Messrs. Melrose send us a book which, in spite of a certain pretentiousness which is apt to jar on the reader, we can heartily recommend to the parent anxious to provide a schoolboy with thoroughly healthy reading: The Book of the V.C. (3s. 6d.). It is a record of the deeds of heroism for which the Victoria Cross has been bestowed from its institution in 1857 to the present day, and has been compiled from official papers and other authoritative sources by Mr. A. L. Haydon to celebrate the Jubilee of its subject. Mr. Haydon found it impossible within the prescribed limits to carry out his original intention to give an account of all V.C. exploits, but a good selection has been made.

The Imperial Reader (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d. net), edited by the Hon. William Pember Reeves and Mr. E. E. Speight has this to recommend it, that practically all the information contained between the covers comes from the best possible—who is often the only real—authority on each subject. The book, in the words of the sub-title, is "a descriptive account of the territories forming the British Empire," and the plan pursued has been to give extracts relating to the country under discussion from famous speeches or articles or books written by a recognised expert. The obvious disadvantage of the method is that the language used is often beyond the comprehension of the schoolboy for whom the book is intended. "Like a virgin Goddess in a primaeval world, Canada still walks in unconscious beauty among her golden woods and by the margin of her trackless streams, catching but broken glances of her radiant majesty as mirrored on their surface, and scarcely recks as yet of the glories awaiting her in the olympus of nations" will add little to the schoolboy's knowledge of Canada, and to-day the words are not true. Thirty odd years ago they were; but the book bears the date of 1906.

To the series of English School Texts, edited by Dr. Rouse and published by Messrs. Blackie at sixpence per volume, there have been added: Izaak Walton's Compleat Angler (abridged); Kingsley's Water Babies (abridged); The Age of the Antonines (reprinted, almost unabridged, from Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire"); Speeches on America (Burke's Speeches on American Taxation and on Conciliation with America, the latter abridged); Macaulay's Third Chapter ("The State of England in 1685," without the original footnotes); the second part of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (abridged); and Sir Thomas More's Utopia (Raphe Robinson's emended translation of 1556, with some omissions). A commendably brief introduction dealing with the author and his work is prefixed to each volume of an excellent little series at a very modest price.

Messrs. Macmillan's similar series—English Literature for Secondary Schools—is intended for students rather more advanced. To The Boy's Odyssey (1s. 6d.), by Walter Copland Perry, Mr. T. S. Peppin has written a capital introduction; other additions are: Part II. of A Book of Golden Deeds of All Times and All Lands (1s.), gathered and narrated by Charlotte Mary Yonge (a selection, edited by Helen H. Watson); Select Scenes and Passages from the English Historical Plays of Shakespeare (10d.), edited by C. H. Spence; Kingsley's Andromeda, with the Story of Perseus Prefixed (1s.), edited by George Yeld; A Midsummer Night's Dream (1s.), edited by P. T. Creswell; and Narratives from Macaulay (1s.): "The Trial of the Bishops"; "The Siege of Londonderry"; and "The Massacre of Glencoe." The type and printing are much above the average of school-books.

The Cambridge University Press issue a second selection of the Lambs' Tales from Shakespeare (1s. 6d.), edited by J. H. Fletcher: A Midsummer Night's Dream; The Winter's Tale; Much Ado about Nothing; Macbeth; A Comedy of Errors; and Othello. A short introduction and a glossary are given, and in an appendix there are one or more simple passages from each of the plays from which the selected tales are taken.

Messrs. Black publish, in their series of Sir Walter Scott Continuous Readers, a much abridged edition of The Abbot (1s. 6d.) with an introduction and notes by H. Corstorphine. We do not think there was any need for the book, and neither the introduction nor the collection of notes contains anything very new or illuminating.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Now ready. Large crown 8vo, pp. xvi + 480. Price 6s.

A GRAMMAR OF CLASSICAL LATIN. For Use in Schools and Colleges. By ARTHUR SLOMAN, M.A., formerly Master of the King's Scholars in Westminster School, late Headmaster of Birkenhead School.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.—"By 'Classical Latin' is here meant that literary dialect of which Cicero and Caesar are the recognised exponents in prose, Virgil, Ovid, and Horace in poetry. With regard to Accidence, the scope of this book is extended to some other authors, commonly read in schools, who approximate more or less closely to the severe standards adopted by the literary purists above mentioned."

A Prospectus will be sent on application.

PLINY.—LETTERS. BOOK VI. Edited by J. D. DUFF, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. 2s. 6d. [Pitt Press Series.]

Now ready. Large crown 8vo, cloth. pp. vii + 404. Price 6s. net.

A GRAMMAR OF THE GERMAN LANGUAGE. By G. H. CLARKE, M.A., Head Master of the Acton County School, and C. J. MURRAY, B.A., of Champéry, Switzerland.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.—"In these days of 'new methods' and 'short cuts' it is perhaps, almost a heresy to speak of teaching grammar for its own sake, and more than presumptuous to venture to add to the number of German grammars already existing. . . . In the present book the authors have endeavoured to give modern usages to be found in works of the best writers rather than the stereotyped rules of grammarians. . . . Colloquial usage, which is as different from literary language, has not been neglected, and has been referred to as far as limits would allow."

THE WINCHESTER ARITHMETIC. By C. GODFREY, M.A., Head Master of the Royal Naval College, Osborne, and G. M. BELL, B.A., Senior Mathematical Master at Winchester College. Crown 8vo, 3s. Teachers' Edition, with Solutions, interleaved, 6s. net.

NATURE.—"This admirable text-book will rank high amongst its fellows, and it would be difficult to find a school arithmetic more worthy of general use."

ELEMENTARY GEOMETRY, PRACTICAL and THEORETICAL.

By C. GODFREY, M.A., and A. W. SIDDON, M.A. Large crown 8vo, pp. xii + 356.

(1) Complete in One Volume. Price 3s. 6d.

(2) In Two Volumes. Vol. I. (Experimental Course, and Books I. and II.), 2s.; Vol. II. (Books III. and IV.), 2s.

(3) In Five Parts at 1s. each.

Answers to the Examples, price 4d. post free.

SOLUTIONS OF THE EXERCISES. By E. A. PRICE, B.A. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A List of New and Standard Books for Schools will be sent on application.

LONDON: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, FETTER LANE—C. F. CLAY, Manager.

ARITHMETIC FOR SCHOOLS & COLLEGES

By JOHN ALLISON, M.A., F.R.S.E.,

Headmaster George Watson's College for Boys, Edinburgh;

AND

JOHN BROWN CLARK, M.A., F.R.S.E.

Mathematical Master, George Heriot's School, Edinburgh.

Complete, 528 pp., Price 4s.

Issued also in Two Parts. Part I., 2s. 6d.; Part II., 2s.

G. M. M., in NATURE writes: "No better exposition of the nature of arithmetical operations and of proofs of the various rules of Arithmetic than that which these two Scottish authors here present to us can be found."

MATHEMATICAL & PHYSICAL TABLES

PREPARED BY

JOHN B. CLARK, M.A., F.R.S.E.

Mathematical and Physics Master, George Heriot's School, Edinburgh.

CONTENTS.

Logarithms and Antilogarithms, Natural Sines, Cosines and Tangents, Logarithmic Sines, Cosines, and Tangents Squares, Cubes, Square Roots, etc. Conversion Tables (Length, Area, Volume, Weight, Force, etc.). Mathematical Constants, Gravitation, Properties of Solids, Liquids and Gases, Moments of Inertia, etc.

Narrow page, rounded corners; suitable for pocket.

Clearly printed on Strong Mantilla, 34 pages. Price 6d.

OLIVER & BOYD, Tweeddale Court, Edinburgh.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

CITY :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

The Perfected System of Life Assurance.

LEGAL & GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

69TH ANNUAL REPORT, 1905 :

NEW BUSINESS exceeded	-	-	-	-	£2,600,000
NEW PREMIUMS nearly	-	-	-	-	£138,000
ASSETS exceeded	-	-	-	-	£5,123,500
THE INCOME Increased to	-	-	-	-	£678,000

Average Rate of Interest earned, £4 8s. per cent.

Valuation Rate of Interest REDUCED to £2 10s. per cent.

Business in Force now exceeds £19,000,000 Sterling.

BONUS RETURNS, 1897-1901.

SURPLUS SHOWN - - - £376,545.

Interim Bonuses paid during the period, £39,871.

The next Division of Profits will be made as at December 31, 1906.

FULL INFORMATION ON APPLICATION TO—

THE MANAGER, 10 FLEET STREET, LONDON.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

VERSES FOR CHILDREN

MEDITATING the other night in mine own apartment on the subject of inspiring a love of reading in little children, I tried to think how I myself acquired the habit. The set teaching of literature is a thing I have never admired. It is necessary, perhaps, that there should be a certain amount of drilling and instruction, but the effect seems to me to be vulgarising to the point of desecration. At least, it is my personal opinion, which I would not for worlds try to impose upon anybody else, that of all books the most dismal are text-books on literature. There may be some object not apparent to my mind in learning the names of authors and their works and learning the opinions that other readers have passed upon their books, but it never bore any fruit in my own case. Yet on looking back it seems to me that the happiest hours of life, and the purest and most innocent pleasures, were those derived from reading. To inculcate a taste for it, then, in children, is to bestow a very precious gift. Yet it is most difficult to say how one attained it. It was certainly not from school. As a child, I possessed a memory out of the common, and there was no reading-book which came into my hands of which I could not have repeated the whole of the prose and the verse from one cover to the other. Even at the present moment, when one does not like to say how distant school-days have become, great screeds of them are still remembered. Yet all that was purely mechanical. To this very moment the mere fact of having got those verses by rote is an obstruction to an understanding of them. There was a poem beginning:

Stay, lady, stay, for mercy's sake,
And hear a piteous orphan's tale,
Ah, 'tis sure my looks must pity wake,
'Tis want that makes my cheek so pale.

The words seem to be absolutely simple to-day, and yet the very first of them was associated in my mind with an article of female attire, and the association has still lingered in my mind. There were scores of other school pieces that were got by heart with an equal lack of intelligence. It happened, however, that both my father and my mother had a natural love of poetry, and it was considered a treat to hear either of them read it. Probably the mere fact that they were not by any means eager to do so, and had to be asked and urged, enhanced the pleasure. At any rate, pieces of Wordsworth, Tennyson, Longfellow, Burns, much more difficult than the school verse, were fully understood and treasured when heard at home. One reason, as it seems to me now, was that this was regarded as amusement pure and simple. There was no attempt made either to teach or explain. If one understood it was all very well, and if one did not understand it was equally well. Nobody asked any questions, and the consequence was that good fruit came of it. A love of poetry came through another avenue. This was the mouth of an old nurse, one of the very few people whom it has been my luck to encounter in the flesh who actually knew old ballads from oral tradition. In her case it could only be from the lips, since she died without ever having acquired the arts of reading or writing. But at her work and sometimes when she was hushing a baby to sleep, she, unconsciously to herself as one would think, was in the habit of crooning old ballads. Our present squeamish generation might perhaps object to some of them on account of a certain breadth both of language and subject. But they conveyed no evil sense to the mind of a child. Even now I can almost hear her murmuring:

"Weel may ye save an' see, bonny lass,
An' weel may ye save an' see."
"An' sae wi' you, ye weel-bred knight,
And what's your will wi' me?"

And another of her great favourites was:

I dined wi' my true-love; mother make my bed soon,
For I'm weary wi' hunting, and fain wald lie down.

Probably one had heard these and perhaps a dozen ballads of a similar nature from the very moment of coming into the world, and yet it is easy to remember the day and hour on which it struck me that some intelligible story was being conveyed by the old woman's monotonous hum, and from that time an interest in ballad literature was awakened that has gone on increasing ever since.

The difficulty about all this, however, is that it is impracticable. It would be of little use, for instance, to advertise for a nurse guaranteed to sing Border ballads, and if the said nurse acquired some knowledge of them for the purpose its virtue would certainly disappear in the process. There was an old schoolmaster whose constant injunction about everything was: "Search for the principle," and the principle here seems to be that those who would teach children to love literature ought first to learn to love it themselves. Such love, like a fever, is infectious. But it is not enough to like verses. A time comes when it is necessary to exercise some critical faculty in order to select and reject. The formation of a fine and sound taste is one of the most difficult tasks conceivable. Yet here, too, there ought to be a principle running through the entire treatment of children, and touching upon their physical as well as their mental culture. A somewhat whimsical friend of the writer sometimes inveighs with great bitterness against what he calls the vicious taste of the age, but he generally ends by asking with a kind of triumph in his voice how it is possible to expect anything else. He points out that we have a population clothed with machine-made garments, fed to a large extent with tinned meats and shop-eggs, surrounded and encircled with machine-made goods of every description, and his counsel of perfection is that children should from infancy be taught to reject all this. They should eat the produce of the earth as it is obtained from field and garden, they should be simply clothed with clothing woven by hand, they should be accustomed to furniture that is also man's handiwork, not machine-made. In that way, he argues, you would implant in the juvenile mind a fine sense of naturalness that would soon extend to art and literature. The next step is to go to the amusements, and his indignation is hot indeed when he comes to speak of the iniquity of taking children to see caged animals.

Though he is one of the gentlest of men I know, he would willingly consign to an early grave all the performing dogs of the music-halls, as well as the elephants, bears, seals and other zoological wonders so dear to the general rabble. But he would in every way encourage the observation of wild and tame life as it exists under natural conditions. He thinks it inevitable that the mental distortion thus encouraged should be carried into art, and rails against monstrosities in the picture-books offered to children, such as animals with men's heads, and men with animals' heads. The human figure and countenance he declares to be of such infinite variety that without distortion it will serve any purpose either of amusement or instruction. The principles underlying these objections he would bring to bear upon literature. The first demand made upon poetry is that it should be simple and natural. To say so sounds almost like a truism, but whoever will take up an anthology of children's verses will find that it is a truism systematically disregarded. As far as I know, there never yet has been published a garland of verse for children that would even at a great distance compare, for instance, with the Golden Treasury. And in many of the latest attempts to make this kind of anthology poetry has been inserted which not every grown man could understand, and which must be worse than Greek to the little ones.

There must be a good deal of truth in the objections made by my whimsical friend, since it is certain that general taste is very far indeed from showing that advance which is being made in various other directions. The manners and general behaviour of the younger generation, for example, show a very marked improvement upon those of their elders, and it is a great pity that it cannot be accompanied by greater discernment and more fastidiousness in regard to the things of the spirit.

A.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Spell of Fairy," by R. G. T. Coventry.]

FICTION

The Call of the Blood. By ROBERT HICHENS. (Methuen, 6s.)

It is not given to many writers to be always at their best; and the "Call of the Blood" has not the greatness of "The Garden of Allah." Nevertheless, it is a fine, moving story, worked out with all the care, the excessive care, that Mr. Hichens always spends on his tales. The scene is Sicily, and the spirit of Sicily is in every page. The blood is Sicilian blood—a drop or two in the veins of a young Englishman; and the drop or two is enough to call him away from his duty to his newly married wife, away from his English ways of thought and actions—to make a Pagan of him, and leave him to be touched after all by the post-Pagan remorse for broken faith and ruined honour—his own and a woman's. It is a full-blooded, stirring story—a work which, if Mr. Hichens had not written "The Garden of Allah," we might hail as the greatest novel of passion of the century.

The Pillar of Cloud. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

MR. RICHARD WHITEING, "Dolf Wyllarde," and others have lately told us in works of fiction the stories of gentlemen who have to work for their living: Mr. Francis Gribble goes more unflinchingly than any into the same question. Given a temperament that longs for love, for joy, even for comfort and ease, in a girl who has to face a life of drudgery and poverty; and given the offer of escape, though it be through the door of dishonour; if the temperament is strong enough, it will take the opportunity. Thereafter the path is inevitably downward; and we follow Bella L'Estrange on her downward path until late-waken shame arrests her almost at the last moment and she returns to face drudgery and poverty once more. That is the story Mr. Gribble has to tell; no polite romance for the drawing-room, but a tale of hard truths and bitter facts; a tale for grown men and women who realise how beauty can be made even of the seamy side of life.

In the Days of the Comet. By H. G. WELLS. (Macmillan, 6s.)

IN this new book Mr. Wells shows himself again something more than the scientific romancer. As in "The Food of the Gods" and other books, his real object is to express the enthusiasm for humanity, the ardent belief in its potentialities for strength, beauty and sense, the fierce impatience with the insincerity, injustice and stupidity of the present order of things, which are his genuine passions. His book falls into two parts: the first tells what happened before the comet struck the earth and changed our atmosphere; the other what happened after that event, and the contrast is great. There is an end of the needless suffering born of ignorance and folly, an end of class jealousies and injustice, an end of war. Mankind is reformed, from its clothes to its character; and if the beautiful dream is not altogether convincing—if, for instance, we, on this side of the comet, cannot yet understand how our fortunate successors are going to manage their free-love-affairs—that does nothing to mar the beauty and sanity of an earnest and exceedingly interesting book.

Benita. An African Romance. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. (Cassell, 6s.)

THE Rider Haggard of "Jess" and "Dawn" is a very able novelist; the Rider Haggard of "Rural England" and "The Farmer's Year" is a writer of standing and social importance; the Rider Haggard the world has a tenderness for is the author of "King Solomon's Mines" and "She." That is the Rider Haggard of "Benita," a delightful, naive story of a ruined Phœnician city and fortress, the degenerate remnants of a once great race; treasure buried by Portuguese centuries ago below a temple, while they starved to death within a few feet of their useless wealth, European adventurers who come to seek that wealth, and find it after sufferings many and strange, a girl in whom dwells the spirit of her long dead namesake, romance, mystery, adventure. Here is the old touch, the old fascination; and the tale—a constant stream of excitement—ends as such tales should end, happily.

MUSIC

SCHOOL SONGS

"ENGLISH FOLK-SONGS FOR SCHOOLS" is one out of very many volumes attempting to deal with the vexed question of what songs shall be taught to school children and how they shall be taught. The Rev. S. Baring Gould and Mr. Cecil Sharp, the editors, make their answer to the question sufficiently clear. It is: English tunes only, and of them such as are not only by English composers, but are unaffected by foreign influence. Such a stipulation practically eliminates all modern music, and for greater security the editors fall back upon traditional folk-songs, and have issued a school selection from their own collections of these under the above title. Whether their answer is to be accepted or not, there is probably no one who will not agree that the beautiful melodies of English folk-song should find an important place in the musical curriculum of our schools, and that it would be a benefit to make them supplant the rubbish which is turned out in quantities and accepted by school teachers ignorant of the first principles of beautiful melody, who accept these things because they have a strong rhythm or an occasional sugary harmony in the accompaniment, or most of all because they are printed in tonic solfa notation, and only cost a penny. The Editors have the weighty utterance of the Board of Education on their side as well as the opinion of all the well-informed musical people who take an unpractical interest in school music, but since the ultimate choice of songs still rests with the teachers they would have been wise to consider more some small practical points which influence, at any rate, elementary school teachers in their choice. This book costs half a crown, and is printed only in staff notation. The accompaniments as a rule are not attractive, and in no way embellish the melody except by supporting it with a few bare chords. In nine cases out of every ten three or four bars of characterless music, vaguely suggesting the first line of the tune and ending with a pause mark, thereby entirely suspending the rhythm which has been set, precede the song itself. This is bad. It connects with the old free-rhythmed melodies the conventions which belong to the third-rate type of song, against which the editors are protesting so manfully, and it is not to be wondered at, if in some cases the school teacher, whose musical judgment it must be remembered is very unformed, fails to see the difference between the good and bad tunes when similarly surrounded. More than this, we have wandered so far away from our own folk-song, and the ears of even the most unsophisticated country child are now so thoroughly attuned to the commonplace tonic and dominant of harmonised music, as well as the plain rhythms of three or four in a bar, that it requires some coaxing to make our ears enjoy the beauty of tunes which originally had no reference to any such harmony or rhythm. In reducing them to modern notation and giving them an accompaniment, some sort of compromise with conventional rhythms and harmonies had to be made, of course, but it is difficult to believe that the accompaniments could not have been made to minister to the original rhythm and tonality of the tune to some extent, without involving a more elaborate technique. In some cases it is necessary to take the tune out of its stiff surroundings to discover any distinctive beauty in it at all. "The Merry Hay-makers," No. 26, is such a one. It is not one of the best of tunes, but its third line redeems it and gives it point; yet as it appears here it might easily be passed over as a dull song. On the other hand, "Strawberry Fair," which comes next to it, has in a very simple way that touch of art in the setting, which would at once commend it to both children and teachers.

Apart from these faults in the manner of presenting their work, the editors' selection and arrangement calls for little comment other than praise. The classification under the headings: "Ballads," "Songs," and "Infant's Songs," is a good one, and in each set most delightful specimens are included. "Lord Randal," "The Two Magicians," "The Golden Vanity," "Henry Martin," are some of the best known of the first section. The words are the most interesting part of many of these. The editors have not been afraid to print twelve, fourteen or sixteen verses where the original authors took as many to tell their tale, though they tell us that they have been "constrained to curtail them to some extent," and the words have needed editing in one or two other ways. Of the songs "The Seed of Love," "Dabbling in the Dew," "The Fox," "Let Bucks a-hunting go," and several others, are pretty well known in one form or another, but there are a good many which will certainly be new to the majority of children, and are no less delightful both in words and music than these. So with the nursery rhymes, there is a happy mixture of those which most children know, with those that few do, though some who have been nurtured on the new-fangled forms of "Simple Simon" and the one beginning "My father died and I cannot tell how" may resent as innovations the older forms here given.

There are one or two instances where an inferior form of a tune has been chosen. "Henry Martin" is a case in point. In Mr. Sharp's "Folk-songs from Somerset," second series, he gives a far more vigorous, though rather more elaborate tune than the one here used, and the children would certainly enjoy singing it more than this one. The same may be said of "Dabbling in the Dew." Of the many forms in which this song is known, the one here given is certainly among the less happy.

These are little exceptions in a very well selected book, the general merit of which makes us notice the faults. It may fail as a book for class singing in elementary schools, while as a collection of folk-songs it is admirable. If we close the book unconvinced that English folk-song is the one and only type of song to be taught in our schools, it is partly because this book is not quite well enough compiled to be "the very thing." There have been a good many admirable books of children's songs, national songs and others, but there is a real need for something which shall be better than any of them. A book is wanted which shall be not only, like this one, the result of a refined taste in words and tunes, but arranged with the practical knowledge of one who has taught children. Such a book would appeal to unmusical teachers of music (of which there are a great many both in elementary and secondary schools) because of its practical utility, just as does the bad music which has these qualities. Well chosen and set, these simple expressions of healthy country life must be able again to make their way into the hearts of the children, whether town or country bred; and, besides raising the level of taste in poetry and music, how far their influence might go to restore something of the lost natural beauty of life it is possible to hope rather than to calculate.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. FRANCIS GRIFFITHS has almost ready for publication a volume by Mr. W. S. Williams on "Newman, Pascal, Loisy and the Catholic Church." The purpose of the book is to give, in outline, the philosophic basis of the Liberal Catholic Movement. It attempts to show that Liberal Catholicism is founded on the best traditions of Catholic thought, and that, in the Catholic Church, those writers who have the widest influence and the most enduring reputation were as Liberal as they were Catholic, and found in an authoritative religion a reason the more for freedom in religious thinking, and in this freedom a reason the more for authority in religion.

Mr. S. C. Kaines Smith, M.A., has just completed a book, entitled "The Elements of Greek Worship," which will be published by Mr. Francis Griffiths in a few days. The object of the book is to present in a small compass the spirit of the ancient Greek religion, in a form which may be acceptable to those who, while wishing to obtain some insight into ancient Greek culture, have neither the time nor the means for an exhaustive study of the subject.

Messrs. Black have in the press "The Education of an Artist," by Mr. C. Lewis Hind. The book tells how Claude Williamson Shaw, casting about for a way to express his temperament, decided upon painting; studied art in Cornwall and the Paris studios, and travelled all over the Continent studying the pictures of the world in pursuit of his art education. The volume is profusely illustrated by photographs of the pictures and sculptures that stirred, stimulated, pleased, or annoyed him in the different cities he visited.

Mr. John Lane will publish, on September 18, a book, entitled "Memoirs of the Count de Cartrie," described as "a record of the extraordinary events in the life of a French Royalist during the war in La Vendée, and of his flight to Southampton, where he followed the humble occupation of gardener." These memoirs are printed from a contemporary manuscript English translation which only came to light last year. An Introduction is furnished by Frederic Masson. Three other works will be issued by the same publisher on the same date: "From Fox's Earth to Mountain Tarn: Days among the Wild Animals of Scotland," by J. H. Crawford; an édition-de-luxe of Oscar Wilde's "Salome," containing Beardsley's illustrations and an introduction by Robert Ross; and "Ledgers and Literature: Being the Recreations of a Book-keeper," by George Knollys. Mr. Crawford's book deals, of course, with the natural history of Scotland. It is illustrated with a carefully selected series of photographs from life.

A book by Commander J. W. Gambier, R.N., entitled "Links in My Life on Land and Sea" will be published by Mr. Unwin on September 17. Captain Gambier made his mark as a writer when Times correspondent in the Russo-Turkish War, and has subsequently contributed articles to the Fortnightly and Nineteenth Century. His book pictures the old Navy, as it was in early Victorian days, practically as Nelson left it, with the scent of tar and the rattle of sails and cordage, instead of the thump of the screw and the smell of oil of the modern fleet; and he describes incidents in the Crimean, Baltic and New Zealand wars, and fights with savages in the Pacific Islands.

Mr. James Bryce and Mr. Herbert Paul are contributing introductions essays to the "Literary and Critical Essays of Sir Leslie Stephen," which Messrs. Smith, Elder are preparing to publish in ten volumes.

FORTHCOMING EDUCATIONAL BOOKS

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.—The Cambridge School History of England. By Arthur D. Innes; The Teaching of Modern Languages and the Training of Teachers. By Karl Breul. Third edition. Revised and enlarged. Student's Handbook to the University and Colleges of Cambridge. Corrected to June 30, 1906. 3s. net; Trigonometry for Beginners. By J. W.

Mercer. Cambridge Tracts on Mathematics and Mathematical Physics, General Editors: J. G. Leatham, and E. T. Whittaker, No. 3, Quadratic Forms and their Classification by means of Invariant Factors. By T. I. A. Bromwich. The Cambridge Physical Series: Conduction of Electricity through Gases. By J. J. Thomson. New edition. A Treatise on the Theory of Alternating Currents. By A. Russell. Vol. ii. Pitt Press Series: Goldsmith: The Traveller and The Deserted Village. Edited with Introduction and Notes, by William Murison; Scott: The Talisman. Edited by A. S. Gaye; Corneille: Le Cid. Edited by H. W. Eve. Contributions to the History of Education in Mediæval and Modern Europe: General Editor, Professor W. H. Woodward; Education in the Age of the Renaissance, 1400-1600. By Professor W. H. Woodward.

MR. MURRAY.—Word Pictures in Rhyme and Prose (Causeries Rimées). By Mrs. S. C. Boyd. A collection of simple stories in French for young children, illustrated by specially drawn illustrations. The text, both in ordinary and in phonetic type, supplement for the use of teachers; A Philological Study of the English Language. By Henry Cecil Wyld. Exercises in Physics, For Homework. By J. H. Leonards and W. H. Salmon. Geometry. By S. O. Andrew, Headmaster of the Whitgift Grammar School, Croydon. A new edition, revised throughout. Colonization and Empire. By F. A. Kirkpatrick. Empire Builders. By the Rev. W. K. Stride.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON.—Rivington's Text-books of English History, for the use of schools in which special subjects in English History are being taught. With maps, plans, genealogies, analyses, lists of dates, etc. By Arthur Hassall, M.A. In nine volumes. It is hoped that these text-books will prove suitable for the Middle and Upper Forms of schools, for Local Examination purposes, and for other Examinations in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, etc.: Vol. i., Early Britain, 449-1066; vol. ii., The Normans and Angevins, 1066-1307; vol. iii., The Later Plantagenets and the French War, 1307-1399; vol. iv., The Wars of the Roses, 1399-1485; vol. vi., The Great Rebellion, 1603-1660; vol. vii., The Restoration and the Revolution, 1660-1715; vol. viii., The Expansion of Great Britain, 1715-1789. An Illustrated History of England, for Upper and Middle Forms of Schools, and for students working for the Oxford and Cambridge Local and other Examinations. By W. S. Robinson. 3s. 6d. With numerous illustrations and maps. Rivington's New Intermediate French Texts. On the direct method. With notes and oral exercises both in French, passages for retranslation, and questionnaire. With illustrations. Edited by W. G. Hartog. Each 1s.: Les Jumeaux de l'Hôtel Corneille (E. About); Tamango and Le Coup de Pistolet (Prosper Mérimée); Les quatre Talismans (Nodier); Un Episode de Guerre (Henri Beyle - Stendhal). Rivington's Illustrated French Comedies for Schools. Edited with notes and oral exercises both in French, questionnaire, exercises, and passages for retranslation based on the text. With illustrations. Edited by W. G. Hartog. Each 1s.: La Joie fait peur (Mme. de Girardin); Valérie (E. Scribe); Le Major Cravachon (Labiche, Lefranc, and Jessé); Le Diplomate (Scribe). Rivington's Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer Book, for the use of teachers and students. With introduction, map, text, notes, schemes of lessons, and blackboard summaries. General Editor, the Rev. Bernard Reynolds, M.A.: The First Volume of the Captivity: Daniel and Ezra, by Canon G. W. Garrod; The Second Volume of the Captivity: Nehemiah and Esther, by Canon G. W. Garrod; The Gospel According to St. John, by Canon W. C. E. Newbolt; The Acts of the Apostles, by the Rev. Bernard Reynolds, and the Rev. G. H. L. Walpole, D.D. Scripture Text-books for Children. Written by the Rev. G. P. Trevelyan, M.A. With a preface by the Rev. Canon Brooke. No. 2: The Beginnings of the Church of Christ. This book is the second of a series published under the auspices of the Society of the Catechism.

MESSRS. DENT announce their new series of Mathematical and Scientific Text Books for Schools, edited by W. J. Greenstreet: A First Statics. By C. S. Jackson and R. M. Milne, with upwards of 200 diagrams and numerous examples (4s. net); Trigonometry. By Cecil Hawkins, M.A. Dent's Modern Language Series: A new and revised edition of Hints on Teaching French, with a running commentary to Dent's First New French Book and Second French Book. By Walter Rippmann (1s. 6d. net). Rippmann's Picture Vocabulary: French. Second Series; German, Second Series (per vol. 1s. net).

MESSRS. GEORGE PHILIP AND SON.—A set of School Gardening Diagrams for class use in connection with the manual on School Gardening published by the same firm. A Rhythmic Approach to Mathematics. By E. L. Somervell, with a preface by Mary Everest; for Infant Schools, Kindergartens and Nurseries. Rafia Work. By Miss Swannell. Sixty illustrations by the author; Child Life in our Schools. By Miss M. A. Brown. A Manual of Method for teachers of Infants' Schools. Preface by Miss Hughes, late Principal of the Training College for Secondary Teachers, Cambridge. A Course of Comparative Geography on the Concentric System. By P. H. L'Estrange. With 170 coloured maps, also numerous illustrations and diagrams in the text. Lectures on Compass Adjustment. By Captain W. R. Martin, R.N. As given to Navigating Officers of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich. With numerous illustrations and charts. How to learn on shore the rule of the road at sea. By Captain E. W. Owens. Illustrated with numerous diagrams. A new series of Geographical Readers. By H. A. Mackinder. Book i., "Our Island Home," with numerous illustrations and coloured maps. Model Duplex Maps. A series of maps for scholars' use, showing a photo-relief model and a political map opposite one another, with Summaries of Geographical information. Sixteen varieties. Geographical Gleanings. By Rev. Frank R. Burrows.

CORRESPONDENCE

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is an amusing paper in The World (No. 101 of date December 5, 1754), contributed by Lord Chesterfield, in which he is very humorous over the "orthography of our language, which is at present," he writes, "very various and unsettled. We have at present two very different orthographies, the pedantic and the polite; the one founded upon certain dry, crabbed rules of etymology and grammar, the other, singly upon the justness and delicacy of the ear." The latter he calls "auricular orthography." "I have really known very fatal consequences attend that loose and uncertain practice; of which I shall produce two instances as a sufficient warning."

He proceeds to give the following couple of stories which present the matter now agitating a good many minds in a light I have not seen it anywhere considered in.

"A very fine gentleman wrote a very harmless innocent letter to a very fine lady, giving her an account of some very trifling Commissions which he had executed according to her orders. This letter, though directed to the lady, was, by the mistake of a servant, delivered to, and opened by the husband; who finding all his attempts to understand it unsuccessful, took it for granted that it was a concerted cipher, under which a Criminal Correspondence, not much to his own honour and advantage, was secretly carried on. With the letter in his hand, and rage in his heart, he went immediately to his wife, and reproached her in the most injurious terms with her supposed infidelity. The lady conscious of her own innocence, calmly requested to see the grounds of so unjust an accusation; and, being accustomed to the auricular orthography, made shift to read to her incensed husband the most inoffensive letter that ever was written."

(Perhaps some modern dramatist may see the materials here for a short "Curtain-raiser," which would have the merit anyhow of being "topical.")

Lord Chesterfield's other story runs thus: "The other accident had much worse consequences. Matters were happily brought between a fine gentleman and a fine lady, to the decisive period of an appointment at a third place. The place where is always the lover's business, the time when the lady's. Accordingly an impatient and rapturous letter from the lover signified to the lady the house and street where; to which a tender answer from the lady assented, and appointed the time when. But unfortunately, from the uncertainty of the lover's auricular orthography, the lady mistook both house and street, was conveyed in a hackney chair to a wrong one, and in the hurry and agitation which ladies are sometimes in upon those occasions, rushed into a house where she happened to be known, and her intentions consequently discovered. In the meantime the lover passed three or four hours at the right place, in the alternate agonies of impatient and disappointed love, tender fear, and anxious jealousy.

"Such examples really make one tremble; and will, I am convinced, determine my fair fellow-subjects and their adherents, to adopt, and scrupulously conform to, Mr. Johnson's rules of true orthography by book."

So, here is evidence that phonetic spelling was over one hundred and fifty years ago followed by force majeure by fashionable but illiterate men and women, who couldn't help themselves. Now we have educated ones pleading for it, which is strange, to say the least. There were a sort of ancestors of theirs in Shakespeare's time; for does not Holofernes in Love's Labour's Lost twit all those of Don Adriano de Armado's fashion of speech: "I abhor such fanatical fantasms, such insociable and point-devise companions; such rakers of orthography as to speak dout, fine, when he should say doubt; det, when he should pronounce debt, d, e, b, t; not d, e, t; he clepeth a calf, cauf; half, hauf; neighbour vocatur nebour; neigh, abbreviated ne; this is abominable (which he would call abominable): it insinuateth me of insanie."

Some suppose that Armado is meant for Lyly. Anyhow it is the enphuists whom Holofernes has in mind, so that our modern form of pronunciation was that of the courtiers of Shakespeare's days who were all admirers of "Euphuus and his England," and as we have got along so well for so long a time without bothering ourselves about phonetic spelling I for one hope that its enthusiastic advocates will have all their work to do for nothing—that their ardour will be in theirs a case of Love's labour lost.

R. S. Y.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Away with the machine-made language with which fanatical phoneticians would afflict us! Away with it, or farewell to all possibility of expressing noble thoughts in noble words.

It would place the F r e on a plane with the Biglow Papers, and lower Shakespeare to the level of Artemus Ward. Who dares try to imagine the solemn philosophy of Job embodied in this buffoonery of orthography? It would read like the illiterate work of a servant-girl.

Language was born, not made; it grows, and is not built. Its present orthography is a living thing: that which phonetic folly would substitute is a soulless automaton—not half so lovable in its way as the monster created by Frankenstein.

J. B. WALLIS.

Sept. 8.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Dr. Wm. Hand Browne of Johns Hopkins University strongly protests against the President's Spelling-Edict. Hence:

BOOKMEN.

Of books tho' Dr. Brown may know
Whate'er a mortal can,
Yet Roosevelt the world can show
He is a Booker Man.

JOHN B. TABB.

August 27,

AGAINST CERTAIN OF OUR POETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I read in the ACADEMY of August 8 an article by Miss Jane Barlow under the heading "Against Certain of our Poets." While heartily endorsing the feeling indicated, I should like to show reason why the analyses are by no means deep and thorough enough. That there is cause for the first feelings of resentment in the case of all writers who write in the spirit of rebuke and complaint, even in the case of such a writer as Marie Corelli, whose entire basis depends upon reproach and clamour, is true enough; but what is lacking is that it does not go deep and thorough enough. It is a common human trait that it is easy to gain partisans to cry down and to hate others. Thus, to gain the feeling of English people against Germans, or poor against rich is easy enough; but to get people to calmly examine and see that, word for word, Germans are as just and as worthy as English, and quite as helpless, and in no way different from an independent standpoint, as for instance in the case of a Divine Just Judge; and the same argument in respect to rich and poor; is very difficult. In short, thoroughness is the thing that is nowhere in evidence. I have no objection to making a scape-goat of Wordsworth, nor would he himself, I believe, object but it is not to be done by taking off the wheels of his vehicles of speech. It is plain that Wordsworth sought to stand as a champion of the idea that first-place beauties, simple nature as it first affects the conscious individual, are what is the really true and beautiful and wonderful. Thus in "We Are Seven," he would seek to show that in the pure, unsophisticated mind the idea of continuity, the idea of the unbreakable stability of what the pure mind has decided is "a whole," and without the whole of which it can have no idea of happiness, will never be yielded up. In all "first hopes," the idea is that all happiness and joy must be shared equally by all those we love, and none must be excluded. In the visible, practical life, this is always broken and more and more broken. But Wordsworth means that the idea, the hope, or thought of no satisfaction without it, is never abandoned. Thus Keats has his "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever." And Shelley, in his "Beautiful garden and beautiful lady" argues that the beautiful garden and the beautiful lady have not altered or gone; they are the same, but we have lost sight of them for a time. Plato does the same thing in an infinitely higher manner. Thus the whole secret of the Plato-Socratic attitude, and the vitality of the arguments (it is all attitude) is that he will not yield a jot of the idea of original beauty and worth. Thus he cannot have a beautiful person or thing that is, at the same time, wicked; he cannot have a brave person, who is other than good; he cannot have a holiness that does not contain all that is beauty; he cannot have a virtue that is barterable. His power is that he avoids all summaries and stands resolute that all order and beauty shall be preserved. He will not let any of it go. Few persons understand him because they look for summaries instead of attitude. The difference between Wordsworth and Plato is that Plato honours first the soul as understood in the idea of honour, bravery, justice, intelligence and perfect utterance, administrative modesty; whereas Wordsworth honours first things visible to the eye and ear; and the freedom of retirement and solitude; against Plato's freedom in action and advance.

More symbols of language never need be separated from the spirit of the writing. Thus in "Little Nell," death and the grave should not be examined at all in connection with the "mystery of death." Only the worth of the intensity of the pathos, or the opportunity for fixing a figure of beauty should be examined. Thus:

With tottering steps he had wandered there,
Where lay the lovely child . . .
Hush, hush, he cried, she only sleeps,
She'll wake again to-morrow;

"Lovely child," "Where lay the lovely child," becomes beautifully set. The words "Lovely child" are made to live vividly. Death not here at all; its subject is not touched; only the power of the sentiment surrounding it is used.

J. M. A.

Sept. 3.

"LIKE" AS A CONJUNCTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Before you close the discussion on "Like" (conj.), may I say I have, in accordance with Dr. Furnivall's assurance that "like" (conj.) is found in Pericles and in Shelley, read all the former and much of the latter, without finding this "like." Pericles, however, has a rather strange ellipse after "like":

"Thou speak'st like him's untutor'd to repeat" (I. iv.), cf.:
"Tuppence for them's learns manners."

H. H. JOHNSON.

Sept. 8.

THE CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is a matter which causes me great regret to see in your paper this week that Edward Irving is reported as founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church. The Catholic Apostolic Church was founded many years before Irving's time as all Churchmen know. If not, the Nicene Creed is only seventy years old.

ERIC F. SMITH (E.F.S.)

Sept. 6.

[The sect generally known as Irvingites designate themselves as the Catholic Apostolic Church, and, as they disclaim the name of Irvingites, we courteously used their own nomenclature.—Ed.]

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S LAMENESS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—"They remember Scott in his later days . . . and an infirmity in one of his legs" (ACADEMY, p. 220).

Have you not the fear before your eyes of Mr. Andrew Lang? He swoops down on any, even the slightest, inaccuracy (so-called) regarding the Queen of Scots or Scott. The latter was presumably born "pied-bot," as was Byron undoubtedly; and this calamity was certainly common to the two in 1827, when were published the two volumes of "Les poètes anglais vivans" (Paris: Baudry, 1827). Here the notes prefatory to Scott's poetry refer to the coincidence of the two foot-maimed poets. Thus Scott was not pied-bot only in old age, like the scriptural king of valour and prowess; "howbeit, when he was old, he was diseased in his feet."

H. H. JOHNSON.

Sept. 9.

[Scott was not born lame, but became so in infancy. His lameness seems to have been very apparent in old age, as all who remember him can testify.—Ed.]

TITLES WHICH DO NOT DISTINGUISH

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—The communication of F. Mayhew (September 1) is a striking justification for a practice which I have now sumtime adopted of addressing persons and firms without any complimentary title. Who is the gainer from the use of such terms as—more especially—Mr., Mrs., Miss, Messrs. or even as Professor, Dr.?

Can we, by Dr'ing and Sir'ing ad one cubit to our intellectual stature?

T. TALBOT LODGE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Lutz, Jules. Les Verrières de l'ancienne église Saint-Etienne à Mulhouse. Avec 6 planches en phototypie. Supplément au Bulletin du Musée historique de Mulhouse, tome xxix. 104 x 64. Pp. 127. Leipzig: Carl Beck, M. 3.

[The old church at Mulhouse or Mülhausen, in Alsace, was pulled down in 1858 and the famous glass-paintings—some of which date from the fourteenth century—have been put up in the new (reformed) church. M. Lutz describes them, then gives an account of the sources from which the designers took their subjects, the Biblia Pauperum and the Speculum humane salutis; then gives the history of the windows, and attempts, with the aid of former descriptions, to reconstitute the whole series as it was. The illustrations are full of quaint beauty and interest.]

Meehan, J. F. Holting House, now used as the Abbey Church House: being some account of its ancient history and modern uses. With Notes by the Rector, the Rev. Prebendary S. A. Boyd. Illustrated. 84 x 54. Pp. 32. Bath: Meehan, 6d.

[Holting House, Bath, is a composite Tudor-Elizabethan-Jacobean building of some beauty, standing on early Norman foundations. It has memories of the Hungerfords, the Lexingtons, Pope, George III.'s daughter Mary and others, and a history closely connected with that of the city. It is now used as a Church House for the Abbey, and Mr. Mehan's well-illustrated pamphlet is published partly with the object of raising funds for the continuance of the parochial and social work carried on there.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Harrison, James A. George Washington. Patriot, Soldier, Statesman, First President of the United States. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxiv, 481. Putnams, 5s.
[Professor Harrison's book is the latest addition to the excellent series of Heroes of the Nations. It is illustrated with 32 plates, has an appendix on the pedigree of the Washingtons, tracing it from Lancashire temp. Henry VI., and an Index.]
- Die Schweizerische Amazone. Abenteuer, Reisen und Kriegszüge der Frau Oberst Regula Engel von Langwies. Von ihr selbst beschrieben: Herausgegeben von Fritz Bär. Dritte Auflage. 7½ x 5. Pp. 164. Leipzig: Carl Beck. M. r. 60 and M. 2. 40.
[Frau Engel was a remarkable woman, born at Langwies in Grisons in 1761. She followed Napoleon's campaigns in Italy, Egypt, the Netherlands, Spain, Prussia, etc., and lost her husband and two sons and was herself severely wounded at Waterloo. She formed part of the guard of honour sent by Napoleon to escort Marie Louise from Vienna to Paris. She was also the mother of twenty-one children. Her record here published was composed by herself from memory.]

DRAMA.

- Browne, Maurice. Job: a Dramatic Poem. Part I. 9½ x 7½. Pp. 18. Not for sale.
[Mr. Browne, not unknown as a poet, has taken up—in no spirit of emulation—a task which Shelley once hoped to carry out. We shall have more to say of his poem later. The Part before us contains the Prologue in Heaven.]

FICTION.

- Welis, H. G. In the Days of the Comet. 8 x 5½. Pp. 305. Macmillan, 6s. (See p. 266.)
- Cholmondeley, Mary. Prisoners (fast bound in misery and iron). 7½ x 5. Pp. 342. Hutchinson, 6s. (See p. 244.)
- Haggard, H. Rider. Benita: an African Romance. With 16 illustrations by Gordon Browne. 8 x 5½. Pp. 344. Cassell, 6s. (See p. 266.)
- Bacheller, Irving. Silas Strong. 7½ x 5. Pp. 339. Unwin, 6s.
- Penny, F. E. The Tea Planter. 7½ x 5. Pp. 374. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Gribble, Francis. The Pillar of Cloud. 7½ x 5. Pp. 365. Chapman & Hall, 6s. (See p. 266.)
- Boyd, Mary Stuart. Backwaters: A Mystery. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
- Whitby, Beatrice. The Whirligig of Time. 8 x 5. Pp. 335. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Drummond, Hamilton. The Cuckoo. 7½ x 5. Pp. 303. White, 6s.
- Blondelle-Burton, John. Knighthood's Flower: A Romance. 8 x 5½. Pp. 354. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Vance, Louis J. The Private War: Being the truth about Gordon Traill, his personal statement. With four illustrations by George W. Lambart. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 369. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Noble, Edward. Fisherman's Gait. A story of the Thames Estuary. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 355. Blackwood, 6s.
[Illustrated from wash-drawings by the author.]
- McAulay, Allan. The Safety of the Honours. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 351. Blackwood, 6s.
[A historical novel of the "Honours of Scotland," founded partly on a private manuscript in the possession of Sir Patrick Keith Murray of Ochertyre.]
- Williamson, C. N. and A. M. The Car of Destiny, and its Rrround in Spain. With 17 illustrations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 450. Methuen, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Rôles Gascons, transcrits et publiés par Charles Bémont. Tome III., 1290-1307. 11 x 8½. Pp. cc, 792. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale n.p.
[This is another volume in the first series (Political History) of the magnificent Collection de Documents Inédits en l'histoire de France published under the direction of the Minister of Public Instruction. M. Bémont's introduction occupies 200 pages, and the remainder of the volume consists of transcriptions of Gascon Rolls, with notes, and index to vols. ii. and iii.]
- Leyds, W. J. The First Annexation of the Transvaal. 9 x 6. Pp. xxii, 378. Unwin, 21s. net.
[The annexation of 1877, with a sketch of the early relations of the Boers with the British Government. Another volume, in continuation of this, is, Dr. Leyds states, in course of completion.]
- Wyndham, Henry Saxe. The Annals of Covent Garden Theatre from 1732 to 1897. With 45 illustrations. In two volumes. 9 x 6. Pp. xvi, 383, 368. Chatto & Windus, 21s. net.
[A handsome illustrated volume, which makes no claim to give new matter, but collects existing knowledge. We shall return to it later.]

LITERATURE.

- Cawein, Madison. Nature-Notes and Impressions in prose and verse. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. New York: Dutton, $1.50 net.
[Mr. Cawein is a man of letters of strong individuality. The present volume is composed mainly of a series of short notes on nature made during many years, with some poems and a strange little story at the end. Striking imagination and vivid use of words are its characteristics.]
- Grierson, Herbert J. C. The First Half of the Seventeenth Century. Periods of English Literature Series. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xiv, 388. Blackwood, 5s. net.

Abrahams, Israel. A Short History of Jewish Literature from the Fall of the Temple (70 C.E.) to the Era of Emancipation (1786 C.E.). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 176. Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.

[See the ACADEMY of September 8, p. 234. A bibliography is appended to each chapter, and there is a full index. Mr. Abrahams has in preparation a larger work which will deal with the whole of the literary history of the Jews.]

Vincent, Leon H. American Literary Masters. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xiv, 518. Constable, 8s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Vincent's studies start at 1809, the date of the publication of Washington Irving's "Knickerbocker's History," and include no one who had not published a notable book before 1860. His names are Irving, Bryant, Fenimore Cooper, Bancroft, Prescott, Emerson, Poe, Longfellow, Whittier, Hawthorne, Thoreau, Holmes, Motley, Parkman, Bayard Taylor, G. W. Curtis, Donald Grant Mitchell, Lowell, and Whitman. Index.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Junk, Wilhelm. Internationales Adressbuch der Antiquar-Buchhändler (International Directory of Second-hand Booksellers). 9½ x 6½. Pp. 81. Berlin: Junk, n.p.

[Compiled by a famous German bookseller and publisher. Contains a notice of Mr. Bernard Quaritch, a directory of all the second-hand booksellers in the world, an index of specialties and an index of names.]

Sadi's Scroll of Wisdom. With an introduction by Arthur N. Wollaston. Wisdom of the East Series. 6½ x 5. Pp. 63. Murray, 1s. net.

[The works by which Shaikh Sadi—"the nightingale of a thousand songs"—is best known are, says Mr. Wollaston in his preface, the "Bustan," the "Gulistan," possibly the most widely read book in Persian literature, and the "Parid Namah," or "Scroll of Wisdom." No translation of "The Scroll of Wisdom" has been published in this country during the last hundred years, though some twenty years ago an Indian scholar rendered it into English. This, as well as Gladwin's text—issued with an appended translation in 1801—is out of print.]

Maeterlinck, Maurice. My Dog. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. Illustrated by G. Vernon Stokes. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 60. Allen, 3s. 6d. net.

[In memory of Pelléas, M. Maeterlinck's bull-dog, who died at the age of six months: an essay on the dog in general—man's only friend in the animal creation—and Pelléas in particular. Six illustrations in colour.]

POETRY.

Cawein, Madison, J. The Vale of Tempe: Poems. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 274. New York: Dutton, $1.50 net.

[This volume of poems should help to make Mr. Cawein's great ability, as well as his wilfulness, better known to English readers.]

Dabbs, George H. R. Charlotte Corday in Prison. 5½ x 4½. Deacon, 2s. 6d.

[A poem in six-line stanzas, giving Charlotte Corday's musings just before her trial, and then before her execution. It is full of high thought and of no small poetic accomplishment.]

Dodds, James. Primitiae. Miscellaneous Poems. 7½ x 4½. Pp. x, 73. Walter Scott, 1s. net.

[Poems in ballad verse, the sonnet (Shakespearean) and other forms, which show refined and tender thought and religious feeling. But Mr. Dodds's mastery of words and metres is not yet complete, and he is apt to give way to false rhymes.]

Alston, John. Odds and Ends in Rhyme, Old and New. 7½ x 5. Pp. 123. Peebles: Anderson, 3s.

[Straightforward, often eloquent and sometimes musical poems, many of them in the Scots dialect and of local interest.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Purchas, Samuel, B. D. Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas His Pilgrimes: Containyng a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Lande Travells by Englishmen and Others. In twenty volumes. Vols. xv. and xvi. 9½ x 6. Pp. 568 and 579. Glasgow: Mac Lehos, 12s. 6d. net per vol.

Everyman's Library. Edited by Ernest Rhys. Biography. The Journal of the Rev. John Wesley, A.M. Introduction by F. W. Macdonald. Four vols. Pp. xiii, 576; 508; 516; 598. Children's Books. The Girlhood of Shakespeare's Heroines, by Mary Cowden Clarke. Three vols. Pp. xii, 432; 416; 468. Classical. The Dramas of Sophocles in English Verse, by Sir George Young, Bart. Pp. xix, 396. Essays. Keats's Discourses. Introduction by L. March-Phillips. Pp. xvi, 264. Rab and His Friends, and other papers and essays by John Browne. Pp. 390. Fiction. Redgauntlet, by Sir Walter Scott, Bart. Pp. xi, 458. Oratory. Orations on the French War, by William Pitt. Pp. xii, 433. Poetry. Legends and Lyrics and other Poems, by Adelaide Anne Procter. Pp. xii, 332. Science. The Old Red Sandstone, or new walks in an old field, by Hugh Miller. Pp. 363. Theology and Philosophy. The Religio Medici, and other writings of Sir Thomas Browne. Introduction by Professor C. H. Herford. Pp. xvii, 296. Travel and Topography. Gatherings from Spain, by Richard Ford. Introduction by Thomas Okey. Pp. xvi, 370. Each volume 7 x 4½. 1s. net cloth, 2s. net leather. Dent.

[A selection from a further instalment of this library, which now numbers 150 volumes. Its features are too well known to need repetition. The various series are distinguished by bindings of various colours; but we think the effort to make all the volumes as nearly as possible of equal thickness by the use of different paper is unnecessary. It is often easy to recognise a book on a shelf by its thickness, and that would be especially the case in large series.]

SCHOFIELD & JESSOP (Ltd.) are acknowledged to be well qualified by experience and training to advise parents and guardians in the choice of a School or Tutor.—217 Piccadilly, W

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

FAMOUS for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHEN, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

EDUCATIONAL AND SCIENTIFIC BOOKS

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

THE LARGEST STOCK IN LONDON OF SECOND-HAND SCHOOL, CLASSICAL, ELEMENTARY & ADVANCED SCIENTIFIC BOOKS, MATHEMATICAL, THEOLOGICAL AND FOREIGN BOOKS.

BOOKS FOR ALL EXAMINATIONS.

All inquiries as to Prices of Books Answered.

KEYS & TRANSLATIONS. BOOKS BOUGHT.

J. POOLE & CO.,

(ESTABLISHED 1854)

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMYADVERTISEMENT CHARGES

Whole Page	£8 8 0
Half	4 4 0
Quarter	2 2 0
Narrow Column	3 0 0
Per Inch, Narrow Column	0 7 6

SERIAL RATES (for not less than 12 narrow columns)

Whole Page	£7 10 0
Half	3 15 0
Quarter	1 17 6
Narrow Column	2 10 0

SPECIAL POSITIONS AS ARRANGED
SMALL-TYPE ADVERTISEMENTS

6d. per Line. Minimum, 2/6. The first line is counted as two.

Copy for Advertisements must be sent in not later than 12 noon on Thursday. All Orders for Advertisements are received subject to the space being available, and the Proprietors reserve to themselves the right to decline or hold over any Advertisement.

All Communications respecting Advertisements must be addressed to THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER, 20 TAVISTOCK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

The Library of Useful Stories

A SERIES OF POPULAR ILLUSTRATED
MANUALS ON SCIENTIFIC SUBJECTS,
WRITTEN BY SPECIALISTS. POTT 8vo,
CLOTH, 1s. EACH; POST FREE, 1s. 2d. EACH.The Story of*A Grain of Wheat.
By WILLIAM C. EDGAR. 191 Pages, with 39 Illustrations.Alchemy: or, The Beginnings of Chemistry.
By M. M. PATTISON MUIR. 185
Pages, with 19 Illustrations.Alpine Climbing.
By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. 180 Pages, with 20 Illustrations.'Anima' Life.
By B. LINDSAY. 208 Pages, with 94
Illustrations.A Piece of Coal.
By A. E. MARTIN. 179 Pages, with 38 Illustrations.Architecture.
By P. L. WATERHOUSE. 211 Pages, with numerous Illustrations.Art in the British Isles.
By J. E. PHYTHIAN. 214 Pages, with 27 Illustrations.Bird Life.
By W. P. PYCRAFT. 244 Pages, with 7 Illustrations.Books.
By G. B. RAWLINGS. 171 Pages, with 17 Illustrations.British Coinage.
By G. B. RAWLINGS. 224 Pages, with 108 Illustrations from Coins in the British Museum.British Trade and Industry.
By JAMES BURNLEY. 224 Pages.Eclipses.
With special reference to the Solar
Eclipse of 1900. By G. F. CHAMBERS,
F.R.A.S. 251 Pages, with 19 Illustrations.Lost England.
By BECKLES WILLSON. 190 Pages, with 23 Illustrations.Music.
By F. J. CROWE. 203 Pages, with 72 Illustrations.Photography.
By A. T. STORY. 192 Pages, with 38
Illustrations.Primitive Man.
By EDWARD CLODD. 206 Pages, with 88 Illustrations.Rapid Transit.
By BECKLES WILLSON. 197 Pages,
with 37 Illustrations.Religions.
By E. D. PRICE, F.G.S. 227 Pages.Reptile Life.
By W. P. PYCRAFT. 212 Pages, with 29 Illustrations.The Alphabet.
By EDWARD CLODD. 234 Pages,
with 90 Illustrations.The Army.
By Captain OWEN WHEELER. 192
Pages, with 7 Illustrations.The Atlantic Cable.
By CHARLES BRIGHT, F.R.A.E. 220
Pages, with 53 Illustrations.The Atmosphere.
By DOUGLAS ARCHIBALD, M.A. 210
Pages, with 44 Illustrations.The British Race.
By J. MUNRO. 250 Pages, with 4
Maps.The Cotton Plant.
By F. WILKINSON, F.G.S. 299
Pages, with 38 Illustrations.The Story of*Electricity.
By J. MUNRO. 200 Pages, with 100
Illustrations.Euclid.
By W. B. FRANKLAND. 176 Pages with 4 Illustrations.Extinct Civilisations of the East.
By R. E. ANDERSON, M.A. 229
Pages, with 9 Maps.Extinct Civilisations of the West.
By R. E. ANDERSON, M.A. 201
Pages, with 16 Illustrations.Fish Life.
By W. P. PYCRAFT. 210 Pages, with 18 Illustrations.Forest and Stream.
By JAMES RODWAY, F.L.S. 202
Pages, with 27 Illustrations.Geographical Discovery.
By JOSEPH JACOBS. 224 Pages, with 24 Maps, etc.Germ Life: Bacteria.
By H. W. CONN. 212 Pages, with 34
Illustrations.Ice, in the Present and Past.
By W. A. BREND, B.A. 228 Pages, with 37 Illustrations.King Alfred.
By SIR WALTER BESANT. 207
Pages, with 8 Illustrations.Life in the Sea.
By SYDNEY J. HICKSON, D.Sc.,
F.R.S. 182 Pages, with 42 Illustrations.Life's Mechanism.
By W. H. CONN. 219 Pages, with 50
Illustrations.The Chemical Elements.
By M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A.
196 Pages, with 2 Illustrations.The Earth in Past Ages.
By H. G. SEEBLEY, F.R.S. 196 Pages, with 40 Illustrations.The Empire.
By EDWARD SALMON. 172 Pages, with 7 Illustrations.The Mind.
By Professor J. M. BALDWIN. 263
Pages, with 13 Illustrations.The Plants.
By GRANT ALLEN. 232 Pages, with 49 Illustrations.The Potter.
By C. F. BINNS. 248 Pages, with 57
Illustrations.The Solar System.
By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. 202
Pages, with 28 Illustrations.The Stars.
By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. 192
Pages, with 24 Illustrations.The Wanderings of Atoms.
Organic Chemistry. By M. M. PATTI-SON MUIR, M.A. 192 Pages.The Weather.
By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. 234
Pages, with 50 Illustrations.Thought and Feeling.
By F. RYLAND, M.A. 219 Pages, with 13 Illustrations.Wild Flowers.
By the Rev. Professor HENSLOW. 249
Pages, with 56 Illustrations.Wireless Telegraphy.
By A. T. STORY. 186 Pages, with 63
Illustrations.50 Volumes. 10,480 Pages.
1,720 Illustrations.

Of all Booksellers, or from

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office:

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office:

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

THE PAPER FOR A FRIEND ABROAD.

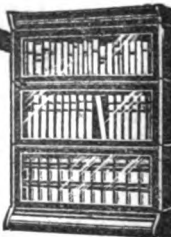

Writing from Saranac Lake, New York,
U.S.A., a reader says:

"I have just finished your issue of June 30th, and I want to say 'Thanks' for it. My father sends it me each week, and I thought it would pleasure you to know how much it is appreciated, though it makes me very homesick at times.

"This is a health resort full of lungers from all parts, and the 'Saturday Westminster' goes quite a round as soon as I get through with it. The Americans—quite a good class up here—are amazed at the price considering the quality, and at the merit of the whole production."

The subscription rate for abroad is 8s. 8d. a year, post free.
Shorter periods at proportionate rates.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

A Home for Books.
Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. They will look well and always be handy if you treat yourself to a "Gunn"

Sectional Bookcase

Its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid handsome piece of furniture. Always complete yet always growing. Full particulars, prices and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 30." to WM. ANGUS & CO. Ltd., 44 Paul St., London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED DRINK THE
WHITE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER. & BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1794

SEPTEMBER 22, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

HIGH SCHOOL AND KINDERGARTEN WORK.

HOME AND COLONIAL SCHOOL SOCIETY.—Incorporated with the National Froebel Union for the issue of Certificates. SECONDARY RESIDENT AND DAY TRAINING DEPARTMENT. Students are now received to prepare for different exams. at 15 Highbury Hill, exactly opposite the College. There is a considerable demand for trained Students of the College.—Apply the Vice-Principal in Charge, Miss KYLE, B.A. NEXT TERM SEPT. 18.

NEUILLY, PARIS.—Mlle. SASSISSON and Miss COCHRAN receive a FEW GIRLS to study French and to continue their Education in all branches; excellent visiting masters.—Address till September 15, c/o F. J. COCHRAN, Esq., 152 Union Street, Aberdeen.

EASTBOURNE.—Half-fees for sake of Games for two GENTLEMEN'S DAUGHTERS in first class School, where education, home advantages, and conditions of health are of the highest.—W. G., Box 16, c/o THE ACADEMY, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.

SCHOFIELD & JESSOP, LTD.,

SCHOLASTIC EXPERTS,

217 PICCADILLY,

LONDON, W.

Appointments Vacant

MESSRS. SCHOFIELD & JESSOP, Ltd. 217 PICCADILLY, W. beg to remind Assistant Masters and Tutors that the vacancies for next term are rapidly filling, and those who have not already sent in their applications, will be well advised to do so at once. There is of course a large number still open, but no time should be lost.

TO AUTHORS.—Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GORREY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP, Secondhand Bookseller, 100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

NEW LAND by Otto Sverdrup; being an account of 4 years in the Arctic Regions, containing 8 maps, 62 full-page, and 158 other illustrations; 2 vols. 8vo, cloth, 1904, 36s. net for 9s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

J. POOLE & CO.

Established 1854.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific

BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

GOOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING (high class), clergyman's daughter; testimonials; several years' experience, Higher Cambridge certificate. 10d. 1000 words. Miss ADA MOORE, Duffield, Derby.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) under takes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith

TYPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION,

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineaes (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

QUEEN'S HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS

Every Evening at 8

THE QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

Conductor—MR. HENRY J. WOOD.

1s., 2s., 3s., 5s., usual agents, Chappell's Box Office, Queen's Hall. Full programmes for the entire season from the Queen's Hall Orchestra (Ltd.), 320 Regent Street W.

ROBERT NEWMAN, Manager.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 5s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

THE FAMOUS THIN PAPER CLASSICS are steadily covering the whole available ground of English literature. In spite of the numerous reprints now on the market they maintain their unique character for perfection, for purity of text, soundness and artistic charm of production, and cheapness. Some of these dainty and portable volumes, which cost 3s. 6d. each, bound in leather, contain within a small compass five or six times as much matter as the leather-bound volumes in other series which are sold at 2s. The type is very legible, the paper opaque, the binding durable, and the decorative details exceedingly artistic. The volumes are really uniform typographically as well as in outward appearance. The various colours of the bindings serve only to mark the different classes into which the series is divided. New volumes are constantly being added, not so fast but that the reader of moderate means may find himself able to acquire the whole series. All of these works are printed from new type and never from old plates.

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

Printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, from drawings by Edmund J. Sullivan, Alfred Garth Jones, & Herbert Cole Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net. Cloth, 3s. net.

By post, 3d. extra.

SHAKESPEARE. 3 Vols.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS' DIARY.

KEATS' POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

LAMB'S WORKS.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S JOHNSON. 2 Vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS, 1830-59.

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

LANDOR'S SHORTER WORKS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 Vols.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.

THE POEMS OF COLERIDGE.

ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.

CHAPMAN'S HOMER'S ILIADS.

CHAPMAN'S HOMER'S ODYSSEYS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

THE PLAYS AND POEMS OF BEN JONSON.

STERNE'S NOVELS.

GOLDSMITH'S MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

MARLOWE'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 Vols.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

THE ESSAYS OF ADDISON.

BYRON. 3 Vols.

MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.

PUNCH says:—

"Lo, Messrs. Newnes have published at the price
Of three-and-six apiece these volumes three (Their print is pleasant and their binding nice)
Of Byron's varied mass of poetry.
Thin-paper classics are they, but to me
What most appeals is this:—that they are bound
In lambskin, like the wolf who fain would be Mistaken for a sheep, and scheming found
Sheep's clothing best to help him as he prowled around."

Three independent reasons for the great demand for Mrs. Craigie's (John Oliver Hobbes) last novel, the second impression of which is nearly sold out.

"The Dream and the Business holds one with its intense interest and its mastery of art."—The Tribune.

"The Dream and the Business is the most fascinating and most human of Mrs. Craigie's stories."—The Standard.

"The Dream and the Business is a very perfect presentment of the author's genius."—Vanity Fair.

"No nobler monument can ever be raised to the memory of Mrs. Craigie than her own last work of fiction."
—The World.

THE DREAM AND
THE BUSINESS
By Mrs. Craigie, &c.

T. FISHER UNWIN
and all Booksellers.

A Literary History of Persia, from Firdawsi until Sa'di (A.D. 1000-1290). By EDWARD G. BROWNE, M.A., M.B., F.B.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, Sir Thomas Adams Professor of Arabic, and sometime Lecturer in Persian in the University of Cambridge. With photogravure frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net (Library of Literary History).

A Short History of Jewish Literature, from the fall of the Temple (70 C.E.) to the Era of Emancipation (1706 C.E.). By ISRAEL ABRAHAMS, M.A., Reader in Rabbinic Literature in the University of Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A Short History of American Literature. By HENRY A. BEERS. Large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A Short History of Wales. By OWEN EDWARDS. With Maps. Cloth, 2s. net. A simple outline account of the history of Wales.

Send for a copy of Mr. Unwin's New Autumn List (post free).

T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 3-12 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	275	Fiction	286
Literature :		Fine Art :
Pauline Epistles	278	The Royal Photographic So-
The Epic of Britain . . .	279	ciety and The Photographic
How Shakespeare Pronounced	280	Salon	287
Mixed Feeding	281	Music :
Lectures on Music	282	The Hereford Music Festival .	287
Nugæ Scriptoris :		Forthcoming Books	288
II. Final Settlements . . .	283	Correspondence	289
The Library of Lord Amherst .	283	Books Received	291
A Literary Causerie :		Education Books	294
The Spell of Faery	284

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free

THE LITERARY WEEK

THERE are few pleasanter books for those who love associations and love London than the little series of "The Fascination of London" (Black), planned by Sir Walter Besant and carried out very largely by Miss G. E. Mitton. With their aid we have been wandering through "Clerkenwell and St. Luke's, comprising the Borough of Finsbury," and have found on every page and in every street something of interest. The very name of Clerkenwell enshrines a memory, for the well of the clerks was the holy well, near which—continuing, though they probably knew it not, a pagan custom—the London parish clerks gave their annual performance of Miracles.

Indeed, the wells of the district were its most famous possession, and the reason, doubtless, of its historical importance as the home of the Priory of St. John. Sadler's Wells—whether or not it was the same as the Priory Well or the Clerkenwell—means a great deal of interesting theatrical and social history. At one time a fashionable resort, it sank to a low haunt, to be raised again by Edmund Phelps into a sort of temple of Shakespeare. There is no need now to station prizefighters on the road to guard the visitors from foot-pads, nor to print on the play-bills the comforting assurance that "There is a moon this week." But security has not revived the ancient glories. Sadler's Wells Theatre—once associated with Macklin, with Grimaldi, with the Dibbins, and with Phelps—is now, Miss Mitton tells us, a music-hall, with prices ranging from twopence to one shilling.

Then there was Bagnigge Wells, a name Mr. Pinero resuscitated in his Trelawney of the Wells, Holy Well, Skinner's Well—another scene of the Miracles, where Richard II. and his Court saw the clerks play "The Passion of Our Lord and the Creation of the World" in 1390—St. Clement's Well and many others. And the wells are not the only sources of theatrical association. In Golden Lane is the site of the Fortune Theatre, built by Henslowe and the actor Alleyn in 1599; and the almshouses erected by Alleyn—who was also founder of Dulwich College—stand in Bath Street hard by. Finsbury Fields was the site of two still older theatres, The Theatre and The Curtain, the earliest in London of which we have any knowledge. Hockley-in-the-Hole, that place of evil reputation, where bears and bulls were baited, lay where Ray Street now runs its respectable course.

Quite other memories than these hang round the district. Here Wesley built his chapel and here is his tomb; here "near Windmill Hill" he and Whitefield joined in taking a foundry; and here Whitefield's followers built him a tabernacle after his rupture with the Wesleys. In Bunhill Fields lie a host of famous men: Bunyan, Defoe, several of the Cromwells, Isaac Watts, Horne Tooke, William Blake, Thomas Stothard. In St. John's Church lies "Scratching Fanny" of Cock Lane fame. In Bunhill Row Milton died; in Finsbury Pavement Keats was born at the Swan and Harp, where his father was a livery stableman; in Old Street Samuel Daniel died in 1619. Over St. John's Gate Edward Cave had his printing presses, which turned out the first Gentleman's Magazine, edited from the first by "Sylvanus Urban," and Johnson's Rambler, "London," Irene and "The Vanity of Human Wishes." And turning over Miss Mitton's pages we come on such names as George Cruikshank, Johnson, Evelyn, Jack Sheppard, Dick Turpin, Isaac Walton, Thackeray, James Thomson, George Pinchbeck; a delightful medley of all kinds of memories.

A very different outlook on London is that of Mr. William Platt, the author of "London and Londoners." Mr. Platt has plunged into modern London, and it is the humours and tragedies of the living people in the streets that have attracted him. For him London lives. "No one can write of London," he says, "unless he loves her—loves her and hates her both at once"; and that is the attitude that many come to adopt. But one thing that strikes Mr. Platt is the indifference of most Londoners to the beauty or the pathos or the interest of the town they inhabit; and whether it is a question of antiquities or modern sights so much it is true that the general indifference is amazing. We are all, of course, very busy. The people who journey up to town in the morning read the morning papers; as they go home they read the evening papers; or perhaps they stare at nothing with a frown which means worry about past or future troubles. Not one man in ten looks up to see the house where a great poet was born, or some historic building looming above the roofs or the trees, or a sunset, or a team of noble dray-horses, or children playing in a garden.

Miss Mitton's book should stir people up to look out for interesting associations—if only the County Council tablets, they will have gained something; while Mr. Platt's, which contains no end of good stories and betrays a keen eye and a ready delight in the ceaseless pageant of our streets, should teach them to look about for the beauties which they wait for a Whistler or a Herbert Marshall to discover, and the insistent, vivid life which they study as a rule in pictures and police reports. Much good work is being done in training the observation of country children. Has any one ever tried—as Mr. Platt appears to have tried unofficially—to waken that of town children? The harvest of the alert town eye should be as rich as that of the quiet country eye, were it properly directed.

The town eye of Mr. E. V. Lucas, at any rate, has reaped a rich harvest, of which he offers the pick in "A Wanderer in London" (Methuen). The book combines the best of Miss Mitton's with the best of Mr. Platt's, and a great deal that is pure and delightful Lucas. The tablets and the memories are not forgotten; the modern life of London is closely studied and surely described. Mr. Lucas is not, we believe, a real cockney, a Londoner by birth: the people who know London well seldom are; and he has not that blind devotion to her which her children of the blood often feel. But on that account, probably, his sight is clear; he sees for himself things that others take for granted.

London humour, for instance, he has no good word for. "It rejoices never, and is merry only when some one has met with a reverse, from Death itself to the theft of a glass of bitter. It is joyless. It never laughs at nothing, out of a clear sky." And, again, he speaks of "the Londoner's faculty of bearing with equanimity the trials of others." Are these charges quite fair? He is right, no doubt, about London street humour as concentrated in the music-halls, which Mr. Lucas chooses as the scene of his study of it; but is provincial or country humour any more joyful, any kinder? Looking back to a childhood spent in the country, we remember more musical but no more joyful laughter from young people at play in the fields than may be heard in London streets: and quite as much sardonic, cruel gibing at misfortune. Who was it that said—erroneously no doubt—that the cause of laughter was the feeling of superiority? Such humour is common to all men, educated or uneducated, in country or town.

It is almost a pleasure to disagree with Mr. Lucas, because he is almost invariably right. He is right in his choice of pictures in the National Gallery and of music-hall artistes, in his dislike of the Strand, his love of May in London, of Highgate and the streets by the river, his regret for destroyed historic slums, his refusal to loiter in any streets built since Georgian days—and, of course, his constant references to the great Londoners, Pepys, Johnson, Lamb. He is absolutely right, and individual, in the manner in which he writes of these things, the vividness of his impressions, the catholicity of his interests, the sense of vitality and joy which his work exhales.

One or two more corrigenda may, therefore, be noticed, without detracting from our high opinion of this book. Mr. Lucas has not yet mastered the difference between the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours (the "Old Society") and the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-Colours. He uses the words "Diocletian repose": if there is an adjective of that Emperor's name, it must be (horribile dictu) "Diocletianian."

"Covent Garden," he writes (meaning the porters), "dearly loves a fight with or without the gloves." It loves reading about, or seeing, professional matches, no doubt; but, on the rare occasions when there is time to look out of the window of this office, we have sometimes seen encounters that do not bear out the last words of the statement. A great deal of display, of shouting, of skipping about; the old women peeling walnuts turn round to look, the other porters collect and watch in cynical amusement. No blows are struck, no claret tapped; the bloodthirsty combatants are merely waiting till the policeman shall come and separate them. Bad language, not fists, is the real weapon.

Mr. Lucas omits all mention of the statue of Robert Raikes in Embankment Gardens—a dull affair, but interesting for this reason, that its nearest neighbour is that of Robert Burns. When the band has ceased to play and the gardens are locked at night, do the two Roberts converse together? What have they to say to each other? We have often wondered. Let Mr. Lucas write the dialogue: no one could do it better than he.

For clearing up one of the present writer's misconceptions, he is half grateful to Mr. Lucas and half resentful. He had always imagined—and so had several friends of whom he inquired—that the unnamed equestrian statue outside the House of Lords is that of Edward I. It is really Richard Cœur-de-Lion, as the bas-reliefs on the pedestal and a special interview with the policeman on duty have convinced him. But, being proved wrong, he takes refuge in saying that if that noble figure is not Edward I., it ought to be. Richard did nothing for us or our constitution: Edward called the first really representative Parliament; and we hereby suggest to the authorities that one of the bas-reliefs be altered to the Peace of Amiens (the capture of Acre scene might perhaps be re-christened), and the statue known henceforth as Edward I.

When will publishers learn that to scatter illustrations haphazard through a book is to make them not only useless but mischievous? We have several times suggested that in the case of miscellaneous illustrations all the pictures should be put at the end, and no better recommendation of this idea could be found than this book by Mr. Lucas. We take three examples. Opposite to a description of Paul Cinquevalli, the juggler, we find the Peter de Hoogh Interior in the National Gallery; an account of Marceline at the Hippodrome is illustrated by Moroni's Tailor; and, by an irony too subtle to be considered intentional, a rough list of London statues faces Andrea del Sarto's portrait of a young sculptor.

Historically interesting is a communication (to the Paris Academy of Inscriptions) which shows how Henry II. was rex Anglorum till absolved of complicity in Becket's murder; Dei gratia rex Anglorum afterwards (from the spring of 1173). M. L. Delisle has collected some five hundred and seventy of Henry's papers on his French possessions. Admirable as were the pigeon-holes in his chancery, this Plantagenet was a very woman in his hatred of inscribing dates. Thus the discovery of a change in title at a fixed epoch will assist historians considerably. Henceforth we can rigidly fix the majority of Henry's instruments to the first eighteen, or to the last seventeen, years of his reign. Hitherto we had been obliged tentatively to refer to persons mentioned in the royal acts, and so grope after approximate dates. M. Delisle has enabled us with certainty to put down to the first or to the second half of the reign the majority of the Anglo-French documents.

A propos, how provokingly silent our historians still are as to the great defeat of Henry II., in 1157, in the Flintshire woods, at the hands of the Welsh; and what admirable self-restraint the latter people, even in these days of Eisteddfodan (when patriotism runs high), have shown in not casting that repulse in our Saxon teeth! Compare St. Louis's "doubtful victory" at Damietta, resulting in the capture and imprisonment at Mansourah of himself, his gentlemen and nobles, together with the annihilation of his troops, by the Arabs. Vix hiscit Joinville.

Messrs. Leroux, Paris, have published two goodly volumes on the French Revolution, being the first-fruits of M. Jean Jaurès's parliamentary commission on the economic history of that period. M. Jaurès is known, not only as the anti-Clemenceau of Socialism and the editor of the Humanité, but also as an ex-professor at Toulouse University. These volumes prove the excellence of his choice as president of the commission. The first deals, inter alia, with the 1789 Inventories, according to which the Church was robbed—or, like Fletcher's Page, to speak prettily—"mise à la disposition de la nation."

Parenthetically one may remark how history repeats itself, as everywhere, so in this matter of Inventories. France has had, and is still having, her twentieth-century Inventories this year. The present writer saw how brutally these could be carried out in one of the quietest and dullest towns of France, that precisely which holds the record for idiocy! Very different, according to Tacitus, were the Inventories of the temples drawn up by Agricola, who showed a grateful pagan people that a warrior could be gentle in politics, or in economics. Inventories were then managed, under Galba's orders, with such care that only Nero's sacrilege was remembered by the people (Tac. Agr., vi.)

The second volume is still more interesting in the light of events, ancient and all too burningly modern. It treats of the Revolution sales. The goods of ecclesiastics were then sold, as a rule, at twice or thrice their valuation.

The other day a French church, which had cost "four figures" sterling, was knocked down at £801. "No serious opposition," we are assured, "was made by the clergy to the sale of its domains." It is not so to-day. Then, as now, many churches were bought in by their expropriated owners. Then expropriation extended to the émigrés, as well as to clergymen, up to 1825, the date of the indemnities allowed the former class.

The great economic result of the French Revolution, the disappearance of huge properties—latifundia quæ perdidit Galliam—is here well illustrated. There is a long list of buyers, following the short catalogue of former proprietors, which is most eloquent as an explanation of the actual division and subdivision of property in France. In that country to-day there is, practically, little destitution. The Gallic "three acres and a cow" system, dating largely from the Revolution, is the cause, or a part of the cause. Has the mantle of The Man from Birmingham fallen on the shoulders of General Booth and of his captains? and will their efforts, by a bloodless, unsectarian revolution in our isles, yet save our Unemployed? Politico-economic problems can only be touched mollissimo braccio in a literary weekly, and, like the Parables treated by Public School Headmasters on sultry Sunday afternoons, "must not be pressed." What is allowed, perhaps, is a recommendation to read, in the light, the fierce light, of modern events, these most instructive documents of M. Jean Jaurès's commission.

"Drink," as dispensed by Mr. Hall Caine, has had an unexampled sale. The little novel was published on August 20, and has already reached a sale of one hundred and seventy-five thousand copies. It has been the occasion of lectures on the Drink problem in many parts of the kingdom and brought the necessity for fresh temperance legislation prominently before the public. In the interval of seventeen years since the story was written the author has had many tempting proposals for it from publishers, the last of them offering a thousand pounds on account of royalties if he would agree to its publication as an ordinary novel. But not regarding it as an essay in fiction to be placed by the side of his other novels, Mr. Hall Caine declined, and finally agreed to take no advance payment at all on condition that the book should be first published at a price (6d.) which would bring it within the reach of all classes and especially the humblest class, to which he wished particularly to speak. That being his object, he has certainly had his reward. There is every probability that the sale of "Drink" will go up to a quarter of a million.

We have received from the League of the Empire a statement concerning a scheme for scattering over all the schools in the Empire a number of text-books on the history and resources of the Empire and the duties, rights, and privileges of its citizenship, to be prepared with the co-operation of the different countries of which the Empire is composed. The text-books are to be graduated to the requirements of schools of different grades, and the League, to which the late Mr. Louis Spitzel gave £5000 for the furtherance of the scheme, will make no profit on the transaction, the cost price charged in certain circumstances being all devoted to education in the various countries. This is the first step towards educational co-operation, and has an interest on that account. The editorial committee includes such names as those of Professor Bury, Professor Egerton, Mr. H. A. L. Fisher and Mr. John Murray, and Professor Pollard is the general editor.

The beginning of term is the right moment for noticing a new schoolboy's paper—The Scholar's Own (Newnes), which is full of good and original features. We like ABC's "Talks out of school," which convey valuable lessons with no air of preaching; the jokes are funnier than most printed jokes; the "News of the Month" is an excellent page for boys, who are always too apt to forget that there is anything in the world but school and sports. The magazine is intended for girls as well as boys, and the competitions, poems, stories, natural history articles, etc., are such as will appeal to both sexes.

The Burlington Magazine proposes this autumn to make an interesting development. A fortnight after the publication of each number an abridged edition will be issued at the price of one shilling, for those who, while wishing to be up-to-date in their art knowledge, have not leisure for more than a general survey. The first number of the Shilling Burlington will be published on October 15. It will contain a selection from the articles of the greatest popular interest in the current Burlington Magazine, and, like it, will be amply illustrated with photogravure, colotype and other full-page plates in colour and half-tone. These features, combined with the sound scholarship of the parent magazine, should make the Shilling Burlington a publication of real value to collectors and lovers of beautiful things.

Mr. Theodore A. Cook has written in the October Fortnightly a reply to the article by Mr. Robert Dell entitled "France, England, and Mr. Bodley," which appeared in the September number of that review. The friendly relations between France and England and the large amount of attention given to Catholic questions by the debates on the Education Bill lend a special interest to the subject discussed.

An interesting exhibition of portraits is now open at the gallery of The British Journal of Photography, 24 Wellington Street, W.C. It comprises the photographs taken by the late Mrs. Cameron, of Carlyle, Tennyson, Sir John Herschel, Longfellow, Joachim, Darwin, G. F. Watts, Browning, and Miss Ellen Terry, as well as of a few head studies of great beauty. Some of these portraits have become classics, and largely by their means the public mind has become familiar with the faces of their great originals. Mrs. Cameron first exhibited forty years ago, and her first achievements were the outcome of slow, laborious and difficult methods long since passed out of use in photography. Notwithstanding this, her work is remarkably modern in spirit, even when judged by the latest standards. She came, by her own choice, to use a slight diffusion of focus, for the avoidance of over-hardness of detail, at that time so much prized. For this pioneer work she only received the opprobrium of the critics of her day. But the whirligig of time brought in his revenges at Paris recently, when her works were displayed as desirable examples at a meeting for the discussion of this laxity of focus by lenses specially designed with that end in view.

An exhibition of a collection from the life-work of W. Holman Hunt, organised by Messrs. Ernest Brown and Phillips with the co-operation of the artist, will take place at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, in October. Many of the works to be exhibited (most of which have not been seen for over twenty years and some never before) are owned by various municipal bodies and private collectors who are lending them for this occasion. The public will have the unique opportunity of seeing a collection of Mr. Holman Hunt's work under one roof, and of tracing his career from the year 1848 to the painting of The Lady of Shalott—his last picture.

By selling his entire collection of modern pictures to Messrs. Agnew for half a million, Mr. Alexander Young, a rival to Staats Forbes, has cheated Christie's of a sensational sale. It is rumoured that several works in this collection have already been secured by American citizens but we hope Messrs. Agnew will decide to exhibit the fine Corots, Daubignys, and Modern Dutch pictures before their dispersal.

LITERATURE

PAULINE EPISTLES

Stray Leaves. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P. (Lane, 5s. net.)

THE main reason why Mr. Herbert Paul is not a great critic is that he is not fundamental. An agreeable, witty and learned writer, he still lacks the patient analytical power and penetration required for any true illumination of his subject. His criticism might be summarised in the phrases "I like it," or "I like it not." He seems to have very little of the artist's desire to create a visible figure and place it before his readers. To illustrate this shortcoming, it is only necessary to turn to the essay on George Eliot. In writing of her he approaches rhapsody as nearly as it is possible for him to do, and yet the sum total of the impression left by reading his essay is a vague and indistinct vision of the novelist. He does not help us to realise what the woman was when she still walked to and fro upon the earth, and still less to know her truly as an artist. No lover of literature can help making personal acquaintance with Sir Walter Scott, Fielding, Dickens, and Thackeray. Whatever he may think of their work, he is bound to have some clear vision of them as individuals. We might take one or two pages to show our meaning more in detail. Mr. Paul tells us that, with all her admiration for George Sand and Rousseau: "George Eliot never caught the magical charm of their style." In passing it may be observed that George Eliot herself, if we are to judge from a well-known passage in her works, thought much more of the magical style of Henry Fielding. But Mr. Paul goes on to describe, very justly, her own style as hard and metallic, and we ask why this was so. George Eliot herself once described style as "a manifestation of mental attributes." If there was something hard and metallic in her manner of writing, it corresponded to something hard and metallic in her own mind, the existence of which would be proved, if by nothing else, by her failure in her ambition to become a poet. But Mr. Paul produces discord, not harmony, out of his observations. If she had "a deep feeling for the inexhaustible pathos of human life," would it not have come out in that softness of colour which poetry lends to the finest prose? Perhaps he would reply that her learning proved an obstacle to the free expression of her simplest and finest feelings. But allowing for all that, we still see Mr. Herbert Paul as a mere commentator, not as a builder. Again, when dealing with Leslie Stephen's well-founded opinion that George Eliot's men are not so real as her women, all that he gives is a personal opinion which does not seem to have very much behind it:

It is impossible for the most acute reader always to determine an author's sex. Sometimes, of course, there can be no doubt. Nobody ever attributed "Rob Roy" to a woman, or "Northanger Abbey" to a man. Fielding is irredeemably masculine. So is Thackeray. So is Dickens. But a woman might have written "Robinson Crusoe," or "Clarissa," or "Far from the Madding Crowd." Miss Martineau was as masculine as Mrs. Gaskell was feminine, and Miss Edgeworth was as well acquainted with a fine gentleman as she was with a fine lady. Miss Austen, with singular self-control, abstains from an attempt to reproduce the conversation of men among themselves. But very few writers in the world's history have understood so well the limitations of their own genius, even when they had any, as Miss Austen felt rather than understood the limits of hers. George Eliot had a man's education, and the course of her life brought her into contact with more men than women.

All this, we believe, misses the essential point in Leslie Stephen's criticism. We may put it in this way, that both men and women possess a certain amount of human nature in common, and, as far as this common factor went, George Eliot had an equal understanding of both sexes. The point of difference really lies in the dominant energy of the man, and this she was never quite so successful in portraying as Charlotte Brontë was in "Jane Eyre." There is a philosophic cause for it, and this Mr. Herbert Paul does not touch, for the simple reason that, as we have already said, he is not fundamental. To take a third instance, he writes in the most glowing way of "Middlemarch." He says:

"Middlemarch" is George Eliot's climax, and those who depreciate it are really depreciating the author as well as the book. "Middlemarch" is her "Vanity Fair," her "David Copperfield," her "Heart of Midlothian." If you do not like the "Heart of Midlothian," you do not like Scott. If you do not like "David Copperfield," you do not like Dickens. If you do not like "Vanity Fair," you do not like Thackeray. If you do not like "Middlemarch," you do not like George Eliot. "Adam Bede" may be more amusing, "The Mill on the Floss" may be more pathetic, "Silas Marner" may be more poetical. But "Middlemarch" is George Eliot herself, with her large, grave, earnest, tolerant view of human nature and human life. It is pervaded by the melancholy of a reverent, regretful scepticism which surrenders with reluctance a store of cherished beliefs. It is impressed with the value of a scientific education and the futility of mere antiquarianism. It brings out more than any ostensibly political novel that I know the rooted and ingrained conservatism of the English character. It exposes, or endeavours to expose, the inadequacy of political reforms, being in that respect a completion of "Felix Holt." But these are its superficial aspects, like Mr. Partridge's contempt for Garrick, or the French proclivities of Squire Western.

Now, it will be observed that this eulogy is not creative in its character. It is merely a statement of personal opinion and is not buttressed by reference to any of those tests which have universal application. In other words, we learn from the passage how much Mr. Paul thinks of "Middlemarch," but he gives no reason why those who have neglected or underestimated this novel should go back to it and possibly revise their judgment.

In dealing with the author of "Ionica" we had hoped that he would have been more satisfactory, because he had peculiar advantages for the performance of this task.

I think I must have known William Cory. I was his pupil for six years. After he left Eton, I stayed with him at his house in Devonshire. During the last years of his life, which he spent at Hampstead, I was his constant visitor and guest.

This paper is, we think, the best in the volume, and ought to be read by all who keep William Cory in remembrance. But the essay is more noteworthy for its collection of data than for its insight. The following passage, for instance, is full of interest to those who know Cory only by his poems:

I have only space to describe him as he was at Eton. There he became notorious for his rudeness, being extremely shy, extremely irritable, and versed in the vocabulary of contempt. In teaching he never aimed at effect. "We are not learned enough to show off," he said sharply to Halford Vaughan, when that eccentric scholar examined him before the Commission. No human being I have ever known was more free from vanity. He had extraordinary terseness of expression, and never wasted a word. His comments upon a difficult passage, or a passage which would have been difficult to others, seemed to come of themselves in the form most easily remembered; his translation was always idiomatic and pointed.

Mr. Herbert Paul makes him out to have been methodical, but a bundle of prejudices. He disliked Shelley, Carlyle and Thackeray, could not read Jane Austen, cared little for Dickens. Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot and Sir Walter Scott appear to have been his favourite novelists. Tennyson, Swinburne and Arnold he fervently admired. These are interesting facts, but we see no answer to the little query "why" that we are almost compelled to ask. Of his clever methods as a teacher we get the following fine example:

Perhaps the most characteristic of them all was to rouse a boy's combative instincts by flouting his prejudices, questioning his beliefs, treading, so to speak, on his corns. Suddenly put on the defensive, the dullest fellow, if he had any spirit in him, would try to say something for himself. If he talked nonsense, no pity was shown him. But if he made any sort of case, he received an encouragement which was peculiarly flattering, because it had the appearance of a reluctant concession. The one thing impossible in that pupil room was intellectual torpor. Acquiescence would not do. You were allowed to disagree if you had a reason.

Altogether the paper teems with very interesting material. It only wanted the light of genius to make it really fine and illuminating.

THE EPIC OF BRITAIN

The Dawn in Britain. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. Vols. iii. and iv. (Duckworth, 4s. net. each.)

WHEN we reviewed the first two volumes of this work (ACADEMY, May 6, 1906) we came somewhat hastily to the conclusion that, as the story had been brought down to the landing of Joseph of Arimathea and his companions in England and their reception by the inhabitants, the remaining books would deal with their adventures in preaching the new religion. But Mr. Doughty had a much longer road to travel than we imagined, before fulfilling the promise contained in his first lines. Two more volumes now appear, and the word "Finis" is not to be found. The Conquest of Britain by the Romans has still to be related. Six out of the eight new books are taken up with this, but do not come near to finishing it. At the end, the Britons have been thrice defeated but not entirely broken up: the armies are lying in sight of each other, the Britons have been joined by a large contingent from Erin, and the Roman general, Aulus, has written for reinforcements.

Enough has already been said on every hand about those linguistic peculiarities which make the poem unique in this or any other age. The style must now be granted, and readers are already familiar with it. Besides, the verbal style and the other features of the poem, its subject, its development, its rugged and telling imagery, are all not only of equal originality, but seem so perfectly adapted one to another, that it would be hard to imagine the language used in any other connection or the subject treated in any other manner. Those readers who liked the first two volumes will be still more delighted with this fresh instalment. It is marked by historical and poetical imagination of a very high order. The first few pages lead to one of those episodes which are now recognisable as highly characteristic of the author. It is introduced, as usual, in the form of a lay sung by a bard in the king's hall, and describes how Cloten, Prince of Kent, was shipwrecked on a sacred island and won the heart of a maiden priestess, whom he carried off to be his queen. This passage is a very happy link between the two parts of the work already published, as it assures the reader at the outset that the expectations raised by the earlier books will be realised in these. We knew that Mr. Doughty could tell a story of this nature with lightness of touch and charm. We knew too that he could describe savage warfare, banquetings, journeys, the meetings of kings in counsel, the joys and griefs of primitive peoples. But there are two qualities in this second part of the poem which make it more attractive than the first. In the earlier part there was necessarily a great want of connection: three different sets of people were in turn the heroes, separated from each other by considerable distances of time; while the scene, passing from Britain in the first book, can only be described as shifting over the whole of Western Europe and the Mediterranean, and returning to Britain somewhat miraculously in the end. Here, on the contrary, the scene lies mostly in our own island, and the story is almost entirely of Britons and Romans. The result is beneficial in more ways than one: there is a splendid unity in the narrative, which is an obvious gain; and the localisation of the scene in Britain affects the poet and his hearers perhaps in an equal degree. For as, from the reader's point of view, the interest in the story, though remote enough from our own life, is bound to be greater than in the history of the Gaulish and German tribesmen; so having to write of his own land must have stirred the author to that strange manifestation of patriotic feeling, of which we only caught glimpses before. He writes in such sincere and intimate sympathy with the islanders and the island—as if conscious of a personal relation with every man and woman, every hill and river, every bough of the forests within it—that no reader, be he never so Saxon and averse from Celtic revivals, could escape from a sense of kinship with the ancient Britons while the book is in his hands.

The other quality, to which we would point as being especially characteristic of Mr. Doughty's latter books, is hard to describe in language which will not convey wrong suggestions. But let us hazard the words, and say that the author is more of a visionary and more of a mystic than he had shown himself to be before. The first and most arresting appearance of this element in the poem (barring the "Vision of Hell" in the second volume, which always seemed to us one of the least successful passages) is in Book XII., where there are three pages describing a conclave of the demon-gods of Britain and their meeting with Abaddon, the demon of sedition, who had already been at work among the Roman legions waiting, before the invasion, on the mainland:

Now dies the evening red, on those cold waves,
Which compass in, Isle, crowned with long white cliffs,
Our foster-Britain. Gloom soon the skies,
I (quothe the Muse) saw in vast gore-swart cloud;
Whose cliffs of pearl, and towers of shining gold;
On thrones that seemed of crystal, azure, made,
Sit demon shapes. . . .

. . . Gods, without voice! discourse,
(Save wind-gods murmured, on that murky floor,)
With looking only of their glowing eyes.
They reason of the war toward, with Romans;
Wherein they shall contend, with Latin gods.

Then I beheld, towards Head of white-cliffed Kent;
And saw, dark effigied, in dim twilight cloud,
Great flying shadow! Comes, manslaying demon,
Now dread Abaddon, from the Gaulish main:
(Was he which breathed sedition, in the legions!)
Would slay our island-Gauls, this homicide fiend.
And as, oft-times, we bleak-sheen, in the sun,
Some crow see shine; at first blench, this might seem Angel of light! Lighted on cliff; to him,
(Falls, in whose shadow, blight and extreme curse!)
Resort the Isle's dark gods. Erst horrid Math,
Britons' tremendous, impious god of death:
(Can all gods not hold back his dread iron hand!)
The Morrighu, then, crowned with a waning moon;
(Is she night-riding queen of murderers!)
With Clothru and horrible Ethne, in her train;
Whom follow, hag-born, burden of the night,
Dim, bat-like, fluttering brood of aery spirits;
Whose power increaseth, in the evening mists,
As day's light wanes. Abaddon, demon, shines,
With peacock's feathers, full of glorious eyes.
Mongst them a moment; that incline their heads.

He, from whose fearful eyes, hell-pangs look forth,
Prepared beholds destruction of our Isle!
Well pleased, then, casting backward baleful looks,
Lifting his spotted wings, the immane fiend,
Returns, towards Gaul. Under his heavy flight,
Is ferment of the sea, that roars for dread.

Here the theme is treated at length for the only time. But from this moment onward the brooding sense of disaster to come is never absent. A touch here and there throughout the remaining four books keeps it constantly before us, and the cumulative effect is haunting. Now it is found in the sight of something of evil omen, now in a Druidical pronouncement, now in the aspect of the sky, now in the troubled sleep of the island chiefs. One of the most effective of these ominous suggestions is contained in a few lines describing how a Briton warrior dreams of two of his heroic Gaulish ancestors, and but half understands their speech. In conclusion we will give one short extract, which is a good example of Mr. Doughty's restrained, imaginative writing. The Romans have defeated and scattered the Britons outside Camulodunum:

Loud wailing, and the city-gates are shut!
Weeping of wives, which stand round on the walls.
The gods of Britons seem to mourn aloft,
Which veil that welling passing radiance,
Of the unweariable sun, with skies,
As rusty gore: in whose now waning beams,
See Druids, from lukewarm blood of fallen warriors
In battle-plain, to rise disembodied spirits.
And still, toward house of heaven, they upward mount;
Like evening dance of silver-winged flies,
O'er crystal water-brooks, in harvest month.

HOW SHAKESPEARE PRONOUNCED

A Shakespeare Phonology and A Shakespeare Reader. By WILHELM VIËTOR, M.A., Ph.D. (Nutt, 6s. and 3s. 6d. net.)

ALL things are flowing, everything is passing away πάντα ῥεῖ, πάντα χωρεῖ. Language cannot escape the inevitable law of constant, unceasing change. Not only do words decay and die, and fresh words flourish in their stead, but no generation pronounces the same word precisely with the same sound as the generation that preceded it. Many generations have lived and talked since Shakespeare's time. There have been so many changes in the spoken language in the meanwhile that it is quite certain that we would not be able to enjoy or understand a play of Shakespeare's if produced on the stage with Shakespeare's pronunciation, and that, if he were to revisit the scene of his triumphs, he would be very disagreeably impressed with the uncouth, unintelligible way in which present actors mouth his glorious lines.

The purpose of Dr. Viëtor in this admirable contribution to English philology is to ascertain as accurately as possible the exact pronunciation of Elizabethan English, as it is exemplified in the poems and plays of Shakespeare. Our author is admirably equipped for his difficult task. The professor of English Philology in the University of Marburg, and President of the Association Phonétique Internationale, is a ripe English scholar, and at the same time an expert in the science of Phonetics. His book is absolutely indispensable to the student of the history of the English language and to the serious student of our greatest poet. The facts are well marshalled, a strictly scientific method is pursued, and the results are drawn from the carefully sifted facts with logical consistency. The book will not be found difficult by any one who has any experience in philological and phonetic studies, and with some little trouble in mastering the strange phonetic symbols which pervade the treatise, even the inexperienced student, if a lover of Shakespeare, will find much to interest him and to reward his pains.

What are our sources of information on the pronunciation of Shakespeare? They are twofold, external and internal. The external sources comprise the contemporary authorities on English pronunciation, such as Palsgrave (1530), Salesbury (1547 and 1567), Smith (1568), Hart (1569), Bullokar (1580), and especially Gill (1621). Of these Bullokar represents a more archaic form of language, whereas Hart favours "the thinness of utterance affected by the ladies." Smith sometimes gives the utterance of fine ladies, who are termed by him "mulierculae quaedam delicatiores." Effeminate forms are cited by Gill as "Mopsarum fictitiae." The evidence of English dialects may also be mentioned as illustrating an obsolete Shakespearean pronunciation. A rime, for instance, may be justified by reference to the utterance of a Warwickshire peasant. As internal sources of information we have puns, metre, and rime. Ellis seems to have thought the rime to be of doubtful assistance. With Dr. Viëtor Shakespeare's rimes form the most important, in fact the main internal source of information. By means of his more accurate knowledge of the earlier stages of the English language, and of his careful study of the Quarto and Folio texts he shows that Shakespeare was a better rimer than he has hitherto been supposed to be. We may add that some inferences as to pronunciation may be drawn from peculiarities of spelling in the early printed texts.

Much light has been thrown on Elizabethan phonetics by Henry Sweet, F. Kluge, and K. Luick, and our author's investigations have received important assistance from three lexicographical works, Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon, the Oxford English Dictionary, and the English Dialect Dictionary.

Before giving some of Dr. Viëtor's results it will be convenient to print the Shakespearean system of vowel-sounds in the notation used in the book. In order to understand the symbols it may be sufficient to say that each one has its usual continental value. The colon [:] added to the letter denotes length. The vowels and diphthongs are as follow:

Front—i; i, ii, iu; e; e, eu; æ; æ, æi.

Back—a; o; o, oi, ou; u; u, uw.

The symbol [ou] has the value of the vowel-sound in E. own.

We will now give some of Dr. Viëtor's conclusions, taking them in the order of the vowel-sounds set forth above. The colon [:] between two words denotes rimes. Rimes in [i:]. Such are deed: bleed; believe: give; evil: devil; build: shield; held: field; in famy: be, me; deeds: sheds (Quarto sheeds); indeed: read; sleeve: believe; speech: eche (vb.). Rimes in [i]. Such are lip: slip; hild (pp.): kill'd; been: sin; pretty (Folio pritty): ditty; achieve (Quarto atchine): live; wit: yet (yt Warwick dialect); theft: shift; parasites (Q. parasits): wits. Rimes in [ii]. Eye: die; dry: high; nigh: eye; night: white; wind (sb.): find, mind; unlived: deprived; memory: die. Rimes in [iu]. Adieu: you; due: review; knew: flew; truth: youth. Rimes in [e:]. Sea: plea; leech (F. leach): each; extreme: dream; scene: unclean; these: please; deer: here, fear; fear: bear; fever: never (?); even: heaven. Rimes in [e]. Bed: head; set: counterfeit; pen: again; whether: feather, thither; weather: thither; confess: decease (Q. decesse); bless: cesse (cease); herd: beard; enter: venture. Rimes in [eu]. Dew: few. Rimes in [æ:]. Name: blame; grave: slave; gave: have; Kate: ha't; care: share; are: snare.

Rimes in [æ]. Glad: sad; hand: command; glass: pass; glass: was; match: watch; scar: afar; bar: war; harm: warm; matter: water; hath: wrath; heard: regard; heart: convert; vaunt: want; haunted: granted. Rimes in [æi]. Day: prey; may: key; survey: key; bait: conceit; bait: straight; afraid: said. Rimes in [a:]. Straw: saw; palm: balm; laud: bawd; daughter: slaughter; wall: fall; fault: halt; walks: stalks. Rimes in [o:]. Boar: more; door (Q. dore): more; groan: throne; moan: none; bone: one; gone: moan. Rimes in [ou]. Soul: control (Q. controule); own: shown; bought: thought; four: door. Rimes in [u:]. Groom: doom; tomb: womb; room: Rome; prove: love; root: foot; cool'd: should; choose: lose. Rimes in [u]. Cup: up; sum: come; good: blood; worth: forth; bushes: rushes. Rimes in [uw]. How: now; hound: wound; hour: flower.

It will be seen from this brief summary of Shakespeare's rimes that the late Elizabethan vowel system differs in many important particulars from the late Victorian. This will be still more clearly shown if we set forth in order some modern English sounds, indicating with Dr. Viëtor's notation the Shakespearean sound in each case.

(1) Sea, dream, fever, deceive [e:]; Key, conceit [æi]. (2) Car, star, heart, command, glass [æ]; are [æ:]. (3) Die, eye, nigh, mind [ii]. (4) Learn, discern [e]; fir, first [i]; fur, curst, worst [u]; convert [æ]. (5) Cup, rush, lust, son, dove, blood, touch, enough [u]; none [o:]. (6) How, hound, hour, flower [uw]. (7) Watch, was, want, war, wrath [æ]. (8) Alone, groan [o:] distinct from known [ou]; Rome [u:]. (9) Straw, laud, fall, fault, walk [a:]; vaunt, haunt [æ]; bought, thought [ou]. (10) Due, truth, you, youth [iu]; dew [ew]. Shakespeare pronounced wind, "ventus," [ii]; heaven [e:]; said [æi]; have [æ:]; should [u:].

It remains to say a word or two on the consonants. Initial w before r, as in wrong, was still sounded. This is a point on which all contemporary authorities agree. The inorganic w in whole is recognised by Bullokar and Gill, who both pronounce [hwo:l]. After is often [a:ter] as in some dialects. Balk, talk, fault, are [ba:k], [ta:k], [fa:t]. The l is sounded in could, would, should [u:] Daughter was probably [da:xter] (x = ch in German doch). Bristle is in the Folio brissle. Ache sb. has the sound of the letter h. Pleasure is [ple:ziur], nature [næ:tiur] and passion [pæ:siun]. The k in know is pronounced. The gh in light was probably pronounced faintly, as the ch in G. dich.

In order to illustrate what Dr. Viëtor believes to be the pronunciation of Shakespeare he has compiled "A Shakespeare Reader" in which some extracts have been selected from "Venus and Adonis," the "Rape of Lucrece," and the Sonnets, and from some of the Plays in the first Folio, and have been presented in a phonetic form. Among these extracts we find included the amusing French scene in Henry V. We have had many Shakespeare Revivals; I wonder if we shall ever have a manager courageous enough to put upon the stage Hamlet or The Tempest spoken in such a way that an Elizabethan actor would be able to pronounce the delivery almost faultless [fa: tles].

A. L. MAYHEW.

MIXED FEEDING

Pribbles and Prabbles, or Rambling Reflections on Varied Topics.

By the late Major-General PATRICK MAXWELL, LL.D. (Skeffington, 10s. net.)

THE reviewer might well despair of giving any satisfactory account of this delightful medley. The late Major-General Patrick Maxwell had a mind stored with millions of out-of-the-way scraps of knowledge, and note-books in which, apparently, he had jotted down anything that struck him as curious in a very wide course of reading. Our readers will best be able to judge of the character of the work by sampling a page or two. We open the book at random and find the page begun with a quotation from a letter written by Sir Walter Scott to Miss Seward, then at Lichfield, to the effect that he would be much more interested by hearing of a hut being on fire at Lichfield than at the occurrence of a conflagration at Constantinople. He follows this up with a quotation from a speech made by Macaulay in 1832 in which the historian said that "a broken head in Coldbath Fields produces a greater sensation than three pitched battles in India." Without any link of reason that we can discover he jumps from this theme to the pitiable condition of a millionaire. "We can see what God thinks of wealth by observing the kind of people on whom He sometimes bestows it," he quotes, and after more comment of the same kind he goes on to make the following whimsical speculation:

An ingenious American lately computed that in the United States alone, half a ton of pure gold, equivalent to half a million of dollars, was annually put, as stuffing, into the teeth of the living, or otherwise employed by the dentist on people's food-grinding apparatus; and inasmuch as none of this precious metal is ever extracted after death, our shrewd calculator "reckoned" that, at this rate, a quantity of gold equal to all that now in circulation would, in the course of three centuries, be lying buried in the earth. It is strange to think that one digger, the sexton to wit, is constantly returning to mother earth nearly as much gold as the other digger is constantly extracting from her bosom. Well, well, this perhaps does not matter much, in view of the constantly increasing supply of the yellow dross.

He remarks with truth that it is perhaps no great jump from money to champagne, and goes on to relate that one of the monthly magazines tells how:

Vin mousseux, or sparkling wine, was accidentally discovered in 1688 by a monk named Dom Perignon, who was cellarer of a Benedictine monastery at Hautvilliers on the Marne, near Epernay. It appears that the bursting of a closely-corked bottle led him to the apprehension of the principle involved. It is also said that the same excellent man was the first to introduce the use of corks, in lieu of plugs of flax saturated with oil; which latter method, as most people know, is still employed in Italy for the stopping of flasks of wine. But oh, if all this be true, surely dear, good Perignon has been but scurvily treated by man. Such a benefactor to his species assuredly deserved a monument ore enduring than brass.

From champagne to beer is an easy descent. To us the most interesting part of this disquisition is the hunt for the origin of the phrase: "Come, my lad, and drink some beer." The writer must confess that he only remembered it as having been quoted by Scott in "The Heart of Midlothian," but Major-General Maxwell refers us to Boswell. Perhaps there is some connection which we do not quite understand between drink and obscure writers; at any rate that is the next theme to engage the writer's attention. He quotes with great gusto Browning's remark to an admirer who asked the meaning of a passage in one of his poems: "Well, only two people ever knew the meaning of this passage—myself, and God Almighty; now God Almighty only knows its meaning." Here, too, is a very delightful passage about George Meredith.

Before leaving obscure writers, I have only this much more to say. Of course Mr. George Meredith is a delightful and entrancing novelist. To deny that would, I suppose, be to write oneself down an ass; but I am free to confess that I do not always understand him. I wonder if he understands himself. For myself, I am a plain man, and when I read fiction I do so for the sake of amusement and diversion, not that I may be compelled to wrestle with the sentences in the book as if I were wrestling with Thucydides. And if any man will lay his hand upon his heart, and declare on his word of honour that he can make head or tail of, say, the first, or introductory chapter, of The Egoist, then all I can say is that, something like Mr. Grimwig in Oliver Twist, I shall be happy to eat my walking-stick, or my umbrella, if so preferred.

Major-General Maxwell's note-books must be veritable stores-houses of quaint odds and ends. Turning over his pages, we come upon a collection of some thirty-four examples of rhymed verse from the classics, seventeen of them from Homer, who sometimes rhymed two consecutive lines, sometimes the two parts of the same line; six from Horace, and nine from Virgil. He does not forget, of course, Cicero's famous jingle:

O fortunatam natam me Consule Romam!

though we can hardly accept his suggestion:

O fortunatam Romam me consule natam!

as any improvement on the original. He gives also a very ingenious couplet quoted by Dean Hole in his "Memories":

"Cane Decane canis, sed ne cane, cane Decane, De cane, sed canis, cane Decane, cane."

Now no man living can tell who wrote these lines. They have been ascribed to Porson, but there is nothing to connect Porson with them. They are supposed to have been intended as a reproof to some elderly dean—probably of the name of Hoare, or Grey—who was attached to venery, and given to the singing of hunting ditties. In Notes and Queries, 1st S. v. 64, they were translated as follows by "W. H. K.":

"Good Dean Grey, the sportsman's lay
Ill becomes thy tresses grey;
Grey-haired Grey, thy theme be, then,
Not greyhounds, but grey-haired men."

The only parallel we can think of are the lines on Tate who dined tête-à-tête at 8.8.

Our examples, it may be mentioned, have been culled from some fifty pages. The reader whose interest is stimulated will find in the book two hundred and seventy-nine like unto them.

LECTURES ON MUSIC

English Music, 1604 to 1904. Music Story Series. (The Walter Scott Publishing Co., 3s. 6d.)

ENGLISH music! The phrase is a red rag to the present-day John Bull. It arouses in him a curious mixture of enthusiasm, half musical, half militant, a sort of artistic jingoism, which must be an amusing spectacle to a nation that has always loved and honoured its own art and so can afford to be appreciative of the art of others. The fact is that he has just waked up to realise that there has been a good deal of musical effort going on unobtrusively in his own country for some hundreds of years, so he is determined to find out all about it and to publish it abroad, if by any means he may persuade the incredulous foreigner that in this he is, and has always been, his equal, as in every other department of civilisation. But it will not quite do; the foreigner knows better, the Englishman in his heart knows better too. All honour to that modest and unobtrusive effort! We would be the last to slight it for a moment, but the fact remains, that, except for a few limited types of music and for limited periods of time, English music has never risen to anything like supremacy, and we shall be the truer artists for accepting this fact and for allowing no self-deception in the matter.

It is just this tone which spoils part of the book before us, and makes it a little ludicrous. We shall show this as we describe the matter of the individual lectures; but apart from this defect be it said that most of the lectures are made up of sound history and tell their story in an intelligible fashion, in fact in the most approved manner of popular instruction. Most musical people will remember the exhibition of musical instruments, books and manuscripts, which in the year 1904 was brought together to celebrate the three-hundredth anniversary of the granting of the charter to the Worshipful Company of Musicians. The lectures here reprinted were given in illustration of the exhibition, and were designed to cover as far as possible the development of music in those three hundred years. Of course they do not make a book. Even the large-hearted definition of Charles Lamb might scarcely include them. They were spoken to illustrate the exhibits, and here they are printed with pictures of the exhibits to illustrate them. A very different matter. In that respect, however, the best has been done by making the illustrations as numerous and as good as possible; but since the lecturers frequently refer to the musical performances which went with the lectures, and of these only occasional fragments could be printed in music type (and even that is not hearing), here is a far more serious gap in the completeness of the work. Last, and this most of all makes it not a book, the lectures are printed apparently just as they were spoken. We all know how a popular lecturer does speak, especially some musical lecturers, and we get all the colloquialisms and slipshod English, nay and all the little jokes too, which may have enlivened a hot lecture-room in the summer of 1904, but which rather annoy the earnest reader of two years later.

Now for the matter of the work itself. Mr. T. Lea Southgate begins with a lecture on "The Evolution of the Pianoforte." His intimate knowledge of ancient instruments, the predecessors of the pianoforte—dulcimer, clavi-chord, harpsichord and so forth—is beyond question, and both this and his later lecture on "The Regal and its successors" show the merits which belong to a man who knows his subject and makes a first-hand contribution to it. One statement of his surprised us, however. He says:

In this little instrument (the clavichord) the makers had not yet discovered a way to graduate the blow of the tangent, although some fondly believe otherwise. Really there is no dynamic expression obtainable in any of the mechanically-struck keyboard instruments until we come to the pianoforte, though the clavichord was amenable to the vibrato.

Now we were among those of the fond belief just to this extent, that we have often played on a clavichord and enjoyed the delicate gradations of loud and soft that we were able to produce; but perhaps our ear deceived us.

To pass on, Dr. W. H. Cummings on "Our English Songs" is not very interesting. He beats the British drum rather hard without managing to show us the real beauty which has always characterised English song melody, and after eulogising "God save the King," "Rule Britannia" and a few other songs, he says that he has "briefly traced the story of our English songs" to the reign of James I. "Rule Britannia" came in for its share of enthusiasm rather too early, because some silly critic on an evening paper seems to have thought that Wagner composed it, and so the lecturer could not wait to disclaim the heresy in chronological order. There follows a summary of representative songs and song-writers down to the present day, but the evil of this fetish of English music appears to the full in the following passage on Arthur Sullivan.

As a composer of detached songs he was particularly successful. I need only mention "The Lost Chord," and the names of many others will recur to you; but some of his happiest efforts are already forgotten.

We all love Sullivan's delightful tunes and songs, especially those of his light operas, but, in the "Lost Chord" the lecturer has chosen to extol his least worthy moment, the side of his music which his best admirers most regret.

Dr. Henry Watson's lecture on "Early English Viols" is rather vague on paper probably it was very much better with the instruments present for actual illustration of their music. For reading purposes it would have been improved if it could have been more definitely connected with Mr. W. W. Cobbett's clever summary of the history of "The Violin Family and its Music," which comes later on. We next come to a lecture on a subject in which no patriotism is needed to discover the worth of English workmanship, namely, "Madrigals, rounds, catches, glees, and part-songs." Dr. Markham Lee, to whose fortunate lot this subject fell, was perhaps right at the time to place his principal reliance on the vocal illustrations. The Elizabethan madrigals are music which speaks for itself; its beauty is indescribable, and why should it be described when it can be heard? So Dr. Markham Lee does little more than describe the various forms enumerated in the title, and the reader has now to be content with the sight of the programme printed at the beginning, which included works from Edwards's early madrigal, "In going to my lonely bed" down to Stanford's "Corydon arise."

Mr. John Finn's paper on "The Recorder, flute, fife, and piccolo" is interesting and sound. It is quite among the best as printed lectures, since it traces the history of this type of instrument consistently and methodically from the ancient Egyptian pipe, of the "Nay" type, to the modern concert flute. We are grateful to him for forgetting all about the Worshipful Company of Musicians, its three-hundred years charter, English music and all the rest of it, and treating us to a solid chapter of history. "The single and double reed instruments," by D. J. Blakley and "The Brass Instruments," by J. E. Borland, may be named with this as work of the same kind. The last-named enters into a spirited diatribe against the use of the transposing system for wind instruments, an interesting question of practical reform which is gradually getting ventilated and may have important results in the notation of orchestral music. But two other important branches of distinctively English music have to be mentioned: "Our Cathedral Composers," by Dr. G. F. Huntley, and the opera. In the first of these the reader, as in the case of Dr. Markham Lee on Madrigals, is disappointed, for he finds a big subject barely more than catalogued; the latter is divided into two parts, and so treated more fully in "Masques and early opera," by A. H. D. Prendergast, and in "English Opera after Purcell," by Dr. Sawyer. The first traces the story well and simply down to Purcell, the one Englishman who had a genius for dramatic music, and thence Dr. Sawyer carries it on and appears to make more of his subject than history justifies, by extolling the works of Arne, Dibdin and Bishop, and later Balfe and Benedict, though he has to acknowledge that the latter was a German born and bred.

One more lecture deserves special mention for the learning and research it displays, that by the Rev. F. W. Galpin on "The Water Organ of the Ancients and the Organ of to-day." The others "Our dances of bygone days" by Algernon Rose, "Music in England in the year 1604" by Sir Frederick Bridge, "Some Notes on Early Printed Music" by A. H. Littleton, and the last, "Music of the Country Side" by Sir Ernest Clarke, are all rather the personal work of the moment, and with the possible exception of the first named, do not leave us with the feeling that we know much more of the subject after reading them than before.

If we have laughed a little at the rather childish admiration of all things English of some of the authors, it is, from no wish to belittle the real importance of the work done. The organisation of the exhibition and the lectures to explain it have done a splendid work in spreading knowledge on a great and neglected subject, and the republishing of these lectures should do more. We close the book with but one regret; that it possessed so kindly and lenient an editor as Mr. Crowest seems to have been. A little more severity might have turned out a work better fitted to bear the hardships of an unsympathetic world.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

[Under the above general title a Series of Brief Papers will appear in successive numbers of the ACADEMY. They will be "short studies on great subjects"; jottings by the way, rather than essays by an expert. Some will be mere suggestions on miscellaneous topics, from varied points of view; others will contain a more ample discussion of one or two questions of contemporary interest.]

II. FINAL SETTLEMENTS

How often one hears the remark made in reference to a problem, a controversy, or a policy: "But this . . . is not a final settlement." It is perhaps added: "The time has not yet come for such a settlement." But can it ever come? Is there such a thing as the final settlement of any problem, controversy, or policy? If it may be safely affirmed that there is not, and that there never can be one, it is surely worth while inquiring why it is so.

Amidst the turmoil of discussion, with a vast number of contrary opinions diametrically opposed, and reached from opposite points of view, surrounded by beliefs which lead to antagonism, it is natural that all who dislike conflict should wish the problems settled, the discussions closed, and a fixed policy carried out. But ever since human controversy began, the settlement of dispute by the closure of debate has been found impossible. Even a temporary adjustment of difference is a compromise more or less. In other words the cessation of strife is more apparent than real. The antagonism is closed for a time; but it not only re-emerges, it is developed out of the very agreements that are come to. These are due to the fundamental contrarieties which exist in Human Nature, and which gave rise to the primitive differences of belief and action.

But how often do we meet with those who say: "I cannot agree with you on that matter; because it is fundamental, settled, axiomatic, with me?" It may be asked in reply: "What do you mean by fundamental? Were not many things considered axiomatic centuries ago, which are now known to be illusory? And may not the fundamentals of to-day become as garments worn out, if not impedimenta, to-morrow? And if this be true in reference to articles of belief, is it not much more so with regard to the so-called ultima of a nation's policy? What was once thought would lead to the dismemberment of an Empire is seen to be means towards its consolidation, its unity, and its strength."

But what is the lesson of History? It is that there is no such thing as finality in opinion, or in policy. Nothing that is vital can be stereotyped; although types survive, and species are renewed. So soon as any seems established, and is fixed in a groove, it begins to change; that is to say, if it is vital. Change is a sign of life, and a necessary element in all progress.

The desire for finality, or the fixed settlement of things—which seems a chronic disease with many persons—assumes, however, a vast variety of forms. Take the desire for peace, for a durable, and a world-wide peace. It is a common, and, from one point of view, a natural longing. But one of the sayings of the divine Teacher of mankind was this: "I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword." And is not universal peace a sheer impossibility, not only so long as evil exists in the world, but so long as the differences which separate are radical and racial? No doubt, with the growth of social and international virtue, the hatred of party and the bitterness of faction may be expected to lessen; but the differences which gave rise to past conflict will continue to exist. Suppose there is a cessation of hostility between two nations that have been at war, a treaty is drawn up, and articles of peace are signed. But does any one, not a political novice or tyro, imagine that the conflict is over? Does he think that it is now more than latent, and has begun to work in new directions? If anything becomes axiomatic to a student of human nature, who has also read History to profit, it is that the forces which sway that nature are not extinguished when they lie latent. They are only changed in their mode of working. They are invisible for a time, while they are re-combining for a fresh effort. And it is wise to ask, would a universal peace be a blessing to the world at large? If would the personal and social virtues be all increased? Would individual and family life be higher nobler and better, if all external strife had ceased? Might not stagnation and the love of ease, a passion for luxury and the gratification of the senses increase? As industrial competition and the strife of bargaining are the very life of trade; surely the antipathies, as well as the sympathies, of mankind have been the means of their development.

No war or battle's sound
Were heard the world around!

It is the same with the individual as with the nation. You meet one who says: "I hate fluidity of ideas, I cannot abide the nebulous haze of opinion, I must have settled convictions." But if his are settled one way, others are adjusted differently; and so, conflict must result, and strife is inevitable. It need not be bitter warfare, but opposition must exist, and the combatants may say with Clough

Oh that the armies indeed were arrayed! O joy of the onset Sound thou trumpet of God, come forth great Cause to array us.

Here again, as in the political arena, or the strife of nations, a world without difference, and in which conflict was unknown, would surely be the most unnatural uninteresting and unprogressive of all worlds to live in.

No two minds ever have their opinions "settled" in precisely the same way, however strong their affinities may be, because they never look from precisely the same point of view. The problems they deal with are never the same, because each has received a different inheritance, complicated by tradition, and varied by the education undergone. Those to whom they present the results of that inheritance, and with whom they discuss it, have all received a dissimilar one, and have a different capacity of dealing with it. So that the net result of the "conflict of opinion" may be described as difference coming into the midst of differences, and colliding with them; although doubtless there is also some unity, or there could be no discussion and no possible intercourse. But perhaps the most important point to be noted is that all conversational discussion amongst those who have received a different inheritance, gives rise to fresh diversity and that the unlikeness resulting is of necessity quite as great as the resemblance.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

THE LIBRARY OF LORD AMHERST

THE announcement that the library of Lord Amherst of Hackney has been placed for sale in the hands of Mr. Quaritch has aroused in the daily press all the plaintive comments which have now become customary whenever an English collection of any kind is dispersed. Sincere sympathy will everywhere be felt with Lord Amherst in the heavy pecuniary loss he has suffered through a misplaced confidence. That it should entail the sacrifice of a personal hobby of fifty years growth illustrates afresh how small nowadays is the margin of income over expenditure in the case of owners of great English estates, more especially since the institution of the Death-Duties. As to the fears which have been so freely expressed that the collection will go to America, they may easily prove well founded; but so long as it is well cared for, there seems no particular necessity to put on sackcloth, wherever it finds a home. This equanimity assuredly does not proceed from any failure to appreciate Lord Amherst's success as a collector. To affect to think little of such fine books would, indeed, be absurd. Of not a few of them it may well be doubted whether another copy will ever come into the market—in some cases because Lord Amherst's copies are believed to be unique; in others, because almost every known copy is either already in a public library or in the hands of owners who intend to bequeath it for public use. Neither the forty-two-line Bible, usually attributed to Gutenberg, nor the "Catholicon" of 1460, which is at least as likely to have proceeded from his press, can be called a rare book (at least thirty-eight copies are known to exist of the first, and forty-one of the second); but the enormous majority of both are definitely locked up, and only a rash man would prophesy with any assurance that a copy of either the one or the other will come into the market within the next ten years. Besides these two books there are other of Lord Amherst's incunables almost equally difficult to procure, notably the two Mainz editions of Cicero "De Officiis," printed by Fust and Schoeffer in 1465 and 1466, the editions of the "De Arte Prædicandi" issued respectively by Fust and Schoeffer and by Mentelin, a blockbook of the Apocalypse, Veldener's "Spiegel onser behoudenis," and the Subiaco Lactantius, which has a good claim to the honour of being the earliest book printed in Italy, now extant. To these must be added the rich collection of Caxtons, most of them perfect and in unusually fine condition—the "Recuyell of the Histories of Troy," the first English printed book; the first edition of the "Game and Pleye of the Chesse," which used to be awarded this proud position; the "Dictes and Sayengis of the Philosophres," the first dated book printed in England; a fine copy of "Godfrey of Boloyne" in Caxton's own binding, and several others. To possess these books, or even half of them, would give any collector a wonderful security in following his own tastes, with the assurance that any library with such a nucleus must be ranked as of the first class. Even Lord Amherst of Hackney, long as he has been at the game, did not start quite early enough to secure all the old fashioned prizes. Every book-loving antiquary would like to own a copy of the first book printed at Venice, but Lord Amherst has had to be content with the fourth, the "De ciuitate Dei," begun, indeed, by John of Speier, but finished after his death by his brother Wendelin. All that time had spared of the hundred copies printed of the Cicero's Epistles of 1469 (1st ed.) were snapped up by collectors before Lord Amherst set to work, and by gifts and bequests the British Museum has come into possession of no fewer than four of them, as it has also in the case of the Pliny printed a year later.

According to a theory which has considerable reason to show for itself, it was the rapid absorption of books of this class which led to the bibliophobia of the second quarter of the last century, of which Dibdin so bitterly complained. It has taken Lord Amherst fifty years to collect his books. An American collector wants to be at the top of the tree in a tenth of this time. Hence he has found a fresh field in Shakespeareana, and when, a few years hence, all the Shakespeare folios and quartos have been absorbed, and only reappear in the market at rare intervals, Americans will have to find a new hobby, just as our English peers had to turn to other amusements seventy years ago, leaving poor Dr. Dibdin stranded.

Pending the issue of a complete list of the thousand or so volumes of which the collection is said to consist, we cannot trace in detail the secondary treasures with which Lord Amherst has flanked and surrounded his great prizes. But the list of incunables printed a few months ago by his librarian in order to obtain information as to other copies, shows that the earliest foreign masterpieces are well backed up by such books as the Cologne and Nuremberg chronicles, the Latin and German editions of Breydenbach's "Peregrinatio in terram sanctam," the edition of the "De Proprietatibus Rerum," which Caxton may have helped to print, the Lubeck "Rudimentum Novitiorum," Bettini's "Monte Sante di Dio," and the Dante of 1481 (both illustrated with copper-plates), and many other fine books, while keeping company with the Caxtons is a nice little handful of English fifteeners from the presses of Machlinia, Pynson, Wynkyn de Worde and Julyan Notary.

After 1500 information is only available as to groups of books. We hear of a notable collection of English Bibles, including a fine example of the edition of 1535 (the earliest complete Bible), Queen Elizabeth's copy of the Bishops' version of 1568, and a copy of the Authorised Version, embroidered for Charles I. with his arms and cyphers. The series of English prayer-books is equally fine, and the collection is also rich in the English controversial theology of the sixteenth century. Those who know Miss Alicia Amherst's History of English Gardening will not be surprised to hear that old gardening books are well represented, while the presence of five out of the six very rare tracts printed about 1570 by Anthony de Solemne at Norwich illustrates Lord Amherst's interest in the antiquities of the county in which he has for so long had his country seat.

After this rapid summary it seems hardly necessary to repeat that the fate of so splendid a collection can assuredly not be a matter of indifference to any book-lover. We should be profoundly sorry to hear that it had been bought for San Francisco, because in San Francisco they have earthquakes. Its transference to New York would give us no pleasure, for in New York they already have many fine books and so many copies of the forty-two-line Bible (five, if we remember rightly) that to add another to them would be almost a vulgarity. But the outcry against the books being "allowed to go to America," the exhortations to British millionaires to purchase them for Liverpool, for Birmingham, for Toronto, for anywhere under the Union Jack, is vulgar also, and not a little absurd. Book have many uses, but the worst to which they can be put is to be made a matter of boasting. Lord Amherst of Hackney has been a liberal owner. He has lent his books when he has been asked to do so. He has facilitated and subsidised reprints. But it is the inevitable tendency of books like these to drift into public ownership. If any one traces the history of book-collecting in England, more especially in the eighteenth century, he will note how one great library after another went to Oxford, to Cambridge, to Dublin, to the British Museum, and it is quite safe to predict that the collections now being formed by rich Americans will gradually find homes in American Universities, libraries and museums, where excellent use will be made of them. The lesser English books which have drifted to the United States during recent years have been well paid for by the admirable "Contributions towards a bibliography of English Literature" issued by the Grolier Club of New York. The best research-work in English literature is now being done in American Universities. If rare books were only playthings, we might remember that if we want our friends to join in the game we must let them share also in the means of playing it. But books are more than playthings. They are for use and study, and it is discourteous and unscholarly that this silly outcry against American bidders should be raised every time a collection is thrown on the market.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE SPELL OF FAERY

Of all the faces of Beauty which pass before the eyes of those who traffic in dreams and in the fine fabric of vision there is none of such appealing grace and perilous pursuit as that of Faery. For this charm, which is an instinct, a consciousness, and no result of experience nor possession of the outward eye, has all the diviner attributes of Beauty—those touches of mystery, those subtle hints of delight and peril which make her the enchantress that she is. And they who have fallen under this spell, who in some enchanted twilight of the heart's imagining have passed out of the world of reality into the still places of dreams, who have walked through the green gloom of the forests of Faëry, looked across her ghostly waters, or stood in the shadow of her haunted castles—these are like the hapless knight of "La Belle Dame Sans Merci"—for ever doomed to wander in solitary places, through withered pastures and under songless boughs. And in some it is a dear belief that this world of phantasy and illusion is no creature of the imagination, but the memory of a previous existence, an actual experience of that imperishable part of us which is not of to-day, nor of yesterday, nor of to-morrow, but from and for all time. And they believe, and care not who shares their conviction, that this glamour of an evil and cruel loveliness is the shadow which man's fallen nature has thrown upon the face of the Beauty which is for ever. There is no place for such a vague and speculative theory in a world so unimaginative and matter-of-fact—in a word, so scientific—as that in which we live, and like all speculative philosophy this theory has no deeper soil than the minds in which it originates. And surely there is no need to conjure up a shadowy and phantom past in other worlds to explain the illusive yet compelling charm of the Beauty of Faëry. For that which we call memory is only the breath of the sleeping centuries blown to us on the wind, across dividing oceans, from the wilderness, from the jungle, from the far snow mountains. In simpler words, that which some would call memory peculiar, and individual, is only legend, tradition, an echo—far-off indeed, and so of a subtler appeal—but an echo only of a real past of things that have really happened. For it is of the East that the Spell of Faëry breathes, of that home of mysteries and dwelling-place of enchantment, which seems to be of an older birth than the rest of the world, of a sadder wisdom. And it is worthy of remark that, whether we turn to the mystic East or to the Gloomy North, the last stronghold of Faëry, it is from the rites of a heathen religion, from the cruel fires of human sacrifice that this spell has spread its unholy glamour across the world. We are led into the tangled jungle, and impenetrable forest, where built of murderous hands rise the temples of idolatry and lust. Like enchanted castles they rise athwart the gloom, though from their sightless walls leans no long-haired enchantress, and no music wakes the unholy silence. But within is an image of Beauty carven in stone. Of stone too is the heart that has never melted to the cries of those who were first her lovers and then her human sacrifice. Lewd eyes have gazed upon her naked loveliness, and dreamed their desire upon her bosom's frozen grace, but the touch of passion has never warmed her, nor the blood of her victims splashed upon her feet. She is of immemorial years, and the knowledge of centuries sleeps upon her lips. A conscious cruelty looks from her sightless eyes, as though she rejoiced to awaken the desire she cannot satisfy. She is the symbol of the beauty of woman as imagined of the Eastern mind, cruel, repellent, alluring. She is the visible image of the unseen spirit of evil, which in so many heathen religions is the controlling power of the world, and holds dominion over the angels of light. And if we turn to the north, to the history of our own islands, it is the Druids, the Celtic hierarchy, who by the practice of the mysterious and the occult in their religious rites have bequeathed to the son and daughter of imagination a legacy of troubling vision and disturbing dreams. Can the dreamer walking the twilight of some ancient forest escape the thought that once its silence awakened to the cries of death, that maybe where he stands once stood the lovely form of some high priestess, her beauty a lure to torture and destruction. And is it not strange that out of thoughts so wild and perilous should have been evolved a face of Beauty, and a world of such arresting charm and haunting delight? For it is the evil eye which looks from this face of dreams, and the voice of peril which calls to this world of enchantment. And yet out of all this lurking cruelty, from the ashes of lust and murder, the poets have woven a spell of words of such haunting music, have kindled a light of such fair sweet melancholy, as in some hearts is sweeter than the songs of spring, and to some eyes fairer than the beams of morning. And here, as is the case in all true and abiding poetry, the poets have gone to Nature for aid in their creation of this Faëry spell. For Nature, greatest of enchantresses, makes of things substantial a place of phantasy, where the dreamer may dream his dreams. It is she that with her wizard twilights spreads a veil of enchantment over the earth, giving to the forests their air of mystery, their loneliness to the hills, their cruelty to great waters. And she is the glass of memory, the remembrancer of love and joy and sorrow, and looking in that glass we see dimly the faces of immemorial dreams, and listening in her solitude hear voices that have long been silent, inarticulate now, and fugitive as the sighing of the wind. Is it a belief altogether shadowy that Nature does reflect in some way the joys and sorrows, the delight and despair, the beauty and grace of faces no longer visible, but whose presence is still felt in her lonely places? If it be, why is it that by a few words drawn directly from Nature the poet can translate us to a world of phantasy and illusion? For it is by those words which create a sense of weird and eerie beauty in the scene they bring before our eyes that the poet gets his effect, his atmosphere of Faëry. And there is no mere beauty of words; they must stir some sleeping memory, touch some actual experience. And the subtlest art is that which lays the scene alone, and merely creates an atmosphere of mystic and disturbing beauty. It is remarkable that the finest poems of Faëry are inconclusive and reach no definite end, as though the poet were pursuing vague and half-forgotten dreams. But they all have this in common: they go to Nature for the material necessary for the creation of this atmosphere of pleasing fear and peril; for it is only by an imagery drawn from Nature and familiar to the mind's eye that they can give to unreality a semblance of the real, and produce a vivid and enduring effect. The figures that appear in the picture derive their repellent charm and fascination from the surroundings amid which they move. In some instances the imagination has to supply the appropriate figure from the imagery given. "The magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas" suggest a face as false and perilous. "Kubla Khan" owes its sustained note of fearful suggestion and haunting mystery almost entirely to its imagery.

But ah! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place! as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon lover

A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice.

Than this last line I know none more suggestive in the whole range of English poetry. We need not to be told the nature of those who wrought this miracle; we know instinctively that it is evil. And it is this thought, the thought that dwells upon the making of the dome and the nature of its inmates, and not the image of the dome itself that gives to the line its pregnant horror and sinister significance. It seems to hide the all of terror under a fair and glittering exterior. No detailed description of cell or dungeon could hint more subtly or more surely the presence of torture and despair. Again, it is the environment of its actors that gives "Christabel" much of its ghostly beauty, suggesting as it does a fell and evil presence.

The night is chilly, but not dark.
The thin gray cloud is spread on high,
It covers but not hides the sky.
The moon is behind, and at the full;
And yet she looks both small and dull.

And—to quote another poem which possesses to the full the glamour of Faëry—"La Belle Dame Sans Merci" opens with a prelude of withered herbage and songless boughs. It is one of the most surprising things in literature that Coleridge and Keats—Anglo-Saxons born and bred—should have ventured into the grey twilight of dreams—that charmed circle supposed to be the peculiar and exclusive property of the Celt—and beaten him on his own ground. For Celtic poetry, or rather the poetry written by Celts, is too carelessly wrought and lacking in finish to satisfy the taste of those who love “the best words in the best order.” And surely Keats, as Professor Palgrave well points out, deserved the title “marvellous boy” in a much higher sense than did Chatterton, seeing that to the remoteness and suggestiveness of the Celt he united the artistic severity and finish of the Greek. The Celtic school has been divided into two classes—the remote, and the ornate; but, though Keats went to the Celt for his spell of Faëry, he learned his ornateness from the Greeks. And this without being able to read a word of the language! Genius! We use the word carelessly nowadays, but if ever man deserved that royal title it was the son of the Moorfields mews owner, who dreamed his dreams in the surgery, and walked with Beauty in the valley of the shadow of death. For though his poems breathe the very grace and beauty of his own fair native land, the intoxication of spring, the riot of summer, the grace of autumn, yet they can waken too the glamour of an older, forlorn world, a world of still twilights and melancholy winds, a world of unquiet silences and haunted loneliness, of ancient sorrows and unhappy dreams.

R. G. T. COVENTRY.

[Next week's Causerie will be “English Translation in Modern Editions of the Classics,” by Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell.]

FICTION

Listener's Lure. An Oblique Narration. By E. V. LUCAS. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. LUCAS is at his best when he has a free hand; and though a kind of plot runs through the collection of letters from several people which composes this work, there is always room for digression from the story into reflections on topics not connected with it. The result is a very delightful book, a kind of lucky-bag. Once you have mastered the simple plot—how Lynn Harberton was in love with his ward and secretary, Edith Graham, but thought he was too old and dry for her; how he sent her to London as companion to a charming old lady surrounded with cranks; how every man she met proposed to her, and how in the end she married her guardian—you can turn back again and open where you will, sure of finding something amusing or interesting, some clever touch of character or some shrewd piece of wisdom. No strain is put on the intellect, but the heart and the temper are all the better for such books as these.

Fisherman's Gat. By EDWARD NOBLE. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THE sea is Mr. Noble's element. He writes of the sea and ships and men in the ships with the same instinctive grace and grip that are apparent in a sailor's movements on a rolling vessel. His gait is less graceful on shore: the strength is there, the charm is there, but the unmoving land lends to the strength and charm a tinge of awkwardness and exaggeration. We notice that in parts of Mr. Noble's book. The whole story is full of life and vigour. We feel the mystery and power and fascination of the sea, from the first chapter, in which Saunderson falls under the curse of the Fisherman's Gat, to the last chapter, in which the curse fulfils itself and he dies alone and dreadfully upon his ship. But horror is piled upon horror a little clumsily, so that strength gives way at times to brute force, and brute force is never convincing. But the book is essentially one to read. It grips, and its grip is rough as a sailor's grip may be.

Gossips Green. By MRS. HENRY DUDENEY. (Cassell, 6s.)

LOVERS of Susan—and who did not love her after reading her Story told by Mrs. Dudeney?—will turn eagerly to “Gossips Green,” and they will not be disappointed. Once more we have a picture of a joy-loving nature that cannot, for all its brave effort, submit to conformity with the strict conventions of a puritanical order; and in the same village as Lucy Vernon dwelt a strange and passionate nature, of foreign extraction, who made no attempt to conform, but was a rebel from birth. A romantic love springs up between them, and Lucy's puritanical husband, a man of fierce, dark passions hidden under a stiff cloak of decorum, must, in the end, go to the wall. But not before both the lovers have struggled their hardest against their love. And when Richard Vernon at last takes himself off, he shows a late-born nobility of soul which reconciles us to him, and makes us all the gladder that the lovers' passion had never found expression in act. The scene—a village near the sea—and the period—1810 and thereabouts—give Mrs. Dudeney an opportunity for the rustic, old-world charm she knows so well how to employ.

Iole. By R. W. CHAMBERS. (Constable, 5s.)

THIS is the prettiest and gayest bit of satire that we have seen in print for many a day; daintily good-humoured, but none the less piercing and effective. As many English readers are aware, the author of it is an American, and his “Iole” should have a sympathetic welcome in England because, if America has been overrun by “Art-Nouveau” affectation and extravagances, it is from these shores that the contagion was conveyed. The United States have, it seems, a poet Guilford, who is also a priestly expositor of “l'Arr Noovo” in all its inwardness. He has also eight lovely daughters, all brought up in the simplicity of wood nymphs. When two young Wall Street gentlemen find their way into this paradise of innocence and culture, the tale begins: a tale that abounds in meaning humour, yet with many a touch of idyllic beauty. Four pictures truly illustrative and of high artistic merit adorn the book.

Lucy of the Stars. By FREDERIC PALMER. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

“LET not hope prevail, lest disappointment follow,” is the philosophy of this story. Brightly and sympathetically written, entirely free from any morbid element, dealing with the sunny side of life generally, it should be a very pleasant romance; and we wade serenely enough through the usual misunderstandings and entanglements, secure in the certainty that all is to end well. It is, literally, upon the last page that the fact is brought home to us that, instead of a gracefully written comedy we are assisting at a very bitter tragedy. On looking back over the pages we realise that we have been led into this trap continually all through the book. Not once but several times have we seen difficulties surmounted, misunderstandings made clear, everything apparently on the high road to success, only to turn over the page and find ourselves confronted by an untimely death or a lost fortune. The story opens with the betrothal of two young people well suited to each other in every way; they are separated at the end of the fifth chapter, joyfully re-united in the thirty-second, only to be torn ruthlessly asunder and parted for ever on the last page of the book, the hero having suddenly, under pressure, married a heart-broken heiress from America, whose own love-affair with one of the most brilliant and successful politicians of the day has been abruptly terminated by a fatal railway accident. The old German savant, after a lifetime spent in secretly amassing a fortune for the daughter he worships, discloses the fact of his wealth to her, to find that it comes too late and that he is only in time to see her die of despair, asking himself: “What is the good of all my money now?” Even the decadent peer, Lord Carniston, is disappointed in his attempt to commit suicide. He dies suddenly of heart failure, holding in his hand the laudanum he has not had time to drink. It is a pity that such good material should be used on so persistently pessimistic a theme. The characters are clearly and consistently drawn, the story is well, and in places wittily told, and Lucy of the Stars is a charming heroine. There are four unusually good illustrations by Mr. A. Kimball.

Silas Strong. By IRVING BACHELLER. (Unwin, 6s.)

THE story of men of quiet hearts and strong muscles, living simply, from day to day, in the green twilight and vast silence of the Adirondack forests. Mighty hunters, with the child-like faith that comes to those who eschew cities and touch hands daily with nature. "Just folks of a very old pattern," we are told in the preface; but it is a pattern that is vanishing at the touch of civilisation as surely as the great forests which moulded it are falling before the hungry steel of the contractor. The author's ambition is to bring home to us the tragedy of the woods, from the woodman's point of view, and he has not failed. Silas Strong, guide and "contriver"; his sister Sinth; Annette Roice, strong, comely and patient; Dunmore and his daughter, Edith; they are all of the type Walt Whitman loved and sang, and their message, if sad, is a true one.

FINE ART

THE ROYAL PHOTOGRAPHIC SOCIETY AND THE PHOTOGRAPHIC SALON

THE increasing number of people to whom photography is an absorbing hobby, if not "a means of artistic expression," as some of them claim it to be, is shown by the corresponding increase of popularity that these two exhibitions win year by year. The fact that they are deadly rivals is advantageous; for it keeps their efforts at a strenuous pitch. The Salon is purely a pictorial show, whilst the "Royal" fills the whole of the New Gallery with exhibits amateur, professional, technical and commercial. It is the alma mater of photography, from which a few supporters, who had a grievance, seceded fourteen years ago; they started on their own account, and have never contributed to the mother society's exhibitions since. Their temple they called the Photographic Salon, and for their offerings they claimed a superiority of artistic spirit at the deliberate expense of the mere letter of technical worthiness. This naturally led them into licence, upon the reputation for which they have thrived, winning to their ranks many clever folk who dislike restrictions. But the parent society has grown with the times, and between the two there is now little, if any, difference in the style of their work.

At the Salon, held at 5a Pall Mall East, fond admirers of Mr. G. B. Shaw may gloat upon his anatomy; may quiz at the size of his feet, and remark upon his adiposity; for there he sits, naked and unashamed, in native worth, an example to all public characters who put too high a price upon the proprieties. The posture of Rodin's "Penseur" gives a title to this epoch-making photograph; but it is difficult to understand how mere admiration of a piece of statuary could find such a curious manifestation. To those in search of something truly artistic, Herr Herzog's decorative works are to be recommended. They possess the style, the design, and the treatment that is only possible from a highly cultivated artist. One represents Ophelia with the skull of Yorick in her lap, a waiting-woman standing on either side. The other has a slighter motive, showing a figure that reaches towards Barye's lion. The camera has never had a greater triumph in this sort of work, and it is hard to think it can ever do better. Typical of the kind of thing one sees at the Salon is a Child and Nurse, the nurse being shown only from the waist downwards. Some beautiful landscapes, well composed, and full of light and air, atone for these vagaries, however, and the visitor will find food for both delight and disapproval.

At the exhibition of the Royal Photographic Society, there are no sensations, and the visitor will feel that the pictures are earnest efforts to carry photography as far as possible upon an artistic road. The strength of the exhibition is due not a little to some excellent work both in landscape and in figure-subjects sent by contributors from abroad. Chief among these is the San Vigilio of M. Paul Pichier. In this the buildings and the cypresses amongst them recall vividly Boecklin's Die Todteninsel. Another work, Der Wächler, a mounted sentinel on a romantic headland, is similarly impressive.

The commonplaces of city life receive very artistic treatment, as they usually do in the hands of capable photographers. Mist and light are used to transfigure a street and omnibuses in one case, and a crane in another, and the results are very charming. The landscapes show that photographers have not yet exhausted all the possibilities of their art. In the matter of true tone-values, some are still careless or uninitiated; but as a general thing the effects of plein air are honestly sought and creditably captured. The selection of subject likewise is growing more and more traditional in its aspect, the "snap-shot" awkwardness of composition being gradually eliminated.

In figure-work the progress has not been so marked, perhaps because it had already gone so far. Some good portraits will, nevertheless, delight the visitor whose ideas of likeness-taking are still founded upon commercial show-case productions. The stern head of Professor Brander Matthews is among them. Mr. Furley Lewis is, perhaps, the only exhibitor who is at the same time a leading amateur and a professional in this branch. In studies from the nude the "Royal" exhibition is not extremely rich; but what it has is characterised by great taste and skill. In one case, a pair of nymphs disport in a charming landscape, one upon the ground and the other erect playing upon a classic double-pipe. This happy accessory has given just the touch to throw the mind into a fitting mood for its proper enjoyment. It is by Miss B. Johnson.

Some attempts at colour are only moderately successful. They appear to be done by a "gum-bichromate" process. Colour in photography is yet too much in its infancy to warrant its display in any but a technical exhibition. As a rule, its addition is no help pictorially. It must be added, however, that Mr. Cavendish Morton has amongst other capital and sprightly figure-studies a splendid head of a girl in colours, called Child of Egypt. The decoration of these galleries deserves a special word of praise.

F. C. T.

MUSIC

THE HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL

LONDONERS who frequent the Three Choir and other festivals are apt to think that these are undertaken chiefly for their benefit. They regard them as occasions on which new works are tried, which may, if good enough, be performed in the metropolis afterwards, and since better choral singing is to be heard than can generally be got in London, they are anxious that the programmes should be filled with unhackneyed works, and are a little inclined to resent the days spent on Elijah and Messiah. The fact, however, that festival authorities pay little attention to this point of view, shows that it is not for the Londoners that they cater. Country people, to whom the Three Choir festival is the great musical event of the year, or perhaps of three years, cling tenaciously to Messiah, Elijah, and the Hymn of Praise; and, more than that, the three towns have now got a composer of their own, and it seems to have become a necessity to have his two longest oratorios annually performed. The space available for "novelties" or little heard works has, therefore, become very restricted, and, taking all this into account, it is a matter for congratulation that the committee for the recent Hereford festival was able to produce at least two important new works, together with Berlioz's Te Deum, and half of Bach's great Mass in B minor, beginning at the Credo and going to the end. It is with regard to the Mass, if anywhere, that we have a right to resent the crowding of the festival with hackneyed works, since this, the one great masterpiece attempted, which probably was new to many hearers, had to be given in a mangled form. The chorus was unequal to beginning at the Credo, and the result was some pages of dreadfully flat singing. Evidently Dr. Sinclair had worked his forces hard, however, and, though it cannot be said that it was well sung, there were moments where the music was overpowering in effect, especially at the beginning of the Sanctus. Of the performance of Berlioz's Te Deum I cannot speak, as I was unfortunately unable to be present, but what I heard of the chorus singing was not of a striking kind. In each work in which I heard them, they seemed to have studied their notes carefully and to have acquired a certain number of expressive effects, which suggested either strong memories or marked copies, but on the whole the result was tame and without inspiration.

Of The Dream of Gerontius and The Apostles there is not much to be said, save that each performance reveals new beauties and new faults, and intensifies the pleasure and disappointment already experienced in them. They had the benefit of a whole-hearted enthusiasm on the part of the performers, which in The Dream of Gerontius was not damped even by the abnormally slow tempi which Dr. Sinclair adopted. Why the most beautiful theme in the whole work, that with which the prelude opens, should be so drawled out that it became disintegrated into a series of almost disconnected notes, it is difficult to imagine. It cannot gain in expression by such treatment. Dr. Sinclair's sentimentalism over this particular work is curiously contradictory, since in other things his readings are straightforward, manly and without deep insight: in fact, good British workmanship.

New works have become too much a necessity to provincial festivals. It is a good thing that the authorities should be willing and anxious to produce new compositions, but the custom which makes it essential that the programme should contain at least two new cantatas or one oratorio is apt to influence composers unduly and to mould their work into conventional patterns. Everything from Sir Hubert Parry's pen is at once recognisable as the product of a mind which looks largely upon life. In his best moments the clear light of genius illumines his music and places it among the greatest; where this is absent, his keen perception and the fact that he has evolved a characteristic and personal technique never allow his music to sink below a high level. Though there is great beauty in The Soul's Ransom, the work produced at Hereford, it does not rise to the highest that is in him, and it is difficult to resist the impression that it would not have appeared in its present shape had a work not been wanted for a cathedral festival. Though, on looking through the vocal score preparatory to hearing it, the scheme seemed perfectly simple, yet in actual performance the progress was clouded and uncertain; indeed, the final chorus is less a solution of problems than the comparatively early one—"The word of the Lord most high is a fountain of wisdom." To name one or two points of great beauty, however, the writing of the opening chorus, "Who can number the sands of the sea, the drops of rain, and the days of eternity?" is a striking instance of his insight into the mysteries of vocal colour, and in the chorus "We look for the light," there is a theme, played first by the orchestra, which is as sustained and lovely a melody as any which has been born since Brahms died.

A very different work in all but name is the other new production, Dr. Walford Davies's Lift up your Hearts. It is called a sacred symphony, and Sir Hubert Parry's is called sinfonia sacra, a sub-title which he has used before for works which can be more exactly, if more clumsily, described as sacred meditations in music. Dr. Davies's title has been misleading to some people, who have got so used to works of one kind being called something else that they were quite unable to believe that when he said his work was a symphony it really was one; and some critics have stated that there is a certain amount of symphonic treatment in Dr. Davies's work, and then gone on to criticise it as a cantata or oratorio, and as such to find it "incomplete and incoherent," and other words to the same effect. The composer has certainly complicated—some may say confused—the issue by the introduction of voices in the midst of purely instrumental music, and the finale is frankly choral music, an attempt such as Beethoven made to transcend the powers of instruments alone. Nevertheless, the whole plan and structure, together with the fact that the work makes its strongest emotional appeal through purely instrumental means, mark it clearly as symphonic, and it is as a symphony, a piece of music with a few indications as to what passed through the composer's mind in writing it, that it must be judged. Viewed in this light, the earlier movements become linked together in a perfectly intelligible musical scheme, and the outburst of the Anglican form of the Sursum corda is a powerful climax. From this point onwards the work can hardly be said to have been heard at Hereford. Rehearsal time, no doubt, was short; it is generally insufficient for a good performance of a new work, and probably no one was to blame that the chorus fastened their eyes upon their copies and were evidently thankful to come through without serious mishap. But on looking at the score it is evident that many fine effects of tone were planned where nothing but a rather feverish excitement was discernible in performance. On the whole, perhaps, it is better to leave further discussion of Lift up your Hearts till it receives more adequate performance, and then to listen to it as a symphony, not as an oratorio.

In a general survey of a festival the omission of any mention of the fine performances of solo singers may be forgiven. They are all well known and their efforts have received ample comment elsewhere. It is the local attitude towards music which is of importance, and this is expressed only in the chorus and the audience. In both there can be no doubt that the festival is the result of genuine enthusiasm and not merely an old-established institution worthy of support. The constitution of the Three Choir Festival must always make complete unity a difficulty, but in spite of all shortcomings there is life and the possibility of infinite artistic growth in this year's choir. The small size of Hereford Cathedral may partially account for the fact that each service was crowded, but not for the eager and silent attention given to all the music to the very end. If the talent is less great, the musical life of the west of England is scarcely less keen than that of the north, and these are hopeful signs for the future.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. HODDER AND STOUGHTON will issue this autumn an edition of 'Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens,' with fifty illustrations in colour, from the drawings which Mr. Rackham has specially undertaken for this work. We understand that the originals of these drawings are to be exhibited shortly at the Leicester Galleries. The same publishers have arranged to issue translations of two other novels by Antonio Fogazzaro. The first of these will appear this autumn under the title of "The Patriot." It deals with the Italian revolution of 1848, and, they add, "more particularly with the triumph of the believing husband over the unbelieving wife."

Messrs. Harper and Brothers are about to add a new work to their Technical list—a "German Scientific and Technological Reader," in two books, by E. Classen and J. Lustgarten, of the Manchester School of Technology. To enable students to become familiar with German scientific terms it gives brief articles in German on Chemistry, Physics, Engineering, etc., and an adequate vocabulary.

Mr. H. J. Glaisher, of Wigmore street, will publish in October "The Ambrose Calendar." The borders and pages have been expressly designed by Mr. John Phillips from the decorations of old manuscripts—among others the magnificent manuscript copy of the "Book of Kells."

Next week Mr. Eveleigh Nash will publish an historical work entitled "The Châteaux of Touraine," by M. H. Lansdale. The volume will be lavishly illustrated by sixty full-page pictures, including a number of reproductions in colour by Jules Guérin.

Under the title of "The Desert and the Sown" Mr. Heinemann will publish a book of travel by Gertrude Lowthian Bell. It is a description of her journey through unfrequented parts of Syria, by Damascus, Baalbek and Aleppo on to Antioch. It will be illustrated from the author's photographs.

M. Edouard Herriot's book, "Madame Recamier," which was given the Bordin prize, and which supersedes all previous lives of the great Frenchwoman, is to be published by Mr. Heinemann. It is founded on documents which have never before been accessible.

Mr. Heinemann announces, under the name of "Medical Hygiene," a reprint of the "Harben Lectures," by Elie Metchnikoff, prefaced by an introduction by Professor Ray Lankester. At the same time there is to appear a cheaper edition of Elie Metchnikoff's famous book, "The Nature of Man."

In "The Children's Odyssey" Professor A. J. Church will re-tell for children, in simple language, the Story of Ulysses. The book will be published by Messrs. Seeley.

On September 24 Mr. George Allen will publish "Lord Acton and his Circle," edited, with an introduction, by Abbot Gasquet. The "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone" dealt with politics and literature; the present book relates primarily to the period of the Roman Catholic Revival of the nineteenth century, throwing strong light on its inner history.

Among Mrs. E. Grant Richards's autumn announcements are "Echoes from Kottabos," edited by Professor R. Y. Tyrrell and Sir Edward Sullivan; "Heidelberg: its Princes and Palaces," by Elizabeth Godfrey; "Queens of Old Spain," by Martin Hume; and "The Voyages of Captain William Dampier," edited by John Masefield. "Poems of Robert Herrick" and "The Lyrics of Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher" are promised in the Chap Books series.

"Race Culture; or, Race Suicide?" is the title of a work by Dr. Robert R. Rentoul (Liverpool) which the Walter Scott Publishing Co. is issuing in October. The author states that the work is "a plea for the unborn, and the giving of more attention to the begetting of a healthy race." It is written for medical and non-medical thinkers.

Messrs. Putnams announce a fourth novel by Mr. Randall Parrish, entitled "Bob Hampton of Placer." The hero is an officer, dishonourably discharged from the army through a miscarriage of justice, who for years led the life of adventurer and gambler in Western trading posts and mining camps. The same firm announce for immediate publication "The Shock of Battle," a story of an imaginary war between England and Germany shortly after the opening of the Panama Canal. It is written by Mr. Patrick Vaux. "Science and a Future Life," by Professor James H. Hyslop, is also in the Autumn List of G. P. Putnam's Sons. In this work Professor Hyslop discusses the problems of life after bodily death from the data accumulated by the Society of Psychical Research. He bases his argument upon experiments conducted by Sir Oliver Lodge, the late Henry Sidgwick, Professor James of Harvard, Frederick Myers, Dr. Richard Hodgson, and others, including much experimental work of his own.

CORRESPONDENCE

"LIKE" AS A CONJUNCTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I fear your readers must be tired of this controversy about the use of like; but some of them have no doubt learnt something from it, like Professor Tyrrell has. He now knows that like can be some other part of speech than the adjective he thought it always was. I hope he will soon admit that, as adverbs don't govern the objective case, like is a preposition in phrases such as "like him, like me," and that it is also a conjunction when it stands for its dropt as, in Shakespeare, Sir Philip Sidney ("Like dropsy folk still drink to be athirst," etc. etc.), Drayton, Daniel, Massinger, Middleton, Henry More, etc. etc. to Shelley ("Hellas," 1086), Southey, Wm. Morris and others. He will then acknowledge that sentences like "He is on the river every Sunday, like I am," "Unluckily they haven't a large Library, like we have at the Working Men's College," "He turned teetotaller at 15, like I did," are neither atrocities, nor deplorable, but good English.

It will be noted that Professor Tyrrell gives no reason why like = like as, is not just as good a conjunction, as like = like to, is a preposition. He steps from his Greek department into our English one, and without inquiry denounces the conjunctival use of like as "an atrocity." Can he wonder that a student of English who has some regard for the history of his language and for Sidney, Shakespeare, Shelley, Morris, urges the historic facts of the case against him? He now thinks it "deplorable" that Darwin, Cotter-Morison, Wm. Morris and others have continued the legitimate and age-sanctioned use of like as a conjunction. I think it "deplorable" that he should seek to deprive us of the freedom of speech and idiom which like gives us in the instances I have cited. I think also that he presses my friend Henry Bradley's words in the Oxford Dictionary into a meaning that they hardly bear, and I wish that that scholar would give the ACADEMY the opinion he is so well entitled to give, on this like question, and tell us whether he had any other quotations from modern writers than those he used in his article on like as a conjunction.

I am sorry that Professor Tyrrell thinks my tone towards him has not been "conciliatory." I hoped that my chaff about his "larking with the functions of like" was at least good-humoured; I really have the highest respect for Professor Tyrrell as a scholar when he doesn't abuse like, conjunction. I am only a worker, but the worm will turn, when trodden on, and I've had to stick up for the historic use of "like."

May I wind up with two anecdotes about it? In 1864 I sent Tennyson my edition of the French Quête del Saint Graal. Next summer when he came to town he called on me; and as I was out I went to his hired London house for a chat. In the course of it he rebuked me for having used like as a conjunction in my Foreword to the Quête. Having been one of the Secretaries of the Philological Society since 1854, and also taken the English Grammar Class at the Working Men's College for the same time, I said: "But it's good historic English." "No, it isn't," answered he; "it's a modern vulgarism that I've seen grow up within the last thirty years; and when Prince Albert used it in my drawing-room, I pulled him up for it, in the presence of the Queen, and told him he never ought to use it again." "That's all very well," said I, "but I've no doubt that the use is Elizabethan, and that I can send it you from Shakespeare." "No, you can't," said he; "it's not thirty years old." "Well, wait till I send it you," rejoined I, which I did, as soon as I got home; and I think I afterwards referred him to the paper on like by Sidney Walker, a Fellow of his own College. Many years after, when I'd had my usual scull in a wager-boat on Sunday morning, I turned into Wm. Morris's on the Upper Mall at Hammersmith, and having had to answer some ignorant in a weekly about the use of like, I said to Morris: "Have you ever used like as a conjunction?" "Certainly I have," answered Morris, "constantly." "But you know there's a set of prigs who declare it's vulgar and unhistorical?" "Yes, I know. They're a lot of damn'd fools. Don't mind them. It's perfectly good English."

I hope this won't offend Professor Tyrrell. But Morris always spoke out what he thought; and he once said to me, "Don't be a damn'd fool," because I objected to the ground colours on a case he was painting at Bexley Heath. He also used the plainest language to Sir Wm. (then Mr.) Richmond, when he let the rush of water through a weir-gap drive his boat into the wall near Lechlade. But he was a dear, fine fellow, true as steel, and every one who knew him loved him. They will all thank Mr. Brock for his admirable paper on Morris's Later Poems in the last number of the ACADEMY.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

P.S.—Mr. H. H. Johnson must have read Pericles very carelessly, as there are two clear instances of the conjunction like in it:

like an arrow shot

From a well-experienced archer hits the mark
His eye doth level at, so thou ne'er return.

I. i. 163-5 (Globe, 979/1).

Like goodly buildings left without a roof
Soon fall to ruin.

II. iv. 36 (Globe, 985/2)

See also Midsummer Night's Dream, IV. i. 170:

But, like in sickness, did I loathe this food.
(Globe, 175/1).

Mr. Johnson should use Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon, and not publish the results of his carelessness so hastily. One clear Shelley instance of like, conj. is in Hellas, 1086:

Another Athens shall arise,
And to remoter time
Bequeath, like sunset [does] to the skies
The splendour of its prime.

Another is in the Posthumous Fragments of Margaret Nicholson, A Fragment, l. 19, Works 1880. iv. 348:

I met a maniac, like he was to me.

From Shelley's prose, take this, from his Six Weeks' Tour, June 28-30, 1816, Works 1880, vi. 183:

"The sudden departure of his cherished and accustomed toil must have left him, like the death of a dear friend [would have done], sad and solitary."

Though perhaps some folk would say that this like stands for like to, not like as: which I think it represents.

[NOTE.—In answer to my note on this point, Dr. Bradley has sent me the following postcard:

"13 Sep. 1906.—I have just seen Tyrrell's note, but am really too busy just now to write about it. Of course he has no right to infer from my remark anything about my own personal preferences, which I try to keep out of the Dictionary. I don't know that I either 'like' or 'dislike' the idiom: as a matter of taste and fitness. I believe there are occasions when I should use it, and those when I should avoid it. The superfluous matter for L is screwed up in boxes in the cellar of the Clarendon Press: if it were more easily accessible I would gladly send you the quotations for like conj. But I do not think there were very many besides those that I printed, which are sufficient to dispose of the assertion that good writers do not use it. I should like, if I had time and energy, to discuss the question, together with some cognate ones, but I must leave it at present."]

F. J. F.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There are two instances in Pericles, as Mr. H. H. Johnson will see by consulting Schmidt's Shakespeare-Lexicon. (How comes it, by the way, that neither appears in Bartlett's Concordance?) I. i. 163: "and like an arrow shot From a well-experienced archer hits the mark His eye doth level at" (where the folio reads "as"); and II. iv. 36: "Like goodly buildings left without a roof Soon fall to ruin." With all respect for Dr. Furnivall, I cannot help thinking that in both these cases the author intended an adverb (quasi-preposition) and mixed his construction as he went on, for in both an adjectival phrase intervenes between the "like" and the verb. Another instance occurs in Henry V., I. ii. 149: "the Scot on his unfurnish'd kingdom Came pouring, like the tide into a breach, With ample and brim fullness of his force" (also omitted by Bartlett), which rather confirms me in my view since it is so nearly equivalent to "Came pouring, like the tide, into a breach" or "like the tide in a breach," in either of which cases "like" would, of course, again be an adverb. Other instances in Shakespeare seem doubtful, but see Franz (Shakespeare-Grammatik, § 431, b). Numerous examples are quoted in the New English Dictionary (s. v. B. 6, a), most of which, however, are easily explained by supposing the writer to have intended an adverb, and then expanded the phrase into a clause by the addition of a verb as an afterthought. Thus Southey: "He talks like Brunswick [did]" and Darwin: "Unfortunately few have observed like you [have done]." But there is no getting over Morris: "Dreading the model day like I used to dread Sunday" (a colloquial sentence from a private letter, if I remember right).

The two phrases, one from Pericles (I. iv. 74), quoted by Mr. Johnson, can hardly be parallel; "Thou speak'st like him's [i.e., 'him that is'—a very common Elizabethan ellipsis] untutor'd to repeat," and "Tup-pence for them's [i.e., them as] learns manners."

W. W. GREG.

September 15

THE NATIONAL ADMINISTRATION OF LIBRARIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Librarians should be indebted to you for the interesting notes on libraries and library work which you insert in your paper. As the notes are unsigned and therefore appear with editorial authority definite statements should be accurate. In your issue of this date a statement is repeated the accuracy of which I unhesitatingly challenge. I refer to the statement (p. 244, col. 1, par. 4) that the establishment of a national central authority for library administration would be "the realisation of the dream of many librarians." What authority is there for such a statement, I should like to know? What does the writer mean by "many librarians?"

I am not now writing as either a supporter or an opponent of "centralisation." That question is an important one and when it comes into the arena of practical politics will be keenly discussed, but meanwhile, as a librarian, I protest against it being prejudiced by a misleading statement in such an influential journal as the ACADEMY.

GEORGE T. SHAW.

The Athenæum,
Liverpool, Sept. 15.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES WITHOUT NEWSROOMS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a recent number of the ACADEMY, containing an editorial note on the exclusion of newspapers from public libraries, you appear to favour such exclusion and state that every reader can afford to buy a penny or halfpenny paper to read at home, and that those who wish to use the institution as a club will find a liberal supply of weekly and monthly papers in the magazine room. You are not alone in holding these views, but as they carry especial weight when published by the ACADEMY, I trust you will allow me, as one who, after organising several public libraries, holds a contrary opinion, to give some reasons for doing so.

In the first place, among the large number of persons in search of employment there are many who cannot afford to buy even one newspaper each day, let alone several, such as they have the run of in a public newsroom, nor have they the advantage of seeing papers especially representing their own trades, which will be found in all up-to-date newsrooms, so that although, as you state, the advertisements of a few selected situations vacant may be provided somewhere in the building, the advantages of the newsroom are not by any means adequately met. Then again as regards the ordinary reader, how many are there among the poorer classes whose homes consist of one or two small dark rooms, shared by noisy children and others, where reading a newspaper or anything else is a difficult, almost an impossible task, and to whom therefore a spacious, comfortable, and well lighted newsroom, to which they have free admission is a great boon? In the second place those who may use the institution as a club will also find it wanting, as all clubs of any pretensions are supplied with several daily newspapers, although the members are much better able to pay for them to read in their own comfortable studies at home than are the majority of the visitors to a public newsroom.

Perhaps the strongest argument in favour of this department will be found in the annual reports of most of our public libraries, which give the newsroom attendance as double that of all the other departments put together. I have to-day visited a public library which possesses both a magazine and weekly periodical room and a newspaper room, and counted the readers with the following result:

	Magazine-room		News-room
10 A.M.	8	...	26
3 P.M.	2	...	26
7 P.M.	12	...	25
8 P.M.	15	...	38
9 P.M.	9	...	23

To quote Sir J. Crichton-Browne's recent presidential address at the Congress of Sanitary Inspectors, "With all its faults the news paper was one of the bulwarks of society at the present time. It gave a world-wide horizon to the purblind and short-sighted; it was real and earnest in its tragedy and comedy, while the novel was only make-believe. Suppress your newspaper and enlarge your lunatic asylums." If there is anything in this eminent physician's contention, those who would suppress the public news-room incur a heavy responsibility.

A. COTGREAVE.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The editorial remarks under the heading of The Literary Week on p. 195 of the ACADEMY of 1st inst. are very interesting and suggestive. President Roosevelt's "impulsive action" must undoubtedly give a great deal of assistance in bringing the subject more urgently before the notice of the public.

It may be taken as axiomatic, that as Mr. Robert Bridges puts it, "The notion that the English people will go on for ever with their present 'orthography,' as we call it, is ridiculous."

The fundamental and essential difference between spelling and ideography or hieroglyphic writing is that the former analyses and denotes the sounds of vocable, audible words, while the latter indicates an idea which is audibly expressed by various readers in wholly different language. Thus, for instance, 99 is read by an Englishman as ninety-nine, while a Frenchman calls it in his own language Four twenties Nineteen, etc.

Now in so far as alleged spelling is unphonetic, to this extent it is not true spelling at all.

To the silent reader it may be a grievous outrage that a long-honoured classic of Beaumont and Fletcher should be written more nearly as it would be read aloud instead of being presented in its familiar and therefore hallowed garb as traditionally spelled. But if our alphabet as customarily used admitted of its transcription in an unmistakable and easily legible representation of the grand diction of the authors as it formed itself in their minds and ears before it was committed to paper this would really be the most magnificent as well as the most natural and the most accurate way of preparing it for delivery to an audience, and they would be wholly unaware of and therefore unaffected by its altered dress to the reader.

The whole tendency of the ACADEMY's editorial is but a fresh testimony to the fact that those who have acquired and grown familiar with the traditional spelling cannot reasonably be expected except in very rare instances to contemplate with equanimity a turmoil, an upset, and a desecration of cherished ideals which to them has not the slightest utility. They may without the least necessity for shame or discredit own themselves very strongly prejudiced against any tampering with their sanctified literature.

But is this a sufficient reason for demanding that the young and all succeeding generations must inherit the spelling with all its heavy initiatory burdens and also all the prejudice and aversion to reform and progress? Assuredly not.

It may be granted that President Roosevelt has made a "hot-headed plunge" of which few will "accept the augury," but this is not quite the same as saying that it were better left undone, and further that nothing of much magnitude can be accomplished in the near future.

There is another and a widely different alternative. It is really useful and desirable so to unsettle spelling as to give it some elasticity and to introduce a large toleration both for reformed and also for imperfectly memorised spelling. The air of freedom in spelling would very rapidly though almost imperceptibly purify and refine it, if the idea that all free spelling is intolerably vulgar were once surmounted. But after all very little can be done with the customs of the learned. They can and ought to be let very much alone.

It is quite a different thing with the unsullied minds of children. Here are no prejudices. Here is native logic. Here is a virgin page for the inscription of truth.

Let the children be taught phonetic spelling and allowed to read an educational literature printed with a suitable alphabet. No doubt the day would rapidly come when these children would be men and women who would prefer new spelled books though they would have no difficulty with the old. Then would arrive the disturbance of the antiquated. This ought however to be welcomed rather than dreaded. It will no doubt set a task to many of those who may survive to see it, but on the whole it will be so great a benefit to literature and learning that it ought to be anticipated with delight by those who desire the improvement of the intelligence of the speakers of English and the progress of the language.

GREEVY FYSHER.

Sept. 6.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—This is an age in which we make it a boast that we are practical. Yet the more circumspect amongst us can readily see that the practical man is very often the man who is being borne helplessly along that current of materialism which seems to be developing with an alarming force. The reforms which sometimes sweep down upon us are not altogether desirable or edifying, and we are in danger of losing much that is valuable and beautiful because we do not wish to be called impractical, or else, because we do not readily see what is being sacrificed to satisfy the desire for expediency. We are told that a reform in spelling is necessary because we do not spell words as we pronounce them. Neither do we altogether repeat the Decalogue as we obey it. The spelling of a word is of greater importance than the pronunciation, for in the spelling lies the essence, and much as is the origin obscured, we should further cast it into oblivion if we altered the spelling according to phonetic rendering. In many cases, it is the pronunciation which has become defective. Take the word "night," from German "niht." How could we think of spelling it "nyt," just to serve a so-called practical purpose, whilst denuding the word of all its old associations, its meaning, and its poetry, to say nothing of essential accuracy. "Nyt" bears no relation to the antecedents of "night." In the spelling of a word, reformers seem to attach no importance to its poetry, its history, or its intrinsic meaning. So much lies in the ordinary spelling of words, that we are giving them more study now than ever, finding much hidden treasure.

Then again arises the difficulty of words of similar pronunciation. "You," and "yew" and "ewe." Each have a different history which the eye more readily understands at present than if they were altered. We would increase the difficulties of tracing the ancestry of words, whilst the study of Philology would lose some of its charm.

Lastly, in what county, or in what town or rural district of this country is the spelling of a word to be decided? How am I to know if the Devonian's "leddee," and the Cockney's "lydee" are the same word. The etymological dictionary would not be able to help me, any more than an acquaintance with ancient languages.

C. W. B.

Sept. 5.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am sending you some other Teddy-bus lines :

THE NEXT STROKE.

As Teddy forces us to spell
According to his view of spelling,
He ought the negroes to compel
To change their antiquated smelling.

SPELLING EXPANSION.

Were Teddy Roosevelt the Czar,
He'd do what Russia wants—
Retain the vowels as they are,
But clip the consonants.

Then, with the strenuousity
That prompts his every plan,
He'd propagate his Spelling-Bee
Thro' China and Japan.

J. B. T.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If I might make a portmanteau proverb, I should say : a multitude of counsellors spoil the broth ; for I find that the suggestions of Messrs. Phipson, Drummond and others confound my confusion in this matter. In the same letter I note fusileer, nurish, and acustic ; also fid (field) and tips. Another gives reformashon and fashon in the same sentence. Word and urdrz also occur in the same letter, and both long and short vowels come before single consonants. It is not, so far, a promising outlook for the "scientific," "logical," "simplified" spelling. Will it ever be any better? Will not personal taste still cause dissent and variation in spite of all academic rulings?

I should like to see some attempts at an improved spelling of : "the solemn soldier sought a sort of solder." They would all be different.

If I were to read, "He had been soing all day," I should not know whether an agriculturist or a tailor were referred to, without help from the context ; but surely we do not strengthen a language when we make it rely more than before upon context. People who read much do so by the sight of words, not by the sound of them. Where is the great call for phonetics in symbols? Reading aloud is akin to conversation, where spelling does not come in.

Again I am sure my joy would be alloyed at reading :

Kum liv widh me and be mih luv
And we will all dbe plezhers proov.

My eye would be defrauded of its sight-rhyme—one of the subtle delights of poetry.

It seems to me that the gentlemen who are so keen upon this upheaval are just the very ones who might have been expected to rub along without it. If any one felt a dire need for it, surely it would be the man in the street, and the poor bothered folk lacking etymological lore ; those who waste their lives writing duplicate consonants and final e's. But do these folk have any difficulty in life, or in the enjoyment of literature, from these causes? They are alive to the most delicate shades of meaning in their language, reading and writing books and newspapers with astonishing facility. They seem content and are a prosperous nation of shopkeepers. Only the few scholarly agitators—the real pedants after all—are for disturbing a pleasant and efficient state of things by an upheaval that must result in chaos and consternation for years to come.

As to the poor infant at school, Mr. Yoxall has, I think, said the real truth. The recollections of my own infancy confirm him absolutely, for my part. Yet the imagined trials of the infant constitute the chief plea and argument of the reformers.

One point more. Supposing a phonetic system could be established to suit all, would not the inevitable changes in pronunciation soon render it obsolete? On the whole, is the game worth the candle?

F. C. TILNEY.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to the letters by Mr. Stronach and "E. M. C." will you permit me to point out that, as suggested by the late Mr. Samuel Butler, it is quite possible that some of the sonnets were written by a "concealed poet" for somebody else to use. That, however, could hardly have been the case as regards the first seventeen sonnets which were manifestly addressed to William Herbert in 1597, when he was seventeen years of age, and was being urged by his relations and friends to marry Bridget Vere, who was Lord Burghley's granddaughter and Francis Bacon's cousin. (See William Herbert in "Dictionary of National Biography.")

AMBROSE T. PEYTON.

CO-EDUCATION

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Russell, writing as a co-educationist, says he has never heard or suspected a foul word in his school. "Can any master of any boys' school say the same?" he asks. Yes, certainly, Mr. Russell and the co-educationists have not the monopoly of morality. I have the good fortune to work in a small private boarding school, with only twenty boys in it and I know that the tone is pure. I say this after a good deal of experience of impurity amongst boys, and without any arrogant presumption that I should never fail.

To secure purity there must be individual sympathy, perfect frankness and a pretty strenuous life. Certainly it is good for boys and girls to be friends ; it is wholly unnecessary for them to come together in school. Boy and girl friendships, when they become at all specialised, are apt, under the most natural conditions, to become either silly or disturbing. It is just as well to keep these risks out of the school. There are plenty of other difficulties.

Swiss friends have told me that in their schools the boys and girls do not play together much. At college the "mixed" classes are possible because the mixing does not occur. A Swiss teacher who was a strong co-educationist came to my school. I did not argue with him, but he became an advocate of separate schools. He saw that we could here be on terms with the boys that would have been impossible if girls had been with them. We could not do our best for the boys, if the girls were there too.

Surely this is natural. Boy and girl natures are different, they should be different, the same methods do not apply to both and mixed methods are not desirable in dealing with a class. A boy from an elementary school drew my attention to this. Besides, in training a boy we should aim at producing a man, in training a girl at producing a woman. It is serious in class and in school to have two essentially different aims, and to try to follow both. For my own part I know how to deal with a boy and how to win him, I should be quite at a loss with girls, for the same methods would not apply.

Of course co-education is possible, but my conviction is that in the long run its results will prove unsatisfactory. Said a Headmaster in the States to a friend of mine, "If you had asked me about co-education five years ago I should have been strongly in favour of it, but now I am not so sure." We cannot in fact expect the most wholesome results by ignoring sex-differences and differences of aim.

MAGISTER.

Sept. 18.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Archæological Survey of India. Annual Report, 1903-4. 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. x, 314. Calcutta: Government Printing Office.
[Contains a great many beautiful half-tone and other illustrations.]

ART.

Hind, C. Lewis. The Education of an Artist. With 91 full-page illustrations. 9 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 258. Black, 7s. 6d. net.
[See the ACADEMY of September 15, p. 267.]

The Connoisseur's Library. Cunyngame, Henry H. European Enamels. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. xvi, 188. Methuen, 25s. net.
[From early Gaulish enamelling to the modern revival, with a chapter on enamelling in ancient times. Frontispiece in colour and over sixty other illustrations. Index.]

Surrey. Painted by Sutton Palmer; described by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. 9 x 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 252. Black, 20s. net.

[The illustrations—there are seventy-five—maintain a higher level than several other volumes in the same series; sketch-map at end.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Letters and Recollections of George Washington: being letters to Tobias Lear and others between 1790 and 1799, showing the First American in the management of his estate and domestic affairs. With a diary of Washington's last days kept by Mr. Lear. Illustrated from rare old portraits, photographs and engravings. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. xiv, 289. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.

[The title-page, as above, sufficiently explains the scope of the book. Tobias Lear, as we learn from the introduction by his grand-daughter, Mrs. Louisa Lear Eyre, was tutor to Washington's children and afterwards his private secretary till Washington's death, besides being his military aide. To him Washington entrusted the management of his household and estates, and the letters show that the First American had a capital head for the small details of business. Excellent illustrations. No index.]

Memoirs of the Count de Catric: a Record of the Extraordinary Events in the Life of a French Royalist during the War in La Vendée and of his Flight to Southampton, where he followed the humble occupation of a Gardener. With an introduction by Frédéric Masson, and appendices and notes by Pierre Armédée Pichot and others. Photogravure portrait of the author and other illustrations. Lane, 6s.

Jewish Worthies Series. Vol. II. Liber, Maurice. Rashi, translated from the French by Adele Szold. 7 x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 278. Published for the Jewish Historical Society of England by Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

[Rashi was a Rabbi who died at Troyes in 1105. M. Liber regards him as the best exponent of French Judaism in the middle ages, and adds "His name is most prominently connected with Rabbinical literature—and it is always Rashi who was referred to." Notes and index.]

Gambier, Captain J. W. Links in my Life on Land and Sea. 9 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 452. Unwin, 15s. net.

[See the ACADEMY of September 15, p. 267.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Stables, Gordon. The City at the Pole. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 352. Nisbet, 3s. 6d.
[A story of mystery and adventure, for boys and girls.]

Layard, Arthur. Billy Mouse. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 88. Nisbet, 1s. net. and 1s. 6d. net.

[The story of kind-hearted Timothy Titus, the Mouse, the Monkey, the Bear and the Lucky Stone. Large print. Twenty illustrations in colour by the author.]

The Story of the Teasing Monkey. By the author of "Little Black Mingo," etc., 5 x 3 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 143. Nisbet, 1s. net. and 1s. 6d. net.

[The troubles and final escape of Jacko. An ingenious and amusing little story with 35 coloured pictures.]

Coupin, H.; and Lea, John. The Romance of Animal Arts and Crafts. With 27 illustrations. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 356. Seeley, 5s.

Elliot, G. F. Scott. The Romance of Plant Life. With 34 illustrations. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 380. Seeley, 5s.

[Two additions to Messrs. Seeley's Library of Romance: a good series of books for boys. We must protest against the advertisement printed on the back of the title-page.]

Scott, G. Firth. The Romance of the Polar Exploration. With 24 illustrations. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 351. Pearson, 5s.

[An addition to a series similar in scope to Messrs. Seeley's.]

Hyrt, H. W. G. Adventures in the Great Deserts. With 16 illustrations. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 341. Seeley, 5s.

[Uniform with "Adventures on the Great Rivers."]

Wood, Walter. Survivors' Tales of Great Events. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 263. Cassell, 3s. 6d.

[“Each of these stories,” the author states, “is based on one or more personal interviews with the survivor of the event described.” The “events” include such historic incidents as the holding of Rorke's Drift, the storming of the redan at Sebastopol, and the wreck of the Birkenhead. An admirable gift-book for boys of, say, fourteen and upwards.]

DRAMA.

Dillon, Arthur: King Arthur Pendragon. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 203. Mathews, 4s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Dillon is making his name as a writer of poetic dramas. The present tragedy is founded on Malory and on the verse of Dr. Sebastian Evans.]

EDUCATION.

Universidad Central de España. Memoria del Curso de 1904 á 1905 y Anuario del de 1905 á 1906 de su distrito universitario que publica la Secretaría General. 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 9. Pp. 56. Madrid: Imprenta Colonial, n.p.
[The year book of the Central University of Madrid. The figures seem to show that the three most popular courses are science, medicine, and social science.]

Hill, Caroline Southwood. Notes on Education, for Mothers and Teachers. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 122. Seeley, 1s. 6d. net.

[Essays on education: "General Principles"; "The Will"; "The Intellect"; "On Certain Faculties"; "On Some Faults and Habits"; "Memoranda of Observations and Experiments in Education."]

Government of Madras: Educational Department. Report on the Administration of the Government Museum and Connemara Public Library for the year 1905-1906. 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 13. n.f.s.

Extracts for Composition in French for Middle and Senior Classes. With references to Heath's "Practical French Grammar." Edited by J. E. Mansion. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 111. Harrap, n.p.

The "Andromache" of Euripides. Edited, with introduction, notes, vocabulary, and appendix, by Gilbert Norwood. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. 1 p. 151. Murray, 2s. 6d.

Smith, the late Sir William. A First Greek Course. Containing Accidence, Syntax, and Exercises for the Use of the Lower Forms in Schools and for Private Students. Initia Graeca. Part I. New and Revised edition. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 208. Murray, 3s. 6d.

Boyd, Christine. Les Pèlerins de la Tamise. The Wanderings of Pierre and Maurice in England. With notes and exercises. Modern Language Series. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 120. Dent, n.p.

Heaton, Ellis W. A Scientific Geography. Book II.—The British Isles. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 137. Ralph, Holland, 1s. 6d. net.

Robert, Frank R. Dent's First Spanish Book (Primer Libro de Lengua Castellana). 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 184. Dent, n.p.

Bygott, John; and Jones, A. J. Lawford. The King's English and How to Write It. Ninth Edition, revised. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 253. Jarrold, 1s. 6d. net.

Bygott, John; and Jones, A. J. Lawford. Points in Punctuation, or How to Punctuate the King's English. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 105. Jarrold, 1s. net.

FICTION.

Penrose, Mrs. H. H. Rachel the Outsider. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 311. Chapman & Hall, 6s.

Meade, L. T. In the Flower of Her Youth. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 308. Nesbit, 6s.

Clarke, Marion Cosmo. An Anglo-French Maid. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 256. Drane, 6s.

[Shows little originality or literary skill. "‘Not worthy! My own, my darling.’ Her arms were round her and he was straining her to his breast, and then the conversation became incoherent so we will leave them to their newly-found bliss." We fancy we have read a similar ending before, though we should hesitate to accuse the author of conscious plagiarism.]

Fitchett, W. M. Ithurie's Spear. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 436. Charles H. Kelly, 6s.

[A novel of adventure intended presumably for the young, with a strong nonconformist bias and plenty of good morals, but very little truth to life.]

Biggs, A. H. Ivy. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 176. Drane, 3s. 6d.

[The author seems very much in earnest, but we think he has missed his vocation. The writing is crude in the extreme. In the opening chapter the man who tells the story, seeing a little child in tears, addresses her thus: "Pardon me, my little lady, but, having experienced in my halcyon days some small portion of that injustice from which you are now apparently suffering, perhaps I may be allowed to offer you the sympathy of an old but true heart."] d'Anethan, Baroness Albert. It Happened in Japan. With coloured frontispiece by Willard Straight. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 323. Brown, Langham, 6s.

Dudeney, Mrs. Henry. Gossips Green. With 8 illustrations by Paul Hardy. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 372. Cassell, 6s. (See p. 286.)

Whadcoat, Gordon Cuming. The Balance. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

[Published last year in Japan. The Baroness Albert d'Anethan is the sister of Mr. Rider Haggard and the wife of the Belgian Minister at Tokyo.]

Lucas, E. V. Listener's Lure. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 286. Methuen, 6s. (See p. 286.)

Frenssen, Gustav. Holyland. Translated from the German by Mary Agnes Hamilton. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5. Pp. 376. Constable, 6s.

Watson, Kathleen. The Gaiety of Fatma. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 360. Brown, Langham, 6s.

[Fatma is a girl of mixed Arab and French blood, who marries an English nobleman wintering in Algeria, just before his death. The greater part of the book is devoted to her introduction to, and experiences in, English society.]

Reynolds, Mrs. Fred. Hazel of Hazeldean. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 333. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Yardley, Maud H. Sinless. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 252. Sisley, 6s.

HISTORY.

Acton, John Edward Emerich, first Baron. Lectures on Modern History. Edited with an introduction by John Neville Figgis, and Reginald Vere Laurence. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ x 6. Pp. xix, 362. Macmillan, 10s. net.

[Lord Acton's nineteen professorial lectures for 1899-1901, with his Inaugural Lecture on the study of history delivered in June 1895. The Introduction deals with his University work exclusively. In an Appendix is the letter to the contributors to the Cambridge Modern History, setting forth Lord Acton's ideals and aims. Index.]

LITERATURE.

- Cestre, Charles. La Révolution française et les poètes anglais (1789-1809). 9½ x 5½. Pp. 570. Paris: Hachette, 7s. 6d.
[Whereas, Mr. Cestre observes, the French Revolution scarcely affected French literature at the time—the classical poetry remaining intact during the social upheaval—in England not a few young poets were inspired by the events and developments in France. His book is devoted to a learned and philosophical examination of Wordsworth, Coleridge and the others, and of the whole movement in English letters.]
- Wülker, Geh. Hofrat Professor Dr. Richard. Geschichte der Englischen Literatur von den ältesten Zeiten bis zur Gegenwart. Zweite, neubearbeitet und vermehrte Auflage. Band I. 10½ x 7½. Pp. viii, 422. Leipzig and Vienna: Verlag des Bibliographischen Instituts. m. 10.
[This volume goes from Anglo-Saxon to the Revolution. Its main value to English readers lies in its fine and plentiful illustrations, portraits, facsimiles, etc.]
- Viëtor, William. Shakespeare's Pronunciation. A Shakespeare Reader in the old spelling and with a phonetic transcription. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 179. Nutt, 3s. 6d. net. (See p. 280.)
- Boraston, J. Maclair. Professor Skeat and Spelling Reform. A Criticism. 8½ x 5½. Sherratt & Hughes, 6d. net.
[Mr. Boraston's point is that, whereas the first inventors of a written language had only the spoken language to guide them, we have to consider whether the phonetics we propose to adopt conform as well as the older spelling to the etymological elements preserved in that older spelling, so that in seeing the new written formulæ we shall recognise as readily their historical (i.e., their fundamental) meaning. The answer is, of course, no; and his conclusion is that where etymology is wrong we must put it right, and thus conform our speech to our spelling, not our spelling to our speech.]
- Stephens, Walter. Don Quixote: a literary study. 9 x 6½. Pp. 19. Cassells, 6d. net.
[A commonplace and hackneyed essay.]

MATHEMATICS.

- American Journal of Mathematics*. Vol. xxviii, No. 3. 12 x 9½. Pp. 104. Baltimore, The Johns Hopkins Press, n.p.
[Contents: The Geometry of Differential Elements of the Second Order with respect to the group of all Point Transformations, by Edward Kasner; Gyroscopes and Cyclones, by F. G. B. Cordeiro; On the Primitive Groups of Class Ten, by W. A. Manning; On Certain unicursal twisted Curves, by Virgil Snyder; and part of Functions of Three Real Independent Variables, by H. L. Coar.]

MILITARY.

- Gaskell, H. S. With Lord Melhuen in South Africa. February 1900 to June 1901. Being some Notes on the War, with Extracts from Letters and Diaries. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 349. Drane, 6s.
[The author, after having been certified as "medically unfit" and twice rejected, went to South Africa with the Yeomanry. Most of the book consists of extracts from his diary: for the most part unexciting records of the sort of incidents which befall the soldier in war. Mr. Gaskell's book comes a few years too late.]
- Maitland, Major H. R. S. Sponsors or Conscription: an attempt to solve the recruiting problem. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 52. Printed by Wyman and Sons, 1s.
[Put briefly, Major Maitland's scheme is that Government should guarantee post-service careers for both long-service and short-service men; that each recruit should then be vouched for by a sponsor, who should receive an allowance of one shilling a day during the service of his or her nominee. The result would be, in his opinion, a great increase in the number of recruits, and recruits of the right sort, with a minimum of wastage and much economy. His plan is thoroughly and statistically worked out.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Paul, Herbert. Stray Leaves. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 308. Lane, 5s. net.
[Ten essays which have appeared in the Nineteenth Century and After and the Independent Review. The subjects are: "Bishop Creighton"; "George Eliot"; "The Study of Greek"; "The Novels of Peacock"; "The Religion of the Greeks"; "Bishops and Historians"; "Horæ Subiectivæ"; "Charles Lamb"; "The Author of 'Ionica'"; and "Winston's Churchill's 'Life of Lord Randolph Churchill.'" (See p. 278.)
- The Secret Life: being The Book of an Heretic*. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 313. Lane, 6s.
[A series of papers—fifty-six in all—on widely-different subjects, from "The Pleasures of Pessimism," "Moral Pauperism" or "The Value of a Soul," to "The Modern Woman and Marriage," "The Ideal Husband," or "Concerning Elbows on the Table."]
- Warden, S. Kathleen. Humorous Sidelights on a Scotch Tour. 7½ x 5. Pp. 239. Drane, 6s.
[The "sidelights" can scarcely be described as humorous. The jests are of a very "cheap" order; the author has not yet learned how to construct sentences; and the printing is the worst we have seen for some considerable time.]

POETRY.

- Apotheosis: A Poem*. Pp. 44. 2s. net. Wild Oats. Pp. 63. 2s. 6d. net. Each 7 x 4½. Mathews, The Woodlands Press.
[Religious and philosophical poems by an anonymous author. "Apotheosis" is a sort of drama of Heaven and Hell, which aims at showing that the sects have lost the original message of Christianity, and that man for his redemption needs "a simpler faith." "Wild Oats" is apparently an earlier work, in which the writer seeks to build up a "tolerable house of life." The poems show high accomplishment and a true lyrical gift. The drama suffers from inexact thought and a theme too large for its treatment.]
- Nott, Vernon. Summer Days and other Verses. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 96. Greening, 2s. 6d. net.
[Verses in many metres, and recalling many masters. They are sincere and not unmusical, but entirely undistinguished.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The Gentleman's Magazine*. New series. Vol. ccc. February to June 1906. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 571. 45 Great Russell Street, W.C.
[The first volume under the editorship of Mr. A. H. Bullen. For good miscellaneous reading, biographical, antiquarian, literary and so forth, there is nothing like the older volumes of Sylvanus Urban's magazine: it looks as if the new editor were going to equal the success of his not immediate predecessors. This volume is packed with good things. Index.]
- Watson, E. H. Lacon. Hints to young authors. 7½ x 5. Pp. 172. Brown, Langham, 2s. net.
[A dainty little reprint of Mr. Watson's amusing and instructive papers.]
- The Works of Mrs. Gaskell: Cranford, and other Tales. The Knutsford edition. In eight volumes—vol. ii. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxxiii, 550. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.
[See the ACADEMY of August 25, p. 186. Vol. ii. contains: "Cranford"; "Christmas Storms and Sunshine"; "Lizzie Leigh"; "The Well of Pen Morfa"; "The Moorland Cottage"; "The Heart of John Middleton"; "Disappearances"; "The Old Nurse's Story"; "Morton Hall"; "Trails and Stories of the Huguenots"; "My French Master"; "The Squire's Story."]
- Dumas's Memoirs of a Physician (3 vols.); and Ascanio. Illustrated. 7½ x 5. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
[Reprinted from American Plates.]
- The Rubáiyat of Omar Khayyám*. Translated by Edward FitzGerald. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 75 (=150). E. Grant Richards, 6d. net and 1s. net.
[The 1859 text. Alternate blank pages.]
- Haggard, H. Rider. The People of the Mist. Illustrated by Cyrus Cuneo. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 218. Newnes's Sixpenny Novels Illustrated.
[Eight illustrations.]
- Worboise, Emma Jane. The Wife's Trials or Lilian Grey. A novel. Popular Edition. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 124. Allenson, 6d.
[First published in 1858.]
- Hobbes, John Oliver. The Flute of Pan. New edition. 8½ x 6. Pp. 126. Long, 6d.
[Paper covers.]

SCIENCE.

- Thurston, Edgar. Ethnographic Notes on Southern India. With 40 plates. 8½ x 6½. Pp. viii, 580. Madras: Government Press, 6s.
[Mr. Thurston is the Superintendent of Ethnography, Madras, and of the Madras Government Museum. He is compiling a large work on this subject: meanwhile he sends out this "farrago," as he calls it, in the hope of arousing interest. His chapters deal with marriage and death customs and ceremonies, omens, evil eye, torture, slavery, infanticide, dress, names and many other interesting things; and the illustrations, from photographs, are useful.]
- Turner, W. Pickett, M.D. Tuberculosis: its origin and extinction. 7½ x 5. Pp. xii, 96. Black.
[Dr. Turner's contention is that tuberculosis comes only of eating tuberculous meat and drinking tuberculous milk, and that the best way to prevent the disease is to give our cattle plenty of light and sunshine which kill the bacillus. For this same reason he considers the "open-air" treatment might be replaced by treatment in a conservatory of properly devised glass.]

THEOLOGY.

- Smith, S. C. Kaines. The Elements of Greek Worship. 7½ x 5. Pp. 154. Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net.
[See the ACADEMY of September 15, p. 267.]
- Westcott, the late Brooke Foss. St. Paul's Apostles to the Ephesians. The Greek Text with notes and addenda. 9 x 5½. Pp. lxxviii, 212. Macmillan 10s. 6d.
[Completed by the Rev. J. M. Schulof from the notes and the manuscripts left by the Bishop of Durham. Exactly how much is Westcott and how much Mr. Schulof, the reader will discover from the Preface; but evidently the Bishop's executors entrusted the editor with a very difficult task.]
- The International Critical Commentary. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Psalms, by Charles Augustus Briggs and Emilie Grace Briggs. In two volumes. Vol. i. 8½ x 6. Pp. 110, 422. Edinburgh: Clarke, 10s. 6d.
[Dr. Briggs, who is a Professor at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, has been at work on the Psalms for forty years. A long introduction on Text, Higher Criticism, Canonicity, and Interpretation; then the commentary, the Psalms being arranged in measured lines, and most of them in equal strophes. Translations based on English official versions.]
- Swete, Henry Barclay. The Apocalypse of St. John. The Greek text with introduction, notes and indices. 9 x 5½. Pp. ccxv, 335. Macmillan, 15s.
[A sequel to Dr. Swete's Commentary on Mark. His aim has been to provide the English student, and especially the clergy, with a book taking account of the large accession to knowledge made in recent years, which may help them to approach the Apocalypse "with an assurance of its prophetic character, chastened by a frank acceptance of the light which the growth of knowledge has cast and will continue to cast upon it." The text is independently studied, and the interpretations offered are those which seemed to arise out of the writer's own words viewed in connection with his circumstances and general purpose. Index of Greek words, and Index. Maps and illustrations.]
- The Interlinear Bible: The Authorised Version and the Revised Version*, together with the marginal notes of both versions and central references. 9 x 6. Pp. xxxv, 1552. Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d. net.
[Shows the Authorised and Revised Versions at a glance. The method adopted is to print in large type such words as are common to both Versions. Where there is a difference between the Versions, however minute, the one line of large type divides into two parallel lines of smaller type, of which the upper gives the separate reading of the Revised and the lower that of the Authorised Version.]

Schnedermann, Dr. Georg. Das Wort von Kreuze: religions geschichtlich und dogmatisch beleuchtet. Ein Beitrag zur Verständigung über die Grundlagen des christlichen Glaubens. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 74. Gütersloh: Bertelsmann.

Taylor, John W. The Coming of the Saints. Imaginations and Studies in Early Church History and Tradition. With 26 illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 326. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

["The main theory that I propose to consider and develop in the following pages," says Mr. Taylor, "is one of Hebrew or Hebrew-Phœnician missions extending from Palestine to all the old Phœnician colonies in the very earliest years of Christendom. It is based on the records of Holy Scripture; it is supported by many old writings and traditions. But it is more than this. It is a theory of missions conducted by the inner circle of disciples who were brought into immediate contact with Jesus at Capernaum and Jerusalem."]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Lloyd, Albert B. Uganda to Khartoum. Life and adventure on the Upper Nile. With a preface by Victor Buxton. 80 illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. xii, 312. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.

[Experiences during five years' residence in the Northern Provinces of the Uganda Protectorate. Deals briefly with missionary efforts amongst the Pagan tribes of the Dark Continent. Maps and index.]

Cooper, A. N. With Knapsack and Note Book. 7½ x 5. Pp. 305. A. Brown & Sons, 3s. 6d.

[Describes walking tours in some of the northern countries of Europe—Denmark, Holland, Belgium and Scotland. Mr. Cooper—the author of "The Tramps of a Walking Parson" and similar books—is the Vicar of Filey, Yorks, and an enthusiastic pedestrian. The book before us is written in the fresh, breezy style which marked his former works.]

Steggall, J. E. A. Picturesque Perthshire. The Shire Series. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 174. Valentine, 2s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Steggall's book is mainly topographical. He explains in a commendably modest preface that the limits of the series precluded a detailed consideration of many subjects which might otherwise have found a place in his volume; and he has followed the plan of dividing the country into five districts and describes what he terms "a rough itinerary." Forty illustrations and a map.]

Stewart, B. My Experiences of the Island of Cyprus. Illustrated from photographs by the author. 7½ x 5. Pp. 260. Skeffington, 6s.

[The material from which this book has been compiled was collected on two occasions: first, when the author was engaged on railway work in the island of Cyprus, and had therefore unusual opportunities to observe the life of the natives; and second, when—two years later—being in the Eastern Mediterranean he visited Cyprus again, and gave up his time chiefly to sight-seeing.]

Lucas, E. V. A Wanderer in London. With 16 illustrations in Colour by Nelson Dawson, and thirty-six other illustrations. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 305. Methuen, 6s.

[A companion book to Mr. Lucas's "Wanderer in Holland." See p. 275.]

France in Eighteen Hundred and Two. Described in a Series of Contemporary Letters by Henry Redhead Yorke. Edited and revised, with a biographical appendix by J. A. C. Sykes and Richard Davey. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 361. Heinemann, 6s.

[These letters were written during a visit to France in 1802, after Henry Redhead had adopted the name of Yorke, says Mr. Davey in his Preface, with the object of "exposing the fruits of a tyrannical and corrupt form of government, whose wires were pulled by unscrupulous miscreants in the oft-blasphemed names of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." A limited edition was printed after the author's death; the reprint before us has been pruned by Lady Sykes to a third of its original size.]

EDUCATION BOOKS

[The following were received too late for insertion in last week's Education Supplement.]

Dr. T. G. Tucker's Frogs of Aristophanes is a new volume in Messrs. Macmillan's Classical Series (3s. 6d. net). The editor aims at giving, besides critical and linguistic commentary, an exegesis of the play as "a true creation of wit and humour presented in an actual theatre before an actual audience." This aim he fulfils well in his introduction (69 pages); then come text, notes, and indices Greek and English. Certain new readings and interpretations, into which we have not space to enter, besides the spirit and vigour of the whole book make it valuable for undergraduates and upper forms of schools. Mr. Tempsky, of Vienna, sends us the second edition of Dr. G. Schreider's Schülerkommentar zu Platons Apologie des Sokrates und Kriton (1k.), which contains also the commentary on the closing chapters of the Phædo and Alcibiades's eulogy of Sokrates from the Symposium.

German Commercial Practice connected with the export and import trade to and from Germany, the German colonies and the countries where German is the recognised language of commerce, by Graham and Oliver (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.), has reached its Part II., which concerns model letters, conversational exercises, exercises for translation into German and abbreviations, all commercial in subject-matter. It is a book of great value to all who wish to carry on business in German.

Theoretical and Practical Physics, by A. H. Mackenzie (Macmillan, 1s.), is a little book adapted to meet the mechanics and physics course proposed by the Board of Education, or the requirements of the mechanics and physics course in the Day Preparatory Grade Schools and the City and Guilds of London Institute. Its method is wholly experimental. Diagrams in the text.

Elementary Arithmetical Graphs, by W. Mudie (6d.), is a new volume in Messrs. Jack's Mathematical Series, explaining simply the use of Graphs as applied to the representation of statistics and the solution of problems in arithmetic.

Book IV. of the Look-about-You Nature Study Books of Messrs. Jack, by Mr. Thomas W. Hoare, deals with objects in Nature of several kinds, in the form of conversations, by which the child is taught to observe for himself. Illustrations in colour and line.

Geographical Gleanings, by the Rev. F. R. Burrows (Philip, 1s. 6d. net), is a book we should like to see in the hands of every teacher of geography—and in the hands of every teacher who neglects the subject. To an excellent series of readers—The English Counties—Messrs. Blackie have now added Middlesex (8d.) A brief historical and geographical account of the county is given, only the more salient features being dwelt on. The same firm publish a good historical sketch of London from early times to the present day: London: historical and descriptive, by Ben Jonson (1s. 6d.); and Our English Towns and Villages, by H. R. Wilton Hall (1s. 6d.)—an excellent reader which makes no pretence to be anything other than an introduction to the study of the history of the customs, manners and so on of our ancestors. The book is written in plain and simple language and should fill a distinct want.

School and Garden: a gardening story with practical hints on school gardening, by Walter P. Wright (Cassell) is a book which will appeal to few children and fewer masters or mistresses. The "practical hints" are well enough in their way, but the story is of a goody-goody type which we regard as unhealthy and pernicious.

An edition of The Simpler Poems of William Wordsworth, edited by Edward Hutton, with an introduction and a glossary which explains the meaning of such words as "pains" have been issued by Messrs. Dent (3d.). We do not fancy that the child who requires that sort of appendix needs an introduction containing facts about Wordsworth's father and mother or his school-days.

Standard Plays for Amateur Performance in Girls' Schools: Scenes from the Great Novelists, by Elsie Fogerty (Sonnen-schein, 6d.) should prove useful to mistresses of girls' schools who are constantly perplexed by the ever recurring question of what to act at term ends. The adaptations are from "The Abbott"; "The Mill on the Floss"; "Adam Bede"; and "A Christmas Carol"; and there are costume plates by Isabel Bonus.

Messrs. Jarrold send us a third edition of Messrs. Bygott and Jones's Points in Pronunciation (1s. net) and a ninth edition of their The King's English (1s. 6d.), but we see no reason to alter our former verdict. Neither Mr. John Bygott nor Mr. A. J. Lawford Jones possesses the qualifications essential in those who would instruct youth in punctuation or literature.

Exercises in Spelling, Dictation, and Composition for Middle Forms (Relfe, 6d.), is a cheap and useful little book; our only objection is to the attempts to explain words such as "deign" by the still more difficult "synonym for condescend!" What child who did not understand "deign" would understand "synonym"?

Literature as an Aid to Teaching, by Alan Northman (Sunday School Union, 1s. net), at almost every page invites the criticism we cannot find space for; but it is in some respects interesting, and pupil-teachers might do worse than glance through it, carefully rejecting the list provided at the end of the book. We read that "there is not one [book] that is not worthy of a permanent place in any library," yet Mr. Hall Caine is there! Paradise Lost has been omitted from the list "because it has not been [the author's] fortune to know any one who had a familiar acquaintance with that poem beyond the connecting of it (sic) with a certain drudgery in schooldays!"

SCHOFIELD & JESSOP (Ltd.) are acknowledged to be well qualified by experience and training to advise parents and guardians in the choice of a School or Tutor. - 217 Piccadilly, W

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

THE NEW PHYSICS and CHEMISTRY:
A SERIES OF POPULAR ESSAYS ON PHYSICAL AND CHEMICAL SUBJECTS. By W. A. SHENSTONE, F.R.S., Senior Science Master in Clifton College; Author of "The Life and Work of Justus von Liebig," etc. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [In the Press.]

THE UPTON LETTERS.

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON,
Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge. With a New Preface. 7s. 6d. net.

SEVENTH IMPRESSION (Second Edition) SELLING RAPIDLY.

EIGHTH IMPRESSION (Second Edition) IN THE PRESS.

TRIBUNE.—"A book that one does not exhaust at the first, or even second reading. It will be treasured by all who seek for beauty in quiet places."

By the Same Author.

FROM A COLLEGE WINDOW. 7s. 6d. net.

FIFTH IMPRESSION (Third Edition) SOLD OUT.

SIXTH IMPRESSION (Fourth Edition) READY ON TUESDAY NEXT.

MORNING POST.—"Hardly since 'In Memoriam' was published has any Englishman, in a book not avowedly religious, written so intimately of his own soul face to face with the mysteries which surround us all."

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIO- GRAPHY, INDEX AND EPITOME. Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

In one volume of 1464 pages, Royal 8vo. Price 25s. net in cloth; or 32s.
net in half-morocco.

ATHENÆUM.—"We can conceive no volume of reference more indispensable to the scholar, the literary man, the historian, and the journalist."

Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, post free on application.

A LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

By SIDNEY LEE, Editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography."
Fifth and Thoroughly Revised Edition. With a Portrait of Shakespeare, a Portrait of the Earl of Southampton, and Facsimiles of Shakespeare's known signatures. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Also the Illustrated Library Edition, in one vol., medium 8vo, profusely illustrated with Photogravures, Topographical Views, etc., 16s.; and the Student's Edition, with a Photogravure Plate, and 4 Full-page Illustrations.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

TIMES.—"A marvel of research. . . Never before has learning been brought to bear upon Shakespeare's biography with anything like the same force."

QUEEN VICTORIA: A Biography. By SIDNEY

LEE, Editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography," New, Revised, and Cheaper Edition. With Portraits, Map, and Facsimile Letter. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

Also the Fourth Impression (Second Edition) of the Original Edition. With Portraits, Maps, and Facsimile Letter. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"Mr. Sidney Lee has performed with marked success, a work which required, in no common measure, a combination of assiduous labour, skilful arrangement, and unflinching tact. . . Our interest is sustained from the first page to the last."

THE INDIAN EMPIRE: Its People, His- tory and Products. By SIR W. W. HUNTER, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., LL.D. Third and Standard Edition. With Map. Demy 8vo, 28s.

SHAKESPEARE COMMENTARIES. By

Dr. G. G. GERVINUS, Professor at Heidelberg. Translated under the Author's superintendence by F. E. BUNNETT. With a Preface by F. J. FURNIVALL. Seventh Edition. 8vo, 14s.

THE HISTORICAL SERIES FOR BIBLE STUDENTS. Edited by PROFS. CHARLES FOSTER KENT and FRANK KNIGHT SANDERS.

Volumes I. and II.—HISTORY OF THE HEBREW PEOPLE. By Prof. CHARLES FOSTER KENT. With Maps and Charts. Seventh Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

Volume III.—HISTORY OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE: The Babylonian, Persian, and Greek Periods. By Prof. CHARLES FOSTER KENT.
With Maps. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Volume IV.—HISTORY OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE: The Maccabean and Roman Periods. By Prof. J. S. RIGGS, D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Volume V.—THE LIFE OF JESUS OF NAZARETH. By Prof.
RUSH REES. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Volume VI.—CHRISTIANITY IN THE APOSTOLIC AGE. By Prof. GEORGE T. PURVES, Ph.D., D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Volume VII.—HISTORY OF THE BABYLONIANS AND ASSYRIANS. By Prof. GEORGE S. GOODSPEED, Ph.D. Crown
8vo, 6s.

Other Volumes to follow.

*. Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send a CATALOGUE of their PUBLICATIONS Post Free on Application.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

THE KING OF COURT POETS.

A Study of the Life, Work and Times of Lodovico Ariosto
By EDMUND GARDNER,

Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc.

With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Being his Correspondence with Tobias Lear and
the latter's Diary.

Illustrated with Rare Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

VICTORIAN NOVELISTS.

Biographical and Critical Studies.

By LEWIS MELVILLE,

Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray."

Illustrated with Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM STUBBS Bishop of Oxford, 1825-1901

From the Letters of William Stubbs.

By WILLIAM HOLDEN HUTTON, B.D.

With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

THE TREASURE OF HEAVEN.

By MARIE CORELLI.

With Photogravure Portrait of the Author. SECOND LARGE EDITION.

HOLYLAND.

By GUSTAV FRENSEN, Author of "Jörn Uhl."

THE INCOMPLETE AMORIST.

By E. NESBIT, Author of "The Red House." [Monday.]

OF MISTRESS EVE.

By HOWARD PEASE, Author of "Magnus Sinclair," etc.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

A GERMAN POMPADOUR.

Being the Extraordinary History of Wilhelmina von Gravitz, Landhofmeisterin of Wurtemberg.

By MARIE HAY.

With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"Memoirs of a remarkable character and of considerable historical importance."
WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

POCKET EDITIONS OF MARY JOHNSTON'S ROMANCES.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net each. Leather, 3s. 6d. net. Frontispiece to each vol.

OLD DOMINION

BY ORDER OF THE COMPANY

American Men of Letters

A Series of Biographies of Eminent American Authors. Foolscap 8vo, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net per volume.

American Commonwealths

A Series of Histories of the Representative Commonwealths of the United States. With Maps and Indexes, foolscap 8vo, gilt top, 4s. 6d.
net per volume.

American Statesmen

A Series of Biographies of Men famous in the Political History of the United States. Foolscap 8vo, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net per volume.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

Devoted to Literature, Art, Science, and Politics.

PUBLISHED ON THE 15th OF EACH MONTH. Price 1s. net

Miss MAY SINCLAIR (Author of "The Divine Fire") and EDEN PHILLPOTTS contribute to the SEPTEMBER Number.

Complete Catalogue of Books published by Archibald Constable & Co.
arranged in classes with analytical notes and brief reviews is now ready; also a List of Announcements of Books to be issued during the autumn.

Constable's Monthly Book List will be sent regularly, post free, if desired.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LIMITED.
16 James Street, Haymarket, S.W.

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office :

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office :

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

THE PAPER FOR A FRIEND ABROAD.

Writing from Saranac Lake, New York,
U.S.A., a reader says :

"I have just finished your issue of June 30th, and I want to say 'Thanks' for it. My father sends it me each week, and I thought it would please you to know how much it is appreciated, though it makes me very homesick at times.

"This is a health resort full of lungers from all parts, and the 'Saturday Westminster' goes quite a round as soon as I get through with it. The Americans—quite a good class up here—are amazed at the price considering the quality, and at the merit of the whole production."

The subscription rate for abroad is 8s. 8d. a year, post free.
Shorter periods at proportionate rates.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

With the October number, ready on Monday, "The Book Monthly" begins its fourth annual volume. If you are not already a subscriber now is the time to begin. You will get for sixpence, all the news of the book world from month to month—gossip, articles, particulars of new books, illustrations. The "Book Monthly" is now the most quoted of magazines, which shows that it is interesting and useful.

Write for a specimen copy to the publishers SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, AND CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1796

OCTOBER 6, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

NEUILLY, PARIS.—Mlle. SASSISSON and Miss COCHRAN receive a FEW GIRLS to study French and to continue their Education in all branches; excellent visiting masters.—Address till September 15, c/o F. J. COCHRAN, Esq., 152 Union Street, Aberdeen.

SCHOFIELD & JESSOP, LTD.,

SCHOLASTIC EXPERTS,

217 PICCADILLY,
LONDON, W.

Appointments Vacant

MESSRS. SCHOFIELD & JESSOP, Ltd. 217 PICCADILLY, W. beg to remind Assistant Masters and Tutors that the vacancies for next term are rapidly filling, and those who have not already sent in their applications, will be well advised to do so at once.

There is of course a large number still open, but no time should be lost.

TO AUTHORS.—Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colour, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

HOLMAN HUNT'S COLLECTED WORKS.

EXHIBITION of the Collected Works of W. Holman Hunt, O.M., D.C.L. Now open, 10 till 6.

THE LEICESTER GALLERIES,
Leicester Square.

QUEEN'S HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS

Every Evening at 8

THE QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

Conductor—MR. HENRY J. WOOD.

1s., 2s., 3s., 5s., usual agents, Chappell's Box Office, Queen's Hall. Full programmes for the entire season from the Queen's Hall Orchestra (Ltd.), 320 Regent Street W.

ROBERT NEWMAN, Manager.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

NEW LAND by Otto Sverdrup; being an account of 4 years in the Arctic Regions, containing 8 maps, 62 full-page, and 158 other illustrations; 2 vols. 8vo, cloth, 1904, 36s. net for 9s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

J. POOLE & CO.

Established
1854.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

GOOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CAN-TIANA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt, 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) under takes TYPEWRITING.—Authors MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING (high class), clergyman's daughter; testimonials; several years' experience, Higher Cambridge certificate. 10d. 1000 words. Miss ADA MOORE, Duffield, Derby.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

MR. ROBERT SUTTON,
Publisher,

HAVING Special Facilities for the Production of Scientific, Educational, Theological, Technical, Biographical, and Art Works

Is prepared to arrange for the issue of same, in a tasteful style, and at most reasonable cost.

Books illustrated by the "Suttonelle" Glas Print, specimen of which will be sent to applicants. MSS. carefully read. Estimates of costs supplied. Accounts verified by a Chartered Accountant's Certificate.

43 The Exchange,
Southwark Street, S.E.

TO BOOKBUYERS AND LIBRARIANS.

W. H. Smith and Son's October Catalogue containing some 7000 titles embracing all Branches of Literature showing reductions of 30 per cent. to 80 per cent. is now ready, and will be sent post free to any part of the world on application to W. H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY, 186 Strand, London, W.C. We have the largest combined stock in the world of Second-Hand and New Remainder Works.

NOTE.—Full particulars of the following and many other important New Books will be sent post free on application to
T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, etc.

- The Philippine Islands. A Political, Ethno- 25 0 graphical, Social, and Commercial History of the Philippine Archipelago, embracing the whole period of Spanish Rule, with an Account of the succeeding American Insular Government. By JOHN FORMAN, F.R.G.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth. NET
- The First Annexation of the Transvaal. By 21 0
W. J. LEYDS, LL.D., formerly State Secretary of the South African Republic. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Society in the Country House. Anecdotal 16 0
Records of Six Centuries. By T. H. S. SCOTT, Author of "King Edward and his Court," etc. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Links in my Life on Land and Sea. By 15 0
Commander J. W. GAMBIER, R.N. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Studies in Biography. By Sir SPENCER WAL- 15 0
POLE, K.C.B., Author of "History of England from 1815," "Life of Lord John Russell," etc. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Lombard Communes. By W. F. BUTLER, 15 0
Professor of Modern Languages, Queen's College, Cork. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Court Beauties of Old Whitehall. By W. R. H. 15 0
TROWBRIDGE, Author of "A Girl of the Multitude," etc. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and many other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Life of Auguste Rodin. By FREDERICK 15 0
LAWTON. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Literary History of the English People. 12 6
Vol. II. FROM THE RENAISSANCE TO THE CIVIL WAR. I. By J. J. JUSSERAND. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Literary History of Persia, from Firdawsī 12 6
UNTIL SA'DI (A.D. 1000-1290). By EDWARD G. BROWNE, M.A., M.B., F.B.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, Sir Thomas Adams Professor of Arabic, and sometime Lecturer in Persian in the University of Cambridge. NET
- Napoleon's Last Voyages. Being the Diaries 10 6 of Admiral Sir THOMAS USHER, R.N., K.C.B. (on board the Undaunted), and JOHN R. GLOVER, Secretary to Rear-Admiral Cockburn (on board the Northumberland). New Edition. With Introduction and Notes. By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Author of "Life of Napoleon I.," "Napoleonic Studies," etc. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Revolutionary Princess: Christina Belgio- 10 6 joso-Trivulzio, her Life and Times (1808-1871). By H. REMSEN WHITEHOUSE, Author of "The Collapse of the Kingdom of Naples," "The Life of Amadeus of Savoy," etc. Commendatore dell' Ordine dei Santi Maurizio e Lazzaro. With Photogravure Frontispiece and many other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- St. Stephen's in the Fifties. By E. M. WHITTY. 10 6
With an Introduction by JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Author of "A History of Our Own Times," and Notes by H. M. WILLIAMS. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Heroines of French Society in the Court, the 10 6
REVOLUTION, THE EMPIRE, and THE RESTORATION. By Mrs. BEARNE, Author of "Queen of Napoleon's Court," "Early Valois Queens," etc. With many Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- An Epoch in Irish History: Trinity College, 7 6
Dublin, its History and Fortunes, 1591-1660. By Prof. J. P. MAHAFFY, D.D. With a New Frontispiece and Preface. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Short History of American Literature. By 3 6
HENRY A. BEERS. With Portraits. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Short History of Jewish Literature, from 2 6
THE FALL OF THE TEMPLE (70 C.E.) TO THE ERA OF EMANCIPATION (1708 C.E.). By ISRAEL ABRAHAM, M.A., Reader in Rabbinic Literature in the University of Cambridge. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- A Short History of Wales. By OWEN EDWARDS, 2 0
Lecturer on Modern History at Lincoln College, Oxford, Author of "The Story of Wales," etc. With Maps. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET

SCIENCE AND NATURAL HISTORY.

- The Horse: A Guide to its Anatomy for 30 0
Artists. 110 Drawings (Reproduced by Photo-Lithography) by HERMANN DITTRICH, with Explanatory Notes by Prof. ELLENBERGER and Prof. BAUM. In Portfolio, quarto. NET
- The Psychology and Training of the Horse. 10 6
By Count EUGENIO MARTINENGO CESARESCO. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET

POLITICS AND ECONOMICS.

- International Law as Interpreted during the 25 0
RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR. By F. E. SMITH, M.P., B.C.L., formerly Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and Vinerian Scholar in the University of Oxford, and N. W. SIBLEY, LL.M., Trin. H. Cant., Barristers-at-Law. Roy. 8vo, cloth. Second Edition. Revised and Reset. NET
- The National Liberal Federation, from its 5 0
COMMENCEMENT TO THE GENERAL ELECTION OF 1906. By R. SPENCE WATSON, LL.D., President of the Federation, 1890-1902. With a Photogravure Frontispiece from a Portrait by Sir GEORGE REID. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Retaliatory Duties. By H. DIETZEL, Professor 2 6 at the University of Bonn. Translated by D. W. SIMON, D.D., and W. OSBORNE BRIGSTOCKE, Member of the Unionist Free Trade Club. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION.

- Rambles on the Riviera. By EDWARD STRAS- 21 0
BURGER, F.R.S., D.C.L. Oxon, Professor of Botany at the University of Bonn. With 87 Coloured Illustrations by LOUISE REUSCH. Translated from the German by O. and B. COMERFORD-CASEY. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Romantic Cities of Provence. By MONA CAIRD, 15 0
Author of "The Pathway of the Gods," etc. Illustrated with Sketches by JOSEPH PENNELL and EDWARD M. SYNGE. Small royal 8vo, cloth. NET
- Carpathian to Pindus: Pictures of Rou- 15 0
MANIAN COUNTRY LIFE. By TEREZA STRATILESCO. With 2 NET
Maps and many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth.
- Uganda to Khartoum. Life and Adventures 10 6 on the Upper Nile. By ALBERT B. LLOYD. With a Preface by VICTOR NET
BUXTON. With a Map and 81 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth.
- From Charing Cross to Delhi. By S. PARNELL 10 6
KERR. With 65 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. NET
- Saunterings in Spain—Barcelona, Madrid, 10 6
TOLEDO, CORDOVA, SEVILLE, GRANADA. By Major-General SEYMOUR. NET
Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth.
- Canada To-Day. By J. A. HOBSON, Author 3 6 of "The Evolution of Modern Capitalism," "Imperialism," etc. Crown 8vo, NET cloth.

THE MODERN ADVENTURE SERIES.

- In Search of El Dorado. A Wanderer's Ex- 5 0 periences. By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Admiral MORESBY. With 32 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- True Tales of Mountain Adventure. By Mrs. 5 0
AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. Main). With many Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays. By the 16 0
Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING, Author of "History in Scott's Novels," NET
"Shakespeare Studied in Eight Plays," etc. Demy 8vo, cloth.
- On Art and Artists. By MAX NORDAU. Large 7 6
crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Bards of the Gael and Gall: Examples of 6 0
the Poetic Literature of Erin, done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael. By GEORGE SIGERSON, M.D., F.R.U.I. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Old German Love Songs. Translated from the 6 0
Minnesinger of the Twelfth-Fourteenth Centuries. By F. C. NICHOLSON, M.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Sanitary Evolution of London. By HENRY 6 0
JEPHSON, L.C.C., Author of "The Platform, its Rise and Progress," etc. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Chats on Old Prints. By ARTHUR HAYDEN, 5 0
Author of "Chats on Old China," "Chats on Old Furniture," etc. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 70 Full Page Plates. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Chats on Costume: a Practical Guide to 5 0
HISTORIC DRESS. By G. WOOLISCROFT RHEAD, R.E., A.R.C.A. Lond., Author of "A Handbook of Etching," "The Treatment of Drapery in Art," "Studies in Plant Form," "The Principles of Design," etc. With a Coloured Frontispiece and many Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Power of Character, and other Studies. 3 6
By Lady ELPHINSTONE. With a Preface by Canon J. G. TETLEY. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET
Leather 3 6
- The Best Plays of George Farquhar. Edited, 3 6
and with an Introduction, by WILLIAM ARCHER. On thin paper with Frontispiece, small crown 8vo. ("Mermaid Series.") NET
Cloth 2 6
- How to Buy a Business. A Guide to the 2 6
Purchase of Retail and other Businesses, Professional Practices, etc. With a Chapter on Partnership. By A. W. BROMLEY. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- Vocations for Our Sons. By JOHN W. HICKS, 2 6
F.R.A.S. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

- The Story of the Amulet. By E. NESBIT, 6 0
Author of "The Treasure Seekers," etc. With 48 Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Welsh Fairy Book. By W. JENKYN 6 0
THOMAS. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Lady Noggs, Peeress. By EDGAR JEPSON, 6 0
Author of "The Admirable Tinker." Children's Edition. (Fourth Impression). With 16 Illustrations by LEWIS BAUMER. Large crown 8vo, cloth. NET
- The Adventures of a Dodo. By G. E. FARROW, 5 0
Author of "The Wallypug of Why," et. With 70 Illustrations by WILL POGANY. Crown 8vo, cloth. NET

NOVELS by JOHN OLIVER HOBBS (Mrs. CRAIGIE), NORA CHESSON, W. H. HUDSON, IRVING BACHELLER, E. NESBIT, ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW, LADY TROUBRIDGE, K. and HESKETH PRICHARD, J. S. FLETCHER, and others.

MAPS.—A NEW CATALOGUE of the Small Scale ORDNANCE SURVEY and GEOLOGICAL MAPS is NOW READY. Post free on application to
T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	323	Abbey Thoughts	330
Literature :		A Literary Causerie :
English Sacred Poetry	325	Creative Criticism	331
Back to the Land	326	Fiction	332
Out of the Barrow	327	Fine Art :
The Path of the Holy Thorn	328	The Artist as Critic	333
De Profundis	329	Forthcoming Books	333
Nugæ Scriptoris :		Correspondence	334
IV. The Motor-Mania and its possible Results	329	Books Received	338

This number contains the Autumn Announcements Supplement.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free

THE LITERARY WEEK

"A NONCONFORMIST minister, who renounced his ministry and took to journalism, told me that the motive of his change was that he desired to 'preach to a wider congregation.'" We take the sentence from a book that has plenty of stories as good and many better, Mr. George W. E. Russell's "Social Silhouettes" (Smith, Elder), s.v. "The Journalist." That minister had the genuine love of power. He gave up, we do not doubt it, a great deal of personal adulation, a constant opportunity for display in the public eye, many tea-parties, slippers and presents of game, and the comforting monstrari digito in the streets of his cure, and took instead the nameless, retired, impersonal influence of the journalist—the reality of power for its shadow. Congregations love their preacher and care nothing for what he says: the world cares nothing for the journalist, but hangs upon his message.

It is the love of power, not, as Mr. Russell says, the "cacoethes praedicandi—that earnest desire to exhort, reprove, instruct and edify—" which leads eight journalists out of ten into their uncomfortable, august profession. The ninth is attracted by what he thinks an easy way of making an income (and perhaps there are few easier ways than being an average art-critic, reviewer, or—but for the hours and the atmosphere—dramatic critic); the tenth by curiosity and the love of variety. But, among the higher rank of journalists, the love of power is the secret. He knows that what he says or allows to be said will have immense weight with the public; and that is true of all journalists, from the novel-reviewer on a provincial weekly to the Editor of the Times. Few of the public know his name; fewer still know him by sight; the meanest has, to quote Mr. Russell again, his "position as opinion-former in the neighbourhood of—"

Power, of course, for a purpose, not merely for self-gratification—the power of speaking the truth in the most effective manner possible. We have always found that the genuine journalist, the man of experience and weight, has an objection to signing his name to an article. Young or inexperienced men are not unnaturally eager to sign. The genuine journalist, the lover of real power, knows that to sign his name is to lessen the weight of his opinion. The man who signs his article ceases to be the voice of Truth and Judgment and becomes an individual author, with eccentricities and prejudices to be allowed for, and possibly some affectation of omniscience to be sneered at by a fickle and easily bored public.

That love of power is often tasted for the first time at school, as Mr. Russell observes. Who that edited or contributed to his school-paper but thrilled at the power of dictating, unknown, to his fellows on all subjects, from Ecclesiastical Patronage and the Rival Claims of Literature and Science (to take two of our author's instances) to the right position of the cap on the head or the need of better fielding in the Eleven? One of the greatest joys ever experienced by the present writer came to him on the day after he had published in his school paper a brief epigram in verse (which he still believes to have been rather clever) on certain exalted personages who had given up wearing tail-coats on Sundays:—he heard one of his victims inquiring angrily for the author of the gibe. The consciousness of power glowed within him. No Dumasian General of the Jesuits "was in it"! And in telling the story he is not sacrificing his anonymity, for he is probably the only person alive who remembers the epigram or the incident.

The writer of an interesting article on "The Sea Shanty," in The Yachting Monthly is of opinion that the name is rightly so spelt, not "chanty." The French sailor, he says, was never very great at singing; it is from negro and American and Canadian sailor-men that the "shanty" comes; and the derivation of its name is from the "shanty" in which the lumber-men—even great singers—lived, not from "chantez." The author declares that the word was always spelt with an "s" until twenty years ago, when the "shanty" was already nearly gone. It is a curious thing that the word "shanty" does not occur in the New English Dictionary. The nearest thing to it is "Chantier," described as "Canadian French" from F. chantier, the slip on which ships are built, a dock-yard, or wood-yard, a "place where one sleeps, place where one puts certain things to store them or to work them," a log-but, a shanty. But if chantier and "shanty" are the same, the "c" is as correct as the "s."

Be it as it may, chanties are very old, as old, the writer believes, as sailing-ships. The earliest known British chanty occurs in "The Complaynt of Scotland" (c. 1450) where we find: "Hou, hou, pulpela, pulpela, boulena, boulena"—in other words "Haul the bowline." It does not seem to mean much; and it really means very little less than later chanties. They must be distinguished, of course, from naval ballads: the chanty is merely the song sung in pulling at a rope, and the object of it is to provide a pleasanter way of setting the time than merely: "One, two, three!" The words that fill up the intervals scarcely matter.

Here is an ancient British chanty, in which it will be noticed that the singer cries "Cheer'ly man" just as the bo'sun in The Tempest cried "Cheerly my hearts!"

O Nancy Dawson, hi oh !
Cheer'ly, man !
She's got a notion, hi oh !
Cheer'ly, man !
For our old bo'sun, hi oh !
Cheer'ly, man, oh !
Hauley hi oh !
Cheer'ly man !

The next verse deals with Sally Rackett who "pawnd my old jacket, She's got the ticket"—"and so on," says the author of the article, "through a number of ladies."

A large number of sea-shanties originated in Yankee sailing-packets, especially those of the famous Black Ball Line. Where did Stevenson get his "Sixteen men on the dead man's chest, Heave-ho and a bottle of rum!"? That is a chanty in form, and a better one than most. But this negro chanty is amusing:

O, de worl' was made in six days and ended on de seven,
Ah-He! Ah-Ho! are you mos' done?
But accordin' to de contrac' it orter been eleven;
So clear de track, let de bulgine run.

To my hie-rig-a-jig and a low back ca
 Ah-He! Ah-Ho! etc.
 With Liza Lee all on my knee;
 O, clear de track, etc.

Then follow some more Biblical verses, such as these:

Lil' David was the boss when he finis' up Goliah,
 But he play it pooty low down on ole man Uriah.

Daniel in de den done sleep all de night,
 Never mind de lions nor de tiger not a mite.

Jonah was a hungry man 'cos he eat de whale,
 He manage very well till he come to de tail.

York House, Twickenham, which is to be sold this month, once belonged to Lord Clarendon, who lived there when the king was at Hampton Court, and tradition says that he used to write in the garden. Later, it passed into the possession of the Mrs. Damer whose name appears frequently in Horace Walpole's letters. She thought him "the most amiable man in the world and the most agreeable," while he loved her as his own child. Mrs. Damer wrote Latin like Pliny and studied Greek, but she is best known for her talent for sculpture. Two marble kittens that she carved had such a lifelike air that Horace Walpole used to talk to them. One of the wings of York House was turned into a museum for her busts and her mother's worsted work.

Another interesting person whose name is associated with York House is Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, who created much excitement in his day. A Hindoo in search of a creed, he travelled to "the country of three hundred religions and one sauce," and soon became the lion of London drawing-rooms. Sir Alexander Johnston, who then lived at Twickenham, often invited him to York House; and here it was that he planned a book in which two Brahmins, standing on the garden-terrace, were supposed to be discussing the relative merits of British and Hindoo civilisation. Their conclusion was that owing to the great facilities for intercourse that existed between the two countries the Hindoo would soon be the equal of the Britisher in science and art and the knowledge of government. The book was not published, owing to the Rajah's death in 1833.

While the modern compilers of collections of verse have often the courage to include contemporary poets, the school anthologist is not infrequently too much of an archæologist. He trusts to time rather than to taste to guide him in his relations, with the result that his florilegium is really a herbarium. This is not the fault of Mrs. P. A. Barnett's "Golden Numbers" (Longmans) for boys and girls in their teens. A bare third of the book is composed of what we may call "immortelles," poems by Byron, Gray, Shakespeare and the like. The rest of her garland is formed of fresh-gathered flowers from living poets such as Newbolt, Kipling, Bridges, Yeats, or from those who are still with us in spirit, Arnold, Browning and Tennyson. This is only as it should be. Why rob the young generation of a knowledge of those poets who are nearest to them in thought and feeling? There appears to be an unwritten law of the school that a poet must wait a certain number of years for due canonisation. Thus Tennyson and Browning may be described as being at the beatification stage, while Byron and Shakespeare have attained the full rights of sainthood.

The French Government, after publishing a large number of bulky tomes on the contents of the Exhibition of 1900, has now issued the first volume of a new series entitled "The balance-sheet of the century," which enumerates the principal achievements of most of the civilised countries of the world in education, science, art, literature, and music. In the literature section the first entry under England is Godwin, the author of the "loveless novel," "Caleb Williams," and the last is poor "Mrs. Ward," who is described as "a popular success." The lives of great writers in half a dozen lines are never very inspiring or suggestive, and some, like Keats, come off with only one line. On the other hand, Thomas Moore, the banjo poet, and Mr. Gosse are allotted as many as nine. Mr. Alfred Austin has six; while Macaulay, a prime favourite with the French, is limited to five. Mr. Hardy is summarily disposed of in three words; Mr. Meredith, with six lines to his credit, is more liberally treated. No mention is made of Oscar Wilde, whose Salome is very well known in Paris, nor of Mr. Stephen Phillips, Mr. H. G. Wells, or Mr. Bernard Shaw.

In art the section is inevitably affected and cramped by the "policy of grab" adopted by the official party, who appropriated the lion's share of the space allotted to English exhibitors. Among contemporary artists Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema, Sir George Reid, and Messrs. Davis, Forbes, Lorrimer and Orchardson are singled out. Then follows a curious list of orthodox painters, Leader, East, Wyllie, Cameron, Aumonier, North, Clausen. The list in sculpture is more comprehensive. So is that in etching, except that the name of Strang is omitted. No name is cited in the paragraph devoted to architecture. England's contribution to the theatre is dealt with in less than two lines. Says the author: "I have only spoken incidentally of the theatre (when dealing with English literature). It is, in fact, a weak point with our neighbours." He has not spoken at all of English music, though even Belgium, Denmark, and Finland are noticed. This is rather surprising, for, though Sir Edward Elgar was unknown abroad before 1900, the same can hardly be said of Sir Hubert Parry, at least so far as Germany is concerned.

Conspicuous on the principal table in the news-room of the well-equipped Public Library of Inverness is a huge Family Bible, "presented," according to an inscription on its opening page, "by Councillor W. Gunn, 18th July, 1891." The library is probably unique in the possession of such a volume; and the twelve-page life of Rev. Dr. John Brown of Haddington, with which it opens, followed by that divine's eighty pages of introduction, with blank pages, too, for family records and portraits, do not bear marks of frequent handling. "Brown of Haddington," as the once famous commentator was termed, was the ancestor of the beloved physician to whom we are indebted for "Rab and his Friends" and "Marjorie Fleming," and in the early decades of last century his Bible was a treasured possession in many Scottish households.

Though we have closed the correspondence on the word "like" as a conjunction, we may be permitted to refer to the quotation from Burns:

Or like the snow falls in the river
 A moment white—then melts for ever, which has been brought forward as an instance of that use of "like." The author of an article on Burns in the ACADEMY of January 20, 1906, quoted the verse, and printed the words "snow-falls" with the hyphen, following the Globe edition. This roused a protest from a correspondent, who declared that either the "like"="as," or the relative "that" had dropped out. Another correspondent now writes to protest that the words ought to have the hyphen, and that they make a compound substantive. The structure of the whole stanza would be more perfect were it so: on the other hand, "melts" in the singular will not tally with "snow-falls" in the plural. The authority of Burns on a point of grammar, is not, in any case, of much weight.

All members of the Classical Association will regret that the President, Lord Curzon, is unable to address the General Meeting of the Association in Manchester on the 12th of this month. As it is, the meeting will be presided over by the Master of the Rolls, who was the first President of the Association; and Mr. Justice Kennedy (Vice-President) will deliver an address. Amongst other interesting matters to be discussed is the Report of the Committee on the Pronunciation of Latin and Greek, and the following Resolution will be moved: "That the Classical Association recommends for adoption the changes of Latin Pronunciation approved by the Pronunciation Committee and by the Philological Societies of Oxford and Cambridge." There is great hope that, as the result of the energetic action of the Classical Association, uniformity of pronunciation may soon be secured, for Latin at least, in our schools and Universities.

The Book sales are on us again. Messrs. Hodgson and Co. announce their first sale for October 9, and three following days. The principal lots to be disposed of are a fine copy of the engravings from the works of Sir Thomas Lawrence, all Proofs or Proofs before Letters, Claude's Liber Veritatis, original edition, Proof Plates, Goupil's Historical Monographs, 9 vols., Gould's Monograph of the Trochilidae or Humming Birds, 5 vols. imperial folio. The Folk Lore Society's Publications, 51 vols., Zoological Society's Proceedings, 1868-92. First editions of Scott's "Waverley" and "Tales of My Landlord," Cussans' "History of Hertfordshire" and many other important books on Art, Natural History, topography and travel.

The following are among forthcoming events:

The Classical Association: Manchester Meeting, October 11-13.
Medical Society of London, October 8. Annual Meeting and Introductory Address by the President.

University of London: October 9, 11 A.M. Professor Priebisch's first lecture on "German Religious Poetry of the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries." October 8, 4 P.M. Professor Robertson's first lecture on "German Literary Criticism from Opitz to Schiller." October 8 at 5 P.M. Professor Carveth Read's first lecture on "The History of Modern Philosophy."

Leicester Galleries: Saturday, October 6. The Holman Hunt Exhibition opens.

Queen's Hall. First Symphony Concert, November 3. To be followed by Concerts on November 17, December 1 and 15, January 19, February 2 and 16, and March 2.

The Society of Artists At Work are now holding an Exhibition of Arts and Handicrafts at the Grafton Galleries, which will close on October 13.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson: October 5. Sale of the Bartlett and other collections of Pottery and Porcelain, and other works of art.

Messrs. Hodgson: Sale of Books, as above.

LITERATURE

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY

The Treasury of Sacred Song. Selections from the English Lyrical poets of four centuries. By F. T. PALGRAVE. (Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.)

PALGRAVE'S "Treasury of Sacred Song," a new edition of which has just been published, contains some faults of detail which it is useless to mention now, since the author is dead and cannot mend them; but, on the whole, it is a good selection and gives a just idea of the quality of our sacred poetry. That sacred poetry may be roughly divided into two classes, the poetry of private devotion and the poetry of public worship. In both these classes our sacred poetry is inferior to our secular; but in the second class, which mainly consists of hymns, the inferiority is extreme. Some poems of private devotion have been written by Herbert and Vaughan and Crashaw and Christina Rossetti which are of the highest excellence; but of our hymns very few have been written by great poets, and still fewer have any pretensions to be called great poetry. We might have expected that the nineteenth century, with its great secular poetry, and with its revival of religion and particularly of the ceremonial of worship, would have produced finer hymns than the eighteenth; but on the contrary its hymns have been as inferior to those of the eighteenth century as its secular poetry has been superior. The most famous of all its hymns, "Lead, Kindly Light," is not really a hymn at all, but an expression of private devotion and of the experience of one particular mind; and this is true also of most of the better poems of our time which are used as hymns. In fact, the art of hymn-writing, never very flourishing in our literature, seems to be dying out; and it is worth while to inquire why this should be.

Palgrave in his introduction quotes from Dr. Johnson a passage to the effect that religion is not a proper theme for poetry. "The ideas of Christian theology," said Johnson, "are too simple for eloquence, too sacred for fiction, and too majestic for ornament." Palgrave does not agree with this opinion, and the facts are against it, even if we suppose Johnson to have meant only that the dogmas of religion cannot be expressed in poetry. Here, for instance, are two verses from Crashaw on the dogma of the Incarnation, verses which are not quoted in Palgrave's work, but which prove that a poet can make the most splendid poetry out of a dogma when it stirs his imagination and his emotions:

That the great Angel-blinding Light should shrink
His blaze, to shine in a poor shepherd's eye;
That the unmeasured God so low should sink,
As prisoner in a few poor rags to lie;
That from His mother's breast He milk should drink,
Who feeds with nectar Heaven's fair family;
That a vile manger His low bed should prove
Who thunders on a throne of stars above.

That He, Whom the Sun serves, should faintly peep
Through clouds of infant flesh: that He, the old
Eternal Word, should be a child, and weep:
That He Who made the fire should fear the cold:
That Heaven's high Majesty His Court should keep
In a clay-cottage by each blast controll'd.
That Glory's self should serve our griefs and fears,
And free Eternity submit to years.

It would be a strange thing indeed if the dogmas and events of our religion made no appeal to our imagination; and that idea of Johnson's, that there is something impious in the use of art as a means of expressing devotion, was never heard of when men were most devout and had most joy in their devotion. If we are told to hold it about poetry, we must hold it about all the other arts. We must say that the cathedrals of the Middle Ages, the paintings of Fra Angelico, the sacred music of Palestrina and Handel and Bach and Mozart are all presumptuous and misconceived. But there is, or ought to be, no need to argue the point now. Johnson's æsthetics are not ours, and his opinions are more likely to be despised when right than accepted when wrong. But it may be said that great hymns are not written because poets cannot write for a congregation of worshippers, cannot give their powers to the expression of common thoughts or common emotions. Yet the facts again are against this theory. There are noble Latin hymns. There are a few noble English ones, such as Cowper's "Hark, my soul, it is the Lord." Also, the greatest poetry of all is usually an expression of thoughts and emotions common to all men; and if we look to the other arts, we shall see that they have all been able to express a devotion not private but congregational. In fact all the noble art of the Middle Ages was of this character; and the art of that time which dominated and controlled all the other arts, the art of architecture, reached the greatest height to which it has ever attained in the expression of a congregational devotion. We may be sure that it never could have reached this height unless the builders had been lifted above themselves by a faith and a joy "in widest commonality spread." Nor yet could the great Italian Primitives have painted as they did unless they had been exalted by the same joy and faith. Are we to suppose, then, that poetry is a narrower and more individual art in its essence than architecture or painting? That it is, in fact, an inferior art to be practised in secrecy by men who fear lest the delicacy of their fancies should be contaminated by communication with their fellows? Is poetry alone of all the arts of a virtue too "fugitive and cloistered" to be enriched by the common life of man? We know that it is not. We know that the Odyssey and the Iliad, the Drama of Athens and our own Elizabethan Drama, our ancient ballads and, indeed, all primitive ballads and epics, were made in the same conditions and for the same wide public as the mediæval cathedrals and the frescoes of the Italian Primitives. Therefore, if we cannot now produce poetry of that kind, we are not to suppose that such poetry cannot be produced but rather that there is some disease of the modern mind which prevents us from producing it.

All our art, ever since the Renaissance, has been growing more fugitive and cloistered; and therefore the arts, such as architecture, which live by expressing a great common faith and great common emotions, have been failing for three hundred years at least. Poetry has not failed, because it can be practised by men sharing no common life with their fellows; but it has ceased more and more to be an art of the people, and more and more it has come to be practised in secret and for an initiate few. Our popular poetry died out in the seventeenth century. Ballads then began to be doggerel, and now instead of ballads we have music-hall songs and the verses of the cricket poet hawked at Lord's and the Oval. We have also hymns, and in them the popular poetry ought to survive if anywhere. But it has not survived in them. The hymns of the revivalists which are written in popular language have adopted the language of the 'bus conductor not of the poet, a language which is admirable for its own uses; which has grown to be what it is in the expression of a certain cheerful, brave and cynical philosophy of life; but which is quite unfitted for the expression of any simple and exalted emotion. These revivalist hymns are afraid to be poetical because they are written for a people ashamed of expressing its deeper feelings; and, even when this people is gathered together to worship, that shame clings to them, so that they must express their devotion in prosaic metaphors and in sophisticated phrases.

Palgrave's selection contains none of these revivalist hymns, nothing from Moody and Sankey or the Salvation Army, and the reason is that he has tried to choose only poetry. Yet most of the modern hymns which he includes, hymns by eminent divines and men of sincere piety and sometimes of considerable poetic power, are not much nearer to real poetry than the revivalist doggerel. They avoid incongruous metaphors, but they have nothing to put in their place. Sometimes they affect the beauties of modern secular poetry, but they cannot make these beauties their own, for modern secular poetry is not popular or congregational. It is seldom written to be sung, and never to be sung by crowds of people. At other times they try to be simple, and when they do this they are nearly always bald; for there is no modern convention of simple popular poetry; and the hymn-writers are not, nor can we expect them to be, strong enough to make such a convention. It could only arise if the poets again began to write for the people; if ballads once more were recited in inn parlours and songs were sung at harvest like the old songs and the old ballads. Then we should recover the old simple music of verse, the dancing tune of:

Ewe bleateth after Lamb
Loweth after Calve Cu;
Bulluc starteth, bucke varteth,
Merry sing Cucu.

or the solemn tune of:

He came all so still
To his mother's bower
Like dew in Aprill
That falleth on the flower.

And then this music would sound in our hymns; and they would be content with their own proper kind of beauty, and not attempt to imitate the beauty of poems made to be read. For, after all, the great technical defect of the modern hymn is that the writer of it never seems to have a tune in his head when he makes it. He is like the abstract designer who draws a pattern without thinking of the material in which it is to be carried out, without knowing anything of the technical processes of that material. Division of labour goes too far in hymn-making as in all modern arts. Just as the modern architect sitting in his office too often thinks little of the stones of which his building is to be made; so the hymn-writer sitting in his study thinks little of the voices that are to sing his hymn. He writes a hymn as he might write a sonnet; and it turns out to be not a hymn at all but merely a poem hampered by certain conventions. And then some composer has to make a tune for it as best he can; and he, too, probably thinks only of his tune and very little of the words that are to be sung to it. Thus the hymn in the end reminds one somehow of the stained glass window of commerce, conceived in an office and made in a factory. Neither hymn nor window is inspired by any thought of its purpose. Both are melancholy examples of our modern incapacity to work together in the production of beautiful things, to express our deeper feelings in any simple congregational way.

It is only in the last generation or so that we have become aware of this defect in ourselves, and even now only a few feel it deeply. The great mass of the people seem not to be aware "that there hath passed away a glory from the earth," and that is small wonder since they have no means or time to discover what that glory once was. Yet the instinct, which in so many different ages and countries has drawn men together to express in some simple and beautiful form their delight in life and their awe of the forces behind life, must still persist, and sooner or later will demand again to be satisfied. The civilised peoples are tongue-tied now in all the things that are most worth saying; but they must loosen their tongues again, or they will grow weary of life and rise against it in a blind revolt. If ever that happens the survivors will, no doubt, sing fierce hymns among the ruins and the corpses, hymns quite unlike any of those contained in the "Treasury of Sacred Song" and much nearer to poetry. But that would be a heavy price to pay for the return of art; and now that we are beginning to know what we have lost, it is to be hoped that we shall find some gentle and gradual means of recovering it. We have discovered that the arts are all bound up together, that we cannot paint great pictures or make great hymns, for the same reason that we cannot build great cathedrals; and we know, too, that even those arts which do survive are slowly dying and will continue to die so long as they are practised in secrecy and for the elect. We have great poets still, but they are unknown to the multitude. They are lonely swallows that will not make a summer of art: not if ten poets, each as great as Mr. Swinburne, appeared next year, could we say that poetry was thriving among us. But when our hymns begin again to say what all men feel and to say it with beauty and simplicity, then we shall know that poetry is alive again and that all the arts are alive with it, and then there will be no fear lest men should grow weary of life and turn Anarchists or Eremites.

BACK TO THE LAND

The Return to the Land. By Senator JULES MÉLINE. (Chapman & Hall, 5s. net.)

Land Reform. By the Right Hon. JESSE COLLINGS, M.P. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

THESE two books may very opportunely be noticed together, since both deal with the same problem as it occurs respectively in England and France. The two writers approach it from opposite points of view. Whatever may be the present position of Mr. Jesse Collings, he is by his own declaration proud of having been born a peasant, and his book is a consideration of the land question from the peasant's point of view. M. Méline, on the other hand, is a statesman of the highest rank, who approaches the question in a manner that is at once widely philosophic and highly practical. A vast number of things come within his view which escape the attention of Mr. Collings. The fire of the latter burns with a narrow and intense heat. His claim is for the re-establishment of small holdings. He would regard this act, not as a concession, but as a piece of elementary justice, and we do not know how the most prejudiced Tory can rebut the argument. The story of the vast number of Enclosure Acts, by which the poor of England were robbed of their commons, is now an old one, but it will be retold in books such as the one before us as long as the effects remain. Taking the most reasonable view of agricultural policy, viz., that enclosed land is much more economical than unenclosed, it still remains a fact that the peasants were dispossessed of the rights of common grazing without receiving adequate compensation. As it happens, the writer of the present article has before him a letter written by a correspondent à propos of a book he published some years ago dealing with this question, and ex uno disce omnes :

My Great Grandfather, my Grandfather and my Father all possessed a freehold cottage and eight acres on a certain Common. They had also the privilege of grazing on about 1700 acres of common land. And I can well remember the time when the old people used to consider that their privileges on the common were at least as valuable as the freehold itself. All this is now changed, and I who now own the cottage and eight acres am "crib'd, cabined, and confined" in that freehold, and all that was allotted to my father (against his will) in 1866 was 1 rd. 8 perches, which was never worth enclosing, and has never been enclosed. Two results have followed from the Enclosure: The first is that the Earl of T— has carved a large stock farm out of it, and the second is that out of seven cottages extending in a line about two miles in length, five are in ruins and only two (one of them mine) are inhabited. Here was an opportunity for the very best kind of Co-operation, namely grazing on common land, and where you can have individuality and co-operation combined. All this has been brought about by an Act passed and put in operation by Landlord Parliaments. Surely the time has now come when the more sensible of our labour members should see to it that we have a "Commons Restoration Act" as soon as possible. You can see it was clear confiscation to offer 1 rd. 8 perches as compensation for the use of 1700 acres as grazing ground. And I think you will agree with me, that although this is to me a personal question, it is in a larger sense a local and also a national one.

But after the contention of Mr. Jesse Collings is granted there still remains a wide tract of country to survey. Any one who will take the trouble to study the very useful volume written by the ex-Minister of Agriculture for France will readily see how the issue has been shifted. Mr. Collings tells of a war between the peasant and the manor, in which in France the peasant won, in England the manor, and in Germany there was a drawn battle. But a still greater contest has been going on for the last hundred years, and that is between commerce and agriculture. Commerce has opened up new and strange El Dorados to those who previously were contented to live out a quiet existence on stabling and garth. It is the call of the towns, the call of business, the call of new lands that, like the fabled song of Orpheus, have set the heads of the peasant on fire in every country of the world; and, if the proposal of Mr. Collings were carried out, it is doubtful what answer there would be to the invitation it is meant to extend. Here in town, the siren's voice declares, "are life, pleasure, amusement, adventure, potentialities untold. There in the country you can have, it is true, health of body, but lethargy of mind will go with it and poverty and long labour and painful days." At the most favourable computation all the land can offer is a poor competence; what, in fact, would be regarded as a pittance by those who toil in the wider fields of industry. M. Méline's argument is that this period of intoxication is past. England has had her turn at being the world's mistress of industry. When the dynasty passed from her grasp it fell into the hands of the United States of America, and now in the far East a long-sleeping pagan youth has awakened with a giant strength in the name of Japan and threatens to do to the United States in the world of commerce what she did to Russia on the battlefield. But it seems to us that M. Méline leaves out of consideration one great factor. It is that the wants of the world go on increasing, because the more the individual possesses the higher his aspirations rise, so that the peasant of to-day lives more generously than the bourgeois of the eighteenth century, and the bourgeois in his turn enjoys more luxuries than the noble did then. It is true that England is no longer the workshop of the world, that Germany, France, Belgium, the United States, and nearly all the other countries have set up their own factories and passed protective laws, saying they would produce what previously was sent to them from England; yet the bulk of our manufacturing trade goes on increasing. Even our exports increase in spite of the work that every country is doing at home, just because the wants and ideals of the individual are ever expanding in accordance with what you supply to him. The peasant who was comfortable in his little holding a hundred years ago, wore the clothes that his womenkind spun, and ate the food that was produced in the garth, byre and pasture, to-day wants much more, and therefore calls upon machinery to supply it. He has luxuries of which his forefathers were ignorant, and will not abide on the stabling. This we believe to be the truth of the matter laid down in general principles. At the same time, those who recognise it most fully will feel the warmest sympathy with the project explained by Mr. Jesse Collings. It is quite true that in the long battle the manor won, and that the risings, rick-burnings, and labour associations of peasants were the inarticulate rebellious cry of an oppressed people who had got the worst of it at every turn. Those who are in the possession of small holdings at the present moment are notable for the cheerfulness, health, and energy with which they go about their tasks, and what is of even more consequence, for the vigour of the children they are breeding to man the armies of peace and war in the next generation. We do not believe that the great mass of working men either in town or in the country will ever again settle tranquilly in small holdings; but in a huge population like ours there must always be a remnant who prefer the field to the street, and in this precious remnant may reside the elements of ultimate salvation. Let us, therefore, encourage it and afford it every facility in our power to enable it to increase and prosper.

OUT OF THE BARROW

Puck of Pook's Hill. By RUDYARD KIPLING. (Macmillan, 6s.)

It has just struck us that at a first glance the title of this article may be misleading in so far as it might seem to suggest that the author of "The Light that Failed" has again taken to the East End and the costermonger. The barrow we refer to is not that which "the moke" draws. It is the grave that holds the ancient inhabitants of this Empire. It is evident that Mr. Kipling, while residing on the South coast, has mused long and deeply on the various historic races that have trampled over this green island of ours, and he has here attempted the not unworthy task of bringing them out of their graves in a series of Midsummer Nights' Dreams intended for the delectation of a group of merry, intelligent, modern children. Everything in England begins at the battle of Hastings, and the first fytte of this epic is a vision of stalwart and kindly Norman knights taking possession of an English manor after William's great battle had been fought and won. The machinery by which they are brought to life is quite English, as the enchantment is that of childhood's old friend, Puck, who still remains one of the People of the Hills, far as we have banished the others. Of course, although everything really begins at the battle of Hastings, there was an earlier beginning, and no surprise is felt when by a turn of magic Puck whips up backward to a time when the legions of Rome still guarded the great wall which they had built to arrest the progress of the active and pillaging Pict. Danes and Romans form a capital hunting-ground for Mr. Kipling's adventurous genius, and we can easily fancy how on winter nights, the children will gather to hear these lively tales told, tales which at one and the same time are calculated to provide amusement and stimulate historic interest. But the serious reader may be warned that Mr. Rudyard Kipling is here not quite at his very best. The tales that concern the Roman Centurion are ill-constructed and want cohesion, and those connected with smuggling in later times have been better told before. Moreover, the verse with which Mr. Kipling sprinkles his prose is distinguished only by a wholesome mediocrity, except in one lyric, "Watch the wall, my darling, while the Gentlemen go by." There is nothing quite up to the standard that Mr. Kipling has taught us to expect. The most ambitious of the poems is the "Song to Mithras," of which we quote the first two verses.

Mithras, God of the Morning, our trumpets waken the Wall !
 "Rome is above the Nations, but Thou art over all !"
 Now as the names are answered, and the guards are marched away,
 Mithras, also a soldier, give us strength for the day !

Mithras, God of the Noontide, the heather swims in the heat,
 Our helmets scorch our foreheads ; our sandals burn our feet.
 Now in the ungirt hour ; now ere we blink and drowse,
 Mithras, also a soldier, keep us true to our vows !

THE PATH OF THE HOLY THORN

The Coming of the Saints. By JOHN W. TAYLOR. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a notable book. It may not satisfy the technical critics of the writings of the sub-Apostolic age ; but all will admit that it is a well-written, interesting and discriminating narrative of the journeyings of the early missionaries from Palestine to the West in the first days of the Christian era. The sub-title is a bold one, for Professor Taylor styles his work "Imaginations and Studies in Early Church History and Tradition." This linking together of ascertained fact with possible fiction may not commend itself to some ; but in this writer's hands the interweaving of these stories is done after so pleasant and enticing a fashion that the record seems to live, and the result is, in places, of almost fascinating attraction.

It would be well, perhaps, for the too credulous reader to peruse Duchesne's "Fastes Episcopaux" published in 1900, which is cited amongst the works of reference prefixed to this volume, for it traverses some of the same ground on sceptical lines. But, to understand the position of the writer, the words of Mr. Taylor in his brief introduction must be carefully weighed :

How much is true and how much is false in the old legends it is impossible to say. Those who have altogether rejected them have done so, I am convinced, at the expense of much that is worthy of preservation ; for there is a certain harmony not only connecting the various narratives themselves, but connecting these with the voices and the silences of history, that decidedly points to some substratum of fact. . . . I may have but little that is new to bring to a well-worn controversy. Indeed, I come to no controversy at all. "The bloom of the rose-petal belongs to the heart of the perfume-seller," and I will not risk its beauty and fragrance in the handling and appraising necessary for controversy. I simply take you half-way back—to the ages of faith, to the belief of a thousand years ago—as I try to tell the happenings of two thousand years ago, and re-imagine the remoter past in the light of the traditions of our forefathers. . . . I have not taken upon myself to disentangle history from legend. The modern critic is by no means infallible, and in rooting out the tares is apt to destroy the wheat also. "Let both grow together until the harvest."

It is well to remember that in these pages there are two comings of the saints to the west. The first is that of the Hebrew missionaries, whose coming may fairly be described as probable though problematical ; their journeyings and stations are based upon tradition or legend, supported by not a few reasonable inferences. The second coming is of a rather later date, namely the coming of the Greeks ; the chief example being that of Trophimus, the Pauline disciple, "whose identity as the first missionary priest of Arles is fairly well established." His coming is supported by documentary evidence of the beginning of the fifth century, and is therefore partly historical and partly traditional.

Some of the earlier chapters deal in a singularly vivid way with scriptural incidents, such as the account of the family at Bethany, or all that is told us of such characters as Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus. The re-writing, in other phraseology, of the simple Gospel stories, or the attempt to harmonise the fourfold evangelistic narrative is seldom successful ; whether attempted in the interests of scepticism by a Strauss or a Renan, or in the interests of orthodoxy by a Farrar or an Edersheim. It is, therefore, no small praise to say that Mr. Taylor succeeds where others have failed. In reading this part of his pages, we are almost unconsciously impressed with the homelike reality and truth of the old familiar tales. The more interesting and original part of the volume begins when the calling and the making of the saints at Capernaum and Jerusalem and the first missionary journeys recorded in the Acts of the Apostles are left behind. We are then introduced to the life of St. Mary Magdalene, as compiled by Rabanus, Archbishop of Mayence, who died in 856. From this and other legendary sources, we learn of the travels into Europe in the south of Gaul of the Magdalene, her sister Martha and her brother Lazarus ; of various other traditions of the three Marys and their companions : of Zacchæus at Rocamadour ; and more particularly of St. Trophimus at Arles and of St. Joseph at Glastonbury.

There is a good deal of sound scholarship displayed in connecting the traditional sites of the earliest missions from east to west—extending from Cesaræa in Palestine to Glastonbury in England—with the lines of the commercial traffic of the period. The chief of these traditional sites where certain early missionaries halted, whilst the rest of the ever-thinning band of saints went on in lessened numbers, were Marseilles and Ste. Baume, where there are cave churches immemorably identified with the names of St. Lazarus and St. Mary ; Limoges and Rocamadour, where similar cave-shelters are identified with St. Zacchæus and St. Martial ; Morlaix, where St. Drenalus was left behind by St. Joseph ; and Cornwall and Glastonbury, so closely interwoven with traditions of St. Joseph of Arimathea.

The last chapter, entitled "On Pilgrimage," is full of charm and admirably written. Herein are described, after an original fashion, the various caves, churches and shrines, very rarely visited by the ordinary tourist, which are scattered throughout France, and are closely associated with the fragrant memories of those who are believed to have been the first to dispel paganism from their midst. It is a chapter that lends itself most readily to quotation. A single example must suffice, being part of the description of the old subterranean church of St. Victor at Marseilles :

All this vast fourth-century church has been visibly built around a still older natural cave or grotto known as the original first-century church or refuge of St. Lazarus. . . . No explanation that I know of, has been or can be offered other than that offered by tradition—that here was the place where Lazarus of Bethany lived and preached and ministered and died, and that therefore within some two hundred or three hundred years afterwards this church was built in honour of his memory and to enshrine his body which was then present here. And all through the ages ever since this faith has been firmly held, and lives as strong to-day as ever. If we come back from the crypt or subterranean church into the upper church of St. Victor, at the west end of the nave, under the organ-loft, we find a life-sized statue of St. Lazarus, his left hand holding the crozier, his face upturned to heaven, and underneath the statue two pieces of stone removed from the old sepulchre at Bethany out of which Our Saviour raised him.

The value of the book is much enhanced by twenty-six photographic plates of sites and churches which are for the most part but little known.

J. CHARLES COX.

DE PROFUNDIS

I HAVE been down with sorrow in the deep,
Where never ray of light can pierce the gloom,
Where is no respite, and where falls no sleep—
Where is Life's tomb.

There lie the buried hopes of all the years,
Lost lives, and broken hearts and loves laid low;
There falls a long monotony of tears—
Falls swift and slow.

I have been long with sorrow . . . If the day
Should ever dawn when I am free from pain,
And love lead gently back to life again,
Can I forget that I have passed this way?

ETHEL EDWARDS.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

[Under the above general title a Series of Brief Papers will appear in successive numbers of the ACADEMY. They will be "short studies on great subjects"; jottings by the way, rather than essays by an expert. Some will be mere suggestions on miscellaneous topics, from varied points of view; others will contain a more ample discussion of one or two questions of contemporary interest.]

IV. THE MOTOR-MANIA AND ITS POSSIBLE RESULTS

THE introduction, and rapid spread, of this new means of locomotion is destined to have far-reaching results. Those who dislike it most, now fear it has come to stay. Patronised by royalty, and by the rich almost everywhere, taken up as a pastime, or indulged in as a form of sport, the courted luxury of many, the daily necessity of a few, and now the source of supply to a vast and almost world-wide industry, it is surely worth while for its advocates and champions to consider its possible (or probable) effects on those who make use of it, as well as on the country at large, and on the national character.

It is almost needless to point out that the loss of life, the number of accidents and the destruction of property by motors is much greater than it has ever been by railway trains, or horse and carriage conveyance. That fact is undoubted; but it is said that the movement is in its infancy, that danger will be reduced, and accidents eliminated, by new contrivances. But other evils of equal magnitude attend it, and make its development a serious outlook. Many have called attention to the injury inflicted on those who do not motor by the noise, and the dust-nuisance; the destruction of our roadways by driving other traffic off them, and the deterioration of house-property all along the lines of transit of the motors; the injury to the trees, the grass, the flowers, the hedgerows, as well as the health of pedestrians. They contend that, if this mode of travelling is to be encouraged and developed, special roadways should be constructed for it, as special tracks are cut, and paths laid down, for railway-service. That the old footpaths of England open to pedestrians, and roadways adjoining them for cart and carriage traffic, should be invaded by an army of dust-raising and eye-blinding machines, and that those who used to use them for business or for health should be driven from them ruthlessly, is surely an evil which cries aloud for remedy.

But it is not the inconvenience, or the physical injury, that are the worst results. There is a large amount of selfishness fostered by this motor-mania; admittedly fostered, as its advocates say that the weaker must go to the wall, and pedestrians must get out of the way. They have no business to protest against the Jehus who ride furiously, and do what they like on the King's highway, regardless of any but themselves. Motor-driving, as at present practised, is an incentive to selfishness. Many of the motorists do not care for the results entailed. They wish to scour the country, and are wholly indifferent to the effects on others which their mode of locomotion involves. But worse than this remains.

We are told of the luxury of rapid movement, the poetry of motion, the advantage of being carried so swiftly from place to place through an exquisite district. But what of the real appreciation of scenery during these scurrying raids? It used to be thought by many, and felt by more, that rapid railway-travelling in express trains dulled by degrees the æsthetic sense of travellers; that they got only glimpses of the landscape, which was blurred, and even blotted out from memory, by the tantalising spectacle of beauty vanishing as soon as seen. But now the dread is that the genuine love of Nature may be imperilled by this excessive speed in locomotion. The scenery itself may be injured; but much worse than that, its refined appreciation may be gradually extinguished. The result of our twentieth-century haste and high pressure may be the development of unrest, the banishment of the ancestral peace which used to give such a charm to the holidays of the past, and the uprooting of that sense of tranquillity which made the country so dear to the toilers in our towns and cities.

There is little doubt that the development of this new method of being carried from place to place will bring about a change in the desires, the tastes, the sympathies, nay in the very ideals of the nation. As the Duke of Wellington used to say in reference to military operations, and political tactics: "But what is to be the next step? What is to follow from this which you adopt and carry out?" Certainly it behoves the advocates of motor-cars to consider well the effect of their introduction, and the extent of area which their adoption will gradually cover; whether their use will help, or whether it will hinder, the development of what is of more importance to a nation than a rapid change of place could ever be. Means have been contrived by which letters in mail-bags can be automatically shot through tubes to almost any distance. Would it be any advantage if human beings could be similarly sent, through subterranean ways from north to south, or east to west, if only their travelling carriages were luxurious enough? Surely not.

It comes to this. The race toward culture is not to the swiftest in locomotion. Life is more than speed, and travelling at leisure is surely quite as desirable as trying to break the record in rushing to and fro. To be whisked along a highway at racing speed, in self-made dust, with confused noise and garments soiled to win a prize, is fatal to all true appreciation of scenery. Besides, there are times, as every poet knows—and all poetically-souled human beings feel—when Nature is giving to man an apocalypse of her glory. At such times it is the instinct of every worshipper of Nature to be silent, metaphorically to "take the shoes from his feet, for the place is holy ground," to listen and be still. But if on a motor! it is impossible to do so. I know a man who never passes Oxford in an express train, or any cathedral town, without reverently lifting his travelling skull-cap. That could not naturally be done, when driving on a motor. If rapid movement from place to place is desired, why not make use of the ever-improving express railway service, and leave our old historic English roads to carriage, cart, and pedestrian traffic? It would add to the sum total of human enjoyment. It would diminish the death-rate. It would lessen disease. It would protect, or at least not invade, the natural sanctuaries of our island-home. It would conserve the charms of Nature, and would add to the service of man.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

ABBEY THOUGHTS

SHALL Herbert Spencer lie—in the Abbey, or rather shall some memorial of him be erected in what journalists love to call the “National Valhalla,” “The English Pantheon,” or the “venerable edifice,” where, as Macaulay says, the dust of the illustrious accusers, et cetera—? The question has been recently agitated in a daily contemporary. It seems that the Dean, when approached on the subject, made a “gran rifiuto,” as his predecessor did in the case of Byron. The Dean is in a very difficult position, because any decision of his must be severely criticised from one quarter or another. The Abbey retains, I understand, some of its pre-Reformation privileges and is not under the jurisdiction of Bishop or Archbishop. Yet no one who has ever visited the Chapel of St. Edward the Confessor on October 13, the festival of his translation, can accuse the Abbey authorities of bigotry or narrowmindedness. Only a few years ago I fought my way with other Popish pilgrims to the shrine of our patron Saint (as he was, until superseded by Saint George in the thirteenth century), and there I indulged in overt acts violating Article 22 of the Church of England by law established. A verger with some colonial tourists arrived during our devotions, but his voice was lowered out of regard for our feelings. Indeed, both he and the tourists adopted towards us an attitude of respectful curiosity (not altogether unpleasant), which was in striking contrast to the methods of the continental Suisse routing out worshippers from a side chapel of a Catholic Church in order to show Baedeker-ridden sightseers an altar-piece by Rotto Rotinelli.*

Thoughts of Cranmer, Latimer and Ridley irresistibly mingled with my devotions. What had the poor fellows burnt for, after all? Here we all were ostentatiously ignoring English History and the adjacent Houses of Parliament, outraging the rubrics by ritual observations for which poor curates in the East End are often suspended, and before now have been imprisoned. I could not help thinking that the Archbishop of Westminster would hardly care to return these hospitalities, by permitting on August 24 a memorial service for Admiral Coligny in the Pro-Cathedral. . . . I rose from my knees a new Luther, with something like a Protestant feeling, and scrutinised severely the tombs in Poet's Corner. Even there I found myself confronted with an almost irritating liberalism. Here was Alexander Pope, who rejected all the overtures of Swift and Atterbury to embrace the Protestant faith. And there was Dryden, not perhaps a great ornament to my persuasion, but still a Catholic at the last. Dean Panther had not grudged poet Hind his niche in the National Valhalla (I knew I should be reduced to that periphrasis). And here was the mighty Charles Darwin, about whose reception into the English Pantheon (I have fallen again) I remember there was some trouble. Well, if precedent embalms a principle, I venture to raise a thin small voice, and plead for Herbert Spencer. “The English people,” said a friendly French critic, “do not admire their great men because they were great but because they reflect credit on themselves,” so on the score of national vanity I claim space for Herbert Spencer. Very few Englishmen have exercised such extraordinary influence on continental opinion, which Beaconsfield said was the verdict of posterity. On the news of his death, the Italian Chamber passed a vote of condolence with the English people. I suppose that does not seem a great honour to Englishmen, but to me, an enemy of United Italy, it seemed a great honour, not only to the dead but to the English people. Can you imagine the Swiss Federal Council sending us a vote of condolence on the death of Mr. Hall Caine or Mr. Robert Hichens?

Again, though it is ungrateful of me to mention the fact after my experiences of October 13, the Abbey was not built nor endowed by people who anticipated the Anglican form of worship being celebrated within its walls, though I admit it has been restored by the adherents of that communion. The image of Milton, to take only one instance, would have been quite as objectionable to Henry III. or Abbot Islip as those of Darwin or Spencer. The emoluments bequeathed by Henry VII. and others for requiem masses are now devoted to the education of Deans' daughters and Canons' sons; where incense-laden altars used to stand, hideous monuments of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries wound the Gothic air with their monstrous ornaments and inapposite epitaphs. St. Paul's may fairly be held sacred to Anglicanism, and I do not think any one would claim sepulture within its precincts for one who was avowedly hostile to Christian or Anglican sentiment, but I think the Abbey has now passed into the category of museums and might well be declared a national monument under control of the State. The choir, and possibly the nave, should, of course, be severely preserved for whatever the State religion might be at the time. Catholics need not mourn the secularisation of the transepts and chapels, because the late Pope renounced officially all claims on the ancient shrines of the Catholic faith, and High Churchmen might console themselves by recalling the fact that Abbots were originally laymen. My whole scheme would be a return to the practice of the Primitive Church, when priests were only allowed on sufferance inside abbeys at all. The Low Church party need not be considered, because they can have no sentiment about what they regard as relics of superstition, and Broad Churchmen could hardly complain at the logical development of their own principle. The Nonconformists, the backbone of the nation, could not be otherwise than gratified. The decision about admitting busts, statues or bodies into the national and sacred “musée des morts” (as the anti-clerical French might call it under the new constitution) would rest with the Home Secretary. This would be an added interest to the duties of a painstaking official, forming pleasant interludes between considering the remission of sentences on popular criminals: it would relieve the Dean and Chapter from a grave responsibility. The Home Secretary would always be called the Abbot of Westminster. How picturesque at the formation of a new Cabinet—Home Secretary and Abbot Westminster, the “Right Hon. Mr. So-and-So”! The first duty of the Abbot will be to appoint a Royal Commission to consider the removal of hideous monuments which disfigure the edifice: nothing prior to 1700 coming under its consideration. A small tablet would recall what has been taken away. Herbert Spencer's claim to a statue would be duly considered, and, I hope, by a unanimous vote some of the other glaring gaps would be filled up. If the Abbey is full of obscurities, very dim religious lights, many of the illustrious names in our literature have been omitted; Byron, Shelley, Keats—to mention only these. There is no monument to Chatterton, one of the more powerful influences in the romantic movement, nor to William Blake, whose boyish inspiration was actually nourished amid that “Gothic supineness,” as Mr. MacColl has finely said of him. Of all our poets and painters he surely deserves a monument in the grey Church which became to him what St. Mary Redcliffe was to Chatterton. A window adapted from the book of Job (with the marvellous design of the Morning Stars) was, I am told, actually offered to, and rejected by, the late Dean. To Dante Gabriel Rossetti and the wonderful movement of which he was the dynamic force there should also be a worthy memorial, to Walter Pater, the superb aside of English prose, to Cardinal Manning, the Ecclesiastic of the nineteenth century, and Professor Huxley, that master of dialectics.

A young actor of my acquaintance, who bore the honoured name of Siddons, was invited to take part in the funeral service of the late Sir Henry Irving. His step-father was connected by marriage with the great actress, and he was very proud of his physical resemblance to her portrait by Reynolds. He had played with great success the part of Fortinbras in the provinces, and

* We are indebted to the Editor of the Burlington Magazine for the suggestion that this painter's name was really Tomaso Rotto.—Ed.

Mr. Alexander has assured me that he was the ideal impersonator of Rosencrantz. It was an open secret that he had refused Mr. Arthur Bouchier's offer of that rôle in a proposed revival of Hamlet at the Garrick. Since the burial of Sir Henry Irving in the Abbey, he has never been seen: though I saw him myself in the funeral cortège. All his friends remember the curious exaltation in his manner a few days before the ceremony, and I cannot help thinking that in a moment of enthusiasm, realising this was his only chance of burial in the Abbey, he took advantage of the bowed, unobservant heads during the prayer of Committal and crept beneath the pall into the great actor's tomb. What his feelings were at the time, or afterwards when the vault was bricked up, would require the introspective pen of Mr. Henry James and the curious imagination of Mr. H. G. Wells to describe. I have been assured by the vergers that mysterious sounds were heard for some days after this historical occasion. Distressed by the loss of my friend, I applied to the Dean of Westminster and finally to Scotland Yard. I need not say that I was met with sacerdotal indifference on the one hand and with callous officialism on the other, but I hope that under the Royal Commission which I have appointed the mystery will be cleared up. Not that I begrudge poor Siddons a niche with Garrick and Irving.

ROBERT ROSS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

CREATIVE CRITICISM

BETWEEN Henry Fielding and Mr. A. C. Benson there is at least one point of resemblance—both of them dislike the critic. To the former he was a reptile, and the latter has just been calling him a tradesman. It was the latter statement that started the present meditation. For the reproach seemed a droll example of the pot and kettle. The retort springs to the lips that never in the history of the world was imaginative literature so grossly commercialised as it is at the present moment. How mechanical has the production of books become! There are several hundreds of writers who with the utmost regularity publish from one to four books per annum. In the language of the day these constitute "the output."

With the aid of certain middle-men called literary agents the "price per thou" is raised to its maximum. To obtain even a few months' life and hearing for the individual book the author has to employ a claque. Even then, like flocks of black birds winging to roost, the crowd of books passes swiftly to darkness and oblivion. And the author of to-day finds no refuge in the pathetic appeal to posterity's verdict that comforted the failure of last century. The following perfectly true story illustrates a state of mind that the majority try to emulate. A lucky author on the night when he received a cheque that made up his total receipts (dramatic and literary) to £60,000 for a popular success, took out the manuscript and kicked it round his study like a football, crying in a hilarious way as he did so: "You have nobly served my turn just now, and what the devil does it matter how you are regarded a hundred years hence!" No; the modern author like every other merchant asks for motor-cars and houses and land while he is alive, and is under no illusion in regard to fame, which Wilfred of Ivanhoe said "gilds our sepulchres and embalms our names." I am neither praising nor condemning this. At times I think it a pity, at other times it seems an act of courage. We are all rushing to obscurity, Lord Tennyson said once, "only some are going a little more slowly than the others." But it breeds egoism in the author. He thinks the critic's function is simply to register an opinion on his work as appreciative and favourable as is possible. Naturally enough, he is chiefly anxious for the increase and strengthening of his own reputation. But the critic and the Editor—the best critic and the best Editor—take a different view. They recognise fully the insignificance of the individual, whether he judge or be judged. It is not the verdict but the theme that matters.

Within the last few years I have noticed a very great improvement in the character and tone of criticism. A decade ago it seemed to be merging into puffery. I remember in the 'nineties one whom the majority would call a distinguished man of letters boasted to me that before the appearance of a certain book he had arranged to obtain no fewer than thirty-two favourable notices in London and provincial journals. Puffery was rampant, and, as a consequence, reviews ceased to exercise the slightest influence. Nor have they yet recovered. The fortunes of a book are only to a very small extent governed by what appears about it in the newspapers. But so far as the reviewer is regaining part of his old power it is due to his sincerity and creativeness. Let me try to disengage the features of a fine critic from the cloud of smoke raised about him by outsiders. And first, it is not the calling but the man that makes the tradesman or the artist. The difference, I opine, lies in this—that the former works for gain and the latter for love of his craft. For his task he needs to have a rare and full equipment, knowledge of life, knowledge of literature, sympathy to recognise what is fine and true, generosity to acknowledge it, courage to expose the unworthy and unnatural devices by which the baser sort of author seeks to win the readers for whom he has no legitimate attraction. Even then the critic is as liable to make mistakes as is, say, a popular novelist. Let us take an illustration bearing more directly on the subject of creation in criticism. During the last year or two various novelists have tried to depict the simple life, of which so much has been written. It is safe to say that no one has yet attained to immortal glory by that path. Many critics have said so, but the best is he who by the force of his knowledge and imagination can sketch the reality. Suppose he had strong views that were wrong, his work would still be far more interesting than that of those who confined themselves to critical comment. I will take another case. A few evenings ago I took Mr. Eden Phillpotts's novel, "The Poacher's Wife," to read, not for review, but to lighten a train journey; and there was one feature of it that set me thinking. One of the characters is a footman and one of the greatest villains imaginable. He is not only a thief, poacher and murderer, but descends to the utmost baseness of treachery by deliberately plotting to have an innocent friend hanged for the murder. All the time he is the constant and devoted lover of a fine and pure girl. Now, if I had been a reviewer, I would have liked to discuss the psychology of that character with the author, but the discussion would only have had real interest in so far as it was an interchange of experiences. My knowledge of such criminals is slight, but I have read a good deal about them and had one or two under observation. And so one could try at least to build up the real character on fact. Had the love been simulated for the sake of acquiring a fortune or any similar object, nothing could have been said; but the girl is pure and it appears to be wholly disinterested. My experience is that men of a criminal type are incapable of such an attachment as is described. They seek the gratification of their lustful and brutal passion, but make very little difference between individuals. Moreover, my idea of a footman who has committed such a crime is that he would fall into such a panic of terror and apprehension as would effectually sear up and burn out his passion for a girl. The behaviour of criminals after a deed has been committed has often been recorded in the newspapers. At any rate, the thief and murderer as a pensive lover sighing because of unrequited affection strikes me as grotesque. Mr. Eden Phillpotts may be perfectly right, but the critic who did not think so could only make his point effectively by an act of creation—that is, by a close picture of the criminal mind as he conceives it. Let me take a pleasanter illustration from a novel that appeared quite lately, I mean Miss Jane Findlater's "The Ladder to the Stars." It is very easy to dismiss a book like this, by a writer who was only emerging from obscurity, as being ineffective; but no one who has not brooded over the idea both with sympathy and imagination can either obtain from this book as much pleasure as the writer intended or criticise it to any good purpose. Miss Findlater's ambition seems to have been almost the same as that which animated Goethe when he produced "Wilhelm Meister," and gave the idea to some of the brilliant men who followed him. Benjamin Disraeli in "Contarini Fleming" and Bulwer Lytton in "Ernest Maltravers" tried to picture the growth of a poet's mind. I think it requires some imagination to understand all that, however, and, on the principle that he "who shudders at the hell of Dante" has himself something of Dante's imagination, so he who is able to understand and sympathise with the attempt to portray a poetic mind must possess at least a little of the original fire. In that case he is much more likely in criticising the book to set down his own creation than merely to register an opinion, and that surely is the more fruitful course.

JOHN BRETT VINCENT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The English Asmodeus," by Ernest A. Baker.]

FICTION

The Tea-Planter. By F. E. PENNY. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

THE sun shines in Ceylon as in few places, and the sun's warmth and kindliness seem to have passed into Mrs. Penny's book, which is all about Ceylon, and which is dedicated to Ceylon most pertinently. By a device, that is a little unwieldy, of a dying man's will and whim, she forces her characters in the first chapter from London to Ceylon, but once there the story unfolds itself like a flower in the sun after a day's rain. The Angus Smith family is one of the most charming that we have had the pleasure of meeting, and the Angus Smith children are as delightful as only real children can be. And there is much clever and kindly characterisation and all the charm of that light-hearted life, of which one has often heard, so that it is as refreshing to read the novel as it is to sit for a whole long day in the sun.

The Whirligig of Time. By BEATRICE WHITBY. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

WITH her first novel Miss Whitby had the good fortune to please the taste of a large class of readers who have continued to regard her stories with an almost affectionate admiration. "The Whirligig of Time" should score another success; it is a good story from every point of view, told with the cheerful confidence of a writer sure of her ground and her power to interest. It is a study in wives: the old-fashioned wife who served for love, or duty; and the "new" wife who fights for her own way—and gets it. It is all very cleverly worked out. Frederica, a hard woman of the advanced school, is a striking character boldly drawn. Every line tells and strengthens her individuality, and throughout the book she dominates, amuses, even fascinates. As in all the author's novels, there is an undercurrent of serious purpose; the sermon is here, as well as the song.

The Comedy of Age. By DESMOND COKE. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

A CERTAIN great writer was once asked: "How do you make your plays?" and he answered: "Oh, I take facts I have observed, add a dash of poetry, and there you are." Mr. Coke takes facts which he observed, tries to subtract the dash of poetry—and even goes so far as to add more than a dash of common sense. The result is that his work is apt to be depressing. What he observes, he observes with accuracy; he writes sound, even scholarly, English, and builds the fabric of his book with cleverness and care. There is, however, much to which he is blind, and we must insist upon this for the reason that he is apt to link his arm a little familiarly into that of Truth—"If I may pit myself and Truth against a dozen novelists," he writes. His present book deals with life at Oxford. Though there is much dissection of Youth with a capital letter, the elusive spirit of youth is absent. Youth cannot be explained, and by endeavouring to explain it Mr. Coke has turned his novel into an able homily on Youth and Crabbed Age with many clever contrasts and some pertinent illustrations.

Holyland. By GUSTAV FRENSSEN. Translated by MARY HAMILTON. (Constable, 6s.)

THE admirers of "Jörn Uhl" will welcome this translation of Gustav Frenssen's new novel, which was reviewed in its original form, "Hilligenlei," in the pages of the ACADEMY some months ago. Though the story is of less striking interest than "Jörn Uhl," it is an exceptionally interesting book, informed throughout with strong and tender feeling. It is less a continuous tale than a collection of charming scenes—simple, poetic, realistic—of the lives of humble folk working and striving in a little harbour town in Holstein. The keynote of the book is struck by Hule Beiderwand, ever watching for the coming of "a brave man who shall bring the whole land beneath his sword until it is a holy land in deed as in name." Miss Hamilton's translation is excellent, especially as reproducing the atmosphere of poetry and romance and of spiritual enthusiasm which is essentially a charm of the original work.

It Happened in Japan. By BARONESS ALBERT D'ANETHAN. (Brown, Langham, 6s.)

THIS is an appreciation of the Land of the Rising Sun by one who evidently knows and loves it well. As the wife of the Belgian Minister at Tokyo, Baroness Albert d'Anethan has had the opportunity of seeing much both of the Japanese and the English life in Japan, and she puts her knowledge to good use. Pearl Norrywood, having divorced the husband who has rendered her life unbearable, only to find herself the victim of a cruel slander, leaves England and settles in Tokyo, where, under the name of Mrs. Nugent, she hopes to find peace and happiness in the shadow of Fujiyama. For three years her retreat is undiscovered and her former sufferings are almost forgotten, when the arrival of an old lover, Lord Martinworth, upon the scenes, brings about the series of complications which end in her sudden and tragic death.

The Gaiety of Fatma. By KATHLEEN WATSON. (Brown, Langham, 6s.)

A CERTAIN "passionate extravagance" (the words are the author's) in plot and language is perhaps permissible when the scene is laid on the coast of Algeria, where a burning sun glows upon the white haiks of stately, slow-moving Arabs and the glamour of the desert is over all things; but what is rich and vivid in the description of an Algerian fishing-village, becomes garish and melodramatic when applied to a house-party in Scotland. The author leads us to suspect that she is as little at her ease in these chilly northern castles as her half-Arab heroine, Fatma, who, after marrying one man she does not love, and after his death almost marrying another, eventually finds herself back in Algeria in the arms of her hero, the English doctor of the little native village, where for the first time her dress and her actions are in keeping with her surroundings.

Hazel of Hazeldean. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

IF Mrs. Reynolds has chosen an improbable and not altogether engaging plot for her new novel she makes the best of it, and ingeniously evades the difficulties of the situation. Told in a light, humorous vein the story might amuse an idle hour; to take it as seriously as the author desires imposes rather a strain upon our patience. Raimond Hughenden, when dying, directs that his little daughter shall be brought up as a boy in order to secure the family title and estates. Hazel's French nurse alone knows the secret; friends, chum, and tutor believe in "Sir Hazel," and she, never doubting that she is a boy, scoffs at feminine limitations and the "loathly petticoat."

Mrs. Reynolds has written some very readable novels; it is a pity she should waste time and labour over such a foolish tale as this.

FINE ART

THE ARTIST AS CRITIC

AMONG many things which the present generation owes to Whistler is the reform of art criticism, that is to say the reform, not so much of the erudite criticism which concerns itself with the works of the Old Masters, but of the humble criticism of journalism which is chiefly occupied with the productions of contemporary painters. But though the present critics of Fleet Street are, as a rule, better qualified than their predecessors, who had made little special study of the craft they criticised, it may be questioned whether the present tendency to deliver criticism into the hands of painters is altogether an unmixed blessing—whether it is true, as Whistler asserted in his libel suit against Ruskin, that "none but an artist can be a competent critic." Pressed by his opponent's counsel, Whistler then conceded: "I should not disapprove in any way of technical criticism by a man whose whole life is passed in the practice of the science which he criticises; but for the opinion of a man whose whole life is not so passed I would have as little regard as you would if he expressed an opinion on law." And yet in the "Gentle Art" Whistler very plainly shows his disapproval of the criticisms passed on his paintings by Mr. Frith and "Mr. Jones, R.A.," who, as men spending their whole lives in the practice of painting, were competent and well-qualified critics according to the canon laid down by their victim.

There is no evidence to show that a painter, ipso facto, is a more sympathetic and competent judge of another painter's work than an intelligent connoisseur. On the contrary, such evidence as exists points the other way. Not one of the writers whose scalps Whistler delighted to collect criticised his work with such bitter hostility and such depth of misunderstanding as the men who spent their lives in practising a different style of painting. When the young Pre-Raphaelites first expressed their new-found principles on canvas, the lay critics of the Press gave them considerable praise. And this benevolent attitude was changed in the following year because the journalists bowed to the superior knowledge of the senior Academicians, who led the hostile criticism which the Pre-Raphaelites subsequently received. Again, by whom were the younger generation of painters, the French Impressionists, more severely condemned than by these same Pre-Raphaelites?

Whether we turn to past or present painters the story is the same. The cases of Constable and Turner are too well known to need repetition, but, as showing how incapable a great creative artist is of appreciating all the aspects of his art, we may call to mind Blake's contempt for Titian, Rembrandt and Rubens whom he called "smudgers, blunderers and daubers." Rossetti had no greater range of appreciation, styling Delacroix a "perfect beast," and finding for one of Fantin's masterly paintings no better term than "a great slovenly scrawl."

It would be no difficult task to find parallel examples in another art of the inability of one great genius to comprehend the achievements of another. We know, for example, that Carlyle held the translation of Omar to be "worse than a mere waste of labour." To a friend who lent him the translation to read, he returned the book with the comment: "I think my old friend FitzGerald might have spent his time to much better purpose than in busying himself with the verses of that old Mahometan black-guard."

The truth would seem to be that the qualities essential to the perfect critic—a well-proportioned mind and freedom from bias—are precisely the qualities which the great creative genius lacks. Necessarily so, according to Mr. Thomas Hardy, who, in "The Return of the Native," tells us:

A well-proportioned mind is . . . one of which we may safely say that it will never cause its owner to be confined as a madman, tortured as a heretic, or crucified as a blasphemer. Also, on the other hand, that it will never cause him to be applauded as a prophet, revered as a priest, or exalted as a king. Its usual blessings are happiness and mediocrity. It produces the poetry of Rogers, the paintings of West, the statecraft of North, the spiritual guidance of Sumner; enabling its possessors to find their way to wealth, to wind up well, to step with dignity off the stage, to die comfortably in their beds, and to get the decent monument which, in many cases, they deserve.

If Mr. Hardy's analysis be correct, Whistler's definition of the critic is further from the truth than the famous mot of Disraeli. And so far from the critic's opinion being vitiated by the fact that he himself has failed as a creative artist, it is possibly this failure which proves his freedom from bias and his competence justly to appraise the productions of minds less well-proportioned. In the politics of art such a man sits on the cross-benches, whence he can discern the merits of both Left and Right. Pledged to neither party, he can give to each its due, and, whenever required, justify his own position by appealing to our belief that it is the looker-on and not the player who sees most of the game, and sees it best.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

EARLY in November Mr. George Allen will publish "The Life, Letters and Work of Frederic Leighton" by Mrs. Russell Barrington. The Diaries and Letters written by Leighton, covering a period of fifty years, are included, and among other letters are several from George Eliot, Ruskin, Mr. and Mrs. Browning, Henry Greville, Fanny Kemble, Richard Doyle, Gambier Parry, Robert Fleury, Edward Steinle, and others, many of whom have contributed reminiscences of the great artist. The work is illustrated by many of Leighton's finest works, and by several drawings and paintings never yet published. There is to be an Edition de Luxe of fifty-five copies (numbered) on Arnold hand-made paper at £5 5s. net.

Mr. John Murray will publish very shortly a volume by Mr. Sidney Lee, entitled "Shakespeare and the Modern Stage: with other Essays." The book consists mainly of articles on various aspects of Shakespearean drama. Most of them have been contributed to periodicals during the past few years, and they have now been thoroughly revised. A paper of "Aspects of Shakespeare's Philosophy" has not been printed before. Besides this essay and the one which gives the volume its title, the subjects dealt with are: "Shakespeare and the Elizabethan Playgoer," "Shakespeare in Oral Tradition," "Pepys and Shakespeare," "Mr. Benson and Shakespearean Drama," "The Municipal Theatre," "Shakespeare and Patriotism," "A Peril of Shakespearean Research," and "Shakespeare in France."

"Some Reminiscences" by William Michael Rossetti, which Messrs. Brown Langham will publish in two volumes on October 15, contains a full account of the early days of the Rossetti family, with interesting sidelights on the Pre-Raphaelite movement, and the literary and artistic career of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The work is illustrated with numerous reproductions, very few of which have been published before. Mr. Rossetti's "Reminiscences" date from his birth in London in 1829, down to the present day.

Messrs. Bell announce a book on "The Gem Cutter's Craft" by Mr. Leopold Claremont, which is to be published this month. In it every kind of gem is described, and the difficulties of discriminating precious stones are discussed and removed. The illustrations show how the stones are secured, identified, cut and polished, and there will be photographs of mines, historic gems, gems under the X-rays, and typical specimens of precious stones in the natural state.

"Aims and Ideals in Art," by Mr. George Clausen, which Messrs. Methuen will publish shortly, will contain eight lectures, delivered to the students of the Royal Academy in 1906, dealing with questions of composition, of style, and of the choice and treatment of subject, rather than with the problems of execution. The book is uniform with the author's "Six Lectures on Painting."

The second volume of M. J. J. Jusserand's "Literary History of the English People" will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on October 8. It deals with the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation, and among the subjects treated are: The Early Renaissance in England; Humanism as represented by Sir Thomas More; Prose-writers, such as Elyot and Ascham; the Poets of the Transition, Dunbar, Skelton and Gavin Douglas; the Poets of the Renewal, Wyatt and Surrey; the Literature of the Reformation and the English Bible; Elizabeth and her kingdom; Elizabethan Prose and Poetry; Spenser; and the Early English Novel. Shakespeare and the Elizabethan Drama remain for treatment in a later volume. On the same date Mr. Unwin will publish "Romantic Cities of Provence," by Mrs. Mona Caird. The volume contains many illustrations from sketches by Mr. Joseph Pennell and Mr. Edward Sygne.

A volume entitled "Reminiscences of Bishops and Archbishops," by Henry Codman Potter, Bishop of New York, is announced by Messrs. Putnams. With three Archbishops of Canterbury in particular—Archbishops Tait, Benson and Temple—Bishop Potter was on terms of close intimacy.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are about to publish a new novel by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy entitled "The Illustrious O'Hagan." The book deals with the adventures of two brothers in the Germany of two centuries ago. Two other novels promised by the same publishers are "The White House," by Miss Braddon, and "The Avenging Hour," by H. F. Prevost Batterby.

Three volumes which Mr. Francis Griffiths will publish early this month are: "Dr. Stiggins: His Views and Principles," by Arthur Machen; "Love in London," by A. St. John Adcock; and "The Return of Joe, and other New Zealand Stories," by W. H. Koebel.

Readers of the ACADEMY may possibly be interested to learn that Messrs. Cassell announce a new "work" by the author of "When it was Dark" and other tracts; it will be, they inform us, "a story of love, in which a woman's nature is laid open as by the scalpel of a soul surgeon."

CORRESPONDENCE

ON THE MAKING OF BOOKS—A PUBLISHING SYNDICATE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The suggestion made by "Spectator ab Extra" in the ACADEMY of September 20 of establishing a Publishing Syndicate is worthy of much consideration.

It is believed that Oxford and Cambridge already do a good deal in this direction through their respective Presses and it would be interesting to know the annual expenditure of the Delegates and Syndics in the preparation and publication of learned works without expectation of profit. But there is a limit to this. A small company under the title of "The Publishing Syndicate" could be incorporated at little expense with the object explained by "Spectator ab Extra," and on the terms that all profits exceeding, say, three or four per cent.

should be reserved and applied towards the expense of publishing works which cannot be expected to yield a profit. A well-organised association of this kind would be exceedingly interesting and might be able to produce much good work. And it may fairly be assumed that the public, literary or otherwise, would be prepared to encourage the attempt.

P. W.

October 1.

THE SECRET OF THE TOTEM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I observe a letter from Mr. Andrew Lang in the ACADEMY of July 14 in which he asks that he may "correct an inadvertent misrepresentation" of me, and he refers to it as being in his "Secret of the Totem" (pp. 197-200) "and elsewhere."

I do not understand Mr. Lang when he says, "I added that the statement was in collision with facts vouched for by Mr. Howitt himself." This appears to refer to a passage at page 199 of the "Secret of the Totem," where he comments on the preceding paragraph, which does not speak of "the advance from descent in the female to that in the male line," but refers to a statement by Dr. Frazer "that as Dr. Howitt has well pointed out, the same regions in which the germs of religion begin to appear have also made some progress towards a higher form of social and family life."

If the correction which Mr. Lang makes refers to page 199 of his work it is rather beside the mark, but in any case what Mr. Lang has explained is merely a side issue. The real matter at issue, in my communication to Folk Lore, was a statement by Mr. Lang (Folk Lore, vol. xvi. p. 223): "We are here on the ground of facts carefully recorded, though strangely overlooked by Mr. Howitt . . ."

This is practically a repetition by Mr. Lang of his charge against me at pp. 197-199 of the "Secret of the Totem," when he quotes from my "Native Tribes of South-East Australia," pp. 499-500.

Mr. Lang does not refer to this in his letter, and, with your permission, I will now briefly bring this under his notice.

The quotation in question is called a "passage from Mr. Howitt," and consists of a conglomeration of four selected parts from a summary of the evidence, upon which I have based the theory of a belief, in a "Tribal All Father." This summary will be found at pp. 499 and 500 of my "Native Tribes," and runs to twenty-seven lines.

The first extract is a sentence at line thirteen, but with its important commencement left out; the second is at line nineteen, but only includes part of the sentence, when the third extract is interpolated from line six, being the final half of a sentence; the fourth is the remainder of the summary taken from the line nineteen.

This garbled quotation leaves out altogether about half of my summary and forms the text of Mr. Lang's adverse discourse from page 197 to page 200 of "The Secret of the Totem."

Will Mr. Lang be so good as to say whether this quotation of selected parts of my summary is the "inadvertent misrepresentation" which he "corrects"?

A. W. HOWITT.

Metung, Victoria,
August 27.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been much interested in the articles which have appeared of late in your excellent paper on spelling reforms. One in your issue of September 15 by Dr. Macnamara, I thoroughly admire and agree with every word of it, unless it be the end where he fears it will not succeed for centuries. We shall see.

But there is one immediately following; by an M.P. which I beg a little of your space to reply to. His chief contention is that spelling reform is not needed and would not be beneficial in the elementary school. His words are:

(a) "I think it a mistake to suppose spelling reform matters greatly in the elementary school."

(b) "I cannot think a simplified spelling would make it easier for the children."

(c) "Where the argument from utility is weak, that from literature, etc., must remain strong."

(d) "I should be jealous of any change which would uglify (sic) literature. As I am not convinced that simplification is necessary for the elementary schools or would be helpful, I cannot but feel lukewarm towards their pleas for spelling reform."

(e) "To many of our children reading and spelling come by nature. What then is the use of teaching these—what is the use of your schools, your teachers, and other costly gear?"

(f) "To others the toil of amending their spelling is a useful discipline"; but

(g) "There remain incorrigible dunces who will never learn to spell. These will be apprentices to a painter or printer, say. The painter will be set to work and will write business, which is quite as intelligible as business or biases. Either will be equally intelligible." Truly here he justifies the title he claims as an anarchist in spelling.

An average child, says a schoolmaster quoted by Max Müller, beginning school at seven ought to be able to read the New Testament fluently at eleven or twelve years of age, and at thirteen or fourteen ought to be able to read a good leading article with ease and expression. That is, with seven hours a week for forty weeks for five years, a child requires one thousand four hundred hours' work to be able to read the New Testament.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS

A NOTABLE DISCOVERY BY MR. ROBERT MOND

Aramaic Papyri: Discovered at Assuan. Edited by Prof. A. H. SAYCE, with the assistance of A. E. COWLEY; and with Appendices by W. SPIEGELBERG and SEYMOUR DE RICCI. Double crown folio, in portfolio. [Just published.] 1 Guinea net.

Contents—General and Grammatical Introductions. Appendix I.—Explanation of Egyptian Names. Appendix II.—Bibliography—Translation of the Text, with Commentary—Index of Proper Names—Glossary—Texts—Facsimiles.

Hypnotism: Its History, Practice and Theory.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. A Monograph on the Scientific and Therapeutic Aspects of Hypnotism. New Edition. Demy 8vo, cloth. [Just published] 18/- net.

"Dr. Milne Bramwell has produced in this interesting volume a valuable contribution to the English literature of the subject . . . The extensive bibliography and copious index largely increase its value for purposes of reference."—MEDICAL CHRONICLE.

Now Ready.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A Manual of Costume, as illustrated by monumental Brasses. By HERBERT DRUITT. Indispensable Handbook for all interested in Brasses, Costume and Mediaeval Archaeology.

The Heart of a Garden. By ROSAMOND MARRIOTT WATSON. Numerous Illustrations. Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Tales from Old Fiji. By LORIMER FISON. Being a collection of native tales from South Pacific Islands, together with much important material bearing on many most interesting customs and long obsolete traditions of the islanders. With numerous illustrations and a map. Royal 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

"Buck" Whaley's Memoirs. Written by himself. Edited, with notes, introduction, and ten illustrations in photogravure. By SIR EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. Now published for the first time from the original manuscript of 1797. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

"It was indeed a lucky accident which led Sir Edward Sullivan to the London auction room in which the manuscript was being sold."—WORLD.

"An extraordinary book."—ACADEMY.

"Literary history is full of romance . . . Certainly Whaley crowded much into his thirty-four years of life. . . . It is clear that Buck Whaley's Memoirs will take their place with Mytton's and with many other books of memoirs that are destined to fascinate future generations of readers."—From "A Literary Letter" in the SPHERE.

A First German Course for Science Students. By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. 2/6 net.

This book is intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the leading examples will be found of great assistance, and the diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments help to fix the names in the memory.

A Pack of Queer Cards. By MARION FELL. Printed in red and black. Pott 8vo. 2/6

"How To" Series. The following are now ready:—

How To Write for the Magazines, 2/6; How To Deal With Your Banker, 3/6; How To Deal With Your Taxes, 3/6; How To Invest and How To Speculate, 5/-; How To Study English Literature, 3/6; How To Write An Essay, 2/6; How To Enter the Civil Service, 2/6; How To Succeed in Your Examinations, 2/6.

THE KING'S CLASSICS.

UNDER THE GENERAL EDITORSHIP OF PROFESSOR I. GOLLANZ, Litt.D.

New Issues at Uniform Prices.

Printed on antique laid paper, 16mo (6 by 4½ in.), and supplied in quarter bound antique grey binding or cloth (new design), 1/6 net each volume. Also with vellum back and cloth sides, or leather, 2/6 net each volume. Double volumes at 3/- and 5/- net each.

"All the 'King's Classics' are delightful little books, chosen by the most unerring judge of English Classics, Professor Gollanz, and produced with his delightful taste."—QUINCY.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd.

32 George Street, Hanover Square, London. W.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

NEW AND POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHORS OF "THE SHULAMITE."

Three large impressions exhausted on day of publication.

A FOURTH IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE ETONIAN By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW
THE ETONIAN Fourth Impression Now Ready.

This book contains an accurate description, combined with a powerful story, of Eton life. Mr. Claude Askew, as an old Eton boy, may be said to write with authority.

"A well-written novel."—TIMES.

"It can be recommended as an interesting and well-written novel."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Parents with lads at school, men who will be 'old boys' to the end of their lives, will do well to read the charming and original story, that has about it the tenderness and grace always rare of achievement."—GLOBE.

"Few who take up the book will be content to lay it aside till the last page is read."—STANDARD.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE STORM OF LONDON."

The First Impression of this book exhausted on day of publication.

A SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE NYMPH By F. DICKBERRY
THE NYMPH Author of "The Storm of London."

"Written with noticeable imaginative vigour and an attractive buoyancy of feeling, the book should not fail to entertain any one who takes it up."—SCOTSMAN.

"'The Nymph' is a well-written and well-constructed story, and marks an immense improvement upon its author's former work."—COURT JOURNAL.

"This book is a good one and its moral of the best."—EVENING STANDARD AND ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"The story is a strong one."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE CUCKOO

By HAMILTON DRUMMOND

"The story is one that holds the attention of the reader from the first to the last chapter."—SCOTSMAN.

THE KNUTSFORD MYSTERY

By DICK DONOVAN

"The book is instructive . . . and its plot absorbing."—NATIONAL PRESS.

PHARAOH'S TURQUOISE By A. M. JUDD
PHARAOH'S TURQUOISE

By A. M. JUDD, Author of "A Daughter of Lilith."

"A well-conceived story, with a romantic plot."—NATIONAL PRESS.

"Highly entertaining."—LITERARY WORLD.

"A well-conceived story, with a romantic plot."—EASTERN DAILY PRESS.

Now ready in cloth gilt, 5s.

GUY BOOTHBY'S LATEST ROMANCE.

A ROYAL AFFAIR By GUY BOOTHBY
A ROYAL AFFAIR Author of "Dr. Nikola."

"Told with all the ease and fluency which the author has taught us to expect of him."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In Picture Paper Covers, price 6d.

THE 22nd YEAR OF PUBLICATION

WINTER'S ANNUAL FOR 1906

ENTITLED

LITTLE JOAN

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER

Forthcoming List

In Cloth Gilt, price 6s. each.

THE LOVE OF PHILIP HAMPDEN. John Strange Winter

A MIRACLE OF THE TURF. By Winifred Graham

THE GREAT COURT SCANDAL. By William Le Queux

A DAMAGED REPUTATION. By Harold Bindloss

THE SOUL STEALER. By C. Ranger Gull

JONAH'S LUCK. By Fergus Hume

A CONQUEST OF FORTUNE. By George Griffith

MONTE CRISTO IN KHAKI. By Richard Henry Savage

F. V. WHITE & CO. LTD., 14 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Our M.P. says:

(h) "Enthusiasts for spelling reform assert that a year in a child's life could be economised for other studies." That's merely a guess, and I think, says our author, a bad one. I grant it a bad one, as it ought to be four and not one—as per above extract.

Let me quote a little more from an official return. Out of two hundred thousand children, ninety per cent. leave school without reaching the sixth standard, eighty per cent without reaching the fifth standard, and sixty per cent without reaching the fourth standard.

Our author makes a few concessions:

(i) "It takes a good deal of time, but is not arithmetic a deal worse, with its absurd systems of reckoning in avoirdupois, troy, and apothecary's weights, etc.? Why not adopt the metric system? Yes, why? It is much better, but two blacks do not make a white."

(j) Concession 2. "More simplification is perhaps the true aim." Well, say I, that is all we want.

(k) Concession 3. "Cow, plough, rough, through, are absurd enough, no doubt, but, says he, what about baan daan taan in South Yorkshire for bound down town." I reply, if we heard them for the first time they might puzzle us as an unknown word would, but if we knew that that was their way, we would not be puzzled at all.

In our five vowels I find we have fifty different ways of representing them. One would scarcely believe that. Take one as example, say the long alphabetic sound of A. Thus:

Pain day gaol ale great vein they reign etc. etc.
where ai ay ao ae ea ei ey eig represent that sound, and to these you could add eight and straight, eigh aigh

Isn't one dose a cure here?

W. G. DUNCAN.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Editorial sympathy is rare balm to the spelling reformer, and your friendly notice of September 1 is gratefully received. But many of us demur to the statement that "simplified spelling is admitted by all to be only a half-way house to phonetic spelling," if that term means one sound one symbol. This doctrine is certainly taught by many authorities who hitherto have promoted the reform movement. They seek history in the sound only, and as for the most part educationists imbued with its value as a medium of elementary education. But there seems to be a large number of moderate reformers who dispute the argument of the advanced school that there is no logical halt short of fonetic spelling, and the recent phase of the agitation has brought them into prominence. Mr. Carnegie insists on the conservatism and respect for precedent which animate his Simplified Spelling Board. Professor Brander Matthews in issuing his list of reformed spellings says: "Any scientific phonetic reform of our common spelling is absolutely impossible; it lies outside the sphere of practical politics. But altho phonetic reform is impossible, improvement of some sort is possibl, if too much is not demanded too suddenly."

These utterances are valuable, for much of the hostility to spelling reform is due to the dread of fonetic spelling. The moderate program as set forth by the British and American Philological Societies and as embodied in all the standard American dictionaries, is a fairly complete scheme, calculated to quench an appetite for more for some generations. Evidences to the eye of etymology are respected, traces of false etymology are removed, and there is no harrowing of scholarly feelings, while, at the same time, a considerable approximation of the written to the spoken word is effected and some sort of regularity is imparted to the value of vowels and diphthongs. Can the fonetic speller be more effectually disarmed?

VIA MEDIA.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Whilst most people will readily agree that it is unfortunate that the written form, or spelling, of words should not always accord strictly with the pronunciation, there are some who fear,—and, I think, rightly,—that an entirely reformed, and phonetic, spelling would eventually be a worse evil than to let the spelling remain quite unchanged! It seems to me that all champions of phonetic spelling make the mistake that it is only the spoken word that at all matters—that the written form should be entirely subordinated to the pronunciation.

Of course, originally (i.e., after the invention of letters), all languages were more or less phonetically written, and it is only in consequence of the vagaries in speech (or the spoken language) at different times and at divers places that our spelling has become so unphonetic.

Considering how continuously the pronunciation of even the most common words varies, and how many of our spellings, though not phonetic now, originally were so (ex., knight, knaue, gnash, indict), we must conclude that while the written form remains fairly constant, the spoken language changes in accordance with the fashion, or caprice, of the day and of the people speaking it. The really conservative element of every tongue is the writing, or, in other words, its literature. That it is which preserves a language from decay. I am sorry to disagree with Mr. H. Drummond, but I do hold with Dean Trench's ideas that there is more in words than mere speech, for they frequently possess a history and an interest apart from their present-day force and signification. If the principle of phonetic spelling were carried out in its entirety, not only would the new spelling empty our language of its associations with the past, but it is highly probable that to succeeding generations English literature would become a closed book to the masses. There would, in fact, be two languages to learn—the current phonetic writing of the day and the classical and literary language of the past, that of the Bible, Shakespeare, Milton, Tennyson, etc. etc. I take it most prefer to read such writers in the original!

F. W. T. LANGE.

September 29.

[We have also received letters on this subject from our correspondents Mr. H. Drummond and Mr. E. Jones, the secretary of the Spelling Conference at the Society of Arts, 1878, and secretary of Sir Isaac Pitman's Spelling Reform League. Mr. Drummond cannot understand our correspondent C. W. B.'s sentimental "devoshon" to the current spelling, claims that beauty and refinement are on the side of the new spelling, and quotes Froude's words on Tyndal's Bible, which, he points out, was not spelt in our present orthography. Mr. Jones submits a phonetic alphabet which we regret we have not space to print. It contains forty symbols.—Ed.]

A CRITICISM FROM AMERICA OF CO-EDUCATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Many important problems are raised in Miss Catherine I. Dodd's educational work, "The Child and the Curriculum," published by Messrs. Sonnenschein and Co., particularly with regard to the education of girls. Scripture, Literature, History, Art, Languages and the study of Nature form the chief items of her curriculum, which includes handwork and gardening. She deprecates in girls' schools a wholesale imitation of the kind of education which fits a boy for his career, and she quotes Professor Stanley Hall to show that the co-educational schools in America are not so ideal as enthusiasts would have us believe. "Boys," says Stanley Hall, "tend, under this system, to grow content with mechanical memorised work, and excelling on the lines of girls' qualities, fail to develop those of their own. There is a little charm and bloom rubbed off the ideal of girlhood by close contact, and boyhood seems less ideal to girls at close range." From the disciplinary point of view he urges: "it is impossible without injury to hold girls to the same standards of conduct, regularity, severe moral accountability, and strenuous mental work that boys need." Miss Dodd apparently does not advocate the mixing of the sexes in school life after the age of ten or twelve, but she does advocate a complete, many-sided curriculum for girls fitting them for either an independent position in life or for domestic and social duties, and she insists that in the formative years girls shall be under the steady influence of good women. Those of us who deprecate the manners of the modern girl, her slang, her devotion to hockey, and her distaste of domestic duties, will cordially welcome this book, which ought to benefit many parents and teachers. Miss Dodd does not merely theorise upon education, for the book is eminently practical, being the result of years of experiment in the class-room, the lecture-room, the hill-side and country lane with children and students, and the details and methods laid down are put into actual practice in the Milham Ford School, Oxford, which Miss Dodd directs, in connection with the work of Chervell Hall Training College where women students are trained for the profession of teaching.

J. C. M.

"WHAT CONSTITUTES A GREAT SPEECH?"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Oratory (which includes the composition and delivery of great speeches) is almost always a reflex of character.

This trait assumes various phases in the speeches of our great men. The cultured democracy of the Bishop of London, the brilliant debating powers of Mr. Balfour, and the stern grandeur of Bishop Welldon (Dean of Manchester) all alike tend to show the character and true worth of the man.

F. BOOTH.

October 2.

THE SUEZ CANAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A propos of Marlowe's dream quoted in the ACADEMY for September 29, it may be of interest to recall the similar anticipations of the greatest of German poets. Discussing with Eckermann A. von Humboldt's views on the project of a Panama canal, Goethe remarked (February 21, 1827): "es ist für die Vereinigten Staaten durchaus unerlässlich dass sie sich eine Durchfahrt aus dem Mexikanischen Meerbusen in den stillen Ocean bewerkstelligen, und ich bin gewiss das sie es erreichen." Despairing of a connection being effected between the Rhine and the Danube, as being beyond German resources, "drittens," added the poet, "möchte ich die Engländer in Besitz eines Kanals von Suez sehen. Die drei grossen Dinge möchte ich erleben, und es wäre wol der Mühe werth ihnen zu Liebe es noch einige funfzig Jahre auszuhalten" (Gespräche, iii. 84). Forty-two years lay between these words and the completion of the canal, and in forty-eight years from their utterance England purchased the Khedive's shares.

W. A. COX.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE MEDICI Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters.

The plates will be printed in colour, and are reproduced by a new photographic process which gives results such as have hitherto seemed impossible of realisation—results amounting, for the first time, to a facsimile of colour as well as form.

No "screen" mars the print; no "chalk-coating" renders it certain that the paper will presently disintegrate. No process has yet produced a coloured print directly reproduced from the original, which could substantiate these claims. Moreover, no coloured process-print of any real value has yet been offered at an approach to Medici prices. The first three are nearly ready.

I. BERNARDINO LUINI

HEAD OF THE VIRGIN MARY, after the Fresco in the Brera Palace, Milan.

Colour Surface, 13 $\frac{3}{4}$ by 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. 10s. 6d. net.

II. LEONARDO DA VINCI

HEAD OF THE CHRIST, after the unfinished Cartoon in the Brera Palace, Milan.

Colour Surface, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ by 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. 10s. 6d. net.

III. ALESSANDRO FILIPEPI, called BOTTICELLI.

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD, Painting on panel in the Museo-Poldi-Pezzoli, Milan.

Colour Surface, 13 $\frac{3}{4}$ by 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. 10s. 6d. net.

Large post 8vo, half-cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

A CHRISTMAS SERMON

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Uniform with PRAYERS WRITTEN AT VAILIMA.

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net.

STEVENSON'S POEMS.

Including "UNDERWOODS," "BALLADS," "SONGS OF TRAVEL."

(A New Volume of the ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.)

Also Uniform, EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY VIGNETTES.

First Series. By AUSTIN DOBSON.

Shortly. Two vols, small demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. net; half-leather, 15s. net.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM BLAKE.

Edited and Annotated by EDWIN J. ELLIS.

With Photogravure Frontispiece to each volume.

In 16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net.

THE POCKET EMERSON.

A Selection of Choice Passages made by ALFRED H. HYATT.

Two vols, demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 21s. net.

ANNALS OF COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM. With forty-five Illustrations.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

BURNT SPICES. By L. S. GIBSON.

THE TEA-PLANTER. By F. E. PENNY.

THE OLD HOUSE AT THE CORNER. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

THE PRIVATE DETECTIVE. By ROBERT MACHRAY.

THE PATH OF GLORY. By GEORGES OHNET.

COMET CHAOS. By CYRIL SEYMOUR.

TO DEFEAT THE ENDS OF JUSTICE. By HERBERT COMPTON.

THE MOTORMANIACS. By LLOYD OSBOURNE. 3/6

THREE NEW SIXPENNY BOOKS.

MARY JANE'S MEMOIRS. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

BAIL UP! By HUME NISBET.

PATRICA KEMBALL. By E. LYNN LINTON.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

MESSRS. NISBET'S NEW LIST.

F. T. BULLEN'S NEW STORY.

Author of "The Cruise of the Cachalot," etc.

FRANK BROWN, Sea-Apprentice.

With Coloured Illustrations by A. TWIDLE. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Bullen has a delightful method. . . . a quaint, melodious style that is peculiarly his own. . . . Mr. Bullen is not a sickly, unwholesome sentimentalist, but, on the contrary, a man of fine sentiment."—STANDARD.

L. T. MEADE'S NEW NOVEL.

IN THE FLOWER OF HER YOUTH.

Illustrated, extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"The characters are full of life, and the story is told with all Mrs. Meade's well-known ingenuity."—SCOTSMAN.

DR. GORDON STABLES' NEW STORY.

THE CITY AT THE POLE.

With 8 Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"This favourite writer has in his time written many fascinating romances for young people, but we question if he has ever before produced quite such a bounteous feast for the youthful imagination."—DUNDEE COURIER.

TWO COLOURED BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE STORY OF THE TEASING MONKEY. By the Author of "Little Black Mingo," etc. With numerous Coloured Illustrations, cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper boards, 1s. net.

BILLY MOUSE. By Major LAYARD. With daintily Coloured Illustrations, cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper boards, 1s. net.

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY (1814-1871). By BOLTON KING, M.A. In 2 volumes. With Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 24s. net.

ITALY TO-DAY. A Study of her Position, her Politics, her Society and her Letters. By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY. With Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

JAMES NISBET & CO. LTD., 21 BERNERS STREET, W.

THREE IMPORTANT NOVELS.

Messrs. BROWN, LANGHAM have just published

A Story of life in Japan by one who knows the country.

IT HAPPENED IN JAPAN

BY THE

Baroness ALBERT D'ANETHAN
(Wife of the Belgian Minister at Tokyo) 6s.

A Novel on quite new lines. Scene chiefly laid in Algeria.

THE GAIETY OF FATMA

By KATHLEEN WATSON. 6s.
(Author of "Litanies of Life")

A vivid and breezy story of the sea.

THE VOYAGE OF THE ARROW

By T. JENKINS HAINS. 6s.
(Author of "The Black Barque," etc.)

Also a New Edition, with Preface, of Mr. LACON WATSON'S Book,

HINTS TO YOUNG AUTHORS

Cloth extra, gilt top, 2s. net.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

ROUGE. By HALDANE MACFALL and D. C. CALTHORP. 6s.

THE SUNSET TRAIL. By A. H. LEWIS. 6s.

HERE AND THERE. (Indian Memories.) By H. G. KEENE, C.I.E.

10s. 6d. net.

CHRISTOPHER DEANE. By E. H. LACON WATSON. 3s. 6d.

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., Ltd., 78 New Bond Street, W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Temple, A. G. Illustrated Catalogue of the [Guildhall] Exhibition of Works by the Early Flemish Painters. With 45 illustrations. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 70. Fairbairns, 10s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Wood, Sir Evelyn. From Midshipman to Field-Marshal. 2 vols. With 24 illustrations and maps. 9 x 5½. Pp. 521. Methuen, 25s. net.

Rosebery, Lord. Lord Randolph Churchill. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 187. Humphreys, 3s. 6d.

["It may be urged," says Lord Rosebery, by way of preface, "Why write at all, when so much has been written so recently and so well? My answer would be that I knew my friend as a contemporary; and the knowledge of a contemporary and that of a son are essentially different. I do not in any sense compete with what his son has produced. His book is a careful and authoritative Life. Mine at most is only a reminiscence and a study."]

Hutton, William Holden. William Stubbs, Bishop of Oxford: 1825-1901. From "The Letters of William Stubbs." 9½ x 5½. Pp. 264. Constable, 6s. net.

[An abridged edition of the biography published in 1904. The editor has been obliged to omit many of the letters, but new matter has been inserted. Bibliography and Index.]

Wilson, Francis. Joseph Jefferson. Reminiscences of a Fellow Player. Illustrated. 8½ x 6. Pp. 354. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

["The present writer has aimed merely to set down the remembrances, mostly anecdotal, which were his over a number of years in connection with the subject of this sketch."]

Taylor, I. A. Robert Southwell, S.J., Priest and Poet. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 82. Sands, 2s. 6d. net.

Macdonald, Frederika. Jean Jacques Rousseau: A New Criticism. 2 vols. 9 x 5½. Pp. 823. Chapman & Hall, 24s. net.

[The purpose of this new criticism of Jean Jacques Rousseau is "to establish by newly-discovered historical evidence a fact which, presented as a theory, has been pronounced too improbable to deserve serious consideration—the fact, viz., that, as the result of a conspiracy between two men of letters, who were his contemporaries, an entirely false reputation of Rousseau has been handed down to us."]

BOYS' BOOKS.

Gibson, Charles R. Electricity of To-day. Its Work and Mysteries Described in Non-Technical Language. With 39 illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 347. Seeley, 5s. net.

[A useful and clearly-expressed book which we should like to see in the hands of every boy who has read Mr. Gibson's "Romance of Modern Electricity."]

Williams, Archibald. The Romance of Early Exploration. With 16 illustrations and 5 maps. 8 x 5½. Pp. 346. Library of Romance. Seeley, 5s.

["With descriptions of interesting discoveries, thrilling adventures, and wonderful bravery of the early explorers." The Publisher's imprint bears the date of 1907.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Stopes, M.C. The Study of Plant Life for Young People. 9 x 6. Pp. 202. De La More Press, 2s. 6d. net.

[By "young people" the author means "children."]

DRAMA.

Gingold, Hélène. Abelard and Heloise. A Tragedy in Five Acts. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 160. Greening, 3s. 6d. net.

Taylor, T. Hilhouse. Parsifal. A Romantic "Mystery"-Drama. 7½ x 5. Pp. 136. Sydney: Angus & Robinson, 3s. 6d. net.

EDUCATION.

Protheroe, Ernest. The Dominion of Man. Geography in its Human Aspect. With 36 illustrations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 215. Methuen, 2s.

Poésies Choisies de Alfred de Musset. Edited by C. Edmund Delbos. Oxford Higher French series. 7 x 4½. Pp. 135. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s. net.

FICTION.

Hood, Alexander Nelson. Tales of Old Sicily. 8 x 5½. Pp. 326. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

[Contents: "The Great Mother"; "Venus of Eryx"; "The Divine Philosopher"; and "Cyane."]

Kipling, Rudyard. Puck of Pook's Hill. With 20 full-page illustrations by H. R. Millar. 8 x 5½. Pp. 306. Macmillan, 6s. (See p. 327.)

Dunsany, Lord. Time and the Gods. With Illustrations by S. H. Sime. 8½ x 7. Pp. viii, 179. Heinemann, 6s. net.

London, Jack. Moon-Face, and other stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 273. Heinemann, 6s.

[Eight short stories.]

Cambridge, Ada. A Happy Marriage. 8 x 5½. Pp. 342. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Gibson, L. S. Burnt Spices. 7½ x 5. Pp. 350. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

Kernahan, Coulson. The Dumping. A Detective Love Story of a Great Labour Rising. Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 339. Cassell, 6s.

Nesbit, E. The Incomplete Amoris. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. Constable, 6s.

Crawford, Oswald. In Green Fields. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Chapman & Hall, 6s.

Tynan, Katharine. The Story of Bawn. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Smith, Elder, 6s.

HISTORY.

Godfrey, Elizabeth. Heidelberg: its Princes and its Palaces. Illustrated 9 x 6. Pp. xxiii, 351. E. Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. net.

[With acknowledgment of works consulted, chronological list of the rulers of the Palatinate and contemporary emperors, genealogical table, and Index. Illustrations from Photographs.]

Sanderson, Edgar. Great Britain in Modern Africa. With portraits and map. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 380. Seeley, 5s. net.

[Some portions of the present work are taken substantially from the author's "Africa in the Nineteenth Century," published in 1898; but these chapters have been revised and the narrative "brought down to the present time."]

Rodocanachi, E. The Roman Capitol in Ancient and Modern Times. The Citadel—The Temples—The Senatorial Palace—The Palace of the Conservators—The Museum. Translated from the French by Frederick Lawton. With 50 illustrations and a map. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 264. Heinemann, 4s. net.

LITERATURE.

The Oxford English Dictionary: A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles: founded mainly on the materials collected by The Philological Society. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray, with the assistance of many scholars and men of science. N—Niche. (Volume vi.) By W. A. Craigie, M.A. 13½ x 10½. Pp. 128. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. ($1.25).

Hazlitt, W. Carew. Some Prose Writings. 9 x 5½. Pp. 334. Reeves & Turner, 6s.

[Twenty-five papers, three of which appeared in a volume entitled "National Tales and Legends," and are reproduced here with "material alterations."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Harrison, Frederic. Memories and Thoughts. Men—Books—Cities—Art. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 433. Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.

["The reply to frequent appeals to the writer to collect pieces which within the last ten or twenty years have appeared in America and in Reviews and Journals at home."]

Whitty, Edward Michael. St. Stephens in the Fifties; the Session 1852-3. A Parliamentary Retrospect. With an introduction by Justin McCarthy and notes by H. M. W. 9 x 5½. Pp. 316. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.

University College, London. Calendar. Session MDCCCXVI-MDCCCXVII 9 x 5½. Pp. clxxiv, 433. Taylor & Francis, n.p.

The London University Guide, 1907. Containing the Regulations for Examinations to be held in 1907 and 1908. 7 x 5. Pp. xx, 63. University Correspondence College, n.p.

Russell, George W. E. Social Silhouettes. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 328. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net. (See p. 323.)

[The substance of this book has appeared in The Manchester Guardian.]

Bernard, Edward Russell. Great Moral Teachers. 8 x 5½. Pp. 174. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.

[Eight lectures delivered in Salisbury Cathedral in the years 1903 and 1904, in fulfilment of the statutory duty of the Chancellor of the Cathedral: one on Confucius, one on Gotama, one on Socrates, and five on Epictetus.]

Méline, Senator Jules. The Return to the Land. With a preface by Justin McCarthy. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxx, 240. Chapman & Hall, 5s. net. (See p. 326.)

Sheehan, Canon. Early Essays and Lectures. 8 x 5½. Pp. 354. Longmans, 6s. net.

[Ranging from "Religious Instruction in Intermediate Schools" and "The Fiftieth Anniversary of O'Connell's Death" to "The Poetry of Matthew Arnold." "Disinterred . . . from several magazines, some of ancient, some of more modern date, at the solicitation of a few well-wishers in Ireland and America."]

The Gate of Death: a diary. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 231. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net. [A record, written after his recovery, of the thoughts of a man who during an illness "stepped twice to the very gate of death."]

NATURAL HISTORY.

The Cambridge Natural History. Vol. i.:—Protozoa, by Marcus Hartog; Porifera (Sponges), by Igerna B. J. Sollas; Coelenterata and Ctenophora, by S. J. Hickson; Echinodermata, by E. W. MacBride. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 671. Macmillan, 17s. net.

[Although this volume is the first in the series as it was planned, it is actually the ninth in order of publication. The final volume (which forms vol. iv. of the series) is in the press.]

POETRY.

Hogg, Walter. Meditata: Sonnets. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 56. Wellwood, 1s. 6d. net. [Fifty thoughtful, imaginative sonnets, often irregular in rhyme-structure, but always dignified and rich in music.]

De La Mare, Walter. Poems. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 127. Murray, 3s. 6d. net.

POLITICAL.

Wrixon, Sir Henry. The Pattern Nation. 8 x 5½. Pp. 172. Macmillan, 3s. net.

[A discussion of the problem "What will the poor do with the rich?" when lawful government by the majority of the people has become an established fact.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn. Christian Institutions: essays on ecclesiastical subjects. Popular edition. 8 x 5½. Pp. 447. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.

A House of Letters. Being Excerpts from the Correspondence of Miss Charlotte Jerminham (the Hon. Lady Bedingfeld), Lady Jerminham, Coleridge, Lamb, Southey, Bernard and Lucy Barton and others, with Matilda Betham; and from Diaries and Other Sources; and a chapter upon Landor's Quarrel with Charles Betham at Llanthony. Also notes of some Phases in the Evolution of an English Family. Edited by Ernest Betham. Second edition. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 291. Jarrold, 6s.

The Gentle and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ. An introduction to the History of Christianity. From the German of John J. I. Dollinger, by N. Darnell. Second edition. 2 vols. 9 x 5½. Pp. 982. Gibbings, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LIVERPOOL
COURIER
says:

"Keeps us in a ripple of laughter."

A New Book by a New Humorist

THE TRIBUNE
says:

"There is in it an exuberance of high spirits."

LOVE AMONG THE CHICKENS

By P. G. WODEHOUSE

Illustrated by H. M. BROCK

THE SCOTSMAN says:

"The story is so happy and refreshing that no holiday-making person who has time upon his hands will begin it without finishing it at a sitting."

This is a Delightfully Humorous Novel dealing with the escapades of an Amateur Poultry Farmer, while incidentally presenting a charming Love Story.

THE DUNDEE
ADVERTISER
says:

"The story flows
on with a light-hearted gracefulness and merry humour."

On Sale at all Booksellers.
Cloth, 6s.
or Post Free for 6s. 4d.,
from

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
Southampton St., Strand, W.C.

THE DUBLIN EXPRESS

says:

"It is written lightly, brightly, and spicily."

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

A Home for Books.

Treat your books as your best friends. They will be true to you when all others fail. They will look well and always be handy if you treat yourself to a

"Gunn"

Sectional Bookcase

Its specially made doors will keep them free from damage. Built up in sections of any required size, the whole looking like a solid handsome piece of furniture. Always complete yet always growing. Full particulars, prices and name of nearest Agent, post free. Write for "Booklet No. 30."
to WM. ANGUS & CO. Ltd.,
44 Paul St., London, E.C.

SCHOFIELD & JESSOP (Ltd.) are acknowledged to be well qualified by experience and training to advise parents and guardians in the choice of a School or Tutor.—
217 Piccadilly, W.

THE ACADEMY

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES

Whole Page	£8 8 0
Half "	4 4 0
Quarter "	2 10 0
Narrow Column	3 0 0
Per Inch, Narrow Column	0 7 6

SERIAL RATES (for not less than 13 narrow columns)

Whole Page	£7 10 0
Half "	3 15 0
Quarter "	1 17 6
Narrow Column	2 10 0

SPECIAL POSITIONS AS ARRANGED

SMALL-TYPE ADVERTISEMENTS

6d. per Line. Minimum, 2/6. The first line is counted as two

Copy for Advertisements must be sent in not later than 12 noon on Thursday.

All Orders for Advertisements are received subject to the space being available, and the Proprietors reserve to themselves the right to decline or hold over any Advertisement.

All Communications respecting Advertisements must be addressed to THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER, 20 TAVISTOCK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge

THE GOLDEN AGE OF THE CHURCH. By the Very Rev. H. D. M. SPENCE-JONES, M.A., D.D., Dean of Gloucester. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS. The Shepherd of Hermas. By the Rev. C. TAYLOR, D.D., LL.D., Master of St. John's College, Cambridge. Vol. II. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS. The Apostolical Constitutions and Cognate Documents, with Special Reference to their Liturgical Elements. By the Rev. DE LACY O'LEARY, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF THE CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. Rhind Lectures by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Demy 8vo, cloth boards. [In the press.]
INSPIRATION. By the late Rev. F. WATSON, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

PROBLEMS IN LIFE AND RELIGION. By the Very Rev. C. T. OVENDEN, D.D., Dean of Clogher. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH IN SCOTLAND, INTRODUCTION TO THE. By the Rev. J. H. SHEPHERD, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S BRIEF ON BEHALF OF HIS NATIONAL CHURCH. By the Rev. THOMAS MOORE. New and Revised Edition. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 8d.

THE TRIAL OF JESUS. Illustrated from Talmud and Roman Law. By the Rev. SEPTIMUS BUSS, LL.B. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION, ON THE. With Reference especially to the Emmaus Narrative of St. Luke's Gospel, and to Recent Criticism. By the Rev. E. HERMITAGE DAY, D.D. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 6d.

THE GREAT COMMANDMENT, and the Second like unto it. Six Sermons preached before the University of Oxford as Select Preacher by the Right Rev. JOHN MITCHINSON, D.C.L., Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, and Canon of Gloucester. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN MODERN LIGHT. By the late WALTER ALLAN MOBERLY, Canon of Southwark. With a Preface by the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE STORY OF THE APOCRYPHA; a Series of Lectures on the Books and Times of the Apocrypha. By the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

NOTES ON THE HIGHER CRITICISM. By the Most Rev. R. S. COPLESTON, Bishop of Calcutta. Fcap. 8vo, 3d.

HOW WE GOT OUR BIBLE. By J. PATERSON SMYTH, B.D., LL.D. Crown 8vo, paper cover, 6d. net.

CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

ISSUED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ABOVE SOCIETY.

LXXXV. THE HISTORY AND USE OF CREEDS AND ANATHEMAS IN THE EARLY CENTURIES OF THE CHURCH. By C. H. TURNER, M.A., Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Small post 8vo, paper boards, 2s.

A Complete List of the Church Historical Society's Publications may be had on application.

REX REGUM. A Painter's Study of the Likeness of Christ from the Time of the Apostles to the Present Day. By the late Sir WYKE BAYLISS, K.B. F.S.A., President of the Royal Society of British Artists. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.

THE SACRED TENTH; or, Studies in Tithe-Giving, Ancient and Modern. By Dr. H. LANDSELL. 2 vols. 800 pp. demy 8vo, with Portraits, Illustrations, and Maps, cloth boards, 16s.

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS: the Religion of the Crescent; or, Islam—its Strength, its Weakness, its Origin, its Influence. By the Rev. W. ST. CLAIR TISDALL, D.D. New Edition, Revised. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

MODERN CRITICISM AND THE BOOK OF GENESIS. By the Rev. H. A. REDPATH, D.Litt., M.A. New Edition. Small post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

COMMENTARY ON THE PRAYER-BOOK. Containing Historical Introduction, Notes on the Calendar, Services, Articles, Table of Kindred, etc., together with complete Concordances to the Prayer-Book and Psalter. New Edition. Revised by the Rev. F. E. WARREN, B.D. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.; with the PRAYER-BOOK, cloth boards, 3s.

THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, WITH HISTORICAL NOTES. Edited by the late Rev. JAMES CORNFORD, M.A. A cheap reprint. 16mo, cloth boards, 1s. 4d.

THE DISESTABLISHMENT QUESTION AT THE PRESENT TIME. An Address delivered in 1906 at the Invitation of a London Debating Society by H. W. HOARE, late of Balliol College. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 6d.

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONGRESS OF 1908. Its Ideals and Hopes. With details and suggestions relating to the problems and duties of the Church in all parts of the world. Published under the authority of the Pan-Anglican Congress Committee. Revised Edition. Demy 8vo, stitched, 3d.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF THE HISTORICAL RECORDS AND LEGENDS OF ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA. By T. G. PINCHES, LL.D., M.R.A.S. Second Edition, Revised, with Appendices and Notes. With several Illustrations. Large post 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.
Applies to the criticisms of the Old Testament the most recent discoveries in the field of Archaeology. This New Edition contains the Laws of Hammurabi and other new matter, amounting in all to nearly one hundred pages.

CHRISTIAN WORSHIP: its Origin and Evolution. A Study of the Latin Liturgy up to the Time of Charlemagne. By Monsignore DUCHESNE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE from the Third Edition of "Les Origines du Culte Chretien." Second English Edition, Revised with considerable Additions by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 10s.
It is not too much to say that this is the most important work which has appeared on this subject.

THE SCHOOL OF SUFFERING. A Brief Memorial of Mary E. Moule. By her father, HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D., Bishop of Durham. With Portrait. Fifth Edition Revised. Small post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

CONCERNING THEM WHICH ARE ASLEEP. Words to Mourners from a Mourner. By HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, Bishop of Durham. Cloth, 4d.

PORTFOLIO OF ENGLISH CATHEDRALS. With Historical and Architectural Notes by ARNOLD FAIRBAIRNS. No. 23. CHICHESTER. 1s.

VOLUME II., containing—

ELY.
CHESTER.
OXFORD.

BANGOR AND ST. ASAPH.
LICHFIELD.
NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

WORCESTER.
ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

Cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

Already published, VOLUME I., containing—Canterbury, Durham, York, St. Albans, Salisbury, Exeter, Peterborough, and Southwark. Cloth boards, 10s. 6d.

CHEAP REISSUE OF

ILLUSTRATED HANDBOOKS OF ART HISTORY OF ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES.

Edited by Sir E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A., and Prof. T. ROGER SMITH, F.R.I.B.A. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, each 3s. 6d.

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES ARE NOW READY:

ARCHITECTURE: CLASSIC AND EARLY CHRISTIAN. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and JOHN SLATER, B.A.

ARCHITECTURE: GOTHIC and RENAISSANCE. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

SCULPTURE: EGYPTIAN, ASSYRIAN, GREEK, AND ROMAN. By GEORGE REDFORD, F.R.C.S.

SCULPTURE: GOTHIC, RENAISSANCE AND MODERN. By LEADER SCOTT.

PAINTING: GERMAN, FLEMISH AND DUTCH. By H. J. WILMOT BUXTON, M.A., and Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

PAINTING: ENGLISH and AMERICAN. By H. J. WILMOT BUXTON, M.A., and S. R. KOEHLER.

WATER-COLOUR PAINTING IN ENGLAND. By G. R. REDGRAVE.

PAINTING: CLASSIC AND ITALIAN. By Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A., and PERCY R. HEAD, B.A.

PAINTING: SPANISH AND FRENCH. By GERARD SMITH.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43 QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C. BRIGHTON: 129 NORTH ST.

Printed for the Proprietors by BAILLANTYNE & CO. LIMITED, Tavistock Street, London, and Published at the Offices of COUNTRY LIFE, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, and GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand.

THE ACADEMY

OCTOBER 6, 1906

AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS

A SELECTION FROM MACMILLAN'S NEW & FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

NOW READY.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW BOOK PUCK OF POOK'S HILL

With 20 Full-Page Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

ADONIS, ATTIS, OSIRIS. Studies in the History of Oriental Religion. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D., Author of "The Golden Bough." 8vo, 10s. net. [Ready.]

THE TODAS. By W. H. R. RIVERS. With numerous Illustrations and a Map. 8vo, 2rs. net. [October 9.]

PAGAN RACES OF THE MALAY PENINSULA. By WALTER WILLIAM SKEAT, M.A., late of the Federated Malay States Civil Service, Author of "Malay Magic," etc., and CHARLES OTTO BLAGDEN, M.A., late of the Straits Settlements Civil Service. Very elaborately illustrated by Photographs taken specially for the work. 2 vols., 8vo, 42s. net.

THE LOWER NIGER AND ITS TRIBES. By Major ARTHUR GLYN LEONARD. With a Map. 8vo.

AT THE BACK OF THE BLACK MAN'S MIND: or, Notes on the Kingly Office in West Africa. By R. E. DENNETT, Author of "Notes on the Folk-Lore of the Fiort," etc. With Illustrations. 8vo.

GREAT MORAL TEACHERS. Eight Lectures delivered in Salisbury Cathedral. By EDWARD RUSSELL BERNARD, M.A., Chancellor of the Cathedral Church. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready.]
The subjects of Canon Bernard's Letters are Confucius, Buddha, Socrates, and Epictetus.

AN OUTLINE OF THE IDEALISTIC CONSTRUCTION OF EXPERIENCE. By J. B. BAILLIE, M.A., D.Phil., Regius Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Aberdeen, Author of "Hegel Logic." 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

THE PATTERN NATION. By Sir Henry WRIXON, K.C., Author of "Socialism," "Notes on a Political Tour," "Jacob Shumate." Crown 8vo, 3s. net. [Ready.]

THE FAMILY. By Helen Bosanquet, Author of "The Strength of the People," "Rich and Poor," etc. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

Macmillan's New Novels.

A LADY OF ROME. By F. Marlon Crawford. Crown 8vo, 6s. each. [October 16.]

IN THE DAYS OF THE COMET. By H. G. Wells. [Ready.]

RUNNING HORSE INN. By Alfred Tresidder Sheppard. [Ready.]

DISENCHANTED. By Pierre Loti. Translated by Clara Bell. [Ready.]

ANDREW GOODFELLOW. By Helen H. Watson.

NO FRIEND LIKE A SISTER. By Rosa N. Carey. [Ready.]

THE ENEMY'S CAMP. By Hugh Sheringham and Nevill Meakin.

HER MAJESTY'S REBELS. By Sidney Royse Lysaght.

Now Ready.

CHEAP EDITION IN TWO VOLS.—UNABRIDGED.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE

By JOHN MORLEY, M.P.

In 2 vols., 8vo, 5s. net each.

LORD ACTON. LECTURES ON MODERN HISTORY.

Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A.

8vo, 10s. net.

[Ready.]

CONCLUDING VOLUME READY OCTOBER 12.

A HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND.

BY HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

In 5 vols. Vol. V., 1885 to 1895. With a complete Index to the whole Work. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

MEMORIES AND THOUGHTS. Men—BOOKS—CITIES—ART. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

COSTUME: FANCIFUL, HISTORICAL, AND THEATRICAL. Compiled by Mrs. ARIA. With 16 Coloured Plates, and many other Illustrations in the Text, by PERCY ANDERSON. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY COLOUR

PRINTS. An Essay on certain Stipple Engravers and their Work Colour. By JULIA FRANKAU. 8vo.

CRANFORD SERIES.—New Vol.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, 16 of which are reproduced in Colour. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SCHOLAR GIPSY AND THYRSIS. By MATTHEW ARNOLD. With Illustrations by EDMUND H. NEW. Crown 8vo.

ENGLISH LITERATURE FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO CHAUCER. By WILLIAM HENRY SCHOFIELD, Ph.D., Assistant Professor of English in Harvard University. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Wednesday.]

AN ANTHOLOGY OF AUSTRALIAN VERSE. Edited by BERTRAM STEVENS. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. hmp leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

* * * MACMILLAN'S LIST OF AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Messrs. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co.'s Autumn List

NOW READY

- THE KING OF COURT POETS. A Study of the Life, Work, and Times of Lodovico Ariosto. By EDMUND GARDNER, Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.
- LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. Being his Correspondence with Tobias Lear and the Latter's Diary. Illustrated with rare Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- WILLIAM STUBBS, BISHOP OF OXFORD, 1825-1901. (From the Letters of William Stubbs.) By WILLIAM HOLDEN HUTTON, B.D. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.
- QUINTIN HOGG. A Biography by ETHEL HOGG. With a Preface by the DUKE of ARGYLL. Illustrated. New Popular Edition. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
- VICTORIAN NOVELISTS. Studies of Famous Writers of the Nineteenth Century. By LEWIS MELVILLE, Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray." With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- AMERICAN LITERARY MASTERS. By LEON H. VINCENT, Author of "Brief Studies in French Letters and Society in the Seventeenth Century." Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
- THE PARDONER'S WALLET. Essays and Reflections. By SAMUEL M'CHORD CROTHERS, Ingersoll Lecturer, 1905. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
- BIRD AND BOUGH. Poems of Nature. By JOHN BURROUGHS. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net.
- ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE. By STEPHEN LEACOCK, B.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Science M'Gill University, Montreal. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

- LIFE AND LETTERS OF LAFCADIO HEARN. By ELIZABETH BISLAND. 2 vols. fully illustrated, 8vo, 24s. net.
- GOLDEN DAYS OF THE RENAISSANCE IN ROME. By RODOLFO LANCIANI. Demy 8vo, fully illustrated, 21s. net.
- MY PILGRIMAGE TO THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST. By MONCURE D. CONWAY. Fully illustrated. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- THE LIFE OF CHARLES GODFREY LELAND ("HANS BREITMANN"). By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. 2 vols. illustrated, demy 8vo, 21s. net.
- EMMA, LADY HAMILTON. A Biography. By WALTER SICHEL. Third Edition, Revised. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- STUDIES IN SEVEN ARTS. By ARTHUR SYMONS, Author of "Spiritual Adventures," etc. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
- EDINBURGH UNDER SIR WALTER SCOTT. P. W. T. FYFE. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- WALT WHITMAN. A Study of his Life and Work. By BLISS PERRY. Crown 8vo, illustrated with Portraits, Facsimiles of MSS., etc., 6s. net.
- THE CRACKLING OF THORNS. By DUM DUM, Author of "Rhymes of the East." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
- COMEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FVIE, Author of "Some Famous Women of Wit and Beauty." Demy 8vo, with many Full-Page Portraits, 12s. 6d. net.
- THE FLOCK. An Idyll of Shepherd Life. By MARY AUSTIN. Illustrated by E. BOYD SMITH. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
- NATIVES OF AUSTRALIA. ("The Native Races of the British Empire." Vol. I.) By N. W. THOMAS. With 32 Full-Page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.
- RACE PREJUDICE. By JEAN FINOT. Translated by FLORENCE WADE-EVANS. Demy 8vo.
- A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Selected and arranged by KATE M. WARREN, Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Westfield College (University of London), and Deputy Assistant Lecturer in the same at Bedford College for Women (University of London), with an Introduction by Rev. STOFFORD BROOKE, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- ENGLISH ILLUSTRATION, 1857-1870. By GLEESON WHITE. With 6 Photogravures, and over 100 Illustrations from the original woodcuts. Students' Edition. Cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.
- THE DIVERTING HISTORY OF JOHN GILPIN. Showing how he went further than he intended, and came safe home again. With 32 Woodcuts drawn and engraved by ROBERT SEAVER. 16mo, 1s. net.
- PETER: a Christmas Story. By Mrs. EDWIN HOHLER, Author of "The Bravest of Them All," "Mark's Princess," etc. With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
- THE JAPANESE FAIRY BOOK. Compiled by YEI THEODORA OZAKI. New Edition. Illustrated in Colours and in the Text. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
- INDIAN TREES. An Account of Trees, Shrubs, Woody Climbers, Bamboos, and Palms, indigenous or commonly cultivated in the British Indian Empire. By DIETRICH BRANDIS, K.C.I.E., assisted by Indian Foresters. Illustrated. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

NOW READY

THE TREASURE OF HEAVEN

BY MARIE CORELLI

- THE INCOMPLETE AMORIST. By E. NESBIT, Author of "The Red House."
- HOLYLAND. By GUSTAVE FRENSSSEN, Author of "Jörn Uhl."
- THE WOMAN'S VICTORY And Other Stories. By MAARTEN MAARTEN, Author of "Dorothea."
- IOLE. By R. W. CHAMBERS, Author of "The Maids of Paradise," "The Maid-at-Arms," etc. With Illustrations in Colour. Crown 8vo, 5s.

TO BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY

GROWTH

- BY GRAHAM TRAVERS, Author of "MONA MACLEAN."
- THE EIGHT GUESTS. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "John Strood," "Park Lane," etc.
- THE COUNTY ROAD. By Miss ALICE BROWN, Author of "Paradise," "King's End," etc.
- THE OPENED SHUTTERS. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, Author of "Jewel," etc.
- A MAN IN THE CASE. By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, Author of "Trixy," etc.
- MONTLIVET. By ALICE PRESCOTT SMITH.

MONOGRAPHS ON IMMORTALITY

Cloth, gilt, 16mo, 1s. net each.

- THE ENDLESS LIFE. By S. M'C. CROTHERS.
- HUMAN IMMORTALITY. By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES.
- THE ETERNAL LIFE. By Prof. HUGO MUNSTERBERG.
- SCIENCE AND IMMORTALITY. By WILLIAM OSLER, M.D.
- THE CONCEPTION OF IMMORTALITY. By JOSIAH ROYCE.

RELIGIONS: ANCIENT AND MODERN—NEW VOLUMES

Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net per volume.

- THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT. By Prof. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, F.R.S.
- ISLAM. By SYED AMEER ALI, M.A., C.I.E. (Member of the Imperial Legislative Council of India), Author of "The Spirit of Islam" and "The Ethics of Islam."

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., 16 JAMES STREET, HAYMARKET, LONDON, S.W.

AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS

OCTOBER 6, 1906

MR. GEORGE ALLEN

Biography

- The Life, Letters, and Work of Frederic Leighton. By Mrs. Russell Barrington. 2 vols. Ill.net 42/0 and 105/0
Lord Acton and His Circlenet 15/0
Sir Thos. Lawrence's Letter-Bag. Ill.net 15/0
Olives: Reminiscences of Sir Wyke Baylissnet 15/0
Ruskin at Venice. From the French of R. de la Sizerannenet 1/0

Drama

- The Medea of Euripides. Trans. by Gilbert Murray....net 2/0
Joyzelle: A Drama. By Maurice Maeterlincknet 3/6

Fiction

- The Contest. By E. L. Haverfield 6/0
George's Whims. By P. Whithard 5/0
The Lilliput Series for Children:
The Man in the Moon, and The Adventures of Mr. Rabbit and Uncle Fox, by S. L. Bensusan—The Doll Doctor, by E. V. Lucas. Ill.each 1/6

Science

- Science in Public Affairs. Seven essaysnet 5/0

Travel

- India under Royal Eyes. By H. Prevost Battersby. Ill.net 12/6

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SON

Art

- The Gem-Cutter's Craft. By L. Claremont. Ill.net 6/0
How to Collect Continental China. By C. H. Wyld. Ill.net 6/0
Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture:
Van Dyck, by Lionel Cust. Ill.net 5/0
The Royal Academy of Arts. By Algernon Graves. Vol. VIII. and lastnet 42/0

Literature and History

- The Poems of Coventry Patmorenet 6/0
The Birds of Aristophanes. Trans. by B. B. Rogers..... 10/6
Alien Influence in English Literature. By T. G. Tucker
Rahab: a Poetic Drama. By Richard Burtonnet 5/0
The Itinerary of John Leland. Ed. by L. Toulmin-Smith. Vol. I.net 15/0
Bede's Ecclesiastical History. Trans. by A. M. Sellar
The York Library of Reprints on Thin Paper each net 2/0 and 3/0
The Register of Thomas de Brantingham, Bishop of Exeter, 1370-1394. Part II.net 25/0

Science and Sociology

- Electrons. By Sir Oliver Lodge
Industrial Combinations. By D. H. Macgregor
The Negro and the Nation. By G. S. Merriamnet 8/0
Heredity in Royalty. By F. A. Woodsnet 12/6
The Cosmic Procession. By Frances Swineynet 3/6
Analysis of Racial Descent in Animals. By T. H. Montgomerynet 10/6
How Ferns Grow. By Margaret Slosson.....net 12/6
Nature and Health. By E. Curtisnet 5/0
Citizenship and the Schools. By J. W. Jenksnet 6/0

MESSRS. BLACKIE & SON

Children's Books

- The Child's Christmas. By Charles Robinson and Evelyn Sharp. Ill.net 6/0
Roger the Bold, by Capt. F. S. Brereton—The Lost Explorers, by Alexander Macdonald—Our Sister Maisie, by Rosa Mulholland—Girl Comrades, by E. F. Heddle. Ill.each 6/0

- With Roberts to Candahar, by Capt. F. S. Brereton—The Escape of the Mullingong, by G. E. Farrow—Across the Spanish Main, by H. Collingwood—Among the Dark Mountains, by David Ker—A Girl of the Fortunate Isles, by Bessie Marchant. Ill.each 3/6
With Gordon at Khartum, by Eliza F. Pollard—The Boy Hero of Erin, by C. Squire—Round de Ole Plantation, by G. F. Christie—The Last of the Peshwas, by M. Macmillan—The Falcon King, by W. L. O'Byrne. Ill. each 2/6
The Fortunes of Philippa. By Angela Brazil. Ill. 2/0
Little Pickles, by Ruth Cobb and Richard Hunter—The Scarecrow's Story, by E. King Hall. Ill.each 1/6

History and Literature

- A Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry. By Arthur Symonds net 6/0
London: Historical and Descriptive. By Ben Jonson. Ill. 1/6
Our English Towns and Villages. By H. B. Wilton Hall. Ill. 1/6

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SON

Biography and Memoirs

- Maids of Honour. By A. J. Green-Armytage. Ill.net 10/6
George Eliot. By A. T. Quiller-Couch 2/6

Fiction

- Fisherman's Gat. By E. Noble—The Heir. By Sydney C. Grier—The Marriage of Aminta. By L. Parry Truscott—Honour's Glassy Bubble. By E. Gerard—Richard Hawkwood. By Neville Maugham—The Young Days of Admiral Quilliam. By F. Norreys Connell—Skipper. By Gilbert Watson—The Hearth of Hutton. By W. J. Eccott—The Safety of the Honours. By Allan McAulay—Scoundrel Mark. By Frank Dillnot—A Servant of the King. By E. Aceituna Griffin..... each 6/0

History

- The Voyage of the Scotia. By Three of the Staff. Ill. net 21/0
A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. By Andrew Lang. Vol. IV.net 15/0
True Romances of Scotland. By E. Maxtone Grahame and E. Paterson. Ill.

Military

- The Development of Tactics from 1740 to the Present Day. By Lieut.-Col. Walter H. James
The Colonials in S. Africa, 1899-1902. By J. Stirling...net 12/6

Miscellaneous

- A Century's Progress in Astronomy. By H. Macpherson, Jun.net 6/0
The CHCl₃ Problem. By Richard Gill. 2 vols.each net 5/0
A Question of Colour: a Study of S. Africanet 6/0

MESSRS. BROWN, LANGHAM & Co. and MESSRS. MASTERS & Co.

Biography

- Some Reminiscences. By William Michael Rossetti. Ill. net 42/0

Fiction

- The Gaiety of Fatma, by Kathleen Watson—It Happened in Japan, by the Baroness A. d'Anethan—The Voyage of the Arrow, by T. Jenkins Hains—Eve and the Wood God, by Helen Maxwelleach 6/0
Moons and Winds of Araby. By Roma Whitenet 2/6

Theology

- Plants of the Bible. By Prof. G. Hurslownet 6/0
O Sapientia. By Cornelius Witherby 2/6
The Servant of the Lord. By Richenda Buxton 2/6
The Problems of Faith in Relation to Modern Science and Criticism. By H. T. Nicholson..... 2/0

MR. A. H. BULLEN

- Poems. By W. B. Yeatsnet 6/0
 Popular Ballads of the Olden Time. Ed. by Frank Sidgwick. Third Seriesnet 3/6
 Early English Lyrics (1225-1550). Chosen by E. K. Chambers and F. Sidgwicknet 6/0
 Anacreon. Trans. by T. Stanley; ed. by A. H. Bullennet 6/0
 Catulli Carmina Selecta. Ill.net 6/0
 Shakespeare's Sonnets. Ed. by A. H. Bullennet 7/6
 Venus and Adonis. Ed. by A. H. Bullennet 3/6
 Collectanea. By Charles Crawford. Papers on Elizabethan Dramatists. Series I.net 3/6
 A Cypress Grove. By W. Drummond of Hawthornden.net 3/6
 Thomas Stothard, R.A. By A. C. Coxhead. Ill.net 16/0
 Prunella, or Love in a Dutch Garden. By L. Housman and Granville Barker. Ill.net 6/0

MESSRS. BURNS & OATES

- Lord Acton and His Circle. Ed. by Abbot Gasquetnet 15/0
 Free Will and Four English Philosophers—Hobbes, Locke, Hume, and Mill. By the Rev. Joseph Rickaby, S.J.net 3/6
 Spiritual Conferences of St. Francis de Salesnet 6/0
 A Selection of the Verses of John B. Tabb. Made by Alice Meynellnet 2/6
 The Church and Kindness to Animals. Ill.net 2/6
 Oxford, Douay, Tyburn: Conferences on the Martyrs of the English Seminaries. By Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.net 2/6
 On Religious Worship. By Geremia Bonomelli, Bishop of Cremonanet 2/6
 Josephine's Troubles: A Story of the Great Franco-Prussian War of 1870-1871. By Percy Fitzgerald. Ill.net 5/0
 Sanctity's Romance. By David Boorne, S.J.net 1/6
 Her Faith Against the World: A Novel. By Wilfrid Wilberforce and A. R. Gilbert.net 3/6
 Two Angel Tales. By Father Faber. Ill.net 1/0 and 2/6
 A Tuscan Penitent: Being the Life and Legend of St. Margaret of Cortona. By Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C. Ill.net 3/6
 "I am the Way." Trans. by The Hon. A. Wilmot, from a French edition of L'Esprit du Christianisme. By Father Nepveu, S.J.net 2/6
 Ecclesia, the Church of Christ: A Planned Series of Papers. Ed. by A. H. Mathewnet 3/6
 The Rhymed Life of St. Patrick. By Katharine Tynan Hinkson. Ill. by L. D. Symingtonnet 1/0 and 2/6

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Bibliography

- Early English Printed Books in the University Library, Cambridge (1475-1640). Vol. IV.
 The Printers, Stationers, and Bookbinders of Westminster and London from 1476-1535. By E. Gordon Duffnet 15/0
 Photogravure Facsimiles of Rare Fifteenth Century Books printed in England and now in the University Library, Cambridge. The Churl and the Bird. Translated from the French by John Lydgate. Printed by William Caxton about 1478. A lytell treatyse of the horse, the sheep, and the ghos. By John Lydgate. Printed at Westminster by Wynkyn de Worde about 1499

Educational Science

- Contributions to the History of Education in Mediaeval and Modern Europe. Education in the Age of the Renaissance, 1400-1600. By Prof. W. H. Woodward

English

- Cambridge English Classics:
 The Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher. Vol. IV. Grace Abounding and The Pilgrim's Progress. By John Bunyan. The Essays and English Plays of Abraham Cowley. The Works of Giles and Phineas Fletcher. The Poems of George Gascoigne. The Poems of George Crabbe. In 3 vols. Vol. III.each net 4/6
 Cambridge University Press New Type. Comus and other Poems. By John Milton—The Essayes and Counsels, Civill and Morall of Francis I.o. Verulam, Viscount St. Alban.each net 21/0

History

- The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. IV. The Thirty Years' Warnet 16/0
 De Republica Anglorum. Compiled by the Hon. Sir Thomas Smyth Knight. Ed. by L. Alston
 The Cambridge School History of England. By Arthur D. Innes

- Memorials to serve for a History of the Parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe. By the Rev. Canon Beck
 The Cambridge Historical Series: Modern Spain, 1815-1898. By H. Butler Clarke
 The Early Age of Greece. By William Ridgeway, M.A. Vol. II.

Law

- International Law. Part II. War. By J. Westlake
 Select Cases in Real Property Law. Ed. by W. J. Whitaker

Mathematics and Science

- Theory of Differential Equations. Vol. V. By A. R. Forsyth
 Cambridge Tracts on Mathematics and Mathematical Physics. No. 3. Quadratic Forms and their Classification by means of Invariant Factors. By T. I'A. Bromwich
 The Cambridge Physical Series. A Treatise on the Theory of Alternating Currents. By A. Russell. Vol. II.
 Reports of the Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits. Ed. by A. C. Haddon. Vol. III. Linguistics

Music

- The Indebtedness of Handel to Works by other Composers. By Sedley Taylornet 12/0

Oriental Literature and Philology

- The Jataka. Translated from the Pali. In six volumes. Vol. VI. Trans. by E. B. Cowell and W. H. D. Rousenet 12/6

Theology

- The Interlinear Bible: The Authorised Version and the Revised Version, together with the marginal notes of both versions and Central Referencesnet 12/6
 The Fourth Gospel and some recent Criticism. By the Rev. H. L. Jackson
 Cambridge Patristic Texts. De Sacerdotio of St. John Chrysostom. Ed. by J. Arbutnot Nairn
 Studia Sinaitica. No. 12. Forty Facsimiles of Dated Arabic MSS. Ed. by Agnes Smith Lewis and Margaret Dunlop Gibson

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co.

Art

- The King's Empire in Pictures. Introduction by W. H. Fitchett. 2 vols.each 12/0
 The Cathedrals of England and Wales. 2 vols. Ill.net 21/0
 Sir Benjamin Stone's Pictures. Ill. 2 vols.each 7/6
 The Old Engravers of England with Relation to Contemporary Life and Art. By Malcolm C. Salaman. Ill.net 5/0
 Porcelain. By William Burton. Ill.net 7/6
 Landscape Painting in Oil Colour. By Alfred East. Ill.net 10/6
 The MacWhirter Sketch-Book. Ill.net 5/0
 Flowers from Shakespeare's Garden. Ill. by Walter Crane
 Familiar Trees. By Prof. S. Boulger. Vol. I. Ill.net 6/0
 Johnston and Hoffmann's Royal Tour Souvenir Album:
 India, 1905-6. Ill.net 10/6
 Pictorial London. Ill.net 12/0
 The Nation's Pictures. In fortnightly parts.each net -/7
 Sacred Art. In monthly parts.each net -/7

Children's Books

- Monitor at Megson's. By Robert Leighton.—The Wolfmen. By Frank Powell—King by Combat. By Fred Whishaw. Ill.each 3/6
 The New Deerfoot Series. Three books. Ill.each 2/6
 Peril and Patriotism—The Book of Romance. Ill.net 5/0
 The Young Gullivers. By S. H. Hamer and Harry Roundtree. Ill.net 1/6 and 2/0
 The Little Folks' Book of Wonders. By S. H. Hamer. Ill.
 The Little Folks' Nature Book. By S. H. Hamer. Ill.each 2/6 and 3/6
 The Little Folks' Story Book in Colours. By S. H. Hamer. Ill.net 3/6 and 5/0
 Percy Vere. By Evelyn Everett-Green. Ill.net 2/6
 A Princess of the Woods. By E. S. Ellis. Ill.net 1/0

Education

- Cassell's New German Dictionary. By Karl Breulnet 7/6 and 10/6

Fiction

- Benita. By H. Rider Haggard—Her Grace at Bay. By Headon Hill—The Dumping. By Coulson Kernahan—The Woman at Kensington. By William le Queux—Highcroft Farm. By J. S. Fletcher—Helena's Love-Story. By Guy Thorne—Gossips Green. By Mrs. Henry Dudeney—The Throwback. By A. H. Lewis—The Patriots. By C. T. Brady.Ill. each 6/0
 The Woman of Babylon. By Joseph Hocking—The Ironmaster's Daughter. By Bertha M. Clay. Ill.each 3/6

History

- Westminster Abbey: Its Story and Associations. By E. T. Bradley. Ill. 6/0
Notable Trials: Romances of the Law Courts. By R. Storry Deans. Ill. 6/0

Science

- Nature's Carol Singers. By R. Kearton. Ill. 6/0
Paradoxes of Nature and Science. By W. Hampson. Ill. 6/0

MESSRS. W. & R. CHAMBERS

Children's Books

- The Hill-top Girl. By L. T. Meade. Ill. 6/0
Turquoise and Ruby. By L. T. Meade—'Tention! By G. Manville Fenn—Peg's Adventures in Paris. By May Baldwin. The Lost Treasure Cave. By Everett M'Neill Ill. each 5/0
Sue. By L. T. Meade—Foray and Fight. By John Finnemore—The Boys of Brierley Grange. By Fred Whishaw—Dora: A High-School Girl. By May Baldwin—The Bolted Door, and Other Stories. By Mrs. Molesworth. Ill. each 3/6

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL

Biography and Memoirs

- Jean Jacques Rousseau. By Frederika Macdonald. 2 vols. Ill. net 24/0
Joseph Jefferson. By Francis Wilson. net 10/6

Miscellaneous

- The Future in America. By H. G. Wells. net 10/6
The Conquest of Bread. By Prince Peter Kropotkin. net 10/6
Morals in Evolution. By L. T. Hobhouse. 2 vols. net 21/0
Carlyle and the London Library. Ed. by Frederic Harrison. net 3/6
The Comedy of Charles Dickens: An Anthology. By Mrs. Perugini. 6/0

Reprints

- The National Edition of Dickens. 40 vols. each net 10/6

Topography and Travel

- The American Scene. By Henry James. net 12/6
The Old Inns of Old England. By Charles G. Harper. 2 vols. Ill. net 42/0

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS

Art

- The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters. IV. Leonardo da Vinci. The Last Supper, from the Fresco in S. Maria della Grazie, Milan. V. Piero Della Francesca. Portrait of an Unknown Lady. Painting now in the Museo Poldi-Pezzoli at Milan Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari. Arranged by E. L. Seeley. net 7/6, 15/0, and 20/0
Phil May's Sketch-Book. 2/6

Biography

- The Real Blake: A Portrait Biography. By Edwin J. Ellis. Ill.
Julie de Lespinasse. By the Marquis de Ségur. Authorised English version. Ill. net 7/6

Fiction

- The Path of Glory. By Georges Ohnet. Translated by F. Rothwell—The Old House at the Corner. By Florence Warden—The Tea-Planter. By F. E. Penny—The Private Detective. By Robert Machray—Israel Rank: The Autobiography of a Criminal. By Roy Horniman—Burnt Spices. By L. S. Gibson—Comet Chaos: A Romance. By Cyril Seymour—A Free Solitude. By Alice Perrin—To Defeat the Ends of Justice. By Herbert Compton—The Man Apart. By Ralph Straus—The Dreams of Simon Usher. By Algernon Gissing each 6/0
The Motormaniacs. By Lloyd Osbourne. 3/6

Miscellaneous

- The Book of Paradise. Trans. and Ed. by E. A. Wallis Budge. 2 vols. net 15/0
A History of Sumeria. By Leonard W. King. Ill. net 20/0
The Annals of Covent Garden Theatre. By Henry Saxe Wyndham. Ill. 2 vols. net 21/0
The History of Devonshire Scenery. By Arthur W. Clayden. Ill. net 10/6
The Romance of the South Seas. By C. L. Wragge. net 7/6

Reprints

- The Poetical Works of William Blake. Ed. by Edwin J. Ellis. Ill. 2 vols. net 12/0 and 15/0

CLARENDON PRESS AND MR. HENRY FROWDE

Biography and Memoirs

- Frederick York Powell: His Life, with a Selection from his Letters and Occasional Writings. By Oliver Elton
Hermann von Helmholtz. By L. Koenigsberger. Trans. by Frances A. Welby

English

- Tudor and Stuart Library:
Mayvett's Defence of the Realme; Howell's Devises; Peacham's Compleat Gentleman; Greville's Life of Sir Philip Sidney; Evelyn's Sculptura; Pepys's Memoires of the Royal Navy
Coleridge's Biographia Literaria. Ed. by J. Shawcross
The Shilburn Ballads. Ed. by Andrew Clarke
A New English Dictionary. Further portions of Vol. VI. (M) by Dr. Bradley, (N) by Mr. Craigie
The Oxford Poets:
Goldsmith, ed. by Austin Dobson; Hood, ed. by W. Jerrold; Keats, ed. by H. Buxton Forman
Oxford Standard Authors:
The above Goldsmith and Hood in a cheaper form; Sheridan's Plays, ed. by Joseph Knight; Scott's Old Mortality.
The World's Classics. More than twenty new vols.
Montaigne: A Study. By R. Warwick Bond
Christabel. Ill. by a facsimile of the MS. and ed. by Ernest Hartley Coleridge

Oxford Library of Translations:

- The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Trans. by John Jackson

Miscellaneous

- Guide to the Bodleian Library. By Andrew Clark. Ill. New College, 1856-1906. by H. B. George
Register of the Members of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford. Vol. V. By W. D. Macray Corolla Numismatica: Numismatic Essays in honour of Barclay V. Head. Ill.
Handbook of the Ila Language. By E. W. Smith

Philosophy and Logic

- The Theory of Good and Evil. By H. Rashdall. 2 vols. Reason, Thought, and Language, or The Many and the One. By Douglas Maclean

Science

- The Oxford Geographies. By A. J. Hebertson. I., Preliminary
The Dawn of Modern Geography. By C. R. Beazley. Vol. III.
The Evolution of Culture and other Essays. By the late Lieut.-General A. Lane-Fox Pitt-Rivers
A Catalogue of the Herbarium of Dillenius. By G. Claridge Druce and S. H. Vines

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & Co.

Biography

- Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn. By Elizabeth Bisland. Ill. 2 vols. net 24/0
The King of Court Poets: A Study of Ariosto. By E. Gardner. Ill. net 16/0
Letters and Recollections of George Washington. Ill. net 12/6
Walt Whitman. By Bliss Perry. Ill. net 6/0
William Stubbs, Bishop of Oxford. By W. H. Hutton. Ill. net 6/0
The Life of C. G. Leland. By Mrs. Pennell. 2 vols. Ill. net 21/0
The Travels of the King: Charles II. in Germany and Flanders. By Eva Scott. net 15/0

Fiction

- The Treasure of Heaven, by Marie Corelli—Growth, by Graham Travers—Holyland, by G. Frenssen—The Incomplete Amorist, by E. Nesbit—The Eight Guests, by Percy White—Montlivet, by Alice Prescott Smith—The Woman's Victory, by Maarten Maartens—The Country Road, by Alice Brown—The Opened Shutters, by Clara Louise Burnham—The Man in the Case, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. each 6/0
Iole. By R. W. Chambers. 5/0
Peter, A Christmas Story. By Mrs. Edwin Hohler. Ill. 3/6
A Knight of the Cumberland. By John Fox. Ill. net 3/6

History

- Golden Days of the Renaissance in Rome. By R. Lanciani. Ill. net 21/0
Edinburgh under Sir Walter Scott. By W. T. Fyfe. net 12/6

Literature

- Victorian Novelists. By Lewis Melville. Ill.net 12/6
 Studies in Seven Arts. By Arthur Symondsnet 8/6
 American Literary Masters. By L. H. Vincentnet 8/6
 A Treasury of English Literature. By Kate M. Warren net 7/6

Natural History

- The Flock. By Mary Austennet 8/6
 Animal Heroes. By Ernest Thompson Seton. Ill.net 6/0

Philosophy and Politics

- The Subconscious. By Professor Jastrownet 10/0
 Harvard Psychological Studies. By Hugo Munsterberg.
 Vols. I. and II.
 Spinoza: A Handbook to the Ethics. By J. A. Picton
 Elements of Political Science. By S. Leacocknet 7/6
 English Parliamentary Procedure. By A. E. Steinthal
 The Native Races of the British Empire—Australia—British Central Africa—British North America. Ill. each net 6/0

Poetry

- The Crackling of Thorns. By Dum Dumnet 3/6
 Bird and Bough. By John Burroughsnet 4/6

Travel

- My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East. By Moncure
 D. Conwaynet 12/6

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co.Biography and Memoirs

- Sigismondo Malatesta. By Edward Hutton. Ill.net 16/0
 Court Life in the Dutch Republic. By the Baroness Suzette van Zuylen van Nyevelt. Ill.net 16/0
 Vittoria Colonna. By Maud F. Jerrold. Ill.net 10/6

Drama

- Constantine the Great: A Tragedy. By Newman Howard
 net 4/6
 St. Agnes and other Dramas. By E. G. Hains

Fiction

- The Plough of Shame. By Mary Bradford Whiting

Literature

- Fairy Gold: Old English Fairy Tales. Ed. by Ernest
 Rhys. Ill.net 5/0
 Loose Beads. By Katharine Burrillnet 3/6
 A Little Book of Courtesies. By Katharine Tynan. Ill. net 2/0
 Shades of Eternity. By H. B. Shephardnet 2/6
 The Vagabond in Literature. By Arthur Rickett.net 4/6

Travel and Topography

- The Heart of England. By Edward Thomas. Ill.net 21/0
 Touraine and Its Story. By Anne Macdonell. Ill.net 21/0
 In Constable's Country. By H. W. Tompkins. Ill.net 12/6
 Picturesque Brittany. By Mrs. Arthur Bell. Ill.net 10/6
 The College Monographs. Ill. by E. H. New.each net 2/0

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & Co.Art

- Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen: A Study of Mediæval Building. By W. R. Lethaby. Ill.net 12/6
 The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci. By Edward McCurdy. Ill.net 8/0
 Sir William Beechey. By W. Roberts. Ill.net 7/6
 Correggio. By T. Sturge Moore. Ill.net 7/6
 Antonio and Piero Pollaiuolo. By Maud Cruttwell. Ill. net 7/6
 The Interpretation of Nature in Earlier Greek Art. By Prof. Emanuel Löwy. Trans. by John Fothergill. Ill. net 5/0
 The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. By Ford Madox
 Hueffer—Watteau. By C. Maclair—Perugino. By Edward Hutton. Ill.each net 2/0 and 2/6

Biography

- The Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen. By Frederic
 William Maitland. Ill.net 18/0

Fiction

- His People. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham—Old Fireproof: Being the Chaplain's Story. By Owen Rhoscomyl
 —Human Toll. By Barbara Baynton.each 6/0
 A New Book for Children. By Lord Alfred Douglas. Ill. 3/6

Miscellaneous

- The Future of Japan. By W. Petrie Watson.net 10/6
 Life and Evolution. By F. W. Headley. Ill.net 8/0
 Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes. By Lina Eckensteinnet 3/6

Poetry

- The Dawn in Britain. By Charles M. Doughty. 6 vols.
 each net 4/6
 Tristram and Iseult. By J. Comyns Carrnet 1/6 and 2/0

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANNArt

- The King's Pictures. Vol. II., Windsor Castle Collection.
 Introduction and Text by L. Cust. Ill.net 546/0 and 420/0
 The Drawings of Jean François Millet. By Léonce Bene-dite. Ill.net 126/0 and 84/0
 Versailles and the Trianons. By Pierre de Nolhac. Ill.
 net 42/0 and 16/0

Biography

- Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving. By Bram
 Stoker. 2 vols. Ill.net 25/0
 The Early Life of George Brandes. By Himselfnet 10/0
 Madame Récamier. By Edouard Herriot. Ill. 2 vols.
 net 20/0
 Napoleon, King of Elba. From the French of Paul Gruyer.
 Ill.net 10/0
 The Flight of Marie Antoinette. From the French of
 G. Lenotre. Ill.net 10/0

Fiction

- Paul. By E. F. Benson—The Pulse of Life. By Mrs.
 Belloc Lowndes—The Swimmers. By E. S. Rorison—
 The White Darkness and other Stories. By Lawrence
 Mott—The Moonface, and other Stories. By Jack London —Unemployed, Limited. By James Blyth—Love's
 Trilogy. By Peter Nansen—The Trail Together. By H. H. Bashford—Memoirs of a Person of Quality. By Ashton Villiers—The Expensive Miss du Cane. By S.
 Macnaghteneach 6/0
 Our Lady of the Beeches. By the Baroness von Hutten.
 Ill.net 4/0
 Time and the Gods. By Lord Dunsany. Ill.net 6/0

History

- France in 1802. From the Letters of Henry Redhead
 Yorkenet 6/0
 The Roman Capitol in Ancient and Modern Times. By E.
 Rodocanachi. Ill.net 4/0
 The World's History. Vol. V., Eastern Europe. Ill.
 net 21/0 and 15/0
 History for Ready Reference. By J. N. Larned. 6 vols.
 net 126/0 and 168/0

Literature

- The Works of Henrik Ibsen. Revised and ed. by William Archer. In 11 monthly vols.each 5/0
 The Novels of Ivan Turgenev. Trans. by Constance
 Garnett. 15 vols. Ill.net 60/0
 Illustrated Cameos of Literature:
 Anatole France, by George Brandes; Aristotle, by Fritz Mauthnereach net 1/6
 Contemporary Men of Letters:
 George Meredith, by G. K. Chestertonnet 1/6
 Literatures of the World:
 Hungarian Literature, by F. Riedl 6/0
 A Volume of Essays. By Count Tolstoy 3/6

Miscellaneous

- A Countryside Chronicle. By S. L. Bensusan. Ill.net 7/6
 Modern Housecraft. By Lucy H. Yates.net 2/6
 The Garden Library:
 Roses, and How to Grow Them; Ferns, and How to Grow Them. Ill.each net 2/6
 The Criminal Prosecution and Capital Punishment of Animals. By E. P. Evansnet 7/6

Poetry and Drama

- His House in Order. By A. W. Pinero.2/6 and 1/6
 The Fool of the World, and other Poems. By Arthur
 Symondsnet 5/0
 On the Death of Madonna Laura. By Francesca Petrarca.
 Trans. by Agnes Tobinnet 7/6

Science

- A Handbook of Metabolism. By C. von Noorden. 3 vols. 63/0
 Medical Hygiene. By E. Metchnikoff. 2/6

Sport

- Eclipse and the Modern Thoroughbred. Compiled by Theodore Andrea Cook. Ill.net 21/0
 The Dog Book. By James Watson. Ill.net 42/0
 The Fine Art of Jujutsu. By Mrs. Roger Watts. Ill. 6/0
 Motors and Men. By Henry Norman. Ill.net 6/0

Travel

- The Desert and the Sown: Tales of Syrian Travel. By Gertrude Lowthian Bell. Ill.net 16/0

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON

Art

- Staffordshire Pots and Potters. By G. Woolliscroft Rhead and F. Rhead. Ill.net 21/0
The Art Crafts for Beginners. By Frank G. Sandford. Ill.net 3/6
British Trees. Described by Rex Vicat Cole. 2 vols. Ill.net 34/0

Biography

- Sir Joshua and His Circle. By Fitzgerald Molloy. 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
The House of Howard. By Gerald Brenan. 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
The First Gentleman of Europe. By Lewis Melville. 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
Memoirs of Malakoff. Ed. by R. M. Johnston. In 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
Talleyrand. By Joseph McCabe. Ill.net 16/0

Fiction

- The Far Horizon. By Lucas Malet—A Morganatic Marriage. By Carlton Dawe—Beyond the Wall. By J. H. Yoxall, M.P.—Mrs. Dimmock's Worries. By B. L. Farjeon—A Vain Thing. By Guy Thorne—Prisoners. By Mary Cholmondeley—The Belle of Vaudroy. By G. B. Burgin—The Fruit of the Tree. By Wm. Teignmouth Shore and Florence Teignmouth Shore—A Dull Girl's Destiny. By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds—The Ring of Day. By Mary Butler—Guy Fulkles of the Towers. By Evelyn Everett Green—Smoke in the Flame. By "Iota"—The Strayings of Sandy. By Dorothea Conyers—The Trampling of the Lilies. By Rafael Sabatini—In Thrall. By Olive Christian Malvery—Fifty-two new Stories for Boys; Fifty-two new Stories for Girls; Fifty-two Pioneer Stories, all round the compass. All ed. by A. H. Miles.....each net 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Living Races of Mankind. 2 vols. Ill.net 21/0
The Living Animals of the World. Ed. by Charles J. Cornish. In fortnightly parts. Ill.each net 0/7

Travel

- Under the Syrian Sun. By A. C. Inchbold. 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
Carthage and Tunis. By Douglas Sladen. 2 vols. Ill.net 24/0
Algiers and Beyond. By M. W. Hilton-Simpson. Ill.net 12/0

MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK

Children's Books

- The Child's Life of Jesus. By Rev. C. M. Steedman. Ill. net 10/6
The Enchanted Land: Tales Told Again. By Louey Chisholm—The Golden Staircase: Poems chosen for Children. By Louey Chisholm—Scotland's Story: By H. E. Marshall. Ill.each net 7/6
Robin Hood: His Deeds and Adventures as Recounted in the Old English Ballads. Ill.net 4/0

Reprints

- The Golden Poets:
Spenser, ed. by W. B. Yeats; Whittier, ed. by A. C. Benson; Coleridge, ed. by Prof. Dowden; Tennyson, ed. by Prof. H. J. C. Grierson; Longfellow, ed. by Prof. G. Saintsbury; Scott, ed. by O. Smeaton; Wordsworth, ed. by Prof. W. MacN. Dixon; Herick, ed. by Canon Beeching; Byron, ed. by C. Whibley; Keats, ed. by A. Symons; Shelley, ed. by Prof. J. Churton Collins; Brownin ed. by Augustine Birrell. Ill.each net 2/6

MR. CHARLES H. KELLY

- Ithuriel's Spear. By W. H. Fitchett, B.A. 6/0
The Story of Hedgerow and Pond. By R. B. Lodge .net 5/0
Life and Adventure beyond Jordan. By G. Robinson Lees, B.A.net 5/0
Persecution in the Early Church. By Rev. H. B. Workman Limitations, Divine and Human. By Rev. W. F. Slater, M.A.
Padri Elliott of Faizabad. Prepared by Mrs. Elliott, and ed. by Rev. A. W. Newbould. Ill. 3/6
The Story of Richard Martin. By Joseph Dawson. Ill. 3/6
Ebenezer E. Jenkins. By J. H. Jenkins, M.A. 3/6
Everyday Life in Bengal, and other Indian Sketches. By W. H. Hart. Ill. 3/6
The Skipper Parson in the Bays and Barrens of Newfoundland. By James Lumsden. Ill. 2/6
The Citizen of To-morrow. Ed. S. E. Keeble.....net 2/0

- The Burning Heart. By John Bamford—The Poetry of the Upward Way. By W. Martin Pope—A Young Man's Bookshelf. By Geo. Jacksoneach net 1/6
The Library of Methodist Biography: James Smetham, Painter, Poet, Essayist—Thomas Walsh—John and Mary Fletchereach net 1/0 and 1/6
Methodist Missionary Library: David Hill, apostle to the Chinese—John Hunt, Pioneer Missionary and Saint—Chu and Lo, two Chinese Pastorseach net 1/0 and 1/6

MR. JOHN LANE

Art

- The Thames from Chelsea to the Nore. 31 lithographs. By T. R. Way. Text by W. G. Bell.....net 42/0
A Portfolio of Aubrey Beardsley's Drawings illustrating Salomenet 12/6

Biography and Memoirs

- Women of the Second Empire. By F. Loliée. Trans. by Alice Ivimy. Ill.net 21/0
A Queen of Indiscretions. The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. By G. P. Clerici. Trans. by F. Chapmannet 21/0
The House in St. Martin's Street. Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. By Constance Hill.....net 21/0
Letters and Journals of Samuel Gridley Howe. Ed. by his daughter Laura E. Richards.....net 16/0
Memoirs of the Count de Cartrie. Ill.net 16/0
Stars of the Stage. Ed. by J. T. Grein. A W. Pinero, by E. A. Baughan; George Alexander, by Mrs. Teignmouth Shore; J. M. Barrie, by Edith A. Browneeach net 2/6

Fiction

- The Dangerville Inheritance. By A. C. Fox-Davies—The Field of Glory. By H. Sienkiewicz—The Strongest Plume. By Hugh de Selincourt—The Master-Man—The Beloved Vagabond. By W. J. Locke—The Wilderness. By T. B. Clegg—Companions in the Sierra. By Charles Rudy—Rhoda in Between. By E. R. Punshon—A Voyage of Discovery. By Guy Flemingeach 6/0
Tales of Jack and Jane. By Charles Young..... 3/6

Miscellaneous

- Herald Badges. By A. C. Fox-Davies. Ill.net 5/0
The Art of Thinking. By Mrs. E. Eastwick.....net 1/0
The County Handbooks. The Stable Handbook. By T. F. Dalenet 3/0
Handbooks of Practical Gardening. The Book of Pruning and Grafting, by R. Lewis Castle; The Book of the Flower Show, by C. H. Curtis; The Book of the Chrysanthemum, by P. S. Follwilleach net 2/6
British Malaya: An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence. By Sir F. A. Swettenham. Ill.net 16/0

Music

- The Music of To-morrow and other Studies. By Lawrence Gilmannet 5/0
Living Masters of Music. Richard Strauss, by A. Kalisch; Paderewski, by E. A. Baughan; Alfred Bruneau, by A. Hervey; Puccini, by Wakeling Dry each net 2/6
The Music of the Masters. Wagner, by Ernest Newman; Tchaikovsky, by E. Markham Lee; Beethoven, by Ernest Walker; Elgar, by E. Newman.... each net 2/6

Poetry and Belles Lettres

- Gold, Frankincense and Myrrh and Other Pageants. By W. Graham Robertson. Ill. by the Author.....net 7/6
Winged Wordsnet 7/6
The Secret Life: Being the Book of a Heretic..... 6/0
Stray Leaves. By Herbert Paul..... 5/0
Out of the Silence. By James Rhoadesnet 1/0
Night and Morning: A poem. By K. S. Trask..net 3/6
Songs to Desideria. By the Hon. Stephen Coleridge..net 3/6
Ledgers and Literature: Being the Recreations of a Book-keeper. By George Knollysnet 3/6
The Old Man Book-Rhymes. By T. P. Stone. Ill. by C. G. Holme 3/6

Reprints

- Gilchrist's Life of Blake. Ed. W. Graham Robertson. Ill.net 10/6
Salome. Trans. from the French of Oscar Wilde. With 16 full-page illustrations by Aubrey Beardsleynet 10/6
Salome. Trans. from the French of Oscar Wilde. With a cover design by Aubrey Beardsley.....net 2/6
The Poems of S. T. Coleridge. Ed. E. H. Coleridge. Ill.net 7/6
The Sacred Treasury. The Hundred Best Poems of John and Charles Wesley; The Spirit of Love, by William Laweach net 2/0 and 2/6

Travel

- A Cruise across Europe. By Donald Maxwell. Ill. net 10/6
 From Fox's Earth to Mountain Tarn. By J. H. Crawford. Ill. net 10/6

MR. WERNER LAURIEFiction

- The Sinews of War. By Eden Phillpotts and Arnold Bennett—The Workaday Woman. By Violet Hunt—A King's Wife. By Hélène Vacaresco—The Salving of a Derelict. By Maurice Drake—The Last Miracle. By M. P. Shiel

Miscellaneous

- Lotus Land. By P. A. Thompson. Ill.
 Camp Fires in the Canadian Rockies. By William T. Hornaday. Ill.
 The Cathedrals of Northern Spain. By C. Rudy. Ill.
 The Cathedrals of England and Wales. By T. Francis Bumpus. Vol. III.
 Literary London. By Elsie M. Lang. Ill.
 Sketches in Normandy. By Louis Becke

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.Biography and Memoirs

- H.R.H. George Duke of Cambridge, 1819-1903. Ed. by the Rev. Edgar Sheppard. 2 vols. net 24/0
 Life and Letters of The First Earl of Durham, 1792-1840. By Stuart J. Reid. Ill. 2 vols. net 36/0
 Personal and Literary Letters of Robert First Earl of Lytton. Ed. by Lady Betty Balfour. Ill. 2 vols. net 21/0
 Correspondence of Two Brothers, Edward Adolphus, 11th Duke of Somerset, and his Brother, Lord Webb Seymour, 1800-1819, and after. Ed. by Lady Guendolen Ramsden. Ill. net 15/0
 Recollections of a Lucknow Veteran, 1845-1876. By Major-General J. Ruggles
 A Great Archbishop of Dublin, William King (1650-1729), his autobiography, etc. Ed. by Sir Charles Scrivener King, Bart. Ill. net 10/6
 John Mason Neale. By Mrs. Charles Towle. net 10/6

Classics

- Homer and his Age. By Andrew Lang. Ill. net 12/6

Economics and Sociology

- Woman, her position and influence in ancient Greece and Rome, and among the early Christians. By James Donaldson
 A Reconstruction of the Science and Art of Political Economy. By J. Beattie Crozier. net 12/6

Fiction

- Some Irish Yesterdays, Stories and Sketches. By E. OE. Somerville and Martin Ross—The Orange Fairy Book. Ed. by Andrew Lang—The Golliwogg's Desert Island. By Florence K. and Bertha Upton. Ill. each 6/0
 The Old Roof Tree: Letters of Isabel Carnegie to her Half-Brother Mark Latimer (August-January). net 5/0
 The Magic Whistle and other Fairy-Tale Plays. By Frank Nisbett. Ill.
 The Master Touch: a Story. By W. Q. net 1/0

History and Law

- International Documents. Ed. by E. A. Whittuck
 A History of Diplomacy in the International Development of Europe. By D. J. Hill. In six vols. Vol. II.
 The English in America. By J. A. Doyle. The Middle Colonies. The Colonies under the House of Hanover each net 14/0
 English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb net 16/0
 A Smaller Social History of Ancient Ireland. By P. W. Joyce. Ill. net 3/6
 The Political History of England. Vol. IV. 1387-1485. By C. Oman net 7/6
 Heroes of European History. By Louise Creighton. Ill. net 1/6

Reprints

- Memoir of Thomas Hill Green. By R. L. Nettleship. With a Preface by Mrs. T. H. Green. Ill. net 4/6

Science and Medicine

- The Mammals of Great Britain and Ireland. By J. G. Millais. Vol. III. Ill. Three vols. net 126/0
 Essays in Pastoral Medicine. By Austin O'Malley. net 10/6

- School Hygiene and the Laws of Health. By Charles Porter

- Medico-Chirurgical Transactions, published by the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London. Vol. 89 net 23/0
 Producer Gas. By J. Emerson Dowson and A. T. Larter Ill. net 10/6
 A History of Chemistry. By F. P. Armitage. 6/0
 The Electron Theory: a Popular Introduction to the New Theory of Electricity and Magnetism. By E. E. Fournier net 5/0
 The Mathematical Papers of Josiah Willard Gibbs. In 2 vols. Ill. net

Sport

- The Old Surrey Fox Hounds: a History of the Hunt. By Humphrey R. Taylor. Ed. by H. G. Harper. net 10/6
 Annals of the Corinthian Football Club. By B. O. Corbett

Theology

- Twenty Years of Continental Work and Travel. By the Rt. Rev. Bishop Wilkinson
 The Servant of Jehovah. By the Rev. G. C. Workman
 The Example of Our Lord, especially for His Ministers. By the Rt. Rev. A. C. A. Hall. net 2/6
 Liberty and Other Sermons. By the Rt. Rev. Bishop Brent net 3/6
 Stoic and Christian in the Second Century. By Leonard Alston net 3/0
 A Short History of the Oxford Movement. By Sir Samuel Hall net 4/6
 Practice and Science of Religion. By James Haughton Woods net 3/6
 The Problem of the Pentateuch. By Randolph H. McKim net 3/6
 Faith and Freedom: By An Oxford Layman net 1/0
 The Temptation of Our Lord Considered in its Relation to the Ministry. By the Rev. H. J. Corbett Knight
 Corpus Christi, and Other Essays. By the Rev. Robert Vaughan net 4/0
 The Oxford Library of Practical Theology. The Atonement. By the Rev. Leighton Pullman. net 5/0
 Handbooks for the Clergy. Preparation for Confirmation. By the Rev. J. P. Maud. net 2/6
 Through Man to God. By George A. Gordon net 6/0
 History of the Society of Jesus in North America: Colonial and Federal. By Thomas Hughes, of the same Society. Text: Vol. I.—From the First Colonisation till 1645
 Early Essays and Lectures. By Canon Sheehan net 6/0

Travel

- Helouan: An Egyptian Health Resort, and How to Reach It. By H. Overton Hobson. Ill. net 2/6

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.Archæology

- Life in Ancient Athens. By T. G. Tucker. Ill.
 The Santuario of the Madonna di Vico., Pantheon of Charles Emanuel I. of Savoy. By L. Melano Rossi. Ill.

Art

- Crome's Etchings. By H. S. Theobald net 10/6
 Costume: Fanciful, Historical, and Theatrical. By Mrs. Aria. Ill. by Percy Anderson net 10/9

Biography and Memoirs

- Memories and Thoughts. By Frederic Harrison. net 8/6
 The Diary of John Evelyn. Ed. by Austin Dobson. In 3 vols. net 31/6
 Paradise Row: Or a Broken Piece of old Chelsea. By Reginald Blunt Ill. net 10/6 and 21/0

Economics

- Protective and Preferential Import Duties. By A. C. Pigou
 Municipal Trading. By Lord Avelbury

Ethnology

- Adonis, Attis, Osiris. By J. G. Frazer net 10/0
 The Todas. By W. H. R. Rivers. Ill.
 Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula. By Walter William Skeat and C. O. Blagden. 2 vols.
 The Lower Niger and its Tribes. By Major A. Glyn Leonard
 At the Back of the Black Man's Mind: Or Notes on the Kingly Office in West Africa. By R. E. Dennett. Ill.

Fiction

- Puck of Pook's Hill. By Rudyard Kipling—A Lady of Rome. By F. Marion Crawford—In the Days of the Comet. By H. G. Wells—Disenchanted (Désenchantées). By Pierre Loti—Running Horse Inn. By A. T. Sheppard—Her Majesty's Rebels. By S. R. Lysaght—No Friend Like a Sister. By Rosa N. Carey—The Enemy's Camp. By H. Sheringham and N. Meakin—Andrew Goodfellow. By Mrs. H. A. Watson. each 6/0
 Jasper: A Story for Children. By Mrs. Molesworth 4/6

NEW AUTUMN BOOKS

MEMOIRS OF THE
COUNT DE CARTRIE

A Record of the Extraordinary Events in the Life of a French Royalist during the War in La Vendée, and of his Flight to Southampton, where he followed the humble occupation of Gardener. With an Introduction by FREDERIC MASSON, Appendices and Notes by PIERRE AMEDEE PICHOT and other hands, and numerous Illustrations, including a Photogravure Portrait of the Author. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

Tribune.—"Mr. John Lane is to be heartily congratulated upon a literary find as remarkable as it is historically valuable. . . . A remarkable narrative."

STRAY LEAVES

By HERBERT PAUL, M.P., Author of "Men and Letters." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Daily Graphic.—"It is long since we have met so brilliant a collection of essays as Mr. Paul's."

THE SECRET LIFE

Being the Book of a Heretic. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Scotsman.—"The freshness and frankness of her views, and her crisp and nervous manner of expressing them, are something more than attractive."

FROM FOX'S EARTH TO MOUNTAIN TARN

Days among the Wild Animals of Scotland. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"It springs fresh and informed from a true love of nature, and from a long acquaintance with her in all her moods. It is written by a man who has the seeing eye for nature—and that means sympathy; by one who can really present her in words, never an easy thing."

SALOME SALOME

A Tragedy in One Act. From the French of OSCAR WILDE. Edited, with Introduction, by ROBERT ROSS. With 17 Full-Page Illustrations by AUBREY BEARDSLEY. Fcap. 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

Also AUBREY BEARDSLEY'S ILLUSTRATIONS to SALOME, R. produced for the first time the actual size of the Originals. Published in a PORTFOLIO at 12s. 6d. net.

LEDGERS AND LITERATURE

Being the Recreations of a Book-keeper. By GEORGE KNOLLYS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Six-Shilling Novels

THE WILDERNESS
THE WILDERNESS

By T. B. CLEGG, Author of "The Love Child."

[Just published.]

THE MASTER-MAN

A new American novel.

[Just published.]

Speaker.—"A charming story . . . the novel is delightfully fresh and natural."

THE MORALS OF
MARCUS ORDEYNE

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE, Author of "Derelict," etc.

"The dramatic version of Mr. Locke's remarkable novel is as great a success as the book itself. In the hands of Miss Alexandra Carlisle and Mr. C. Aubrey Smith, Carlotta and Marcus are earning golden opinions from both press and public. Those who made the acquaintance of this pair at the Garrick Theatre will gladly renew it in reading the novel."

Mr. LANE has in active preparation Mr. LOCKE'S new Novel, THE BELOVED VAGABOND, which he will publish EARLY IN OCTOBER.

THE UNDYING PAST

By HERMANN SUDERMANN. Translated by BEATRICE MARSHALL.

Standard.—"It is practically impossible to have anything but praise for this powerful and virile translation of Sudermann's impressive work."

THE FIELD OF GLORY

By HENRY SIENKIEWICZ, Author of "Quo Vadis?"

Speaker.—"A spirited, picturesque romance."

THE BRIDAL OF ANSTACE

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "The Winning Road."

Westminster Gazette.—"Miss Elizabeth Godfrey's book is so instinct with charm, so full of individual atmosphere, of sweet sympathy and wide-eyed comprehension of human nature, that one finds it difficult to realise it is actually a novel and not a piece of life lived out before our eyes—a piece of life in which we have been sympathetic, intimate onlookers."

JOHN LANE,

The Bodley Head, London and New York.

Messrs. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

CORRESPONDENCE OF TWO BROTHERS

Edward Adolphus, 11th Duke of Somerset, and his Brother, Lord Webb Seymour, 1800-1819, and after.

Edited by LADY GUENDOLEN RAMSDEN.

With 3 Portraits and 3 other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net.

These two brothers, the sole family of the tenth Duke of Somerset, added to the lustre of their name by distinction in scholarship. At Oxford Lord Webb devoted himself to study in a spirit of earnestness seldom known among students of his rank, and in 1797 he went to Edinburgh to prosecute his investigations into moral and physical philosophy. Here he met many distinguished men, among whom were John Playfair, the eminent mathematician. Sydney Smith, Francis Horner, Francis Jeffrey, and Henry Hallam. Letters to or from these and many other famous men will be found in this volume, as well as selections from the correspondence that passed between Lord Webb Seymour and his brother the Duke of Somerset, Lord Webb died unmarried in 1819, the year also of his friend Playfair's death.

Edward Adolphus, the eleventh Duke of Somerset, was President of the Royal Institution of Great Britain from 1827 to 1842, and published books on geometry—a "Treatise on the Properties of the Ellipse, etc.," and "Alternate Circles," etc.

Lady Guendolen Ramsden, who edits the book, is a daughter of the twelfth Duke of Somerset.

NEW BOOK BY CANON SHEEHAN.

EARLY ESSAYS AND LECTURES. By Canon SHEEHAN,

D.D., Author of "My New Curate," "Luke Delmege," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

ESSAYS: Religious Instruction in Intermediate Schools—In a Dublin Art Gallery—Emerson—Free-thought in America—German Universities (Three Essays)—German and Gallic Muses—Augustinian Literature—The Poetry of Matthew Arnold—Recent Works on St. Augustine—Aubrey de Vere (a Study). LECTURES: Irish Youth and High Ideals—The Two Civilisations—The Golden Jubilee of O'Connell's Death—Our Personal and Social Responsibilities—The Study of Mental Science—Certain Elements of Character—The Limitations and Possibilities of Catholic Literature.

WITH A PREFACE SPECIALLY WRITTEN FOR THE ENGLISH EDITION BY M. E. SADLER, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY AND ADMINISTRATION OF EDUCATION, UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

THE GERMAN UNIVERSITIES AND UNIVERSITY

STUDY. By FRIEDERICH PAULSEN, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Berlin. Authorised Translation by FRANK THILLY, Professor of Psychology in Princeton University, and WILLIAM W. ELWANG. 8vo, 15s. net.

"We have here a book which has been wanted for some time. . . . It is a truly monumental work, filled with information which will be useful to lecturers, students, and experts alike, and inspiring them at the same time with all sorts of valuable hints and suggestions on matters connected with their work. . . . In short, the book is a most stimulating contribution to our educational literature. The author has a thorough grip of his subject, and much that he says of his own system is applicable, mutatis mutandis, to ours."—SCHOOL.

"Prof. Paulsen's book abounds in suggestion, and we commend it especially to those who are connected with the new Universities in the big towns."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

A HISTORY OF MODERN LIBERTY. By JAMES MAC-

KINNON, Ph. D., Author of "The History of Edward III," etc. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net. VOL. I. INTRODUCTION (ORIGINS—THE MIDDLE AGES). VOL. II. THE AGE OF THE REFORMATION.

"The book is a work of real importance, controvertible necessarily in some of its judgments, but reasonable and essentially a historical as distinguished from a merely theoretical or argumentative work. To a theme of the profoundest interest Dr. Mackinnon does justice in these volumes, and the sequel will be awaited with no inconsiderable degree of interest."—ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

SYNTHETICA: being Meditations Epistemological

AND ONTOLOGICAL; comprising the Edinburgh University Gifford Lectures of 1905-6. By S. S. LAURIE, LL.D. 2 vols. 8vo. (Vol. I. Book I.—ON KNOWLEDGE; Vol. II. Book II.—ON GOD AND MAN.) 21s. net.

A HISTORY OF CHEMISTRY. By F. P. ARMITAGE, M.A.,

F.C.S., late Exhibitioner of Magdalen College, Oxford, Assistant Master at St. Paul's School. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A GREAT ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN, WILLIAM

KING, D.D., 1650-1729; his Autobiography, Family, and a Selection from his Correspondence. Edited by Sir CHARLES SIMON KING, Bart. With 7 Plates and 4 Illustrations in Text. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

By Sir SAMUEL HALL, M.A., K.C., formerly Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

A DISCREPANT WORLD. Being an Essay in Fiction.

By the Author of "Through Spectacles of Feeling," "The Haggard Side," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A story of unusual literary merit. . . . Altogether, it is a delightful book, over which we should like to linger, a book that, quite unlike 'Cranford,' yet possesses so much of the same charm which differentiates Mrs. Gaskell's masterpiece from the rest of her writings. . . . It is, however, not by its story that this book charms us, it is by the admirable manner of its presentation, the simple, unforced portraiture of diverse people, the pleasant literary style, and the wit and humour which irradiate the whole."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

History

- Lectures on Modern History. By the Late Lord Acton net 10/0
 A History of the British Army. By the Hon. J. W. Fortescue. Vol. IV. 1789-1801. With a separate vol. of maps net 42/0
 A History of Modern England. By Herbert Paul. In five vols. Vol. V., 1885-1895 net 8/6

Law

- Playright and Copyright in all Countries. By W. Morris Colles and Harold Hardy

Literature

- English Literature from the Norman Conquest to Chaucer. By W. H. Schofield 7/6

Philosophy

- An Outline of the Idealistic Construction of Experience. By J. B. Baillie net 18/6
 The Structure and Growth of the Mind. By W. Mitchell
 Studies in Humanism. By F. C. S. Schiller Great Moral Teachers—Confucius, Gotama, Socrates, Epictetus. By Canon E. R. Bernard net 3/6

Poetry

- Silverleaf and Oak. By Lance Fallaw
 Ronsard and Le Pléiade. With selections and translations
 by George Wyndham
 An Anthology of Australian Verse. Ed. by Bertram
 Stevens net 2/6 and 3/6

Science

- Cambridge Natural History. Vol. I. Protozoa, M.
 Hartog—Porifera, by I. B. J. Sollas. Coelenterata and Ctenophora, by S. J. Hickson. Echinodermata, by E. W.
 MacBride net 17/0

Sociology

- The Family. By Helen Bosanquet net 8/6
 The Pattern Nation. By Sir H. Wrixon net 3/0
 The Making of the Criminal. By C. E. B. Russell and
 L. M. Rigby

Theology

- The Apocalypse of St. John. Ed. by H. B. Swete 15/0
 St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. Ed. by Bishop Westcott 10/6
 Village Sermons. By Bishop Westcott
 A Layman's Mind on Creed and Church. By J. S. Templeton
 A History of the Christian Church from the Reformation to the Present Time. By Archdeacon Cheetham
 Points of Church Law. By C. J. Sturge
 Truth in Religion, and Other Sermons. By Claude G.
 Montefiore

Travel

- The Fair Hills of Ireland. By Stephen Gwynn. Ill. by
 Hugh Thomson 6/0
 Untravelled England. By J. J. Hissey. Ill.
 Highways and Byways Series. Berkshire. By J. E.
 Vincent. Ill. 6/0

MESSRS. MAUNSEL & Co.

- The Fair Hills of Ireland. By Stephen Gwynn. Ill. by
 Hugh Thomson 6/0
 Poems, 1899-1905. By W. B. Yeats net 6/0
 The Aran Islands. By J. M. Synge. Ill. by Jack B.
 Yeats net 21/0 and 5/0
 Memoirs of Miles Byrne. 2 vols. 15/0
 The Northern Leaders of '98. By F. J. Bigger. II.,
 Henry Monro net 1/0
 Economics for Irishmen. By Pat net 2/0 and 1/0
 The Quest: A Book of Poems. By J. H. Cousins. net 2/6
 The Fiddler's Daughter: A Play. By Padraic Colum. net 1/0
 The Tower Press Booklets. Second series by Charles Weeks, Padraic Colum, Eva Gore-Booth, J. H. Orivel, George
 Roberts, Maurice Joy the set 5/0

MR. ANDREW MELROSEChildren's Books

- The Book of Animals. By Horace G. Groser. Ill. net 5/0
 The World's Exploration Story. By Albert Lee 5/0
 The Book of the V.C. By A. L. Haydon. Ill. 3/6

Fiction

- A Motherless Maid. By Evelyn Everett-Green. Ill. 3/6
 A Girl of Dreams. By Lily Watson. Ill. 3/6

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co.Archæology

- Antiquary's Books. The Bells of England. By Canon J. J.
 Raven—The Domesday Inquest. By Adolphus Ballard. Ill. each net 7/6

Art

- The Connoisseur's Library. European Enamels. By H.
 Cunynghame. English Coloured Books. By Martin
 Hardie. Glass. By E. Dillon. Ill. each net 25/0
 William Blake. By Laurence Binyon. In 2 vols. Vol. I.
 Illustrations of the Book of Job. per 2 vols. net 21/0
 A Book of English Gardens. By Kate Wyatt and M. R.
 Gloag. Ill. net 10/6
 The Complete Photographer. By R. C. Bayley. Ill. net 10/6
 Classics of Art:
 The Art of the Greeks. By H. B. Walters net 12/6
 Velazquez. By H. de Bernete. Ill. net 10/6
 The Child in Art. By Margaret Carpenter. Ill. 6/0
 Aims and Ideals in Art. By George Clausen. Ill. 5/0
 A Glossary of Terms used in English Architecture. By
 T. D. Atkinson. Ill. net 3/6
 Little Books on Art. Enamels. By Mrs. Nelson Dawson.
 The Arts of Japan. By E. Dillon. Ill. each net 2/6

Biography and Memoirs

- From Midshipman to Field-Marshal. By F.-M. Sir Evelyn
 Wood. Two vols. Ill. net 25/0
 Beauties of the Seventeenth Century. By Allan Fea. Ill. net 12/6
 Garrick and his Circle. By Mrs. Clement Parsons. Ill. net 12/6
 George Herbert and his Times. By A. G. Hyde. Ill. net 10/6
 The Last of the Royal Stuarts: Henry Cardinal Duke of York. By H. M. Vaughan. Ill. net 10/6
 The Letters of William Blake, With a Life by Frederick
 Tatham. Edited by A. G. B. Russell. Ill. net 7/6
 Charles Dickens. By G. K. Chesterton. Ill. net 7/6
 St. Catherine of Siena and her Times. By the Author of "Mile. Mori." Ill. net 7/6
 Queen Louisa of Prussia. By Mary M. Moffat. Ill. net 7/6
 Thomas à Kempis, His Age and Work. By J. E. G. de Montmorency. Ill. net 7/6
 Nelson's Lady Hamilton. By E. H. Moorhouse. Ill. net 7/6

Children's Books

- A Little Brother to the Birds. By F. W. Wheldon—A Child's Life of Christ. By Mrs. Percy Dearmer. Ill. each ... 6/0
 A Book of Nursery Songs and Rhymes. Ed. by S. Baring-
 Gould. Ill. New Edition net 2/6
 Tommy Smith's Other Animals. By E. Selous. Ill. 2/6

Fiction

- The Call of the Blood. By Robert Hichens—The Car of Destiny. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson—The Guarded
 Flame. By W. B. Maxwell—Listener's Lure. By E. V.
 Lucas—A Blind Bird's Nest. By Mary Findlater—The Ladder and the Stars. By Jane H. Findlater—A New Novel. By Richard Bagot—The Poacher's Wife. By Eden Phillpotts—A Rogue's Tragedy. By Bernard Capes
 —The House of Islam. By Marmaduke Pickthall—In the Shadow of the Lord. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser—I know a Maiden. By E. Maria Albanesi—Profit and Loss. By John Oxenham—The Eglamore Portraits. By Mary E.
 Mann—The First Claim. By M. Hamilton—The Wick-hamses. By W. Pett Ridge—Tally Ho! By Helen Mathers—The Coming of the Randolphs. By Adeline
 Sergeant—Mave. By Randal Charlton—The Fortunes of the Landrays. By Vaughan Kester—Laughing
 Through a Wilderness. By James Barr—Enderby. By Bertha Shelley—In the Service of Love. By Richard Marsh—The Bar. By Margery Williams—Caesar's Wife.
 By R. Melton. each 6/0
 The Ha'penny Millionaire. By George Sunbury. 3/6

History

- Parish Life in Mediæval England. By Abbot Gasquet.
 O.S.B. Ill. net 7/6
 The Coming of the Saints. By J. W. Taylor. Ill. net 7/6

Music

- Modern Music and Musicians. By R. A. Streatfeild. Ill. net 7/6

Philosophy

- The Political Thought of Plato and Aristotle. By E.
 Barker net 10/6

Science and Sociology

- The Hygiene of Mind. By R. T. S. Clouston. Ill. net 7/6
 Principia Therapeutica. By H. Sainsbury net 7/6
 Wild Life in East Anglia. By W. A. Dutt. Ill. net 7/6
 The Royal Society. By Sir W. Huggins. Ill. net 4/6
 A Concise Handbook of Shrubs. By Mrs. Gwyn Lewis.
 Ill. net 3/6

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S NEW LIST

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF LESLIE STEPHEN

By FREDERICK W. MAITLAND.
Photogravures.
Royal 8vo, 18s. net.

Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY.

With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A building second to none among the marvels of architectural beauty produced by the Middle Ages. Like all such buildings, its beauty is convincing and sets criticism aside."—WILLIAM MORRIS.

The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci

Revealing the Master's Ideas on Life, Nature, Art, Poetry, Fantasy.

By EDWARD McCURDY.

13 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 8s. net.

Life and Evolution

By F. W. HEADLEY.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

With a specially interesting series of Illustrations.

A Text Book of Fungi

Including Morphology, Physiology, Classification.

By GEORGE MASSEE.

With 110 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The Interpretation of Nature in Earlier Greek Art

By EMANUEL LÖWY.

Translated by J. FOTHERGILL. 30 Illustrations. 5s. net.

Correggio

By T. STURGE MOORE. 7s. 6d. net.

Watteau

By C. MAUCLAIR. 2s. and 2s. 6d. net.

Tristram and Iseult

By J. COMYNS CARR.

Demy 8vo, 1s. 6d. and 2s. net.

Now being presented at the Adelphi Theatre.

Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes

By LINA ECKENSTEIN.
Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

The Dawn in Britain

By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY,
4 vols., 4s. 6d. net each.

New Fiction

Old Fireproof

Being the Chaplain's Story.
By OWEN RHOSCOMYL. 6s.

His People

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM. 6s.

The Heart that Knows

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS. 6s.

A NEW BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.
Illustrated by PAUL PHIPPS. Oblong crown 4to. 3s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

The PRINTERS, STATIONERS & BOOKBINDERS OF WESTMINSTER & LONDON from 1476 to 1535

Crown 8vo, 7 plates, 5s. net.

By E. GORDON DUFF, sometime Sanders Reader in Bibliography in the University of Cambridge.

This book, to be ready next week, contains two series of lectures delivered by the author as Sanders Reader. Of the first series a small edition has previously been printed privately, but not published; the second series is now printed for the first time. The two series together give an account of the introduction of the art of printing into England and of its spread, and describe the work of the early English printers, of those foreign printers who printed abroad for sale by the "stationers" in England, and of the English bookbinders, from the introduction of printing down to the Act of Henry VIII. which restricted the importation of foreign books.

NO MAN'S LAND

By Sir MARTIN CONWAY. Royal 8vo, illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

A history of Spitsbergen from its discovery in 1596 to the beginning of the scientific exploration of the country. Year by year from early in the seventeenth century, Spitsbergen has been the scene of industries attracting adventurers of many nations, whose purposes, rivalries, and fortunes are related. The book is illustrated and has many excellent maps.

PHOTOGRAVURE FACSIMILES OF RARE BOOKS PRINTED IN ENGLAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

When complete this series will consist of twelve facsimiles of rare fifteenth century books printed in England, and now in the University Library at Cambridge. The reproductions are made with great care and only a limited number of each is printed, two hundred copies being for sale. Six of the facsimiles are ready now, and two others will be published next week; seven out of the eight being reproductions of the only copy of the original known to exist.

The facsimiles now ready are: 1. Chaucer's Story of Queen Anselme and the false Arcite (Caxton 1477); 2. Augustine's Dactylus Libellus (The Schoolmaster Printer at St. Albans, 1479). 15s. net; 3. Lydgate's Temple of Glas (Caxton, 1477). 12s. 6d. net; 4. Betson's Ryght Profitable Treatise (Wynkyn de Worde, 1500). 15s. net; 5. Lydgate's Assemble of Goddes (Wynkyn de Worde, 1500). 17s. 6d. net; and 6. Benet Burgh's Parvus Cato, Magnus Cato (Caxton, 1477). 15s. net. Those to be published next week are: 7. Lydgate's Lyttell Treatise of the Horse, the Sheep, and the Ghoose (Wynkyn de Worde, 1499). 10s. net; and 8. Lydgate's Churl and the Bird (Caxton, 1478). 10s. net.

Subscribers to the whole series of twelve volumes are entitled to a reduction of one-fifth of the published price, which in no case will exceed twenty shillings net. The few copies that remain of No. 1 are reserved for subscribers to the complete series, to whom its special price is 8s. net.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net each vol.

Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by ARNOLD GLOVER, M.A. and A. R. WALLER, M.A. In ten volumes.

The text of this edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, reprinted from the folio of 1679 with a record of all earlier variant readings, will be completed in ten volumes. Vols. I., II., and III. are ready. Vol. IV. will be published next week, and will contain The Tragedy of Valentinian, Monsieur Thomas, The Chances, The Bloody Brother, and The Wild-Goose Chase.

Subscribers for complete sets of the edition are entitled to purchase copies at the reduced rate of 4s. net per volume.

ANNALS OF POLITICS AND CULTURE 1492-1899

Second Impression, Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

By G. P. GOOCH, M.A. With an Introductory Note by the late Lord Acton.

"On the left-hand page stand the annals of politics; on each right-hand page the annals of culture (in its widest sense), grouped under black-letter heads. By a system of numbering each paragraph a student is enabled, with the aid of an almost complete index, to trace the chronological sequence of the development of a people on a department of art, literature and science." ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

"A book which no student should be without, and which every general reader will find useful."—SPECTATOR.

CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY

Royal 8vo, 16s. net each vol.

Planned by the late Lord ACTON. Edited by A. W. WARREN, Litt.D. G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D. and STANLEY LEATHES, M.A.

The twelve volumes in which this History will cover the period from the close of the Middle Ages to the present day are issued in two series: the one beginning with Volume I. and the other with Volume VII. Under this arrangement six volumes have now appeared: viz. I.—The Renaissance, II.—The Reformation, III.—The Wars of Religion, VII.—The United States, VIII.—The French Revolution, and IX.—Napoleon. Volume IV.—The Thirty Years' War, will be published next month.

Any volume may be purchased separately, at 16s. net. But subscriptions of £7 10s. net are received for the complete work in twelve volumes. Such subscriptions may be paid either at once in full, or half now (for the six volumes ready) and the balance in instalments of 12s. 6d. on the publication of each of the six remaining volumes.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
FETTER LANE, LONDON—C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

- A History of Arctic Exploration. By J. D. Hoare. Ill. net 7/6
 The Children of the Nation. By the Rt. Hon. Sir J. Gorst net 7/6
 Infant Mortality. By George Newman. Ill. net 7/6
- Sport
 The Complete Rugby Footballer. By D. Gallaher and W. G. Stead. Ill. net 10/6
 Great Golfers in the Making. By 24 Champions. Edited by Henry Leach. Ill. net 7/6
- Theology and Devotion
 The Little Flowers of St. Francis. Trans. by W. Heywood Ill. net 5/0
 Franciscan Days. By A. G. Ferrers Howell. net 3/6
 The Library of Devotion. The Little Flowers of St. Francis. Trans. by W. Heywood. Death and Immortality by Henry Montagu, Earl of Manchester. Ed. by E. Waterhouse each net 2/0 and 2/6
 Ethics and Atonement. By W. F. Lofthouse. net 5/0
 A Little Book of Life and Death. Ed. by Mrs. Alfred Waterhouse net 5/0
 The Churchman's Bible: The Gospel According to St. Mark. Ed. by J. C. du Buisson net 2/6
- Travel and Topography
 A Wanderer in London. By E. V. Lucas. Ill. 6/0
 A Book of the Rhine. By S. Baring-Gould. Ill. 6/0
 The Mirror of the Sea. By Joseph Conrad. 6/0
 Hills and the Sea. By Hilaire Belloc 6/0
 The Lake of Como. By Richard Bagot net 3/6
 The Little Guides. Normandy. By C. Scudamore—Middlesex. By J. B. Frith—Kerry. By C. P. Crane. Ill. net 2/0 and 3/6
- DE LA MORE PRESS
- Fiction
 The Slanderers. By Warwick Deeping 6/0
- Miscellaneous
 The Sarum Missal in English. Newly trans. by Canon Warren. 2 vols. net 22/6
 Burma. By Sir George Scott, K.C.I.E. Ill. net 10/6
 Some Pages of Levantine History. By the Rev. H. T. Forbes Duckworth. Ill. net 3/6
 Aramaic Papyri: Discovered at Assuan. Ed. by Prof. A. H. Sayce, with the assistance of A. E. Cowley. net 21/0
 A Dreamer in Paris. By William Jasper Nicolls net 3/6
 The Story of the Laxdalers. Trans. from the Icelandic by Robert Proctor net 6/0
 The Peril and the Preservation of the Home. By Jacob Riis net 3/0
 The Industrial Problem. By Lyman Abbott. net 3/0
 The Battles of Labour. By Carroll D. Wright net 3/0
 Organised Labour and Capital. By Washington Gladden, Talcott Williams, George Hodges and Francis G. Peabody net 3/0
- Reprints
 De La More Booklets:
 Abraham and Isaac, an old English Miracle Play; FitzGerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam; Smari's Song to David; The Book of Ruth; De Quincey's Suspiria; Tom Pinch's Ride to London, by Charles Dickens each net -/6, 1/0, 1/6, and 2/6
 The King's Classics:
 Poe's Poems, ed. by Edward Hutton. Cranford.
 Sappho: One Hundred Lyrics; by Bliss Carman each net 1/6 and 2/6
- MR. JOHN MURRAY
- Art
 Five Italian Shrines: With an Essay on Early Tuscan Sculptors. By W. G. Waters. Ill.
 A History of British Water-Colour Painting. By H. M. Cundall. Ill. net 21/0
 The Essentials of Æsthetics. By George Lansing Raymond
 The Arts in Early England. By G. Baldwin Brown, M.A. Vol. III., The Decorative Arts of the Anglo-Saxon Period
 A History of Painting. By Crowe and Cavalcaselle. New ed. 6 vols. Ill. each net 21/0
 The Shores of the Adriatic: An Architectural and Archaeological Pilgrimage. The Italian side. By F. Hamilton Jackson. Ill.
- Biography and Memoirs
 The Letters of Queen Victoria. Ed. by Arthur C. Benson and Viscount Esher. 3 vols. Ill.
- Empires and Emperors of Russia, China, Korea, and Japan. By Monsignor Count Vay de Vaya and Luskod. Ill. net 15/0
 George Crabbe and His Times. By René Huchon. Trans. by Frederick Clarke
 Mrs. Montagu and Her Friends: A Sketch. By René Huchon net 6/0
 Diaries and Correspondence of Sir Charles James Fox Bunbury, Bart., 1809-1886. Abridged and edited by his Sister-in-Law, Mrs. Henry Lyell. Ill. 2 vols.
 Queen and Cardinal: A Sketch of the Life and Companions of Anne of Austria. By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant
 The Life and Letters of Sir James Graham, 1792-1861. Ed. by C. S. Parker. 2 vols. Ill.
 Moltke in His Home. By Friedrich August Dressler. Authorised trans. Ill.
 Life and Works of Vittorio Carpaccio. By the late Professor Gustaf Ludwig and Professor Pompeo Molmenti. Trans. by R. H. Hobart Cust. Ill.
 Sidney Herbert, Lord Herbert of Lea: A Memoir. By Lord Stanmore. 2 vols. Ill. net 24/0
 The Life of Isabella Bird (Mrs. Bishop). By Miss Anna M. Stoddart. Ill.
- History
 History of Venice. By Pompeo Molmenti. Trans. by Horatio F. Brown. 3 vols. (2 parts each)
 Old Fort William in Bengal. Ed. by C. R. Wilson. 2 vols. each net 12/0
 The History of the Papacy in the Nineteenth Century. By Dr. Fredrik Nielsen. Trans., with the help of others, by Arthur James Mason, D.D. 2 vols. net 24/0
- Military and Naval
 Imperial Strategy. By the Military Correspondent of the Times. Maps net 21/0
 The Army in 1906. By the Rt. Hon. H. O. Arnold-Forster, M.P.
 Lord Milner's Work in South Africa. By W. Basil Worsfold
 Cavalry in Future Wars. By Lieut.-Gen. Frederick von Bernhardi. Trans. by Charles Sydney Goldman
 Nelson and other Naval Studies. By James R. Thursfield. Ill.
 Before Port Arthur in a Torpedo Boat. By Lieut. Hesibo Tikovara. Trans. by Captain Robert Grant
- Miscellaneous
 Colonisation and Empire. By F. A. Kirkpatrick, M.A.
 An Idler in the Wilds. By Tickner Edwards. Ill.
 A Philological Study of the English Language. By Henry Cecil Wyld.
 Modern Ireland and Her Agrarian Problem. By Moritz J. Bonn. Trans. from the German by T. W. Rolleston net 2/6
 Local and Central Government: A Comparative Study of England, France, Prussia, and the United States. By Percy Ashley, M.A.
 Pillow Lace. By Mrs. Mincoff. Ill.
 Recent Advances in the Study of Variation, Heredity, and Evolution. By Robert H. Lock. Ill.
 The Industrial Organisation of an Indian Province. By Theodore Morison
- Topography and Travel
 Portuguese East Africa. By R. C. F. Maugham. Ill.
 Adrift in New Zealand. By E. Way Elkington. Ill. 10/6
- MR. EVELEIGH NASH
- Biography, Memoirs, and General
 Famous Beauties of Two Reigns: An Account of Some Fair Women of Stuart and Georgian Times. By Mary Craven. Ill. net 21/0
 The Chateaux of Touraine. By M. H. Lansdale. Ill. net 24/0
 A Twice Crowned Queen—Anne of Brittany. By Constance, Countess de la Warr. Ill. net 7/6
 From Fiji to the Cannibal Islands. By Beatrice Grimshaw. Ill. net 12/6
 Canada: The Two Races. By André Siegfried 7/6
 A Royal Tragedy. By Chedomille Mijatovitch 7/6
 Nooks and Corners of Old England. By Allan Fea 10/6
 Success in Life. By Dr. Emil Reich 6/0
- Fiction
 The Power of the Past. By Daniel Lesueur—The Matrimonial Lottery. By Charlotte O'Connor Eccles—The Red Burgee. By Morley Roberts—The Surge of War. By Norman Innes—God's Outpost. By Cullen Gouldsbury—Ghost Stories. By Algernon Blackwood—Women and the West. By Charles Marriott—Lawful Issue. By James Blyth—The Manager's Box. By John Randal—Mr. Poskitt. By J. S. Fletcher. each 6/0

BLACKIE'S LIST

A New Book by Mr. Arthur Symons A PAGEANT OF ELIZABETHAN POETRY By ARTHUR SYMONS

Edited, with an Introduction, by ARTHUR SYMONS. Crown 8vo, sumptuously bound in quarter vellum, 6s. net.

A "Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry" is an attempt to choose and arrange what is best in the best period of English poetry, from Spenser, in whom it properly begins, to Herrick, in whom it may be said to end. Herrick, though in point of time Jacobean, is really far more the last of the "tribe of Ben" than the first of those pious and courtly poets, Herbert, Crashaw, or Carew, in whom we hear the new speech of the seventeenth century. Every poem given has been given in full, and great care has been taken to secure an accurate text. Nothing has been put in because it was unfamiliar, or left out because it was familiar. The attempt has been to marshal a pageant, not to compile a text-book.

THE RED-LETTER LIBRARY

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON, Limited, have pleasure in announcing that they are about to add the following volumes to the Red-Letter Library.

BURNS—SELECT POEMS. With an Introduction by NEIL MUNRO.
ARNOLD—SELECT POEMS. With an Introduction by ALICE MEYNELL.
THOREAU—WALDEN. With an Introduction by RICHARD WHITEING.
HAZLITT—SELECT ESSAYS. With an Introduction by CHARLES WHIBLEY.

OTHER VOLUMES IN PREPARATION
1s. 6d. net, cloth, gilt top; 2s. 6d. net, leather, gilt top.

New Books for Boys

Two New Stories by Captain F. S. BRERETON (G. A. Henty's Successor)

ROGER THE BOLD

A STORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO. Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

WITH ROBERTS TO CANDAHAR

A STORY OF THE THIRD AFGHAN WAR. Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

A New Writer for Boys

By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S.

THE LOST EXPLORERS

A STORY OF THE TRACKLESS DESERT. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

By HARRY COLLINGWOOD

ACROSS THE SPANISH MAIN

A STORY OF ADVENTURE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

By DAVID KER

AMONG THE DARK MOUNTAINS

OR, CAST AWAY IN SUMATRA. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW AND POPULAR EDITION OF G. A. HENTY'S WORKS
Illustrated by eminent Artists. Beautifully bound in cloth, with ornamental cover design and olive edges. 3s. 6d.

WITH CLIVE IN INDIA

OR, THE BEGINNINGS OF AN EMPIRE. Illustrated.

New Books for Girls

By ROSA MULHOLLAND (Lady Gilbert)

OUR SISTER MAISIE

Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 6s.

By ETHEL F. HEDDLE

GIRL COMRADES

Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 6s.

By G. E. FARROW (author of "The Wallypug of Why")

THE ESCAPE OF THE MUL-LINGONG:

A ZOOLOGICAL NIGHTMARE. Profusely Illustrated with humorous Drawings by GORDON BROWNE. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt edges, 5s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT

A GIRL OF THE FORTUNATE ISLES

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

New Picture Books

By CHARLES ROBINSON and EVELYN SHARP
A SUMPTUOUS BOOK FOR CHILDREN

THE CHILD'S CHRISTMAS

Large quarto, cloth elegant, gilt edges, price 1s. net.
Nearly 200 charming illustrations in colour and black-and-white by Mr. CHARLES ROBINSON, with text by Miss EVELYN SHARP, describing all that makes Christmas a time of pure delight to the young.

Messrs. BLACKIE AND SON, Limited, will be happy to send a Set of their ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES AND PROSPECTUSES, containing particulars of "The Red-Letter Library," "Great Novelists" Series, "Standard Two-Shilling Library," Children's Books, and General Literature, post free.

LONDON: BLACKIE AND SON, LIMITED, 50 OLD BAILEY, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW VOLUME BY GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

JUST PUBLISHED. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SOCIAL SILHOUETTES.

By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL,

Author of "Collections and Recollections," etc.

TRIBUNE.—"The author of 'Collections and Recollections' is peculiarly fitted for the production of such an album of social types as he here offers to the eager reader."

THE GATE OF DEATH:

A DIARY. Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

 This book describes the experiences of one who has twice approached those gates which await every man. [Just ready.]

THE STORY OF BAWN.

By KATHARINE TYNAN,

Author of "The Honourable Molly," "Julia," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

 A romantic love-story in the Irish setting which the author knows so well how to portray. [Just published.]

RUTH: and other Tales.

Being Volume III. of the "KNUTSFORD" EDITION of Mrs. GASKELL'S WORKS.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Volumes are being published at fortnightly intervals, and each will contain a Photogravure Frontispiece. There will also be other illustrations.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"The edition will deserve to rank as the standard set of an author for whom fresh fame is in store."

NEW IMPRESSION OF THE BROWNING LOVE LETTERS.

With 2 Portraits and 2 Facsimile Letters. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, 21s.

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING AND ELIZABETH BARRETT BARRETT Fifth Impression.

THE UPTON LETTERS. By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON, Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge.
With a New Preface. 7s. 6d. net.

EIGHTH IMPRESSION (SECOND EDITION).

DAILY NEWS.—"A reperusal of the Letters strengthens the first impression that in the book we have a real contribution to our literature."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

FROM A COLLEGE WINDOW. 7s. 6d. net

EIGHTH IMPRESSION (SECOND IMPRESSION).

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Much as Mr. Arthur Benson has written that lingers gratefully in the memory, he has written nothing to equal this mellow and well-flavoured book."

THE NEW PHYSICS AND CHEMISTRY:

a Series of Popular Essays on Physical and Chemical Subjects. By W. A. SHENSTONE, F.R.S., Senior Science Master in Clifton College
Author of "The Life and Work of Justus von Liebig," etc. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [In a few days.]

THE FUTURE OF RUSSIA. Translated from the German of REGIERUNGSRAT RUDOLF MARTIN by Miss HULDA FRIEDERICH. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net (probably). [Immediately.]

FORTHCOMING SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

CHIPPINGE.

By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

Author of "Count Hannibal," "The Castle Inn," etc. [October 16.]

SIR JOHN CONSTANTINE.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH ("Q").

Author of "Dead Man's Rock," "The Splendid Spur," etc. [October 23.]

THE OLD COUNTRY: A Romance.

By HENRY NEWBOLT,

Author of "Taken from the Enemy," "The Year of Trafalgar," "Admirals All," etc. [October 23.]

CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.

Art

- Drawings by Great Masters:
Leonardo da Vinci, by Lewis Hind; Gainsborough, by Lord Ronald Sutherland Gower.....each net 7/6
- Master Etchers:
William Strang, A.R.A., by Frank Newbolt.....net 7/6
- Library of Applied Arts:
French Furniture, by André Saglio; Sheffield Plate, by B. Wyllieeach net 7/6
- Art Library:
Correggio, by Selwyn Brinton; Burne-Jones (second series); The Landscapes of G. F. Watts; Ingres, by Octave Uzanne; Michael Angelo, by Dr. Georg Gronaueach net 3/6
- National Gallery:
The North Italian School, by Sir Charles Holroyd;
The Central Italian School, by Sir Charles Holroyd;
The French, German, and Spanish Schools, by Walter Bayeseach net 3/6

Fiction

- Love Among the Chickens. By P. G. Wodehouse. Ill. .. 6/0
The Secret of the Moor: A Novel. By Morice Gerard.... 3/6
The Fairy Library:
Puss in Boots; Jack the Giant-Killer.....net 5/0

Miscellaneous

- Houses and Gardens. By M. H. Baillie Scott.....net 31/6
"Country Life" Library. Where the Forest Murmurs.
By Fiona Macleod*net* 6/0
The Citizen Rifleman. (Official handbook of the Miniature Rifle Clubs Assoc.) By E. D. Newitt.....net 2/0
Recreation Series:
New Games and Amusements; The Field and Forest
Handy Book: New Ideas for Out of Doors; Things Worth Doing (and How to Do Them)
each net 6/0

Science

- A Technological and Scientific Dictionary.....cloth, net 18/6 half-morocco, net 21/0

MESSRS. J. NISBET & CO.

Biography and Memoirs

- James Wright of Bristol. By the Rev. A. T. Pierson ..net 3/6
A Great Heart. By the Rev. A. H. Grey-Edwards.....net 5/0

Theology

- The Story of the Bible. By Eugene Stock.....net 2/0
The Life of Christ. By the Rev. A. W. Gough*net* 2/0
The Story of the Prayer-Book. By the Dean of Carlisle net 2/0

MR. DAVID NUTT

Children's Books

- Peter Pickle. Ill. by Hilda Cowham—My Friend Poppity.
By Augusta Thorburn. Ill.each 2/6
Beasts in Bayswater. By Harry Bruce. Ill.net 1/0
The Flower Fairy-Tale Book. By I. Blackwood. Ill. .. 5/0
Nausicaa: an Idyll of the Odyssey. Arranged as a Play for Schools, by Mary R. Hoste*net* 1/6 and 2/6

Fiction

- Whom God hath Joined. By Arnold Bennett—The Treasure Trail. By E. Frank Pollock—Behind the Veil. By Ethel Rolt Wheeler—Human Affairs: Stories. By Vincent O'Sullivaneach 6/0

Poetry

- Æschylus: Agamemnon. A metrical version. By W. R.
Paton
Durante and Selvaggio. By Kauffmann C. Spiers
Cinderella: A Dramatic Phantasy

Philology and Folk-lore

- Studies in Irish Epigraphy. Part III. By R. A. S.
Macalister. Ill.
The Irish Æneid. Vol. VI. Printed for the first time from fourteenth-century MSS., and trans. by the Rev.
J. Calder*net* 10/6
A Text-Book of Irish Literature. By Eleanor Hull*net* 3/6
Shakespeare's Pronunciation. By W. Viëtor. Vol. I., A
Shakespeare Phonology, net 6/0. Vol. II., A Shakespeare Reader in the Old Spelling and with a Phonetic Transcription*net* 3/6

- Theobald and Pope. By T. R. Lounsbury
George Buchanan: A Memorial, 1506-1906. Ed. by David A. Millar*net* 5/0

MESSRS. OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER

Fiction

- The Undertow. By Robert E. Knowles..... 6/0
Ian of the Orcades. By Wilfred Campbell. Ill. 6/0

Miscellaneous

- A History of the Tron Kirk and Parish of Edinburgh. By the Rev. D. Butler. Ill.net 21/0
Pilgrims in the Region of Faith: Amiel, Tolstoy, Pater, Newman. By John A. Hutton*net* 3/6
Skibo: Its Laids and History. By Peter Gray*net* 4/6
America and China. By Dr. Arthur H. Smith

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS

Biography and Memoirs

- The Cambridge Apostles: An Account of the Famous Set in the Thirties. By Mrs. Charles Brookfield. Ill. net 21/0
Daniel O'Connell: His Early Life and Journal from 1795-
1802. Ill.....net 12/6

Fiction

- The Sentimentalists. By Father Robert Hugh Benson.... 6/0

Poetry

- England's Parnassus: An Anthology of Anthologies. Ed.
by W. Garrett Horder.....net 3/6 and 2/6

Theology

- The Creed of Creeds: A Series of Short Expositions of the Apostles' Creed. By the Rev. F. B. Meyer*net* 3/6
The Child of Nazareth. By Benjamin Waugh.....net 5/0
The New Idolatry. By Washington Gladden..... 3/6

Topography and Travel

- Italy of the Italians. By Helen Zimmern. Ill.....net 6/0

MRS. E. GRANT RICHARDS

Fiction

- The Miracle Worker. By Gerald Maxwell—The Private
War. By Louis J. Vance—The North Sea Bubble. By E. J. Oldmeadow—The Broken Law. By Harris Burland—Nedra. By George Barr McCutcheon—The Earthquake. By W. Holt White—The Primrose Path. By James Easton.....each 6/0
Echoes from Kottabos. Ed. by Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell and Sir
Edward Sullivan.....net 7/6
Christopher Columbus. By Filson Young. Ill. 2 vols. net 25/0
The Birds of the British Islands. By Charles Stonham.
Ill. 20 partseach net 7/6
The Voyages of Captain William Dampier. Ed. by John Masefield. Ill. 2 vols.....net 25/0
Queens of Old Spain. By Major Martin Hume. Ill.net 15/0
Heidelberg. By Elizabeth Godfrey. Ill.....net 12/6

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE & CO.

Miscellaneous

- Useful Library. Scharlieb. Railway Matters and How to Deal with Them. Lissenden. Railway Passenger's Handbook.

Reprints

- New Universal Library: Pauli's Pictures of Old England; Macaulay's History; Mackenzie's Man of Feeling, Man of the World, etc.; Marcus Aurelius; Aristotle's Ethics; Bacon's Essays and Novum Organum; The Works of Borrow (5 vols.); Church's Dante, Anselm, etc.
each net 1/0, 1/6 and 2/0
Library of English Novelists. The Monk. By M. G.
Lewis; Defoe's Moll Flanders and Roxana; Sidney's
Acadia; Chrysal; and Thoms' Early English Prose
Romanceseach net 6/0
Library of Historical and Standard Literature: Grote's
History of Greece; Macaulay's History.... each net 5/0
The Muses' Library: Thomson; Chatterton
each net 1/0 and 2/0
Photogravure Album Series: Goethe's Faust; Drayton's
Nymphidia; Chaucer's Patient Griselda; Dante's Vita
Nuova by D. G. Rossetti; Lodge's Rosalynade; The Song of Songs; Irving's Rural England. Ill....each net 3/6

Mr. Edward Arnold's Announcements

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL

Edited by her Son, RALPH NEVILL. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [October 8.]

LETTERS OF GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., LL.D.

Arranged by his Daughter, LUCY CRUMP. With Portraits, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [October 15.]

WESTERN TIBET AND THE BRITISH BORDERLAND

By CHARLES A. SHERRING, M.A., Indian Civil Service; Deputy Commissioner at Almora. With 175 Illustrations from Photographs and Maps, royal 8vo, 21s. net. [October 8.]

ABYSSINIA OF TO-DAY

An Account of the First Mission sent by the American Government to the King of Kings. By ROBERT P. SKINNER, American Consul-General; Commissioner to Abyssinia, 1903-1904. With numerous Illustrations and Map, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [October 15.]

THE AFTERMATH OF WAR

An Account of the Repatriation of Boers and Natives in Orange River Colony. By G. B. BEAK. With Illustrations and Map, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [November.]

PATROLLERS OF PALESTINE

By the Rev. HASKETT SMITH, M.A., Editor of "Murray's Handbook to Syria and Palestine," 1902. With Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [October 22.]

THE PRINCES OF ACHAIA AND THE CHRONICLES OF MOREA

A Study of Greece in the Middle Ages. By Sir RENNELL RODD, G.C.V.O., K.C.M.G., C.B., British Minister at Stockholm. With Illustrations and Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

PERSONAL ADVENTURES AND ANECDOTES OF AN OLD OFFICER

By Col. JAMES P. ROBERTSON, C.B. With Portraits, demy 8vo. [November.]

TRANSLATIONS INTO LATIN AND GREEK VERSE

By H. A. J. MUNRO, Sometime Fellow of Trinity College, and Professor of Latin in the University of Cambridge. With a Prefatory Note by J. D. DUFF, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Medium 8vo, with Portrait, 6s. net. [October 8.]

MISREPRESENTATIVE WOMEN, AND OTHER VERSES

By HARRY GRAHAM, Author of "Misrepresentative Men," "Ruthless Rhymes for Heartless Homes," etc. With Illustrations by D. S. GROESBECK. Fcap. 4to, 5s. [October 15.]

THE LAND OF PLAY

By Mrs. GRAHAM WALLAS. Illustrated by GILBERT JAMES. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [October 15.]

A SONG-GARDEN FOR CHILDREN

A Collection of Children's Songs. Adapted from the French and German by HARRY GRAHAM and ROSA NEWMARCH. The Music Edited and Arranged by NORMAN O'NEILL. Imp. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [October 8.]

LETTERS TO A GODCHILD ON THE CATECHISM AND CONFIRMATION

By ALICE GARDNER, Associate and Lecturer of Newnham College, Cambridge, Author of "Friends of the Olden Times," "Theodore of Studium," etc. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

POLITICAL CARICATURES, 1906

By Sir F. CARRUTHERS GOULD. 104 Cartoons from the Westminster Gazette. Super-royal 4to, 6s. net. [November.]

NEW EDITIONS

MY MEMOIRS

By HENRI STEPHEN DE BLOWITZ. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, 6s.

IN A GLOUCESTERSHIRE GARDEN

By Rev. H. N. ELLIACOMBE, Vicar of Bitton and Hon. Canon of Bristol. Photogravure Frontispiece, 3s. 6d.

THE QUEEN'S POOR

Life as they Find it in Town and Country. By M. LOANE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A TREASURE OF MINOR BRITISH POETRY

Selected and Arranged, with Notes, by Prof. J. CHURTON COLLINS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE LADY ON THE DRAWING-ROOM FLOOR

By M. E. COLERIDGE, Author of "The King with Two Faces," "The Fiery Dawn," etc. [October 15.]

OCCASION'S FORELOCK

By VIOLET A. SIMPSON, Author of "The Bonnet Conspirators," etc. [October 8.]

THE BASKET OF FATE

By SIDNEY PICKERING, Author of "Verity," etc. [October 8.]

QUICKSILVER AND FLAME

By ST. JOHN LUCAS, Author of "The Absurd Repentance." [October 15.]

THE MILLMASTER

By C. HOLMES CAUTLEY. [October 22.]

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE LETTERS OF ERASMUS. By P. S. ALLEN. Medium 8vo, cloth, with four plates, 18s. net.

THE OXFORD TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

By G. E. HADLOW and W. H. HADLOW. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Vol. I.—Old English to Jacobean. Vol. II. will contain the history of the English Drama to the Jacobean Age. Vol. III., will take up the record at the time of Milton and will continue it to that of Tennyson and Browning.

THE KING'S ENGLISH. By H. W. F. and F. G. F. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Edited by Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY.

N—NICHE. A Double Section. By Mr. W. A. CRAIGIE. 5s. The next issue (Jan. 1) will be a portion of Vol. VI., by Dr. BRADLEY. Already Published, A—L, M—Mesnalty, N—Niche, O, P—Piper, Q and R—Reserve.

PRIMITIVE AND MEDIÆVAL JAPANESE TEXTS.

Edited, With Introduction, Notes, and Glossaries, by F. VICTOR DICKINS, C.B., sometime Registrar of the University of London. Vol. I., Texts. Vol. II., Translations. 8vo, cloth, 2 vols, 10s. 6d. net.

SELECTED DRAWINGS FROM OLD MASTERS IN THE University Galleries, and in the Library at Christ Church, Oxford. Part V. containing twenty drawings exactly reproduced in chromo-collotype. Chosen and described by SIDNEY COLVIN, Keeper of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum. Extra imperial folio. Price £3 3s. net.

CAESAR'S CIVIL WAR WITH POMPEIUS.

Translated by T. P. LONG. With 11 Maps. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. [Oxford Library of Translations.]

GREEN'S PROLEGOMENA TO ETHICS.

Edited by A. C. BRADLEY. Fifth edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

GUIDE TO THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY.

By A. CLARK. Illustrated. Fcap. 8vo.

POESIES CHOISIES D'ALFRED DE MUSSET.

Edited by C. E. DELBOS. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. [Oxford Higher French Series.]

FEUILLETONS CHOISIS.

Edited by C. BRERETON. 112 pp. Price 2s. [Oxford Modern French Series.]

PREMIERES NOTIONS DE VOCABULAIRE ET DE LECTURE.

Par J. E. PICHON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

MONTAIGNE. A Study.

By R. WARWICK BOND. 8vo, buckram, 4s. net.

NEW COLLEGE, 1856-1906.

By HEREFORD B. GEORGE. M.A., Senior Fellow. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net each; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net each.

KINGLAKE'S EOTHEN.

With Introduction by D. G. HOGARTH. Illustrated.

THE TREASURY OF SACRED SONG, selected from the English Lyrical Poetry of Four Centuries. With Notes explanatory and biographical by FRANCIS T. PALGRAVE.

The World's Classics

79 VOLUMES NOW PUBLISHED.

Cloth boards, gilt back, 1s. net; sultan-red leather, limp, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

CHARLOTTE BRONTE'S "THE PROFESSOR" AND THE Poems of Charlotte, Emily, and Anne Brontë. With Introduction by THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON.

DEFOE'S CAPTAIN SINGLETON. With Introduction by T. WATTS-DUNTON.

Mrs. GASKELL'S MARY BARTON. With Introduction by C. K. SHORTER.

Mrs. GASKELL'S RUTH. With Introduction by C. K. SHORTER.

THE PERIODICAL. An Illustrated Magazine sent post free on receipt of a postcard.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43 Maddox Street, Bond Street, W.

The London Library. Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury; Letters of Literary Men; Lewes's Life of Goethe; Hogg's Life of Shelley; The Hutchinson Memoirs; The Newcastle Memoirs; Essays by Jowett. Ill.each net 2/6
Poems and Poets of the Nineteenth Century. Vol. vii. Robert Bridges to Rudyard Kipling]net 1/0 and 2/6

MESSRS. SEELEY

Boys' Books

The Children's Odyssey. By A. J. Church. Ill. 5/0
The Library of Romance: The Romance of Animal Arts and Crafts. By H. Coupin and J. Lea—The Romance of Plant Life. By G. F. Scott Elliot—The Romance of Early Exploration. By Archibald Williams—The Romance of Missionary Heroism. By John C. Lambert. Ill.each 5/0
The Library of Adventure. Adventures in the Great Deserts. By G. W. F. Hyrst—Adventures on the Great Rivers. By Richard Stead. Ill.each 5/0

Miscellaneous

Electricity of To-day. By Charles R. Gibson.....net 5/0
The Tower of London. By the Rev. Canon Benham. Ill.net 5/0 and 7/6
The Sacred Seasons. Readings for Sundays and Holy Days. By the Rt. Rev. H. C. G. Moule. Ill.net 6/0
The Pilgrim's Way. A Little Scrip of Good Counsel for Travellers. In Prose and Verse. Compiled by A. T. Quiller Couch*net* 3/6 and 5/0
Great Britain in Modern Africa. By Edgar Sanderson. Ill. 5/0
Things Seen in Japan. By Clive Holland. Ill. net 2/0, 3/0 and 5/0 and Six Etchings. By Frank Short, A.R.A. In wrapper net 6/0

MESSRS. SKEFFINGTON

Fiction

Bubble Reputation. By Alfred Buchanan—Kinsmen. By David Heron—The Betrayal of Mistress Donis. By George Connock Dyke—The Web of Circumstance. By Lucian de Zilwa—Toll Marsh. By Poynton Stranger—A Spanish Web. By Reginald St. Barbe—In the Frock of a Priest. By M. Gavassaeach 6/0

Miscellaneous

Pribbles and Prabbles. By Major-General P. Maxwell..net 10/0
My Experiences in the Island of Cyprus. By B. Stewart.. 6/0

Theology

The King and His Kingdom. By the Dean of Carlisle..net 3/6
Churchmanship and Labour. 28 Sermons by eminent authors 5/0
Simple Talks to Little Children. By Lady Snagge 3/6
The Soul's Escape, or Perfect Freedom 3/6
Skeffington's Sermon Library. Vols. V. and VI.each net 2/0

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co.

Biography and Memoirs

The Letters of a Betrothed, 1803-1814. By the Baroness Edith von Cramm. Trans. by Leonard Huxley 9/0
The Friends of Voltaire. By S. G. Tallentyre. Ill.net 9/0
The Great Days of Versailles. By G. F. Bradby. Ill.net 10/6
The Life of Richard III. By Sir Clements Markham.....net 10/6

Fiction

Chippinge. By Stanley J. Weyman. Ill.—Sir Nigel. By Sir A. Conan Doyle. Ill.—The Story of Bawn. By Katharine Tynan—Sir John Constantine. By A. T. Quiller-Couch—The Old Country: A Romance. By Henry Newbolteach 6/0

History

The Rise and Fall of the Netherlands. By J. Ellis Barker net 10/6

Miscellaneous

Social Silhouettes. By George W. E. Russell.....net 7/6
The Future of Russia. Trans. from the German of Regierungsrat Rudolf Martin by Miss Hulda Friederichs..net 7/6
The Gate of Death: A Diary*net* 6/0
Letters to Young and Old. By Mrs. C. W. Earle*net* 7/6

Our Heritage the Sea. By Frank T. Bullen 6/0
Provincial Letters and Other Papers. By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary"net 5/0
The House of the Luck. By Mrs. Skrine. Ill.net 6/0
The Book of Gilly: Four Months out of a Life. By the Hon. Emily Lawless. Ill.net 7/6
The New Physics and Chemistry. By W. A. Sheenstone, F.R.S.net 7/6

Reprints

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell. In 8 vols.each net 4/6

Topography and Travel

Sketches in Mafeking and East Africa. By Maj.-Gen. R. S. Baden-Powell. Ill.net 21/0
The Romance of an Eastern Capital. By F. B. Bradley-Birt. Ill.net 12/6

S.P.C.K.

Theology and Church History

The Golden Age of the Church. By the Very Rev. H. D. M. Spence-Jones..... 6/6
Early Church Classics: The Shepherd of Hermas. By C. Taylor. Vol. II 2/0
Inspiration. By Frederick Watson..... 4/0
The Irony of St. John, and other Papers
The Historic Claims of Episcopacy, and other Papers
The Colour Blindness of Judas, and other Sermons. By Provost Salmon. 3 vols.each 1/6
Cuneiform Literature and Its Value for the History of Bible Times. By Professor Sayce
Introduction to the History of the Church in Scotland. By J. H. Shepherd 2/6
Problems in Life and Religion. By the Very Rev. C. T. Ovenden 2/6
The Trial of Jesus. Ill. from Talmud and Roman law. By Septimus Buss..... 1/6
Cottage Talks on Important Subjects. By John Polkinghorn 1/6
Church Historical Society. LXXXV.: The History and Use of Creeds and Anathemas in the Early Centuries of the Church. By C. H. Turner 2/0
Everlasting Punishment. By the Right Rev. F. Paget 0/1
Portfolio of English Cathedrals. With Notes by Arnold Fairbairns. No. 23—Chichester 1/0
Notes for One Year's Sunday School Lessons. Series V. By the Rev. Canon Wilson..... 1/0
Sermons for the People. New Series. 7 vols.each 1/0

Children's Books

Grimm's Household Stories. Ill. 1/0
The Day's March: A Daily Portion for the Children to read at bed-time. By the Ven. G. R. Wynne..... 1/6
An Old-fashioned Prayer and Hymn Book for Young Children. Ill. 1/0
Hunting the Skipper. By G. Manville Fenn. Ill. 5/0
Dick Leslie's Luck. By Harry Collingwood. Grit and Pluck, by W. C. Metcalfe. Ill.each 3/6
Barbara Pelham, by M. E. Shipley—Dolphin of the Sepulchre, by Gertrude Hollis—Rather a Scapegrace, by Mrs. Neville Cubitt—The Disappearance of David Pendarve, by Edith E. Cowper—The Gold Hunters, by W. J. Marx. Ill.each 2/6
A Saint George of King Charles' Days, by Dorothea Townshend—Athabasca Bill, by Bessie Marchant—Cold Blow Corner, by Phoebe Allen—Granfer Garland, by Phoebe Allen—Under One Standard, by H. Louisa Bedford. Ill.each 2/0
Agnes de Tracy, by J. M. Neale—Daybreak, by J. E. Henderson—Stories of the First Four Councils, by G. B. Howard, with map—The Fortunes of Junia, by M. Bramston—The Luck of Haviland, by Theodora Corrie. Ill.each 1/6
A Village Tyrant, by Mrs. Henry Clarke—"Good-bye, Summer," by C. M. MacSorley—Henri Duquesne, by E. E. Drake. Joey's Sacrifice, by Mary Davison—Ralph and Percy, by H. Elrington—The Almshouses of Amer, by K. E. V. Ill.each 10/

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION

Children's Books

Nan's Schooldays. By Mrs. Henry Clarke. Ill. 2/0
The Medland Boys and School Days at St. Benedict's. By A. L. Haydon 1/6

Messrs. BELL'S NEW & FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

Full List of New Books and Complete catalogue
post free on application.

TROLLOPE'S BARSETSHIRE NOVELS.

New and Complete Edition. With an Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON. In eight vols., small crown 8vo, printed on antique wove paper, 3s. 6d. net each. Also an Edition on thin paper in "The York Library." Eight vols., cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The Warden. With Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON. [Ready.] | IV. Framley Parsonage. [Oct.] |
| II. Barchester Towers. [Ready.] | V. The Small House at Athelington. 2 vols. [Nov.] |
| III. Dr. Thorne. [Oct.] | VI. The Last Chronicle of Barset. 2 vols. [Nov.] |

THE POEMS of COVENTRY PATMORE

New and Complete Edition. In One Volume, crown 8vo, with an Introduction by BASIL CHAMPNEYS, and Portrait, 6s. net.

NEAR HOME AT LAST.

By the late Dean MONSELL. New Edition. Pott 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

New Vols. of Bohn's Standard Library

NEW EDITION OF LANE'S "ARABIAN NIGHTS."

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

Translated by E. W. LANE. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by STANLEY LANE-POOLE, M.A., Litt.D. In four vols. 3s. 6d. each.

* * This Edition contains "Ali Baba" and "Aladdin," which were not included in Lane's translation, and have been supplied by the Editor.

ELECTRONS; or, The Nature and Properties of Electricity.

By Sir OLIVER LODGE, D.Sc. (Lond.), Hon.D.Sc. (Oxon.), LL.D. (St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Victoria), F.R.S., Vice-President of the Institution of Electrical Engineers, and Principal of the University of Birmingham. Demy 8vo. [In the Press.]

INDUSTRIAL COMBINATION.

By D. H. MACGREGOR, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of the Royal Economic Society. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE GEM-CUTTER'S CRAFT.

By LEOPOLD CLAREMONT, Author of "A Tabular Arrangement of the Distinguishing Characteristics and Localities of Precious Stones" in the Mining Journal. Small 4to, with over 100 Illustrations. 15s. net.

BEDE'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY & OF ENGLAND.

Revised Translation, with Notes by A. M. SELLAR, late Vice-Principal and Resident Lecturer Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. With a Map. Large post 8vo. [In the press.]

THE YORK LIBRARY.

NEW SERIES OF REPRINTS ON THIN PAPER.

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather 3s. net. New volumes.

BURTON'S PILGRIMAGE TO AL-MADINAH AND MECOAH. Edited by Lady BURTON. With an Introduction by STANLEY LANE-POOLE. Two vols.

CLASSIC TALES: Johnson's "Rasselas," Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," Walpole's "Castle of Otranto." With an Introduction by C. S. FEARENSIDE, M.A.

GASKELL'S (Mrs.) SYLVIA'S LOVERS.

TROLLOPE'S BARSETSHIRE NOVELS. See above.

Others to follow.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

CHARLES H. KELLY'S AUTUMN BOOKS

6/- By the Author of "How England Saved Europe." ITHURIEL'S SPEAR. By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth.

The author of "Deeds that Won the Empire" has written a story full of thrilling incidents. "Ithuriel's Spear" works wonders in the hands of Dr. Fitchett. Every part is powerful, but the fighting scenes of the Boer War are the finest.

5/- net By the Author of "The Birds and their Story." THE STORY OF HEDGEROW AND POND.

By R. B. LODGE. Small medium 8vo, 306 pp., with numerous Illustrations and eight Full-page Coloured Plates, elegantly bound, cloth, gilt edges.

Will be warmly welcomed by boys and girls, who, while attracted by the wonders of Nature, and the life of birds, beasts, and insects, need some guide to point out and explain the beauties which can only be seen by those who understand where, when and how to look for them.

5/- net Uniform with "Rambles in Bible Lands." LIFE & ADVENTURE BEYOND JORDAN.

By G. ROBINSON LEES, B.A., F.R.G.S. Small medium 8vo, 304 pp., with 86 Photographic and eight full-page Coloured Illustrations, elegantly bound in cloth, gilt edges.

The country and people Beyond Jordan have been brought into less prominence than the more familiar portion of Palestine west of the historic river. Explorers and travellers have from time to time recorded their observations in different districts, but the whole of the country has never before been portrayed by pen and picture in one volume.

3/6 PERSECUTION IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

A Chapter in the History of Renunciation. The Fernley Lecture for 1906. By Rev. H. B. WORKMAN, M.A. Second Thousand. Crown 8vo, cloth.

3/6 LIMITATIONS, DIVINE AND HUMAN. By Rev. W. F. SLATER, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth.

3/6 PADRI ELLIOTT OF FAIZABAD. A Memorial (chiefly Autobiographical). Prepared by Mrs. ELLIOTT, and Edited by Rev. A. W. NEWBOULT. Crown 8vo, cloth. Numerous Illustrations.

3/6 EBENEZER E. JENKINS. A Memoir by his Son, J. H. JENKINS, M.A. Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo, cloth.

3/6 THE STORY OF RICHARD MARTIN. By Rev. JOSEPH DAWSON. With Portrait and nine other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth.

3/6 EVERYDAY LIFE IN BENGAL, and other Indian Sketches. By W. H. HART. Crown 8vo, cloth, 360 pp., with 33 Illustrations.

2/6 THE SKIPPER PARSON ON THE BAYS and BARRENS OF NEWFOUNDLAND. By Rev. JAMES LUMSDEN. Crown 8vo, cloth, with 17 Illustrations.

2/- net THE CITIZEN OF TO-MORROW. A Handbook on Social Questions. Edited by Rev. S. E. KEEBLE. Fourth Thousand. Crown 8vo, cloth.

1/6 net THE BURNING HEART. By Rev. JOHN M. BAMFORD. Crown 8vo, cloth, elegantly bound.

1/6 net THE POETRY OF THE UPWARD WAY. Studies in the Language of St. Paul. By Rev. R. MARTIN POPE, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, elegantly bound.

1/6 net A YOUNG MAN'S BOOKSHELF. By Rev. GEORGE JACKSON, B.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, elegantly bound.

1/- net } THE LIBRARY OF METHODIST BIOGRAPHY. Narrow fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 1s. net; or leather, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net.

5. JAMES SMETHAM, PAINTER, POET, ESSAYIST. By W. G. BEARDMORE.

6. THOMAS WALSH, WESLEY'S TYPICAL HELPER. By R. GREEN.

7. JOHN AND MARY FLETCHER, TYPICAL METHODIST SAINTS. By T. ALEXANDER SEED.

1/6 net } THE METHODIST MISSIONARY LIBRARY. Narrow fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 1s. net; or leather, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net.

1/- " } 1. DAVID HILL, AN APOSTLE TO THE CHINESE. By W. T. A. BARBER, D.D.

2. JOHN HUNT, PIONEER MISSIONARY AND SAINT. By JOSEPH NETTLETON.

3. CHU AND LO, TWO CHINESE PASTORS. By G. W. ALLAN.

1/- net } ORNAMENTAL OAK CASE to take six books of the above Libraries, price 1s. net. A Cardboard Case is supplied, to hold six books assorted, without extra charge.

CHARLES H. KELLY, 2 CASTLE STREET, CITY ROAD, E.C. and 26 PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.; and of all Booksellers.

- A Believer's Thoughts. By Edith Hickman Divall—Bible Stories Retold for Young People. By Robert Hyslop—Things that are Lovely. By Rev. A. Averell Ramsey each net 1/6
- Stories of South Pole Adventure. By Frank Mundell. Ill. 1/6
- John Wesley. By Edward Miller—The House by the Railway. By Ada J. Graves—Fifty-one Animal Stories. Ill. 1/0

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co.

Biography

- William Clark, Journalist: His Life and Work. By Herbert Burrows and others
- Life of Ramtanu Lahiri. Trans. and ed. by Sir Roper Lethbridge
- King Ludwig II. of Bavaria. By Clara Tschudi. Ill. .. 7/6
- Memoirs of Prince Kropotkin. Arr. by B. S. Rowntree

Classics

- Ancient Legends of Roman History. By Ettore Pais. Trans. by Mario E. Cosenza. Ill. 15/0
- The Sophist, Parmenides, Politicus, and Timaeus of Plato. Trans. by H. F. Carhill

Fiction

- Life and Manners. By F. J. Gould
- Fairy Tales for Little Children. Ill.
- Atlantis: a Novel. By Fanny Johnson

History

- The History of South Africa, 1505-1652. By George McCall Theal 7/6
- Medallions from Early Florentine History. By Emily Underdown (Norley Chester)
- Historic Links. By Dorothea Maguire
- The Campaign of Magenta and Solferino. By Lieut.-Col. H. C. Wylly. 5/0

Philosophy

- Thought and Things: A Study of Logical Process. By Professor Mark Baldwin. Vol. II., Experimental Logic; Vol. III., Real Logic 10/6
- The History of Philosophy. By Dr. J. E. Erdmann (Fifth German Edition). An English abridgment
- A Treatise on Psychopathology. By Professor Storrer
- Physiological Psychology. By Prof. W. Wundt. Trans. E. B. Titchener. Vol. II. Ill.

Poetry

- Pot Pourri. By Mrs. Gore Conway Bishop 3/6

Science

- The Student's Text-Book of Zoology. By Adam Sedgwick. Vol. III. and last. Ill.
- The Natural History of our Shores. By Joseph Sinel. Ill.
- How to Study Geology. By Ernest Evans. Ill.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN

Biography and History

- Cobden as a Citizen. By William E. A. Axon. Ill. 21/0
- The First Annexation of the Transvaal. By W. J. Leyds 21/0
- Society in the Country House. By T. H. S. Escott 16/0
- Links in My Life on Land and Sea. By Commander J. W. Gambier, R.N. 15/0
- Studies in Biography. By Sir Spencer Walpole. 15/0
- The Lombard Communes. By W. F. Butler. Ill. 15/0
- Court Beauties of Old Whitehall. By W. R. H. Trowbridge 15/0
- The Life of Auguste Rodin. By Frederick Lawton. Ill. net 15/0
- Thomas Davidson, the Wandering Scholar. By William Knight 10/6
- St. Stephen's in the Fifties. By E. M. Whitty 10/6
- Heroines of French Society. By Mrs. Bearne. Ill. 10/6

Fiction

- The Dream and the Business, by John Oliver Hobbes—Father Felix's Chronicles, by Nora Chesson—Counsels of the Night, by Lucas Cleeve—The Iron Gates, by Annie E. Holdsworth—Seven Nights in a Gondola, by Lucas Cleeve—Man and Maid, by E. Nesbit—A Crystal Age, by W. H. Hudson—At the Sign of the Peacock, by K. C. Ryves—Silas Strong, by Irving Bacheller—London Lovers, by M. Baillie-Saunders—The Queen of a Day, by J. S. Fletcher—The Locum Tenens, by Victor L. Whitechurch—The New Chronicles of Don Q., by K.

- and Hesketh Prichard—The Woman Thou Gavest, by Lady Troubridge each 6/0
- A Love Cure, by Philip Treherne—Mister Bill: A Man, by Albert E. Lyons each 3/6

Children's Books

- The Welsh Fairy Book, by W. Jenkyn Thomas—The Story of the Amulet, by E. Nesbit—The Adventures of a Dodo, by G. E. Farrow. Ill. 5/0

Literature and Art

- A Literary History of the English People. By J. J. Jusserand. Vol. II. net 12/6
- A Literary History of Persia (A.D. 1000-1290). By E. G. Browne net 12/6
- A Short History of American Literature. By H. A. Beers net 3/6
- Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays. By the Hon. S. G. Canning net 16/0
- On Art and Artists. By Max Nordau. net 7/6
- Old German Love-songs. Trans. by F. C. Nicholson 6/0
- Chats on Old Prints. By Arthur Hayden. Ill. net 5/0
- Chats on Costume. By G. W. Rhead. Ill. net 5/0

Politics and Economics

- The National Liberal Federation from its Commencement to the General Election of 1906. By R. Spence Watson 5/0
- Retaliatory Duties. From the German of H. Dietzel net 2/6

Religion and Philosophy

- The Nature and Purpose of the Universe. By John Denham Parsons. net 21/0
- Concepts of Monism. By A. Worsley net 21/0
- The Finality of the Christian Religion. By George Burman Foster net 18/0
- The Messianic Hope in the New Testament. By Shailer Mathews net 10/6

Travel

- The Philippine Islands. By John Foreman. Ill. net 25/0
- The Matterhorn. By Guido Rey. Ill. net 21/0
- Romantic Cities of Provence. By Mona Caird. Ill. 15/0
- From Carpathian to Pindus: Pictures of Roumanian Country Life. By Tereza Stratienco. Ill. net 15/0
- Uganda to Khartoum. By Albert B. Lloyd. Ill. net 10/6
- From Charing Cross to Delhi. By S. Parnell Kerr. Ill. net 10/6
- Saunterings in Spain. By Maj.-Gen. Seymour. Ill. net 10/6
- Spain and Her People. By Jeremiah Zimmerman. Ill. net 8/6
- Vacation Days in Hawaii and Japan. By Charles M. Taylor. Ill. net 7/6
- With Shelley in Italy, and Byron in Italy. Ed. by Anna B. McMahan. Ill. each net 5/0

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO.

Fiction

- Buchanan's Wife. By Justus Miles Forman—In the Emperor's Villa. By Richard Henry Savage—Frost and Friendship. By George Frederic Turner—The Counterstroke. By Ambrose Pratt each 6/0
- The Walcott Twins. By Lucile Lovell—Betty the Scribe. By Lilian Turner—Young Pickles. By Stuart Wishing—The Hundredth Acre. By John Campden each 3/6

LONDON LIBRARY

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P. Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S. Trustees—EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; HENRY YATES THOMPSON, Esq.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Do son, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price £2 2s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known, the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."—W. E. H. LECKY.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

On October 15 Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL will commence the issue of

THE NATIONAL EDITION OF THE WORKS OF CHARLES DICKENS

Including upwards of One Hundred and Thirty Articles now collected for the first time.

HIS LETTERS, SPEECHES, PLAYS AND POEMS
Together with FORSTER'S LIFE OF THE AUTHOR

The pictures, numbering upwards of 850, comprise all the Original Illustrations; with a complete series of Portraits, Additional Illustrations, Facsimiles and Reproductions of Handwriting, many of which have not been included in any collected edition of the novelist's works; the whole printed upon India paper, and mounted on Plate paper.

Strictly limited to 750 sets for England and America. Complete in 40 volumes. Royal 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net per volume.

N.B.—The Publishers reserve to themselves the right to raise the price after the sale of the first 500 sets.

The National Edition of the Works of Charles Dickens is designed to rank as the final and definite edition of his works, and to serve as a worthy memorial to the connection which has subsisted for over seventy years between the firm of Chapman and Hall and the immortal memory of Charles Dickens. It is by far the most handsome edition of Dickens ever placed upon the market, and being strictly limited in number is likely to take its place in a very short time among those treasures of the booklover which change hands at highly enhanced prices.

The edition is being printed by Messrs. T. and A. Constable, of Edinburgh, His Majesty's Printers, in a type newly cast for the purpose, upon pure rag paper of the highest quality.

THE TEXT.—The text used is that which was corrected by Charles Dickens himself in the last two years of his life, and therefore contains all the copyright emendations which he made when the volumes passed for the last time through his hands.

The edition contains all the collected papers from whatever source that seemed worthy of permanent association with the name of their author—from The Examiner, Daily News, Household Words, All the Year Round, over 130 in all—the most notable of these being all Dickens's contributions to Household Words, ninety of which have been identified for the first time by indisputable evidence.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.—As regards the choice of illustrations, the Publishers' plan has been to include only those pictures which were drawn for their editions during the life of the author, and which may therefore be held to have received his personal approbation. Under this arrangement they are able to reproduce for the first time in a Collected Edition a number of illustrations not usually associated with the novels, and the utmost care has been taken to do justice to the artists' workmanship. The original illustrations are printed from a duplicate set of the steel plates on the best India paper and mounted on plate paper—a process which gives a greatly refined value to the delicacy of the original steel plates.

Send to CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11 Henrietta Street, W.C., for a complete Prospectus with specimen page, or ask your Bookseller to show you a sample volume.

STANFORD'S COMPENDIUM OF GEOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Revised and in great part Re-written, with New Illustrations and Maps. Thirteen Volumes. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 15s. each (sold separately).

EUROPE. Vol. I. The Countries of the Mainland (excluding the North-West). By GEO. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc.

EUROPE. Vol. II. The British Isles, Scandinavia, Denmark, AND THE LOW COUNTRIES. By GEO. G. CHISHOLM, M.A., B.Sc.

ASIA. Vol. I. Northern and Eastern Asia, Caucasus, Russian TURKESTAN, SIBERIA, CHINESE EMPIRE, AND JAPAN. By A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S. Second Edition. 554 pages, 8 mps, and 90 illustrations.

ASIA. Vol. II. Southern and Western Asia, Afghanistan, India, INDO-CHINA, MALAY PENINSULA, TURKEY IN ASIA, ARABIA, AND PERSIA. By A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S. [Just published.]

NORTH AMERICA. Vol. I. Canada and Newfoundland. By SAMUEL EDWARD DAWSON, Litt.D. (Lazal), F.R.S.C.

NORTH AMERICA. Vol. II. The United States. By HENRY GANNETT, Chief Geographer of the United States Geological Survey.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA. Vol. I. South America. By A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S. Edited by Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, F.R.S.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA. Vol. II. Central America AND WEST INDIES. By A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S. Edited by Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, F.R.S.

AUSTRALASIA. Vol. I. Australia and New Zealand. Second Edition. By Dr. J. W. GREGORY, F.R.S. [Ready short'y.]

AUSTRALASIA. Vol. II. Malaysia and the Pacific Archipelagoes. By F. H. H. GUILLEMAUD, M.D.

AFRICA. Vol. I. North Africa. By A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S.

AFRICA. Vol. II. South Africa. Second Edition. By A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S. With 11 Maps and 94 Illustrations.

GLOSSARY OF GEOGRAPHICAL AND TOPOGRAPHICAL Terms and Words of frequent occurrence in the composition of such Terms and of Place Names. By ALEXANDER KNOX, B.A., F.R.G.S. 472 pages, large crown 8vo. Price 15s.

Illustrated List of the Series gratis on application.
FIFTH EDITION. REVISED AND CORRECTED.

A Century of Continental History. (1780-1880).

With a SUPPLEMENT descriptive of EVENTS up to the YEAR 1900.
By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D.

Formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge; Author of "The Life of Napoleon I." "Napoleonic Studies," etc. etc.

This work is intended for the Upper Forms of Schools, as well as for all who desire to have a clearer knowledge of the course of events on the Continent. Three chapters have been added describing in brief compass the chief events in the history of France, Germany, and Russia in the last two decades of the century.

404 pages, crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Detailed Prospectus gratis on application.

Stanford's Catalogue of Maps, Atlases and Books gratis on application.
London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, and 14 Long Acre, W.C.
GEOGRAPHER TO H.M. THE KING.

CONTINENTAL TOURISTS WILL FIND THESE EXTREMELY USEFUL.

OUR NEIGHBOURS

A Series of handy books dealing with the Intellectual Life of the various Peoples, their Social Divisions and Distinctions, their Manners and Customs, Wealth and Poverty, their Armies and Systems of National Defence, their Industrial Life, Rural Life, Home Life, Religious Life, Amusements, and Local Governments. Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net each; by post, 3s. 9d. Edited by WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

DUTCH LIFE. By P. M. Hough, M.A.

SWISS LIFE. By A. T. Story.

RUSSIAN LIFE. By Francis H. E. Palmer.

GERMAN LIFE. By William Harbutt Dawson.

FRENCH LIFE. By Hannah Lynch.

SPANISH LIFE. By L. Higgins.

ITALIAN LIFE. By Luigi Villari.

DANISH LIFE. By J. Bröchner

AUSTRIAN LIFE. By Francis H. E. Palmer.

TURKISH LIFE. By L. M. J. Garnett.

BELGIAN LIFE. By Demetrius C. Boulger.

SWEDISH LIFE. By O. G. von Heidenstam.

GREEK LIFE. By W. Miller.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE PENTLAND EDITION

OF THE WORKS OF

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Complete in 20 Volumes, price 10 Guineas net each set; the Edition being limited to 1550 Copies

IT will be within the remembrance of the public that during the years 1894 to 1898 was produced "The Edinburgh Edition" of Stevenson's Works. This Edition, consisting of 28 volumes, published at £16 17s. 6d., was quickly at a premium, and has been for several years past worth more than double that sum.

THE PENTLAND EDITION has been arranged in conjunction with the representatives of the late Robert Louis Stevenson and Messrs. Cassell and Co., acting on behalf of the various publishers of his works in this country.

The volumes will bear on the title-page the names of Messrs. Cassell and Co., Ltd., Messrs. Chatto and Windus, Mr. William Heinemann, and Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co. Messrs. Cassell and Co. will issue this Edition on behalf of these publishers. They have also made arrangements to include "Edinburgh Picturesque Notes" published by Messrs. Seeley and Co.

The publishers have been fortunate in securing the co-operation of Mr. Edmund Gosse, who will contribute a General Introduction, arrange the order and contents of the volumes, and write a series of brief biographical notes to precede the various works.

The Volumes will be set in a handsome small pica type of large face, and a fine paper with deckle edges has been selected.

A series of Photogravure Plates will appear. The titles will be printed in red and black. The binding will be in buckram, with headband and gilt top.

It is intended to publish the First four volumes during October.

Applications for copies will be registered in the order received.

The publishers reserve the right to increase the price of the Edition to those whose subscriptions are received after the publication of the first four volumes.

* * A Detailed Prospectus will be sent post free on application.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.

GEORGE ALLEN'S NEW BOOKS

THE LIFE, LETTERS, AND WORK OF FREDERIC LEIGHTON

By Mrs. RUSSELL BARRINGTON.

With over 140 Reproductions from Drawings and Paintings by LORD LEIGHTON. Including 18 in Colour and 18 in Photogravure.
Two vols., Royal 8vo., cloth, gilt tops, 42s. net.

Also an Edition de Luxe of Fifty-five Copies (Numbered) on Arnold Hand-made Paper, £5 5s. net.

The Diaries and Letters written by Leighton, and covering a period of fifty years, are included. Among other letters are several from GEORGE ELIOT, RUSKIN, Mr. and Mrs. BROWNING, HENRY GREVILLE, Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE, RICHARD DOYLE, many of whom have also contributed their reminiscences of the great Artist specially for this work. [Nearly Ready.]

OLIVES

THE REMINISCENCES OF A PRESIDENT
By Sir WYKE BAYLISS.

With an Appreciation by FREDERICK WEDMORE and 18 Reproductions of Drawings by the Author, including 4 in Colour, and 2 Portraits. 350 pages, demy 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 15s. net.

Architecture, Books, Pictures, and Art Criticism are the chief subjects dealt with; but there are also personal reminiscences and charming anecdotes of leading men in the art world—Millais, Leighton, Watts, and Whistler. [November.]

LORD ACTON AND HIS CIRCLE

Letters to and from Various Correspondents, containing Criticism on Literature, History and Theology.

Edited, with Introduction, by ABBOT GASQUET. With Portrait. 464 pages. Demy 8vo., cloth, 15s. net. [Just out.]

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE'S LETTER-BAG

Edited by G. SOMES LAYARD.

With recollections of the Artist by Miss ELIZABETH CROFT, and letters from PEELE, WELLINGTON, SCOTT, COWPER, THOMAS CAMPBELL, etc.

With 20 Portraits and Illustrations in Photogravure and Half-tone. 320 pages. Demy 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 15s. net. [October.]

THE MEDEA OF EURIPIDES

Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with Preface and Explanatory Notes. By Professor GILBERT MURRAY.
Crown 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 2s. net. [November.]

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Pott 4to, half cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net each.

MY DOG

With 6 full-page Illustrations in Colour by G. VERNON STOKES. [Just out.]

OLD-FASHIONED FLOWERS

Including "News of Spring," "Field Flowers," and "Chrysanthemums."

With 6 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by G. S. ELGOOD. [October.]

Crown 8vo., half-cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

JOYZELLE

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

A NEW NOVEL

By E. L. HAVERFIELD,

The Story of a Struggle between Capital, Labour, and Love, entitled—

THE CONTEST

Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN, 156 CHANCERY CROSS ROAD.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1797

OCTOBER 18, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION. FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

EXAMINERS in the Exchequer and Audit Department (18-20) November 1.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

GREAT MALVERN SCHOOL OF ART

HHEAD MASTER required, duties to commence in January next. Commencing Salary £120 per annum. Teaching in Schools permitted. Applications, with particulars of qualifications and with sealed testimonials, to be sent on or before November 13 to

Mrs. JACOB (Hon. Sec.),
St. Helens,
Great Malvern,

from whom a Prospectus of the School may be obtained.

MR. ROBERT SUTTON, Publisher,

HAVING Special Facilities for the Production of Scientific, Educational, Theological, Technical, Biographical, and Art Works

Is prepared to arrange for the issue of same, in a tasteful style, and at most reasonable cost.

Books illustrated by the "Suttonelle" Glas Print, specimen of which will be sent to applicants. MSS. carefully read. Estimates of costs supplied. Accounts verified by a Chartered Accountant's Certificate.

43 The Exchange,
Southwark Street, S.E.

Art

PORTRAITS.—Exhibition of reproduction of portraits from the 14th century to the present day.—FREDK. HOLLYER'S STUDIO, 9 Pembroke Square, Kensington. Open daily, 10 to 6.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

CENTURY DICTIONARY (Unwin's Edition)
6 vols., cloth, binding soiled, clean as new inside; published at £12 for £5 5s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE YELLOW BOOK an illustrated Quarterly, many plates by Aubrey Beardsley and others, vols. 2 to 13 inclusive, original cloth, new, 12 vols. published at £3 net for 42s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CAN-
TIANA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

LEVER'S WORKS (Grolier Society) 37 vols, any binding.—W. E. CLEGG, 39 Market Place and Peter Street, Oldham.

COLLECTION of Old Ballads (plates), 3 vols, 1737-38
Collins (D.) New South Wales, 2 vols, 1798
Collins (Wilkie), any first editions
Collinson's History of Somerset, 3 vols, 4to, 1791
Collyus (C. P.) Chase of the Wild Red Deer, 1762
Comforts of Bath, 12 coloured plates, by Rowlandson, oblong 4to, Fores, 1798
Comic History of England, in parts or cloth, 1847-8, or odd parts
Comic History of Rome, in monthly parts or brown cloth, N D or odd parts
Comic Nursery Tales, Orr & Co., N D
Conciones ad Populum, 1795
Confessions of an Oxonian, 3 vols, 1826
Confessions of C. P. Morgan, 2 vols, or odd parts
Conjugal Lewdness (or Defoe), 1727
Constable's English Landscape Scenery
Constitutional and Public Ledger, 1836-1839
Cooke (M.C.) British Fresh Water Algae, with Supplement (British Desmids), 3 vols, 8vo, 1882-7
Handbook of British Fungi, with Supplement, 3 vols, 8vo, 1871-91
Illustrations of British Fungi, with Supplement, 8 vols, 8vo, 1881-91
Cooper (J. Fenimore) Novels, complete set, 30 vols, 8vo, New York, 1860, or any first editions
Coronation of George IV., Folio Coloured, either Naylor's or Whitaker's
Corsair Gazette, New York, 1839-1840
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.O.

TO AUTHORS.—Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Just out. At all Libraries.

SLINGS OF FORTUNE

A Novel by JONATHAN NIELD.

Author of "A Guide to the Best Historical Novels."

320 pages, crown 8vo, handsome cloth, 6s.

London: H. R. ALLENSON, Ltd., Racquet Court, Fleet St. E.C.

QUEEN'S HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS

Every Evening at 8

THE QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

Conductor—MR. HENRY J. WOOD.

1s., 2s., 3s., 5s., usual agents, Chappell's Box Office, Queen's Hall. Full programmes for the entire season from the Queen's Hall Orchestra (Ltd.), 320 Regent Street W.

ROBERT NEWMAN, Manager.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

PAUL'S INKSARE UNIQUE!*Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.Ready October 15*THE SHILLING BURLINGTON.

The First Number of this ABRIDGED EDITION of the BURLINGTON MAGAZINE will contain, among other Articles:

ENGLISH PROVINCIAL MUSEUMS (Article I.)—THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF IRELAND—ST. CLOUD PORCELAIN—THE LATE ALFRED STEVENS—A PORTRAIT BY GOYA—AND NOTES ON SILVER PLATE, FURNITURE, ETC.

It will be illustrated with 11 FULL-PAGE PLATES, including a HAND-PRINTED PHOTO-GRAVURE of the New Raphael in the National Gallery.

N.B.—THE SHILLING BURLINGTON will appear on the 15th of each Month. THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE will be published as hitherto on the 1st of each Month at 2s. 6d. net.

The First Number is Strictly Limited, and Cannot be Reprinted.

THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE, LTD., 17 BERNERS STREET, W.

THE PREMIER POCKET CLASSICS*NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in., and ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCEY. Edited by TIGHE HOPKINS.

BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.

ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.

SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS'S POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS'S DIARY.

KEATS'S POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFTS JOURNAL to STELLA.

BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

THE NOVELS OF

LAURENCE STERNE.

MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.

POPULAR HANDBOOKS ON SCIENCE
ART, HISTORY, Etc.*THE LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES

A Series of Popular Manuals on Scientific Subjects, written by Specialists, and profusely Illustrated. Size, 6 in. by 4 in.; Cloth, 1s. each; post free, 1s. 2d.

The Stars.

Primitive Man.

The Plants.

The Earth in Past Ages.

The Solar System.

A Piece of Coal.

Electricity.

Extinct Civilisations of the East.

The Chemical Elements.

Forest and Stream.

The Weather.

The Atmosphere.

Germ Life: Bacteria.

The Potter.

The British Coinage.

Life in the Sea.

Photography.

Religious.

The Cotton Plant.

Geographical Discovery.

The Mind.

The British Races.

Eclipses.

Ice in the Present and Past.

The Wanderings of Atoms.

Life's Mechanism.

The Alphabet.

Bird Life.

Thought and Feeling.

Art in the British Isles.

Wild Flowers.

Books.

King Alfred.

Fish Life.

Architecture.

Euclid.

Music.

Animal Life.

Lost England.

The Empire.

Alchemy.

The Army.

Rapid Transit.

The Atlantic Cable.

Extinct Civilisations of the East.

Alpine Climbing.

A Grain of Wheat.

Wireless Telegraphy.

British Trade and Industry.

Reptile Life.

50 Volumes.

10,480 Pages.

1720 Illustrations.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	363	An Intercepted Letter	371
Literature :		A Literary Causerie :
The Use and Abuse of Fictions		The English Asmodeus	372
Geography	365	Fiction	374
Coventry Patmore	366	Fine Art :
Tristan and Yseult	367	Mr. Holmnn Hunt at the
Sir Evelyn Wood	368	Leicester Galleries	375
An Old Journalistic Hand	369	Music :
Two Actors	369	Puccini's Operas	376
The Guitar Player	372	Forthcoming Books	377
Nugæ Scriptoris :		Correspondence	378
V. The Use of the Church		Books Received	380
Services to Agnostics	372	The Bookshelf	382

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WE rarely have the good fortune to meet with such illuminating and "suggestive" remarks on criticism as those of Mr. Irving Babbitt in the September number of the Publications of the Modern Language Association of America. He deplores the excessive cultivation of the "feminine virtues" in criticism which has grown out of the revolt of the romantic critics against the neo-classicists with their standards and their rules of right and wrong. We have, indeed, moved far from the days when an Edinburgh reviewer could write of poetry, that "its standards were fixed long ago by certain inspired writers whose authority it is no longer lawful to question." To-day we have but one standard of literature: the impression made on the reader. We never blame; we only say "we do not like"; and the duty of the critic has been declared to be nothing more than to "praise, praise, praise!" With what futility, exaggeration and coarseness he does it, any page of publishers' advertisements will show.

We have cultivated the feminine virtues, knowledge and sympathy (and especially the latter), until the "masculine" note, that of judgment, has almost disappeared. We would all be either Sainte-Beuves—or rather Taines—deducing by "scientific" criticism facts about the author from his work, or absolute "impressionists," caring for nothing but the effect on our own sensibilities. And it need hardly be said that, since knowledge is one of the requisites of a scientific critic, the majority of modern critics prefer to be impressionists. Now, impressionist criticism is all very well—M. Anatole France is an impressionist critic; the dramatic critic of the Times is another—when the personality, the sensibilities which you make your sole standard, are stronger and finer than other people's. If you can glow with warmer sympathy and admiration for what you like, and shrink with a more delicate apprehension from what you do not, than the common run of mankind, you help to create a standard, a canon on which future Johnsons or Brunetières may work.

If you have not these qualities—and they are rare—you are merely being "invertebrate and gelatinous." What you call your "taste" may not "deserve the cudgel," as the old Spanish proverb has it; but it is little likely to be of any value to the rest of the world. It will, if you aim at scientific criticism, land you in gossip; if at impressionistic, in what is most easily described as "slush." Slush is, possibly, no worse than the aridities of the old dogmatic criticism; but we are in full agreement with Mr. Babbitt in his demand for a criticism that shall "combine the breadth and versatility and sense of differences of a Sainte-Beuve with the elevation and insight and sense of unity of an Emerson"—shall temper impressionism with judgment. Standards do not remain fixed; the critical canon should be "a coat woven of elastic steel." But unless the critic be one of the select few whose "impressionism" really helps to the formation of standards, he needs more consideration of what the best minds have thought, more reverence for the universal in man and in art, than he is apt to show at the present day.

How many living people can honestly declare that they do not like a little touch of vulgarity, when it is neatly offered them? Very few; and therefore we contend that a particularly ugly little book called "Cozy Corner Confidences," by Mr. Walter Pulitzer (New York: Dodge), will have a wide sale. It is exceedingly ugly. The brown paper cover appears to be clotted with the legs, bodies and heads of squashed beetles; each long, narrow page has a very heavy decorated border of a particularly hideous red, within which one, two or no sentences at all are printed large and black. And the sentences or sententiae are such as these: "In Cupid's Geography a kiss is the isthmus joining two main bodies together": "A dress suit case and a divorce suit case often go hand in hand": "The summer-girl is apt to be as summary as she is summery."

But it is not really Mr. Pulitzer's vulgarity, nor his publisher's idea of decoration, that contains the merit of his work. He has besides a good deal of hard, practical philosophy—the kind of thing that many men feel but few dare say—very neatly put. "All is care in love and war" is feeble; but we come to better things in these: "It is not quite accurate to speak of a woman's character. Unless you designate which of her many you mean":—"It is usually the man with nothing to do who can never spare you a moment" (that is old, but well done):—"Some give according to their means—some according to their meanness." And "The educated heart is a broken heart," and "On judgment-day the Stork will have much to answer for," seem to us to reach a very high level of gnomic philosophy.

A very original kind of anthology is "The Shaver's Calendar" (Bullen), in which Mr. F. Sidgwick has collected from the poets and dramatists a "conceit" for every day in the year on the subject of shaving. By bad luck we opened it first at July, the main motto for which comes from "A Jewell for Gentry" (1614): "Begin at the cheek on the left side, from which directly take off the skinne." We shuddered, and turning more pages found many another awful quotation, enforcing on us with fresh bitterness the penalty of Adam, which Elia declared to be worse than the curse laid on Eve. Blood in every line! We once knew a man whose doctor ordered him to grow a beard; the daily loss of blood he suffered through shaving was, it appeared, too great a drain on a not very strong constitution. The alternative is even worse. "Take your hand away that's fiddling on my throat!" cries Browning on October 11; and J. M. Synge, the Irish dramatist, echoes him on October 6: "Let you keep away from me and not be soiling my chin." Mr. Sidgwick's book is enough to bring beards into fashion again.

The ACADEMY of August 11 contained a paragraph on the Malone Society, which has been recently founded for the printing of old plays in strict conformity with the most authentic texts and for the publishing of documents and information of interest to the students of the English Drama. To the original list of supporters given in that paragraph we may now add the names of Messrs. G. B. Churchill, Edmund Gosse, C. H. Herford, Percy Simpson, G. Gregory Smith and G. C. Moore Smith. The organising committee, which will draw up the rules, receive applications for membership (at the small subscription of one guinea) and put work in hand, consists of Messrs. F. S. Boas, E. K. Chambers, R. B. McKerrow, Alfred W. Pollard and the Provisional Honorary Secretary, Mr. W. W. Greg, Park Lodge, Wimbledon, to whom all communications should be addressed. The plays at present in hand are Wealth and Health (4to, n.d.), St. John the Evangelist (4to, n.d.), The Battle of Alcazar (4to; 1594), and Orlando Furioso (4to, 1594). Our readers will notice that the first two of these were among the pre-Shakespearean plays discovered at Lamport Hall during the latter half of the nineteenth century, and sold at Sotheby's in June last.

Those who are not in sympathy with the views which Mr. Alfred W. Pollard expressed—with our hearty concurrence—in the ACADEMY of September 22 on the subject of the sale of books to America will have received with sorrow the news that the famous Loveday copy of "The Passionate Pilgrime," 1612, has been sold by Messrs. Sotheby's to an American collector for £2000, a price which makes it the most costly volume of its size in the world. Those who wish for further information on the volume should turn to Notes and Queries, August 12, 1882, or, better still, to the "Census of Copies" included by Mr. Sidney Lee in his facsimile of the first edition published by the Oxford University Press last year. Of this ("third") edition only one other copy is known, that in the Bodleian, which is especially interesting as having both title-pages; that which has the words "By W. Shakespeare," and that from which the words have been removed, owing to Thomas Heywood's protest against the plagiarism contained in the same volume of his own "two Loue-Epistles," from Paris to Helen and from Helen to Paris. Of the first edition (1599) there are only two copies; one is in the Capell Library at Trinity, Cambridge; the other was in the Isham Library. Of the second edition no copies are known to survive.

October 19 is the centenary of the death of Henry Kirke White. His poems were very popular at one time—the second-hand stalls still offer many copies of his "Remains"; but of late years, if mentioned at all, it has usually been with a sneer. Even his early death of consumption has not availed him. Mr. Arthur Symonds, for instance, has attacked Southey on the score that he edited White's "worthless" writings. White had precocity, and he had some poetic power; his work is also interesting as the product of a transitional period. He began as an imitator of Goldsmith and Thomas Warton; he died before he had evolved his own manner or reached maturity of thought. Certainly, his work is not worthless; in some parts it is tame enough, in others simply pleasing, but at times there will be found a lilt of true melody and a touch of true imagination. If we strip Chatterton's poems of their antique garb, and forget the glamour of his romance, White need not shrink from the comparison. Sometimes his sweetness and smoothness develop into genuine force, particularly where he is handling blank verse, always a severe test of a young poet:

Lo, on the eastern summit, clad in grey,
Morn like a horseman girt for travel comes,
And from his tower of mist
Night's watchman hurries down.

These lines are surely not despicable; nor are those in which White followed Lyttelton and anticipated Macaulay and the "After London" of Jefferies:

O'er her marts,
Her crowded ports, broods silence; and the cry
Of the lone curlew, and the pensive dash
Of distant billows, break along the void.
Even as the savage sits upon the stone
That marks where stood her Capitols, and hears
The bittern booming in the weeds, he shrinks
From the dismaying solitude.

Was Southey so wrong, after all, in approving of the youth who could write like this? It would be easy also to quote snatches of lyric that have the true ring, such as the "Ode to Disappointment," and the Maiden, wrap thy mantle round thee,

Cold the rain beats on thy breast

On the whole, those of us have no need to be ashamed, who have nourished a quiet fondness for the poems of poor Kirke White.

IN LUCK

In Massachusetts it is well
That Teddy never came to dwell,
When mere suspicion of a Spell
Sent wonder-workers into hell—
A school whence never god or man drew
Spellers such as he and Andrew.

JOHN B. TABB.

Messrs. Hodgson and Co., Chancery Lane, announce a sale on October 17, 18 and 19 of a collection of books of a miscellaneous character. There are some important county histories—Nash's Worcestershire, Cussan's Hertfordshire and Hutchins's Dorset, also Warner's Illuminated Manuscripts in the British Museum, four series; a number of Goupil's Monographs, Wheatley's London, Extra-illustrated and extended to six vols.; an extensive collection of early books of travel in Australia and New Zealand; many sets of standard authors and a large collection of books and pamphlets, many of them rare, published in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

There has been discovered in Austria a manuscript volume which will be of much interest to print collectors. It is a catalogue, of date about 1820, of a collection of Bartolozzi prints. The name of the owner of the collection has apparently been cut out of the title-page, and the whereabouts of the prints, if they exist now as a collection, is not known. Probably no more complete collection of the works of one artist was ever made. The catalogue describes every detail of no less than 2472 prints and 4506 "states," giving the artists after whom they were executed, the sizes, manner of engraving, dates of issue and so on. An interesting circumstance is indicated by the catalogue. Although 2472 prints are dealt with, there are not this number of plates, owing to the fact that some of the plates were made to do duty for more than one subject. It is interesting to note the number of "states" of some of the best known Bartolozzi prints, described in the catalogue. Of Miss Farren after Lawrence there are four; of Lord Thurlow after Reynolds, five; of the Earl of Camden after Gainsborough, six; of Lady Smith and her children, four; of Miss Bingham and Countess Spencer after Reynolds, four each; of the Duchess of Devonshire, three; of Countess Cowper after Hamilton, six; and of the Princess of Wales and Princess Charlotte after Cosway, four. In the subject-engravings it is not uncommon to find six states, and in one (Tenderness, after Cipriani) there are seven. The catalogue is divided into sixteen parts, of which the first three are written in Italian, and the remainder in English.

The Dresdner Zeitung announces the discovery in Italy of a pocket sketch-book of Benvenuto Cellini containing some four score small designs by the master, chiefly of jewel work, cups and table plate.

We regret that in the Announcements Supplement published last week the two firms of Messrs. Brown, Langham and Co. and Messrs. Masters and Co. should have been included under one heading. The firms, we now hear, are distinct, though they have the same address; and Messrs. Masters are responsible only for the theological books that appeared in the printed list.

The following are among forthcoming events :

The British Academy.—The next Meeting will be held at the Rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, on Wednesday October 31, at 5 o'clock. Dr. D. G. Hogarth, Fellow of the Academy, will read a Paper on "The Ephesian Artemis."

Royal Microscopical Society.—The next Meeting of the Society will be held on Wednesday the 17th inst. at 8 o'clock P.M., when the following papers will be read: Mr. James Murray—Some Rotifera of the Sikkim Himalaya. Mr. J. M. Coon—Cornuvia serpula; a species of Mycetozoa new to Britain.

The Directors of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, Ltd., will devote the final evening of the Promenade Concert Season on the 26th inst to the Endowment Fund, inaugurated last year, for the benefit of the Members of the Orchestra. The Artists who have promised their services are Mrs. Henry J. Wood, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, and Mr. Henry J. Wood.

The Institute of Oil Painters, 195 Piccadilly, W.—Exhibition opens on Monday, October 15.

Messrs. Hodgson and Co.—October 17, 18 and 19. Sale of books as above.

Mr. Frederick Hollyer's Exhibition of reproduction of portraits by various masters from the fourteenth century to the present day with some from life. 9 Pembroke Square, Kensington. Closes November 5.

Royal Exchange.—October 22. Unveiling of the new fresco "Modern Commerce," by Frank Brangwyn, A.R.A., and T. L. Devitt.

LITERATURE

THE USE AND ABUSE OF FICTITIOUS GEOGRAPHY

Sophy of Kravonia. By ANTHONY HOPE. (Arrowsmith, 6s.)

MANY are the lines of thought suggested by Mr. Anthony Hope's new book. The theme is as old as the tale of King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid. It tells how a maid-servant came to be the sweetheart and presumably the wife of an earl. Thus baldly described, "Sophy of Kravonia" might hastily be classified with the literature that, according to the late Mr. Anthony Froude, ladies' maids love to read. But the treatment would probably surprise them, as the steps by which Sophy mounts the ladder are not those which would have suggested themselves either to the ordinary feminine novel reader or to students of those books of memoirs which show how fair ladies in real life have earned the reward of social fame and success. Sophy differs from these pleasing heroines in nearly every respect. She is not entrancingly beautiful, though it may as well be said here once and for all that the novelist has been able to keep in his own mind's eye, and consequently in that of the reader, the vision of a woman supremely womanly and therefore supremely attractive. Her first claim to distinction is a birthmark which glows on her face when other damsels would blush. That gives distinction of a kind to her. Against it is the fact that she is called by the plebeian name of Grouch. She loses her father early and finds a guardian who thinks she has done well by her when the girl is engaged to be a kitchenmaid or help to the cook. Her first step up the ladder occurs when she has the opportunity of giving a bone to Lord Dunstanbury's dog. It is a very tiny step and ought to have led to nothing, as Lord Dunstanbury promptly disappears until he is needed again in the last act. Step number two occurs when Lady Margaret Duddington is so struck with the red star on the girl's face that she takes her into her protection on the understanding that the moment she tires the contract may be ended by the enclosure of a £100 note in an envelope without any explanation whatsoever. Lady Margaret Duddington's intention is to use the strange young woman as a medium, her hobby and weakness lying in the direction of spiritualism. Step number three is the falling in love of a French officer with her. Fortunately or unfortunately he is killed in battle, and she is carried off to the mythical kingdom of Kravonia. Step number four is when, with a heavy lamp, she all but breaks the neck of a Kravonian officer. Step number five is the falling in love with her of the Prince whose life she had saved. The sixth step is the death of this Prince under circumstances that bring the long absent Lord Dunstanbury to her rescue. It is earnestly to be hoped that young women of a dreamy and romantic tendency will not be led by the perusal of this brief history, to lie in wait on balconies with heavy lamps which they are ready to drop on the head of any unfortunate prowler, who, in their hot fancy, may be taken for an officer, bent on assassination. From the epitome of the story here presented it will be apparent that Sophy is a very passive agent. Her career comes in answer neither to will nor to ambition; emphatically she is among those who have greatness thrust upon them, and the maiden who hopes to emulate this seductive career will probably find that her path is more thickly strewn with briars and thorns than the author has suggested. Perhaps his work will be considered all the more suitable for the drawing-room in so far as not a hint is given of the pitfalls that lie on either side of the primrose path. On a memorable occasion Thackeray expressed his regret that the conventions of the day made it impossible for him to paint a full-length portrait of a man. Mr. Anthony Hope might say the same only with a change of sex.

Now we come to a second consideration with regard to this novel, which is, the use made in it of a fictitious kingdom. We are not of the number of those who would apply the decalogue or any commandment whatever to the novelist. He is allowed to do what he likes and leave undone what he likes. The only criterion by which he is to be judged is the result, and, to be quite frank and explicit, this kingdom of Kravonia is one of the dullest realms in which it has been our ill-fortune to wander. Mr. Anthony Hope has illustrated his chapters with maps, but he should also have added a list of characters. At any rate we have found it most difficult to keep in mind which of these very ordinary people in Kravonia is the scoundrel and which the hero. They have such names as Stenovics, Natcheff, Mistitch, Sterkoff and Zerkovitch, but it would almost have been necessary for lucidity's sake for Mr. Anthony Hope to have appended to each his description every time his name was mentioned. It reminds one of Lord Beaconsfield who said in regard to two of his ministers that he never could remember whether it was Mr. W. H. Cross and Sir R. Smith or Sir W. H. Smith and Mr. R. Cross. Thus Mr. Hope's fictitious geography is not justified of the inhabitants. They are a very dull set of people in spite of their intrigues, their mimic wars, their assassinations, death-beds, loves and hates. One can almost imagine that the novelist began with a very different scheme in his head, because the early chapters are spirited, fine, and true to nature. A false note, however, is struck with the entry of Lady Margaret, whose whimsical fancy for the girl is not justified artistically by the result, and the sense of reality once lost never reasserts itself.

That is why we feel inclined to inquire when and how an author may with advantage invent his own geography. On at least one occasion Mr. Anthony Hope did this successfully. Perhaps the comparative failure on the present occasion is due to the fact that he has repeated an old device. In no circumstances, however, can we imagine that his plot actually needs any fanciful land for its development, unless it be that he wished to introduce kings, queens, and their ministers in order to delight the ears of the ladies' maids. Since the time of Homer fabulous countries have frequently been used with great effect by distinguished writers. Homer himself made them the scenes of strange appearances and wonderful adventures. Shakespeare was as brilliant as Homer when he gave us the island with Prospero and Caliban and Ariel upon it. For a very different purpose Jonathan Swift invented Lilliput and Brobdingnag. Like cannot be compared with unlike, but the purpose at which Swift aimed was as brilliantly achieved in his way as was that of Shakespeare and Homer in their way. Defoe stumbled upon a place of fictitious geography that will ever delight the minds of children. When Mr. Anthony Hope wrote "The Prisoner of Zenda" this discovery of new land had a freshness and a beauty of its own. Perhaps one reason why we find the kingdom of Kravonia so dull is because Mr. Anthony Hope has had so many imitators. Probably a hundred books have been written since his first one appeared, and the device has become stale. He is not alone in his misfortune. Mr. H. G. Wells, who went beyond the habitable globe altogether in search of a dwelling-place for the efforts of his imagination, must also be now growing sick of the planet Mars and even of occasional comets. A fictitious land can only be usefully invented when there is something new to say. It is always more or less of a Utopia.

COVENTRY PATMORE

Poems by Coventry Patmore. With an Introduction by BASIL CHAMPNEYS. (Bell, 6s.)

A ONE-VOLUME edition of Patmore's poems was much needed. They had been published in various forms, in different order, at different stages of completion: so that it was not always easy for a purchaser to secure what he wanted unless by particular inquiry at a bookseller's counter. This inconvenience has now been remedied. All the poems, with the latest changes in them (whether improvements or otherwise) are brought together in a single volume of clear and stately print. A remarkably faithful portrait is included in the six-shillings' worth, and Mr. Basil Champneys adds an introductory discourse in which a sufficiency of biographical detail has place.

In the later half of a lifetime by no means exceptionally long, Patmore saw his poems in the hands of three generations of readers, each with distinctive predilections in poetry and with very different tests for the value of his own verse. According to Mr. Gosse, an authority seldom open to doubt in such matters, it was in 1863 that the "Angel in the House" entered into popularity. Our own remembrance is that not only among a perceptive few, but in every place where literature was talked, that surprising novelty in verse was warmly discussed long before 1863. But if Mr. Gosse post-dates the arrival of Patmore's success he does not exaggerate its magnitude. It was a success that would now be called sensational; for beginning with the volunteer good word of Landor, Tennyson, Ruskin, the Brownings, Carlyle, and other high literary personages, it ran on to the captivation of thousands of minds which till then had hardly known themselves possessed of poetic sensibilities. So much was quite evident at the time; though it may not seem altogether credible to many who read the "Angel in the House" to-day, and read with full appreciation of its merits. And in ten years from 1863, in less than ten years, there was an end to the "Angel's" popularity; not by gradual lapse into neglect, but under a sudden irruption of new ideas, angry and contemptuous. Not, of course, that this fierce change of mood told upon Patmore only or even with particularity. Nothing that would bear the description, "tea-table poesy," could be endured. Tennyson himself—"Miss Alfred" as he was called—was the more direct object of revulsion and attack, in the wind of which Patmore and his two little volumes of verse were carried away into what seemed the outer darkness of oblivion. Such rebellious changes of opinion and sentiment have been common enough; all can be accounted for and few are without reasonable explanation.

The reaction from which Patmore suffered was no exceptional case. Whether by intention or not, the pre-Raphaelite spirit is as fully expressed in the "Angel in the House"—in the treatment of that poem we mean—as by any of the pictures of the Brotherhood painted at the same time. But here the poet had a considerable advantage over the painters. He had chosen a theme which, when rightly understood, was entirely novel, and even when not so understood was never more congenially attractive to Patmore's fellow countrymen than in the middle of the last century. At the same time, the pre-Raphaelite directness and simplicity of expression was better suited to the poet's purpose—the exaltation of Love in Marriage—than to anything that the painter could choose for fixed and challenging display on canvas. But yet there was that in the primal nakedness of pre-Raphaelism which embarrassed and even obscured substantial merit in all art; as Millais soon found out and Patmore sooner. Patmore never openly allowed that the cantering versification of the "Angel in the House" was a mistake, nor that the sweet trivialities of his story were spread too diffusely under too strong a light. But the mischief was there, and it worked to such effect that the popularity of the "Angel in the House" did not long survive the captivation of surprise. At the first breath of the spirit of criticism that came in when Swinburne was on the road Patmore's "Angel" wafted away, was remembered for a little while with less of admiration than amused derision, and then seemed forgotten altogether. All this within the space of nine or ten years.

For a longer period thereafter Patmore or his work remained in complete neglect: or in what would have been complete neglect but for the fact, firstly, that the "Angel in the House" was not all of a piece, and, secondly, that what in a sudden revulsion of taste was most disliked in that poem was no essential attribute of Patmore's genius, but accidental, extraneous, an unhappy choice of trappings for it. The "Angel" is a narrative poem printed in sections, each of which is marshalled by two or three brief independent pieces happily invented and justly called Preludes. At its first appearance, attention was mostly and quite naturally drawn to the narrative poem. Popularity came and went with attention to the narrative poem; that is to say, to that larger part of the book which was most exposed to the accusation of banality. But Patmore had a minority of readers who, while they found in the story many a good line of meaning music, found more in the Preludes, which were sometimes written as if by another hand. In the minds of such readers as these, the fewer but the better though more silent ones, Patmore lived throughout the long winter of general neglect. And he had not been idle all the time. He had been writing certain Odes which came out from time to time in print—all of them more firmly stamped with the mark of poetic genius, some majestically great in expression if not to every mind acceptable in meaning, and some others supremely beautiful in spirit and deliverance alike. While these came straggling out one by one or a few at a time, a new generation brought on another change of taste, or mood, or whatever may be the better name for it; whereupon Patmore's poems, "Angel in the House" and all, were handsomely restored to the currency of English literature.

This brief history has a purpose, suggested by the publication for the first time of the whole of the poems in a single volume, issued at an easy price. Patmore's new readers, for whom we may suppose this edition mainly intended, will now have the whole series in one view; which, as Mr. Champneys thinks (and there will be but little disagreement with him so far), is just as it should be. As we understand, it seems to him a matter of high importance, in reading Patmore, to mark a continuity of intention, ever expanding, from the simplicities of the "Angel in the House" to those odes of his which ascend to the most forbidding heights of mysticism: those odes in which nuptial love is closely identified with Divine Love, the union of God and the soul of man. It is extremely doubtful that Patmore had in mind any such expansion of his theme, or ever thought of stretching it to that dread height, when the "Angel in the House" was sent to press. Looking backward from these strangely spiritual poems—few but baffling and distressing—to the earlier one, it is easy to find apparent indications of the supposed continuity of purpose and design: only, however, by looking backward, only by looking back upon an actual line of advance which would have been the same had there been no predilection in the poet's mind and no foresight from one stage to the next. Possibly he may have persuaded himself in his later days that he was conscious of where his theme would end when he began to write the "Angel." But there is no good reason for inferring that he had that idea, and if he had we should believe in nothing more than self-persuasion gradually acquired.

Holding these views, we cannot welcome the thought that many new readers of Patmore may go through his poems, from the "Angel" onward, accompanied by a supposition that, in part at least, the first pages were intentional preparation for the mysteries suggested in the last. They had no such purpose; and the most distant suspicion, the remotest idea that they had, must have an unfortunate effect on the reader's mind. And considering what a medley of good and bad, of pleasure and offence, the "Angel in the House" will still be thought, we cannot think acquaintance with Patmore fortunate when it begins with the perusal of that poem's many pages. There is in them a strong possibility of prejudicial weariness and dislike. They have many beauties and reveal a hundred indications of greatness; but could we prescribe for the general reader on his own and Patmore's behalf, we would bid him pass at once to the fewer pages where, again and again, the truest and most finished greatness may be found. We would have these later poems read, as they were written and as they are printed, without regard to sequence, and only for whatever meaning each may seem to hold. Those that are undoctinal are all the truest poetry; yet the few which, being doctinal in a strange forbidding way, cannot be read in a consenting spirit, are themselves splendid examples of poetic fire and subtlety.

TRISTAN AND YSEULT

Tristram and Isolt: a Drama in Four Acts. By J. COMYNS-CARR. (Duckworth, 2s. net.)

No story connected with Arthur's Round Table has so attracted the imagination and exercised the pens of poets, as that of Tristan and Yseult. Yet this story did not originally belong to the Arthurian cycle of romances. It was forced in after this cycle was complete, and the other members of the ring contain no reference to Tristan and his tale. Mr. Ludlow, who wrote two volumes on the "Popular Epics of the Middle Ages," passed over the Arthurian group. He says rather contemptuously:

We can only make Arthur epic by making him more and more unreal; the only patriotism he appeals to is a microscopic Welsh or Breton patriotism; no religious fervour can be kindled in his favour by making him a Christian hero against Paynim Saxons, long converted into good Catholics. The real centres of interest in the Arthurian cycle are two essentially unpopular ones—the wire-drawn double adulteries of Launcelot and Guinevere, and that of Tristan and Isolt, very fit themes for courtly pruriency and sentimentalism, very poor and dull ones for the healthy popular mind.

Sir Walter Scott, who published the English metrical romance of Sir Tristrem, by Thomas of Erceldoune, strove to give to Thomas the credit of being the writer of the story, and of having recorded the theme for Norman and Provençal, for German and Italian epic poets. But this was a delusion. Thomas himself was a copyist. The earliest writer of this epic was Chrestien de Troyes, born between 1140 and 1150, chief minstrel at the Court of Philip, Count of Flanders and Vermandois. Unhappily his great poem, "Del roi Marc et d'Ysolt la blonde," is lost, and the earliest redaction of it that is extant is that of Luce de Gast, who came from the department of Calvados, but spent his life near Salisbury. He pretended that his composition was based on a Latin chronicle, but this was a common trick adopted to enable his story to receive credence as history. Luce de Gast did not complete his poem, and it was finished by Elie de Boron at the solicitation of a kinsman of King Henry III. Thomas of Erceldoune belonged to the thirteenth century. His son signed a charter in 1299. As already said, the tale spread everywhere in Europe. It was condensed into Icelandic or Old Norse in or about 1226, by command of King Hakon. It became the theme of epics by Gottfried of Strassburg, Henry of Vriberg, Ulrich of Thürheim, and others, in German. Hans Sachs, the Nürnberg cobbler-poet, composed a play upon the story. Wagner adopted it for one of his operas, and now in England we have Mr. Comyns Carr dishing it up for the stage. Although the most popular and famous of the tales connected with the Round Table, it is not easy to see in what its particular merit consists. We will give a sketch of the original story, leaving out the tedious episodes wherewith it is padded.

Meliadus of Lyonesse was descended from the nephew of Joseph of Arimathea. His wife was Isabel, sister of Marc, King of Cornwall. Meliadus was fascinated by the beauty of a fairy and eloped with her, leaving wife and kingdom to look after themselves. Isabel gave chase to her runaway husband, but was arrested in the pursuit by the pains of labour, and she gave birth to a son, whom from the doleful circumstances of his birth she named Tristan, and then expired. The name in Thomas of Erceldoune is Tristram, and that is the form adopted by Mr. Carr. The Queen's squire Gouvernaille took charge of the child and restored him to his father, who had recovered from his infatuation and had returned to Cornwall.

Marc, having had it prognosticated to him that he would be dethroned by his nephew, vowed the death of Tristan. His emissaries killed Meliadus, but the child was rescued by Gouvernaille, who conveyed it to the Court of Pharamond of France. After a time a reconciliation was affected between Marc and his nephew, and Tristan completed his education at Tintagel. In a tournament with Moraunt, brother of the Queen of Ireland, at Tintagel, Tristan killed him, but was himself wounded by the poisoned lance of Moraunt. Then Tristan departed from Cornwall in quest of a skilled surgeon. A breeze carried his boat to the coast of Ireland. Landing there he tuned his harp and played. It was a summer evening, and Gormund, King of Ireland, with Yseult, his daughter, heard the strains and had the harper brought to the castle, where Yseult speedily recovered him of his wound. But after that he was found out, from the circumstance of wearing the sword of Moraunt, to be the knight who had killed the brother of the queen, and he was obliged to quit the country. On his return to Cornwall he fell in love with the wife of a Cornish noble, and followed her to the Court of King Arthur, and so got drawn into the cycle of Arthurian romance. Getting tired of the lady, and willing to please his uncle, Tristan proposed to go to Ireland again and induce Gormund to give Yseult as wife to his uncle Marc. This was approved, and the King of Ireland overlooked the death of his brother-in-law in consideration of the advantage of the marriage of his daughter to the King of Cornwall. But before Tristan departed with the damsel, the mother of Yseult gave to her daughter's handmaid, Brangian, a love-potion to be administered to Yseult and Marc on the occasion of their marriage. Of this beverage Tristan and Yseult unfortunately partook on the voyage. Its effects were instantaneous. It precipitated each into the other's arms; nor were the effects other than permanent. On their arrival in Cornwall, a trick was played on Marc, and lest uneasiness should arise in the mind of the king, Brangian was substituted for Yseult temporarily, and then the prudent Yseult, to escape the possibility of detection, delivered her maid to two ruffians, with orders to murder her. The assassins, more pitiful than the mistress, contented themselves with tying her to a tree, from which fate she was released by Sir Palamedes.

After this, a great part of the romance is occupied with the contrivances of the lovers to elude the vigilance of Marc and procure secret interviews. However, Marc's suspicions were roused, and he drove Tristan out of the realm. Whilst on the continent, Tristan happened to be wounded by a poisoned arrow, and went into Brittany to be healed by a second Yseult, she of the White Hands; and in gratitude for his cure he married her, and spent his honeymoon in building a boat in which to escape to Cornwall and renew his liaison with Yseult the Queen. When the boat was completed he entered her and was wafted to the English coast. After another visit to King Arthur, and further adventures, he made his way to Cornwall, accompanied by his brother-in-law Pheredin. No sooner did they reach Tintagel, than Pheredin fell in love with Queen Yseult. Tristan thereupon went mad with jealousy; but after a while was cured once more by Queen Yseult; and the intrigue went on till Marc's jealousy was roused, and he exacted an oath from Tristan to leave Cornwall for ever. Tristan then returned to King Arthur, and a series of fresh adventures ensued. Then Tristan, oblivious of his oath, went back to Cornwall and stirred up an insurrection against his uncle, and eloped with his paramour, the Queen. After a while he abandoned her, and went back to Brittany to his sadly neglected wife. Here Tristan, engaged in a sordid intrigue, for the third time is wounded by a poisoned weapon, and of course sends a messenger to Yseult of Cornwall to come over and heal him. Should she be willing to come, his messenger is instructed, on approaching the shore, to hoist a white sail, and a black one should he fail in persuasion—an idea borrowed from a classic original. Yseult consented, as a matter of course, ran away from her husband, Marc, and started for Brittany. Meanwhile Yseult of the White Hands had discovered that the faithless Tristan had sent for her rival, as also what the signal was to be that would announce her approach. The vessel bearing the Queen of Cornwall was being wafted to the harbour by a favourable breeze that swelled the white sail. Yseult, who was watching on the shore, flew to her husband, and reported that the sail was black. Thereupon Tristan uttered a cry of despair and expired. When Yseult of Cornwall landed and heard of his death, she also gave up the ghost.

Such is the bare outline of this famous tale, and it is difficult to see any great originality and merit in it. The most poetic incident is that of the white and black sails, which is borrowed from the story of Ægeus and Theseus. Tristan gets wounded thrice with poisoned weapons. He fights with giants and monsters, he falls in love with married women and deserts them. He is without a spark of honour. To his own wife he is contemptuously untrue. If faithful, after a fashion, to the first Yseult, it is due solely to the love potion he had drunk, not to any chivalry in his nature. His final despair and death are due to disappointment because she will not come and salve his sores. The character of Yseult is equally despicable: selfish, deceitful and cruel, she repays the faithful companion, who had saved her good name, by sending assassins to murder her.

Mr. Comyns Carr has had to condense the story: one poisoned weapon suffices for him. Yseult the wife of Tristan is converted into something between the Angel of Death and a mermaid. The love potion it was quite unnecessary to retain. Queen Margaret, according to Shakespeare, fell in love with the Duke of Suffolk sent over to obtain her as a wife for Henry IV. Two young persons so situated would very possibly, even probably, become enamoured of each other, without the aid of a philtre. Mr. Comyns Carr makes the vessel encounter a storm which doubtless, if Yseult and Brangian had been real personages, would have upset their insides; but it does not spill the potion carried in an open goblet. There is all the difference in the world between the coarse daub of the scene of Tristan and Yseult of the Romance finding in the boat that they love each other, and the delicate handling of Dante in narrating the fall of Francesca da Rimini. Mr. Carr does not enter into details, but he retains all the mawkish sentiment of the original.

The story of Tristan and Yseult is simply the glorification of adultery, and it was solely on that account that it appealed to the taste of the licentious courts of the kings and princes and nobles of mediæval Europe.

Such a story now can only be endured when used as a vehicle for Wagner's music; and Mr. Comyns Carr's poetry is not of so high an order as to be palatable.

SIR EVELYN WOOD

From Midshipman to Field-Marshal. By EVELYN WOOD, F.M., V.C., G.C.B., G.C.M.G. 2 vols. (Methuen, 25s. net.)

AMONG other useful memoranda printed at the beginning of this book there is a page-long epitome of Sir Evelyn's career in a list of his "war services." This list being scanned we say to ourselves: "If the man who took part in all these stirring scenes, these great events, had good eyes, a good memory, and knows how to use a pen, a fine course of reading lies before us." Firstly the Crimean campaign, at the historic distance of fifty years and yet not beyond personal interest or politic inquiry. Immediately thereupon the direfully romantic Indian Mutiny, of which there was more forgetfulness at the end of the last century than is allowed at the beginning of this. Then the Ashanti War, of no great importance from the soldier's and statesman's point of view, but with its own romance too; comparing with the incursions that broke into the New World in the days of Spanish ascendancy. Soon afterward the war with Cetewayo and his Zulus (another memory more distinct of late) and the first Transvaal War—1878–81. In 1882 the Egyptian conflict provoked by Arabi; and, lastly, the Soudan expedition of 1884–5, which brings in the Gordon legend with new particulars. Such a history is the constant renewal for a lifetime of vivid experiences in ever-changing scenes, ever-changing circumstance and companionship; and how much must there be to tell of them when to these experiences is added the gift of a harvesting eye, a good memory, and competence with the pen. Has Sir Evelyn Wood, then, these crowning advantages? The good memory probably; but certainly an old and ever-constant habit of note-taking by diary and "letters home" which supplies him with more than the best of memories could have stored. The other qualifications are equally evident. We see now if we did not know before that his observation is of the kind that has no eclectic preferences, but casts its net upon every significant thing, every noticeable person that comes within its range: no matter what sort of thing or what kind of person. With such opportunities for its exercise as crowded upon Sir Evelyn Wood for the greater part of his days, this precious faculty gathered for him the hoard of reminiscence and good story which he now distributes through his pages with a literary aptitude of which he seems quite unconscious. Told without effort, these stories and other "good things" are so numerous that all the rapacity of all the newspapers has not yet appropriated half of them. Yet, many as they are, they drop into their places easily and quietly, and with no sensible interruption of the narrative in which they occur. Few practised writers have ever found this an easy achievement; but then it is the practised writer who least knows the magic of simplicity. On all occasions, indeed, even when the noblest or the most touching deeds of heroism are his theme (as they often are), Sir Evelyn writes in a style familiar as fireside talk; losing nothing by it as he possibly feared, but earning an uncalculated gain.

It must not be supposed, however, that "From Midshipman to Field-Marshal" is an amusing book of the usual Reminiscence order. Yet what may be said is that while the book is eminently instructive, it is instructive for the most part in an amusing, even extremely interesting way. Thus in the earlier chapters (our author sticking faithfully to notes made at the time) we see the privations, the hazards, the defeats and triumphs of the Crimean War as they appeared to the eyes and enlarged the experience of an adventurous boy; and thus we have new views, strictly accurate, but as if supplied by Mr. Henty. Elsewhere in many a page our knowledge of this campaign and that little war is cleared and enlarged by a variety of small particulars which first amuse and then are found to be greatly informing. It follows from this that what we read here imparts a more intimate knowledge of the Crimean War, the Mutiny, and, above all, the Zulu War and the first campaign against the Boers, than we had before, or than the professional chronicler was ever likely to supply. Wood's South African reminiscences, seemingly as fresh as yesterday's records, are especially interesting, as they will find who have never heard in detail of the Empress Eugénie's visit to South Africa and its purpose, or the story of the death of Captain Barton. As to Sir Evelyn's own story, it is all romance throughout, and so appears very strikingly even from the matter-of-fact account of incidents and accidents relative to self which is scattered up and down his pages. It does appear that he has a joyful sense of success, of honours well earned and handsomely bestowed; but from first to last we see no evidence of a craving for personal distinction, nor repining at anything in his lot but the prospect (which did occur once) of lapsing employment. While he has not too much to say for himself, he brings forward many a comrade—some known to us, some unknown—for the praise that ought not to have been missed or that there ought to be more of. Of the jealousy that rankles more or less in all the professions there is not a trace; and one of the secrets of his success in managing men may be discovered, perhaps, when we mark how equally quick and warm was his recognition of skill and courage wherever found.

Sir Evelyn strictly confines his survey to the past, and from that he makes no forecast of the future at any point. Some regret has been expressed on this account, and he has been half reproached for withholding his views of what should be done to dispose of the military problems of the day. But a book like this is not the place for any such controversial matter.

AN OLD JOURNALISTIC HAND

St. Stephen's in the Fifties. By EDWARD MICHAEL WHITTY. (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

PRESS writers of to-day, it seems to us, occasionally forget that very clever writers wielded the pen before their day. English journalism never was better than in the 'fifties and 'sixties of last century. At that time it was not manufactured so obviously for the eyes and ears of the vulgar as is the case to-day, but was addressed to a select and intelligent audience. The consequence is that much of it has passed into the ranks of permanent literature, and in this portion a high place must be given to the book before us. Mr. Edward Michael Whitty wrote Gallery letters to the Leader newspaper, an extremely clever journal that now has passed into oblivion. These letters are better than those of the present day for two reasons. One is that the writer was an exceptionally keen, witty and intelligent observer. The other is that Parliament at that time contained more interesting characters than it does to-day. Among others Disraeli, Gladstone and John Bright were at St. Stephen's and nightly supplied young Whitty with copy. We take rather a long quotation from the introductory hints to new M.P.s, but it gives a living picture of Disraeli as he appeared in those early days.

The House of Commons is before you, and your sensations undergo an instantaneous collapse. Your eye takes in the scene: a full House, listening, but lazily and loungingly; the cheer you heard having been made up of an aggregate half laugh, half sneer. You see the orator, there at the top. His body is half thrown across the table, one hand resting behind him, flirting with a laced cambric, the other white hand tapping gently a red box. And he is making a great speech? He is talking to Lord John, whose arms are crossed carelessly, whose thin lips are parted with an easy smile, and who seems to think the eloquence rather amusing. Mr. Disraeli has a most exquisite voice, and he is using only its gentlest modulations. He is quite colloquial, and his tone is friendly and familiar,—especially when he comes to a bitter innuendo, when he turns his head to the country gentlemen, that they may hear it and laugh—a low, simmering chuckle, that just agitates the surface for a moment only, Lord John and the Whigs and the Radicals smiling, too, as though the sarcasm were a good-natured joke. Mr. Disraeli is getting near the end of his speech, and is now recapitulating and fastening all the points (not mathematical ones) together, as is his wont; and this is his argumentative style. He approaches the peroration—his forte; and here he raises his head; he throws back his collar: he puts by his cambric; he turns from Lord John and faces the House. He speaks slower; he ceases his affected stammer; he is more serious and more solemn, but still quiet and unpretending. Talking now to the many, and not to one or two, he becomes more oratorical, and he fixes attention. What he is now saying is the manifesto of a party; and not a syllable is lost. He is nearing a meaning, and his articulation is elaborate; and there is a dead silence. But he is still unexcited; dexterously and quietly he eludes the meaning—soars above it, in one or two involuted closing sentences, delivered with a louder voice and with more vehement gestures; and having got the cheer at the right spot, this great orator, concluding, sinks into his seat, as nonchalant as though he had been answering a question about Fahrenheit, and immediately (Mackenzie having told him how the division will be) turns to ask Lord Henry Lennox whether Crispien was in good voice that night!

The journalist does not conceal his opinion that Disraeli was never of equal weight to Gladstone in debate, but as a literary man he likes best to deal with the adventurer. Besides, as can be easily gathered from these pages, Mr. Whitty was much more in sympathy with erratic cleverness than with solid capacity. Of Mr. Bright he said that he had no equal "in sneering invective, in suggesting rather than in speaking contempt." But he never loses sight of the minor Parliamentary characters, provided they are interesting. Take, for instance, Henry Drummond. It is possible to gain a very adequate idea of this curious genius from the references that occur in the volume. He tells us that his trenchant common sense never missed a point. The mot that Cain was the first Dissenter was noted almost as soon as it was spoken. In another passage we are told that Mr. Henry Drummond "is to the feast of reason in the House what the skeleton was to the Egyptian debauches." We are told how the House chuckled when Mr. Drummond called it "a Bazaar of places, and emphatically pronounced every forensic M.P. a place-hunter." The author goes on to ask: Why was Mr. Drummond laughed with and Mr. Duffy laughed at? And the answer is that Mr. Drummond was emphatically "one of us." There are many other passages about him which might be usefully compared with the memorable account Carlyle once gave of a dinner at his house. The same vigilant eye for detail has presented to us little vignettes of all the men who were famous at the time and many who were fated to become so. Mr. Whitty must have been a paragon of newspaper correspondents.

TWO ACTORS

Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving. By BRAM STOKER. 2 vols. (Heinemann, 25s. net.)

Joseph Jefferson. Reminiscences of a Fellow Player. By FRANCIS WILSON. (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. BRAM STOKER's book on Sir Henry Irving has been eagerly expected. High hopes were entertained of it. It was known not only that the author was a close personal friend of the great actor, intimately associated with him during the whole of his career and so better able than any other living man to give an account of him in public and in private life, but that he was one who, if business matters claimed the most of his time and ability, was also an author with a fine gift of telling a story and impressing a picture on the mind. An ideal biographer, one would have imagined, possessing at once the knowledge of his subject, the power of expressing it and (if we may say so without offence) just that touch of Boswell about his admiration that is of such value in these cases. And the reminiscences, now we have them, prove anticipation to have been right in everything but the one point of the workmanship. This is not a book at all; it is a congeries, a collection, a scrap-album. It contains a mass of the very things which we hoped it would omit—pieces of gossip, records of people whom Irving met, of suppers and speeches. The only thing it spares us is press-notices, and those not entirely. Gossip is good, when it is Boswellian gossip and when the subject of the memoir has the tongue of a Johnson. Mr. Stoker's Boswellianism is of the wrong sort; it remembers and records trivial things which do not bring out the characteristics or the genius of his subject. And Sir Henry had not the tongue of a Johnson. His genius lay in other fields, in fields that cannot be covered by chronicles of small beer.

Had Mr. Stoker been content to cut out one half of his work—we refer especially to some uninteresting reminiscences of other people than Irving in vol. ii.—the remainder would have been a fitting monument of a great friendship with a great man. For when he comes to the point, so to speak, when he tells us what he alone could tell, the financial history of Sir Henry's management, the relations between Irving and Tennyson, Irving's attitude towards the modern dramatist, he is extremely interesting; and when he comes to tell of his own feelings for his chief, of the "turn of the tide" through accident and illness, of the last years and the death, he rises to what we expected of him. It is impossible to read unmoved. So just, so strong, so manly, so wise a tribute has never yet been paid to Sir Henry, and never will be again. Here, at last, the man lives for us in the pages of his friend; here, at last, we catch the sense of his greatness, which makes all the gossip and chatter seem dustier and dryer than before.

Three things in the book are of importance: the account of Sir Henry's views on his art; the financial history of his management and his attitude towards the contemporary dramatist. To take the last first. It was often said that Irving did nothing for the modern drama. Mr. Stoker shows that, besides the plays by living authors which he produced, he accepted and paid for more than twenty. If it be objected that none of these plays were really representative of modern movements in drama, there are two pertinent replies possible. In the first place, there was in Sir Henry's prime no modern movement worth forwarding; in the second, he could no more be blamed for not forwarding it than a Porson could be blamed for not writing a novel. It was not there that his genius lay; and what his genius did for the stage we need not now point out. The financial side of the story will clear up many doubtful points and dissipate many calumnies, and Mr. Stoker's chapter on the philosophy of acting and other references to Sir Henry's views make it plain that he was not on the side of Diderot in the great dispute. We should have liked, by the way, to have seen more emphasis laid on a side of his work which entitled Sir Henry, quite as much as his acting, to the name of artist—his productions. Charles Kean had done something in that direction. It remained for Irving to establish once for all that the play was the thing; that it must be regarded as a whole; that every line and every movement, even the smallest, of every character, must be subordinated to the single effect. In this he showed himself indeed a great artist. All the Royal Academy assistance in the world would not have availed him much, had he not owned the master-mind to throw all into scale together.

We have taken objection to some of Mr. Stoker's gossip, and feel it only fair to add that the rest of it is very interesting gossip. Tennyson, according to Mr. Stoker, who is generous in his admirations, had in him all the elements of a great dramatist, and only needed technical knowledge of the stage. Irving was always asking him for new plays, and on one occasion suggested a play on Dante. "A fine subject!" replied Tennyson. "But where is the Dante to write it?" Had Sir Henry laid that reply to heart, what disappointment he and all of us would have been spared a few years later! We hear, too, all about Sir Henry's own adaptation of Becket for the stage; and the admiration of poet and actor each for the other appears to have been very great. The visits to Freshwater must have been amongst the pleasantest of recollections. We find Tennyson reading aloud, and Irving telling him he would have made a fine actor; Tennyson telling stories, and opening his mind to Mr. Stoker in a way which few have enjoyed. Mr. Stoker quotes something that Tennyson said to him not long before his death:

You know I don't believe in an eternal hell, with an All-merciful God. I believe in the All-merciful God! It would be better otherwise that men should believe they are only ephemera!

There are good stories, too, not a few—of the stuffed horse in the railway horse-box; of Mr. Stoker's reply to a happy father who offered the use of his own child for the baby in Henry VIII., which concluded:

As the play will probably run for a considerable time, your baby would grow. It might, therefore, be necessary to provide another baby. To this you and your wife might object—at short notice.

If Mr. Stoker is unwise in admitting too much into his pages, he is, at least, never foolish. We cannot say the same of Mr. Francis Wilson, a well-known and popular American actor, who has, deliberately and admittedly, attempted to Boswellise Joseph Jefferson. Mr. Jefferson was an amiable and energetic actor who made a name and a fortune by playing two parts, Rip Van Winkle and his own idea of Bob Acres in The Rivals, with occasional appearances as Dr. Pangloss in The Heir-at-Law, the author of which Mr. Wilson invariably misspells as "Coleman." He was a delightful, genial, able man, who deserved better treatment than to have all his little failings so ruthlessly exposed as by the entirely well-meaning hand of his Boswell.

One of Mr. Jefferson's amiable traits was his love of painting: is it fair to quote such remarks as this: "The error of our American artists consists in too servile imitation of the foreign schools . . . I myself have found much trouble in avoiding this, for now and then suggestions of Corot and Daubigny kept unconsciously intruding themselves"; or that the jolting of a train in which Mr. Jefferson was painting, "helped the leafiness of the picture"? What are we to think of the man who can gravely record such a sentiment as: "Genius may dye the hues of the rainbow, but art catches the tints and makes them lasting"? "Much fun," we read, "was caused by Jefferson's inability to spell Miss Wright's given name—Eleanor"; a statement which lessens our surprise when we are told, a few pages later to "think of the great characters that have been presented by Shakespeare and Bulwer," or that Mr. Jefferson's list of plays that were good literature as well as good acting plays included The Wife, The Honey-moon, Fazio, Douglas, and London Assurance. Nothing but malice (which is out of the question) or the sublimest innocence could lead a biographer to publish this: "Happiness is the religion of our family. To begin with, we take all the comic papers." "Irving will be remembered because he was knighted" is an opinion as false as that which follows: that Mr. Jefferson himself would be remembered only because of his autobiography. It bears too clearly the traces of feeling left by a discussion on Macbeth, in which the English actor and student did not treat, perhaps, with befitting seriousness the views of one who admitted that he was not a student of Shakespeare, though "what he had read he knew as well as Mr. Irving or Mr. Anybody Else." That Mr. Jefferson was not the man this unfortunate book would imply is clear enough from one or two very wise and witty remarks admitted into its pages by accident. "For my own part," he says, of the old discussion on the subject of Diderot's "Paradox" (of which he had not, apparently, heard), "I like to have the heart warm and the head cool"; and, again, of acting: "The actor is most often effective when he shows how he is impressed by what is said to him." But those who knew Mr. Jefferson personally and those who knew him only on the stage will be sorry to see him so belittled by an account which, meaning to exalt, succeeds only in debasing.

THE GUITAR PLAYER

He touched the strings with a subtle hand—
The wind blew cold and the sky was grey—
And he sang of a soft-air'd, sunlit land;
Of scented breezes and golden day.

He lull'd the wind with his wizard skill;
From the dusky mists he charm'd the sun;
But the sky was grey when his hand was still,
And the wind blew cold when the song was done.

FREDERICK BROUGH.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

V. THE USE OF THE CHURCH SERVICES TO AGNOSTICS

It is more than unfortunate that the word "agnostic" should have become, in many quarters, a term of reproach. It should rather be one of honour, and its use might be construed as a sign of humility. When one explicitly says "I do not know," in reference to insoluble problems, it is surely as much to his—or her—credit to do so; as either to profess knowledge, or to remain silent, and conceal existing ignorance. The converse to "agnostic" is "gnostic"; and time was, when that term was not only one of reproach, but of heresy. The gnostics of the early centuries claimed to know, and to determine, much which the Church maintained to be unknowable and indeterminable; and in reference to which, therefore, the early Church itself was agnostic. It rejected knowledge "falsely so called." But that is precisely the attitude assumed by modern agnostics. They do not profess to have any knowledge of mysteries, and honestly avow their ignorance of ultima. If the result of their cross-examination of received beliefs is the conclusion that there is nothing really known or knowable, they are only honest in calling themselves agnostic. They may be wrong in rejecting what is, if not verifiable, at least highly probable; but they are true to their convictions in doing so. They cannot be blamed, or expected to act differently, so long as they remain unconvinced of the truths, which are "surely believed" by others.

Now suppose a company, or group of thoughtful men and women—reverent, intelligent, open-minded, eager-hearted, explicitly agnostic—is it desirable that they should remain apart from those who are gnostic (in the sense that they believe in the supernatural) and never join their fellow men or women of the Church in any religious service? It may be unhesitatingly replied, "Most certainly not." Many men attend religious services although they have no defined belief, and cannot say "Amen" to every clause in the creeds. But who can do the latter intelligently, sincerely, and reverently? Who is expected to do so? Assent to propositions is one thing, the worship of the Unseen and the Infinite is another; and sometimes those who can do least of the former do a great deal more of the latter.

No orthodox Churchman ought to doubt the fact that such worship is a very real and genuine thing. It should be rejoiced in as a tribute to the universality of Religion. But, on the other hand, it may be pointed out to the agnostic that worship "chiefly of the silent sort" (as Carlyle put it) loses much by its silence, and its solitariness. What more natural for human beings than to associate themselves together in worship, not although they differ in their theological notions, but because they do so? Religious usage may unite those who are divided into sects by doctrinal difference. It is when we identify ourselves in usage or practice with the men and women from whom we are separated by wide intervals of thought, and even of sympathy, that we first of all get to understand their attitude towards the Unseen; secondly, that we discover hidden points of agreement underneath our differences; and thirdly, that we diminish the latter, reduce their number, and lessen the intensity with which they obtrude themselves upon us.

Bishop Wilson, in his "Maxims of Piety and of Christianity"—a book which fascinated Matthew Arnold—writes of the Prayers of his Church: "In these we join, and pray, not as private men asking blessings for themselves, but as a Religious Society, exercising that charity which is the peculiar badge of the Christian Religion." Well may the reverent doubter—the devout agnostic let me say explicitly—make use of these collects, "which say so much in saying so little," use them by silent pondering, and "inward listening," if not by vocal utterance; and be aided thereby. Let him avow it, and act on the avowal, that "worship of the silent sort" is not always satisfactory, that it is apt to be intermittent, or to end in vague enthusiasm: whereas vocal utterance defines our worship, gives it an embodiment which has its uses however transient, and ultimately inadequate it may be. It is impossible to worship the wholly unknown and the utterly unknowable; but it is not impossible to pay homage to a Being at once known and unknown. The ancient Hebrews knew this, as well as the Athenians and St. Paul. The upward flight, and the onward movement are necessary; but so are the resting-places for outlook and repose, for a wise survey of the past and a prospect of the future.

Then the credenda of the Church may surely be interpreted as "articles of peace," binding it together, giving it unity in diversity, while it is hard to say which of the two—the oneness, or the difference—is the most necessary to its life. But let the agnostic realise his gain. The creeds may be to him harbours of refuge, in which he tarries for a while, until his next voyage is begun; in obedience to the call, "arise and depart, for this is not your rest." But he enters the church of his fathers, of his friends, of his countrymen. He does not ask himself whether he believes all the dogmas that he has been taught, or are about to be placed before him. He ceases for the time being to interrogate, to put those great questions, what am I? where am I? whither am I going? (although he returns to them with greater ardour afterwards). He feels that there is a time for receptivity, for a "wise passiveness," for repose with others, whatever the credibilia may be. The creeds may at times be prison-houses, which shut out the light, and fetter the intellect; but at other times they become luminous milestones, which mark the progress of the mind of the race. And perhaps those who understand and value most that scepsis, which frees the intellect from error, come to appreciate most fully the rest that follows from the survey they have taken, which carries them nearer to the roots of things.

It is almost a commonplace to say that the Church includes, and has always included, many a type of thought, and many "phases of faith." Amongst the primitive Apostles there were high, low, and broad: and it must ever be so. Inclusion, not exclusion, is at once the motto and the privilege of Christendom.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER

[The following letter seems to have dropped accidentally into our post-bag without name or address. We conjecture, though we can scarcely believe, that it must have been originally written to Mr. Hubert Bland, whose "Letters to a Daughter" have just been published. As a human document, it may be of service to future social historians when they are endeavouring to describe a certain type of twentieth-century woman.—ED.]

MY DEAR FATHER,—No—"that formal greeting inadequately expresses my emotion at the moment—I will say then," Great Scott, dad, what have you been up to now? What on earth induced you to rake out those old letters of yours after all these years and go and publish them? When I got back from the Cesarewitch on Billy Forsyth's new motor last night I went up to see Grannie and found her deep in a new book. I don't care much about books now, but I asked her just out of politeness what it was and she said it was by you, and when I asked her what sort of stodge it was this time, she said it seemed rather old-fashioned, like the letters she used to get from her great-aunt when she was a girl. Then I found it was those rotten old letters of yours! Of course, I'd burned them all as soon as I got them—"one can spare oneself and others a lot of unhappiness by the simple process of burning letters, especially (old) women's letters"—you know—and I hadn't an idea you'd kept copies. But I might have guessed it! Gran read over the bit about a man's daughter being the only woman in the world for whom a man five and twenty years her senior could feel no stir of passion (you always did like rolling it out, didn't you?), and then she went on to say that some men were five and twenty years older than their mothers. Gran's a bit of a wit, and has come on a lot since I took her over to The Towers.

Honestly, I do think it's a bit of a shame. It sort of gives me away, don't you see? Was I really such a "pigeon"—goose—as all that? Nineteen! why I might have been nine. Fancy my wanting to know whether I ought to drop poor Mrs. G. after that little affair of hers with the Major! and asking you, you dear old stick-in-the-mud, about the "proper limits of a flirtation"! I must have been greener than I thought. Still, one lives and learns—knowledge of life, as you wisely observe, can only be got by living—and one does live a bit in six years when one's married as I have, and knocked about and got out of the habit of asking one's pater's advice about everything.

You know, what's the matter with you, dad, is that you think you're jolly knowing and modern and all that, and really you're a ducky old fossil all the while. "At our time of day and amongst our set, I should hope, any man might go to any picture-gallery with any woman and escape censure." A picture-gallery! I don't know about your set but—you come and spend a week-end with the Mauleverers and watch Una von Huytens a bit, and hear her stories about Newport in the season. They'll make your hair curl! "Secret assignations should be avoided as beyond the limits, so should the underground post." Good Lord! As if there was any need for secrecy! Why, Jack Henderson and Millie de Winter send each other appointments through Mrs. H. and the Marquis. And then you go on and say: "Be as modern as ever you can, and count on my support to the utmost." It's just rich! You darling old frump, Potiphar's wife would think you a back number.

That sort of thing might have been all very well six years ago, but I'd moved further than you thought even then. You weren't sure that I'd made the acquaintance of Madame de Bovary? You bet I had! You caught me once reading a novel of George Moore's—but how many books did you not catch me at? I remember I could have screamed when you threw Stella in my face as "advanced" because she wanted to sit out Mrs. Tangueray. You didn't know that I'd been to the Tivoli to hear Marie Lloyd! "The censorship that should be exercised over the reading of young women!" If I really asked you about that, I was deeper than you guessed. It was really rather knowing of me.

There's one point I ought to make clear, though, in self-defence. Why Tommy Scarlett and I broke it off—you remember him; he was the first; he liked your cigars and didn't show too much sock—it wasn't me, really, it was him. It was my fault to start with, though. I was fool enough to show him your letters! He read them all through very nicely without a word. When he'd finished, all he said was that his doctor had just told him he had acute heart-disease, and that he was off next day to climb mountains in the Pamirs. Of course, I knew what he meant, and he's owned up since (we're quite good pals); he was afraid I'd turn out as frumpish and strict in my notions as my father. So you did me a good turn after all. I might have married him instead of Arthur, and then I should have been fighting him instead of Arthur. As it is, we're as thick as thieves and I'd rather have him for my partner at Bridge than any one I know. So don't be upset, old man, at what I've said. It's not your fault. You're a darling, though you are an also-ran.

Your loving ALEXA.

P.S.—Billy and I and Millie and Jack are just off again, motoring to Monte. Better address me at The Towers. They'll forward the letters, though Arthur's off to Paris.

P.P.S.—Ought a young married woman to go to Monte with no better chaperon than Millie? I wish you'd let me have a good long letter all about it.

A.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE ENGLISH ASMODEUS

THE lot of the satirist is not a happy one, not more felicitous, as a rule, than the fate which he invokes upon his victims. Mr. George Meredith says of one of his characters, an industrious manufacturer of acidulated epigrams: "He is not happy in his business: Colney suffered as heavily as he struck." The more he thrives in his trade of public executioner, the surer he is of his wages, hatred from his contemporaries and posthumous oblivion. Of Charles Johnstone, author of one of the most telling satires in the English language, "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea," it is stated in one of the few scraps of biography that have come down to us (if so much can be said of a faded page in an old Gentleman's Magazine): "Conviviality and a turn for satirical observations in time left him few friends." Though his book had extraordinary success at the time, and went rapidly into many editions, Johnstone in middle life found himself a failure both in literature and in law, his nominal profession; and less than twenty years before his death took the drastic step of starting afresh in another hemisphere and another career. In 1782 he went to India, and became a journalist at Calcutta. India in those days could hardly have been the most desirable haven for old age. But at any rate Johnstone, having written his last satire the year before he set sail, made money on his newspaper; and for the last few years before his death was in affluence for the first time in his life.

It might reasonably be argued that the durability of satire must needs be in inverse ratio to its immediate effectiveness, since this depends on two ephemeral elements, the force of the personal application and the virulence of the sarcasm. Comedy endures, satire is forgotten. The reason is in the nature of the two things. Of both alike the social function is to make man better by laughing at his aberrations from common sense. But comedy does this gently and lovingly. Comedy, in short, laughs with, satire laughs at, humanity. The comic spirit, according to Mr. Meredith, looks into the hearts of men and reveals the causes of their folly. That is to say, sympathy and love of mankind are necessary to comic insight. This, in truth, must be the foundation of all art that is great and permanent. But the success of satire rests on the negation of sympathy, the contrary of love. Scorn, indignation, hatred—these are the passions that give it vitality; and, happily for our race, these are the most transitory of human emotions.

The first two volumes of "Chrysal," which were written originally for private entertainment only, appeared in 1760, the last in 1765; the period dealt with was the last few years of George the Second and the opening of the reign of George the Third. No time in our history was so prolific in satire, yet how little of it is remembered! Smollett, Fielding, and an army of writers whom no one to-day has ever heard of, waged a fierce war of personalities, from day to day and week to week, in newspaper and magazine; Foote and Woodward travestied public characters upon the stage; scores of incompetent poets like Paul Whitehead earned money and reputation by ephemeral lampoons, and poets of genius like Gray and Cowper were wrung to outbursts of wrathful satire by the follies and vices of the great; Charles Churchill, as suddenly as Byron, woke one morning to find himself famous, and after years of poverty able to command almost any price he wanted for his furious pasquinades; Hogarth was but the one true artist among a crowd of indifferent caricaturists, and Junius but the most pungent among a host of acrid critics in the press. Yet of all these floods of satire, what remains? The comedy in Fielding and Smollett's novels is read, but their squibs and pamphlets are forgotten as completely as Paul Whitehead's verse and Foote's burlesques. Few but students of the period are aware that Gray and Cowper ever wrote satire, and "Chrysal" ceased to be reprinted or remembered as soon as the last of the objects of its ridicule were in their graves.

One of these numerous reprints was edited by Sir Walter Scott, who compared the work with Le Sage's "Le Diable Boiteux," in which a Spanish student is carried by the demon Asmodeus through the streets of the city and shown all the vices, scandals and follies that are going on behind the stone walls. Chrysal, or the Spirit of Gold, is embodied in a guinea, which passes through the hands of a number of people eminent or obscure, and gives an account of its experiences to an adept in the science of alchemy, whose unwearied perseverance and constancy have earned the "grand secret," the revelation of the mysteries of nature. Like Asmodeus, Chrysal is a spirit with supernatural powers of insight; but there the resemblance ends, for the gold spirit has nothing of the tricky sprightliness and malicious wit that make the Spanish imp so entertaining a guide. Johnstone himself was destitute of the good-humoured tolerance of Le Sage; he had a bitter and sarcastic nature, and wrote his satire with a grim seriousness that was, indeed, the usual tone of the Satiric Muse in his day. Comparing the two works, which resemble each other so closely in their machinery, Scott rightly distinguishes between the Horatian spirit of "Le Diable Boiteux," which is true comedy, and the saeva indignatio of "Chrysal," the temper of Juvenal, and, it may be added, of Dryden and Churchill. As in Le Sage's story, the initial device makes any internal connection between the episodes unneeded and undesirable. Chrysal passes from hand to hand, is now at court, and now in a pawnbroker's cash-box, one day consorts with admirals and ministers, and the next with ale-house keepers and thieves. Its peregrinations and strange vicissitudes of fortune are a source of much entertainment, as were those of the farthing and the shilling in Bathurst and Addison's well-known stories in the Adventurer and the Tatler, from which Johnstone, no doubt, got some ideas. After resting a little while in the purse of General Wolfe, on the eve of his departure for Quebec, and witnessing his tender parting with Miss Lowther, afterwards Duchess of Bolton, the guinea suffers a series of quick changes, which may be related in its own words.

My next master was one of the pillars of military glory, who had contributed a leg, an arm, and the scalp of his head to raise the trophies of the French in America. Though he was destitute of almost every comfort which nature really stands in need of, his first care, on the acquisition of such a treasure as I was to him, was to gratify the artificial wants of luxury. He went directly to a gin-shop, where he chucked me for a quatern of that liquid fire; the taste of which was too pleasing to his palate, and the warmth too comfortable to his heart, for him to be satisfied with so little. Quatern followed quatern, till every sense was intoxicated, and he fell dead drunk on the floor, when his good-natured host had him kindly laid, to sleep off his debauch, on the next dunghill, first taking care to prevent his fellow inhabitants of the streets from robbing him of the rest of his treasure, by picking his pocket of it himself. The scenes I saw in this service were all of the same kind, but I was soon relieved from the pain of them, my master giving me as a present to an officer of the custom that very night. By this faithful steward of the public, I was next morning given to the factor of a gang of smugglers, to be laid out for him in lace in Flanders, whither he was just going on the affairs of his profession. With this industrious trader I went as far as Harwich, where while they waited for the tide, he lost me at a game of cribbage to a person who was going over with him.

This person was Aminadab, the rascally agent of the king's mistress, the Countess of Yarmouth, and in his company the coin becomes immersed in the political broils and warlike ferment of Europe at the outbreak of the Seven Years War. Chrysal is an eye-witness of the execution of Byng; is able to give a full, true, and particular account of why Minorca was captured by the French; which officers behaved with cowardice and who did their duty, what ministers were responsible for our unpreparedness; and, in a word, to apportion praise and blame with the fearlessness and decision of a modern halfpenny—paper.

The guinea plays the part of special correspondent, visiting the battlefields of Frederick the Great and Ferdinand of Brunswick, victor of Minden; being opportunely present at most of the important sea-fights, and witnessing the military movements against the French in Canada. The incompetence, treachery and cowardice of king's officers are everywhere the theme: though not a single name is mentioned throughout the book, the charges are corroborated by narratives alleged to be by an eye-witness, and the guilty are portrayed with lifelike traits which nobody could mistake. Chrysal of course sees everything as Johnstone, a fervent believer in Pitt and the war policy, wants it to be seen. When, accordingly, the guinea gets into the purse of Frederick of Prussia, it finds him to be not only a heaven-born general, fighting the battles of the Lord and of Protestantism, but a high-souled ascetic, who sets his people a shining example of piety, humility and virtue. The guinea is also an anti-Semite, and has the good fortune to be present at a celebration of the Feast of the Passover, where the Jews are represented as offering up a Christian child as Pascal lamb. A man with the journalistic art of relating as fact the things he wants believed, with very little conscience, and an intimate and minute acquaintance with the backstairs history of his time, Johnstone produced, in spite of these extravagances, one of the most damaging indictments of the public men whom he hated that was ever used in political warfare. Sandwich and Fox, examples of speculation on a colossal scale; the admirals and generals whose voracious appetite gorged the wealth of Havana, and robbed the men who enabled them to capture it; the aristocratic warriors who ran away from the Spaniards, or allowed themselves to be paid blackmail to remain inactive; the profligates and buffoons of the Hellfire Club, and their obscene parody of the Abbey of Thélème at Medmenham—all these familiar figures of the time had their portraits painted so incisively that, in spite of the absence of names, their identity could not be mistaken. Large parts of the book, in fact, had all the sting and force of the keenest and most uncompromising journalism, a more deliberate and thoughtful force than that exhibited a year or so later by the Letters of Junius. As a specimen of his style, take this rough sketch of the chameleon actor Foote, whose amazing powers of mimicry were celebrated by Churchill in the Rosciad:

The person my master was sent to meet had something so uncommon in his appearance as instantly struck my attention. Every passion of the human heart, was printed in his face so strongly, that he could at pleasure display it in all its force, while his very look and gesture turned some vice or folly into ridicule. "You inquire for number one, Sir!" said my master, bowing with the profoundest respect. "I do, Sir," answered the other, returning his bow, assuming his look, and imitating his voice, in a manner that would have extorted laughter from despair, "inquire for number one." Though my master was no stranger to his talents, which he had often seen him display at the expense of others; this personal application of them to himself threw him into such confusion, that, in spite of his long-practised assurance, a blush broke feebly through his unimpassioned, lifeless face, and he had scarce power to show him into the room.

The ballad-singer seeing that he had him at command, would not pursue his advantage any farther, at that time, for fear of frightening him away; but putting on the exact countenance, and mimicking the voice and manner of the doctor (Whitefield). "I am come, my friend and brother in the Lord," said he, "to inquire into thy spiritual estate, to give thee ghostly advice, and commune with thee, for a short space, for our mutual edification." The surprise and manner of this address had such an effect upon my master that he could not refrain bursting into laughter; and immediately recovered from the confusion into which the ridicule of himself had thrown him.

ERNEST A. BAKER.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The later poetry of Mr. Swinburne," by A. Clutton-Brock.]

FICTION

The Story of Bawn. By KATHARINE TYNAN. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE appearance of each new novel from the pen of Katherine Tynan must be a reason for regret to those to whom she has given such good cause for admiration as a writer of verse. We look in vain in her fiction for that simple charm of feeling and expression by which her verse with its intimate tenderness becomes as much a part of her country as the fields and skies of which it tells—a charm which places her poetry in the front rank of the little Celtic school. "The Story of Bawn" is a tale of a young Irish girl's life and love-affairs. By this time the reader of Katherine Tynan's stories can rely from the commencement on the usual "happy ending" and so is not surprised to find that all the characters—including a red setter with a phenomenal memory—are compelled, whether or no, to rejoice at the conclusion, when the tale is tidily finished off, so as to leave none of those "loose ends" unpleasantly characteristic of real life.

M lomanics. By JAMES HUNEKER. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THE dominant impression left by this volume of short stories is one of cleverness—of rampant, unmitigated cleverness. And cleverness, like fire, is a good servant and a bad master: it must be kept rigidly under control. In twenty out of the twenty-four stories Mr. Hunecker's cleverness runs wild riot. Nothing ruins a quality so surely as its own excess. The book has the same effect as a complete dinner of anchovies and oil: for the stories float in fluency. Music, musicians, imaginary and real, and the wives and daughters καὶ τὰ ἅλλα of musicians file before you, a motley, longhaired, dishevelled pageant who gabble art and chatter modernity, until the brain tires with their epigrams and smart jargon and the senses weary of the patchouli atmosphere and the untidiness. It was Thoreau who said of a certain book he was advised to read: "I seem to remember there is too much about art in it for me and the Hottentots." But the cleverness is there; and has its compensations. There is generally an idea behind the stories, sometimes an uncommonly ingenious one, and its presence makes the rococo trickery of the treatment all the more intolerable.

In Green Fields. By OSWALD CRAWFURD. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

THIS book is a charming daydream and one that many a Londoner has dreamed after a long day's work in the noise and dirt of his town. The old Jacobean house in the country, with paved walks in the garden, looking on the sea and the moor, miles away from a village, with a trout stream and a few delightful country neighbours, and freedom, absolute freedom. . . . Mr. Crawford is an epicure in dreams. His plot is extensive, his soil is rich, his stream is packed with fish, his garden is ideal, his house is old and perfect, his neighbours are natural artists, his blacksmith is a thinker and a genius, and he must have a lovely country girl under a black cloud which with nobility he dispels, to make the girl his wife. And the dream is beautifully real and elaborated with country lore; and the air of the country breathes in every page.

Meriel of the Moors. By R. E. VERNÉDE. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

MR. VERNÉDE has a sprightly fancy and the gift of expressing himself with a laughing lightness that is not common. That was apparent in his first book, "The Pursuit of Mr. Faviel," a distinguished if not wholly original farce. So we feel slight dudgeon at finding his easy paces at times clogged by the mud of commonplace melodrama. That mud is exceptionally sticky. He is like a race-horse in a ploughed field—out of place. Happily it is not all ploughed land, and he quickly kicks his heels free and is off at his own pace on the turf. And the prim egg-collector's adventures are as amusing as Meriel, the wild girl of the moors, is charming. But why the heavy murders with the heavy stick and that heavy and usual pair of villains? We know these men. They come from Sheffield. Let them stop there. Mr. Vernéde has no need of them, possessing as he does a fund of fresh wit and gaiety, from which he could make light comedy—and good light comedy too.

The Car of Destiny. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. (Methuen, 6s.)

IF Mr. and Mrs. Williamson had either written, or had never read, a guide-book to Spain, their present story would have been, as so many books are said to be, "without a dull page." But, most unfortunately, they know everything interesting about every place they mention, and a course of interesting information is only welcome when one has schooled one's mind to it, in the form of guide-book, lecture, or Mr. Hall Caine. In the present book, all the sins are of commission. There is King Alfonso in it, and there is Princess Ena, and there is the State bull-fight after the wedding, with an entirely fictitious ending. These things would have been better out of the volume. So would the interesting information. But the other things are excellent. Evidently Mr. and Mrs. Williamson had a delightful motor tour in Spain (they took charming photographs), and then remembered the most exciting Weyman story they could, and mixed the two. The recipe turns out very well. If any one wants to know why they were told that the Mayor of an inland Spanish village kept petrol in the cemetery to kill lobsters with, and how every word was true, they must go to the book.

The Queen of Swords. By JOSEPH KEATING. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

MR. KEATING tells us the story of a remarkable duel and its far-reaching consequences with a dramatic vigour that would make a less ingenious plot interesting. The tale overflows with incident, and, were the principal actors of a more sympathetic type, would be deeply exciting. As it is, the complacent egoism of Owen Wynne and the milk-and-water insipidity of Lady Mainwaring (who is merely a lay figure on which to hang the mild raptures of her self-centred admirer), serve to dull the interest excited by a complicated and well worked-out plot. Mr. Keating is particularly happy in his dealings with Welsh peasant life, and the chapter devoted to the Dissenting picnic is the best in the book.

The Wilderness. By T. B. CLEGG. (Lane, 6s.)

THIS is the story of a great wrong, a bitter hatred, and retribution complete and merciless enough to satisfy the most remorseless seeker after justice. The plot is very complex and the unusually large cast makes it difficult to control, but Mr. Clegg handles his unwieldy material skilfully, drawing his characters with a strength and sincerity that is often brutal in its directness. His story is intensely dramatic, and the worst that can be said of it is that, in his appreciation of a strong situation, the author sometimes verges on melodrama. The scene is laid in Australia, a country which Mr. Clegg has evidently studied to some purpose; the characters are primitive men with primitive passions, drawn with a sureness of touch that shows a deep insight into human nature, combined with a wide sympathy. Mr. Clegg writes well.

The Worsleys. By ARMIGER BARCLAY. (Sisley's, Ltd., 6s.)

"THE WORSLEYS" is a story for the stage, and we understand it has already been put into dramatic form. The plot, characters and situations are designed with a view to obtain a laugh, a sympathetic murmur, a round of applause: the author is not concerned with fine gradations of light and shade, nor with analysis of character and motive, the scenes are lightly strung together and allowed to explain themselves. The heroine, a beautiful, highly educated parlourmaid; a homely, kindly brewer, head of the firm of "Worsleys;" a chivalrous husband; a peer with a scapegrace son; a pert ingénue and her boy lover, are among the chief characters, and all are more or less familiar to playgoers. There is nothing new about them, but they are well-defined, interesting, often amusing people, who may be counted upon to move a reader, or an audience, to sympathy and smiles.

The Ladder to the Stars. By JANE HELEN FINDLATER. (Methuen, 6s.)

THE book takes its name from a little thumb-nail sketch by Blake, in which two mannikins are putting up a ladder in the vain hope of reaching the stars, with the inscription: "I want, I want!" The ladder, in this case, is the ladder of fame, and leads from the narrow provincial home of a girl who in point of both intellect and education is far above her station, to a more congenial world of wit and letters and to no small amount of celebrity. Miriam Sadler, the woman in question, is consistently and sincerely drawn; her faults are the faults of her class and temperament, and her grave, sane outlook upon the different phases of life with which she comes in contact as she mounts rung after rung of the ladder of fame, lends her a gracious dignity that is very attractive. Her pride (or is it a nonconformist conscience born of her middle-class extraction?) saves her from disaster where many another woman in her circumstances would have fallen, and we leave her reaping the reward of her renunciation.

The Incomplete Amorist. By E. NESBIT. (Constable, 6s.)

MISS NESBIT'S work is remarkable for a lightness and delicacy of touch and for a certain graceful humour. In her earlier book, "The Red House," these qualities appeared to their best advantage; in the present novel there are instances in which a firmer hand is needed. It is essentially bright, witty, superficial work, and we are sorry to be, more than once, confronted with problems and situations which demand a stronger treatment and a deeper insight into human nature. The line between humour and pathos is a very small one, but Miss Nesbit never succeeds in crossing it; in her most serious passages we have the uncomfortable feeling that she is laughing in her sleeve. She is at her best in the closing pages of the book, which are full of sincerity and restraint.

FINE ART

MR. HOLMAN HUNT AT THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

AN enterprising American syndicate was once formed for manufacturing Stilton cheeses on a large scale, like the pirated Cheddars, from similar sources enjoyed by members of most London clubs. Various farms celebrated for their Stiltons were visited and large sums of money offered for secret old family recipes. The simple peasants of the district willingly parted with copies of their heirlooms for a consideration to the different American agents, who, filled with joy, repaired to their London offices in order to compare notes, and fully persuaded that England was a greener country than even Constable has painted it. What was their mortification on discovering that all the recipes were entirely different; they could not be reconciled even by machinery. So it is with Pre-Raphaelitism; every critic believes that he knows the great secret, and can always quote from one of the brotherhood something in support of his view. At the beginning the brothers meekly accepted Mr. Ruskin's explanation of their existence; his indeed was a very convenient though not entirely accurate exposition of their collective view, if they can be said to have possessed one. How far Ruskin was out of sympathy with them indiscreet memoirs have revealed. An artistic idea, or a group of ideas, must always be broken gently to the English people, because the acceptance of them necessitates the burial of some darling idol in Shechem. When the golden ladders are let down from heaven by poets, artists, or critics, and new spirits are hovering in the intellectual empyrean, the patriarch public snoring on its stone pillow wakes up, but he will not wrestle with the angel. He mistakes the ladders for scaffolding or some temporary embarrassment in the street traffic; he orders their instant removal; he writes angry letters to the papers and invokes the police. For some time Ruskin's definition of pre-Raphaelitism was accepted, and then the death of Rossetti produced other recipes for the Stilton cheese, Mr. Ham Caine being among the grocers. Whatever the correct definition may be, ungracious and ungrateful though it is to praise the dead at the expense of the living, it has to be recognised that among the remarkable group of painters in which even the minor men were little masters the greatest artist of them all was Dante Gabriel Rossetti. "By critic I mean finding fault," says Sir William Richmond, but let us follow his advice and avoid technical discussion along with the popular jargon of art criticism. "After staying two or three hours in the always delightful Leicester Galleries, let us walk home and think a little of what we have seen." For the essence of beauty there is nothing to compare with Rossetti's Beloved or the Blue Bower, and you could name more than twenty of his exquisite water-colours which for design, invention, devious symbolism and religious impulse surpass the finest of Mr. Hunt's most elaborate works. Even in the artist's own special field—the symbolical illustration of Holy Writ—he is overwhelmed by Millais with the superb Carpenter's Shop. In Millais, it was well said "we were cheated out of a Rubens"; he was the strong man, the great oil painter of the group, as Rossetti was the supreme artist. In Mr. Holman Hunt we lost another Archdeacon Farrar. Then, in the sublimation of uglitude, Madox Brown, step-father of the Pre-Raphaelites (my information is derived from a P.R.B. aunt) was an infinitely greater craftsman. Look at The Washing of the Feet in the Tate gallery; is there anything to equal it, at what will be the most interesting of all temporary shows this season? The Hiring Shepherd comes nearest, but the artist, like his own sheep, has strayed into alien corn and on cliffs from which are ebbing a tide of nonconformist conscience. Like his own hiring shepherd, too, he has mistaken a phenomenon of nature for a sermon.

One of the great little pictures, Claudio and Isabella, proves, however, that once he determined to be a painter. In The Lady of Shalott he showed himself a designer with unusual powers approximating to those of Blake-Richmond. But, examined at a distance or close at hand, among these canvases do we find a single piece of decoration or a picture in the ordinary sense of the word? My definition of a religious picture is a painted object in two dimensions destined for the decoration of an altar or other site in a church or edifice devoted to religious purposes; if it fails to satisfy the required conditions it fails as a work of art. Where is the work of this so-called religious painter which would satisfy the not exacting conditions of a Protestant or Anglican place of worship? You are not surprised to learn that Keble College mistook the Light of the World for a patent fuel, or to learn from the catalogue that the background of the Innocents was painted in "the Philistine plain." Who could live even in cold weather with The Miracle of the Sacred Fire? Give me rather the Derby Day of Mr. Frith—admirable and underrated master. What are they if we cannot place them in the category of pictures? They are pietistic ejaculations—tickled up maxims in pigment of extraordinary durability—councils of perfection in colour and conduct. Of all the Pre-Raphaelites Mr. Hunt will be the most popular. He is artistically the scapegoat of that great movement which gave a new impulse to the art of last century, a scapegoat sent out to wander by the dead seas of popularity. I once knew a learned German who regretted that none of his own countrymen could paint Alpine scenery as Hunt has done in The Scapegoat! Yes, he has a message for every one, for my German friend, for Sir William Richmond and myself. He is a link between art and popularity, he symbolises the evangelical attitude of those who would go to German Reed's and the Egyptian Hall, but would not attend a theatre. After all, it was a gracious attitude, because it is that of mothers who aged more beautifully, I think, than the ladies of a later generation which admired Whistler and Burne-Jones. When modern art, the brilliant art of the 'sixties, was strictly excluded from English homes except in black and white magazines, The Finding of Christ in the Temple and The Light of the World were allowed to grace the parlour along with Bolton Abbey, the Stag at Bay, and Blucher meeting Wellington. You only see them now in Pimlico and St. John's Wood. A friend of mine said he could never look at the picture of Blucher meeting Wellington without blushing. . . . Like a good knight and true Sir William, another Bedivere has brandished Excalibur in the form of a catalogue. He offers the jewels for our inspection; they make a brave show; they are genuine; they are intrinsic, but you remember others of finer water—Bronzino-like portraits of Andrew Lang and Bismarck and many others. Now, you should never recollect anything during the enjoyment of a complete work of art.

Every one knows the view from Richmond, I should say of Richmond; it is almost my own. . . . Far off Sir Bedivere sees Lyonesse submerged; Camelot-at-Sea has capitulated after a second siege to stranger forces. The new Moonet is high in the heaven and a dim Turner-like haze has begun to obscure the landscape and soften the outlines; under cover of the mist the hosts of Mordred MacColl, en-Tatè with victory, are hunting the steer in the New English Forest; far off the enchanter Burne-Jones is sleeping quietly in Broceliande (I cannot bear to call it Rottingdean). Hark, the hunt (not the Holman Hunt) is up in Caledon (Glasgow); they have started the shy steer: they have wound the hornel, the lords of the International, who love not Mordred over much, are galloping nearer and nearer. Sir Bedivere can see their insolent pennells waving black and white flags and the game-keepers and beaters (critics) chant in low vulgar tones:

When we came out of Glasgow town
There was really nothing at all to see
Except Legros and Professor Brown
But now there is Guthrie and Lavery.

Undaunted Sir Bedivere drags his burden to a hermitage near Coniston; but he finds it ruined; he bars the door in order to administer refreshment to the wounded Pre-Raphaelite; there is a knocking at the wicket-gate; is it the younger generation? No, he can hear the tread of the royal sargent-at-arms; his spurs and sword are clanking on the pavement. Sir Bedivere feels his palette parched; his tongue cleaves, to the roof of St. Paul's, but he is undaunted. "We are surely betrayed if that is really the sargent," he says. Through the broken tracery of the Italian Gothic window a breeze or draught comes softly and fans his strong bear arms; he feels a twinge; some Merlin had told him he would suffer from ricketts with shannon complications; seizing Excalibur, he opens wide the door. "Draw, caitiffs," he cries; "draw." "Perhaps they cannot draw; perhaps they are impressionists," said a raven on the hill; and he flew away.

ROBERT ROSS.

MUSIC

PUCCINI'S OPERAS

IN the last few years a new ingredient has been added to that operatic pot pourri, the repertoire of Covent Garden, by the production of Puccini's operas. They have not appeared merely as novelties to be given a few performances and then laid aside, but their frequent repetition on the playbills of each season shows that they are a real ingredient in that still more curious pot pourri—public taste. Of the first five performances of the autumn season three were devoted to the two works by which Puccini is chiefly represented in this country, Madama Butterfly receiving two performances, La Bohème one. It is not the season of experiments, or of art for art's sake (if there ever is such a season as the latter); they are placed cheek by jowl with Carmen and Rigoletto, because they draw the same audiences and are equally popular with them. The most casual comparison of one of Puccini's scores with that of Carmen, however, is sufficient to show that it is not from similarity of treatment that they share their popularity. At first sight Puccini's method seems opposed to what has generally been considered to make for popularity in opera. There are no tunes that ring in one's head after the curtain falls, no numbers that amateurs can enjoy singing in private together, or that can be made up into selections for pianoforte; in La Bohème no very stirring situations, in Madama Butterfly only the simplest plot of which the whole course is foreseen as soon as the situation is unfolded; and in both almost a complete absence of stage pageantry such as used to characterise Italian opera. Their claim to popularity, however, is, that each makes a picture of a phase of human nature, which brings prominently forward such emotions as enlist every one's sympathy without severely taxing his understanding. This property belongs to the "books" of both operas, especially, of course, to that of Madama Butterfly, which is, perhaps, the most popular for that reason. The music is entirely subordinate to this idea; it ministers to it with every means of melody, of harmony, and of orchestration which the art possesses, but not one of those means is ever developed in such a way as to call attention to itself rather than to the emotion which the words or action suggest. A completed melody or extended musical form would do this, and a system of recurring leit-motiven would do so no less. The example of old Italian opera shows the one, that of Wagner the other; for time has made it clear that in the music-drama of Wagner the music still commands the drama, in spite of all his efforts to the contrary. Puccini has naturally the melodic facility of the Italians, and he has borrowed a good many of Wagner's stage properties in the direction of musical colour, while he has rejected the formalism of the one and the definiteness of the other. His music, therefore, says nothing, but is entirely sympathetic to all that the words and actions of the drama say. Once the hearer realises this he may cease to be surprised that after listening closely to one of these works for three hours he comes away and can remember no detail except a few of the more strongly rhythmic phrases. A very small proportion of his attention has, in fact, been occupied with the music, which is so vague, in itself so unimportant, that if it is to be carried away in the mind it requires the closest concentration. This is Puccini's way of solving the old problem of the conflict between music and drama in opera. It appears at first sight to be the exact opposite of the older Italian method and to have something akin to Wagner's. As a matter of fact it is diametrically opposed to Wagner's method, even if Puccini's orchestral idiom has, like that of every other modern composer, been influenced by him. Wagner tried to solve the problem by making every detail of his music mean something—that is, become the expression of some feature of the drama; Puccini tries by letting no detail mean anything, but the whole suggest the actions and emotions of his characters and heighten their effect.

His Italian fluency helps him in this. Wagner made melody with difficulty. His efforts at sustained or developed tunes are often second-rate in quality, but he rose to his greatest heights of melodic invention when every phrase was the direct outcome of some impelling idea. Puccini, without such stimulus, can still go on, and, while he never writes distinguished melody, his music does not become dull. Further, it is always, or almost always, effective for the voice. There is no reason why it should not be, for since considerations neither of musical structure nor of dramatic significance bind him fast, there is no need to force the voice into musical outlines which are uncongenial to it. Here, then, lie the causes of the popularity of his works. Audiences who are not used to paying close attention to music find themselves moved by human sympathy with emotions in the portrayal of which music apparently has a large share. They feel the effect of the added colour. The play is as interesting as any modern stage piece, and all its features are further intensified by music which does not interrupt its action. It is a process exactly similar to the favourite recitation with music now also in vogue, except that the voice partakes of the music with the instruments.

Popularity is one thing; permanency another. It is an open question whether works of this kind really do anything to solve the question of the future of opera. If the future is to be in this direction it is a frank acknowledgment that opera cannot be considered any longer as a serious form of music, any more than scene-painting is a serious form of pictorial art. It creates an effect but has no intrinsic value. The musician capitulates completely before the playwright. It is an easy solution, and like most capitulations brings peace. There is no conflict in Puccini's operas; we are never afflicted by the sense that commonplace detail is incongruous when set to music. One man may offer another "Milkpunch o Wisky," for we simply feel that he does it while music is going on, not that the words are set to music. But, for all the practical advantages of the plan, a thoughtful musician must feel that in them music has wandered far from its true course, until it has even arrived at a reversal of its function. It becomes the commonplace, and the most impressive thing it can do is to leave off. When "Butterfly" murmurs the words:

Con onor muore
Chi non può serbar vita con onore

she does so in a speaking voice with more real effect than the most carefully devised musical phrase could have given, because for some hours past our ears have become used to everything that music can do to make an effect, where simplicity would have sufficed. At last it becomes the only untried method, and at the climax of his work the composer therefore uses it and so for a moment passes from the artificial to the real.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Syndics of the Cambridge University Press have undertaken the publication of a comprehensive History of English Literature, on a scale and plan following the general lines of the "Cambridge Modern History." The work will be published in fourteen royal octavo volumes of about four hundred pages each (9s. net per vol., or £5 5s. the set), and will cover the whole course of English literature from Beowulf to the end of the Victorian age. Each chapter will, so far as is possible, be the work of a writer specially familiar with the subject; and the Editors—Dr. A. W. Ward and Mr. A. R. Waller, M.A.—will be jointly responsible for the work as a whole. It is intended (i) to give a connected account of the successive movements, both main and subsidiary, in English Literature:

this implies an adequate treatment of secondary writers, instead of their being overshadowed by a few greater personalities; (ii) to trace the progress of the English language as the vehicle of English literature; (iii) to take note of the influence of foreign literatures upon English and (though in a less degree) of that of English upon foreign literatures; and (iv) to provide each chapter with a sufficient bibliography. A few very brief notes, containing references to authorities for new or disputed statements, will be introduced when held necessary. These will be printed at the end of each volume, before the bibliography. The following list indicates approximately the scope of the volumes, the first three of which will be published during the year 1907: (1) From the Origins to Chaucer; (2) From Chaucer to the Renaissance; (3) Elizabethan Poetry and Prose; (4) and (5) The Elizabethan and the Jacobean Drama; (6) Jacobean Poetry and Prose; (7) The Caroline Age; (8) The Age of Dryden; (9) The Age of Swift and Pope; (10) The Rise of the Novel; Johnson and his Circle; (11) The Earlier Georgian Age; (12) The Romantic Revival; (13) and (14) The Victorian Age.

Professor William Knight's monograph on Thomas Davidson, which Mr. Unwin has nearly ready, is to be supplemented by an elaborate biography, which may extend to a couple of volumes, and will be called "Life and Letters of Thomas Davidson." Towards the end of his life the "Wandering Scholar" initiated on the east side of New York an educational movement in which a large number of Jews speedily became interested, the magnetic personality and high character of the Scholar's teaching resulting in the establishment of a Thomas Davidson Society, which is now a centre of influence in New York. Mr. Morris R. Cohen, a pupil of Davidson and president of this society, is preparing the biography.

On October 19 Mr. John Lane will publish "Gold, Frankincense and Myrrh and other Pageants," by W. Graham Robertson, with twelve full-page illustrations in colour by the author; and "The Dangerville Inheritance: a Detective Story," by A. C. Fox-Davies. On October 21 the same publisher will issue "British Malaya," an account of the origin and progress of British influence in Malaya, by Sir Frank Athelstane Swettenham, formerly Governor of the Straits Settlements. The object of this book is to record the exact circumstances which led to the British protection of that part of the Malay Peninsula now known as the Federated Malay States, and to describe in detail the gradual evolution of the system of administration.

Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew and Co., Ltd., will publish on the 29th inst. a new book by Mr. Walter Emanuel, the author of "A Dog Day," entitled, "The Dogs of War," which has been running through the pages of Punch, and will now appear in book form, enlarged and with upwards of fifty illustrations (including twelve in colour) by Cecil Aldin. Another book for children promised by the same publishers is "Mr. Punch's Book of Birthdays," by Olga Morgan and Harry Rountree.

During the autumn Messrs. George Bell and Sons will publish a short treatise on modern theoretical electricity, by Sir Oliver Lodge, under the title "Electrons." This will be an expansion of a paper communicated by the author to the Institute of Electrical Engineers in the year 1902, with additions which bring it fairly up to date.

Messrs. Ginn and Company will publish shortly a new work by Mr. William J. Long, entitled "Brier Patch Philosophy," by "Peter Rabbit."

Messrs. Routledge send us the following additions to their autumn announcements list: "Te Tohunga: The Ancient Legends and Traditions of the Maoris," orally collected and pictured by W. Dittmer, with sixty illustrations; A Beckett's "Comic History of England": a reprint of the original 8vo edition, with all the original illustrations by John Leech; "English-Greek Dictionary," by S. C. Woodhouse; and Smedley's "Frank Fairleigh," "Lewis Arundel," and "Harry Coverdale," with all the original plates by George Cruikshank and "Phiz";

Sir Thomas Browne's Works, and "Beowulf"—translated, with notes, by Wentworth Huyshe (both in "The London Library"); Sismondi's "History of the Italian Republics," edited, from the original 14-vol. edition (hitherto untranslated), by Dr. W. Boulting (in "The Library of Historical and Standard Literature"; Berkeley's "Principles of Human Knowledge," Cowley's Essays, "Grey's" "Polynesian Mythology," "The Hitopadesa" (a new translation, with notes, by B. Hale-Wortham), Hobbes's "Leviathan," Hume's Essays, Lytton's "Harold," Peacock's Poems, and the Spectator Essays, in six volumes (all in "The New Universal Library"); Beddoes's Poetical Works, Peacock's Poems, Thompson's "The Seasons," and "The Castle of Indolence, and other Poems" (in "The Muse's Library"); and nine volumes in "The Miniature Reference Library: "Dictionary of Technical and Scientific Terms"; "Dictionary of the Bible," by A. M. Hyamson; "French and English Waistcoat Pocket Phrase-Book," by J. W. Milligan; "Glossary to Shakespeare," by J. A. Farquharson; "Historical Allusions," by Frank Mundell; "Dictionary of Classical Mythology," by J. H. Manson; "Who's Who in Fiction? a Dictionary of Noted Names in Novels, Tales, Romances, Poetry and Drama," by H. Swan; "Who Wrote That? (Foreign Authors)" by E. Latham and Muriel Curle; and "Who Wrote That? (Classical Authors)" by William Swan Sonnenschein.

Messrs. H. R. Allenson announce for publication this autumn:—Fiction—"Slings of Fortune," by Jonathan Nield. Children's Books—"Five-Minute Stories" (one hundred short stories and poems), by Laura E. Richards; "The Legend of the Silver Cup," by George Critchley; "The Gold Thread," by Dr. Norman Macleod—a new edition, with Introduction by Dr. Donald Macleod, and the full-page illustrations by McWhirter and others; and "The Silver Crown," a book of fables by Laura E. Richards. Reprints—"Carmina Crucis," by Dora Greenwell, re-edited, with an Introduction, by Miss C. L. Maynard; and "Selected Poems from Dora Greenwell," chosen and edited, with introduction by Miss C. L. Maynard. Theology—"Aspects of Life," twelve sermons by Principal John Caird; "The Unfolding Dawn," sermons by Luther W. Caws; "After His Likeness: thoughts on the Christian Ideal"—practical sermons on the Imitation of Christ, by J. W. Jack; and "The Meaning of Christ": studies in the Place of Jesus Christ in human thought and action, as shown in Dante, Shelley, Browning, Tennyson, Ruskin, Savonarola and Mazzini, by the Rev. Richard Roberts. Devotional—"The Practice of the Presence of God," by Brother Lawrence (new issue); "Great Souls at Prayer": fourteen centuries of prayer, praise, and aspiration, from St. Augustine to Christina Rossetti and R. L. Stevenson, selected by M. W. Tileston, (new edition); and "Prayers and Meditations," by Dr. Samuel Johnson (new edition, with additional prayers not before printed in a collected edition).

Among Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes's autumn announcements are: "The Church Plate of the City of Chester," by T. Stanley Ball; "The Art of the Victorian Stage," by Alfred Darbyshire; "Canon Peter Casolas' Pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the year 1494," by M. Newett; "Continuation Schools in England and Elsewhere," by Michael E. Sadler; "The Simple Plan" (a novel); and "Cheshire Village Stories," by W. V. Burgess.

We are informed by Mr. Edward Arnold that the publication of the Reminiscences of Lady Dorothy Nevill has been postponed till Monday, October 22.

CORRESPONDENCE

MR. HOWITT AND "THE SECRET OF THE TOTEM"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In "The Secret of the Totem" (pp. 197-200) I criticised parts of a passage in Mr. Howitt's "Native Tribes of South East Australia" (p. 500). My criticism, made in the place referred to and elsewhere, is by me withdrawn, for it was based on my own misconception of the passage in Mr. Howitt's book. On reading Mr. Howitt's reply to me in Folk Lore (June 1906), I wrote to that periodical, saying that I "regretted my misapprehension of his page 500. . . ." and that I had "forwarded my correction to every quarter in which it is likely to be published; had placed slips containing the corrigendum in 'The Secret of the Totem,' and 'The Euahlayi Tribe' and had withdrawn the criticism based on the misunderstanding." (Folk Lore xvii. 3, p. 291.)

Mr. Howitt complains, in your columns, of my remark in the previous number of Folk Lore: "We are here on the ground of facts carefully recorded, though strangely overlooked by Mr. Howitt. . . ." In the new number of Folk Lore (p. 290) I have pointed out that, in addition to my initial misconception of Mr. Howitt's meaning, another error was introduced by the misplaced comma, after "recorded," a coquille which escaped my correction, though it perverted my meaning, and, indeed, produced nonsense. The Editor of Folk Lore, in a footnote, "apologises for the comma," but I must take the wyte of it on my own shoulders. If Mr. Howitt will oblige me by understanding that I withdraw every word of criticism which is contaminated by my initial misconception of his meaning, I have, I hope, no more to do but to reiterate the expression of my regret that the error occurred.

A. LANG.

October 7.

DR. JOHNSON ON SACRED POETRY

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to Dr. Johnson's odd prejudice against sacred poetry, which is a subject of comment in your review of "The Treasury of Sacred Song," it may be of interest to your readers to be reminded of at least two passages in "The Lives of the Poets" where he maintains this view with characteristic force. Of Denham he writes: "He made a metrical version of the Psalms of David. In this attempt he has failed; but, in sacred poetry who has succeeded?" And of Dr. Watts: "His devotional poetry is, like that of others, unsatisfactory. The paucity of its topics enforces perpetual repetition, and the sanctity of the matter rejects the ornaments of figurative diction. It is sufficient for Watts to have done better than others what no man has done well."

Can any good Johnsonian tell me whether Johnson had read George Herbert, and, if so, does he anywhere express any opinion on his sacred poems? I cannot recollect his doing so, and my "Boswell" lacks an index. It is to be presumed, if he makes no mention of Herbert anywhere, that he judged him also to have failed in this particular field—however mistaken such a judgment may appear to us to-day. For it is not easy to suppose that Herbert's poetry was unknown to him.

H. C. MINCHIN.

October 7.

SINGULAR AND PLURAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If "snow falls melts" is bad grammar, it is a mistake often committed by Scotchmen at the present day and by Burns, as for instance in the end of "The Two Dogs": "There's some exceptions, man and woman" and by Shakespeare, as pointed out in Abbott's "Shakespearean Grammar" § 333.

But the inflection in -s in such cases should rather be regarded as a survival of the old northern plural in -s, which is commonly found in Middle English works composed in Scotland and the North of England. Many instances may be found in the poems of Dunbar, e.g.,

"As varlotis dois in France"

"Them helpes no conclusions slee."

MICHAEL MACMILLAN.

October 6.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the pleas for and against the revision of spelling one point is continually passed over; whether or not those letters summarily styled silent are entirely without their phonetic value in actual practice. It is easy for reformers to persuade their following of the advisability of like spelling for sounds and syllables which to them are homonymous when even the supporters of the old order are ignorant of the extent of their possible loss. The truth is, too few of us regard language as heard and uttered sound, capable of infinite evolution in accordance with the exigencies of its day; too many of us try to circumscribe it by the limits of its written token, confounding the symbol with the living principle symbolised. Our speech, gathered from many sources, contains ghosts and shades of sounds needing not less but more complexity of spelling to indicate them fully, but as speech continually evolves owing to its compulsory currency the full indication of it is not necessary, can indeed never be arrived at because of the essentially variable nature of language until the language has become practically dead. Therefore a temporary symbolism is all that should be aimed at, not a scientific theory of spelling based on the pronunciation of to-day to which the pronunciation of to-morrow is expected to conform. Also the question arises whether any newly suggested theory can express even the sounds of to-day; for, as elocutionists know, our present much-cavilled-at system of spelling is wonderfully efficient, and anything conciser must lose some capability for denoting those subtle distinctions of pronunciation in which English is so rich. German and Italian have indeed arrived at simple orthography, but both these tongues are of less mixed origin than ours and therefore of less variety, and have in addition a certain decadent tendency to lose sounds by the assimilation of letters which with us are mercifully quite defined; as, for instance, the assimilation in German of g and h, t and d. And this is an evil to be feared with simplified spelling, because the spread of lettered education has to some extent taught men to speak as they write. It would probably be in vowel sounds that English would lose most, because it contains so many more than the alphabet contains vowels, at present generally indicated by the conjunction of vowel with vowel, or vowel with modifying consonant combined with a silent vowel; e.g., the o in how, or, and alone. It would also lose in that breathing which can hardly be said to be audible of such letters as the gh in through, or in light; which, in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, have an influence on speech. To the mental ear at least there is a value attached to such so-called silent letters which affects stress and rhythm vitally; and as the cultured may speak as they write so will they consequently write as they wish their words to be spoken. The music of a poem written under the present system of orthography would under the orthography proposed have no written token, and its correct delivery would have to depend on intuition or tradition.

The historic and etymological interest of the old spelling, with its interwoven charm of a race's varied growth become articulate from age to age, has been admitted; and lovers of literature feel how much of subtlety and delicacy may be lost by the removal of letters which carry in themselves the scent of use in many centuries, but they feel it sentimentally for the most part, deprecatingly, as though bewailing the glamour of a superannuated system. Very few reason further and consider whether or not there is any present point in the maintenance of our familiar orthography. They do not realise that, consciously or not, those "silent" letters and apparently accidental variations of spelling exercise a definite though infinitesimal difference in the duration and pronunciation of a syllable. Unfortunately this is too seldom noticeable in common speech, for few of us employ beauty of diction, but to the actor, the orator and the poet they may be invaluable. It is a commonplace that in lovely diction one should hear not only every word but every letter of the word. This does not mean a necessity for pronouncing "honest" or "often" literally; but it does imply a lingering, which is hardly more than a thought, over the silent letters. A conscientious spelling-reformer would probably state that under the present plan "word" is pronounced as it would be if spelt "wurd" or "werd"; but the student of diction knows better. There is a fullness in the o vowel which the u and e lack. "Tongue" written "tung" must, if faithfully pronounced according to its spelling, lose both in the vowel and in a certain stress on the final obvious articulation.

There is also the point, debateable between Northerners and Southerners, which would have to be settled before phonetic spelling could be adopted, whether the r in "word" and "cord" is simply a modifier of the vowel, or whether it should be lightly touched upon as a consonant.

Probably by the lay mind the final letter of "colour," "whether," etc., is considered silent, but this is an easily refutable mistake. Then there is the fullness of sound in the ou of "colour" which cannot be expressed by the same token as the e in "latter." Again, there is a fuller inflection, and the fraction of a moment's more lingering on "were" than there would be if it were spelt "wer." These are a few of many instances which prove the danger our language would run of becoming thinned and attenuated with a simplified spelling, for the next generation would probably lose its tradition of the varying sounds, and loss of variety cripples the music of speech. If words such as these are to be subjected to revision it can only be done satisfactorily by adding to our alphabet the many letters needed for their scientifically written indication.

Now the present advocates of reform are all for simplification, but by it they would probably impoverish most disastrously the possibilities of modern English. More than most other much-spoken European languages English is still developing and changing. It was a complete and noble language in the sixteenth century, it is another to-day, and, if destructive science is not allowed to intervene, it may become another to-morrow. The music of it for literary purposes is practically unlimited, for it has adopted and adapted so many sounds from so many lands. Might not the proposed binding of it down break its further flight? The art of a language, like other arts, has generally culminated when it is reduced to a system.

There is, of course, the point of view of English as a language for foreigners, but this should not be considered, properly. A tongue is primarily for the nation which gave it birth, and that it is spoken by foreigners at all is a transitional occurrence, dependent on commercial or dynastic importance, of little real moment. The supremacy of a country is not affected by the simplicity or complexity of its speech or orthography, and international intercourse can be maintained on a slight vocabulary. Judged from a higher platform our language is more likely to endure as a classic among languages if we cling as heretofore to the variety which makes accuracy of expression possible. If we eliminate we must lose some power of signifying the sounds of our speech, we sacrifice a part of our national inheritance and retrogress towards the unsubtlety of a dead and formulated tongue. Imagine such a poem as Keats's "Ode to the Nightingale" written with the proposed revised spelling! What clinging cadences, what imperceptible breath of music would it not lose! The thought-borne "silent" letters are sweet with the sweetness of unheard melody, faint with beauty. That is why poetic speakers must appreciate the value of the individual word and letter; the rhythm of the phrase is insufficient. The inspired orator may produce his effects by stress of thought in imperfect English, but the reciter of beautiful words must do justice to the very juxtaposition of the vowels and consonants.

Without a special gift, perhaps the only people who have the instinctive love of letters are those who learned to read very young. Easy and correct spelling comes naturally to the early reader, whilst bad spellers almost invariably have learned reading late; that is, after five years old. There is much to be said for the old plan of teaching a child its alphabet as its first game; and then on through stories of short words until at the age of four or five it reads for its own amusement. A child that loves reading can so easily be led to educate itself, and self-education is the only kind that really counts. But nowadays we systematically render our children trivial-minded by kindergarten and other methods, we premeditatedly incapacitate them for self-development by letting them learn to work and play in the schoolroom instead of in the nursery, and then when we find that the average child of eight can hardly spell at all (and if it can't at eight it probably won't at eighteen, or eighty!) we come to the conclusion that English orthography should be revised according to the limitations we have created.

GLADYS JONES.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I beg to thank Mr. Mayhew for his practical suggestion for the introduction of fonetic spelling, altho I do not think there wud be any need for the old and the new spellingz to be plaist in parallel columz. If the new letterz wer indicated and their equivalents in the old spelling wer plaist at the bottom of each page, this wud be a sufisient kee. I remember Sir Isaac Pitman giving me copieez of "The Spiritual Columbus," a sketch of Emanuel Swedenborg, printed in a graduated fonetic stile, the new fonotypic letterz wer introduced gradually, with a foot-note of explanashon at the bottom of the page. I gave a copy to a friend, he past it on to his sister, and she red it thru, without notising the new characterz, until she had finisht the book. This explodes the so-called difficulty of reeding fonetic type. Further, if haaf-an-our wer spent in larning the new characterz ther wud be no need for parallel columz, graduated steps, or foot notes.

Let us hope the ashurans of Via Media wil help to giv quiet to the fearful. In aul ajez the aprehenshon and profesiez of evil of ultra-conservativz hav playd a larj part, seldom, if ever realizd. Mr. John Morley's advise iz—not to beleev the "profets."

Iz Mr. F. W. T. Lange not too aprehensiv, and did he re-reed his oan leter? With his great experiens he seemz to be fighting against his reezon and his sentiment. Ther iz litl or no chans ov fonetic spelling becoming the standard notashon for ordinary use for jenerashonz. Our extreem conservativz wil never permit it, altho its introduction wud create litl if any more disturbans than the first and subsequent developments of the Simplified Spelling Boord wil ocazhon. It wud be beter—az Mr. G. Bernard Shaw suggests—wer we to take the bul by the hornz and adopt it strait of. After that "red ruin, and breaking up"—ov every thing. Perhaps—not. Aul that the most radical can expect iz the gradual modificashon of our ritten formz and the introduction of a fonetic alfabet into scoolz, for tuisohnal purposes. The familiarity and reezonableness of this wil beget a demand for practical fonetics for daily use, which a subsequent jenerashon wil hav to consider and meet, when Mr. Lange and the rest of us ar ded and gon.

Mr. Lange clingz to the historic side of ritten speech. Whot haz made history, stability or chanje? Insted of destroying history, fonetic spelling, wer it adopted, wud furnish Mr. Lange with adishonal food wherwith to feed his historic craving. Sentiment haz completely captured Mr. Lange, or he wud never hav committed himself to such an absurd statement—that fonetic spelling wud empty our langwaje of its asosiaschonz with the past and cauz our literature to becom a slozed book to the masses. I cannot imajin that Mr. Lange beleevz this. That the introduction of sum 12 or 14 new characterz, closely allied to existing letterz wud swomp our literature, that the resoarses of typic injenuity and the wit of man wud be dried up, and that we shud be without a book to reed, iz too monstrous to entertain. Mr. Lange protests too much.

Mr. Lange afirmz most peopl prefer to reed the Bible, Shakespear, Milton, etc., in the orijinal. Doo they? Whot vershon of the Bible ar preferd—the Hebraic, the Vatican, the Sinaitic, the Alexandrian, the Beza, St. Jerome's, King Alfred's, Elfric's, Wyclif's, or Tyndal's? How many First Folio edishonz of Shakespear haz he found in Librarianz, in the palases of the great, or in the cotej homes of England? If the demand for orijinals iz real, it must hav been met, to the joy of Christie and long prices, or the preferens for them iz just a fansiful figment on Mr. Lange's part, that first edishonerz are stil hunting in a scanty feeld, and that ordinary mortaltz ar content with current edishonz, and manaje to doo the wurk of the world just az wel az the "orijinal" readerz.

H. DRUMMOND.

Hetton-le-Hole,

THE SUEZ CANAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The lines Marlowe puts into the mouth of "Tamburlaine the Great," as to his project of cutting a channel from near Alexandria to the Red Sea, may rather be regarded as reminiscent than prophetic. Marlowe was not unacquainted with classic, or mediæval lore, and must have known that such waterways as his Scythian hero suggests, had been constructed by the ancient Egyptian monarchs; by the Roman rulers of Egypt, and finally, by its Arab conquerors. The last canal was destroyed by Caliph Ali Mansoor in 767. It is stated that Napoleon had the isthmus surveyed with a view to reconstructing the canal but was dissuaded by his engineers.

Gothe, who, by the way, was an admiring student of Marlowe, was often unfortunate in having his best suggestions, "stolen by the ancients."

J. H. INGRAM.

October 9.

ENGLISH AND FOREIGN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is remarkable that the London County Council has, ever since its creation, had a wonderful knack of doing the wrong thing. Its latest action is, however, about the worst I ever heard of. The London County Council is perfectly justified in wishing to build itself a grand ornate hall on the south side of Westminster Bridge, but instead of straight-away commissioning one of the many capable English architects to undertake the design, I hear that the Council has actually determined to open a competition, in which foreigners are to be asked to participate! Could unpatriotism go further than this? What a disgrace it would be to England, and to London in particular, if by any chance a foreigner were to win the competition, and an alien structure were set down to face the quiet serenity of Westminster Palace in the heart of the Empire! The possibility of such a thing is too awful to contemplate, and it must not happen.

October 8.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Leonardo da Vinci's Note Books, arranged and rendered into English with Introductions by Edward McCurdy. 8½ x 6. Pp. xiv, 289. Duckworth, 8s. net.

[All passages of philosophical, artistic or literary interest have been selected, and from the scientific writings a few of more general interest or serving to illustrate Leonardo's method of exposition. The thirteen illustrations are mainly studies of anatomy, flowers and drapery.]

Phythian, J. E. George Frederick Watts. With 32 illustrations. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 191. E. Grant Richards, 2s. net.

Tompkins, Herbert W. In Constable's Country. With many reproductions from his paintings. 9 x 6½. Pp. 264. Dent, 12s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Walker, Williston. John Calvin: The Organiser of Reformed Protestantism, 1509-1564. Heroes of the Reformation series. 8 x 5½. Pp. 456. Putnam, 6s.

[The author dwells on Calvin's training, spiritual development, and constructive work, rather than on the minutæ of his Genevan contests, or the smaller details of his relations to the spread of the Reformation in the various countries to which his influence extended.]

Stoker, Bram. Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving. 2 vols. 9½ x 6. Pp. 760. Heinemann, 25s. net. (See p. 369.)

De La Warr, Constance, Countess. A Twice-Crowned Queen: Anne of Brittany. 9 x 5½. Pp. 228. Nash, 7s. 6d. net.

The Flight of Marie Antoinette. From the French of G. Lenotre, by Mrs. Randolph Stawell. With over fifty illustrations. 9 x 6½. Pp. 340. Heinemann, 10s. net.

Marzials, Sir Frank T. Molière. Miniature Series of Great Writers. 6½ x 4. Pp. 128. Bell, 1s. net.

[Chapters on Molière's Life, Molière's Works, Molière's Art, "Le Misanthrope," and a short bibliographical note.]

Lydekker, R. Sir William Flower. 7½ x 5. Pp. 191. English Men of Science series. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[Deals with the scientific rather than with the social and personal side of Sir William Flower's career.]

Williams, J. E. Hodder. The Life of Sir George Williams. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 356. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[The life of the "Father of the Young Men's Christian Association."]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Nesbit, E. The Story of the Amulet. With 48 illustrations by H. R. Millar. 8 x 5. Pp. 374. Unwin, 6s.

The Old-Man Book. Rhymes by R. P. Stone; illustrated by C. G. Holme. 10 x 7½. Pp. 71. Lane, 3s. 6d.

The Child's Own Magazine. Seventy-third annual volume. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 148. Illustrated. Sunday School Union, 1s.

Young England. Twenty-seventh annual volume, 1905-6. Illustrated. 11 x 8. Pp. 484. Sunday School Union, 5s.

Meade, L. T. The Hill-Top Girl. 8 x 5½. Pp. 405. Chambers, 6s.

Fenn, G. Manville. Tention! 7½ x 5½. Pp. 411. Chambers, 5s.

Finnemore, John. Foray and Fight. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 315. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Baldwin, May. Dora: A High School Girl. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 319. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Whishaw, Fred. The Boys of Brierley Grange. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 316. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Finnemore, John. The Empire's Children. 7½ x 5. Pp. 288. Chambers, 2s. 6d.

Townshend, Dorothea. A Saint George of King Charles's Days. 8 x 5. Pp. 224. S.P.C.K., 2s.

Allen, Phoebe. Granfer Garland. 8 x 5. Pp. 215. S.P.C.K., 2s.

Marchant, Bessie. Athabasca Bill. 8 x 5. Pp. 220. S.P.C.K., 2s.

The Sunday at Home, 1905-1906. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 1004. R.T.S., n.p.

The Boys' Own Annual, 1905-1906. 11½ x 8½. Pp. 824. R.T.S., 8s.

The Girls' Own Annual, 1905-1906. 11½ x 8½. Pp. 832. R.T.S., 8s.

FICTION.

Hope, Anthony. Sophy of Kravonia. With 16 full-page illustrations by Fred Pegram. 7½ x 5. Pp. 398. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 6s. (See p. 365.)

Sheppard, Alfred Tresidder. Running Horse Inn. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 416. Macmillan, 6s.

Simpson, Violet A. Occasion's Forelock. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 354. Arnold, 6s.

Compton, Herbert. To Defeat the Ends of Justice. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

[Here and there the author reveals an imagination almost equal to Stevenson's, but his novel is a thing of shreds and patches. "General Faloon" belongs to comic opera; and the opening chapters might have been written by the brothers Melville. The author might have made a good writer for boys.]

Somerville, E. (E.); and Ross, Martin. Some Irish Yesterdays. Illustrated by E. E. Somerville. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 249. Longmans, 6s.

Hamilton, M. The First Claim. 7½ x 5. Pp. 315. Methuen, 6s.

Rorison, Edith S. The Swimmers. 8 x 5½. Pp. 402. Heinemann, 6s.

Truscott, L. Parry. The Marriage of Aminta. 8 x 5½. Pp. 340. Blackwood, 6s.

Griffin, E. Aceituna. A Servant of the King. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 304. Blackwood, 6s.

Battersby, H. F. Prevost (Francis Prevost). The Avenging Hour. 8 x 5½. Pp. 347. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

MacCarthy, Justin Huntly. The Illustrious O'Hagan. 8 x 5½. Pp. 319. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Cutting, Mary Stuart. Little Stories of Courtship. 7½ x 5. Pp. 233. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

Oxenham, John. A Princess of Vascony. Her Trials and Troubles, Her Adventures and Misadventures, and where they Brought Her. With illustrations by Frances Ewan. 7½ x 3. Pp. 428. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Silberrad, U. L. The Second Book of Tobiah. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 390. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Jepson, Edgar. The Triumph of Tinker. Being some Further Adventures of the Admirable Tinker, Child of the World. 7½ x 5. Pp. 275. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

HISTORY.

Snider, Denton J. The American Ten Years' War, 1855-1865. 8 x 5½. Pp. 527. St. Louis: Sigma Publishing Co., n.p.

La Nation Belge, 1830-1905. Conférences Jubilaires faites à l'Exposition Universelle et Internationale de Liège en 1905. 10½ x 7. Liège: Desoer, 12f. 50.

LITERATURE.

Munro, H. A. J. Translations into Latin and Greek Verse. With a preface by J. D. Duff, and a portrait. 8½ x 6. Pp. 113. Arnold, 5s. net.

[These translations were printed in the autumn of 1884 and the copies were distributed by the author among his friends. In the reprint before us a few slight changes are introduced from Munro's own copy of the original edition, and two translations have been added at the end. Some were printed separately before 1884, mainly in Sabrina Corolla and in Holden's Folia Silvulae, but these were much changed before their second appearance. We shall return to the book later.]

The Vita Nuova and Canzoniere of Dante. The Temple Classics. 6 x 4. Pp. 357. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.

[The Temple Classics Dante, begun by the issue of the Paradiso (1899), is completed by this volume. Mr. Thomas Otley is responsible for both text and translation, except those of the Canzoni, which are contributed by Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed.]

Lewis, Charlton. The Principles of English Verse. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 143. Bell, 5s. net.

Jusserand, J. J. A Literary History of the English People. Book iv.—From the Renaissance to the Civil War. 9 x 6. Pp. 551. Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.

Quesnerie, G. de la; and Bastide, Ch. The English Language. History—Word-making—Synonyms—Spelling. With exercises and index. Classes du premier et du second cycles. Enseignement secondaire des jeunes filles. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 88. Paris: Paulin, 1fr. 20.

Kilbourne, Frederick W. Alterations and Adaptations of Shakespeare. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 190. Boston: The Poet Lore Company, $1.50.

An Anthology of Australian Verse. Edited by Bertram Stevens. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 300. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Conrad, Joseph. The Mirror of the Sea. Memories and impressions. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 306. Methuen, 6s.
- Baynes, Herbert. The Way of the Buddha. 6½ × 5. Pp. 132. Wisdom of the East series. Murray, 2s. net.
- [Appendix : Sanskrit and Pali Texts of Works Translated or Referred to in the Treatise.]
- Schooling, John Holt. The British Trade Year-Book, 1906. Covering the twenty-six years 1880-1905, and showing the course of trade. With 221 tables, each containing several sections of British or of international trade, and 75 diagrams. Second year of issue. 10 × 7. Pp. xxxii, 384. Murray, 10s. 6d.
- [Chapters on : Imports; Exports; Bullion and Specie; The Excess of Imports; Manufactured Goods; Our Trade with Foreign Countries; Foreign Countries' Imports; Taxes on Imports; Our Trade with British Colonies; British Colonies' Imports; Colonial Taxes on Imports, etc.; An International Comparison of Imports and Exports; The Leading Articles of Export; and Sellers in Foreign Markets. Five appendices.]
- Burrill, Katharine. Loose Beads. "Life's free beauty, its loose beads, with no straight string running through." 7½ × 5½. Pp. 223. Dent, 3s. 6d. net.
- [Essays on various subjects. Four have appeared in Chambers' Journal.]
- Pulitzer, Walter. Cosy Corner Confidences. 7½ × 3½. New York : Dodge Publishing Co., n.p. (See p. .)
- Eliot, Charles W. Great Riches. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 38. New York : Crowell, 75c.
- [Papers on "The Rich Man's Power," "The Children of the Very Rich," etc.]
- Nicholson, J. S. The Relation of Rents, Wages and Profits in Agriculture, and their Bearing on Rural Depopulation. 7½ × 5. Pp. 176. Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.
- Parsons, John Denham. The Nature and Purpose of the Universe. 9½ × 6. Pp. 561. Unwin, 21s. net.

POETRY.

- Yeats, W. B. Poems, 1890-1905. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 280. Bullen, 6s. net.
- [A reprint of all the author's printed poems since the publication of "The Wind Among the Reeds," nearly seven years ago.]
- Symonds, Arthur. The Fool of the World, and other Poems. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 118. Heinemann, 5s. net.
- [Some of the shorter poems in this volume were printed in "A Book of Twenty Songs."]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, the Astronomer Poet of Persia*. Rendered into English verse by Edward FitzGerald. Introduction by C. K. Shorter. 6½ × 4. Pp. 68. Heinemann, 6d. net.
- [We should have imagined that at this date an introduction to Omar Khayyám was superfluous. Fourteen pages, however, are prefixed to the present reprint, and from them the reader may learn much : that the "Rubáiyát" has "eclipsed in fame the best-known poems of Longfellow and Tennyson—the favourite writers of verse within the memory of most of us," and a host of equally illuminating details. Perhaps the most thoughtful piece of criticism is that on page xi : "A knowledge of the Persian language or an acquaintance with the Persian poet is as little required in reading Omar as is a knowledge of the original 'Gesta Danorum' of Saxo-Græmmaticus in order to be able to appreciate Hamlet. We do not need to read the Bible story of the Creation in its original Hebrew in order to enjoy the 'Paradise Lost' of Milton!" A portrait of FitzGerald is prefixed to the volume, though there is none of Mr. Shorter, whose work precedes the translator's.]
- Trollope's Barsetshire Novels.—Library Edition : Barchester Towers, with an introduction by Frederic Harrison; and The Warden. 7½ × 5. Each 3s. 6d. net. The York Library : Barchester Towers, with an introduction by Frederic Harrison; and The Warden. 6½ × 4½. Each 2s. net. Bell.
- [The same type has been used for both editions, without alteration in spacing or pagination.]
- Hogarth, D. G. Kinglake's "Eothen". With an introduction and notes by D. G. Hogarth. 7 × 4½. Pp. 295. Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Except where obviously wrong, the text of 1864 is adhered to in the present edition.]
- Poems of Coventry Patmore*. With an introduction by Basil Champneys. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 439. Bell, 6s. net. (See p. 366.)
- Nettleship, R. L. Memoir of Thomas Hill Green. With a short preface specially written for this edition by Mrs. T. H. Green. With portrait. 8 × 5½. Pp. 251. Longmans, 4s. 6d. net.
- [Reprinted, with a few slight alterations, from "The Works of T. H. Green."]
- The Pembroke Booklets (First Series). V.—Robert Southwell (Selected Poems); Henry Constable (Pastorals and Sonnets); William Drummond (Songs, Sonnets, etc.). Pp. 63. VI.—Thomas Lodge (Songs and Sonnets); Robert Green (Lyrics from Romances, etc.); Samuel Daniel (Selected Verse). Pp. 64. Each 7 × 4½. Hull : Tutin, 4d. net each.
- Lawler, John. Book Auctions in England in the Seventeenth Century (1676-1700). With a Chronological List of Book Auctions of the Period. Popular edition. The Book-Lover's Library. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 241. Elliot Stock, 1s. 6d. net.
- The Rule of Saint Benedict*. Edited, with an English translation and explanatory notes, by Dr. Oswald Hunter Blair. Second edition, revised. 7½ × 5. Pp. 220. Sands, 3s. 6d. net.
- H. W. F. and F. G. F. The King's English. Second Edition. 8 × 5½. Pp. 370. Oxford : Clarendon Press, 5s. net.

The Modern Cyclopædia. "A handy book of reference on all subjects and for all readers." Edited by Charles Annandale. New edition, revised and extended. Vol. i. A—Bla. 8½ × 6½. Pp. 536. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

[Articles contained in the earlier edition have been revised, and new ones have been added, and a supplement appended to each volume. A large number of new illustrations have been inserted.]

Carey, Rosa Nouchette. At the Moorings. 7½ × 5. Pp. 451. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell : Ruth, and other Tales. The Knutsford Edition. In eight volumes—vol. iii. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 557. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.

[See the ACADEMY of August 25, p. 186. Vol. iii, contains : "Ruth"; "Cumberland Sheep-Shearers"; "Modern Greek Songs"; "Company Manners"; "Bessy's Troubles at Home"; and "Hand and Heart."]

Brassey, the Hon. T. A. Problems of Empire. Papers and addresses. Popular edition. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 218. Humphreys, 2s. 6d. net.

[Reprinted articles, speeches and letters on Imperial Federation; Imperial Defence; and Imperial Preference.]

"Grey, Vivian"; and Tylee, Edward S. Boy and Girl; should they be Educated Together? A study of the principle and methods of co-education. 6½ × 4. Pp. 72. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. net.

SCIENCE.

Massee, George. Text-book of Fungi, including Morphology, Physiology, Pathology, Classification, etc. 8 × 5. Pp. 427. Duckworth, 6s. net.

Gill, Richard. The CHCl₃ Problem. 7½ × 5½. Pp. lxxvii, 597. 2 vols. Vol. i.—Analysis; Vol. 2—Physiological Action. Blackwood, 10s. net.

SOCIOLOGY.

Bosanquet, Helen. The Family. 9 × 5½. Pp. 344. Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.

[An estimate of the meaning and importance of the Family as an institution in human society.]

Baskerville, Beatrice C. The Polish Jew. His Social and Economical Value. 9 × 6. Pp. 336. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY.

Brierley, J. Religion and Experience. 8 × 5½. Pp. 310. Clarke, 6s.

[“A study of religion from the standpoint of experience.”]

Vianney, Joseph. The Blessed John Vianney, Curé d'Arz, Patron of Parish Priests. Translated by C. W. W. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 211. Duckworth, 3s.

The Expository Times. Edited by James Hastings. Vol. xvii. October 1905—September 1906. 9½ × 7½. Pp. 568. Edinburgh : T. & T. Clark, 7s. 6d.

Watson, Frederick. Inspiration. 8½ × 6. Pp. 248. S.P.C.K., 4s.

Abbott, Edwin A. Silanus the Christian. 9½ × 5. Pp. 368. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

[An endeavour to show, "in a general and popular way—on psychological, historical, and critical grounds—how the rejection of the claim made by most Christians that their Lord is miraculous, may be compatible with a frank and full acceptance of the conclusion that he is, in the highest sense, divine."]

McKim, Randolph H. The Problem of the Pentateuch. An examination of the Results of the Higher Criticism. With a foreword by the Dean of Canterbury. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 136. Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.

[Three lectures on the Reinecker Foundation delivered at the Virginia Theological Seminary in December 1905.]

A Little Book of the Inner Life. By a Monk. 6½ × 4. Pp. 66. Sands, 1s. net.

[“Written by a monk of the old school. The manuscript is in the possession of a Benedictine Convent in England, and is now published for the first time.”]

Frazer, J. G. Adonis; Altis; Osiris; Studies in the History of Oriental Religion. 9 × 5½. Pp. 339. Macmillan, 10s. net.

[“In studying afresh these three Oriental worshipers,” says the author, “I have paid more attention than formerly to the natural features of the countries in which they arose, because I am more than ever persuaded that religion, like all other institutions, has been profoundly influenced by physical environment.” These studies are an expansion of the corresponding sections in "The Golden Bough," and they will form part of the third edition of that work, on the preparation of which, we are glad to learn, Dr. Frazer has been engaged for some time.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Sherring, Charles A. Western Tibet and the British Borderland; the Sacred Country of Hindus and Buddhists, with an account of the Government, Religion, and Customs of the People. With a chapter by T. G. Longstaff describing an attempt to climb Gurla Mandhata. Illustrations and maps. 10 × 6½. Pp. 376. Arnold, 21s. net.

[Deals at some length with the legends, religions, customs, superstitions and beliefs of the Tibetans and neighbouring tribes.]

Thompson, P. A. Lotus Land. 9½ × 6. Pp. 312. Werner Laurie, 16s. net.

[“Being an Account of the Country and the People of Southern Siam.” Profusely illustrated. The greater part of the introduction consists of a historical sketch of Siam; for the rest, the author has “tried to give a faithful account of the peasantry,” among whom he lived for three years.]

Del Mar, Walter. The Romantic East: Burma, Assam, and Kashmir. With 64 full-page illustrations from photographs. 9 × 5½. Pp. 211. Black, 10s. 6d. net.

[Completes the series of book on the East which Mr. Del Mar commenced with "Around the World Through Japan." The author is an excellent guide, and the traveller to Burma, Assam, or Kashmir will do well to provide himself with the book. But was the frontispiece portrait necessary?]

THE BOOKSHELF

MR. JOHN LANE sends us a new edition of the English translation of Oscar Wilde's Salome (10s. 6d. net) with the drawings of Aubrey Beardsley and "a note on 'Salome'" by Mr. Robert Ross. Mr. Ross's note is not an appreciation of the play: it is a brief history of its reception in England, where it was cordially disliked, and abroad where it is much admired, and frequently acted. Richard Strauss, as Mr. Ross makes clear, made an opera of it—of "Salome"—and nothing else, though there have been attempts in England to diminish the composer's debt to the dramatist. In England the performances of the play have been but two. It was forbidden, as all will remember, by the Censor when Mme. Bernhardt, for whom it was written, proposed to play it in French in London: since then it has been played by the New Stage Club in May 1905, and again by the Literary Theatre Club in 1906. Mr. Ross's note contains one or two interesting quotations from the author's letters and conversation; one from a letter being most characteristic; when the play was produced in Paris with great success, the author wrote from prison: "I wish I could feel more pleasure, but I seem dead to all emotions except those of anguish and despair. . . . Try and see what Lemaitre, Bauer, and Sarcey said of 'Salome.'" There is no use now in attempting to alter the common English opinion: those who admire the play will be glad to have this beautiful edition, those who do not will not be persuaded to try again. English criticism has not shown itself to advantage in this matter. It is a pity that those who dealt the heavy-handed attacks on an extraordinarily beautiful, if unwholesome, piece of work, did not realise that the last word of criticism had been said by the illustrator. We know of no more cruel, more fiendish comment on Salome than Aubrey's Beardsley's drawings. Just because he understood where others did not, because he saw to the full the beauty of what others thought at least merely foolish, his sympathetic mind was able to sum up the faults and merits of the work and to express at the same time the spirit of the artist himself. In all art there is no more extraordinary instance of combined collaboration and criticism; the infernal wit of the drawings mocks at the very beauty which they translate with consummate sympathy and skill.

Alexander Petöfi, Poet of the Hungarian War of Independence. By A. B. Yolland. (Budapest: Franklin Society.)—New works about Petöfi are appearing continually, but so many new facts concerning him continue to come to light and his idiosyncrasies are always being regarded from such varied standpoints, that there may be raisons d'être for all of them. The latest book on the subject which has reached us is by Dr. Yolland, author of a work in Hungarian on the foreign translations and translators of Petöfi and of an English-Hungarian dictionary, now in the press. Dr. Yolland does not really deal so much in the present brochure with Petöfi's position towards the War of Independence, as with his place in the world's literature. He is properly desirous of remedying the deplorable ignorance of the English, even amongst our literary people, as to the nature and position of the great Hungarian poet's work. He animadverts upon the fact that of a poet of the very highest rank, a man who, if not as Dr. Yolland claims, the compeer of Dante and Shakespeare, is certainly one of the greatest lyrical poets known, the very name, much less the writings, is scarcely recognised in England, deeply though he be revered by other races no more akin to Hungarians than are the English. It is true Hungarian is not easy to acquire; its grammar is complicated and its vocabulary is amazingly copious, but these difficulties are not insurmountable: it is a living language, with a fine, prolific literature, and it has an advantage over the Russian, Greek, German, and Oriental languages in being written and printed in Latin characters. There are no subtleties about Petöfi's work. His poetry bursts forth in strains of even less premeditated art than Shelley's, but it is no commonplace, conventional rhyming. He is too natural and too national to have been modified by any model, and, although he was conversant with and admired intensely the poets of other races, his poetry is quite uninfluenced by them. He appertains to no school or class. His works are as varied and as different from one another as they are original and uncontaminated by the published thoughts of other men. He was a creative genius and could delineate a typical being in a few words; embody an immortal thought in one line. That he was the laureate of the War of Independence is true; and his national anthem, "Talpra Magyar," and his patriotic lays aroused the nation as much as the eloquence of Kossuth, "the greatest orator of the age," but that was only one manifestation of the poet's powers, and it is impossible to believe—it is contrary to proof—that Petöfi's genius would have remained dormant, or his poetry have been suppressed, whatever circumstances may have environed him. The national melancholy of his race permeates his song, but it is lit up at times by flashes of humour, of humour often mordantly sarcastic. He was the embodied spirit of his country: there never breathed a poet so representative of a race—so characteristic of its type and class, as Petöfi.

Unhistoric Acts: some records of Early Friends in North-east Yorkshire. By George Baker. (London: Headley Bros. 7s. 6d. net.)—Mr. Baker's record, while principally intended for members of his own family and religious Society, is so packed with quaint detail accumulated from many sources that it is of wider interest. The period covered is not strictly indicated in the sub-title, since the lives of its "three generations" of Yorkshire farmers cover the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The picture of yeoman life at Honeybee Nest, Danbydale during the early years of the last century is full of quiet charm. It has its pages of storm also, which tell how the moorland Quaker home was beset by a malignant smuggler, how the neighbours shared in keeping watch against the marauder, and eventually prevailed upon the owner to allow them to make use of fire-arms. After a series of adventures the harassed family was relieved by its enemy's disappearance: "whether he was seized by a press-gang in one of the seaport towns, or whether he went another voyage and never returned, is almost equally likely to have been the case, but rumour has it that he became a changed character and developed into a local preacher. . . ." The most striking person in the book is Joshua Hedley, "Uncle Jossey" as he was called, who died at Thirsk in 1856. As years passed, says the annalist, "he seems to have become more obstinate and self-willed, due probably in part to his increasing deafness. Some few of a later generation may still remember him as an old man, dressed in knee-breeches and gaiters, rather below medium stature, hard of hearing, preferring his old armchair in the corner of the kitchen to a more dignified seat in the farmhouse parlour. Even in his old age he liked to be helping amongst the farm stock, especially the sheep, and much preferred ewes' milk in his own basin to milk from the ordinary sources of supply. He took upon himself the post of supervisor of his nieces' reading, who would doubtless have preferred to choose their own books without his censorship, but," adds Mr. Baker with a charming inconsequence, "those who knew him best seem to have loved him most." He was the enemy of all who infringed upon the public rights, and used to say, when a declaration of "No road" sought to prevent his wanderings: "No one would have taken the trouble to put up such a notice unless there had been a road." We can well believe that his deafness, as Mr. Baker remarks, "increased the difficulty of dealing with him."

From Libau to Tsushima. By the late Eugène S. Politovsky: translated by Major F. R. Godfrey, R.M.L.I. (Murray). The author of this book was engineer-constructor of the second deep sea fleet flagship which went out to the far east, and the book, which is in diary form, consists of extracts from his letters to his wife. It cannot be said that it throws very much light on the voyage of the celebrated Baltic fleet, but it contains a few observations of interest buried in a mass of trivial details never intended for publication. If the author had been a closer observer and a more trained writer, the letters might have been very valuable, since little is known of that remarkable journey after the fleet left Tangier until it met its doom. It is remarkable that the hopelessness of the enterprise was apparent to the author from the start, and that he is quite candid in his remarks about the discipline and morale of the fleet. In spite of being constantly employed in repairing damages this officer suffered badly from ennui and seems to have found relief in abusing the English. From Angra Pequena, for instance, he wrote: "England supplies with arms the natives whom the Germans are now going to subdue. She is evidently a country that tries to damage every one and to work mischief everywhere." Naturally the account of the Dogger Bank incident is described, and the writer finds consolation in the fact that the shooting was so good: the comment that the fishermen were to blame for not getting out of the way and cutting adrift their nets is worthy of a Russian.

The Science of Dry-Fly Fishing. By Fred. G. Shaw, F.G.S. (Bradbury, Agnew, 3s. 6d. net.)—This is a pleasantly written treatise on Fly Fishing, and the novice will find in it all the information that he requires, and much excellent instruction conveyed in a very direct and simple manner. Mr. Shaw was amateur champion in the trout-fly casting competition at the International Tournament in 1904, and confines himself throughout to his own experience, so that we have here no second-hand information or advice. We quite agree with him that every one should learn how to cast a fly before he goes to the river-side "to scare the trout": and, if careful directions, aided by capital diagrams and photographs, can teach the art of casting, Mr. Shaw's book should prove invaluable to the beginner. Anglers are so numerous to-day, water so limited, and trout so shy, that it is not fair to learn the rudiments of casting at the expense of the public. It is not the fish which are caught that harm a trout-stream, but those that are frightened or pricked; and the enthusiastic recruit is safer on a lawn at home until he has learnt to cast a fly lightly in the direction required. As an attempt to combine the two schools in Fly Fishing—of wet and dry fly—the book is not likely to commend itself to the Dry Fly Purist; but it should be useful to all who have not unlimited time at their disposal. "Watch and wait" is an excellent motto for such happy people, but few men nowadays can afford to spend a day by the river waiting to cast a fly until they see a rising fish: the majority will prefer to fish on the chance which is always present so long as the fly is in or on the water; and these will welcome a book which emphasises the fact that trout may be induced to rise at times when they are not actually feeding on the natural fly. It is only the most accomplished angler who can support blank days with equanimity. A chapter is devoted to the natural history of trout flies, and Mr. Shaw gives us much interesting information about Pisciculture, with illustrations of the Trout Breeding Establishment at Lower Chilland on the Itchen. There are still many places in the British Isles where trout-fishing may be obtained which is both cheap and good, as the author points out. A most useful chapter on the various articles which a trout-fisher requires concludes a very practical book; and, though we feel sadly that the complete angler will soon resemble Father Christmas or the White Knight, yet we are grateful for Mr. Shaw's advice, and feel sure that his book will be most useful to "all who are anxious to earn."

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED DRINK THE
WHITE
 DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
 AND AFTER DINNER. & BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much
 stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE ACADEMYADVERTISEMENT CHARGES

Whole Page	£8 8 0
Half "	4 4 0
Quarter "	2 10 0
Narrow Column	3 0 0
Per Inch, Narrow Column	0 7 6

SERIAL RATES (for not less than 13 narrow columns)

Whole Page	£7 10 0
Half "	3 15 0
Quarter "	1 17 6
Narrow Column	2 10 0

SPECIAL POSITIONS AS ARRANGEDSMALL-TYPE ADVERTISEMENTS

6d. per Line. Minimum, 2/6. The first line is counted as two

Copy for Advertisements must be sent in not later than 12 noon on Thursday.
 All Orders for Advertisements are received subject to the space being available and the Proprietors reserve to themselves the right to decline or hold over an Advertisement.

All Communications respecting Advertisements must be addressed to THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER, 20 TAVISTOCK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE PAPER FOR A FRIEND ABROAD.

Writing from Saranac Lake, New York, U.S.A., a reader says:

"I have just finished your issue of June 30th, and I want to say 'Thanks' for it. My father sends it me each week, and I thought it would please you to know how much it is appreciated, though it makes me very homesick at times.

"This is a health resort full of lungers from all parts, and the 'Saturday Westminster' goes quite a round as soon as I get through with it. The Americans—quite a good class up here—are amazed at the price considering the quality, and at the merit of the whole production."

The subscription rate for abroad is 8s. 8d. a year, post free.
 Shorter periods at proportionate rates.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
 TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
 SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
 THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office:

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office:

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE:

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY:

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches:

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1798

OCTOBER 20, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

GREAT MALVERN SCHOOL OF ART

H EAD MASTER required, duties to commence in January next. Commencing Salary £120 per annum. Teaching in Schools permitted. Applications, with particulars of qualifications and with sealed testimonials, to be sent on or before November 13 to

Mrs. JACOB (Hon. Sec.),
St. Helens,

Great Malvern,
from whom a Prospectus of the School may be obtained.

MR. ROBERT SUTTON,
Publisher,

H AVING Special Facilities for the Production of Scientific, Educational, Theological, Technical, Biographical, and Art Works

Is prepared to arrange for the issue of same, in a tasteful style, and at most reasonable cost.

Books illustrated by the "Suttonelle" Glas Print, specimen of which will be sent to applicants. MSS. carefully read. Estimates of costs supplied. Accounts verified by a Chartered Accountant's Certificate.

43 The Exchange,
Southwark Street, S.E.

Typewriting

T YPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt, 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

T YPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

T YPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

T YPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

QUEEN'S HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS

Every Evening at 8

THE QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

Conductor—MR. HENRY J. WOOD.

1s., 2s., 3s., 5s., usual agents, Chappell's Box Office, Queen's Hall. Full programmes for the entire season from the Queen's Hall Orchestra (Ltd.), 320 Regent Street W.

ROBERT NEWMAN, Manager.

Books for Sale.

T H O M A S T H O R P,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

M O N T H L Y C A T A L O G U E S from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

D R A M A O F Y E S T E R D A Y and T O - D A Y
by Clement Scott, a History of Drama during the last 50 years, 2 vols., 8vo cloth Macmillan, 36s. net for 7s. 6d. post free.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

S P E C I A L B A R G A I N.—Dickens's Complete Works, with frontispieces, 21 volumes, neatly bound in cloth, as new 18s. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought or Exchanged. List of "Books Wanted" sent free.—GEORGE T. JUCKES & Co., The Ruskin Book Stores, 85 Aston Street, Birmingham.

G O O D C O P Y O F A R C H A E O L O G I A C A N -
T I A N A, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

F I R S T Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,

All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

Books Wanted

C U R R E N T Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

R H Y S L E W I S, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Hotel

A B E R Y S T W Y T H . — T H E Q U E E N ' S
H O T E L .—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

S I G N O R I N A C I M I N O, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

T O A U T H O R S.—Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Art

F A M I L Y P O R T R A I T S, P I C T U R E S, and M I N I A T U R E S Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GORREY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

Where is it?

HERE IS THE BOOK TO TELL YOU.
JUST PUBLISHED. Price 6s. net.

A THOROUGHLY REVISED EDITION OF Chambers's Concise Gazetteer of the World

PRONOUNCING.
Topographical. Statistical.
HISTORICAL.

Containing the latest and most reliable facts and figures regarding places at home and abroad

Edited by DAVID PATRICK, LL.D.

AN INVALUABLE BOOK

For BUSINESS MEN.

For THE HOME LIBRARY.

For every SCHOOL, COLLEGE, and REFERENCE LIBRARY.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

LONDON LIBRARY

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.
Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq., ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S.

Treasurer—EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; HENRY YATES THOMPSON, Esq.
Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof.
Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S.,
Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P.
Ibbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq.,
Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D.,
Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription,
£3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1906 pp.
410, 1905) is now ready, price £2 6s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known," the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."

W. E. H. LECKY.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art specially dealt with.

Fastest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 418. OCTOBER 1906. 8vo, price 6s.

- I. SOCIALISM IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
- II. BORDER BALLADS.
- III. CHRISTINA, QUEEN OF SWEDEN.
- IV. THE ORIGIN OF LANDSCAPE.
- V. SOME TENDENCIES IN MODERN MUSIC.
- VI. LITERARY CRITICISM, ESTHETIC AND PSYCHOLOGICAL.
- VII. GREEK ART AND MODERN CRAFTSMANSHIP.
- VIII. THE GERMAN STAGE.
- IX. CHARACTERISTICS OF MR. SWINBURNE'S POETRY.
- X. REFORMING THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.
- XI. IRISH WANTS AND IRISH WISHES

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

T. FISHER UNWIN
Adephi Terrace, London

A LITERARY HIS- TORY OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE

By J. J. Jusserand

12s. 6d. net

The ATHENÆUM, in a review of the French edition, says: "One feels a certain difficulty in characterising this book adequately. It is not only a literary history—the work of a scholar . . . this book is more than literature—it is the prose epic of the Elizabethan age."

RAMBLES ON THE RIVIERA

By Edward Strasburger, F.R.S.

21s. net

A record of the author's rambles during Spring trips made in the course of ten years. His excursions extended over both the Rivas—di Ponente and di Levante. The volume contains 87 Coloured Illustrations.

ROMANTIC CITIES OF PROVENCE

By Mona Caird

15s. net

An attempt to suggest to the imagination the peculiar charm and quality of Provence. The volume contains 72 Illustrations from sketches by Mr. JOSEPH PENNELL and Mr. EDWARD SYNGE.

THE PSYCHOLOGY AND TRAINING OF THE HORSE

With Frontispiece

10s. 6d. net.

This book, written by a well-known authority, Count EUGENIO MARTINENGO CESARESCO, contains a minute and practical study of the manner in which the horse learns and the methods by which it may be trained.

'ST. STEPHEN'S IN THE FIFTIES

By E. M. Whitty

10s. 6d. net

"A series of brilliant and informing chapters giving us insight into the politics of the time, and graphic pen pictures of the men who played the prominent parts in the great political drama."—TRIBUNE.

New 6s. Novels

AT THE SIGN OF THE PEACOCK

By K. C. RYDES [TINT NOVEL LIBRARY]

THE IRON GATES

By ANNIE E. HOLDSWORTH

THE LOCUM TENENS

By VICTOR L. WHITECHURCH

SILAS STRONG

By IRVING BACHELLER

A CRYSTAL AGE

By W. H. HUDSON

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	387	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		The Later Poetry of Mr.
Owen Meredith	389	Swinburne	397
The Complete Parson	390	Fiction	398
Art and Sociology	391	Fine Art:
A Poet Philosopher	392	The Autumn Salon	400
The Mirror of the Sea	393	Music:
American Culture	394	The Colour in Brahms	401
Fetichism	395	Forthcoming Books	402
An English View of the		Correspondence	402
Philippines	396	Books Received	404
Treble Song	397	The Bookshelf	406

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

SEEING the announcement of Mr. Hall Caine's generous offer to publish his new play himself at a low price, we wrote to one or two other leading authors for their views. The following are among the replies we did not receive:

"I have been compelled to change publishers more than once, because they declined at my order to entirely and completely drop the abominable practice of advertising. I shall publish my next book—'The Heavenly Hostess, or County Society seen from Inside'—myself, at the normal price of 10s. 6d. net, including the only known portrait of my little dog."—M-r-e C-r-lli.

"As a good Socialist, I hold that no author ought to make any money at all: as a consummate artist, I intend to make all I can—anyhow."—G. B. S.

"My Parliamentary duties leave me no time for writing books now. I have only twenty-six on hand at present. But I am thinking out a plan for disposing of them to my publisher at thirteen as twelve—inclusive of Prefaces."—H. B-ll-c, M.P.

"My West End audiences tell me that the miasma of trade contaminates the atmosphere of my published lectures. The next volume, therefore, entitled 'Aristotle's Categories of the World-Influence of Corsets,' will be obtainable only on application to the Porter, Claridge's Hotel. I have undertaken to see to the advertising."—Em-l R-ch, Doctor Juris.

"Can't afford such experiments. But would sell to children half-price."—J. M. B-rrie.

"It all comes of the decadence of the drama."—H. Arthur-J.

"The futility of the whole squabble is only equalled by its fatuity. Commerce is the poetry of existence; and poetry the existence of commerce. Your publisher is your only poet, and a poet without a publisher is a pig without a poke. If you want to know what all this means, ask some one else. I don't know. But it pays."—G. K. Ch-st-rt-n.

"My Book on Funereal Fun or Corpses and Canards, with a dedication to the Serious Press of England, will be published (uniform with my collected plays) in time for Christmas. The volume will also contain a few of the things I wrote for W. E. Henley and Pollock, some years before Howglass was born."—R-b-rt R-ss.

(We are happy to publish this letter, but it seems a little off the point.)

"I bow before Mr. Hall Caine's consummate genius for [a word erased here; it seems to begin with adv . . .]. But I do not intend to imitate it."—A. W. P-n-ro.

[Through spirit post, by favour of Mr. J. N. Maskelyne.] "All that for The Bondman when you can get the whole of me for sixpence! Methinks the author doth expect too much."—W. Sh.—"Poor Shakespeare preserves his delusions. He means the whole of me."—Fr. St. A.

"Will ask Colvin's opinion and wire you again."—St-ph-n Ph-ll-ps.

"Am engaged in dramatising the Sermon on the Mount. What offers?"—W-lt-r St-ph-ns.

It is just forty years since Dr. Edmund Gosse first entered the British Museum as an assistant transcriber, and, in the address which he delivered at the inaugural meeting of the Library Assistants' Association at the London School of Economics, he gave some interesting reminiscences of the years he spent there. During a small part of this time he served under Sir Antonio Panizzi, or, as he probably preferred to be called in this country, Sir Anthony Panizzi. The first time Dr. Gosse visited the Museum was in the company of Kingsley; but when, some three months later, he took up his duties there he found the assistant transcribers placed in "a horrible room, below everything, smelling of dry rot." The assistants were alternately neglected and bullied. Their favourite pastime was playing cricket against the office door of the Head of the Printed Books. Watts "wished they'd play cricket when they knew he was out."

At that time the catalogue of the library was in a deplorable condition and full of mistakes. This was particularly the case in regard to the entries in foreign languages, and the young transcriber set to work and mastered the tongues of northern Europe. He then carefully compiled a list of the corrections necessary in the catalogue and took it to his chief. The chief however, scarcely appreciated these well-intentioned efforts. "Can't you mind your own business?" he asked, as he tore the manuscript in two and threw the pieces into the waste-paper basket. Dr. Gosse then devoted the time to making books. And it is to these otherwise regrettable circumstances that we owe some of his earlier works. The inevitable end of these conditions, which were brought about by the tyranny of Sir Anthony Panizzi and those who followed after him, arrived at length, accompanied by the usual explosions. The climax was brought about by Archbishop Trench, who was turned out of the reading room by one of the attendants. A letter to the Times followed as a matter of course. But it was still some time before the necessary changes were made.

Referring to the Library of the Upper House, Dr. Gosse lamented the fire which in 1834 broke out opposite the chapel of Henry VII. The spread of the conflagration completely destroyed the Library; and there is now no record of any kind left of the books it then contained. The catalogue or the inventory of the contents, whichever it was, was kept on the premises, and was destroyed. The present collection numbers some fifty thousand volumes. The librarian of the Middle Ages was obliged to swear an oath to take due care of the books in his charge, as well as to see that his readers observed the same rule. Wordsworth usually received his parcel of books at breakfast time and on these occasions he sometimes cut the leaves with a buttery knife! Professor Morley, whose work consisted in a great measure of editing, had absolutely no respect for the books he used and tore out pages and sections and sometimes gutted a book to save copying. If we remember rightly, his library, now in the Hampstead Public Library, contains a set of Swift's works in twenty-five volumes, completely ruined in this way.

The report of the Bodleian Library for 1905 contains some interesting matter. The number of printed and manuscript items received during the year constitutes a "highest on record," being no less than 79,539. This includes a number of colonial newspapers subscribed for from the Beit donation; a gift from the Indian Government of manuscripts and blockbooks purchased in Tibet; and the collection of printed books and pamphlets on Homeric subjects formed by the late D. B. Monro, presented after purchase by his friends. The most important new manuscript acquired by purchase is MS. Lat. liturg. d. 11, a fourteenth-century missal of the church of Marspitz in Bohemia, in ancient leather binding with brass ornaments. Mr. Lowther Bridger, Old Manor House, Walton-on-Thames, an old member of New College, and a descendant of Milton's brother, Christopher, has deposited two articles which had belonged to the poet: (1) a tortoiseshell case containing ivory tablets, a pair of metal dividers and another instrument; (2) a leather and tortoiseshell snuff-box, gold-mounted. These are exhibited in the same glass case with those volumes of Milton's works (with long autograph inscriptions) which the poet himself gave to the Bodleian.

Mr. Bouchier, having staved off the critics from The Morals of Marcus until the fiftieth performance, invited them to witness the play last Saturday. From our study of the notices received, we do not see that Mr. Bouchier has gained any more weighty or well-considered verdicts than he would have by following the usual course. It is not, indeed, a play that gives much scope to the critic. The original book, we believe, had some sort of a philosophy of life in it; there is little in the play. As adapted by Mr. W. J. Locke from his own novel, it appears a pretty sentimental story of a middle-aged scholar who fell in love with a little vagabond from Turkey—of English parents, but of Turkish up-bringing—and loved her so well that he married her even after she had been entrapped into running away with a professional seducer. A touching story, well and delicately told, with plenty of fresh humour; but nothing more. It is, however, very capably acted. Mr. Aubrey Smith is the first scholar we have seen on the stage who looks like a scholar. He does not, indeed, handle a book as the real Marcus Ordeyne would have handled it; but in every other respect he makes it easy to believe that he is what he is called. That is no small achievement. The average actor never fails so utterly as in his attempts to represent a man of learning. Miss Alexandra Carlisle, who plays the Turkish lady, is delightful—a recruit of importance to our stage; and every one else acts well.

The only thing we find to grumble at concerns the outside, not the inside of the theatre. Is it necessary that the front of the house should be so plastered and blocked with advertisements of the play? The Garrick Theatre is not a particularly handsome building, but it is not one which, like, say, the Waldorf or the Aldwych, we should be glad to see entirely covered with posters to conceal the hideous architecture and the detestable "decoration." All theatres are offenders in this matter—even His Majesty's. Do these posters and bills really attract so many people as to make it worth while to disfigure handsome buildings for the sake of the custom they bring?

It may be only coincidence, but we have recommended for some months past that something more should be done to aid librarians in their selection of books; and a proposal before us, which comes from the Library Supply Company, would, if successful, permanently accomplish the object. The want of some additional aid in the selection of books is not felt only by the provincial librarian, but also in a large measure by the London librarian. There are only four booksellers in the metropolis who stock technical books in any large numbers, so that it is obviously a matter of difficulty for a librarian to examine books before purchasing. And, of course, the whole success of the Library Movement rests upon the selection of the best books. Obviously the scheme, under which the books will be exhibited but not sold, must depend upon the publishers for support; but after the Exhibition of Best Books at the Bradford Conference there appears little doubt that this support will not be withheld.

The scheme provides for a central exhibition, more particularly of technical publications. These books will be arranged and systematically classified on shelves, so that all may examine them with a view to purchase, which must be transacted through their booksellers. The book-cases and shelves will be properly labelled, and an index provided. The books will remain on exhibition for three months, after which they will be returned to the publishers. Each month a selected list of the best books will be published in classified order, with correct catalogue entries and annotations, and with the purchasers' names and addresses, in The Library World and Book Selector. An essential feature will be, not only complete catalogues of all the publishers properly arranged, but also a card-index of all information concerning forthcoming works. Arrangements will also be made to answer all queries.

In addition to the current exhibition, series of exhibitions of the best books on special topics or subjects will be arranged every two months, and a classified list of all books on each subject will be prepared and printed. It would be difficult to overrate the value of these special exhibitions to any one engaged in a special industry. And, if the scheme proves successful in London, it will probably be extended to some of the larger provincial centres. As we have before pointed out, the book-buying powers of the whole of the public libraries of the country are enormous.

A correspondent writes: While agreeing in the main with your contributor (September 29) on the condition of "The Modern Picture Market," I think he is unjust to a not inconsiderable section of the public who do extend their patronage to young and almost unknown painters. It must be remembered that pictures, if necessities to the few, are to the many luxuries, and consequently, if trade and business generally are depressed, artists are the first to feel the effects. Now, among my acquaintance are many painters and a few modest collectors, and it may interest your readers if I give a few facts with regard to the buying of modern pictures which have come within my own experience. One friend of mine, whose total income cannot exceed £300 a year, is in the habit of spending annually on sketches, etchings or lithographs by modern artists from thirty to forty pounds, no negligible proportion of his scanty income. Another case is a house-master at a public school—by no means a millionaire's profession—who within the last two years has spent close on £400 on paintings and bronzes by artists usually under thirty years of age.

These cases (our correspondent continues) may be held to be exceptions, but the fact remains that notwithstanding the very large number of painters and the reputedly small number of buyers, there are, even among the younger generation, many painters who can earn their living without sacrificing their aims and ideals. I know of a young painter practising in Paris, where prices are lower than in England, who after his third year of exhibiting at the Salons found his sales yielding from £150 to £200 per annum. No great wealth this perhaps, but how many young authors, musicians, barristers, doctors, etc., are there who can earn so much in their first few years of practice? A second painter of my acquaintance, practically unknown as yet, has earned £350 with his brush in little over a twelvemonth. To do this, it is true, he was forced to sell about twenty-five pictures at prices far lower than they were worth, but he wisely decided that even a quarter of a loaf was better than no bread. I should add that neither of these artists is a portrait-painter, the most lucrative branch of their profession, and neither exhibits at the Royal Academy. The sales have resulted in the first case from exhibitions at Paris and Brussels; in the second from exhibitions held in various provincial cities. To conclude, my experience is that a painter of real gifts, who is content at the outset of his career to accept low prices, has no great difficulty in making a livelihood. It is not so much the lack of buyers as the big prices demanded for bad pictures which have depressed the modern picture market.

The Slade Professor's lectures at Oxford during the October term will deal with Raphael, and will be illustrated by lantern slides chiefly from the drawings in the University Galleries. The Oxford collection of drawings by Raphael and Michelangelo is among the finest in the world and in the case of Raphael it is specially rich in drawings of the master's early period. The lectures are delivered in the Slade Professor's studio in the University Galleries at six o'clock on Wednesday afternoons, beginning on Wednesday, October 24.

Mr. A. H. Bullen writes to us as follows: "In the list of 'Books Received' in your number of October 13, Mr. W. B. Yeats's 'Poems 1899-1905,' published this week by me, is described as a 'reprint.' I venture to ask you to qualify this statement, seeing that although the book contains previously published matter, the dramas therein included have been largely re-written, and the additions and alterations made by the author entitle the book to fresh consideration." That fresh consideration it will shortly receive in the ACADEMY, but we would point out that the book was entered under "Poetry," not under "Reprints," as it would have been had it contained no new matter.

At the annual congress of the Association Littéraire et Artistique that closed in Bukarest recently, the Minister of Public Instruction announced that a bill is shortly to be brought into Parliament for effecting the adhesion of Rumania to the Berne Convention. The congress also proposed to amend the convention by adopting a resolution that the contracting states should pledge themselves to grant reciprocity even to countries outside the union, provided that the home legislation includes the reciprocity clause with regard to publication. Another matter of practical interest, as bearing ultimately on the admission of the Netherlands to the union, was a decision to institute an inquiry (a questionnaire) concerning the complaints and grievances of authors in the Netherlands in the matter of piracy. It may be noted that at the present time the union is formed by Great Britain, with her Dominions, and most of the countries of Europe, excluding Austria-Hungary—which has a separate convention with Great Britain on similar lines to the Berne Convention—the Netherlands, Russia and Turkey. Japan, Hayti and Tunis have also joined.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Aristotelian Society, 22 Albemarle Street, W. Meetings for session 1906-7. 1906: November 5, at 8 P.M. Rev. Hastings Rashdall. The Presidential Address: "Nicholas de Ulricuria: A Mediæval Hume"; December 3, at 8 P.M. Hon. Bertrand Russell. "The Nature of Truth." 1907: January 7, at 8 P.M. Mr. T. Percy Nunn. "Causal and Final Explanation"; February 4, at 8 P.M. Miss E. E. Constance Jones; March 4, at 8 P.M. Dr. F. C. S. Schiller. "Humism and Humanism"; April 8, at 8 P.M. Mr. Shadworth H. Hodgson. "Fact, Idea, and Emotion"; May 6, at 8 P.M. Mr. A. T. Shearman. "Intuition"; June 3, at 8 P.M. Mr. B. Dumville. "Philosophy and Education."

Parents' National Educational Union.—Tenth Annual Conference at the Pavilion, Brighton, on November 2, 3, 5 and 6, 1906.

British Empire Shakespearean Society, St. James's Theatre. Friday October 26 at 1.30 P.M.—Annual Elocution Competition. Judge, Mr. George Alexander. Thursday November 29. Prize-giving by H. H. Princess Louise Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein.

Royal Court Theatre. Tuesday, October 23 at 2.30.—The Charity that began at Home, a comedy in four acts by St. John Hankin.

Early in December Mr. David Bispham will produce in London, under the management of Mr. Frank Curzon, a new light romantic opera on The Vicar of Wakefield, written for him by Mr. Laurence Housman and composed by Madame Liza Lehmann. Mr. Bispham will play the part of the Vicar, and Miss Isabel Jay that of Olivia.

The English Drama Society will revive Dekker and Ford's masque The Sun's Darling (1624) on Wednesday evening, October 31, at the Queen's Gate Hall, South Kensington. Further particulars can be obtained from the Secretary (Mr. Nugent Monck), 20 Regent Street, S.W. The Hour by Nugent Monck, with Cleopatra in Judaea by Arthur Symons will be produced early in November.

Joachim Committee.—Series of Concerts of Brahms's Chamber music will commence on November 21. The whole of Brahms's Chamber music works written for more than two instruments, two of the Violin Sonatas and the two sets of Liebeslieder Waltzes will be performed by Dr. Joachim and his colleagues of the Joachim Quartett—Professors Halir, Wirth and Hausmann—with Messrs. Frank Bridge, Alfred Gibson, Percy Such, Richard Mühfeld, A. Borsdorf, Leonard Borwick and Donald Tovey, and Miss Fanny Davies.

Messrs. Carfax and Co.—Water-colour drawings by Mr. Alfred W. Rich. October 18 and following days.

The Chenil Gallery, Chelsea.—Paintings by Mrs. Mary McEvoy. Friday November 2 and following days.

Fine Art Society. Thursday, October 18 and following days.—Engravings after Rembrandt. Pastels by Frank Dean and T. W. Hammond.

New Dudley Gallery. Monday, October 22 and following days.—Oil-Tempera and Pastels by Edgar Wills.

Mr. W. B. Paterson. Thursday, October 18 and following days.—Memorial Exhibition of pictures by the late W. Evelyn Osborn.

LITERATURE

OWEN MEREDITH

Personal and Literary Letters of Robert first Earl of Lytton.
Edited by Lady BETTY BALFOUR. 2 vols. (Longmans, 21s. net.)

THIS is one of the most interesting books of the season. The late Lord Lytton was one of the most versatile of the public men of his day, and the only reproach that can be properly addressed to his memory is that he never did himself complete justice, whether in the domain of politics, administration or literature. In the book before us Lady Betty Balfour has not endeavoured to give a formal biography of her father, but she has produced a work even more interesting than a Life would have been. Her material has been studied and digested. The volumes form no crude collection of miscellaneous letters, but an arranged and orderly display of correspondence that illustrates the many sides of a most remarkable man. Robert Lytton was born on November 8, 1831. His early life was spent in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bulwer at Acton, near Ealing. As late as 1882 he gave in a letter to Mrs. Earle an amusing account of a visit paid to this scene of his childhood.

When the old woman saw my name on the order she exclaimed, "Why, this place belonged many years ago to the great Bulwer Lytton, did you know that?" "Yes." "Any relation to him?" "His son." She eyed me shrewdly—and with an air of evident disappointment. "Ah," she said, "he was the handsomest man I ever saw—or shall see—not like you." "What! you were then in his service at the Priory when he lived here?" "No. I have been here thirty-six years—but not so long as that. The place is full of historical associations—and now to think it should be cut into bits—and sold—to common people. Oh do buy it, my lord, and keep it together for his sake." "But when and how did you know him?" "I saw him once—once only. Years ago, Bulwer, as we used to call him—rang at that gate—and asked to see the place. I was obliged to tell him that my orders were to admit no one. He stood under yonder tree, and stamped his foot, exclaiming, 'Good God, this place was once my property—and now I am not allowed even to look at it!'"

He also tells us that when quite a child he was for some years in Ireland. He went to school at Harrow and after that was taken in hand by an English tutor, Dr. Perry, at Bonn. A great deal of his youth was spent abroad, and if it had been deliberately intended to train him for a diplomatic career he could scarcely have served a better apprenticeship. Indeed, in 1854 he was appointed as an unpaid attaché to the Embassy at Paris under Lord Cowley. But he probably had a stronger inclination towards literature than any other walk of life. Very early he seems to have formed the acquaintance of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and appreciated the works of the former long before they had come under the patronage of Dr. Furnivall. In 1855, when "Men and Women" was published, he wrote a most appreciative letter to the author. The friendship continued without interruption until Browning's name was made, when it somewhat cooled. He was the poet of his time of whom Lytton seems to have thought most highly. The references to Tennyson are not always so complimentary. In a letter to Mr. John Morley occurs this passage:

Prithee tell me now all about thyself, and something about the world "wherein I move no more." What are the wise men doing in England? Or are they all gone back to the East? Is the Gladstonian twaddle selling the Contemporary by its thousands and tens of thousands? What do people say of King Alfred's new play? I need not ask what they write of it. For this I see in all the daily and weekly papers. The Puff Universal, I cannot fancy the possibility of a really dramatic conception having issued from the brain of that blameless monarch of the milder muses, and their many worshippers. Not at least dramatic in the sense to which I think that much misused word should be confined. But I daresay his Queen Mary is at least more readable than Swinburne's Bothwell—a book I had rather praise than read—that is to say, if I needs must choose between the two evils.

It is scarcely possible to mention this letter without referring to the clever verses which Lytton often sent in communications to his friends. This one begins with a page of clever doggerel, of which we give the first lines:

What are you doing, John Morley, John Morley?
What are you doing in town?
Are you sorely, John Morley, assaulting the Tory
Lawgivers, and smiting them down?
While you list to the chatter of . . . the satyr,
For your sake does he dish up to breakfast a bishop,
Or parson, grown fatter by railing at matter,
With a sinner or two, such as Maxse and you,
And, to garnish the platter, a Turk or a Jew,
Between Moody and Sankey and Swinburne—who'll flavour
The whole with an aphrodisiacal savour
Lascivious and Grecian?

In the very interesting letters that passed between Bulwer Lytton and his son there is much with a literary bearing. Special mention might be made of a series in which they discuss the formation of schools of poetry, the point at issue being whether a small and more or less fantastic poet is more likely to found his school than one of the greatest. We have a school of Pope, but it can scarcely be said that we have a school of Shakespeare. It would be invidious to dwell on other instances that leap to the mind, because they are so recent. The truth would seem to be that while second-rate men of letters are frequently tempted to form themselves into coterie and tea-parties, the really great wield an influence that is unbounded. Milton did not found a school, but the study of his blank verse has moulded that of nearly every successor. It is very evident that Tennyson, for example, had given days and nights to the study of "Paradise Lost."

We might go on quoting thousands of passages that have a piquant literary flavour and interest, but the reader will find it more satisfactory to come upon them in their context. The book pictures the life of one who was born into the highest existing intellectual circle. His father was not only the most famous novelist of his day, but he was also a close friend of Disraeli and in touch with the best political thought of the time. Lytton himself was perhaps too dreamy and contemplative to have attained the highest distinction as a man of action, yet his vice-royalty of India was a fine chapter in English history. His appointment as French ambassador at the time gave the most general satisfaction and laid the foundation of that friendliness which has become so strong of recent years. His poetry was best when it was in lighter vein. "Glenaveril," as somebody said at the time of publication, requires a deal of reading; but scattered through these pages are bits of verse that the late Locker-Lampson would have been delighted to include in his Lyra Elegantiarum.

THE COMPLETE PARSON

George Herbert and His Times. By A. G. HYDE. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

ISAAC WALTON and the lapse of time have combined to invest the character of George Herbert with a sweet simplicity it did not possess. The modern Anglican is apt to think of him only as the gentle parson, living his devout, orderly life at Bemerton, spinning sacred poems in his garden (witness the horrible picture by Dyce reproduced in the volume before us) or on his sick-bed or pallet, dispensing heavenly counsel and earthly sustenance among a model parish of adoring rustics. We are all apt to forget that the man was, in fact, an exceedingly complex person; and we welcome, therefore, Mr. Hyde's very interesting, wise and well-written book, because its true message—as Mr. Hyde himself says of Herbert—is one of reconciliation. It had to deal with a large number of elements. There was first of all the fine gentleman, one of the Herberts of Montgomery, son of the Lady Magdalen, brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, stepson of Sir John Danvers, kinsman by marriage of Lord Danby, and one who, at least in his Cambridge days, "kept himself too much retired, and at too great a distance with his inferiors; and his clothes seemed to prove that he put too great a value on his parts and parentage." Then there was the courtier, the friend of the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, the constant visitor of the king, with a "laudable ambition" to obtain high office in the State. There was the fastidious scholar, the Public Orator of the University of Cambridge, who showed at any rate no greater disinclination than others of his class to fawn and flatter and adulate, and to indulge to the full his intellectual pride. There was, again, the dedicated soul, the life vowed from the earliest years of discretion to the service of God and his Church. There was the "orthodox, regular, puritan protestant," to apply to Herbert words which fit him well, though they were originally written of Nicholas Ferrar and his household at Little Gidding. There was the Laudian "sacerdotalist," whom modern High Churchmen still claim as one of themselves. There was the poet; there was the good Samaritan who arrived at one of his favourite music-meetings in Salisbury with his clothes all "soiled and discomposed" as the result of helping a poor man, whom he met on the road, to unload and load again his sinking horse; there was the simple, direct preacher—at the opposite pole to the Public Orator; and there was the poor parson who was still the "complete gentleman." All these things was Herbert; and it was Mr. Hyde's task—a task which he has fulfilled extremely well—to reconcile them all, and show us one man, the man George Herbert. In these pages he lives; we see him in all his apparently contradictory qualities; and so we receive a wider and saner view of him than is commonly current.

It need hardly be said that such a view of him adds enormously to the meaning and interest of his poems. Their literary quality has been discussed over and over again. The world is pretty well agreed that they contain much that is arid and much that is falsely ingenious in "conceit" and simile; that sometimes the poet is overcome by the teacher; but that in very many poems there is a homely freshness, a spontaneity, a perfection of workmanship, and a sweetness of soul and fancy that will render them immortal. At times, as in passages of "The Church Porch," Herbert's wit is vivid and actual, if at times it is far-fetched and false; at times, as our author well points out, there is the true Shakespearean ring in his line. Stricter critics will not follow Mr. Hyde along the full length of his generous enthusiasm for Herbert's poetry; but readers in general may be much more favourably disposed to it after reading his account of the poet's life and times. And for this, among other reasons. The world has grown so accustomed to devotional poetry that it frequently doubts its sincerity. Such and such ideas, it is imagined, are common property amongst devout people; they are the right thing to say; they have no more actuality in individual experience than the sentiments dutifully expressed by the preacher in his weekly discourse. That is the result, of course, of a flood of inferior sacred verse sent forth by writers without the capacity to feel deeply spiritual experience or to express it with point and truth. But no sooner is devotional poetry brought closely into touch with the facts of its author's life and character than it acquires a new meaning and a new force. If we are able to realise that the man who said this or that actually felt it, that it possibly or probably can be assigned to a period in his life when he was likely to have such thoughts and difficulties, we find it becoming real, vivid and genuine. And though, even without that knowledge, George Herbert's powers have indeed "comforted and raised many a degraded and discomposed soul, and charmed them with sweet and quiet thoughts," the possession of that knowledge is likely to increase his value for those who keep their spiritual troubles to themselves rather than submit them to the pragmatical handling of a church that is often too busy over philanthropy and sociology to be spiritual. The various elements in the character of George Herbert and the state of religion in the Church of England are the keys to most of George Herbert's poems; and though the analysis and dating of the poems falls outside the scope of Mr. Hyde's work, it forms an excellent introduction to study along those lines, and is likely, as we have said, to increase the value of the poems for all. Herbert did not write for publication at Christmas or the season of Lent; he did not wish to become a popular name in pious households or win promotion by his pen. Preserving in this matter to the last the shyness, the proud reticence of the fastidious scholar and the fine gentleman, he kept his poems to himself until, on his death-bed, he handed them to Mr. Duncon for the eye of Nicholas Ferrar, in case, after he was gone, they might "turn to the advantage of any dejected poor soul." They proved to be the pictures of the actual "many spiritual conflicts that have passed betwixt God and my soul, before I could submit mine to the will of Jesus my Master." The arena of spiritual conflicts is different now, it may be said, from that of an Anglican churchman under Charles I. Nevertheless, Herbert had the gift, like all poets, of expressing the universal through the particular. Of those who bow to the same Master as George Herbert, not one but will find his own spiritual conflicts illuminated in these pages; of those who do not, how many have not found in his treatment of that sense of sin, that need of renunciation that never die, echoes of their own feelings and new sources of strength?

There are many other aspects of George Herbert to which we might allude: one, in particular, must not be passed over. Mr. Hyde rightly touches with gentle scorn what we may call the Shorthouse view of Herbert, expressed in "John Inglesant,"—in the parson as fine gentleman, as centre of "culture" and "delicacy" and "refinement." How much of the weakness of the modern Church of England is due to that pernicious ideal?

ART AND SOCIOLOGY

The Social Ideals of Alfred Tennyson. By WILLIAM CLARK GORDON. (Fisher Unwin, 6s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this book is evidently afraid of incurring the reproach of philistinism. He has a commendable feeling of diffidence in subjecting a divine art to the prosaic loquacity of the sociologist. He recognises that the poet or prose writer can only at his peril start out to point a moral. But for purposes of lucid thought it would have been better if he had not employed the word "art." The writer of imagination, in a sense, is, as Arnold called him, a critic of life, but his primary duty is to hold the mirror up to Nature; that is to say, to paint men, women and things as they appear to him, regardless of what moral may be conveyed. That is not to say that he will be an immoral or even an unmoral writer, but only that the greater includes the less, and in this case the greater is truth. Very often it must happen that a man of deep and clear insight will go against the conventional morality and traditions of his time, but that does not by any means prove him lacking in morality. Conventions and traditions have grown with the human race and they wax old as doth a garment. There is scarcely one that has not had or does not now possess a useful purpose, but a time comes when that purpose is fulfilled and the tradition can be set aside. However, this is rather a digression from the main purport of Mr. Gordon's book, which is in truth a very acute and learned discussion of the social conditions of England during Tennyson's career. Nathaniel Hawthorne once produced the dark saying that every man is but the newspaper of an age. What he meant was that into the receptive ear pour the voices of a man's own age, and that when he gives out his own thoughts they are inevitably coloured by them. There is a kind of parochialness in time. How many writers have there been who have expressed the aspirations of their own generation only! The difference between them and the really great is that a Shakespeare or a Homer, as it were, feels along all the ages, while a Pope or a Tennyson speaks only for his century, and Tennyson was distinguished by exceptional receptivity. The son of a clergyman and imbued with beliefs that never were completely shaken, his "honest doubt" did more to weaken the national hold upon Christianity than any other utterance of his time or generation. What science was doing, what philosophy was saying, what historical research was laying bare, coloured his thought even where no revolution was produced. He also idealised the institutions of his country, was an Imperialist before Imperialism became popular, a devoted believer in a monarchy at a time when republican opinions were expressed by a considerable minority, a believer in Parliament as it might be, a supporter of the Established Church, and an adherent to the conventional morality of his time. All this made him a reflection of Victorian England, a reflection that, to speak metaphorically, might have been seen in one of the clear pools of his Somersby rivulet. Only on one occasion did he give some inkling of darker and more aggressive thoughts that seemed to find a place deep down in his mind. This was in "The Vision of Sin," which in so many respects affords a rude and striking contrast to all else that he had written. There we have sentiments and images such as might have come to the mind of some determined and aggressive reformer, combined with the bitterness and despair of one who had learned to hate a species. But this vein never again was allowed to appear in his poems. If we take the poem which he meant to be autobiographical, we can easily summarise the substance of Mr. Gordon's book. In the poems of Tennyson are shown, as in a beautiful picture, the scenery of his native Lincolnshire and the people who lived there.

Silent river,
Silvery willow,
Pasture and plowland,
Innocent maidens,
Garrulous children,
Homestead and harvest,
Reaper and gleaner,
And rough-ruddy faces
Of lowly labour.

When it led at length to the city and palace of Arthur the King, it was to bring these rough old knights back to us in a halo of nineteenth-century morality. When the gleam touched on the golden cross of the churches, the shrine was seen in a light cast upon it by modern philosophy. All this Mr. Gordon has worked out laboriously and well. His book is a creditable summary of the forces and conditions prevalent in Great Britain while Tennyson was writing.

A POET PHILOSOPHER

Dans la Lumière Antique. Le livre des dialogues. Vol. i. Les dialogues civiques. Vol. ii. Les dialogues d'amour. Par A. ANGELLIER. (Paris: Hachette, 3f.50 each.)

ONE of the most striking developments in modern French literature has been the wholesale fashion in which the great bulk of "intellectuels" have devoted themselves and the best of their talents to the problems and even the politics of the day. No doubt, the Dreyfus case had much to do with this descent into the public arena of those who had hitherto shut themselves up in their "tours d'ivoire," or had lived a sequestered life in those retired and exclusive laboratories of thought, the Universities. Some writers, like M. Jules Lemaitre and M. Francois Coppée, have undoubtedly lost by participating in the hurly-burly, but others, like M. Anatole France, have brought back imperishable loot from their bold forays and incursions into contemporary life and politics. We can forgive all the failures of the others for the sake of such incomparable studies of modern French society as "L'Orme du Mail" and the novels which form its sequel. Just as some hundred and fifty years ago the Encyclopedists with their followers and opponents seemed to be preparing for a vast change in the political world, so the great body of French writers, reactionaries as well as reformers, by their intense and extensive study of current social problems appear to be paving the way for a new conception of society. The contrast with England is indeed remarkable, where the great majority of our leading writers seem to draw their inspiration from the past—a fact which may explain the comparatively low position occupied by current English literature in the estimation of Europe to-day. Only the thinkers like Mr. H. G. Wells and Mr. Bernard Shaw appear to attract attention.

The very poets of France have been drawn into the fray. One of the latest, M. Angellier—known in this country for the masterly study of Burns which won him an honorary degree at the recent Quatercentenary of Aberdeen University—has in two volumes entitled "Dans la lumière antique" boldly discussed some of the most burning questions of the day, such as disarmament and depopulation. He wisely makes use of the past as his stage. The false perspective of remoteness that he thus secures gives to his pictures that slight tinge of artificiality that removes them from the vulgar actuality of the passing moment. The verse itself is strong, yet sinewy and even supple. French verse has to English ears at times the hardness and brittleness of glass. If architecture be frozen music, much of the beauty of French poetry appears to have the virtues of architecture. One thinks again and again of the French poet as a lapidary working in language. One is vividly conscious of the glorious clearness and the real presence of intentional design. One admires the strength and solidity of the work. These results are due, no doubt, to some extent to the fact that in French the noun and not the verb is the principal part of speech. Hence the difference in effect between the two languages. Substantives can only describe a succession of states, whereas the verb, which is the vehicle of action, is the vivida vis of English, serving as the go-between to the points through which the story passes. Πόρτα πέι is a good description of English, and especially of German poetry, whereas it is only the staccato clearness of the successive states depicted by the French writer which enables our minds to construct progressive transformations out of them like a cinematograph.

French verse has, in fact, all the qualities of a bronze bas-relief, but of a bronze so admirable that at its highest it is best described as spirantia aera. In such cases the metal seems to be flowing still, nay, flowing for ever; but it is a viscid kind of flow, much retarded, no doubt, by the limitation of the Alexandrine. It certainly lacks the extreme fluidity of English verse; and yet, paradox as it may seem, within the mould of the line itself it vibrates and throbs even more fiercely than English verse, for the simple reason that as the stressed syllable alone counts in the making of the verse there is a far greater variety possible among the unstressed or more lightly stressed syllables. Take for instance a poem like Victor Hugo's "Djinns," and the greater liberty within each line will at once be apparent, especially if one attempt to translate the poem into English verses of the same length as the French.

The title of the first volume, "Les Dialogues Civiques," sufficiently explains its contents. The opening poem is quite in the vein of Juvenal, except that there is just that absence of exaggeration which distinguishes the real poet from the rhetorician. The subject is roughly the same as the third satire of the Roman writer and Johnson's "London." An orateur (we should rather say statesman) disgusted with the degradation of political life, proposes to abandon the city. A friend attempts to remonstrate with him. The dialogue is typical of all those which follow. There is little or no action, but each contains an admirable summary of the pros and cons of the point at issue. Thesis and antithesis are the ground-work of the Euripidean tragedy, and the French seem to have inherited the passion of the Greeks for hearing both sides put. Perhaps it is partly due to the legal instinct of the northern Frenchman; to some degree it is the result of the rhetorical education they receive; but the truest reason of all is that real tragedy is the shock of conflicting ideals, of which action is only the outward and visible sign. To "interiorise" the struggle, to place it on the stage of the soul with eternity for background, does not mean a loss of dramatic force. The picture drawn by the orateur of contemporary politics is certainly striking.

"Le Nombre est devenu la raison de la loi; la loi n'est plus ainsi qu'un instrument du Nombre," producing merely "édits de convoitise et décrets de colère." The men "de bonne volonté" are proscribed. The country is ruled by men "qui, pour la dominer, vers eux l'ont fait déchoir jusqu'à plier sa gloire à leur ignominie." History has become a mere record "d'appétits d'un jour et de pactes d'une heure" on the part of vile traffickers in honours and posts.

Inaptes à connaître, à comprendre, à prévoir,
Ils réduisent l'histoire à leur propre ignorance . . .
En trafic mutuel, corrupteurs, corrompus,
S'achetant, se vendant, se marchandant l'un l'autre,
Echangeant, tour à tour mendians et repus.
Pour chaque heure où l'on rampe, une heure où l'on se vautre.
Le vieux sol paternel n'est qu'une marchée. . .

The very land "tantôt sent le crime et tantôt l'agonie." In answer to this fierce indictment, worthy of the "Iambes" of Barbier and of Hugo's "Châtiments," the friend pictures the orateur "vir pius et gravis," rebuking vice in the senate. Exile to him can only mean leaving behind him all that made life worth living. Arriving at the other side he will disembark "un voyageur sans âme." No matter if he fights single-handed. "Sur les champs d'imposture un seul mot vrai prévaut." Inevitably one thinks of Victor Hugo's proud assertion that, if only one be left to withstand Sylla, "je serai celui-là." The orator is overcome and exclaims: "Brise ce bâton! viens! Rentrons dans la cité!" This powerful plea against incivism is followed by two dialogues on the problem of disarmament and the wider question of the abolition of war. An old man—represented by a peace-loving philosopher—is matched against a warrior whose pen is as mighty as his sword. At all events, the chief laurels in the debate fall to his share. The poet evidently disbelieves in the abolition of war. It is contrary to his reading of human nature. Moreover he regards it as essential for preventing the relapse of humanity into a slough of swinish sloth. At most, he considers there is room in the intervals between the inevitable wars for the dreams of peace to be realised, and he admits that these peaceful interludes go to the making of the world, in which wars and the warriors are, however, necessary ingredients. One cannot help thinking that the writer has lived too near to the German frontier—a suspicion which is confirmed by a sombre passage towards the end:

La Paix ! Et maintenant, combien de temps ce frein
Tiendra-t-il en repos cette race hautaine ?
Ils sont persévérants, faits d'orgueil et de haine :
J'ai voulu d'un traité qui ne les blessât pas ;
Mais nos fleuves, nos champs, nos vins sont des appâts
Trop offerts à leurs yeux ; leurs nations fécondes
Multipliant sans cesse et grossissant leurs ondes,
Doivent franchir leur digne et déborder sur nous.

The old man begins by lamenting the horrors of war. "Quel vin est donc le sang pour que les populations De sa vendange rouge aiment à s'enivrer ?" And he asks if ever the time will come to break in pieces this wine-fat and uproot the vine. The warrior enters, and after a few preliminary skirmishes the old man opens fire by praising those who create:

Heureux celui qui sait et qui sent qu'il produit
Une immortalité dont la source est en lui !
Ah ! que cet homme soit la sculpteur, l'architecte,
Le philosophe en qui tout un peuple respecte
Le verbe d'où naîtra la substance des lois,
Le poète qui met des ailes d'or aux voix.

Whereas to the warrior he says: "Dans tes vides grandeurs ton âme est solitaire;" and the soldier himself as he grows old becomes "fatigué de porter cette immortalité Dans son ennui croissant et sa stérilité." The soldier argues that the warrior is rather a blind weapon in the hands of Destiny comparable to the tempest. Then, rising higher, he speaks of the stoical agony of the soldier whom men regard as a mere wheel in a huge machine, which, however, is composed of flesh and blood and feels and suffers like humanity. Inevitably one recalls those wonderful passages in Alfred de Vigny's preface to "Grandeur et Servitude Militaires," in which he almost anticipates Tennyson's words: "Theirs not to make reply, theirs but to do and die." "Ils tuent et se font tuer, C'est un sang anonyme." The soldier declares that he at least will perform his "inclement devoir." The old man admits that nature is but "un éternel frisson d'innombrables combats"; but the philosopher will one day find the dogma of peace. For the warrior that day is still far off. It will take as long as it has taken "qu'aujourd'hui les blés Croissent sur d'anciens lacs par les torrents comblés." The warrior preaches conscription, that tribute "par qui tout citoyen donnant en peu de soi, forme et mérite ainsi le secours qu'il reçoit." For him "la Volonté de l'homme est la santé du monde." "Et la lutte, ce van suprême qui sépare" the decadent nations from those which have a morrow. Yet, though the day be long, "les soirs ont aussi leur rosées"—an exquisite phrase worthy to set against Hawes's immortal couplet. But the Vieillard professes his preference for the dawn. "Ce qui meurt se sent-il attiré vers ce qui vient de naître." His fading eyes are fixed on the future. Once more the soldier affirms his stoic creed in spite that here below "tout est condamné et rien n'est gracié." And he exclaims: "Mais j'accepte le sort, tu rêves le miracle." Yet he recognises the truth of the philosopher's day-dream. "Cela fuit, diras-tu ? Mais c'est aussi réel Que la cité, la tour et le mont immortel !"

The "Dialogues d'Amour" are composed in a gentler key. Here the poet exchanges the trumpet for the lyre, and even for the lute. The first dialogue is between an old man (one had almost irreverently written Father William) and an adolescent. Its subject is l'éternel féminin. The old man speaks of the shipwrecks that love has caused, the youth is anxious to make the voyage to Cythera with a certain stranger who has recently come to the village.

For him the old man's wisdom is but "une douleur qui vit dans le cerveau quand elle est morte au coeur." "Ceux qui n'ont pas aimé n'ont qu'une âme imparfaite." The poem ends with a delightful description of his rustic home, unfortunately too long to quote here. We are transported into the land of Virgil's Eclogues. The last poem in the book is a striking statement of the problem posed by Zola's "Fécondité." It is a discussion between the young man and the stranger and is the most profound and the most powerful of all the poems. The woman is a wonderful study, full of disillusion and determined at all hazards not to obey the law of her sex. Although she has had a foretaste of the obscure delight of an infant at the breast, which recalls "le profond bonheur des muets sacrifices dont la vigne nourrit la grappe de raisin," yet her reason tells her that Chacun devrait laisser, sans le passer à d'autres,

Retomber à la nuit le peu d'être qu'il tient :
Les dernières douleurs seraient enfin les nôtres,
La cruauté des Dieux n'a que nous pour soutien.

Never have we seen the plea for race suicide more forcibly put. Happily the opposite case is equally eloquently maintained. This leaves us unfortunately but scanty space to describe the second poem in the book. It is a delicious idyll and in its way a flawless gem. Like the verse of André Chénier, it is full of the mellow flavour of antiquity blended with a strong essence of modern thought. "Sur des pensées nouveaux faisons des vers antiques !" A maiden passes the potter's house. The latter begs the wayfarer for a subject, and himself suggests various themes. First it is a cup worthy of the beaker so happily described by Theocritus, then a group of figures that Virgil himself might have traced, and finally a marriage procession in the style of Catullus. The virgin rejects them all. The potter in despair begs her for a subject and she suggests that of two faithful spouses in an exquisite passage worthy of Philemon and Baucis. The potter plucks up courage and asks if he may employ the maiden as a model for the female figure. She consents. To his further request to allow him to add himself for the companion figure she hesitates, and asks for a month's time to decide. That month she will spend on the mountains, but meanwhile he may start the work. Here is but the bare skeleton of a perfect work of art which can only be truly appreciated when it has been read and criticised as a whole. It has the symmetry, the grace and the oneness of the finest Greek work.

THE MIRROR OF THE SEA

The Mirror of the Sea. By JOSEPH CONRAD. (Methuen, 6s.)

LIKE every other fine artist Mr. Joseph Conrad runs the risk of being considered more for his matter than his manner. The distinction is not really so unfair as it looks, because if a thing is well said it is nearly certain to be at least worth saying. But, on the other hand, sometimes a fine conception is bungled in the telling, and the great advantage that Mr. Conrad has over most other writers about the sea is in his use of the English language. There are other English writers with equal knowledge, and love of the sea, but too often they stand in the light of their own impressions. Generally, they suffer from that curse of English descriptive writing—fluency; or, if they are not too fluent, they lay brutal hands upon the language, and by the use of startling epithets arrest the attention at the wrong moment and so spoil the impression. In the one case the impression is muddled by too many words, in the other it is distorted by the violent use of them.

Throughout his book Mr. Conrad so persistently speaks of the sea and seamanship in terms of art that it seems natural to take illustrations from him. In "Emblems of Hope" he complains of the degradation of sea language in the daily press of this country. The journalist, he says, almost invariably "casts" his anchor:

Now [Mr. Conrad goes on], an anchor is never cast, and to take a liberty with technical language is a crime against the clearness, precision and beauty of perfected speech.

An anchor is a forged piece of iron, admirably adapted to its end, and technical language is an instrument wrought into perfection by ages of experience, a flawless thing for its purpose.

As Mr. Conrad says, an anchor is never "cast," it is "let go"; and the difference between casting and letting go seems to us just the difference between the right and the wrong way of conveying an impression in words. You may cast a thing blindly and at random, always with obvious effort, but a thing "let go" must have been already prepared for its fall. Its fall is inevitable. Forethought and consideration are implied. If your impression has been keenly felt and well considered, you have not to cast but to let go the inevitable word—"a flawless thing for its purpose." So that Mr. Conrad's title, "The Mirror of the Sea"—at first, one might think, a trifle arrogant in its claim—is no more than just for his method. It is the method of self-restraint, of humility, of so patient a consideration that the impression seems to fall upon the page almost without human intervention. The reflection of the picture is never marred by any clumsiness or affectation of the writer. Whether he shows you a winter landscape in Amsterdam, or the sudden apparition of an ice-floe in the Southern Ocean, or the stretch of the Thames from London Bridge to the Albert Docks, which "recalls a jungle by the confused, varied and impenetrable aspect of the buildings that line the shore, not according to a planned purpose, but as if sprung up by accident from scattered seeds," or basins that are like "places of repose for tired ships to dream in," you see the picture so clearly that there is some danger of your forgetting the self-sacrificing art that goes to the making of it. That seems to us the supreme triumph of personality in a writer: to make you forget not only his personality but his existence.

Among many beautiful and true pictures it is difficult to pick out one for special quotation, but the sinking of the brig in "Initiation" strikes us as one of the most successful.

As if at a given signal, the run of the smooth undulations seemed checked suddenly around the brig. By a strange optical delusion the whole sea appeared to rise upon her in one overwhelming heave of its silky surface, where in one spot a smother of foam broke out ferociously. And then the effort subsided. It was all over, and the smooth swell ran on as before from the horizon in uninterrupted cadence of motion, passing under us with a slight, friendly toss of our boat. Far away, where the brig had been, an angry white stain undulating on the surface of steely-grey waters, shot with gleams of green, diminished swiftly, without a hiss, like a patch of pure snow melting in the sun.

But the book is more than a series of fine pictures; it is a sensitive appreciation of the whole art of seamanship, an imaginative reading of the varying moods of the sea. Perhaps the most interesting sections are those dealing with the psychology of the elements: "The Character of the Foe" and "Rulers of East and West." Even a landsman can appreciate the truth and felicity of Mr. Conrad's personification of Westerly and Easterly weather. Of the King of West he says: "He is a barbarian, of a Northern type. Violent without craftiness, and furious without malice . . . with a thundering voice, distended cheeks and fierce blue eyes"; while the East King is "a spare Southerner, with clear-cut features, black-browed and dark-eyed . . . impenetrable, secret, full of wiles, fine-drawn, keen—meditating aggression."

As is only natural, the very perfection of Mr. Conrad's art exposes his limitations. He is illuminating rather than suggestive. His words clear your vision, but they do not set you dreaming. He uses them to get the last essence of their meaning but they do not carry more than their meaning. He never writes better than he knows. To use his own distinction between two moods of the West wind, he is a North-westerly rather than a South-westerly writer. He allows you, he compels you to see the beauty and the terror of things, but he does not play upon your nerves with a sense of their mystery.

AMERICAN CULTURE

The Secret Life. Being the Book of a Heretic. (Lane, 6s.)

FIFTY years ago the American mind promised to become one of the grand intellectual forces of modern civilisation. In the period of intellectual stagnation in Europe, between the decline of romanticism and the rise of evolutionism, a new school of thought was formed in America in which the ideas of the Orient were combined with those of the Western world. Emerson framed a Buddhistic view of life in which there was retained an exhilarating sense of the worth and poetry of the material universe. Whitman found in the mystic idea of the soul something that clothed flesh and matter with a fresh beauty and a fresh significance, and in the philosophic idea of evolution something that gave to individual existence a new purpose and a new grandeur. Whistler, some years later, discovered in the decorative style of Buddhistic art the principle of a new manner of painting, and Peirce recognised in the connection between thought and purpose the ground of a new system of philosophy. None of these pioneers, however, has found among his countrymen another man of genius to resume and consummate his work. This sudden decline of American thought is the strangest of all the events of the Civil War. And in view of its effect upon the spiritual life of the nation we are sometimes inclined to doubt whether the victory of the Northern States was a just one. A race of sincere and generous liberators does not, on turning home from a glorious battlefield, dedicate its mind entirely to low and material ends. Yet this is what the Americans seem to have done. Their culture is now a borrowed thing animated by no life of its own. Their art is become a reflection of French art, their literature a reflection of English literature, their learning a reflection of German learning. A velleity of taste in their women of the richer class seems to be all that maintains in their country the semblance of a high, serious and disinterested passion for the things of the mind. And, to judge by the works commonly produced by these women, it is indeed only a semblance:

I am just home from a meeting of one of those literary clubs we American women affect in the absence of any masculine society, and we have been talking about Stevenson as the poet most typical of the mind of the nineteenth century.

The anonymous book, "The Secret Life," from which this illuminating passage is taken is a thing of melancholy interest. Ostensibly it is a diary in which a married woman, of middle age, moving in a cultivated circle of American society, sets down the wild, original and heretical ideas which she has elaborated during her travels in Europe. Actually it is a story of the spiritual adventures of a commonplace mind of a chameleon nature vagrant among unrealised worlds of thought.

From it we do indeed learn the secret of the author's life and of the lives of many women of her order, but it is not the secret that she wishes to disclose. She labours to prove that she is a remarkable person with two modes of existence, in one of which she lives according to the gospel of comfort, and in the other, according to the gospel of culture. But she unwittingly reveals the fact that her interest in art and literature is as material a thing as her interest in dress or jewelry. She collects ideas not for use and delight but for effect and parade. They are part of the apparel by means of which she endeavours to acquire an air of distinction. This is the explanation of the note of artificiality of her book, of the insincerity that shows beneath its restless effusiveness. The writer has taken the most glittering things she could discover in the authors now fashionable in America—Nietzsche, Lafcadio Hearn, Pater and Stevenson—and has strung them loosely together as the latest novelties in the wares of conversation. They are not thoughts which have sunk into her mind and have there grown and harmonised into a philosophy of life, but motley shreds of knowledge gathered for the purpose of display. The Nietzschean view of Christianity and its Founder, which she adopts on one page, conflicts with the humanitarian view which she assumes on another: the love and admiration of Apollo, which she affects in the early part of her diary, is incompatible with the love and admiration of the ordinary Philistine which she avows in the latter part. These inconsistencies, however, do not trouble her; such slight defects she regards perhaps as things incidental to the most brilliant forms of heresy.

The title of heretic is one that the author of "The Secret Life" strangely covets. She seems to regard it as a mark of supreme intellectual distinction. Unfortunately for her ambition, her heresies in matters of religion resemble the heresies in matters of taste of those friends of hers for whom Stevenson is the typical poet of the nineteenth century. They are founded on ignorance. She can scarcely be allowed the title of infidel. She is merely a heathen of that bourgeois type of soul which in the order, routine and security of modern life loses the primitive sense of awe and terror and environing mystery, and remains incapable of acquiring the finer emotions of reverence, worship and infinite wonder. Her paganism is, in fine, a matter of shallowness of thought and vapidity of feeling; and neither the ideas which she takes from Nietzsche nor the sentiments which she borrows from Pater serve to disguise the native poverty of her nature. It is not given to the daughters of the new Philistines, who masquerade in bacchanalia of nonsense as the children of light, to feel either the maddening spell of Dionysus or the benign influence of Apollo. Over them Momus alone condescends to exercise his power. Were their race now to perish from the earth as completely as did the Phoenicians, there would perhaps be just as slight a diminution of the spiritual and intellectual wealth of mankind.

FETICHISM

Annales du Musée du Congo. Notes analytiques sur les collections ethnographiques. Tome i.—La Religion. (Bruxelles, 20 francs.)

THE Musée du Congo, charmingly situated in the park of Tervueren, the old hunting-seat of the Dukes of Brabant near Brussels, is an institution that is to fulfil for the Congo State the mission and purpose that were contemplated by the founders of the late Imperial Institute with regard to the British Empire. It contains an interesting and growing collection of African products, curiosities, and emblems, and among the latter is a very comprehensive array of the objects and instruments of fetichism. There are nearly seven hundred items in this department of the Museum, and the last number of the "Annales" contains the reproduction in photogravure of the whole collection. It gives also the valuable notes on the religious practices of the Congolese tribes which supply the material for this review. The name of the writer of these notes is not stated, but he may be complimented on having provided a very instructive and interesting description of the religious and superstitious practices of the peoples of the Congo, and also a realistic picture of savage and sanguinary fetichism in all its naked horrors.

Fetichism is not a religion; it is the superstitious practice which has grown under the influence of the fetich doctors or priests out of the general fear among the blacks of evil spirits. It bears some resemblance to Nat worship among the Burmese. The religion of the Congolese is destructive in its simplicity. They believe in a God all powerful and eternal whom they call Nzambi, but then they consider him too great to occupy himself with human beings. Consequently they regard him with the same absolute indifference that he is supposed to feel towards them. This effmination of the power of good leaves the poor ignorant and intensely superstitious black a prey to the powers of darkness which are supposed to surround him in the forms of bad spirits representing the souls of his own enemies, or those of his village, tribe or race. The absorbing thought of his existence is how to prevent these spirits from injuring him, and his only hope of success lies in the supposed skill and prowess of the local fetich doctor, from whom he purchases talismans or fetiches to protect him against all human ills. It is fortunate for fetich doctors as a class that the failure of their charms to effect the wished-for end does not entail loss of reputation or unpopularity, for their easily contented clients merely conclude that the enemy has a more powerful fetich than they have. If fetichism were only the harmless superstition that the sale of ineffective talismans would suggest, it would not have come under the ban of civilised governments. But it has been the cause of the most frightful cruelty and bloodshed, entailing, as was written twenty years ago, an annual loss of life greater than the slave trade and tribal war combined. The human sacrifices in multiple forms to fetich still continue despite all the efforts to put them down, but they are carried out in secret and claim far fewer victims than formerly. The Commissioners who inquired into the situation on the Congo two years ago wrote in their report that the progress effected in this respect was "both admirable and marvellous."

Fetichism would never have attained its firm hold on the negro mind if the negroes themselves had not been addicted to cruel practices and the shedding of blood. These found a vent most frequently on the occasion of burials, and especially those of their chiefs. From time immemorial it had been the practice among the tribes of Central Africa to bury with a chief his wives, slaves and followers, or at least some of them. The origin of the practice is probably to be found in a variety of motives, the desire of demonstrating by human sacrifice the importance and power of the dead chief being perhaps the principal. In the early days of Belgian rule a native detected in the act of celebrating the burial of his chief by a human sacrifice defended himself by exclaiming: "How many heads would you cut off if Stanley died? No doubt two thousand, and I have only cut off two for my father!" But the lives sacrificed at the burials of chiefs and free men—slaves not being buried at all, but merely cast into the forest for wild animals to devour—were few in comparison with those taken in the form of ritual murders and ordeals by poison. There is a very vivid account in this volume of the many forms in which life was taken by the orders and under the direction of the fetich doctor (nganga), but it would be impossible to summarise them here. The writer throws out one hint which, when we remember the very similar practices among the extreme devotees of Vishnu in India, does not appear far-fetched. This is that cannibalism originated with the practice of distributing portions of the bleeding victim among the audience. The Belgian authorities have long declared war on the fetich doctor, and punish him with death when he is caught in the act of committing murder in the guise of sacrifice, but it is not contended that an end has yet been put to the practices that brought his class so much profit and power. In the recesses of the virgin forest, protected by a screen of guards and spies, it is more than suspected that fetichism continues to celebrate its mad and repulsive orgies. Not, indeed, until the blacks have been educated to see the folly and injustice, to say nothing of the brutality, of such proceedings, which entail the murder of the innocent and helpless, will it be possible to extirpate the whole brood of fetich doctors.

The closing pages of this work deal with a subject of which not much is known and which is surrounded with a good deal of mystery. This is the formation of secret societies. While something has been discovered about their organisation, nothing is known of their object, but it is ominous that the novices in what is practically a new sect are trained by the old class of nganga or fetich doctors. The most remarkable thing about them is that they have invented a language of their own which is quite different from Bantu or any of the dialects. This organisation may be the expiring effort of fetichism, or the sinister beginning of a political movement hostile to Europeans which has not yet fully developed, but in any case it needs careful watching. One offshoot is composed of assassins who take the pseudonyms of men-leopards or men-crocodiles. The members meet periodically, and on these occasions one of them is called upon to justify his membership. This means waylaying a native and killing him by surprise and stealth, just as the animal whose name he has appropriated would do. There are certainly dark points about the evolution of the negritic tribes of the Congo State that require elucidation, and suggest the need of close and constant vigilance. The studies and publications of the savants and scientists who form the staff of the Congo Museum have already added much to our knowledge of the customs and characteristics of the races of Central Africa, and if continued in the same spirit of zealous inquiry must result in a very complete ethnological discovery.

DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF THE PHILIPPINES

An Englishwoman in the Philippines. By Mrs. CAMPBELL DAUNCEY. (Murray, 12s. net.)

EVERY globe-trotter deems it an essential part of his duty to himself and an expectant world to set down his impressions for the edification and enlightenment of his fellow men, and it is a relief to discover that Mrs. Campbell Dauncey spent nine whole months in the Philippines. Nor is her book a deliberate and conscious literary effort. It is made up of ample letters addressed to a friend during her stay at Iloilo. The result is delightful, affording the reader real insight into the condition of the islands under American rule. To Mrs. Campbell Dauncey the prospect of a visit to the Philippines must have had peculiar attractions. She is the possessor of an old emerald ring given to her father's great-uncle, the Admiral Cornish who bombarded Manila in 1792, by the priestly governor of the Walled City, as the Americans now call it. That ring she no doubt regarded as a symbol of the romance of exploration and colonisation, which culminated in the highly prosaic appropriation by the Western Republic of the last remnant of Spain's once mighty Empire. If she went to Panay, the island of which Iloilo is the capital, with the conventional idea of the "gorgeous East," her nine months' stay effectually dispelled the illusion. India, China, Japan, whatever their charms in colour and sunshine, all have their drawbacks for the European who is paying something more than a flying visit, but the Philippines present conditions which are torture to the sensitive and cultured man or woman of the West. "Ship me somewhere—not East but—West of Suez," is Mrs. Campbell Dauncey's refrain, now that imagination has been tempered by experience. She finds no compensation in "the gaudy parrot" and "the scentless canna" for "the exquisite thrush and the lilac bush," nor does escape from the thousand and one little inconveniences inseparable from Western social amenities make up for the absence of books and art and good music and "intelligent fellow creatures." She leaves the Philippines with the hope that they will stay "down under" her horizon for the rest of her days. They are not the Paradise they are represented to be in American magazines. She does not like the people, she finds little to interest her in the country, she has scant respect for the Americans, and she sums the whole up as "a shuffling, drab, discontented, thick-headed, costly East—with all the worst traditions of four hundred years of the offscourings of the Spanish monkish orders, overlaid by a veneer of shallow cocksureness hastily assimilated from a totally incongruous alien civilisation."

This sweeping verdict notwithstanding, we cannot imagine that Mrs. Campbell Dauncey regrets her sojourn among the Filipinos, at a time when the great Republic was making its first experiment in over-sea Imperialism. In themselves the Filipinos are not a particularly entertaining people, but as the corpus vile of an American crusade in the righteous cause of liberty and civilisation, they afford a keen observer such as Mrs. Campbell Dauncey an opportunity for a study in exotic methods of altruism which is full of significance and suggestion. This book is worthy of careful attention on that ground alone. It will be read with displeasure in America, and will, no doubt, call forth angry and contemptuous denials. Yet we see no reason to question Mrs. Campbell Dauncey's entire sincerity and impartiality in her criticism of American aims and achievements in the Philippines. Americans are spoiling the Filipinos by their extravagance in living and by their ideas of brotherhood and equality, which they contradict by every act of their lives. Their methods are opposed to the experience of other races who have become the masters of Eastern peoples; they are attempting to open up the Philippines by means of "school desks instead of roads and reservoirs"; they are building harbours which are to astonish the commercial East in defiance of commercial needs and commercial routes, and "the revenues that choke agriculture go to pay officials and school teachers." The Americans mean well, but their energy is wrongly directed. Nor can any country hope to enjoy healthy development under the ridiculous customs regulations which prevail. Some cases containing wedding presents and articles for Mrs. Campbell Dauncey's home in the Philippines, which were unpurchasable in the islands, were subject to a duty amounting to £30. The impost was so monstrous that she tells her friend: "All the italics and exclamations in the biggest printing house in the world could not convey my sentiments on the subject." What she felt when, a day or two later, the Custom House officials said they had made a mistake and demanded £70—more apparently than the original value of the goods—we are left to surmise. Politically the Filipino is where he was ten years ago, as ready to revolt against the Americans with their Equality Ideal as he was against the Spaniards, whose treatment of native races, to put it mildly, was never remarkable for altruism. It was Mr. Taft, the first American Governor, who talked of "the Philippines for the Filipino": when, as secretary for the War Department, he visited the islands last year, he said the Philippines were a solemn trust and in a century or two the people might be able to run alone! And the Filipinos promptly retort that they are animated by the same spirit that caused the Americans to revolt against England.

In the Philippines there is rather too much of the American flag in evidence to please our "Englishwoman" or to render it possible to believe that the Americans regard their mission as temporary. It appears in every conceivable form, as window curtain, as tablecloth, as drapery, inducing the contemptuous Spaniards to sneer: "We hold our flag sacred! we do not use it as furniture." What the American object really is Mrs. Campbell Dauncey cannot make out, but she suggests that all their talk of equality is just so much dust in native as well as foreign eyes "to excuse and justify the position the U.S.A. has chosen to assume towards these Islands." A truer explanation probably is that the great American people are new at the business of Imperialism; they have put their hand to a serious task; time and mistakes will show them the difference between the right way and the wrong, and in due season they will understand how much or how little of the Ideal in colonisation is translatable into hard practice. If they read Mrs. Campbell Dauncey's penetrating but not unkindly criticisms in the proper spirit, her book for them will be of real service. To the British reader it will appeal as a notable contribution to Pacific literature, worthy, at a reasonable interval, to be placed on the same shelf with Stevenson's South Sea Studies.

TREBLE SONG

TREASURE the golden moments as they pass
 For Youth's a bird that flies too fast, alas !
 Alas !
 Treasure the rosy Dawn—too soon it goes ;
 Treasure the Morn—it fades, as fades the rose ;
 Treasure the Noon—for it is hard to hold
 Unstinted largess of Olympian gold ;
 And treasure Afternoon—that languorous thing—
 For after Afternoon comes Evening.
 And after Eve fast comes the dreadful Night
 The tomb of all the golden Day's delight.
 Oh, let us deck Apollo's shrine and move
 His heart to give more gold. Oh, let us love
 Thro' Dawn, and Morn, and Noon, and Afternoon,
 For Love's the loveliest thing that goes too soon.
 Dear Friend of all fair things that come and pass,
 Fair Love's the fleetest of them all—alas !
 Alas !

ALTHEA GYLES.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE LATER POETRY OF MR. SWINBURNE

MR. SWINBURNE'S later poems are not much read, and there is a common belief that he has not fulfilled the promise of his youth. No doubt there are some people who, when Atalanta and Poems and Ballads first appeared, thought that the greatest of English poets had arisen. Mr. Swinburne has certainly not fulfilled the expectations of these. But then, they had no right to expect so much. There was nothing in Atalanta or in Poems and Ballads which gave promise of a poet of the first order ; indeed, there was much to make men fear that Mr. Swinburne had nothing but the ardour of youth and a miraculous sense of beauty to inspire him. This was said at the time, and it has been repeated so often that it is believed even now when Mr. Swinburne is almost an old man and has been writing great verse for nearly half a century.

Yet it must be confessed that there are some reasons, not good but plausible, for this belief. Mr. Swinburne has written a vast deal of verse ; plays innumerable, and some of them not easy to read ; odes to Victor Hugo longer than any odes ever written before ; huge poems about the sea ; multitudes of poems about children. Most of these, however far they vary in merit, are written in much the same style. Mr. Swinburne could not write a clumsy verse if he tried ; and this puts him at a disadvantage compared with Wordsworth, who always wrote clumsy verses when he was not inspired. You can tell at a glance when Wordsworth is worth reading and when he is not. But you have to read a poem by Mr. Swinburne very carefully before you can tell whether it is good or not. Like Rubens, he has a system of composition, a machinery so elaborate, that, while it conceals his lack of inspiration sometimes from himself, it may also conceal the presence of inspiration from his readers. We come upon a long poem beginning :

Sea and Strand, and a lordlier land than sea tides rolling and rising Sun—

and we say to ourselves, "Ah, Swinburne!" and pass on, just as we say to ourselves, "Ah, Rubens!" and pass on when we come to the great Rubens room in the Louvre. There seems to be in Mr. Swinburne's brain a continual momentum of rhythm that is always driving him to compose, and sometimes there is nothing but momentum in his verses. But he is not to be judged by these any more than Wordsworth is to be judged by Simon Lee or Ellen Irwin ; nor, because his style has changed but little and he is always writing poems about Victor Hugo and children and the sea, is it to be assumed that his mind has not developed with years nor learnt anything from his experience of life. He is, what he has always been, a lyrical poet. He does not argue in poetry, he does not elaborate ideas ; he has no curious interest in character—at least, if he has, it does not come out in his poetry—the forces and the elements of life are still great abstractions to him, and he continues to speak broadly of love and hate, of tyranny and freedom, of joy and grief, just as he speaks broadly of the sun and the wind and the sea. But though he does not elaborate ideas or unravel intricacies of thought, or argue subtly in his poetry, we are not to assume that he has no ideas, that he is a kind of brainless virtuoso, "a tube through which all things blow to music" as Tennyson called him. It is, indeed, plain to any one thoroughly acquainted with his work that he has ideas about life of great force and clearness, but that they are so fixed in his mind that he has no need to discuss them. They are the inspiration rather than the subject-matter of his verse, and an inspiration that has lasted into his old age, so that he has been able to write pure lyrical poetry at a time of life when most poets are either silent or broken in their music.

He is not one to put questions to Infinity. There are some things he would say, no doubt, that we know for certain. There are others that we cannot know by any questioning. But sometimes the thought of death turns his mind to those unknowable things, and then he speaks of them with a courage and gravity that could only have been begotten out of his certainty about what can be known. Here are three verses from the poem in memory of John William Inchbold, and I wish I could quote more :

"Whatever heaven, if heaven at all may be,
 Await the sacred souls of good men dead,
 There, now we mourn who loved him here, is he."
 So sweet and stern of speech, the Roman said,

Erect in grief, in trust erect, and gave
 His deathless dead a deathless life even here
 Where day bears down on day as wave on wave
 And not man's smile fades faster than his tear.

Albeit this life be given not me to give,
 Nor power be mine to break time's silent spell,
 Not less shall love that dies not while I live
 Bid thee, beloved in life and death, farewell.

These are not the words of a poet who can sing only because he cannot think, but rather of one who can face the darkness of thought without losing his trust in life, and whose music is solemn with the conquest of fears.

Mr. Swinburne seems always to have kept the ardour of youth, but not without a struggle ; and the first sign of this struggle, the first note of gravity and solemnity, is to be found in the second series of Poems and Ballads. He never wears his heart on his sleeve ; but there is some autobiography in the wonderful last verse of a Vision of Spring in Winter, where, addressing the spring, he seems to review the glories of his youth and to reconcile himself to the thought that they belong to the past.

The morning song beneath the stars that fled
 With twilight through the moonless mountain air,
 While youth with burning lips and wreathless hair
 Sang toward the sun that was to crown his head,
 Rising ; the hopes that triumphed and fell dead,
 The sweet swift eyes and songs of hours that were ;
 These may'st thou not give back for ever ; these,
 As at the sea's heart all her wrecks lie waste,
 Lie deeper than the sea ;
 But flowers thou may'st, and winds and hours of ease
 And all its April to the world thou may'st
 Give back, and half my April back to me.

The passion of the past is apt to lie heavy on poets; and not many of them have been able to sing it with so much power and yet with so brave a resignation. Mr. Swinburne gives thanks for all beauty and delight, but he will not be tied to a dead delight or stand for ever looking back upon a dead beauty. Nor is he in any sense one of those who fill the dome

Of great dead gods with wrath and wail, nor hear
Time's word and man's: "Go honoured hence, go home,
Night's childless children; here your hour is done;
Pass with the stars, and leave us with the sun."

In his youth he was fierce in destruction; but, as the years went on, it grew plain that he destroyed not from lack of faith but from excess of it. To all the creeds and institutions which he attacked he might have addressed that magnificent line last quoted:

Pass with the stars, and leave us with the sun.

For, indeed, the sun has always seemed to shine clearly in his heaven, and he has never been one of those who creep away from it into a cave and then cry out that it is extinguished or has never been. His poetry is full of the glory not only of earth and sky and sea, but also of mankind, and he has made a kind of religion out of his worship of these things. Many years ago a hostile and not very intelligent Quarterly reviewer said that there was too much ritual in the Songs before Sunrise, and in all Mr. Swinburne's poetry about freedom. That kind of ritual, those litanies and doxologies, such as for instance the great doxology of all the cities of Italy to Mazzini, those odes that seem to need choirs of all the free nations to sing them; all these are but natural expressions of the poet's religious instinct, and they take the splendid and high sounding forms common to noble religious instincts in all ages. Mr. Swinburne lives unfortunately in an age distrustful and, indeed, almost incapable of fine ritual. He has to imagine for himself the exultant choirs; and it is part of his task to make us imagine them also as we read his poetry. This he contrives to do with the volume and complexity of sound that seem to rise even from a printed page of his poetry. His is not chamber music or the voice of one man telling secrets about himself and to himself. With advancing years he has become more and more the poet of the play of the elements, of the hopes of the world, of heroic actions and of the fame of great men dead. All these things take on the same kind of glory to his mind and in his verse. When he deals with the high passions of mankind as in Tristram of Lyonesse, those passions seem to be in the sea and the wind and the sunrise no less than in the hearts of men. Tristram and Iseult in their loves by the western sea are but the heart of the summer night, and it is all alive with their passion.

Fair and fain
Somewhiles the soft rush of rejoicing rain
Solaced the darkness, and from steep to steep
Of heaven they saw the sweet sheet lightning leap
And laugh its heart out in a thousand smiles.
When the clear sea for miles on glimmering miles
Burned as though dawn were strewn abroad astray,
Or, showering out of heaven, all heaven's array
Had paven instead the waters.

Tristram of Lyonesse is all lyrical. The story is but a pretext for passages like this, or for speeches of an eloquence like that of Romeo and Juliet; and in his plays, too, Mr. Swinburne is always lyrical, and their action is nothing to him except for the lyrical opportunities which it provides. There is great poetry lost in these plays which no one in future probably will ever read, and one cannot but regret that he should have spent so much time upon a kind of art unfitted to his genius. But it is easy to understand why he has done so. He delights in heroic actions as some lyrical poets delight in the songs of nightingales or the thought of love. The dramatic form provides him with a machinery to bring heroic actions about and with scope to write of them at large. But still he cannot write of them dramatically. He cannot make them happen before our eyes. He can only glorify them when they have happened; and the action must stand still for him to do this, just as in Italian opera it stands still for the prima donna to sing a great song. So the plays will be forgotten, I fear, as the old Italian operas are being forgotten. But the best of his poems in which he writes of heroic things are not likely to be forgotten, least of all those poems in his own Northumbrian dialect, in which he, the great virtuoso and master of all literary conventions, seems to recapture the simplicity of the ballad, enriching it with his own stronger music.

We'll see nae mair the sea-banks fair,
And the sweet grey gleaming sky,
And the lordly strand of Northumberland,
And the goodly towers thereby:
And none shall know but the winds that blow
The graves wherein we lie.

It is not a mere archaistic trick that produces lines like this. Mr. Swinburne can write so only because he has been concerned with heroic thoughts all his life, and this rough speech of the border, in which so many heroic things have been written, comes as naturally to him as the tongue of Milton and Shelley. But there is one other verse, from A Jacobite's Farewell, than which no poet, not even Burns, has ever written anything more simple or poignant, and I will end by quoting this from the third series of Poems and Ballads as a challenge to those who think that Mr. Swinburne has never fulfilled the promise of the first:

O lands are lost and life's losing,
And what were they to gie?
Fu' mony a man gives all he can,
But nae man else gives ye.

A. CLUTTON-BROCK.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Gospel and Wonder-tale,"
by J. A. MacCulloch.]

FICTION

Paul. By E. F. BENSON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

AN unpleasant, laboured story in which the murderer of a woman's husband ultimately marries her. It is difficult, indeed, to regard the murder of Theodore Beckwith as a more serious crime than the killing of an ear-wig, or a less meritorious action than the killing of a dangerous snake. It is but fair to add, too, that Paul Norris had changed his mind about killing him at the actual moment when the motor-car went over his body; had, indeed, resolved to go over the cliff himself rather than do the deed. But the intention was there, and the death was the result of the intention. We cannot imagine a man and woman with this knowledge between them living together as man and wife largely on a bequest from the dead man, even when we consider the second husband's drunken remorse and its very sensational conversion to real sorrow for the sin during a service at St. Paul's Cathedral.

A Lady of Rome. By E. MARION CRAWFORD. (Macmillan, 6s.)

MR. MARION CRAWFORD is usually at his best in his descriptions of Roman life, and his latest book "A Lady of Rome," though possibly a little thin in comparison with some of his work, is written in his invariably charming manner. It has for background the social life of Rome which he depicts so well, and deals chiefly with the character—or rather conscience—of Maria Montalto, which is sustained through many years and various crises by religious conviction, causing her to expiate her sin at some length, in fact from cover to cover. Expiations and religious scruples at such length might easily become irritating, but here the author has shown his skill by making Maria's struggles not only far from wearisome but so far interesting that the reader is pleased to leave her in the last pages still a sensible woman, who believes in the reward of virtue. The story is told well and smoothly, though without the deeply studied and vividly rendered psychology for which the characters give plenty of opportunity, so that they lack in some measure the vitality which such studies demand. The minor characters and descriptions are treated with the author's usual skill, and help to form a readable novel.

The Safety of the Honours. By ALLAN McAULAY. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THE glamour of the Stuarts is a never-failing source of inspiration to historical novelists. Even the inanimate objects connected with them share some of the romance, and this account of the Honours of Scotland is a case in point. The Crown, the Sceptre and the Sword were looked upon with something approaching superstition by Royalists and Cromwellians alike. So long as they remained in faithful hands, so long would there be hope for the Stuarts in Scotland. Mr. McAulay has given us a faithful history of their adventures, their smuggling in and out of the Castle of Dunnottar, and the group of quiet country folk who found their lives tangled up with the safety of the Regalia. The tale lacks the exaggerated adventurousness which we are accustomed to expect from modern books about this period, but it gains in characterisation, in impressiveness and in interest; for we can believe in it, and admire the unhysterical faithfulness of two or three quiet Royalists who sacrificed much and expected nothing.

The Motormaniacs. By LLOYD OSBOURNE. (Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d.)

MR. LLOYD OSBOURNE tells four rattling, breathless tales of American lovers and their motor-cars. Their adventures, quarrels, accidents and reconciliations while on the road are told in the highest spirits and at the third speed. Here other "motormaniacs" may read of the peculiarities of half a dozen kinds of car, their mechanism, their fascinating and fiendish ways; they may also revel in love stories told in the technical language of the garage. Pretty little stories they are too, when we are permitted to pause and enjoy them, and the motormaniacs are always entertaining and capital company to the end of the run.

The Matrimonial Lottery. By CHARLOTTE O'CONOR ECCLES. (Nash, 6s.)

THE lottery that is to boom the Comet and restore all its former glory and prosperity offers to the prize-winner a handsome husband, a title, and a fortune. The competition is keen, and leads to amusing complications. While the fun sparkles brightly on the surface, there are frequent glimpses of deeper interest and feeling, and some fresh and charming passages in Jack Derracott's wooing. The embarrassments that beset the prize in his endeavour to deal honourably with the two claimants for his hand are most divertingly described, although Miss Arethusa Evadne Jenkins is perhaps rather cruelly overworked as the ruthless husband-hunter. Wisdom and humour, pathos and the lightest spirit of farce rapidly succeed each other in this ingenious story, which cannot fail to find many delighted readers.

Sinless. By MAUD H. YARDLEY. (Sisleys, 6s.)

THAT a man, even after an absence of ten years, should not only fail to recognise his own wife, but should innocently appropriate a perfect stranger, accompany her to her hotel and never discover until the following morning that she was not his "Nell" but another's; that she should trustingly adopt him as her husband, without even ascertaining that he bore the right name, is completely absurd. It makes an original and startling opening for a story, however, and the novel-reader will not quarrel with it on the score of improbability. It is not often that his breath is taken away so completely in the first pages of a novel. Miss Yardley nurses her material with such skill and keeps her secret so well that the close of the chapter, where she allows the truth to burst on us, is a triumph of dramatic effect. The end of the book is as startling, in its way, as the beginning.

Moon Face, and other Stories. By JACK LONDON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

EVEN if Mr. Jack London pronounces "Claverhouse" as it is written, it is difficult to see why he should spend half a page railing against it as "absurd—what a name! Just listen to the ridiculous sound of it!" However, the bearer of it is doomed to speedy extinction, at the hands of a man who hates him. Several of these stories are tales of hate. They are terse, virile to the verge of brutality, and they grip the mind. The language is fresh and convincing, save for one irritating phrase, "what of," which Mr. London uses very unsuitably. The story which lingers longest in the mind is "All Gold Canyon"; it paints a virgin solitude to which comes a gold-miner. When he has found the gold, and Earth has been compensated for the theft by her usual sacrifice of human blood, he goes away. That is all, but it is wonderfully told, and leaves an impressive sense of silence and solitude. There is also a weird story of two men who achieved invisibility, and of how they fought to the death in broad sunshine. But the short story is a crucial test, and we miss in these the power of "The Call of the Wild" and "The Sea-Wolf."

The Dumpling. By COULSON KERNAHAN. (Cassell, 6s.)

THIS story is described on its title-page as "A detective love story of a great Labour rising." It deals with a reincarnation of Napoleon, nicknamed "The Dumpling," who is filled with a noble love of his fellow men, if only they be poor enough, and sees no other way of bettering their condition than by indulging in robbery and murder, plotting in an opium den, and evolving the picturesque combination: "God, Napoleon and the Dumpling strike with a granite arm." There are also a millionaire and his sister and daughter, and the narrator of the tale, an insufferable young man who is a journalist by profession, a detective by fits and starts, a relief worker in the East End now and then, and impossible always. Coincidences rage throughout the book, but impossibilities are more rampant still. There is no characterisation, but there is a speech eleven pages long about Labour, delivered by a murderous madman. The grammar is uncertain, and the style is frequently facetious. The Labour army captures the Tower of London: the Dumpling kidnaps the King, and the King in captivity talks like an Adelphi hero. It is possible that there is a public which demands such books; it is a thousand pities that Mr. Kernahan should condescend to cater for it.

A Happy Marriage. By ADA CAMBRIDGE. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

"PERHAPS no marriage ever made since the world began was right after the first week or two," remarks the author of the book, and the story bears out this opinion. It is a happy marriage—in parts. A man who prefers the simple life, in the rough, who entreates his father to disinherit him, marries a sensible angel with a nice appreciation of wealth and position. Of course, they sharply disagree, and coldly good human angels are formidable antagonists when their principles or their tastes are attacked. Time and tribulation, however, soften their asperities, and we leave the middle-aged couple rejoicing, rather demonstratively too, in an ardent renewal of love. Miss Cambridge is a capable story-teller and writes well. The daily round of these Australian families, their fine qualities, temptations, even their little vulgarities, are interesting and amusing in a quiet way.

The Avenging Hour. By H. F. PREVOST BATTERSBY. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

"So we go forward, forgetful and secure; while unseen, unheeded, behind us follows, with unhinderable feet, the ghost of our deeds: that spirit, merciful and terrible, the Avenging Hour," quotes the author, by way of preface to his tale; and the fact that we know not why he quotes it—that we cannot discover its applicability, nor find a suggestion of any Avenging Hour—detracts very little from our appreciation and enjoyment of a well-written and charming novel. Once we catch Mr. Prevost Battersby slipping into the redundancies which mar his journalistic work, but for the rest he has exercised a wise restraint, and the book before us is by far his best. It is no small praise to say that in the first thirteen chapters—describing a single railway journey—there is not a word we could wish away.

The Triumph of Tinker. By EDGAR JEPSON. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

WE believe it was a remark of Mr. Whistler's concerning the use of pastels that "the use of a medium should never be pushed further than it was intended to go," and if Mr. Jepson will take a word of advice he will do well to abandon Tinker and all such marvellous children as his pièces de résistance for a time at any rate: for interesting as this story is—and it must be confessed that it goes with a good swing—it will not bear reading a second time, and the author has a command of workmanship that we feel sure is wasted on such unlikely happenings. He puts a very double-edged retort into the mouth of an American millionaire when he makes him say: "I was giving you statistics, sonny. You shouldn't go mixing up statistics and facts," which we commend to the earnest consideration of journalists.

FINE ART

THE AUTUMN SALON

ALTHOUGH it has only been in existence four years, the Salon d'Automne has made an assured place for itself among the large art exhibitions annually held in Paris, and the heat with which it is discussed and the contradictoriness of the critical opinions passed on it only serve to augment its interest and importance. Its enthusiastic supporters assert that here alone may you see the art of the future, art that is original and untrammelled by the bonds of convention; while more conservative critics condemn the exhibition in toto as a chamber of horrors, of paintings ignobles et ignorants. More moderate and less partial criticisms are harder to find, but a juster estimate was made by a veteran art-collector of Paris, a man whose rare natural judgment for the finer qualities of painting has been ripened by half a century of collecting. "I find in the Autumn Salon," he said, "plenty of cleverness; but too often it is cleverness run to seed. There is too much eccentricity, too many excesses." Were it not always dangerous to question an artist's sincerity, the honesty of too many exhibitions might also be called into question. For the man who paints blue men talking to green women under blood-red trees under the conviction that by so doing he is achieving beauty or demonstrating truth we may have some respect, however mistaken we may hold him to be. But for the man who perpetrates these things merely to attract attention to himself, to prove his originality and the freedom of his spirit, we can have nothing but dislike and contempt.

Viewed as a whole, the Autumn Salon shows us among younger French painters a tendency to give too much attention to theory and too little to practice. Imagination, often morbid and diseased, runs riot, and a search for truth of colour serves in many cases as a pretext not only for carelessness in the presentation of form but also in the rendering of values. Now and again, it must be admitted, surprising and by no means unpleasing results are obtained by audacious means, and this gives hope for the future when the young painters have better mastered their medium, and are more discriminating in their association of colours.

A curious contrast is presented by the work of the two painters who this year are honoured with retrospective exhibitions. Courbet, to whom one room is allotted, was a painter eminently sane, a realist who, as the exhibits show, could paint an old woman with the direct strength and robust humour of a Hals, a landscape with the truth and earnestness of a Rousseau, a nude or a sea-piece with equal fidelity to nature and with equal dignity of handling. Paul Gauguin, for whom two rooms are thrown into one, was the very opposite to this. Starting his career as a disciple of the impressionist masters Pissarro and Cézanne, his imagination soon gained the upper hand over his observation. The painting of his masters appeared to him too sophisticated, and like our Pre-Raphaelites he thought that art, to progress, must retrace its steps, that it was necessary reculer pour mieux sauter. Being a "whole-hogger" in these matters, Gauguin was not content, as the English painters were, to go back to the primitives of Italy. He sought his masters among the primitives of the world, among the Egyptians and Assyrians, even, so M. Morice informs us in a brief memoir, the Aztecs and the Maoris. To be free from civilisation Gauguin shook the dust of Europe from his slippers and took up his residence in Tahiti, where he made a profound study of the religious beliefs and rites of the islanders and found models and inspiration for his paintings. A few years ago he died, and the present is the first collection of his paintings from which any estimate of the man's achievements can be deduced. That he was a genius there is little doubt, but he is at the same time a very dangerous model for the student. In technique his performances are varying and unequal. His drawing at times delights by the effective simplicity with which form is expressed, at other times we are affronted by what has the appearance of being wilful and unnecessary affectation. He will draw a Tahiti native with truth and charm, and then give us a Crucifixion in which the figures look like disjointed and contorted wooden dolls. As a decorator he has many merits, his design being usually well balanced and his lines rhythmical, while his colour-schemes, though at times almost crude in their association of primaries, often glow with a luminosity rivalling the effect of a stained glass window. The yellow skies in which he delights are peculiarly beautiful and effective, and there can be no doubt that by his self-imposed exile France has lost a master-designer of church windows. Inasmuch as a painter is to be judged by his performance rather than his intentions, it would be out of place here to do more than allude to the wealth of symbolism which admirers find in his work. It may be, as some say, that a complete philosophy of life is expressed in his paintings; but, if his work lives, as seems probable, it will be due quite as much to its decorativeness as to its symbolism.

A group of characteristic monotonous by Carrière, including more than one of his favourite maternity subjects, reminds the visitor of the loss the society has experienced in the death of its president, while the work of two veterans, happily still alive, reveals the source whence so many of the younger exhibitors have sprung. Cézanne and Renoir may no longer be in their prime, but the simplicity and strength of the former's still-life pieces and the flashiness of the sun-bathed nudes of the latter are still models to the student and among the most notable contributions to the exhibition.

Of the remaining exhibits, over two thousand in number, a mere summary must suffice. Anglada, the greatest colourist of the young Spanish school, is finely represented by two jewel-like colour harmonies, the motive in one case being a group of white-robed women seen by electric light and presenting a shimmer of iridescent colour which justifies the title, Opales. Guirand de Scevola, forsaking for the moment the portraiture in which his cleverness is apt to outrun his discretion, appears at his best in a series of Versailles scenes, very true and very beautiful, happy and original in composition, harmonious in colour and fine in quality. For truth and beauty combined with the modern spirit they are not surpassed in the Grand Palais. Vuillard, the Hornel of France, sends three of his fine mosaics of colour, interiors with figures, but the values do not seem to have been preserved as carefully as is his wont. Simon Bussy shows life-sized figures on a balcony, with a tea-table and accessories better painted than the figures: Abel Truchet some garden and river scenes sunnily seen and blithely recorded; d'Espagnat, Guillaumin and Milcendeau are also represented, though not quite at their best.

Of the British exhibitors the foremost place is claimed by Mr. Lavery, who sends an important group, including his self-portrait for the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, admirable as a likeness and sober and dignified in presentation, and two daring portraits with strong sunshine effects, of which that of "Miss Eileen L." is the more successful. Mr. Walter Sickert sends a group of sombre night scenes, mostly of London music-halls, and Mr. Stephen Haweis is represented by a group of decorative marines and scenes in the Luxembourg gardens, rich in colour and good in quality. Some clever street scenes by Mr. Gerald Kelly, and a dignified study for "Christ in the Temple," by Miss Sibyll Meugens, also deserve mention; while in the illustrated book section, where France has much to teach us, the designs of Aubrey Beardsley ably maintain the artistic honour of England against the "Fleurs du Mal," illustrated by Rodin, the lithographs of Fantin and the cats of Steinlen.

MUSIC

THE COLOUR IN BRAHMS

It is very remarkable that the first quality which attracts many people to music is its colour. A hymn tune without anything either of melodic beauty or rhythm to commend it has often gained a wide popularity because it contained some harmony of a highly coloured kind. This is a common instance, but the same fact is illustrated by every popular concert, especially, of course, by orchestral concerts. Successful scoring makes the first appeal and gives immediate delight, where other fine qualities may pass unnoticed. The concert room popularity of Wagner has been built up upon this fact. His sense of colour (not only his power of combining and contrasting instrumental qualities, but certain aspects of his harmony and melody also) is his most artistic resource, when a fragment of his music is taken out of its context and played in a concert room. On the other hand, nothing has retarded the progress of Brahms in the popular esteem so much as his apparent disregard of these qualities. Wagner's inherent love of scintillating, ever-changing colours has, as every one knows, a transforming effect upon the technique of the orchestra. Every composer who has written since has been to some extent influenced by him, because his discoveries were precisely in the direction which suited the temperament of his age. Constant variety is the conspicuous characteristic of modern music, both in its actual material and its colour, and a great many concert-goers take a childlike delight merely in the kaleidoscopic properties of the orchestra. Since colour has in itself such power to command attention, only the pedant, who cares not to be in touch with his audience, can neglect it, just as only the charlatan who cares for nothing else will rely upon it. No one knew better than Wagner how to turn this power to account for the ends towards which he worked, and among the greater spirits of the present day the sense of colour is likewise used for an end beyond itself, though often the means seems disproportioned to the end.

Finding that Brahms stood aside from these methods, many critics of his day classed him among the pedants, who refuse the common parlance of their generation, and have no wish for intercourse with mankind. There are some, even among musicians, who still look on him as a man apart, who must be respected but cannot be loved, chiefly for this reason. As a matter of fact, however, attention soon teaches that Brahms was not in the least deficient in a sense of colour. He had a very great love for it, but it was a different love from that of his age. He had a most intimate appreciation of pure and simple tone qualities, but instead of contrasting and interweaving them in rapid succession he enjoyed dwelling upon one or two in the course of a whole movement. He was akin to Bach in this. Although Bach adopted the plan of using an obligato instrument, oboe d'amour, viola da gamba, or trumpet, through a complete movement, chiefly because it was the conventional plan of his time, he must have found great enjoyment in the contemplation of these tones separately, since he was such a revolutionist that, had it been otherwise, he would certainly have made experiments in the direction of complex orchestration. He took great care in the selection of instruments to play these parts, so that, unlike Handel, who in the same circumstances was content to write over and over again for the violin rather than to seek variety, Bach was a thoughtful colourist. This method of dealing with his colours would have suited Brahms's temperament, had it been possible to have used it; as far as the orchestra was concerned, however, complex treatment of its colours had become a necessary condition of its employment by the time that Brahms began his career, and he had to adapt himself to it. The fact that he was more than forty years old when he produced his first symphony shows how difficult he found it, and it is not to be denied that in this symphony, as well as in his earlier works in which he used the orchestra for accompaniment, there is a good deal of confused colouring. The introduction to the first movement of this symphony sounds strikingly like the colouring of Bach's tutti passages. One is reminded of the beginning of the settings of the Passion by the long stretches of monotonous colour. Whether Brahms purposely imitated an archaic tone or not, it shows that his mind was sympathetic to the music of another age. There are several instances of his using only a part of his orchestral resources through a whole movement, which illustrate this same characteristic. In the second serenade the violins are not used at all, and this gives the whole a sombre tone. It will be remembered that he used the same device through the first movement of the German Requiem, with extraordinarily impressive results. No one who has heard it can forget the mystic effect of the entry of the muted violins at the beginning of the second movement after the subdued colour of the first. Again in the fourth symphony he withheld the trombones throughout the whole work until the finale, that they might announce the theme with pompous grandeur, and colour the whole movement with their noble utterance. These are instances of broad and simple contrasts alien from the modern spirit of orchestral writing, but which appealed with great force to Brahms's nature.

The love of separate tone qualities is, of course, amply illustrated in Brahms's chamber music. His affection for the rich tone of the violoncello often led him to give it the theme, to place the weaker viola beneath it for accompaniment, and to continue the use of this colour over long passages. In the horn trio, but most of all in the clarinet music, written quite at the end of his life, this Bach-like love of dealing with a single pure quality was strikingly exemplified. No one who has heard the playing of Herr Mühlfeld is surprised that Brahms should have been inspired thereby to write two sonatas for clarinet and piano, a trio for clarinet, violin and piano, and the famous clarinet quintet. In these, he allowed himself to indulge his love of a beautiful tone to the full. It has often been urged that he could not have cared much about tone qualities, since he added "oder Bratsche" after the word "clarinet," but this of course means no more than that he was so true a musician that he wished his music to reach people in whatever way possible, even if not in the most ideal way.

Whether this individual outlook of Brahms on questions of colour permanently injures the popularity of his music is an open question. There may come a reaction from the complexity and rapidity of contrast for which modern audiences thirst, and in which modern composers excel. Better still, people may learn to look deeper when they have got so used to these possibilities of combination and contrast that their attention is no longer occupied by them. In the meantime Brahms has in certain cases shown himself a master in the very arts which were less natural to him. The third symphony in F major is triumphantly successful in the intricate interweaving of the orchestral voices.

For this reason it is of all the four symphonies the happiest introduction to his music.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. JOHN LANE will publish on October 23 "The House in St. Martin's Street: Being Chronicles of the Burney Family," by Constance Hill. These chronicles of the life of the authoress of "Evelina" and her family in the last of their London homes are taken from contemporary letters and journals, written by Fanny Burney and her sisters, a large number of which are now published for the first time. The book includes unpublished letters from Mrs. Thrale, "Daddy" Crisp, Garrick and others.

A new volume of the "Story of Exploration" series is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Alston Rivers, "Tibet, the Mysterious," by Colonel Sir Thomas Holdich. The book covers the whole history of Tibetan exploration from the earliest efforts to the most recent period.

Mr. John Murray has in the press a new volume from the pen of Mr. T. Hubert Warren, entitled "Essays of Poets and Poetry, Ancient and Modern." There are nine essays, on: Sophocles and the Greek Genius; Matthew Arnold; "In Memoriam" after Fifty Years; Virgil and Tennyson; Dante and the Art of Poetry; Gray and Dante; Tennyson and Dante; the Art of Translation; and Ancient and Modern Classics as Instruments of Education. Two other books of interest announced by the same publisher are: "The Story of Port Royal," by Ethel Romanes, and "Life and Labour in India," by A. Yusif Ali, which deals with the characteristics and tendencies, social and industrial, of the Indian people. Mr. Murray will publish very shortly two novels: "Periwinkle," by Miss Lily Grant Duff, and "Rezánov," by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton.

Authors, playwrights, publishers, and, indeed, all who are concerned with copyright questions will be interested in a work by Messrs. Morris Colles and Harold Hardy on "Playright and Copyright in all Countries" which will be published next week by Messrs. Macmillan. The book is designed as a practical guide, its principal object being to show how to protect a play or a book in all countries of the world where copyright and playwright have a marketable value.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will publish shortly three new novels: "The Tyranny of Faith," by Carl Joubert; "As Ye have Sown," by Dolf Wyllarde; and "Fortunes a' Begging," by Tom Gallon.

Messrs. Cassell will publish shortly "The Old Engravers of England in their Relation to Contemporary Life and Art," a book, which aims at presenting, without technicalities, a concise survey of the three methods of copperplate engraving in line, mezzotint and stipple as they interpreted the life and art of England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The author is Mr. A. Malcolm Salaman.

Mr. Werner Laurie has in the press a travel-book entitled "Camp Fires in the Canadian Rockies," by Mr. William T. Hornaday: a narrative of an expedition to the mountains of British Columbia. Mr. John M. Phillips contributes seventy illustrations from photographs, and two maps.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think the remarks made under this heading should not be allowed to pass without protest, as some of them, at least, contradict the facts. No spelling reformer would dream of suppressing a sound that is really audible, because the very essence of phonetics is the exact preservation of the spoken utterance. I do not understand what is meant by "the mental ear" which attaches a value to "the so-called silent letters." The silent letters are absolutely silent, and the dubbing of them as "so-called" is obviously meant to cast dust in our eyes. The gh in light has long been dead in polite language, and the fact that it may be recognised in some dialects and was sounded in all dialects some hundreds of years ago has nothing to do with the question. You might just as well write etaticum while you are about it, because that was the mediæval spelling of age. It is absurd to ignore historical movements and changes. We are actually told that, "in lovely diction one should hear not only every word, but every letter of the word." This is obviously impossible, and worse; for it is absurd, and meant to mislead. How is one to pronounce the false and delusive c in scent or in scythe, or the c and na in victuals? And does anybody really pronounce the h in huce, or the ue in tongue, and all the rest? And we are to go, we are told, by the spelling, even (of course) when it is demonstrably wrong. If we do not write the ue in tongue, we are told that we lose the "obvious final articulation"! Do we indeed? Then how about bung, and sung, and lung? Are we to spell these bongue, and songue, and longue? Do let us talk common sense, and not pretend to be poetical and sentimental where nothing of the sort is possible. Never talk about the spelling of tongue unless you happen to know how it came to be so spelt.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. H. Drummond, although he is so evident a reformer, does not seem very sanguine of success, and says we need not be apprehensive as our extreme conservatism will prevent phonetic spelling becoming the standard notation for ordinary use for generations. I think he is right there, and, while I hold with certain alterations such as were agreed on by the Philological Society years ago, I am sure that an entirely new and phonetic alphabet would only cause endless confusion and trouble.

Mr. Drummond, however, believes that by introducing some system of phonetic spelling into schools for tutorial purposes only (whatever that means) subsequent generations will by degrees come to use such new spelling in their daily intercourse. As one opposed to an entirely new and phonetic spelling, I must leave to others to decide whether it might not be better to then adopt this system of phonetic spelling straight away rather than to have to endure for generations two current systems of spelling, i.e., one for educational (sic) and another for reading purposes.

I doubt, too, very much that even after the introduction of some twelve or fourteen further characters, English spelling would be perfectly phonetic, or would remain so long, especially if our language continues to extend and increase its vocabulary, as heretofore, by adopting words from other tongues.

No one imagines, in any case, that (as Mr. Drummond thinks I implied) there would be a dearth of books of some sort as a result, but a too violent reform, I do believe, would render our past literature quite unreadable to the masses, whose claims are equally as worth considering as those of the scholar with plenty of leisure.

Mr. Drummond, in accusing me of a too sentimental attachment to the historic side of language, says that phonetic spelling would not destroy the history bound up with words. If necessary, however, I could furnish him with many instances where such a change as he desires would entirely destroy the links in the chain connecting our written language with its past.

As in everything else of natural growth, too violent measures would, in my opinion, simply destroy instead of healing our language, and, whether the historic side of the question appeals to one or not, the fact remains, no language that has not been built up in a day can be altered at anybody's sweet will. All attempts to do so are sure to meet with failure. Language is of two kinds—written and spoken—the written part, as it represents not only the speech of today but of the past, is the more important. Hence, reformers are, I think, wrong when they make out that it should be solely governed by the pronunciation of the moment, and that written language must always conform to speech.

F. W. T. LANGE.

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. H. Drummond unconsciously misrepresents me when he says it follows from my reasoning that Job, Shakespeare, and Milton were "ignoble thinkers and writers." (I refrain from following Mr. Drummond's ludicrous spelling in this quotation.) It is, rather, a necessary corollary of my dictum that language grows, to admit that at an earlier period of its history its form should be different. There is no analogy between the living orthography of Milton's time and this mechanical monster—this caricature of a language—of the phoneticians.

Have these misguided men calculated the possible consequences of their misapplied zeal? Have they considered our Continental neighbours, and is the integrity of the "entente" sacred in their eyes? Already the nations will have read, on Mr. Drummond's authority, that Mr. Chamberlain has been caught "tripping," a term and mode of expression which well may lead them to suspect that dark political intrigue is afoot.

Mr. Drummond's plea for the dunces is pathetic, but unconvincing. If their faculty of observation is so slack that they cannot spell correctly in the current orthography, neither will they do so in any other. And, at all events, they may rest content that Englishmen are not going to allow this wholesale degradation of their noble language in the interests of any one.

J. B. WALLIS.

October 10.

[We have received also another long letter from Mr. H. Drummond, on the subject of "The Value of the Letter," in which he pours scorn on Miss Gladys Jones's plea while praising the charm of her style. To her doubt whether any newly suggested theory of spelling can even express the sounds of to-day, he replies with the names of Pitman, Ellis, March, Larison, Sweet and Passy, and quotes Max Müller as saying that some schemes refined too much and that he preferred Pitman's "Fonotypy," because it did not attempt to record every passing sound. Our present spelling he declares in the words of Mr. W. D. Howells to be "the greatest monument of human folly." In reply to her remark that the historic and etymological value of the old spelling has been admitted, he asks, By whom? and quotes Professor Skeat and Dr. Donaldson's recent speech at St. Andrew's on the other side. He imagines, it appears, that it is only in the north of England that the "r" is sounded broadly as a consonant, and gives "Southerners" the quite unnecessary advice to "do likewise." Has he, we wonder, ever heard a west country dialect spoken? Among other interesting quotations in a letter which adds little to the argument of Mr. Drummond's previous communications on the subject occurs Dr. Donaldson's statement that there were no English newspapers in Egypt in 1881-2 because English spelling was so difficult that the Egyptians did not learn the language, and Mr. Clement Shorter's admission that he cannot spell. A statement by Mr. Egbert Roberts that the present redundancy of consonants makes English singing difficult and unpleasant, and a story of Mme. Patti's refusing to sing "Una voce poco fa" in English, have, we submit, nothing to do with the question at issue. Singing-masters and singers are concerned not with the spelling of words but their pronunciation, and we are right, we believe, in supposing that the Spelling Reformers are content at present with the endeavour to approximate spelling to pronunciation, and have not yet undertaken the task of reforming speech as well.—ED.]

PUBLIC LIBRARIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a recent issue of the ACADEMY attention is called to two new features introduced into the library world; one the adoption of the "Private View," the other a Librarian's Club-Room. Now as regards the private view of a few librarians before a library is opened to the public, little objection need be taken, but it cannot be claimed as a new feature originating at the Islington Libraries, as it has occurred elsewhere. As regards another private view, that to which a chosen minority of the public are invited by circular to view the interior arrangements of a library (to the cost of which objection was made at a recent meeting of the Islington Borough Council) while the vast majority are left out in the cold; it appears to be ill-advised in connection with a public library, and especially with one which so widely advertises its freedom in other respects, and I certainly think that the less "private views" and similar privileges, restricted to a comparative few, are allowed in these institutions the better will be their chance of popularity and success. In these days, and especially in a democratic community, it certainly seems altogether inconsistent that an institution that should be noted for its democratic character of perfect equality is so prominently noted for the "private view" and the abolition of the newsroom—the room par excellence of the working man. These remarks are made in no carping spirit but rather as an expression of regret that anything should mar the inauguration and efficiency of libraries which, according to the numerous press notices, possess several features of interest worthy of commendation.

As regards a librarians' club-room, no doubt such a room might be a convenience, but it should be provided by the librarians' own association and not by a Library Supply Company, as the visitors to the latter would naturally feel under some restraint and feel under pressure, in some cases, to purchase something if only to relieve their sense of obligation. These conditions would not exist in a room provided by the Library Association itself, and consequently free from any possible suspicion of ulterior motive. But even were such a room provided by the Association, whatever other advantages it might possess, those connected with correspondence would be of little value as most librarians receive their letters at their own libraries or residences, and would, with rare exceptions, answer them from there.

The intimation that such a room is to be provided by a library furnishing company has already been commented upon by the representatives of other firms, and we may yet see an interesting competition between them, each one vying with the other in providing rooms with superior attractions in order to obtain the larger number of visiting librarians. It would certainly appear that a press announcement of such club-rooms would be most appropriately made in the advertisement columns.

A. COTGREAVE.

29 Victoria Road, Great Yarmouth.

October 12.

"THE USE OF THE CHURCH SERVICES TO AGNOSTICS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—One afternoon, about twenty years ago, I wandered—a "reverent doubter," a "devout agnostic"—into the Oratory in Brompton Road, and there I learnt a lesson. May I give it to you in an extract from the story of my pilgrimage as it is told in "An Agnostic's Progress," instead of trying to find new words?

"I remember vividly the profound emotion with which I saw at last a great gathering of pilgrims worshipping, as in my queer but honest way I worshipped, and acknowledging—it seemed—as I acknowledged, the oneness of spirit and matter, the immeasurable greatness penetrating and including the very least, the infinite issuing through the finite, the supreme source reflected in the image, God coming to man through the little things being made. I saw all this in a people prostrate, as I was prostrate, before an everyday material thing."

I think that this goes to confirm some of the many just statements made by "Spectator ab extra," to whom I tender my thanks.

WM. SCOTT PALMER.

SPECTATOR ET JOCULATOR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Comparisons are odious but contrasts delicious. The reason probably is that in comparisons the things are alike, only more so, and therefore, as in the case of the plain sister, we get too much of a good thing. Whereas the sense of contrast, of the thing and its opposite, gives us the exquisite sensation of eating our cake and having it too. My letter is prompted by the inexpressible thrill of delight I experienced from reading the weekly "Nugæ Scriptoris" on the use of the church service to agnostics, and the article on the greatest religious painter of our times in your Fine Art section. Could mortal man conceive a more perfect contrast between what I would call the scriptural nuggets of the one and the profane "rosseries" of the other? One is a pious rendering of the agnostic, the other an agnostic rendering of the pious. I can only compare its surprising effects to a music-hall entertainment in which Dr. Clifford and Mr. George Robey should appear as consecutive numbers on the programme.

A. CHORTLER.

TRISTAN AND ISEULT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is rare that the ACADEMY speaks with two voices, and rarer still that it ever holds a narrow Puritan view of life and art. But it is enough to make that most proper of proper persons the late Mr. Matthew Arnold turn in his grave and poor Mr. Binyon blush on learning that the story of the hero and heroine of two of their best known poems "is simply the glorification of adultery, and it was solely on that account that it appealed to the taste of the licentious courts of the kings and princes and nobles of mediæval Europe."

What your reviewer would have said of Oscar Wilde's Salome I tremble to think. Happily the real ACADEMY gives us its verdict when dealing with this identical work in the Bookshelf section, by alluding to "the heavy-handed attacks on this extraordinarily beautiful, if unwholesome piece of work."

But your critic's bovinity knows no bounds: He concludes: "such a story now can only be endured when used as a vehicle for Wagner's music." Fancy Wagner being told that his libretto was merely a peg to hang his music on, as though his chief aim were not to make words and music as far as possible one in thought, idea and feeling. Does your critic then estimate Wagner's music as mere ear-tickling stuff, à propos of nothing in particular? Happily, once more the same issue contains the antidote as well as the base. Your musical critic, in discussing Purini's operas, shows incidentally how Wagner was, and tried above all to be, a great psychologist in music.

A GREAT ADMIRER OF THE "ACADEMY."

THE MOTOR MANIA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Could "Spectator [ab extra]" kindly give me the authority for his startling statement that "the loss of life, the number of accidents, and the destruction of property by motors, is much greater than it has ever been by railway trains or horse or carriage conveyance. That fact is undoubted." I have been at some pains to try and discover any official return which could lend colour to an allegation so damaging to the motor-car, but, so far as I can ascertain, statistics point to a very different conclusion. Perhaps, however, your contributor has access to more recent returns than those which I have been able to unearth. Early in the recent Session the Home Office issued a table which showed that the number of deaths caused by motor-cars in England and Wales in the year 1904 was fifty-nine; the electric tram, which of course bears no relation to the motor-car, being responsible for the loss of fifty-five lives, and the traction engine for twenty-nine. Another return from the Home Office, issued over a year ago, showed that during 1904 covered vans in the Metropolis alone caused 1389 accidents, of which thirty-four were fatal. A still later return shows that, from June 1904 to March 1905, motor-cars in the metropolis caused accidents to three hundred and thirteen persons, with fatal results in eleven instances. No doubt the tale of accidents has considerably increased during the past twelve months, but I think that it should in fairness be remembered that there are at the present moment something like 100,000 motor vehicles in use in the United Kingdom, each of which represents in the matter of mileage covered, at least two or three horsed vehicles. The motor-car, so far as my experience and observation goes, is by far the safest road conveyance in existence, so long as it is driven with reasonable care and skill. Accidents occur from time to time, but their number is apt to be grossly exaggerated owing to the prominence given by the daily press to any incident in which a motor-car is even remotely concerned. How many, I wonder, of the 1389 accidents caused by covered vans in 1904, found their way into the newspapers?

With the rest of Spectator's paper I have little concern. He prefers to move slowly from point to point. For my own part if business instead of pleasure is the object in view, the quickest means of locomotion available suits me best. It is a mistake to suppose, however, that the motorist on pleasure bent has no eye for scenery and the beauties of nature. Mere speed may have a fascination for some drivers, but I have constantly heard motorists declare that, apart from the purely utilitarian side of the question, the possession of a car has enabled them to gain a closer acquaintance with their country than they could have obtained by any other means.

F. A.

SINGULAR AND PLURAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—An instance of a plural verb wrongly placed in relation to a singular noun is supplied by Shakespeare's "Of his bones are coral made," in which, of course, "coral" is the subject and demands the use of "is." Maybe this blunder is the work of an editor, and that Shakespeare really wrote: "Of his bones are corals made," a more musical line than "Of his bones is coral made" which the singular subject necessitates.

J. B. WALLIS.

October 15.

[It is far more likely that Shakespeare wrote the ungrammatical phrase as quoted. There are hundreds of such instances in his works and those of his contemporaries.—ED.]

AFRICAN LANGUAGES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The importance of language in relation to political and social aspects of the native question in Africa seems liable to be overlooked. The possibility of large groups of tribes, hitherto distinct and mutually antagonistic, becoming rapidly able and eager to understand each other in some common form of speech has apparently to be taken into account. Twenty-six years contact with Swahili and various dialects of Eastern and Central Africa points so far to the conclusion that there is a remarkable degree of similarity, amounting in many important respects to substantial identity, in the grammatical structure of language over the whole vast area occupied by the Bantu races of Africa, from the Soudan to the Cape. And the stock of words common to all Bantu tribes, when recognised under their various dialectic disguises, will probably prove very considerable.

The officials, missionaries, traders, settlers and travellers of various nationalities who are qualified to give help in testing this conclusion by personal and first-hand study of a Bantu dialect are naturally difficult to reach, scattered in remote and often isolated spheres of work. It is therefore perhaps justifiable to ask publicity for the request, that persons so qualified and willing to accept and reply to a brief communication on the subject would send me their addresses at Fort Jameson, North-Eastern Rhodesia. I should be grateful if foreign journals and local papers in Africa, general and official, would assist by calling attention to my invitation.

A. C. MADAN.

July 12.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Aberdeen University Studies, No. 20: Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire. Written for the Quatercentenary of the University of Aberdeen by Seven of its Graduates. Edited by W. M. Ramsay. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 391. Aberdeen University Press.

[Contents: "Isaurian and East Phrygian Art in the Third and Fourth Centuries After Christ," by A. Margaret Ramsay; "Smyrna as Described by the Orator Aelius Aristides," by W. M. Calder; "Epitaphs in Phrygian Greek," by A. Petrie; "Inheritance by Adoption and Marriage in Phrygia, as shown in the Epitaphs of Trophimos and his Relatives," by John Fraser; "Explorations in Lycaonia and Isauria, 1904," by T. Callander; "Paganism and Christianity in the Upper Tembris Valley," by J. G. C. Anderson; "Preliminary Report to the Wilson Trustees on Exploration in Phrygia and Lycaonia," by W. M. Ramsay; "The War of Moslem and Christian for the Possession of Asia-Minor," by W. M. Ramsay; and "The Tekmoreian Guest-Friends: An Anti-Christian Society on the Estates at Pisidian Antioch," by W. M. Ramsay.]

Clausen George. Aims and Ideals in Art. With 32 illustrations. 8½ x 6. Pp. 185. Methuen, 5s. net.

[Eight Lectures delivered to the Students of the Royal Academy in 1905 and 1906. With the exception of a few alterations in form made necessary by publication, they are printed as delivered.]

Maclair, Camille. Antoine Watteau (1684-1721). Translated by Madame Simon Bussy. The Popular Library of Art. 6 x 4. Pp. 200. Duckworth, 2s. net.

Dillon, Edward. The Arts of Japan. With 41 illustrations. Little Books on Art. 6 x 4½. Pp. 212. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.

[An attempt to "summarise the vast amount of information upon the Art of Japan [much of it from native sources] that has lately become available."]

Moore, T. Sturge. Correggio. With 59 illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 276. Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Some Reminiscences of William Michael Rossetti. 2 vols. 9 x 6. Pp. 873. Brown, Langham, 42s. net.

[See the ACADEMY of October 6, pp. 333-4.]

Court Life in the Dutch Republic, 1638-1689. By the Baroness Suzette van Zuylen van Nyevelt. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 363. Dent, 16s. net.

Personal and Literary Letters of Robert First Earl of Lytton. Edited by Lady Betty Balfour. 2 vols. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 1788. Longmans, 21s. net. [See p. 389.]

Stoddart, Jane T. The Life of the Empress Eugénie. With six illustrations in photogravure. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 311. Hodder & Stoughton, 18s. 6d. net.

[Genealogies: The Scots Ancestry of the Empress Eugénie; and The Empress Eugénie's Association with the Houses of Stuart and Guelph. Index.]

Moorhouse, E. Hallam. Nelson's Lady Hamilton. With 51 portraits. 9 x 5½. Pp. 376. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

A Genealogical History of the Savage Family of Ulster. Being a Revision and Enlargement of Certain Chapters of "The Savages of the Ards." Compiled by Members of the Family from Historical Documents and Family Papers, and edited by G. F. S. A. With illustrations of Arms, Mansions, Ruins of Castles, and Ancient Sites and Monuments connected with the Family. 11½ x 9½. Pp. 381. Chiswick Press, 21s. net.

Stoddart, Anna M. The Life of Isabella Bird (Mrs. Bishop). 9½ x 6. Pp. 416. Murray, 18s. net.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Orange Fairy Book. Edited by Andrew Lang. With 8 coloured plates and numerous illustrations by H. J. Ford. 7½ x 5. Pp. 358. Longmans, 6s. Lees, Rev. G. Robinson. Life and Adventures Beyond Jordan. With illustrations from Photographs by the author. 8 x 5½. Pp. 304. Kelly, 5s. net.

Stories of William Tell and his Friends. By H. E. Marshall; pictures by I. L. Gloag. Told to the Children series. 6 x 4½. Pp. 112. Jack, 1s. net.

The Story of Sir Francis Drake. By Mrs. Oliver Elton; pictures by T. H. Robinson. 6 x 4½. Pp. 126. The Story of Lord Roberts. By Edmund Francis Sellar; pictures by Sydney Paget and others. 6 x 4½. Pp. 120. The Children's Heroes series. Jack, 1s. 6d. net each.

Steedman, C. M. The Child's Life of Jesus. With 30 coloured pictures by Paul Woodroffe. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 423. Jack, 10s. 6d. net.

Lodge, R. B. The Story of Hedgerow and Pond. Coloured illustrations from drawings by G. E. Lodge. 8 x 5½. Pp. 298. Kelly, 5s. net.

Clarke, Mrs. Henry. A Village Tyrant. 7½ x 5. Pp. 126. Macsoreley, Catherine Mary. "Good-bye, Summer." A Story for Girls. 7½ x 5. Pp. 127. Crake, Rev. Edward E. Henri Duquesne. A Sussex Romance. 7½ x 5. Pp. 128. S.P.C.K., 10d. each.

The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine. Vol. LXXII New Series: Vol. L. May 1906 to October 1906. 10 x 7. Pp. 966. Macmillan, 10s. 6d.

St. Nicholas: An Illustrated Magazine for Young Folks. Vol. XXXIII. Part II.—May 1906 to October 1906. 9½ x 7½. Pp. 573. Macmillan, 6s.

Duncan, Norman. The Adventures of Billy Topsail. Illustrated. 8 x 5½. Pp. 331. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

Bearne, David, S. J. Charlie Chittrick. 8 x 5½. Pp. 205. Roehampton: Manresa Press, 3s. 6d.

Wallas, Mrs. Graham. The Land of Play. Illustrated by Gilbert James. 7½ x 5. Pp. 240. Arnold, 3s. 6d.

Meade, L. T. The Colonel and the Boy. Illustrated. 8 x 5½. Pp. 309. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Strang, Herbert. One of Clive's Heroes. A Story of the Fight for India. Illustrated by William Rainey, R.I. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 406. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

EDUCATION.

- Feuilletons Choisis.* Edited by Cloudeley Brereton. Oxford Modern French series. 7½ x 5. Pp. 118. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s.
Forster, Edward S. Dent's Latin Primer for Young Beginners. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 135. Dent, 1s. net.

FICTION.

- Marriott, Charles. Women and the West. 7½ x 5. Pp. 304. Nash, 6s.
[Fourteen short stories; all save one have appeared previously in different periodicals.]
Benson, E. F. Paul. 7½ x 5. Pp. 321. Heinemann, 6s. (See p. 398.)
Rhoscomyl, Owen. Old Fireproof. Being the Chaplain's story. 7½ x 5. Pp. 390. Duckworth, 6s.
Connell, F. Norreys. The Young Days of Admiral Quilliam. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 349. Blackwood, 6s.
Crawford, F. Marion. A Lady of Rome. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 390. Macmillan, 6s. (See p. 398.)
Rhodes, Kathlyn. The Spinner. 7½ x 5. Pp. 304. Digby, Long, 6s.
[Priscilla, a country maid who is married by an artist in order that he may obtain her services as a model, is sympathetically drawn, but the author has not devoted the same care to her other characters, and the story leaves an unpleasant taste in the mouth.]
White, W. Holt. The Earthquake. A Romance of London, 1907. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 334. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
[We are growing a little tired of these novels of a future year; but much may be forgiven the author of the book before us. He is seldom dull, and his story of an international conspiracy, based on a corner in wheat, carries the reader with a rush from the first chapter, in which the earthquake disturbed a dinner-party and "set the ball rolling," to the last, in which the brilliant Prime Minister, of course, saves his country. A good book to beguile the tedium of a railway journey.]
Holdsworth, Annie E. (Mrs. Lee-Hamilton). The Iron Gates. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Unwin, 6s.
Nield, Jonathan. Slings of Fortune. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 317. Allenson, 6s.
[Mr. Jonathan Nield will be remembered as the author of a valuable "Guide to Historical Fiction"; but a discriminating critic does not necessarily make a good novelist, and his "Slings of Fortune" is crude, and the jocosity forced and a little "cheap."]
Grier, Sydney C. The Heir. Illustrated. 8 x 5½. Pp. 348. Blackwood, 6s.
Steuart, John A. The Wages of Pleasure. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 395. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
Lucas, St. John. Quicksilver and Flame. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Arnold, 6s.
Laffan, Mrs. De Courcy. The Vicar of Dale End. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Digby, Long, 6s.
Fletcher, J. S. A Maid and Her Money. With illustrations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 317. Digby, Long, 6s.
[An unoriginal and particularly dull novel. The characters are unconvincing, and the poet and the brilliant novelist and journalist (who is very shaky in his grammar) frankly impossible. (About the middle of the book two chapters—brightly written, with some good conversational matter—promised better things, but the author falls back into the slough of convention and the end is as dull as the beginning.)]
Fleming, Clifton. A Mad Compact. 7½ x 5. Pp. 302. Digby, Long, 6s.
[A mad compact—a very mad compact, we think—between an author and his "ghost"; but had Mr. Fleming, before publication, submitted his novel to a friend, together with a blue pencil, the result might have been an interesting book.]
Cullum, Ridgwell. The Night-Riders. A Romance of Western Canada. 7½ x 5. Pp. 330. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
Braddon, M. E. The White House. 8 x 5½. Pp. 444. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
Weyman, Stanley J. Chipping. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 375. Smith, Elder, 6s.
Coleridge, M. E. The Lady on the Drawing-room Floor. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 283. Arnold, 6s.
[A pleasant little story—without a plot, and with no more exciting incident than a fancy-dress ball—which runs smoothly along till, in the end, the lady on the drawing-room floor responds to the invitation of the gentleman on the ground floor.]
Innes, Norman. The Surge of War. 7½ x 5. Pp. 310. Nash, 6s.
[Ten short stories cast in the form of "Memories of an Aide-de-Camp to Frederick the Great." The first is poor, but there is no lack of excitement in the remaining nine, though they might equally well have been styled memories of an aide-de-camp to any one else. They are the sort of stories—full of incident and the glamour of war—we are accustomed to find in the pages of monthly magazines.]
Butler, Ellis Parker. Pigs is Pigs. Illustrations by Will Crawford. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 47. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.

HISTORY.

- Paul, Herbert. A History of Modern England. In five volumes. Vol. v. 9 x 6. Pp. 408. Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.
[1885 to 1895. With a complete index to the whole work.]
Gasquet, Abbot. Parish Life in Mediæval England. With numerous illustrations. The Antiquary's Books. 9 x 5½. 1 p. 279. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
[Chapters on The Parish Church, Clergy, and Officials; Church Services and Festivals; Parochial Finance; The Sacraments; The Parish Pulpit; Parish Amusements; and Guilds and Fraternities.]
Oman, C. The History of England from the Accession of Richard II. to the Death of Richard III. (1377-1485). The Political History of England series. In twelve volumes—vol. iv. 9 x 6. Pp. 525. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.
[Appendices, with genealogical tables; index and maps.]

LITERATURE.

- Hyde, A. G. George Herbert and his Times. With 32 illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 327. Methuen, 10s. 6d. net. (See p. 390.)

- Schofield, William Henry. English Literature: From the Norman Conquest to Chaucer. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 500. Macmillan, 7s. 6d.
[The first of two volumes on the literary history of England from the Norman Conquest to the time of Elizabeth—companion volumes to those by Mr. Stopford Brooke, Professor Saintsbury, and Mr. Edmund Gosse.]
Duff, J. Wight. Homæ and Beowulf: a Literary Parallel. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 25. The Viking Club, n.p.
[Reprinted from the Saga-Book of the Viking Club, 1906. Paper covers.]
Duff, E. Gordon. The Printers, Stationers and Bookbinders of Westminster and London, from 1476 to 1535. 7½ x 5. Pp. 156. Cambridge University Press, 5s. net.
[Lectures delivered by the author as Sanders Reader in Bibliography in the University of Cambridge in two series: the first in the Lent Term, 1899, the second in the May Term 1904. Of the first series a small edition was privately printed for presentation, the second is now printed—and both are now published—for the first time.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Irving, H. B. Occasional Papers, Dramatic and Historical. 8 x 6. Pp. 252. Bickers, 3s. 6d. net.
[Eight essays, some of which have appeared before in different periodicals.]
A Sailor's Garland. Selected and edited by John Masefield. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 328. Methuen, 3s. 6d. net.
Belloc, Hilaire. Hills and the Sea. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 314. Methuen, 6s.
[A "nature book." Many of the papers have appeared in the Speaker, the Pilot, the Morning Post, the Westminster Gazette, and other periodicals.]
Thomas, Edward. The Heart of England. With coloured illustrations by H. L. Richardson. 10½ x 8½. Pp. 258. Dent, 21s. net.
White, H. J. Merton College, Oxford. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. The College Monographs. 7 x 4½. Pp. 104. Dent, 2s. net.
Priestly, L. A. M. (Mrs. George McCracken). The Love Stories of Some Eminent Women. 7½ x 5. Pp. 379. Drane, 6s.
[The "eminent women, are: Madame Roland, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, George Eliot, Lady Henry Lawrence, Isabel Lady Burton, Mrs. Siddons, Christina Rossetti, and Charlotte Brontë. The reader will learn little from the wash of words and fulsome eulogy which result from the author's attempt to "catch with a sympathetic ear the heart-beats that underlie [the] greatness" of "these illustrious lovers."]
Catalogue of Books Printed for Private Circulation, Collected by Bertram Dobell and now Described and Annotated by Him. 9½ x 6. Pp. 238. Published by the Author, 77 Charing Cross Road, W.C.
Cunynghame, H. H. Time and Clocks. With many illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 200. Constable, 6s. net.
[A description of ancient and modern methods of measuring time.]
Parkyn, Walter A. The Language of Commerce. 2 vols. 7½ x 5. Pp. 242. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. 6d. each.
[Vol. i.—Composition, Terminology, and Letter-Writing, with Dictionary of technical terms and phrases, list of abbreviations, model business letters, and test papers; vol. ii.—Correspondence Classified and Simplified, with characteristic schemes for the composition of each distinct class of correspondence and eighty model business letters.]
Clayton, Joseph. The Bishops as Legislators. With a Preface by the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 126. Fifeild, 2s. net.
[A record of votes and speeches delivered by the Bishops of the Established Church in the House of Lords in the Nineteenth Century.]

MUSIC.

- Evans, Edwin. Tchaikovsky. Illustrated. The Master Musicians series. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 208. Dent, 3s. 6d. net.
[Chronology of works at end.]

PHILOSOPHY.

- Baillie, J. B. An Outline of the Idealistic Construction of Experience. 9 x 6. Pp. 344. Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.
Shepherd, Harold B. The Shadow of Eternity. 7½ x 5. Pp. 156. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
Fichte, Johann Gottlieb. The Vocation of Man. Translated by William Smith, with biographical introduction by E. Ritchie. Philosophical Classics—Religion of Science Library, No. 20. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 178. Kegan Paul, 1s. 6d.
[Paper covers.]

POETRY.

- "Dum-Dum." The Crackling of Thorns. 7½ x 5. Pp. 79. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.
[Most of these verses have appeared in Blackwood's Magazine or Punch.]
Rose of My Life—II. 5½ x 4. Pp. 87. Chiswick Press, 2s. 6d. net.
[Verses—triolets, rondeaus, sonnets, and ballads.]
Spiers, Kaufmann. Durante and Selvaggia, and other poems. 7½ x 5. Pp. 115. Nutt, 2s.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Maxwell, Hellen. The Marriage of Eileen. 7½ x 5. Pp. 317. Digby, Long, 6s.
Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn. Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church. Popular Edition. 3 vols. 8 x 5½. Murray, 7s. 6d. net the set.
[Not sold separately. Vol. i.—Abraham to Samuel; vol. ii.—Samuel to the Captivity; vol. iii.—The Captivity to the Christian Era.]
Smiles, Samuel. Self-Help: with Illustrations of Conduct and Perseverance. Re-issue. Two parts in one volume. 7½ x 5. Pp. 212. Murray, 1s. net.
[Paper covers.]
Dumas, Alexandre. Comtesse de Charny. Illustrated. 3 vols. 7½ x 5. Pp. 624, 675, and 670. The Black Tulip. 7½ x 5. Pp. 355. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.
[Reprinted from American plates.]

Irving, Washington. The Keeping of Christmas at Bracebridge Hall. With 24 coloured illustrations by C. E. Brock. 8x5. Pp. 267. Maaning, Anne. The Household of Sir Thomas More. With 24 coloured illustrations by C. E. Brock. 8x5. Pp. 185. English Idylls series. Dent, 5s. net each.

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell: North and South. The Knutsford edition. In eight volumes—vol. iv. 7½x5½. Pp. 521. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.

Lithgow, William. The Tattall Discourse of the Rare Adventures and Painfull Peregrinations of longe Nineteene Yeares Travayles from Scotland to the most famous Kingdomes in Europe, Asia and Affrica. 9x6. Pp. 449. MacLachose, 12s. 6d. net.

[The text now published is a reprint of the editio princeps of 1632. The letters i, j, u, and v, have been altered to conform to modern usage, and obvious printer's errors, both of spelling and punctuation have been corrected. The index of the original edition has been replaced by a fuller one.]

Hardy, O. H. Rel Letter Days in Greece and Egypt. Illustrated. Second edition. 7½x5½. Pp. 135. Smeatt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net.

Gillespie, William Honyman. The Argument, à Priori, for the Being and the Attributes of the Lord God, the Absolute One, and First Cause. 8½x5½. Pp. xvi, 334. Edinburgh: Clark, 1s.

[The sixth or Theists' edition, reissued for the Trustees of Mrs. Honyman Gillespie. With a sketch of the author's life and work by James Urquhart.]

SCIENCE.

Hamilton, Mary. Incubation, or the Cure of Disease in Pagan Temples and Christian Churches. 8½x5½. Pp. 227. St. Andrews: Henderson, 5s. net.

SOCIOLOGY.

Gordon, William Clark. The Social Ideals of Alfred Tennyson as Related to his Time. 7½x5½. Pp. vii, 257. Unwin, 6s. 6d. net. (See p. 391.)

Rivers, W. H. R. The Todas. With illustrations. 9x6. Pp. 755. Macmillan, 21s. net.

[Bibliography, list of villages, list of plants, glossary, index and genealogical tables.]

THEOLOGY.

Coulton, G. G. Friar's Lantern. 7½x5. Pp. 255. Clarke, 3s. 6d. net.

Russell, Rev. W. E. Life's Greatest Problem and how it is Solved. 7½x5. Pp. 173. Kelly, 2s. 6d.

Carus, Paul. Amitabha. A Story of Buddhist Theology. 8x5½. Pp. 121. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.

Powell, Francis E. The Unified Gospel (A Written Tetramorph). 8x5½. Pp. 365. Drane, 3s. 6d. net.

[“Consisting of every word of the Four Gospels woven into one consecutive and harmonious narrative from the text of the Revised Version, with descriptive analyses.”]

Beet, Joseph Agar. A Manual of Theology. 8½x5½. Pp. 568. Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. 6d.

[“This volume embodies an attempt to gain, so far as the limitations of human knowledge permit, a connected and comprehensive view, in their objective reality, of the unseen foundations of religion.”]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

The Voyage of the “Scotia.” Being the Record of a Voyage of Exploration in Antarctic Seas. By Three of the Staff. With illustrations. 9x6. Pp. 375. Blackwood, 21s. net.

Hobson, J. A. Canada To-Day. 7½x5. Pp. 143. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.

[The greater part of the book was contributed to the Daily Chronicle, during the winter of 1905-1906 in the form of letters, which have now been corrected and added to.]

Bogg, Edmund. Richmondshire and the Vale of Mowbray. In two volumes—vol. i. With 58 illustrations and 4 maps. 9x6. Pp. 428. Elliot Stock, 4s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

Archæological Survey of India: Annual Report 1903-4. Calcutta, Office of the Superintendent of Government Printing, India, 1906. Price not stated.—The Annual Report of the Archæological Survey of India for the year 1903-4 is of special importance because it is the first issued since the passing of the “Ancient Monuments Act.” Consequently a considerable part of the report deals with an entirely new section, the conservation and repairing of some of the historic monuments of India. The Director, Mr. J. H. Marshall, prefaces the report with a summary of the Act mentioned for the benefit of the English reader at home, and one clause of the Act will certainly appeal to the sympathies of archæologists generally. This is the provision that if necessary for its preservation, that is to say on account of the ignorance or indifference of the owner, any historical monument can be compulsorily acquired by the Government. There is only one exception to this rule, but it is one especially essential in the East. All buildings used for religious observances are to be exempt from the operation of this law. Another clause is noteworthy. The exportation of movable antiquities from India is prohibited, and consequently the raids of American millionaires on Buddhist and Mahomedan art treasures are thus repelled in anticipation. That is another matter for which art-lovers in this country will feel grateful and may be a little envious. The German excavator is also warned off. The excavation of ancient sites by irresponsible persons is not to be allowed. Enough has been said to show that the “Ancient Monuments Act” was an excellent piece of legislation, for which grateful thanks are due to Lord Curzon. When we descend from the general to the particular we find that the monuments of India divide themselves into two chief classes—Mahomedan and Hindu. In the latter the Director includes, and everyone will admit that the arrangement is correct as well as convenient, Buddhist and Jaina. This division is especially important with regard to conservation, because a great deal more in the way of renovation, and re-ornamentation is possible with regard to Mahomedan monuments than is the case with Hindu. The latter mainly consist of “solid stone walls, stone columns and architraves, and flat ceilings,” and therefore simple measures of reparation suffice. But it is totally different with regard to Mahomedan buildings. As Mr. Marshall writes, “once their domes or arches have become cracked nothing short of the most radical measures will secure their permanent safety.” The essential point is to achieve this result, and the reader of this report will come to the conclusion that it has been more or less attained. Among all the monuments of India there is none so widely or so well known as the Taj Mahal of Agra. It has appealed to the imagination of the poet as well as the traveller, and it has placed the name of Shah Jehan in the front rank of royal builders. It occupies the foremost place in this report, and a very interesting account is given of the various measures of restoration and improvement carried out with regard to it by English officers since 1810. The effective photographs of this monument of a man's love give a very good idea of the beauty of the building, and they show that the practical measures taken by our officers for its improved sanitation have in no way detracted from its appearance. This is especially the case with regard to the jawab or quadrangle, where the roads have been lowered and metalled and the drains covered in. Formerly the quadrangle was deep in dust in dry weather and flooded with water during the rains. Under the new arrangement dust and water have disappeared. That is certainly an improvement to which the admirer of all that is ancient cannot possibly object. Another celebrated Mahomedan building is the Fort at Agra. Here extremely happy restorations have been carried out, and as the Amir of Afghanistan has declared himself to be a patron of archæological remains (which abound in his country despite neglect and the ruthless deeds of Eastern conquerors) it may be hoped that they will be brought to his notice during his approaching visit. At Delhi also great improvements have been carried out. The beautiful tomb of Isa Khan has been cleared of its mean surroundings of native hovels, and has been exposed in all its untrammelled beauty to the eye of the beholder. In Madras and Burmah excellent conservatory work has been done, of which the details will be found in the Report. The larger part of the work deals with excavations, especially at Basarh, and it will be gratifying to pundits of the old school to find that Mr. Marshall clears General Cunningham from the doubts cast by some recent critics on his identification of that place with Vaisali, the capital of the Licchavi kings. The excavations at Basarh, copiously illustrated, would alone supply material for a long article, but all that can be done here is to attract the attention of archæologists generally to the most interesting excavations now in progress in India. The Report reflects great credit on the Department responsible for it, and provides durable proof that the Government of India is not unmindful of its duty to the artistic and archæological legacies left it by its predecessors.

A cheap, convenient and trustworthy encyclopedia is The Modern Cyclopædia, of which the Gresham Publishing Company are just issuing a revised and extended edition, edited by Charles Annandale. The former articles have been added to and brought up to date, and a very valuable feature is the addition of a supplement, dealing with matters that have come into being or prominence since the original publication. In the volume before us (A—BLA), for instance, we find in the supplement articles on Acetylene, the late Lord Acton, Canon Ainger, Alien Immigration, Anti-Semitism, Antitoxin, Appendicitis, the Ascoman Dam, Dr. Barnardo, Aubrey Beardsley, Archbishop Benson, and many other things. The type is clear, the illustrations and maps good, and the information, so far as we have tested it, accurate and to the point; and the book is one we can confidently recommend as sound, erudite and practical. The pronunciation has a key which makes it quite clear.

Letters to a Daughter. By Hubert Bland (T. Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net.) A wit once remarked that men are divided into two classes: those who know that women rule their lives, and those who do not know. He uttered a truth too profound to be permissible save in a jest. Mr. Bland knows this fact well; and a consummate jest awoke in his mind one day and took hold of him until it obsessed him. And he perpetrated it judiciously and solemnly, as befits a proper jest, with even an occasional tear and touch of pathos—always genuine—in a staid book of imaginary letters. It was no less than to instruct a woman and a young woman in that mysterious art, in which all that is subtle, all that is beautiful, all that is morbid, all that is delicate, all the all of all, can be expressed—the art of being a woman. What a magnificent subject for a man! For long god-like moments he holds the leagues in stress; and yet always must come the true refrain, “be yourself, my dear, be yourself.” On such a subject there is little to say; and yet the attitude which the subject creates, enables a man to say anything, to say everything. It is a book which every man should learn spelling to write; and every woman should be deferentially persuaded to read.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES GODFREY LELAND ("HANS BREITMANN"). By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. Illustrated. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Mrs. Pennell was Leland's niece, and was at one period his constant and intimate companion; he left all his papers, letters, and manuscripts in her hands, and therefore no one could be better qualified to write the story of his varied life. Folk-lore, study of Romany, writer of ballads, and decorative designer, Leland was a most fascinating and interesting personality. The names of his friends and correspondents show not only the breadth and variety of his life, but also the entertainment which these volumes offer to all who are fond of literary reminiscences and gossip of famous people.

QUINTIN HOGG. A Biography by ETHEL HOGG. With a Preface by the DUKE OF ARGYLL. Popular Edition, with Portrait and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Of the first edition the Daily Telegraph said: "A touching biography, it leaves on the reader the impression not only of a high-minded philanthropist, 'the friend of the boys,' but also of a man of buoyant spirits, whose presence everywhere tended to make the society in which he moved better and brighter. The Duke of Argyll, in a preface to the volume, observes that 'a book giving the life-story of Quintin Hogg should be a useful one,' and Miss Ethel Hogg's work realises that ideal."

ECCLESIASTES IN THE METRE OF OMAR. With an Introductory Essay on Ecclesiastes and the Rubaiyat. By WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH.

The volume contains a brief study of the Ecclesiastes and the Rubaiyat, followed by a metrical arrangement in seventy quatrains of the old Hebrew book in the terms of the Persian poet, with explanatory notes.

THE CRACKLING OF THORNS. By DUM DUM, Author of "Rhymes of the East," "In the Hills." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A new volume of Parodies and Humorous verse by a popular and frequent contributor to Punch.

THE KING OF COURT POETS. A Study of the Life, Work, and Times of Lodovico Ariosto. By EDMUND GARDNER, Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc. Illustrated from Portraits, Facsimile, Letters, etc. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

The study of the Later Renaissance in Italy is a sequel to the Author's "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara." It centres round the person of Ariosto, the supreme Italian poet of the sixteenth century, author of "Orlando Furioso." The historical period covered is that of the reign of Alfonso I. d'Este, third Duke of Ferrara (1505-1534), the husband of Lucrezia Borgia, and father-in-law of Renée of France, whose prolonged struggle with three successive Popes for the preservation of his duchy is rich in romantic interest. The book deals more fully with Ariosto, his poetry, and his relations to his times, than has hitherto been done in a single work.

LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. Being his Correspondence with Tobias Lear and the latter's Diary. Illustrated with rare Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Tobias Lear was Washington's confidential secretary, and these intimate letters, all but six of which are hitherto unpublished, give one much new light upon the character of the First of Americans. They are full of information as to his property, farm, and home life during the years when he was President; indeed, the volume might almost be called "Washington as a Country Gentleman," so much does it give us to his mode of life at Mount Vernon, his methods of handling the servants, and the like.

VICTORIAN NOVELISTS. By LEWIS MELVILLE, Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray." Illustrated, with Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM STUBBS, BISHOP OF OXFORD, 1823-1901. By WILLIAM HOLDEN HUTTON, B.D., Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College, Oxford. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

BOOKS TO BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY.

WALT WHITMAN. A Study of his Life and Work. By BLISS PERRY. Crown 8vo, illustrated with Portraits, Facsimiles of MSS., etc. 6s. net.

COMEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE, Author of "Some Famous Women of Wit and Beauty," "Literary Eccentrics." Demy 8vo, with many Full-Page Portraits, 12s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN SEVEN ARTS. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Contents: Rodin—The Painting of the Nineteenth Century—Gustave Moreau—Watts—Whistler—Cathedral—The Decay of Craftsmanship in England—Beethoven—The Ideas of Richard Wagner—The Problem of Richard Strauss—Eleanora Duse—A New Art of the Stage—A Symbolistic Farce—Pantomime and the Poetic Drama—The World as Ballet.

EDINBURGH UNDER SIR WALTER SCOTT. P. W. T. FYFE. With an Introduction by ROBERT S. RAIT, Fellow of New College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

FORTHCOMING SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

GROWTH

By GRAHAM TRAVERS, Author of "Mona Maclean," etc. [Tuesday next.]

THE EIGHT GUESTS. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "Mr. John Strood," "Park Lane," etc.

THE OPENED SHUTTERS. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, Author of "Jewel," "The Right Princess," etc.

THE COUNTY ROAD. By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Paradise," "King's End," etc.

A MAN IN THE CASE. By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, Author of "Trixy," "Burglars in Paradise," etc.

MONTLIVET. By ALICE PRESCOTT SMITH.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LIMITED,

16 JAMES STREET, HAYMARKET, S.W.

BOOKS FOR CONNOISSEURS ART LOVERS AND STUDENTS

Drawings by Great Masters.

4to, 7s. 6d. net each. Post free, 7s. 10d.

The Drawings in this new series are reproduced on a large scale on a page 11½ in. by 8½ in. The volumes each contain forty-eight Reproductions, many of them printed in colour, and several of these are mounted on coloured papers in harmony with the tints in which the illustrations are printed. The volumes are bound in delicately toned paper boards with vellum backs, and a beautiful design printed in three colours.

HOLBEIN. By A. LYS BALDREY.

LEONARDO DA VINCI. By LEWIS HIND.

GAINGEBOROUGH. By LORD RONALD SUTHERLAND GOWER.

ALBRECHT DÜRER. By Dr. HANS SINGER.

Modern Master Draughtsmen

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters." 7s. 6d. net each. Post free, 7s. 10d.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX. By A. J. FINBERG.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By MALCOLM BELL.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. LYS BALDREY.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. HANS SINGER.

Great Etchers

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters." 7s. 6d. net. Post free, 7s. 10d.

WANDYCK. By FRANK NEWBOLT.

CHARLES MERYON. By HUGH STOKES.

Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts

A series of volumes for those interested in the Applied Arts of the past, providing information of a really practical value to collectors and students. Particular attention has been paid to the illustrations, which are both numerous and of the highest quality, and include both monochromes and subjects in colour. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net each. By post, 8s.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. PITCAIRN KNOWLES.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By FREDERICK FENN.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. KENDRICK.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By PERCY SAW.

OLD PEWTER. By MALCOLM BELL.

FRENCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By HENRI FRANTZ.

The GUARDIAN says:

"Messrs. Newnes' books are all produced with singular taste."

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED,

3-12 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office:

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office:

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1799

OCTOBER 27, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SWINEY LECTURES ON GEOLOGY. 1906.

Under the Direction of the TRUSTEES of the BRITISH MUSEUM.

A COURSE of Twelve Lectures on "The Geological History of the European Fauna," will be delivered by R. F. Scharff, B.Sc., Ph.D., F.L.S., in the Lecture Theatre of the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington (by permission of the Board of Education), on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 6 P.M., beginning Monday, November 5, and ending Friday, November 30. Each Lecture will be illustrated by means of Lantern Slides and Lime Light. Admission to the Course, Free. Entrance from Exhibition Road.

By order of the Trustees,
E. RAY LANKESTER,
Director.

British Museum (Natural History),
Cromwell Road, London, S.W.

Appointments Vacant

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION. FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

EXAMINERS in the Exchequer and Audit Department (18-20) November 1.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

GREAT MALVERN SCHOOL OF ART

HEAD MASTER required, duties to commence in January next. Commencing Salary £120 per annum. Teaching in Schools permitted. Applications, with particulars of qualifications and with sealed testimonials, to be sent on or before November 13 to

Mrs. JACOB (Hon. Sec.),
St. Helens,

Great Malvern,
from whom a Prospectus of the School may be obtained.

VACANCY for young GENTLEWOMAN in Miss Ethel Christian's Typewriting Establishment (warmly commended by the Leading Writers of the day). NO PREMIUM. Thorough instruction in Shorthand, Typewriting and Secretarial duties. Salary or Engagement at end of Tuition Course.—Write, ETHEL CHRISTIAN, 36, 37, 38 Southampton Street, Strand.

MR. ROBERT SUTTON,
Publisher,

HAVING Special Facilities for the Production of Scientific, Educational, Theological, Technical, Biographical, and Art Works

Is prepared to arrange for the issue of same, in a tasteful style, and at most reasonable cost.

Books illustrated by the "Suttonelle" Glas Print, specimen of which will be sent to applicants. MSS. carefully read. Estimates of costs supplied. Accounts verified by a Chartered Accountant's Certificate.

43 The Exchange,
Southwark Street, S.E.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

HORACE WALPOLE'S LETTERS,
edited by Cunningham, 66 steel-engraved Portraits, 9 vols, 8vo, cloth, gilt, published £10 10s., for £2 10s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTABRIGIA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Books Wanted

CONTARINI Fleming, first edition, 4 vols, 1834
Cooke (Colonel) On Fox Hunting, 1826
Copie of a letter sent to Don B. Mendoza, on the State of England, relating to the Spanish Armada, 1588, small 4to
Corser (T.) Collectanea-Anglo-Poetica, 4to, 1860-83
Cortes (H.) Conquest of West Indies, 4to, 1596
Coryat's Crudities, 1611
Costumes of the Clans of the Scottish Highlanders, 2 vols, 1845
Costumes, Works on Costumes, Books of Cotgrave's Wit: Interpreter, 1671
Cotton, Compleat Angler, 1676
Cowper (W.) Poems, 1782
The Task, 1785
Cox (D.) Landscape Painting
Cox (D.) Memoir of, by Solly
Cracks of the Day, 1841
Crealock (Lieut.) Deer Stalking in the Highlands, 1892
Creighton's Papacy during Reformation, 5 vols, 1882-94
Cricket, any Prints relating to, plain or coloured Cricketers, any Prints, Portraits, etc., of Crompton's Pterides, or Muses Mount, 1658
Cromwell, a Prize Poem, Oxford, 1843
Crowe and Cavalcaselle, History of Painting, 3 vols, 1864-66
Crowe and Cavalcaselle, History of Painting, N. Italy, 2 vols, 8vo, 1871
Crowe (E.) History of France, 5 vols, 1858-68
Crowquill (A.) An Holiday Grammar, 1825

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.O.

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHOR (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

TO AUTHORS.—Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD's Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION (Incorporated), Sir C. HUBERT H. PARRY, Bart., President. Founded in 1874 for the Investigation and Discussion of Subjects connected with the History, Art, and Science of Music.—Particulars of the Secretary, J. PERCY BAKER, Mus.B., 12 Longley Road, Tooting Graveney, S.W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST

OF
NEW AND RECENT BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES GODFREY LELAND ("Hans Breitmann.")

By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL.
Two vols. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE KING OF COURT POETS.

A Study of the Life, Work and Times of Lodovico Ariosto

By EDMUND GARDNER,
Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc.
With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Being his Correspondence with Tobias Lear and
the latter's Diary.

Illustrated with Rare Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

VICTORIAN NOVELISTS.

By LEWIS MELVILLE,
Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray."
Illustrated with Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE CRACKLING OF THORNS.

By DUM DUM,
Author of "Rhymes of the East," "In the Hills."
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A new volume of Parodies and Humorous Verse by a popular and frequent contributor to PUNCH.

A GERMAN POMPADOUR.

By MARIE HAY. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.

"This is a notable piece of work. There is distinction in the style, and the writer shows evident familiarity with the period and place involved."—
ATHENÆUM.

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE.

By STEPHEN LEACOCK, B.A., Ph.D.,
Associate Professor of Political Science McGill University, Montreal.
Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

TIME AND CLOCKS:

A Description of Ancient and Modern Methods of Measuring Time.

By H. H. OUNYNGHAME, O.B.

With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

WILLIAM STUBBS, Bishop of Oxford, 1825-1901.

From the Letters of William Stubbs.

By WILLIAM HOLDEN HUTTON, B.D.

With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

ECCLESIASTES IN THE METRE OF OMAR

With an Introductory Essay on Ecclesiastes and the Rubaiyat

By WILLIAM BYRON FORBUSH. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

QUINTIN HOGG. A Biography by ETHEL HOGG.

With a Preface by the DUKE OF ARGYLL. Popular Edition, with Portrait and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

GEORGE MEREDITH.

The Meredith Pocket Book. Selections from the Prose Writings arranged by G. M. T. 32mo, limp leather,
2s. 6d. net.

The Poetry and Philosophy of George
Meredith. By G. M. TREVELYAN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THREE NEW NOVELS.

1. GROWTH.

By GRAHAM TRAVERS, Author of "Mona Maclean."

2. HOLYLAND.

By GUSTAV FRENSEN, Author of "Jörn Uhl."

3. THE INCOMPLETE AMORIST.

By E. NESBIT, Author of "The Red House."

Constable's Monthly Book List sent regularly, post free, on application.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LIMITED.
16 James Street, Haymarket, S.W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

NEW BOOKS.

PUCK OF POOK'S HILL

Illustrated,
6s.

BY

RUDYARD KIPLING.

CONCLUDING VOL. NOW READY.

HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND, 1846 to 1895.

BY HERBERT PAUL.

Vol. V., 1885 to 1895. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

*. * Previously published, Vols. I.-IV., 8s. 6d. net each.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

MEMORIES AND THOUGHTS.

MEN—BOOKS—CITIES—ART.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN.

With Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON.

New Edition in 3 vols. Illustrated. 8vo, 31s 6d. net. [Tuesday.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 100 copies, £3 3s. net.

RONSARD & LA PLEIADE.

With Selections from their Poetry and some Translations in the Original Metres.

BY GEORGE WYNDHAM.

Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SILVERLEAF AND OAK.

A Volume of Poems.

BY LANCE FALLAW.

Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

CRANFORD SERIES.—New vol.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE.

BY GEORGE ELIOT.

With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, sixteen of which are reproduced in colour. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SCHOLAR-GYPSY & THYRSIS.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

With Illustrations by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH LITERATURE FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO CHAUCER.

BY WILLIAM HENRY SONOFIELD, Ph.D.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PLAYRIGHT AND COPYRIGHT IN ALL COUNTRIES.

SHOWING HOW TO PROTECT A PLAY OR A BOOK
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

By WILLIAM MORRIS OOLLES, B.A., and HAROLD HARDY, B.A., Barristers-at-Law.

8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	411	Nugæ Scriptoris :
Literature :		VI. How to utilise our Cathedrals profitably	418
Lady Dorothy Nevill	413	A Literary Causerie :
H. A. J. M.	413	Gospel and Wonder-tale	420
The Eighteenth-Century Stage	415	Fiction	421
The other Farmer George	416	Drama :
Purple and Fine Linen	417	"The Charity that began at Home" at the Court Theatre	422
English Historians	417	Fine Art :
All Souls' Eve	418	Mr. Rich's Water-Colours	423
Hallowmas	418	Forthcoming Books	424
Lines found in a Woodman's Cottage	418	Correspondence	424
		Books Received	428

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It is difficult to tell whether Mr. Stead's latest publication is an advertisement or the description of a philanthropic scheme. "A plea for the revival of reading" is a pamphlet of exactly one hundred pages, describing a plan by which a "book-university," or a "library for the million," is to find a place in every home. One hundred thousand sets of one hundred and twenty volumes are required to be guaranteed at a cost of thirty shillings per set. The collector, or canvasser, or distributor as the case may be, will be at liberty to use the half of the purchase-price of the sets for which he obtains orders "to enable the local reading centres, Sunday schools, literary societies, etc., to fill their treasuries, besides conferring an inestimable benefit upon their subscribers."

"It may seem a gigantic undertaking to propose to sell twelve million 3d. books in the next thirty months, and it seems, perhaps, even more impossible to do so on terms which will have the effect of endowing local literary and educational institutions with a sum of £35,000, or £75,000 if paid in advance." This reads very well, but there are two things Mr. Stead appears to have forgotten: one, that the number of public libraries is rapidly increasing (in fact it is not until far on in the pamphlet that any important mention of the work of the public library is made at all), and that already the sum spent annually on books by them is something between £200,000 and £300,000, probably nearer the latter sum than the former: two, that threepenny series have been published before.

Mr. Henry Newbolt is to be congratulated on hitting upon a new idea in "The Old Country," which he has just published. In due course it will be reviewed in our columns, but in the meantime we may give a key to the structure by saying that the motto of the book is a passage from Sir Thomas Browne beginning: "In Eternity there is no distinction of Tenses. And in this sense, I say, the World was before the Creation, and at an end before it had a beginning; and thus was I dead before I was alive: though my grave be England, my dying-place was Paradise."

Mr. Newbolt has given this a very literal interpretation: by mingling the people of the fourteenth and twentieth centuries. An additional clue to his method will be found in the following scraps of verse:

Yet had it chanced, while there he dreamed,
Far otherwise than as he deemed;
For while he numbered three swift nights
Within that palace of delights,
Three hundred years had passed on earth,
And in the country of his birth
Dead was his king, his own folk dead,
Yea, all his lineage lapped in lead,

And all the cities he had known
Ruined by time and overthrown.

So on the third day unafraid
To his dear love he came and prayed
That homeward now he might be sped,
With boar and hound, as she had said,
But she made answer, "Have thy will,
Yet vain is this thy longing still,
For while with us three days have shone,
Three hundred years on earth are gone,
Thy king is long in darkness thrust,
And all thy kindred dust in dust.
Seek where thou wilt in that dim land,
There shall not come beneath thy hand
One man so old that he may know
The names thou lovedst long ago."

The dedicatory epistle to the Right Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, D.D., Lord Bishop of Stepney, is a suggestive dissertation on the principles employed by Mr. Newbolt in his work.

"Toby, M.P." has found a theme to his mind in the new number of the Cornhill, where he writes on "Bulls in the (Westminster) China Shop." He quotes a great many, and it is difficult to select the best of them. Something might be urged in favour of Mr. Stanley Wilson who said: "We managed by a short head gentlemen, to dam the flowing tide," and this one is a delightful Hibernianism: "That, gentlemen, is the marrow of the Education Act, and it will not be taken out by Dr. Clifford or anybody else. It is founded on a granite foundation, and it speaks in a voice not to be drowned by sectarian clamour." Mr. Lucy himself is of the opinion that nothing can beat Sir William Hart-Dyke's lapse into mixed metaphor. "The right hon. gentleman," he said, referring to "Jemmy" Lowther, "has certainly gone to the top of the tree and has caught a very large fish."

The preface to the new catalogue of the Royal United Service Institution gives some interesting details. The Museum was founded by William IV. in 1831. Its first home was Vanbrugh House in Whitehall Yard; a few years later it was moved to the former office of the Board of Works in Inner Scotland Yard, and in 1895 it was transferred to its present building, the banqueting-house of Old Whitehall Palace. The building is a part of the original design by Inigo Jones, of which Horace Walpole said that "the intended Palace of Whitehall, if it had been carried out, would have been the most truly magnificent and beautiful fabric of any of the kind in Europe." The ceiling by Rubens, and the last exit of King Charles I. from the building are too well known to be more than mentioned, but the following story of the building may not be known to all who pass down Whitehall: "When James II., restless and uneasy, was waiting for what he must have felt was at least a possible fate, he ordered a weathercock to be placed where he might see it from his own apartment, that he might learn with his own eye whether the wind was Protestant or Papist. The wind turned Protestant and James took his departure; the weathercock still stands on the end of the Banqueting House." It is curious that the building was from 1837 to 1890 used as the Chapel Royal, though it was never consecrated.

For some years past the "Literary Year Book" has included a list of the libraries of the kingdom. This list, although it was very useful, left much to be desired. Next year's issue, to be published on December 11, promises to be much improved in this respect. The assistance of the Library Association has been obtained, and the returns will be published with their approval. This section of the "Literary Year Book" will give particulars of more than six hundred public libraries in this country in addition to several hundreds of the libraries of learned and scientific societies.

The new enterprise of the Burlington Magazine promises well. The scheme is delightfully simple, and the results excellent. A fortnight after the publication of each month's half-crown Burlington will be issued a Shilling Burlington containing the pick of the articles and illustrations of the parent number. The first (October) number lies before us. Of the four large-type articles in the October Burlington it contains three unabridged and illustrated with precisely the same plates, while the fourth is slightly curtailed, but retains its plate, the beautiful frontispiece of Raphael's Madonna of the Tower. The two small-type articles are curtailed to notes, and there are several notes, in two cases handsomely illustrated, which do not occur in the half-crown edition and are directed more especially to the notice of the modern art-student. The Shilling Burlington is, of course, not so sumptuous a publication as the half-crown edition: its paper is (as a practised eye and hand will discern) of rather poorer quality; its illustrations are printed from plates that have already satisfied the demands of the half-crown public, and it contains forty pages of reading matter and nine full-page plates as against sixty-eight pages and fourteen plates in the parent paper. But the editorial secret of knowing what to leave out has been very skillfully practised; and it is only in quantity that the Shilling Burlington (filia pulchra matris pulchrioris) falls patently short of the magazine which all lovers of art have learned to value.

To photography has fallen the honour of being the first amongst the applied sciences to have a journal all to itself in Esperanto. We have received the first number of the Foto-Revuo Internacia, which is described as a Monata Revuo kun Ilustraroj. Whilst we admit the enterprise of its publisher, Chas. Mendel of Paris, we fail to see what purpose such a journal can serve; for surely photographic literature exists wherever cameras and chemicals are sold; and a photographer would hardly read technical articles in Esperanto when he could read them in his own tongue. Nevertheless, we learn from a foot-note that a large assortment of literary and scientific works already exist in the new language, and if Esperantists become a very numerous body, it might prove that translations into Esperanto will reach at one economical stroke an immense foreign public. The present publication appears to be something of this nature, since it has parallel columns in French and a Photo-Revue already exists. The price for 1 Jare is 5 frankoj.

Photographers will also be glad to have their attention called to the "autumn and lantern number" of the Photographic News (in English), the oldest photograph weekly in the world, which was founded by Sir William Crookes in 1858. The buyer will receive seventy-two good pages for his penny and the illustrations show many of the best things for this autumn's photographic exhibitions.

We are requested to state that Miss Anna Stoddart, author of the life of Mrs. Bishop (Isabella Bird), is not the writer of the articles signed "Lorna" in the British Weekly.

On Tuesday, October 30, the winter book-sales begin with a four days' sale at Messrs. Sotheby's. The first day includes the sale of the collection of London and Provincial Play-Bills formed by Burnham W. Horner and the fourth day the dispersal of a small but rare gathering of Books on Angling collected by the late Mr. J. E. Jones, formerly joint-manager of the British South African Company. The Play-Bills include a chronologically arranged lot relating to Covent Garden Theatre, covering a range of nearly eighty years from 1791, a special collection of bills of the same theatre ranging from 1780 to 1791 and including appearances of Macklin, Miss Farren, S. Kemble, Macready, and Mrs. Inchbald; also the Play-Bill, April 24, 1795, announcing the last appearance of W. Farren. Other lots relate to Garrick in various parts, Madame Vestris, Macklin, Edmund Kean, Helen Faucit, Ellen Tree, J. B. Booth, Mrs. Siddons, the Kembles, Macready, Master Betty and Sir Henry Irving. The Provincial Bills refer to Manchester, Bath, Liverpool, Birmingham, Brighton, Edinburgh and other towns.

On the same day will be sold a complete set from the commencement in 1769 to 1893 of Royal Academy Catalogues, a presentation copy with autograph from the author of the original edition of Alfred Crowquill's St. George and the Dragon with artist's proofs before letters, an Exposition of the Creed, first edition (1659), containing all the passages afterwards suppressed, and many books of general interest.

A very rare book occurs in the second day's sale in Tennyson's Poems, 1830, 1833, Privately Printed (in Canada), 1862. This volume consists of three poems in the volumes of 1830 and 1833 which were not reprinted in subsequent editions. The collection of angling books to be sold on the fourth day runs to one hundred and fifty-two lots, of which perhaps the most remarkable are the many editions of "The Compleat Angler." They begin with not the first (1653)—that is too much to hope for—but a reprint of it with coloured plates, now a scarce book, the first (1750) and seventh of Moses Browne's editions, the first, third, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth editions of that edited by Sir John Hawkins, Major's first and other editions, many editions edited by Sir Harris Nicolas, and an unusually extra-illustrated copy, including plates from Pickering, Hopland, Fisher, the Sporting Magazine, and other books, and with an introduction by Richard Le Gallienne. Other angling books of note are Bainbridge's Fly Fisher's Guide, First edition, 1816; Thomas Best's Art of Angling, 1794; Pickering's Reprint (1827) of Dame Juliana Berners, "Treatyse of Fysshynge wyth an Angle"; The Fresh-water Fishes of Great Britain, by Mrs. T. E. Bowditch, 1828; Boosey's Piscatorial Reminiscences (Pickering, 1835); Brooke's Art of Angling, first edition, 1740; The Gentleman Angler, "by a Gentleman who has made Angling his Diversion upwards of twenty-eight years," first edition, 1726; Hopland's British Angler's Manual, first edition; and The Compleat Sportsman, by Giles Jacob, 1718.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Linnean Society. Thursday, November 1, 8 P.M.—Papers: 1. Sir Dietrich Brandis, The Structure of Bamboo Leaves; 2. Dr. J. G. de Man, On a Collection of Crustacea Decapoda and Stomatopoda, chiefly from the Inland Sea of Japan, with descriptions of new species; 3. Professor A. J. Ewart, on Hectorella caspitosa, Hook. f., with remarks on its systematic position. Exhibitions: 1. The President, Young plaice hatched and reared in captivity; 2. Mr. George Talbot, Abnormal specimens of Equisetum Telmateia, Ehrh.

Physical Society of London. Friday, October 26, 5 P.M.—Agenda: 1. Mr. W. A. Scoble, The strength and behaviour of ductile materials under combined stress; 2. Mr. J. M. Baldwin, The behaviour of iron small periodic magnetising forces (communicated by Professor Trouton); 3. Professor R. W. Wood, Fluorescence and magnetic rotation spectra of sodium vapour, and their analysis.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. November 8.—Sale of the books, pictures, letters, prints, playbills, etc., of the late J. L. Toole. October 30 to November 2. Sale of books and MSS. comprising the library of books on angling of the late J. F. Jones; the playbills of Mr. Burnham W. Horner, etc. November 5 and 6. Books and MSS. (illustrated and others) of the late C. J. Spence. November 7. English gold and silver coins and medals of the late W. W. Wootten. November 10. Early printed and rare books and MSS. (illustrated and others) from the Mollington Hall Library formed by the late Canon G. B. Blomfield.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson. October 26.—Sale of china, furniture, miniatures, clocks, lace, etc., the property of the late Captain Reinecker and others.

Plays: Royal Court Theatre, Man and Superman, October 29 at 8.15. English Drama Society: Dekker and Ford's The Sun's Darling, Queen's Gate Hall, October 31. Royalty Theatre: Maeterlinck's Pelleas and Melisande, November 1, evening, and November 2, afternoon. Melisande, Lady Vivian; Pelleas, Mr. Frank Lascelles.

Concerts.—Queen's Hall: First Chappell Ballad Concert, October 27, 3 P.M. Robert Newman's annual concert (Wagner programme), November 7, at 8 P.M. Aeolian Hall: Lionel Tertis and York Bowen, October 30, at 8.30 P.M. Ernest Newlandsmith: Lecture and Piano-forte Concert, November 1, 3.30.

LITERATURE

LADY DOROTHY NEVILL

The Reminiscences of Lady Dorothy Nevill. Edited by her son RALPH NEVILL. (Arnold, 15s. net.)

THERE are few living people who are better qualified to hold the mirror up to the society of their time than is Lady Dorothy Nevill. She has lived in the centre of it since the youth of many conspicuous characters who have now passed away. Her memory goes back to the 'thirties and 'forties, when England, or at least that part of Norfolk with which she is most familiar, was a merrier England than it is to-day. When in town, she came into contact with Samuel Rogers, Lady Blessington, Count D'Orsay, Prince Louis Napoleon, and Mr. Elliott Warburton, the author of "The Crescent and the Cross." In the season in which she came out, she records that she went to "fifty balls, sixty parties, about thirty dinners, and twenty-five breakfasts." As a child she once breakfasted with old Lord Hertford, Thackeray's Lord Steyne, the incident she remembers most vividly being that a cow was "milked into a superb pail, the milk providing a sillabub for the guests." At that time Vauxhall and Cremorne were still the fashionable resorts that they are represented to be in "Vanity Fair." Lady Dorothy was married in 1847 to her cousin, Reginald Nevill, and spent her honeymoon at Burnham Thorpe in the house once inhabited by the great and immortal Nelson. Her husband was fond of coaching and was associated with her father in the ownership of race-horses. He also combined the somewhat opposite tastes of collecting and farming. The London home of the married couple was in Upper Grosvenor Street, where they had Mr. Disraeli as their neighbour. They bought an estate on the borders of Hampshire and Lady Dorothy's vivacious accounts of shooting and other parties in her youth are as full of charm as her memories of town society. What she says about the latter has a peculiar interest. Society itself has undergone a revolution in her time. Its boundaries used to be strictly defined, and it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that all who were members of society in those days knew one another. To-day there are worlds within worlds, smart sets, racing sets, art sets, and even business sets, for the old exclusiveness has gone away, probably never to return. The self-made man of the mid-Victorian period had to plot to receive invitations; now he is overwhelmed by them. Any peculiarities that might have clung to him during his climb upwards from the end of the ladder would have been observed by the gay and fanciful spirits who led society then. Now they are not only tolerated but almost regarded as distinctions. Lady Dorothy Nevill is probably right in saying that on the whole society to-day is somewhat duller than it used to be. Cræsus does not unite to his other gifts the faculty of conversation. Mr. Bernal Osborne would be out of place in it to-day. Lady Dorothy rather maliciously suggests that the business man is somewhat too dull to bring clever conversation. He is afraid of being made a butt. The members of the society of her early days "had no ulterior object beyond intelligent, cultured and dignified enjoyment," but society to-day is "on the make." She says:

It is, I think, a good deal owing to the preponderance of the commercial element in Society that conversation has sunk to its present dull level of conventional chatter. The commercial class has always mistrusted verbal brilliancy and wit, deeming such qualities, perhaps with some justice, frivolous and unprofitable. The old leisured aristocracy of the past delighted in gathering together people of conversational power, and for this reason alone certain individuals whose sole credentials were their wit and mental cultivation were accorded a place in Society. There were several such men, of whose origin nothing was known or asked, whose claim to social consideration lay in cultivated and well-stored brains—these were welcomed without demur. A brilliant conversationalist enjoyed special privileges, and when he talked other people were content to listen. Now people do not talk: they chatter.

All this is very much to the point, and the moral is driven home by many clever descriptions of the wits of old time. It is somewhat difficult to give adequate examples of the witty stories with which this book abounds, but here is an excellent one of Abraham Hayward of Quarterly Review fame, whose irritating trick of misquoting in French is well known:

On one occasion, for instance, for some reason of his own, anxious to impress his hearers with a sense of his personal importance, he sought to do so through the medium of the accepted French saying, "Je ne suis pas la rose, mais j'ai vécu près d'elle." Unfortunately, however, he stumbled upon the word "avec" instead of "près," without suspicion of the solecism he had committed and the entirely changed meaning of the phrase, and was, in consequence, summarily annihilated by the sarcasm, "Well, if you have, it isn't manners to say so."

Many amusing anecdotes are told of "the old Duke" at Strathfieldsaye. Luckily his ways were known, and what would have been rudeness in another was interesting in himself. Here, for instance, is a characteristic story about Irving:

The carriage had been at the door for two or three minutes, whilst Mr. Irving was lingering over lunch, when at last he said to the Duke: "Well, I suppose I ought to be off now, though there is still plenty of time."

To which the answer was; "Mr. Irving, the day is hot—the horses not yours—you had better go."

He used to go about dressed in an old felt hat and an aged cloak of the sort once known as a "roquelaure," and this combined with his goggles made him a figure of a very noticeable and eccentric kind. There is a good story of his going once with Lady Dorothy to the Crystal Palace, where a donkey show was being held:

On our arrival there nothing would prevent him from walking on the especial piece of ground marked out "For Judges Only." At first I accompanied him in this illegal perambulation, but, seeing a good deal of whispering and flutter amongst the officials, I told him that we really had no right to be there, and had better withdraw before we were ordered off. The old Duke, however, would not listen to me, saying it was all nonsense, and that for his own part he should remain where he was; if I was afraid, I had better leave him and see what would happen, and accordingly I abandoned the sacred spot, amidst his bitter taunts of cowardice. He continued to stroll about as before, when presently an official approached him and said: "Sir, may I ask, are you a judge?" "A judge of what?" thundered the Duke. "Of donkeys," came the reply. "Certainly I am, and" (looking hard at the man) "a very good one too; leave me alone." Very much abashed, the man slunk back to his fellows, and another consultation ensued. Eventually someone recognised the identity of the eccentric stranger, who, indeed, presented a figure, once seen, difficult to forget, and the committee of management sent to him to say that they would esteem it an honour if he would consent to act as one of the judges.

At the end of the publishing season these reminiscences will probably be described as the liveliest volume that it has produced. It is crammed with good things from beginning to end.

H. A. J. M.

Translations into Greek and Latin Verse. By H. A. J. MUNRO. (Arnold, 5s. net.)

SHREWSBURY, to adapt a simile of Cicero's is like the Trojan Horse, from which issued meri principes. Perhaps the most outstanding figure of all the meri principes—from that admirable scholar and composer Dr. Benjamin Hall Kennedy to the most recent among Salopian versifiers, Mr. Archer-Hind, whose delightful volume has been recently reviewed by us—is the illustrious H. A. J. M., a name known to every reader of the Sabrinæ Corolla as that of a prince of composers. I myself, while still an undergraduate, knew by heart all Munro's verses in the Sabrinæ Corolla, Folia Silvulæ and Greek Verses of Shrewsbury School, and in later life, when I had attained to the honour of his acquaintance, received from him versions from time to time. It was, he told me in a letter, my intense admiration of his version of "To be or not to be" in Lucretian hexameters which set him on rendering the same piece in Greek iambs. Both of these admirable translations adorn the present volume. I think my favourite pieces were these two, "Chevy Chase" in Greek hexameters, Tennyson's "Fill the cup" in Latin Sapphics, the same poet's "For I dipt into the future" in Latin Alcaics, and all his noble Latin and Greek hexameters, to which are added many as great in the recently published collection. His Greek hexameters never violate the rule forbidding the trochaic caesura in the fourth foot, a rule often neglected by modern composers. Indeed, it was Munro who first enounced the law to British scholars and emended some passages in which it was violated. One of the prettiest of such corrections was by the brilliant Ahrens, who in Theocr. 18.15 for κῆρ ἔτος ἐξ ἔτους Μενέλαε, τὰ δ' ἄνδρ' ἄδε read by a brilliant emendation Μενέλα, τὰ δ' ἄνδρ' ἄδε. May I digress further to remark that from this Idyll Tennyson took one of his charming adaptations from his favourite Greek poet? In ποσει περιπλέκτοισ we have the source of Tennyson's charm

Of woven faces and of waving hands.

This may have been observed before, but I have not met any notice of it. The other best known loans are "softer than sleep" in "The Palace of Art" and the simile in which the muscles of the sleeping Geraint are likened to the smooth firm pebbles under the waters of a clear-flowing book (Theocr. 22, 48-50).

A new and delightful feature in this book is the occasional use of the rapturous metre of Catullus's "nuptial poem," a measure rarely essayed by modern composers. I give an example of it from the Song of Deborah (Judges v.):

The mother of Sisera looked out at a window and cried through the lattice
"why is his chariot so long in coming, why tarry the wheels of his chariot?"

Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself.

"Have they not sped,
have they not divided the spoil?
to every man a damsel or two,
to Sisera a prey of divers colours,
a prey of divers colours of needle-work,
of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, meet for the necks
of them that take the spoil."

So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord;
but let them that love him
be as the sun
when he goeth forth in his might.

Siseraia ab aedibus mater exseruit caput per fenestram ita clamitans cur morantur equi diu?
cur rotæ retinentur?

Tum catae comites, sibi que ipsa talia reddidit
nonne res bene cesserit, praeda contigerit, duae
cuique treve puellae?

Praeda praeterea duci,
mille praeda coloribus,
picta vestis et hinc et hinc utilis spoliantium colla concederare.

Sic, Deus, pereat tibi quisquis invidiosus est, quique te bene diligunt
floreant quasi vi sua
Sol ut incipit ire.

Here is another example of this soaring measure, so apt for invocation. It is from Milton's Penseroso (31) and is very difficult:

Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain
Flowing with majestick train,
And sable stole of cypress lawn
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted state,
With even step and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes.
There held in holy fashion still Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad leaden downward cast
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
And bring with thee calm Peace and Quiet,
Spare Fast that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses in a ring
Aye round about Jove's altar sing.

Huc, Vestalis, ades, pio
corde seria cogitans,
casta sobria pervicax,
os severa, nigerrimo
palla operta colore.

Ista nobilis instita fluctuante superbiat,
Cypriaeque umeros tibi
pulla rica coerceat
sindonis padibundos.

Perge, sed solito statu,
sed pari pede prodeas, os gerens meditantis et colloquuntia cum polo vulta, plena animae vi.

Tota mens ibi sit, sacroque illigata furore, fi
marmor inscia: mox humum fixa lumine plumbeo tristis intusare.

Paxque blanda, Quies, simulque
Abinentia eat tenax, caelitem hospita quae frequens audit Aonidum choros psallere ad Iovis aram.

Here we observe the passionate admiration which the great scholar had for the Republican poets with their magnificent strength sometimes even approaching harshness. When he writes elegiacs we hear Catullus rather than Ovid. We have elisions in the last half of the pentameter which Ovid would have deemed more flagitious than the crime to which he owed his exile. We are, however, often compensated by a bold vigour of which Ovid would be incapable:

Afterwits are dearly bought,
let thy forewit guide thy thought.

Stat magno bona mens Epimetheos empta: fac erge arte Promethea tu tua corda regas.

Let not ambition mock their useful toil, their homely joys and destiny obscure,
nor graudeus hear with a disdainful smile
the short and simple annals of the poor.

Nam bonus iste labor nec rustica gaudia nec sit obscura haec tibi sors, ambitiose, iocua, nec risu, trabeate, tuo plebeia superbo
Acta, breve et simplex, excipiantur, opus.

Far from smooth though these elegiacs are, they are vigorous and they are Latin, but the same can hardly be said for the version in the first edition of Arundines Cami, which had for the last line pauperis historiam, sit brevis illa, domi.

This view of the rude strength of Munro's Elegiacs is beautifully put by that master of hexameters, the late Canon Evans of Durham, in a letter to Munro, of which I cannot forbear quoting a few verses. They are given by Mr. Duff in his interesting Preface:

Per vestigia vatis
Paligni minus isse reor te, maxime Munro, quam signasse novum sermonem . . .
Si qui forte satus Romana gente fuisset
Aeschylus, atque elegos voluisset adire Latinos, talem crediderim scripturum carmina vatem haud aliena tuis, qui stant quasi marmore versus et similes solido structis adamante columnis.

Such were the letters which scholars used to write to each other a generation ago.

The fact is, Gray's Elegy should not be rendered in elegiacs but in hexameters. It is a solemn, grave, reflective poem quite alien from the fluent lightness and easy grace of elegiac verse. Moreover, Munro's version of the Elegy suffers from a defect common to Shrewsbury men. In the anxiety to achieve exact verbal correspondence, they sometimes sacrifice the spirit to the letter: ruris parvus erus does not mean "the little tyrant of his fields" but "a small owner of a farm." The very same weapon may be brought to bear on Munro which he launched at Wakefield's version of

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Wakefield's version was

In tumuli fauces ducit honoris iter, which, as Munro pointed out, is capable of but one meaning,

The path of a public office leads to the gorge of a hillock.

Again, when in the tenth line the owl complains to the moon of intruders, the phrase rusticitatis agit, "charges with rudeness," introduces a very alien image of an action at law, and is hardly justified by Locr. iii. 963 εὖρε . . . ἀγῶν, "rightly would she bring her charge."

The same adherence to the letter has marred a fine rendering from Macbeth on p. 34 where he translates to the last syllable of recorded time χρόνου γραφέντος συλλαβὴν ἐς ὑστάτην.

Now this is not Greek, unless γράφειν χρόνον means "to record time." In the same piece μῶρος is not the word for an idiot in it [life] is a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing.

That adjective is applicable to a dull, sluggish, stupid animal person, who would not be full of sound and fury. There is an expression in a somewhat similar passage in Euripides (Troad. 1205) which seems exactly suitable. It is ἑμπεληκτος ὡς ἄνθρωπος, and refers to the wild gestures of a maniac.

Hence, though, as I have already said, Salopians have produced some of the finest translations into Greek and Latin verse ever published, we do not meet happy to uns de force, which in neglecting the letter to some extent perfectly preserve the spirit, such as Jebb's δνειρον εἶδον ὃ τί καὶ θεοῦ προσήν for

I had a dream which was not all a dream, or another composer's

"fert unus et alter
talìa dona dicit" Parthis mendacior addo, for a line in Goldsmith's Haunch of Venison,

I get these things often—but that was a bounce.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY STAGE

Garrick and his Circle. By Mrs. CLEMENT PARSONS. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)

The Annals of Covent Garden Theatre from 1732 to 1897. By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus, 21s. net.)

Occasional Papers: Dramatic and Historical. By H. B. IRVING. (Bickers, 3s. 6d.)

HERE are three very different books. Mrs. Parsons's forms one of what seems to be growing into a series of biographies paying special attention to the contemporary setting of the main figure. Mr. Irving's volume starts off with the lectures on the English stage in the eighteenth century which he delivered before the Royal Institution; Mr. Saxe Wyndham is a patient, indeed, a humble chronicler, who has got together his facts carefully and thoroughly into a form which will make his book valuable for purposes of reference. It is the fault of an uninteresting subject (for the history of Covent Garden Theatre has been strangely uninteresting) rather than of the author that makes this book a little unattractive to the reader. Between Mrs. Parsons and Mr. Irving there is all the difference in the world. The author of "Garrick and his Circle" has realised that you cannot write about such a person as little Davy and his friends in any high-falutin', monumental style. You must be light and sprightly; and she is light and sprightly. She has written a very charming and entertaining book, which clothes wide learning in graceful though transparent chiffon. The pity is that she has not always—or not often—distinguished between lightness of the right and the wrong kinds. "Oh, Pip, Pip," said Mrs. Gadsby to her husband, "How much of you is a solemn, married man, and how much a horrid, slangy schoolboy?" We feel inclined to say to Mrs. Parsons: "Oh madam, how much of you is a witty, learned lady, and how much a horrid, slangy schoolboy?" Mr. Irving, on the other hand—frock-coated lecturer before a solemn audience; champion of the art he worthily loves and finely practises—is very serious and grave. His style tends a little to the pompous and turgid; he is very much in earnest—in the Royal Institution lectures and others of these papers—in his championship of a profession which he believes to be still the object of much injustice and unfair prejudice. Is it? Not more now, we think, than other artistic professions. If it is attacked or sneered at by people of supposed culture, who—like Mr. Birrell—ought to know better, the attacks and sneers are mainly reaction from the excessive adulation of the foolish. Besides, it annoys us all to see a hundred actors' portraits in a shop-window, and not one of ourselves, and we go away and write bad-tempered things. It annoyed Dr. Johnson to find Davy so much richer and more popular than himself, and he said bad-tempered things. Besides, the world will always contain many Tolstoys, Johnsons and Stigginses—men whom either total ignorance of the drama or a total lack of the power of making-believe renders potential enemies of the actor and his art.

We are accustomed to imagine that only since the coming of the Bancrofts and Sir Henry Irving have actors enjoyed that social position and repute which they now enjoy to the annoyance of the jealous. It is clear that such a view is mistaken. Garrick moved in higher "circles" than even Sir Henry Irving; the eighteenth century was the age in which the adulation of the actor was carried to a higher pitch than it had reached before, or has reached since. That players were ever a despised class—outside the official attitude and the prejudice of Puritans—we doubt. The public grief at the death of Richard Burbage was almost as great as that at Garrick's; there were scores of tributes to Betterton which show him valued not only as actor but also as man. To be successful, in fact, was, as in all other walks of life, to be socially successful. In the eighteenth century it was to be immensely successful. Many actors, then as now, started fair. Garrick's father may have been "a poor half-pay captain"; but half-pay captains have a way of holding themselves to be gentlemen.

Wilks was grandson of a judge [we are quoting Mr. Irving], and gave up a lucrative post in the War Office at Dublin to become an actor; [Barton] Booth was the son of a country gentleman, related to the Earls of Warrington; and Mrs. Oldfield, the daughter of a captain in the Army. Cibber, Quin, Garrick, Foote, Macklin, Henderson, Mrs. Barry and Mrs. Clive all came of what we may call respectable antecedents.

Peg Woffington was the daughter of a bricklayer and cried halfpenny salads on College Green, and Mrs. Siddons was "born on the stage"; but the balance is strongly in favour of that respectable descent, the supposed lack of which is sometimes held to be a reproach to the actor's character and sometimes a guarantee of good acting, according to the mood of the scoffer.

The eighteenth century, says Mr. Irving, "is, in theatrical history, the century of the actor." The reason why is worth looking into. Some day the philosophic historian of the stage, who will make the proper use of valuable books like Mr. Saxe Wyndham's, will come and explain this, among a thousand other things that need explanation. It is Mr. Irving who makes the point that the actor came to the fore because the plays he acted were so dull. To-day we cannot read, we could not endure to see acted, the interminable tragedies that were the staple fare of those times. Any genuine inspiration which the Restoration drama may have drawn from the continental classicism had died out; but the theory remained. In a formal age, these formal things were valued. The "right conduct" of the plot, "just" sentiments, "correct" verse—these were the things that were demanded. There was a pattern, and the playwrights followed it, slipping further and further from any study of life as it is, under the shadow of the heroics that old John Dryden and his fellows had imported many years before. But yet they had not arrived at the idea of an intellectual content—an idea—for a play. It was a purely emotional affair, addressed to the "sentiments." And since in reproducing over and over again the same formula there is no chance for emotion, it had to be supplied by the actor. It was, as Mrs. Parsons does not neglect to observe, an emotional age, an age in which tears and strong drink were closely allied and both in high favour; and they liked their emotion thick and strong. They liked it even in their comedy. The post-Cibber "reform" of the drama meant the substitution, by Steele and his more lacrymose followers, of the sentimental comedy that was as tearful as the tragedy; and though Goldsmith came to show them how to be at once merry and wise, it was long before the lesson was learned. Here was the chance of the Garricks, the Mrs. Barrys, the Booths and the rest. They made the dry bones live. If ever there was a period when, more than at any other, the actor deserved the name of creative artist, it was the eighteenth century. He took the skeleton and made it a man, filled it with life and feeling, and by his own tears drew the tears of an adoring audience. When he could stand no more of it, he revived a play of Shakespeare or an old comedy. But the point of view of the audience remained the same. It was (and very likely for the most part still is) the actor they came to see: Garrick's Lear or Abel Drugger, Booth's Romeo, Mrs. Pritchard's Beatrice; and the most philosophical age in England took its Shakespeare as a chance for its favourite actors or a delightful field for squabbles on textual emendation. The world had changed before the coming of Lamb, and Coleridge, and Hazlitt.

The nineteenth century was the period, as Mr. Irving points out, when the actor rather disappeared behind the scenery. What of the twentieth? We pay more attention to plays now, and less to players—outside the musical comedies, where, as of old, they remain the only creators. Their personal popularity may be less (or it may not); but their task, as it seems to us, is likely to become more difficult with the increasing subtlety of the material they have to interpret. But they will always be quite popular enough to satisfy reasonable beings; and will always have pin-pricks enough to call forth those eloquent defences of their profession and their art, of which Mr. Irving's is one of the best yet written.

THE OTHER FARMER GEORGE

Letters and Recollections of George Washington. (Constable, 12s. 6d.)

At heart Washington was a farmer always, in spite of the fact that as a boy he was very anxious to be a soldier: in practice he was a farmer, with intervals devoted to soldiering and public life. This bulky volume of letters shows him almost entirely as a farmer and illustrates that domestic side of his character very well, although, it must be owned, it contains many letters that are too trivial to be of any interest at all. The majority of the letters were written to Mr. Tobias Lear, who was tutor to Washington's adopted children and afterwards his private secretary for sixteen years and his A.D.C. There are also some miscellaneous letters and a diary of Washington's last days kept by Mr. Lear.

The most noticeable fact about all the letters is the writer's mastery of detail, and it is a fact which shows how hard he must have worked. The calls upon his time and hospitality were many. He wrote in 1797, for example:

Unless some one pops in unexpectedly—Mrs. Washington and myself will do what I believe has not been done within the last twenty years by us—that is to set down to dinner by ourselves.

In spite of this, we find him writing to his secretary on all manner of subjects connected with his estate. The price of blankets, the hire and purchase of servants, the repair of his coach-harness, the Hessian fly in the turnip-seed, wine-coolers and a sick mare, are specimens of what occupied his thoughts. Indeed, his epistles are at times almost Pauline in their variety. If only there were a reference to a coppersmith or a cloak we could easily quote a parallel to the following:

The newly published Pamphlets, pray purchase, and bring with you for me; Mr. Dandridge knows what I already have. Desire Peter Porcupine's Gazette to be sent to me as a Subscriber.

In another letter he writes to thank a correspondent for a pamphlet, but:

being on the point of celebrating Harvest home, I must be allowed, as a Farmer, to make every other matter yield to the accomplishment thereof, that being over, the Pamphlet, I am persuaded will be read with edification and pleasure.

It is curious, however, that the letters contain few political allusions—except rumours of peace or war between France and Great Britain—and no very striking remarks on general subjects. The choice of suitable schools for his children was for some time on his mind, and he makes some shrewd observations on what is necessary in a school. The letters also show Washington to have been a kind and considerate master to his servants, but in this connection there is one letter which contains a paragraph of considerable interest:

If it should be convenient [he wrote], and perfectly safe for you to engage for me, on reasonable terms a complete Black Smith, you would oblige me by doing so. As there are laws in England prohibiting such engagements under severe penalties, and such may exist in other Countries, you will understand me clearly that for no consideration whatsoever would I have you run the risk of encountering them.

Nor was Washington a conservative landowner, for on one occasion we find him anxious about the inland navigation of the Potomac and desirous of hearing the opinion of an engineer who "professes to be particularly well skilled in the application of steam, in propelling Boats (in an easy and cheap manner) against the Stream."

The letters, which were not intended, of course, for publication, are all so straightforward and frank that they are an excellent index to the writer's mind. The only point in them which is open to doubt is one where, in writing to his secretary, he says:

I find another of the Federal Judges (Hopkinson) has by his death occasioned a vacancy in the District of Pennsylvania. As some have and others will unquestionably apply for the appointment, I wish you would use every indirect means in your power to ascertain the public opinion, with respect to the fittest character as a successor to Hopkinson. Pursue the same mode to learn who it is thought would fill the present Auditor's office (as he will be appointed Comptroller) with the greatest ability and integrity.

It would hardly have been thought that Washington cared twopence for public opinion, and the confession brings out an unexpected flaw in his character.

PURPLE AND FINE LINEN

The Heart of England. By EDWARD THOMAS. (Dent, 21s. net.)

THE classical example of Isaak Walton shows that the townsman may widely appreciate country effects that perhaps become a little dim to the rustic through familiarity. We do not know whether Mr. Edward Thomas be city or landward bred, but, as he begins his book with a chapter on leaving town, the inference that he spends some time in London is a fair one. His book bears a resemblance in more than the title-page to another recently published work, but it has a distinguishing feature in the scraps of folk poetry that are brought in. They are chosen with taste and used most appropriately. We take the liberty of quoting one which will probably be new to most of our readers:

Mary come into the field
To work along of I,
Digging up mangold wurzels,
For they be a-growing high,
Dig 'em up by the roots,
Dig 'em up by the roots,
Put in your spade,
Don't be afraid,
Dig 'em up by the roots.

Our master is a hard one,
He pays us very small;
And if we stop a moment
We hear his voice to call—
"Dig 'em up by the roots," etc.

We work all day together,
Till all the light is past;
And only going homewards
Do we join hands at last.
"Dig 'em up by the roots," etc.

For many years we've been sweethearts
And worked the fields along.
And sometimes even now
Mary will sing the old song—
"Dig 'em up by the roots," etc.

The fault of the book is that it is written in a style that is much too affected. Holy simplicity is a virtue to which the author has not attained. We cannot open a page without meeting such phrases as "a rising tide of long, starry herbage," "vast green cumulus clouds with round summits," "receding glooms of blue," and "cool yellow grass. In the Heart of England we imagine that the diction would have been of a homelier description. The rustic never sees "the hot air quiver in crystal ripples like the points of swords." Occasionally we catch just a glimpse of better things in this writer. In his description of a country churchyard, for instance, he tells of a vicar who objected to an inscription attributed to Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. The bereaved person erased the offending words of origin, and until recently you might read:

God rest his soul! He was a merry man, beneath which he put "Kings iii." The following passage is not entirely innocent of the faults to which we have drawn attention, yet speaks of gifts that might be chastened into a sound English style:

Where are the robuster views of which this is a late reminder? The gay, the fanciful, the calmly elaborate epitaphs seem to have gone for ever, and in the newer portion of the churchyard it is hard not to think of death, unless we turn to the unnamed little mounds that rise and fall like summer waters, so calm, so soft, so green, that fancy cannot make them aught save pillows for the weary.

The book is illustrated with pictures in colour which at all events show that the art of colour-printing is still in its infancy. There is one drawing of Northumbrian hinds tossing the farmer when the last load has been led, which is not good in itself, and is, we believe, inaccurate. The custom was for the women workers to toss the master. Here they are calmly looking on.

ENGLISH HISTORIANS

English Historians. By A. J. GRANT. (Blackie, 2s. 6d. net.)

TIME was when a book upon the history of the writing of history might well have appeared, only to lapse into immediate oblivion. In these days, however, when a genuine thirst for historical knowledge and historical accuracy has laid hold upon the great Universities, the widening circle of historians and students of history will doubtless welcome Mr. Grant's interesting and suggestive book as a delightful relaxation from the dusty search through Manorial Rolls and crabbed manuscripts.

The book is in three parts, of which the first is an Introduction. In this Mr. Grant deals with the phases and forms which English historical writing has taken. He maintains the view that the writing of history, as we now understand the word, began in England only in the early half of the eighteenth century, when Bolingbroke, relegated to private life by the failure of his political schemes, took to writing instead of making history—as certain later statesmen have done.

Before the Renaissance, bald chronicle narrative, relieved by bursts of heroic poetry, obtained in historical literature. In the Tudor era, with Roper's "More," and Cavendish's "Wolsey," there is some advance, but Mr. Grant stigmatises these works as still "rambling, uncritical, and anecdotal." The seventeenth century he calls "too busy making history to write it," while he dismisses Clarendon, the greatest historian of the age, as too partisan. With the eighteenth century the unity of history was, according to Mr. Grant, appreciated for the first time.

Part I. gives extracts from Bacon's writings down to Professor Bury's inaugural lecture in 1903, showing various views on the art and use of historical writing.

"Philosophy teaching by experience" is the most frequently quoted definition of history throughout; the views on the use of history are, however, widely different. Hume recommends the study of history particularly to ladies, "those who are debarred the severer studies by the tenderness of their complexion, and the weakness of their education." "History," he goes on, "amuses the fancy as it improves the understanding." The modern claims a more important function for history—to Seeley it is the school of statesmen.

Bolingbroke's views on research are rank heresy to modern ears; he avows "a contempt for the whole business of these learned lives" which are spent in "groping in the dark mazes of Antiquity." Typical of the modern school, Lord Acton sees in the toiling of the researchers the means by which posterity may gain a loftier, truer view of history than we have yet attained.

Part II. is composed of well-chosen quotations to illustrate the history of historiography. It begins with a piece from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, in which King Aelfred's messenger and the appearance of a "long haired star" are jotted down one after the other, as the history of two years of national life, while following on comes the famous song, how:

Eadmund Aetheling life long glory
in battle won,
with edges of swords
at Brunanburh.

Then follow passages from most of the greatest English historians down to Carlyle's French Revolution, that "rhapsodical sermon," and Gardiner's History.

"English Historians" cannot fail to be appreciated by those interested in history as a well-proportioned and scholarly work.

ALL SOULS' EVE

ALL the day Love watched where the ruined roses
Guard the grave of Hope, till the night and darkness
Fell upon him there, and a gracious silence
Sweeter than songs are.

Like a lonely star in the moonless heaven
Love's lamp shone above the ruin of rose-leaves,
Set there lest the feet of the Dead, returning,
Haply should stumble.

All the night Love waited for Hope who came not,
Till the roses shivered at Dawn's caresses,
Till the pale flame, weary of wasted vigil,
Died with the daybreak.

ANGELA GORDON.

HALLOWMAS

OH, the ring of the moon was glowing
When I went hempseed sowing!—
For fain I would be knowing
What lovers' footsteps mean;
And ruddy hung the beeches,
And yellow swung the birches,
Down in the deep glades in the dusk o' Halloween.

The fir tree in the bracken
In its arms would me have taken,
And whispered me to waken;—
But down the dim boreen,
Golden swung the chestnuts,
And redder hung the beeches,
Down in the green lanes in the spell o' Halloween.

Now the ring of the moon is setting,
And fain I'd be forgetting
The doubts, the fears, the fretting,
And be as I have been!—
But greyer gleams the ash tree,
And darker dreams the fir tree,
For ever in the deep glades in the dusk o' Halloween.

ALICE E. GILLINGTON.

LINES FOUND IN A WOODMAN'S COTTAGE

AMONGST THE QUANTOCK HILLS IN 1888, AND SENT FROM BRISTOL BY A CANON, THEN NEWLY IN RESIDENCE *

A MAN there was of woodland fame
His days were many, health seemed good,
I will not mention now his name,
For three score years between us stood.

* They were supposed by the Canon to have been written by a poet who haunted the Quantocks in 1796, and advocated simplicity of diction.

He slept, he dreamed, he waked, he mused,
Yet very seldom ever spake,
From childhood's hours he seemed confused.
Approaching him, I said, "Awake,

"Look up." And soon the old man's eyes
Turned to me, though he looked half-dead.
This gave me such a new surprise,
I spoke to him again. I said,

"Now, William, why upon that stone,
Do you sit here so many hours,
With naught to do, and all alone,
Under the sun, and 'mid the showers?"

"Rise up, old William, rise, I say,
And give your aged limbs a walk,
They need it in a kind of way,
'Twill help you too to wholesome talk."

He waked, he gazed, he turned him round,
To see if any one was near,
Then cast his eyes back to the ground,
And said, "Good sir, I truly fear

"My days on earth are getting few,
My aged limbs are very sore,
And so my words are these to you:
'I cannot do it any more.'"

With that he laid him down again,
And turned him over unto sleep,
As if he were in real pain.
I say, it almost made me weep.

Yet, Sir, I gathered from this man,
To rest contented all the day,
And live just any way we can.
Now, reader, learn from what I say

In all your sorrows be content
To take whatever's old or new.
Be thankful for each blessing sent,
And deem it quite enough for you.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

VI. HOW TO UTILISE OUR CATHEDRALS PROFITABLY

THE previous number in this series of papers was devoted to the use of Church Services to Agnostics. It referred only to worship, to "Common Prayer" and Praise, and the public reading of "Lessons" from the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. No allusion was made to the clamant need of a new or revised Lectinary, adapted not so much to modern as to universal wants; but this is a subject to be afterwards considered. Another one, viz., how to make the most fruitful use of our National Cathedrals, is of equal importance.

The doors of these princely structures stand always open for worshippers to resort to—although they are not made use of for private devotion in Britain so much as they are on the Continent of Europe—and daily there is a double Service in public for all who value it, with sermons on Sundays for those who appreciate them. Even a visit to these great buildings, which express in their construction the religious thought, aspiration, and faith of Christendom, is a privilege that cannot be summed up in words. Especially when the Sphere-born harmonious sisters, Voice and Verse, Wed their divine sounds, and mixed powers employ, the gain even to the casual visitant, is incalculable. Merely to walk in silence reverently along the aisles, to look and listen in silence, is an education of the noblest kind. But surely these buildings—which are a priceless national asset—might be used to profit in ways which they are not now.

It is useless to allude to the kind of sermon at times offered to the listener, discourses which do more harm than good, and detract so much from the gain derivable from the Service, that many worshippers desire to leave the sacred building before the sermon begins. Penance, truly! for educated men and women to be compelled to listen to trivialities, to commonplaces, or to irrelevances which have no sanction higher than the speaker's dream; or to have to take with them a Latin copy of the Book of Common Prayer, or a Greek New Testament, to read as a solace. But what a power might be exerted, what an influence wielded by brief addresses of ten minutes duration by skilful preachers, trained to speak as the great prophets spoke, not as members of a University or clerical caste, but as those "anointed to preach good tidings to the meek, to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound, to comfort all that mourn, to give the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

And why might not some of the laity, as well as the clergy, be empowered thus to teach, and to help their fellow pilgrims of the Infinite? There are hundreds of educated men able to do so, men fitted by their insight and wisdom, by their humility and self-oblivion, to be heralds of the Highest, and by whom their fellow worshippers would be gladly taught. Let the experiment be tried. It has been tried in the Scottish Episcopal Church, where a layman has been licensed to deliver an address at the close of morning Service. Our Bishops can inaugurate it. And why should they not allow the clergy of other denominations, men "of light and leading," to speak betimes within these national Sanctuaries of religious worship? It would not be at the hours of morning or evening Service; and they need not enter the ordinary clerical pulpit. Their fitter place would be at the lectern, where the laity may now read the Lessons for the day. It is the belief of the present writer that such a permission would both widen and deepen the Church's influence; while it would utilise these national structures which for so many hours of each day are now unused, save by the solitary entrant seeking rest in private prayer and meditation.

There may, however, be legal and ecclesiastical difficulties in the way of realising what many think would be a national ideal for Cathedral use and wont, in this matter of lay as well as clerical utterance within their walls. But there can be none in the utilisation of these noble buildings for performances of Sacred Music, of an ampler character than is possible on Sundays. We have in our daily Cathedral music, at matins and vespers, a singularly precious gift; but religious music of a different character might surely be given at other week-day hours, which would not only be an education to the listeners, but an act of worship to them and the performers.

Already some of our Cathedrals are used in this way at distant intervals, as in the case of the Three Choirs Festival of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, when a week is devoted to the performance of oratorios, symphonies, and other kinds of solemn music. But there is much excitement connected with these performances, when distinguished soloists from a distance perform, and new works by our leading musical artists are introduced for the first time. Could it not be arranged, in Cathedral Cities, that, every week of the year, there should be a short musical performance of "things new and old," as a distinctly religious act, not as a concert, but a weekly Hymn of Praise? It might act on the community like a magnet, drawing them to the sacred building and detaining them there, the willing captives of a melody and harmony that they could listen to nowhere else.

Doubtless the performers would require to be paid, although there are hundreds of competent musicians who would perform voluntarily if they were wanted to do so; or—let us say—if they were licensed for the work. The education and the delight of the musically inclined in our Cathedral Cities would thus be continuous; and the casual traveller from far and wide, or the passing stranger from a distance, would come to receive an uplifting influence, and to bless the Church that provided it. It is easy to realise the difference between a hot concert-room at an evening performance—the noise, the excitement, the criticism of new works, as a first-night audience criticises a new play in a theatre—with all the other accompaniments of secular music, and the cool air of the Cathedral, the preceding silence, the refreshment of hearing well-known works well performed or well sung, the refinement of the voices and instruments, the teaching given to the spirits of the listeners, and the serene pleasure of the listening itself. While the eye is appealed to by glorious architecture and by the colour of the cathedral glass, the ear is more easily attuned by the solemn music heard; and there cannot be a doubt that these two conjoined would have an ennobling influence on the character of those who assemble to see and to hear.

Another suggestion is this. Why should not systematic courses of lectures on great religious themes be delivered within our national Cathedrals? Not historical ones (which might lead to controversy), or scientific, or artistic, or philosophical ones—unless they were on Christian Art and Religious Philosophy—but on such subjects as these: "Palestinian Travel," "The Sacred Sites of the Gospels," the "Archæology and Topography of the Holy Land." There is scarcely a chapter in Professor George Adam Smith's "Historical Geography of the Holy Land," which might not have formed part of such a course. The subjects discussed in these short courses of lectures would not touch what lies within the credenda of the Church, as embodied in its creeds; but might deal with problems outside of them, topics belonging to the credibilia. Experiments have already been made in this direction within some of our own Cathedrals, e.g., lectures by laymen on "The Journeyings of St. Paul"; and during Dean Stanley's tenure of his high office at Westminster, he not only arranged special sermons in the nave on Sundays by Nonconformists as well as Churchmen; but on week-days he granted the use of the chapel-house for the delivery of Professor Max Müller's Hibbert Lectures on Comparative Religion. The question is this: Would it not be wise, acceptable, and beneficial if our Deans and Chapters granted permission to wise and prudent men, selected for the purpose, to discourse on great religious themes within the cathedrals precincts on week-days; questions on which they could address their fellow worshippers with intelligence and earnestness, as well as with the authority of experts.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

GOSPEL AND WONDER-TALE

AMONG the early Christians the passion of curiosity in all matters relating to our Lord and the Apostles led to the formation of a large mass of purely imaginative works—the apocryphal Gospels and Acts.

He told it not, or something sealed
The lips of that evangelist, but there were many who were quite willing to tell, and whose lips were far from being discreetly sealed about matters which had been left untold. The demand for information, no doubt, created the supply, and imagination, "that forward faculty," was equal to the occasion. Imagination, indeed, riots in the pages of these mythical Gospels and Acts. A study of these documents shows also, however, that their writers made frequent use of existing wonder-tales, pagan romances, even the incidents and données of Märchen. To these they gave a semi-Christian colouring, and were thus early in the field with an exciting yet presumably edifying story for Sunday reading. On the whole the result was more entrancing than the feeble stuff that used to pass muster in strict homes on dull Sundays.

These apocryphal documents have scarcely yet been studied from this point of view. We commend the task to students of folk-tales and the lovers of literary parables; it is also interesting as a revelation of the method of the early Christian novelist. The amount of matter thus cribbed varies in different documents; in some, like the "Acts of Andrew and Matthias in the City of the Anthropophagi" (recently studied by M. Salomon Reinach), it is considerable. We may take this account as a specimen of the method and of the materials used by the compilers.

When the Apostles were deciding upon the various routes they should follow, it fell to Matthias to visit the city of the Anthropophagi, who ate nothing but men, first bleeding them and giving them a poison which deprived them of reason, then feeding them on grass. All this happened to poor Matthias, but Christ appeared in his prison, restored his sight, and promised deliverance before the day of his fate arrived. Meanwhile Andrew had been commanded by our Lord to deliver Matthias, and next morning found a boat whose captain agreed to carry him to his destination. The captain posed as a disciple and begged the Apostle to recount some of Christ's miracles. One of these is curious. Christ entered into a pagan temple guarded by two sphinxes, one of which He bade arise and bring the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob from their tombs, that the pagans might be convinced of His divine claims. Meanwhile the boat had accomplished the journey in an incredibly short space of time; the apostle fell asleep and the captain bade his men carry him to the gates of the dreaded city. This they did on their wings, for they were angels, and the captain was no other than our Lord Himself. It was now the Apostle's turn to work miracles: the gates opened before him, the warders fell dead; he restored sight to Matthias's fellow prisoners and set them free; he commanded a cloud to come and carry Matthias and his disciples to a distant mountain. The story then goes on to tell how the citizens, deprived of their natural food, resolved to kill the old men of the town. One of these gave up his son and daughter instead, and they were about to be slain when the Apostle caused the knives to drop harmlessly from the hands of the executioners. At this point, while the citizens feared they would die of hunger, the devil in the shape of an old man appeared and bade them seek for a stranger called Andrew. The Apostle was finally discovered, and the people, whose feelings towards him were worse than those of Voltaire towards Habakkuk, maltreated him for three days. But he noticed in his prison a fountain-statue, which he commanded to run with a corrosive fluid until the city was overwhelmed. Further, he desired fire to surround the city that none should escape. The citizens rushed to the prison, prayed to the stranger's god to forgive them; the Apostle stopped the flow of water, forgave all except the old man who had sacrificed his children, commanding the earth to swallow him up, and finally baptized the whole city. The people, we may presume, then adopted a less horrible food.

Several of the incidents of this story can be traced to their probable sources. In another apocryphal Gospel we learn that the city of the Anthropophagi is called Myrne, elsewhere Myrmene or Myrmidona, probably Myrmecion in the Crimea, thinks Gutschmid. Herodotus and other Greek writers describe the cannibalism of Scythian or Russian tribes. There was among them actual ritual cannibalism, and this was, doubtless, duly exaggerated into a traveller's tale of a people who ate nothing but men. Such travellers' tales were soon converted into stories of imaginary voyages with desperate adventures. Among the Celts these voyages were called Immramm, and there was a whole literature of them. In one, the "Voyage of Maoldun," we have an echo of the Gospel incident; the travellers came to an island of ants (myrmidons) which ate men—obviously a misunderstanding of some current story of the city of the Myrmidona. Another such story, that of the cannibal Cyclops, is enshrined by Homer in the Odyssey. But by far the closest parallel is found in the story of Sindbad. The voyager lands with his men on an island of the blacks, who capture them and make them eat a certain herb which deprives them of reason; they then eat whatever is set before them greedily, not aware that they are being fattened for the pot. Sindbad abstains from the drug, as well as from the food which is set before him, exactly as did Matthias. Finally, having been passed over because he is so thin, he escapes from the cannibals' clutches. Similarly, the incident of Mass celebrated on the back of a sea-monster in the mediæval Voyage of S. Brendan and the Life of S. Malo is the equivalent of Sindbad's interrupted meal, and all three have, doubtless, a common source.

The story of Sindbad would probably be put down by folk-lorists of the Bentley school to Indian sources. The probability is that it is composed from current wonder-stories based on travellers' tales, Phœnician, Greek, Egyptian. The episode of the one-eyed cannibal giant and the spit is, of course, that of Odysseus and Polyphemus. For the incident just discussed an Egyptian source may be suggested: there may easily have been current in Alexandria, that officina gentium, tales of cannibal lands from which sailors had made hair-breadth escapes. In effect, one of Maspero's early Egyptian contes describes a shipwrecked sailor's adventures on a strange island inhabited by bearded snakes. And that the Acts of Andrew has some Egyptian connection we see from the miracle performed on the sphinx. Temples with sphinxes were unknown outside Egypt. The presumption is, therefore, that on some story of Egyptian provenance both the Sindbad story and the Gospel are based. But the Gospel has been influenced by Greek ideas about Scythian cannibalism. Part of the adventure—depriving the victims of their reason by means of a drug or potion—was also known to Greek story. It is what Circe did to the companions of Odysseus. Sindbad's friends and the prisoners in Myrne behaved like beasts, eating grass and other unusual things. Circe's victims became beasts in reality, only she did not eat them. Perhaps there was a version of the story in which the enchantress had cannibal tastes. If so, Homer discarded it for one which was less disgusting, and it has now disappeared as a popular tale. Lucian, however, knew or invented a similar incident in his "True History," that of the island of spectral women who first intoxicated their deluded victims and then put them to death.

Other incidents in this Gospel belong equally to the magic atmosphere of Märchen and Wonder-tale. The magical boat which covers vast distances in a short space of time is well known to readers of folk-tales: it is also related to the shoes of swiftness, Houssain's magic carpet, and other such useful properties. Apart from its use in the Gospel, the earliest literary notice of it occurs in Procopius, who tells how the souls of the dead were swiftly conducted across the sea to Britain. He may have learned this from Celtic sagas; at all events, such a magic boat occurs in Celtic tales of an early date, known to us from twelfth-century manuscripts. The mortal hero is invited into the boat by its divine or fairy owner, and is instantly carried to the land of Immortal Youth. Cuchullin was taken thither by the divine Liban, and Connla by an unnamed goddess. The boat in which S. Andrew travelled moved swiftly because the divine Christ was its captain. All such boats were probably, in origin, the vessels of a god, perhaps like the boat of the Sun in which Ra made his daily rounds.

The sphinx-miracle is one which would be quite credible in antiquity and is clearly derived from existing stories of images and statues which wept, made signs, left their pedestals to perform various acts, even to fight for their worshippers. Pausanias and Herodotus tell of many such statues; they were well known in mediæval times, as they were to Buddhists and ancient Peruvians. Exactly similar stories are told in England of megalithic remains, e.g., the Rollright stones, and originally for precisely the same reason. They were held to be animated by the ghost of the dead man buried beneath, as the classical image was occasionally tenanted by the divinity whom it represented. Are instances of self-moving sphinxes and statues known to Egyptologists? Herodotus does not refer to them in his discussion of Egyptian religion and manners. Presumably the convincing part of the miracle was less the speaking and travelling of the sphinx than its production of the bodies of the patriarchs from the field of Mamre. Did the composer of the Gospel suppose they were mummified? If so, this would be another suggestion of its Egyptian origin.

It is not impossible that the statue-fountain with its multiplied waters threatening to overwhelm the town may owe something to an episode in contemporary wonder-tales or Märchen, which originated, in turn, in primitive beliefs concerning wells and the spirits which dwelt in them. It was dangerous to approach them rashly, dangerous even for the priestess of the well to leave it uncovered. To do so roused the anger of the spirit, the waters rose, destroyed the careless ministrant or devotee, and then overwhelmed the surrounding town or country. Celtic saga and folk-tale offer the most numerous instances of this belief and episode, but other examples are known in European folk-lore, as well as in India, South America and Melanesia. The flood of acrid water in the Gospel may owe something to a similar episode in a tale not now known to us; it may, however, have been suggested by the miracle of Moses's striking the stony rock so that the waters gushed out.

A great part of this apocryphal Gospel is thus connected with the incidents of existing tales, to which has been given a Christian colouring. The remainder, leaving out what is due to the imagination and literary skill of the author, is freely borrowed from the Old Testament or from the Gospels and Acts. The deliverance of the apostle from prison, the miraculous cure of blindness, the calling down fire from heaven to surround the city, the earth swallowing up the old man—all will be easily traced to their sources by those who have read, marked and learned.

J. A. MACCULLOCH.

[Next week's Causerie will be "On a Poem by Wordsworth," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

Chippinge. By STANLEY J. WEYMAN. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

INTO a carefully arranged historical background Mr. Weyman weaves the formula of his plot. This plot with slight variants remains the same; the background changes. The hero meets the heroine in the opening pages and after the proper set-backs, which prove the truth of their love, they are united. "Chippinge" deals with the Reform Bills at the beginning of last century, and the riots and disturbances which obtained during their passing. It is written with Mr. Weyman's usual fluency and constructed with the ease of a man who knows his business so well that he no longer needs to think about it. It is wholesome, mediocre work, and will delight Mr. Stanley Weyman's immense number of readers from its first word, which is "Boom," to the last word, which happens also to be "Boom."

Quicksilver and Flame. By ST. JOHN LUCAS. (Arnold, 6s.)

FOR some reason (or the absurd lack of it) romance has so long been fettered to depict dreary muscular heroes, who perform ridiculous exploits in dull little clap-trap kingdoms, that we had almost forgotten that it could be a magnificent means of expressing a resolute attitude towards life. Romance should clothe Truth with fine raiment and adorn that raiment with pearls. "Life," says Lord Basil in this book, "is a heavenly poem, but we are most of us too short-sighted to read it or we have gone to sleep over its grammar and syntax." That is the spirit of the true Romance. And that spirit informs Mr. St. John Lucas's present book, which contains beauty of a high order, both in its writing (he can write good prose) and in its thought. Moreover, it is full of wit and epigram; and the one exception we can take to Mr. St. John Lucas's work is that at times, when he has created a mood of strong emotion, he startles with a witticism which has the effect of a stone on bare feet when one is walking upon soft grass.

Disenchanted (Désenchantées). By PIERRE LOTI. Translated by CLARA BELL. (Macmillan, 6s.)

M. LOTI laments the disenchantment which unlimited indulgence in western culture has brought with it to the princesses in Turkish harems. Uncaged intellectually, as free to study Kant and Nietzsche as to trifle with Baudelaire and Verlaine, they are yet, in the original words of one of these ladies, "sans le moyen de se consoler de son amour, et de son rêve, par action;" wherefore there is nothing for them but death unless full emancipation come speedily. M. Loti is gently sympathetic, writes charmingly of everything, paints delightful pictures, but suggests no remedy for sufferings which are "already an anxiety to my dear friends the Turks." We are left to balance the chances whether these Mahomedans will open wide the door to freedom (and the inevitable destruction and reconstruction of their social system), or whether they may rather choose to banish professors, books, and foreign influence, and cry: "Back to the peace of our forefathers!"

The Illustrious O'Hagan. By JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

"It was all kissing-time, drinking-time, singing-time, tripping-time" with John O'Hagan, and nearly all with Philip O'Hagan, his twin-brother, save that Philip had a little time for melancholy, during which he cherished in his heart the thought of his first boy-love for Dorothea of Sonnenburg. From her brute-husband, Prince Max of Schlafingen, the gallant twins rescue her, and she is lovely enough to warrant all the risks they run. They step through all the perils with a grace as gallant as that with which the romance passes on its brave way: and the romance lilts swingingly along. So let hats sweep off, as they should, before the Illustrious O'Hagan. Mr. McCarthy is at his buoyant best.

The Second Book of Tobiah. By U. L. SILBERRAD. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

READERS who recall Miss Silberrad's original and interesting stories, "The Wedding of the Lady of Lovell" and others, will gladly renew their acquaintance with Tobiah, the Dissenter. Tobiah—a Christian of the valiant sort and a sportsman—is once more called to lend a hand in the affairs of his neighbours, for the furtherance of virtue and well-doing. He grasps the nettle of interference between man and wife with a vigour that crushes all opposition: with their good will, or against it, his courage and resource bring all marital difficulties to a successful issue. "Drusilla, the Jewess," and "The Elf Lady of Morwood," are, perhaps, the most important stories in the collection: the old-world atmosphere and environment, the characters and form of narration are all convincing. Miss Silberrad is a writer of ability and distinction, and nowhere has she shown the finer qualities of her work to greater advantage than in these tales.

Old Fireproof. By OWEN ROSCOMYL. (Duckworth, 6s.)

OWEN ROSCOMYL in his latest novel deals so accurately and intimately with the practical details of his background (the South African campaign) that the reader cannot but feel disappointment at the unsatisfactory nature of his characterisation. Nor has he handled the knowledge he possesses in such a manner as to create any atmosphere or stir the imagination. The story is told in the first person, and, therefore, the strained phraseology and the lack of simplicity in the dialogue are all the more marked; the reader is also irritated throughout the book by the would-be poetical phrases which are introduced. The author does not succeed in creating an impression of horror by such descriptions as the following: "The sergeant-major's voice burst back with a threat so awful as should have turned my blood to clots, but which only made my flesh burn instead" or: "Using such words as make my flesh cringe now to remember"—a style which is not calculated to give an impression of anything save the ridiculous.

The Marriage of Aminta. By L. PARRY TRUSTOTT. (Blackwood, 6s.)

"ALL the world's mad but thee and me, and sometimes I think thee is," said an old Quaker, and we have no doubt that three delightful lunatics living on the banks of the Thames think so too, after the manner of the insane. They are mad enough, at any rate; from the amiable male lunatic, "with just enough of his life behind him to make a fair pretext for denying his age," to the fat, fair female lunatic clad in crumpled silk and an exaggerated mushroom hat. Of course, for the good of the story, there is a young and beautiful girl lunatic. This irresponsible household is presided over by the One Sane Man, Mr. Clinkaberry, gardener by trade and misogynist by nature. A grand piano and a sad little song about a sad little dream which they warble inconsequently in the intervals of proposing promiscuously to one another, play an important part in this unhinged but attractive story.

A Servant of the King. By E. ACEITUNA GRIFFIN. (Blackwood, 6s.)

OUR first feeling on opening this book was that the title was in some way familiar; our second, on realising the subject, that it had been treated once too often. The story of Strafford and Lady Carlisle is almost as popular with novelists as that of Charles the Second and Nell Gwynne, and only great dramatic power and freshness of treatment can make the theme anything but hackneyed. These are the qualities we miss in "A Servant of the King." The story is clearly and conscientiously told, but it is a tale we have heard too often before. Charles the First has been punished sufficiently for the most traitorous act in the annals of English history, if only by the amount of times he has been made to rehearse his crimes in print. Surely no ghost ever "walked" in expiation of his sins more consistently than that unfortunate monarch since he delivered himself into the hands of the novel writer. This well-written but dull book is dedicated "to Muriel Cooper, who made me write it": we could almost wish she had refrained.

DRAMA

"THE CHARITY THAT BEGAN AT HOME" AT THE COURT THEATRE

MR. ST. JOHN HANKIN'S new play appears to have puzzled the professional critics. Last Wednesday one morning paper praised its "unobtrusive, but original and rather subtle technique," while another critic found fault with something as "a failure of technique." One says: "His Margery is really a failure"; another calls her "an exquisite little woman." When the doctors disagree, may a humble amateur, who knows nothing of technique, try to point out why he enjoyed The Charity that began at Home more than most of the plays he has been taken to see of late?

The disagreement as to the character of Margery Denison (prettily played by Miss May Martyn) is a leading clue to his enjoyment. She may be a "failure"; if so, the way to draw human nature is to make more such failures. The more we think of Margery, the better we understand her. A bright, quick, active, thoroughly good girl, young as yet and quite a stranger to passion, devoted to "good works," and finding immense pleasure in being a fussy little Lady Bountiful. She is unawakened to passion, but her eyes lighten when the name of Hylton is mentioned, and her busy fingers go a little quicker than ever when they are working his handkerchief-case. Then comes Verreker, young, handsome, cynical, almost disgraced; just the man to appeal romantically to a little apostle of unselfishness. She likes him—likes him very much: quite enough, in fact, to make the idea of marrying him pleasant, a little for itself, a great deal for the opportunity of reforming him. With her bright, clear sense, and her utter inexperience of love and the world, she routs the opposing forces. He robbed his Mess? Yes, but he is not really bad; and if he is, ought she not, according to the very doctrines of Hylton and her mother, all the more to marry and reform him? But she does not like him enough to be more than a little bewildered and disappointed when he tells her, after all, that she is too good for him (in a scene which sets an example of the right use of words)—so good that either he or she must be unhappy. And when Verreker suggests that it is really Hylton whom she ought to marry, she goes away reflectively—wondering. It had not occurred to her. She will learn very soon, we know, that the idea does not shock her because it is Hylton after all by whom her sleeping womanhood is to be awakened. Take the character of Verreker, again. After preaching selfishness all through the play, he suddenly gives up a pretty girl with a large fortune. Is that selfishness or unselfishness? Both, of course; a mixture of opposites, as human nature always is. Margery's fortune would be fine for him, when—as he very soon would—he had grown used to Margery's tears of unhappiness: on the other hand, it would be a shame to marry her when Hylton so much better deserves her. That scene of renunciation delighted the present writer by its very indefiniteness, its utter lack of the hard and fast, cut and dried rules about men and women and actions which the stage is always trying to force upon us. Verreker, again, is a bit of a cad. Of course, he is. When a man has been kicked out of his regiment and has lived as best he can for four years, he becomes even more of a cad than most gentlemen are born. And what of Hylton, the apostle of unselfishness, founder of the Church of Humanity, preacher, philanthropist? We all thought he was going to turn out a humbug, and he did not. Truth, again. Did any one ever meet such a man and not believe he was going to turn out a humbug? And Hylton—to Mr. Berte Thomas's credit be it recorded—showed just the self-consciousness, the touch of the poseur, the head-on-one-side, elaborately gentle manner, which such men always acquire and which always leads to their being suspected as humbugs.

But we need not follow through the whole list of people. Some of the minor characters are less life-like—and would probably be considered more life-like by the theatre-goer, because they are more cut to pattern and easier to understand. This may be carelessness or ignorance on the author's part; but, knowing nothing of technique, we venture to suggest that they were put there as foils to the subtler natures of the principal characters. The story as a whole gives us the impression by its very vagueness, so to speak—its lack of hard and fast distinctions, of "strong and decided" action, of Procrustean periods—that we were watching some real people at a very interesting period in their fortunes. Life and people are like that: a little vague, a little contradictory, a little baffling. They do not arrange themselves in "scenes" and "moments." In actual experience, we have not time to watch them, and follow out causes, results and reasons: it is delightful to have it done for us on the stage.

One must, of course, distinguish one's pleasures. Mr. Hankin, who has a kind of eclectic feebleness, all his own, cannot excite us. We do not care a rush what happens to these people afterwards; whether dear, stupid, brave Lady Denison (played to perfection by Miss Florence Haydon) is cured of personal philanthropy by her troubles, or whether she goes on her dear, stupid, brave way. We do not dream of nights of the lovely Margery, nor pity poor, handsome, battered Verreker. We do not even know (again, as in life) whether we "like" any of the people; and we do not believe that Mr. Hankin either "likes" any of them, or cares whether we do. But we know them, and that is more important. Moreover, we have laughed a good deal at the witty way they are presented; and, if we are perfectly unmoved to emotion, perfectly cold all through, how often do other people's lives move us to enthusiasm?

There is uprising a new drama, and Mr. Hankin is one of its professors. It seems to us a very delightful and sensible kind of drama; and the only thing that stands in the way of its appreciation is the demand for something the dramatist does not profess to give—the shocks and thrills and sentiments of the old drama. The characters are "failures" only from the point of view of those who ask for the old cut and dried strips called human beings by the Victorian stage; its technique is a failure only in the eyes of those who on entering a theatre forget the infinite variety of the world outside.

FINE ART

MR. RICH'S WATER-COLOURS

WHEN we consider how widespread in this country is the practice of painting in water-colours, when we reflect that this essentially national medium is even more favoured by amateurs than by professional painters, we can no longer feel surprise at the immense number of indifferent examples of this art recurrently offered to our gaze in Bond Street and thereabouts. But with so great a multitude of practitioners we have reason for regretful wonder in the fact that so few out of the many attain to any real distinction. We have painters—Mr. Sargent, Mr. Steer and Mr. Tonks, for example—who from time to time show water-colours of undoubted charm and distinction; but with these and many others water-colours are a by-product, their best energies being given to painting in oils. Now that Brabazon and Arthur Melville are no more, it would be difficult to name half a dozen living artists who, devoting their undivided energies to water-colour, have added fresh lustre to the greatest school of this branch of painting in the world.

Truth to tell, British water-colour art is for the moment at low ebb, and, though promise for the future is not lacking, the present performers on whom we may justly pride ourselves may be counted on the fingers of one hand. Of the rare few who could be included in this chosen band, none is surer of his place than Mr. A. W. Rich, a selection of whose water-colours is being exhibited this month at the Carfax Gallery (24 Bury Street, St. James's). In these days, when water-colours is misused to obtain any effect save those most peculiar and proper to the medium, it is delightful to dwell on the purity of Mr. Rich's colour. No one could take his exhibits at Carfax to be oils, pastels, chalks, chromolithographs, or anything except water-colours, and if this be no high praise it is, at least in our time, a distinction. Quieter and less arresting at the first glance than that of Brabazon or of Melville, Mr. Rich's art is none the less modern in feeling and expression, and notwithstanding the title of the catalogue we should prefer to term his exhibits "paintings" rather than "drawings in water-colour." In so saying we cast no slur on his ability as a draughtsman. To look at the rounded ribs of the boats in his Rye Harbour (47) is to know that Mr. Rich is as accomplished in the expression of form—which is drawing—as he is in the balancing of masses—which is composition. But if we attach any precise significance to technical terms we now understand by "water-colour drawings" pencil drawings slightly tinted with washes of colour. This more old-fashioned method is not that most favoured by Mr. Rich. The lead pencil is rarely, if ever, discernible in his work. He does not insist on outline. He builds up form by planes of light and shade or colour-values, rather than the lines of an anatomical diagram. He does not use colour to fill up pencil outlines; he lays it on directly in deft blots and washes. No doubt the new water-colour tradition has grown out of the old, but there is sufficient difference between the two to justify a verbal distinction, so that even when an artist is capable of using either method it is not improper to classify him by his favourite, and to allude, for example, to the drawings of Mr. MacColl and the paintings of Mr. Rich.

If Mr. Rich favours the blottesque technique, his use of it is not violent, but so gentle as to be at times almost imperceptible. The most conservative critic could hardly take exception to his Brighton (60). The beach in the foreground is so orderly that at first it appears quite old-fashioned, almost ordinary, till suddenly there dawns on us the miracle of sunshine on the water, and afterwards we realise that the beach, too, is ablaze with light, that the scene and the painting are of to-day and not of yesterday. Though he shows no marked preference for high keys of colour—rather the reverse, since cool greens, olive and terre-vert predominate—there is abundant evidence that Mr. Rich, with the foremost painters of his generation, is deeply occupied with problems of light, light which for a sensitive soul can transform Croydon (17) into a fairy-like vision of ethereal delicacy. The light may be concentrated, as in The Farmyard (26), seen bathed in light through a frame of shaded foliage, or diffused, as in The South Downs (23), spaced out by a subtle appreciation and registration of values; but light and air are always there.

Mr. Rich's interest in nature is not limited to a single aspect: in Stanmer Park (15), Field Work (12), the Constablesque A Stormy Day (34), and many other low-toned pictures of equal beauty he demonstrates the wide range of his art and sympathy. But whatever diversity in other respects his exhibits have, they all show in common the purity of colour and deftness of touch which characterise a master-craftsman. The colour may be deep and full or light and delicate, but it is never muddy, never impure. The touches may be large or small, few or many, but they are always expressive, never superfluous.

Hardly a week passes without an exhibition of water-colours opening in some part of London, and invitations to view the work of possible rivals to Mr. Rich have not failed us of late. We had thought this week to say something about the sketches of Messrs. H. L. Dell and Westley Manning and the designs of Mr. H. Raymond Thompson at the Baillie Gallery (54 Baker Street), of Mr. Douglas Fox Pitt's Algerian studies at Messrs. Dickinson's (114 New Bond Street). To each of these a word of praise might have been awarded for some merit achieved on occasion, but with Triton on the stage it is difficult to administer justice with mercy to the minnows.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

AMONG Mr. Edward Arnold's autumn announcements are: "Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer," by Colonel James P. Robertson, who took part in the Sutlej Campaign from Moodkee to Sobraon, was in the Crimea, and commanded a regiment of Light Cavalry throughout the Mutiny; "Abyssinia of To-day," by Robert P. Skinner, an account of the first mission sent by the American Government to the Emperor Menelik; "Houseboat Days in China," by J. O. P. Bland; a new and cheaper edition of the Memoirs of Henri Stephen de Blowitz, the late Paris correspondent of the Times; "The Princes of Achaia and the Chronicles of Morea," a study of Greece in the Middle Ages, by Sir Rennell Rodd; "The Aftermath of War," by G. B. Beak—an account of the repatriation of Boers and natives in the Orange River Colony; "Individual Ownership and the Growth of Modern Civilisation," a translation of Henri de Tourville's "Histoire de la Formation Particulariste," by Maisie G. Loch; "A Song-Garden for Children," a collection of children's songs adapted from the French and German by Harry Graham and Rosa Newmarch, the music edited and arranged by Norman O'Neill; a re-written and enlarged edition of Professor Lloyd Morgan's "Psychology for Teachers"; "Political Caricatures, 1906," by Sir F. Carruthers Gould; "A Hunting Catechism," by Colonel R. F. Meysey-Thompson; and "At the Works: A Study of a North Country Town," by Lady Bell—a description of the industrial and social condition of the ironworkers of the North Country.

Messrs. Methuen are issuing a work which will contain all the extant letters of William Blake, including a considerable number which have never before been published. The book contains also a hitherto unpublished life of Blake, by Frederick Tatham, Blake's most intimate friend in his later days. The work has been edited by Mr. A. G. B. Russell, who supplies an introduction and notes. Another book which Messrs. Methuen are publishing is Mr. Adolphus Ballard's "The Domesday Inquest," which gives an account of the Domesday Book and the various terms used therein. There will be reproductions from contemporary manuscripts and the Bayeux Tapestry.

Mr. John Lane will publish on October 30 a new edition of Gilchrist's "Life of Blake." Mr. W. Graham Robertson, who has the finest known collection of Blake pictures, has edited the text and written an introduction and, further, enriched Gilchrist's work with a large number of the most perfect of Blake's drawings and pictures. Most of the illustrations originally selected by Gilchrist for the "Life" are included.

Mr. Heinemann has purchased the English copyright of Prince Hohenlohe's Memoirs, and hopes to have his translation of the first (unexpurgated) German edition ready shortly.

The writing of the "Life of Voltaire" necessarily involved a careful study of the group of "Intellectuals" who are known as the Encyclopaedists, and "S. G. Tallentyre" has now written a companion volume, entitled "The Friends of Voltaire," which Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish shortly.—About December 1 Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish the volume of new and original stories and poems contributed by various writers as their effort on behalf of the Barnardo National Memorial Fund. All profits will be banded to this fund. Contributions are already in hand from Owen Seaman, Ralph Connor, Maxwell Gray, E. W. Hornung, Coulson Kernahan, Mrs. Campbell Praed, Annie S. Swan, Major Hume, Norman Gale, Hume Nisbet, and Tom Gallon.

The suppressed commentary by Walter Savage Landor on Trotter's "Memories of the Last Days of Charles James Fox" will be published shortly by Mr. Murray. The only known copy was preserved by Southey and Lord Houghton, and is now in the possession of the Earl of Crewe, who has given permission for its publication.

Messrs. Parker and Co. publish this week a sixth story in "The Digit of the Moon" series entitled "An Essence of the Dusk," translated from the original manuscript by F. W. Bain. A fifth edition is also ready of "The Digit of the Moon," and a second edition of "A Draught of the Blue" in the same series.

"Chats on Costume—A Practical Guide to Historic Dress," will be published by Mr. Unwin on October 29. The author is Mr. G. Woolliscroft Rhead, who has written several volumes on art subjects. His book is in no sense technical, and consists of a series of chats on the tunic, the mantle, head-dresses, and the dressing of the hair, the doublet and hose, boots, shoes, and other coverings for the feet, collars and cuffs, gloves, lace, the crinoline, etc., showing the various developments from the earliest periods to the present time. The volume is fully illustrated by reproductions of paintings and engravings by the great masters, and a number of sketches by the author.

Messrs. Archibald Constable and Company will publish very shortly a volume by Professor E. Ray Lankester, entitled "The Kingdom of Man."

Miss Jessie Pope, the author of "Paper Pellets," a collection of poems which Mr. Elkin Mathews is about to publish, has the unusual gift in a woman of expressing humour in verse. Her contributions appear regularly in Punch and Vanity Fair, and the book itself is one of the first volumes of humorous verse published by a lady.

A new novel entitled "The Ark of the Curse," by Miss K. L. Montgomery, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett. The scene of the story, which is full of exciting incidents, is laid in the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees, the period being that of Philip II. of Spain.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will issue shortly a volume of tales entitled "Back o' the Moon," by Oliver Onions, author of "The Drakestone," "Tales from a Far Riding," etc. The principal story deals with the lives of lawless dwellers in the remoter districts of Yorkshire towards the latter part of the eighteenth century.

CORRESPONDENCE

ON EDITING BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Last spring the criticisms of a reviewer drew from me some remarks on the text of the Elder Brother in the Cambridge edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's works, which you were kind enough to print. In the appendix to vol. iv. which has just appeared, the editor has attempted to meet the objections raised. You may possibly think the matter of sufficient interest to allow me a few words of further comment. I will quote Mr. Waller's own words:

"In the Preface to the second volume of the present edition, I used the words 'First Quarto' somewhat loosely to represent indifferently two versions of The Elder Brother, both dated 1637, differing very slightly from each other. The phrase has been misunderstood as implying that the editors of this edition were not aware that one of these two Quartos may possibly have been printed a few years later than the other. This is not the case: the opinion, and the evidence adduced in support of it, were known to the editors. . . . It is a matter of very slight importance, and it is sufficient to state here that one of these two identically dated editions was called A and the other B . . . without there being any intention on the part of the editors to express . . . any opinion . . . as to which is the earlier . . . of the two."

It appears, therefore, that the editor intentionally applied the letter A to an edition which he knew to be demonstrably later, possibly as much as a quarter of a century later, than that he designated B; that he described as one version of the First Quarto an edition which he knew to be not the first, and possibly only the fourth. This seems to me a deliberate attempt to mislead students, in comparison with which mere ignorance and carelessness are venial offences, and to speak of it as a matter of indifference argues a strange inability to grasp the situation. The serious study of English will continue, and will deservedly continue, to be an object of neglect and contempt so long as our University Presses continue to lend their countenance to methods in dealing with our native language and literature which would not be tolerated for five minutes in the case of classics, mathematics, or natural science.

W. W. GREG.

Mr. A. R. Waller writes from the University Press, Cambridge, as follows:

By the courtesy of the Editor of the ACADEMY I have been permitted to see a copy of the above letter. Mr. W. W. Greg omits qualifying words of mine and then proceeds to draw attention to an argument he has distorted. I do not propose to reply otherwise than by supplying the words of mine that he has omitted, and I leave the question of his fairness, or shall I say the ethics of his methods of criticism, confidently in the hands of the readers of the ACADEMY: "editors, but all questions of date, together with all other discussions of like nature, were left to be dealt with in their proper place in the volume or volumes of notes that are to follow the publication of the text. It"—"B in the Appendix to volume ii. for purposes of reference only, just as, in volume i., the two identically dated Quartos, of Philaster, 1652, were called F and G, respectively, without"—"express, in either case, any opinion, for the moment, as to which is the earlier or the better of the two. Furthermore, since the text of one of these 1637 Quartos was printed in the Appendix merely in order to show the verse arrangement that prevailed in the early Quartos and not for any other textual purpose, it was a matter of indifference which of the two 1637 Quartos was used."

A GENTLE REBUKE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

WITHOUT PREJUDICE

SIR,—I have to request you to insert this letter in the next issue of your publication and also a full apology for the insulting and vulgar remarks made upon in your issue of to-day under the heading of "The Literary Week," failing which I shall take legal proceedings against your publication as I am advised, and claim such damages as I think necessary.

Your remarks are not only irreverent but intensely offensive, and calculated to hold me up to ridicule, which the law punishes.

Because you are unable to see merit in my literary and dramatic work, which others do both here and abroad, owing to your lack of education and culture, that is no reason why you should attack me so ignorantly and foolishly as you did, for example, as regards my adaptation from "Paradise Lost" for the English stage, which received high praise on all sides, but to now try and hold me up to ridicule also and introduce into your vulgar joke a sacred subject and matter to us all, is a gross prostitution of journalism in the worst form possible.

WALTER STEPHENS.

26 Coventry Street, W,
Telephone 11918 Central.
10.10.6.

[We readily offer Mr. Stephens the apology for which he so prettily pleads, regretting at the same time that among the twelve living authors at whom we ventured to poke fun there should have been one to whom it was necessary to point out the words of Mr. Stephens's fellow dramatist: "Look you, if you take the matter otherwise than is meant . . . peradventure I shall think you do not use me with that affability as in discretion you ought to use me, look you."—Ed.]

THE BOOK TRADE AND THE TIMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In consequence of certain announcements which are appearing in the Press, I beg to state that since Oct. 1 I have not advertised my books in the Times, and further, on October 11, following the meeting of the Publishers' Association, I immediately closed my account with the "Times Book Club" for both gross and net books.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

October 23.

THE MODERN PICTURE-MARKET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent who responds to the article upon the "Modern Picture-Market" is to be thanked for his attempt to show a more cheery outlook upon the matter; but the cases he gives of patron and artist are palpably exceptions which prove the rule. We must still deplore the scarcity of such patrons as he instances. Your correspondent gives it out in the manner of something of which the community may be properly proud that "there are, even among the younger generation, many painters who can earn their living without sacrificing their aims and ideals." Are we expected to fling up our caps and hurrah at this? The meaning of "many" in the passage quoted is in reality "few," as the context proves. Moreover the article did not refer primarily to painters "in their first few years of practice"; but to those who have experience as well as talent, and families to boot. It is not good for a beginner to go up like a rocket. Collectors and other exploiters get hold of him and turn his head—witness Beardsley, whose moral suicide led to his premature demise.

It is impossible for artists to "accept low prices" in a general way, for such are not offered in this country. They might do so perhaps by calling from house to house with their pictures in a parcel. All sales to the larger public are made in galleries where the limit of cheapness has been raised during the last thirty years, gradually from £5 to £25 or something like that; for the increase of commission, of course. Most of the public galleries show only the work of members and are therefore closed to the mass of free-lances outside. The much abused Royal Academy is after all the best friend to artists. You may price your work as you like and no commission is charged. But these advantages attract an impossible and overwhelming competition. We want a dozen academies. Failing that we want people to go to artists direct, after disabusing their minds of the notion that pictures are luxuries, and that lavish establishments (barring pictures), costly clothes, motor-cars, and other things which moth and rust doth corrupt, are the only necessities.

I could elaborate my points were I not fearful of boring your readers with a matter unhappily of no general interest.

F. C. TILNEY.

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—As one deeply interested in the above subject, not as a dealer but in a small way as a buyer and lover of pictures, I have a proposition to make, which may, I think, stimulate the sale of works of art in this country. Being a busy man myself I cannot do more than suggest a scheme which must be carried out systematically and safeguarded in every possible way by some one who has the genius and leisure for organisation.

There are a good many of us who have wall-space which might be better utilised than it is at present by exhibiting for sale works of art which fail to sell only because they are never seen by possible buyers. Better utilised, I say, both in our own interests and in the interests of struggling artists. We, who are willing to take part in this movement, would gain the pleasure of (temporarily) having a work of art before our eyes. The artist would gain by having his picture seen by a new stream of possible buyers. In return for the pleasure of temporary possession it would be a condition that every such picture should have exhibited prominently, beside or on it, a card stating that the picture is "FOR SALE," that its price is so-and-so, and that the painter is this, that or the other, a further implied condition being that the temporary owner should try to sell it, unless indeed he became so attached to it that he preferred to buy it himself rather than be parted from it.

On the other hand, in return for his advantage of having his pictures seen by a new set of possible purchasers, it would be a condition on the part of the painter that he should insure his picture, a mere nominal expense, and deliver it free of charge.

There are of course other details which would have to be considered, such as the risk of a picture being seized with other ostensible belongings in the event of the bankruptcy of the exhibitor, but I imagine such a contingency could be easily guarded against by printing on the sale-card, "THIS PICTURE IS THE PROPERTY OF THE PAINTER."

At any rate I have said enough to outline a scheme which I sincerely hope some one (perhaps you, Sir) will see his way to organise. I say "perhaps you, Sir," because it should be some one of influence and some one who would command the confidence of both artists and private persons willing to lend their wall-space.

To cover the clerical and other expenses I should propose a small subscription, say a guinea a year from each householder offering wall-space. Personally I should be only too ready to pay this myself for the privilege of looking at a really beautiful picture for a year.

There is, of course, the question of what picture or pictures the householder would wish to contemplate, for of course it would not do, for example, to force Mr. Robert Ross to contemplate such a picture as Mr. Holman Hunt's Hiring Shepherd, though to me this would be worth very many guineas a year. This, however, could be got over by the Association publishing a list of those artists who might be willing to try the experiment with pictures exhibited but unsold. Then all that would be necessary would be for the householder to fix upon such pictures as took his fancy in the exhibitions, send a list of these to the secretary of the association, intimating that he would be willing to give wall-space, under the conditions named, to such as might be left on the artist's hands.

I have only stated the idea crudely and have no doubt that many objections will be raised. At the same time I am prepared to "face the music" rather than let a possible solution of the difficulty be lost just for want of putting it down on paper.

With apologies for taking up so much of your space and dashing down the leading points, without correction, for which I have no time, just as they flow from the tip of my pen,

G. S. LAYARD.

ORATORY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The centenary of the death of Fox suggests a question which, so far as I know, has not been raised in any article on the subject. "Has oratory become a lost art in modern England, and is admiration for oratory an emotion which belongs to the dim past?" Such evidence as I have observed seems to demand an affirmative answer. What great author nowadays would think of giving one of his chief works the title "De Oratore" or "De Oratoribus"? Who would dream of writing of "eloquentiam et ceteras artes," of describing eloquence in the immortal words, "sicut flamma, materia alitur et motibus excitatur et urendo clarescit," of requiring of the speaker "ut omnem omnium artium varietatem complecteretur," of declaring that the only orator is he "qui in forum omnibus artibus armatus exierit"? What modern publisher can read without a smile of scorn the story that one of his predecessors was foolish enough to offer Sheridan a thousand guineas (or fifteen hundred pounds of our present money) for a corrected version of his speech on the Begums of Oude? What modern speaker can read without a sneer the line in which Aristophanes has immortalised the eloquence of Pericles, ἡστραπὴ ἐβρόντα, ξυνεκύνε τὴν Ἑλλάδα? What modern educationist can read without a sardonic laugh the story of Æschines in his exile reciting to his pupils his great rival's greatest speech? What modern politician can listen without a lofty sense of superiority to the tradition which tells how the House of Commons hung in spellbound rapture on the lips of Pitt as he pleaded for the abolition of the slave-trade, and with an unsurpassed felicity of quotation, pointing to the first rays of the sun shining through the windows of the House, exclaimed,

Dum nos primus equis Oriens afflavit anhelis,
Illic sera rubens accendit lumina Vesper?

What arm-chair critic of our day does not pish or pshaw over Voltaire's criticism of the "Provincial Letters," "Toutes les sortes d'éloquence y sont renfermées"? What modern philosopher ever thinks of emulating the inimitable eloquence of Plato in the eighth and ninth Books of the "Republic"? What Parliamentary candidate or "noble Lord" devotes years of intense and incessant study, like Mirabeau, to acquiring that "omnem omnium artium varietatem" which made him the greatest orator of his nation, and the co-equal of the greatest English speakers? There is an anecdote that a famous orator was taunted by an envious rival with delivering speeches which "smelt of the lamp"; how many modern speeches are pervaded by that delicious aroma?

I regret to see that Lord Rosebery has given the weight of his great authority to the assertion that no sensible person ever reads old sermons and old speeches. As the young lady in the comic opera says, "It all depends! Bless you, it all depends!" There are one or two sermons, more than eighteen centuries old, which to-day are read far more widely than the masterpieces of the greatest poets. There are speeches of an even greater antiquity which students of literature are foolish enough to study. I remember how, even as a boy, I was stirred by the splendid speech in which Cæsar declared to his reluctant and mutinous soldiery that, if the rest of the army failed him, he would march with the 10th Legion alone to victory or death; and from that day I never wondered that he should have taken the foremost place among the great men of all time. I remember with equal vividness the impression which was made upon me by the first perusal of the "De Corona"; and I thought then, and still think, that the close of the magnificent passage where the speaker suddenly turns upon his opponent, Ἐμβρόντητε, εἰτα νῦν Μένει; is the master-stroke of the greatest master of human speech. The words of Pericles, Ἀνδρῶν ἐπιφανῶν πᾶσα γῆ τόπος, haunt me more than the lyrics of the "Bacchæ"; and the words of Burke, "Magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom, and little minds and a great Empire go ill together," linger in my memory more constantly than Wordsworth's "Odes." But I am doubtless qualifying for one of those lunatic asylums on which Lord Rosebery eloquently dilated.

I was amused some time ago to read that a modern critic had sneered at Byron for his "rhetorical poetry." Apparently the critic wrote in sublime unconsciousness of the fact that almost all the world's greatest poets are incomparably more rhetorical than Byron. I have been meditating an article, which has not yet been written, on "The poets as orators," in which I intended to illustrate and enlarge upon this theme. Indeed, Milton is an admirable instance of Cicero's celebrated maxim, "Est finitimus oratori poeta." The "Areopagitica" is in form a pamphlet but in reality a splendid piece of oratory. In four great passages of his poems he has sounded the praises of eloquence. In "Comus" the lady ends her speech with the words:

Should I try, the uncontrolled worth
Of this pure cause would kindle my rapt spirits
To such a flame of sacred vehemence
That dumb things would be moved to sympathise . . .

In the well-known passage of the "Paradise Regained" he extols the "resistless eloquence" of the Greek orators. In the "Paradise Lost" he contrasts it with song:

In discourse more sweet
(For Eloquence the Soul, Song charms the Senses)
Others apart sat on a hill retired . . .

and, above all, in the magnificent simile of the ninth Book he sets the seal on the greatness of eloquence:

As when of old some orator renowned . . .

Are we, in view of the twentieth century, to interpret the words "since mute" prophetically as well as retrospectively?

A curious and instructive light is thrown upon this subject by the "Everyman's Library," which has earned for Messrs. Dent the gratitude of all literary students. Of the first one hundred and fifty volumes only one is devoted to oratory. "Only one ha'porth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" But still more interesting is the remark in the Prospectus to the Library: "It will be acknowledged that it is only very rarely possible to reproduce the eloquence of other nations in our own language." Apparently it is easier to give an adequate reproduction in English of Sophocles and Virgil, Dante and Goethe, than of Demosthenes and Cicero, Mirabeau and Luther. I confess that my slight acquaintance with classical and modern literature forces upon me a diametrically opposite conclusion. I should respect unbelievers more if they had the courage of their opinions, and boldly said that in this enlightened age literary students set no store by an art which in the ignorant and benighted ages of the past held a foremost place.

Must we, then, make the melancholy confession that the eloquence of our age is like the degenerate eloquence which the great historian bewailed: "Eloquentiam velut expulsam regno suo, ut quæ olim omnium artium domina pulcherrimo comitatu pectora implebat, nunc circumcisa et amputata, sine apparatu, sine honore, . . . quasi una ex sordidissimis artificibus discatur?" And must we believe that literary students, for whose sake the "Everyman's Library" and the "World's Classics" are presumably published, have steadfastly closed their eyes to the larger and wider interests of the world's history and the life of great States which are embodied in the masterpieces of oratory with unrivalled splendour?

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

THE STIBBART ART COLLECTION (FLORENCE)

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As the renunciation of this valuable legacy is sure to occasion regrets for its loss when Parliament assembles, I seize this last opportunity to speak of it now.

I have just received two replies direct from Florence to my queries on the subject. One says "that the Palace and its Collection of Armour, Tapestries, have become the property of the Florence Municipality by right of heirship (a titolo di eredità); and are now closed to the public."

"The claims which the English Government could boast (vantare) of were repudiated after the intercession of the Marquis (?) Labouchère, late Member of the British House of Commons, now residing in Florence."

The other says, "Until now no Catalogue exists, and therefore the Art Collection cannot be exhibited until the compilation of one is finished."

If I am well informed this matter will not be allowed to rest without some explanation, and as replies in Parliament are often unsatisfactory (as I know myself by experience) a Blue Book containing the correspondence is now imperatively called for.

WILLIAM MERCER.

Oct. 18.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor Skeat misses the point which I tried to make clear that with our present system of sound-signs phonetic spelling is not possible in English except by the current method of occasionally turning letters from their common use to employ them as indicators of very slight sounds and pauses, "tied notes," and barely audible breaths, which to those with ears to hear are not valueless. To be exact, I mentioned the gh in light as "breathing which can hardly be said to be audible" which yet has "an influence on speech." It might be possible for some few of us to feel quite positive that there is no difference between the playing of a pianola and Paderewski if the notes are the same, and yet with shut eyes others recognise a distinction. Speech, like music, is an art; from it we may deduce a science, but we cannot circumscribe it by the science. I think Mr. Drummond's citation of Max Müller's preference for Pitman's Fonotypy "because it did not attempt to record every passing sound" is an argument on my side.

If Professor Skeat had done me the honour of reading my letter more carefully he would have noticed that I did not say that "the final obvious articulation" would be lost if tongue were spelled twag, but a "certain stress" upon that final articulation; meaning that the articulation of the g is held the fraction of a moment longer than in sung. I think I implied intelligibly that quite silent letters may have their value merely in time, but that very few are quite silent. This final stress in the given instance is probably the survival of a syllable which is still retained in other languages, whilst the shade of fulness which I find that the o gains over a possible u is most likely a corruption of the full Teutonic u, preserved in the accent of this generation because we sometimes know how to spell so well and speak accordingly.

I don't think any one would deny that in individual words, such as programme, where the termination is quite useless in English, the orthography might be changed with advantage, and the gradual transformation of language perceptible in a single century proves that what is desirable generally takes place naturally; but to make a practically clean sweep of the old spelling in favour of a bald and inexpressive invention is suicidal. Language should be the expression of the genius of a people; it should be pliable and living, not stereotyped and academic, or the literature, and the uttered word which that literature symbolises, will suffer. To consider orthography from the point of view of its reaction on the music of speech is not only sentiment, but common sense. If sentiment, and poetry, and the glamour of old use are not sufficiently "portable property" to be taken into account to-day we should logically all learn wisdom and Esperanto.

If Professor Skeat really sees no difference in the principle of spelling light light and age ataticum, I am afraid it is useless to say more.

GLADYS JONES.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The correspondence respecting the reform of English spelling indicates a general ignorance of the science of fonetics, of the character of the reforms proposed, of the relation of spelling to general education, and of the history of the modern, as well as of the older, reform movement. At the same time it may serve to dissipate this ignorance—from which reformers are not exempt—and to establish a definite aggressive movement which shall eventually secure the adoption of a fonetic code for recording spoken English.

A popular misconception of the result of applied practical fonetics is formulated by F. W. T. Lange. "I am sure," he says, "that an entirely new and fonetic alphabet would only cause endless confusion and trouble." This statement is surely hypothetical; and a knowledge of the history of fonetic achievement would have dispelled this groundless notion. In those cases—neither rare nor unimportant—where fonetic spelling has been employed for tuitional purposes only the result has been an incalculable diminution of confusion and trouble. Without here adducing statistical confirmation, it may be stated that children who received an eighteen-months' course of instruction in reading by the fonetic method, a supplementary eighteen-months being devoted to an introduction to current spelling, were generally much better readers and spellers according to the orthodox standards than were children taught to read by means of the current spelling only who had received instruction during periods of from six to eight years. The children taught by the fonetic method also made greater progress in other studies. The tests upon which these statements are based show also the groundlessness of the fear that "a too violent reform would render our past literature quite unreadable to the masses," because, as stated, the child-students of fonetics were more excellent readers of books in the current spelling than the general students who had not received fonetic instruction.

Exception may be taken to the expression "natural growth" as a description of orthographic development. Spelling is an arbitrary device for representing spoken language; susceptible of improvement by conscious agency precisely as any other mechanical invention. Language may perhaps be described as a growth or process of evolution; but the function and nature of spelling, and the manner of perfecting it as such that to describe this process as a growth is as meaningless as if the description applied to the construction of a building or the making of cloth. And it is every whit as desirable and as practicable to adopt a completely fonetic system of spelling in elementary schools as it is to supersede by substantial residences the slums and hovels of poverty, or by instruments of utility and precision the cumbrous and obsolete tools of yesterday.

The last sentences in the letter of F. W. T. Lange and in the note of the editor each suggest an aspect of the question which is apt to be overlooked. Spelling-reformers are, without exception so far as my personal knowledge goes, advocates of speech reform. This is a plank in every spelling-reform platform. The service of fonetics (rendered indirectly through the agency of the dictionaries) to the refinement of speech and the promotion of plain and effective pronunciation is already manifest in several directions. Such forms as "ejocashun, Crischan, feetchur, culchur," for "education, Christian; feature, culture," arrest the attention of the reader,—with the most salutary effect. Thus fonetic spelling connotes a reform of pronunciation.

J. B. Wallis rails against "this mechanical monster—this caricature of a language—of the foneticians"; (I refrain from following entirely the ludicrous spelling in this quotation) ignorant, forgetful or unmindful of the circumstance that language has become a caricature in actuality, chiefly because of the lack of a principle of conservation such as is undoubtedly a fonetic notation.

Lastly, neither the indignation of J. B. Wallis against those who do things instead of merely advocating that they be done, nor the "Englishmen" whom he borrows to prevent "this wholesale degradation of their noble language" can permanently stay the current of orthographic reform. The science of fonetics is advancing and extending both in its proper nature as a science and in the general estimation of it as an instrument of education.

No, grannie, put away your broom, before you shall be Borne like its bubbles, onward

on the full tide of English spelling-reform.

T. TALBOT LODGE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The correspondence on Simplified Spelling is interesting and amusing, and it has made me famous, or, perhaps, Mr. Wallis would say, infamous.

I have been much interested in Professor Skeat's neat thrusts.

I am glad Mr. Lange goes so far as to agree with the recommendation of the Philological Society, altho he does not adopt any of their emendations in his letter.

There cannot be any change without confusion and trouble; and the introduction of a new fonetic alphabet must create a disturbance, and it is questionable whether it would not be a benefit to have this stir amongst the dry bones. Stagnation often spells decay and death.

Mr. Lange does not understand the meaning of a fonetic alphabet being used in schools for tuitional purposes. It means this. That, whereas the orthodox spelling is now taught in schools, in future a fonetic notation should be employed for teaching children to read and write. Principal Donaldson, in his recent address, emphatically pronounced in favour of such a course, having the note and testimony of Sheriff Watson, the Pitman family, the Bell family, and others who had experimented. This method may be carried through a scholar's school life, or it may be seen when fluency in reading is attained, and then introduced to the common print.

Altho Mr. Lange objects to a new fonetic alphabet, and to it working the "levers" during the course of a generation or so, he would prefer that we go straight away rather than begin this half and half method. There is no pleasing conservatism. The time has gone by for standing still, and if the pace is more rapid than is cared for by anti-reformers, let themselves to blame. They have ruled the roost too long.

So long as man is furnished with a tongue his speech will be supreme; the written can never supersede it, for it is its servant, at times unfaithful, slow and sluggish, and it is not to be counted for righteousness on that account.

Mr. J. B. Wallis wishes to escape from his own prison. The introduction of fonetics would bid farewell to all possibility of expressing noble thoughts in noble words, and like a poultry maid showing fowls, he said, "Away with it." As Job and Shakespeare were his special case, and as they spelled absolutely different from us I infer that both of them were ignoble thinkers. Mr. Wallis recoils at his own logic. I agree with him, that neither Job nor Shakespeare were ignoble thinkers, and by releasing them he removes the stigma which he cast upon fonetic writers. Spelling, whether ancient, orthodox or fonetic does not and never will create noble or ignoble thoughts. If a man spells better than a dictionary, but lacks the faculty of pure and high thinking, his orthographic gift will avail him nothing.

Mr. Wallis alludes to sum "ludicrous spelling." Will he say how such spelling is "ludicrous"? What is the standard spelling? What is its virtue?

That hardy child of Trench—"language groez"—rears its head again. I "spect" it does, seeing that we have been told so often; but how does it grow? Has Mr. Wallis seen it move, and from whence came the vital power? Darwin makes no such record.

Mr. Wallis asks if we have considered our continental neighbors. Miss Jones told us we hadn't to bother about them; now we have to regard them by preserving our spelling.

Mr. Wallis is good enough to allot to me the power of setting European names by the use of the simple phrase that Mr. Chamberlain had been sent tripping in his spelling. I must apologize to the proprietors of the ACADEMY, to Mr. Chamberlain, to Sir Edward Grey, and to all the names upon earth, for making use of such a diabolic expression. I truly repent, and promise never to do it again, especially if my memory fails me.

I regret you consider my reply to Miss Jones was couched in scorn. I hope a milder term will be accepted by her, as such a spirit would and is, I hope, absolutely foreign to me. With such a charge against me as that which Mr. Wallis has levelled at me, I trust, Mr. Editor, you will be considerate or I must seek protection, if not satisfaction.

I imagined nothing as to whether Westerners or Easterners sounded the "r" broadly or lightly. Miss Jones pitted Northerners and Southerners together. I replied that we, in the north, did sound the "r" broadly, and enjoined upon Southerners to do the same, and our Western friends will say Amen.

You question what the testimony of Mr. Egbert Roberts and the refusal of Mrs. Patti to sing has to do with the subject under discussion. Again I refer to Miss Jones. She spoke about Keats in fonetics, music and melody departing thereby, and poetic speakers valuing the individual word and letter, as the fonetic letter and word were without poetry or value. I contested her position, and am glad to have your endorsement by your rejection of the intrusion.

I am glad to learn from Principal Donaldson's address that the Senate of the London University is in communication with kindred bodies with a view to memorializing the Education Department to appoint a Committee of Investigation with a view to arriving at some general agreement on the main principles underlying all voice and speech training. He thinks there can be little doubt that such a Committee would recommend the use of a phonetic alphabet, as indeed is indicated in the memorial to the University of London which has led the University to take this step.

Professor Moir speaking at the opening of the Greek class, Edinburgh University, last week, welcomed the new spelling decreed by President Roosevelt.

H. DRUMMOND.

THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WORKING MEN AND WOMEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—An important movement for the Higher Education of Workpeople has found expression in an organisation known as the Workers Educational Association, which can claim to represent both working-class demand and educational supply, being, as it is, a federation of the Universities and organisations of workpeople. Its members are nearly all working men and women.

The excellence of its constructive work in many towns is well known to those who are interested in the education of the people. Further, Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, Secretary to the Oxford University Extension Delegacy, affirms in the Fortnightly Review for August that "the Association has worked wonders in bringing into closer and more sympathetic contact representatives of the Universities and of working-class organisations."

We, who are helping, realise the great responsibility which lies upon this young Association (founded in 1903), and we know somewhat of the heavy demands from all parts which are made upon it. Moreover, we are deeply impressed by the need for the continuance of its untiring missionary effort aimed at stimulating the desire for education on the part of our people in all parts. Having regard to these things, it seems to us that a central office, with reasonable equipment, is an immediate necessity. The work must not be hindered in its development.

An appeal for a minimum of £500 per annum has been issued, and, so far, has realised £120 for each of five years. Among the subscribers (several of whom are workpeople) are the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Ripon, the Earl of Crewe, Mr. George Wyndham, Mr. G. Cadbury, the Dean of Christ Church, the Master of Trinity, the Oxford and Cambridge University Extension Authorities, the Co-operative Union, and the National Union of Teachers.

We earnestly urge your readers to make covering donations or guarantees of amounts for the specified period—five years. The Bankers of the Association are the National Provincial Bank of England, St. Martin's-le-Grand branch. Remittances may be made direct to them or to the Hon. Treasurer, the Rev. W. Hudson Shaw, M.A., South Luffenham Rectory, Stamford, Lincs.

Further information will be supplied at once upon application to the Secretary, Mr. Albert Mansbridge, 98 Windsor Road, Ilford, Essex, who is anxious to explain either verbally or by letter the work of the Association, with which he has been connected since the foundation.

SAMUEL A. BARNETT,
C. BIRMINGHAM,
THOMAS BURT,
OLIVER LODGE,
MICHAEL E. SADLER,
D. J. SHACKLETON,
JAMES STUART.

October 20.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Reid, Stuart J. Life and Letters of the First Earl of Durham, 1792-1840. 2 vols. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 818. Longmans, 36s. net.

The Reminiscences of Lady Dorothy Nevill. Edited by her Son, Ralph Nevill. With portrait. 9 x 6. Pp. 336. Arnold, 15s. net. (See p. 413.)

Letters of George Birkbeck Hill. Arranged by his Daughter, Lucy Crump. With portraits. 9½ x 6. Pp. 296. Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.

Madame Récamier. From the French of Edouard Herriot, by Alys Hallard. With 15 portraits in photogravure. 2 vols. 9 x 6½. Pp. xvii, 773. Heinemann, 20s. net.

Hutton, Edward. Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini. A Study of a Fifteenth-Century Despot. With 10 illustrations in photogravure. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 296. Dent, 12s. 6d. net.

[An imaginative biography, supposed to be a translation of a fictitious Italian fifteenth-century work.]

Hill, Constance. The House in St. Martin's Street. Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. With illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and reproductions of portraits, etc. 9 x 6. Pp. 365. Lane, 21s. net.

Saintsbury, George. The Earl of Derby. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 223. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[In the Prime Ministers of England series.]

Jenkins, J. H. Ebeneser E. Jenkins. A memoir. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 285. Kelly, 3s. 6d.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Molesworth, Mrs. Jasper: a Story for Children. With illustrations by Gertrude Demain Hammond. 7½ x 5. Pp. 235. Macmillan, 4s. 6d.

Robertson, W. Graham. Gold, Frankincense, and Myrrh, and Other Pageants for a Baby Girl. With 12 designs in colour by the author. 10½ x 8½. Pp. 152. Lane, 7s. 6d. net.

Fairy Gold, A Book of Old English Fairy Tales. Chosen by Ernest Rhys. Illustrated by Herbert Cole. 8 x 6. Pp. 474. Dent, 5s. net.

Brereton, F. S. Roger the Bold. A Tale of the Conquest of Mexico. Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood. 8 x 5½. Pp. 381. Macdonald, Alexander.

The Lost Explorers. A Story of the Trackless Desert. Illustrated by Arthur H. Buckland. 8 x 5½. Pp. 380. Mulholland, Rosa (Lady Gilbert).

Our Sister Maisie. Illustrated by G. Demain Hammond. 8 x 5½. Pp. 383. Heddlie, Ethel F. Girl Comrades. Illustrated by G. Demain Hammond. 8 x 5½. Pp. 372. Blackie, 6s. each.

Henty, G. A. With Clive in India, or the Beginnings of an Empire. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 378. Henty, G. A. Both Sides the Border. A Tale of Hotspur and Glendower. Illustrated by Ralph Peacock. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 384. New editions. Blackie, 3s. 6d. each.

Pollard, Eliza F. With Gordon at Khartoum. Illustrations by Frances Ewan. 7½ x 5. Pp. 248. Blackie, 2s. 6d.

Harris, Joel Chandler. Uncle Remus, or The Story of Mr. Fox and Brer Rabbit. With 12 coloured plates by Harry Rowntree, and 84 pen-and-ink sketches by René Bull. 12½ x 9½. Pp. 110. Nelson, 5s.

Avery, Harold. Firelock and Steel. A Story of the "Good Old Days." 8 x 5½. Pp. 464. Warren-Bell, R. S. The Duffer. A Story for Boys and "Old Boys." 8 x 5½. Pp. 462. Nelson, 5s. each.

Everett-Green, Evelyn. A Heroine of France. The Story of Joan of Arc. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. Nelson, 2s. 6d.

Young, Charles. Tales of Jack and Jane. With 8 full-page illustrations in colour by W. H. Walker. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 131. Lane, 3s. 6d.

Blackie's Children's Annual. Stories and Rhymes by various authors; designs and pictures by various artists. 11 x 9. Pp. 192. Blackie, 3s. 6d.

Christie, G. F. Round de Ole Plantation. Illustrated in colour. 11½ x 8½. Blackie, 2s. 6d.

Little Pickles. Rhymes for Children by Richard Hunter; illustrations by Ruth Cobb. 10 x 7. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

Road, Rail, and Sea. A Picture-Book for Little Folk. Pictures by Charles Robinson; Stories by Clare Jerrold. 10½ x 8. Blackie, 1s.

Bramston, M. The Fortunes of Junia. A Story for Girls. 7½ x 5. Pp. 159. Henderson, J. E. Daybreak. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. 7½ x 5. Pp. 159.

Neale, J. M. Agnes de Tracy: A Tale of the Times of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. 7½ x 5. Pp. 178. S.P.C.K. 1s. 6d. each.

ECONOMICS.

Crozier, John Beattie. The Wheel of Wealth. 9 x 6. Pp. 526. Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.

[“Being a reconstruction of the science and art of political economy on the lines of modern evolution.”]

EDUCATION.

Hull, Eleanor. A Text-book of Irish Literature. Part I. 7½ x 5. Pp. 260. Nutt, 3s. net.

[Takes in, generally, the period up to the sixteenth century. Chronology and Index.]

Smith, Arnold W. Education and Ethics, and Other Essays On Educational Subjects. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 72. Birmingham: The Saint George Press, 3s. net.

[Six essays, the first of which appeared in The Westminster Review; two others are a modification of articles which appeared in The Westminster Review and Saint George.]

ETHNOLOGY.

Skeat, Walter William; and Blagden, Charles Otto. Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula. With numerous illustrations specially taken for the work. 2 vols. 9 x 6½. Pp. xi, 1579. Macmillan, 42s. net.

FICTION.

Sir John Constantine. Memoirs of his Adventures at Home and Abroad and Particularly in the Island of Corsica: Beginning with the Year 1756. Written by his son, Prosper Paleologus, otherwise Constantine, and edited by “Q” (A. T. Quiller-Couch). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 391. Smith, Elder, 6s.

Cautley, C. Holmes. The Millmaster. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 396. Arnold, 6s.

Eccott, W. J. The Hearth of Hutton. 8 x 5½. Pp. 346. Blackwood, 6s.

Whitechurch, Victor L. The Locum Tenens. 7½ x 5. Pp. 316. Unwin, 6s.

Maxwell, Helen. Eve and the Wood-God. 7½ x 5. Pp. 283. Brown, Langham, 6s.

White, Roma. Moons and Winds of Araby. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 212. Brown, Langham, 5s.

Locke, William J. The Belovdd Vagabond. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 303. Lane, 6s.

Ryves, K. C. At the Sign of the Peacock. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 302. Unwin 6s. [A new volume in the First Novel Library.]

Tracy, Louis. Waifs of Circumstance. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 408. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[This story of the voyage of the Kansas is much the best novel Mr. Louis Tracy has written, and one of the best tales of adventure we have read for some considerable time. Villains and cowards and heroes and a heroine, a man shanghaied, dynamite concealed in the coal, partial shipwreck, gales, mutiny, cannibals, and so on; with a wedding at the end and never a dull page.]

Newbolt, Henry. The Old Country. A Romance. 7½ x 5. Pp. 365. Smith Elder, 6s.

Begbie, Harold. The Priest. 7½ x 5. Pp. 430. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

McCutcheon, George Barr. Nedra. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 323. E. Grant Richards, 6s.

Kernahan, Coulson. The Duel. 7½ x 3½. Pp. 90. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s.

Wyllarde, Dolf. As Ye Have Sown. 8 x 5½. Pp. 363. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Joubert, Carl. The Tyranny of Faith. A Story of Courland. 8 x 5½. Pp. 320. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Travers, Graham. Growth. 7½ x 5. Pp. 418. Constable, 6s.
 Forman, Justus Miles. Buchanan's Wife. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.
 [Married against her will, Buchanan's wife was not happy. Appears on the scene the Other Man, and instantly Buchanan himself disappears. A corpse is found. Betty, longing for happiness, identifies it as that of her husband, and marries the Other Man. Follows an idyl in a cottage, and—the reappearance of Buchanan. Ultimately, of course, all is well, and presumably the idyl—rudely interrupted by the inconsiderate Husband Number One—is resumed. Mr. Forman knows his public and caters for it. Some day he may write a good novel.]

Lee, Jennette. Uncle William. The Man Who was Shiftless. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 278. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
 [The story of "the man who was shiftless" closely resembles "Pa Gladden" and other books of a similar nature which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have introduced to the English public. "Uncle William" himself is a delightful creation. It would be idle to pretend that he is a typical fisherman, or that he speaks as a fisherman would; but we take him for what he is—the author's ideal of what a fisherman should be—and enjoy his philanthropic enterprises. A book to cheer the heart on a rainy day. The illustrations are not in keeping with the text.]

HISTORY.

Young, Filson. Christopher Columbus and the New World of his Discovery. A narrative. With a note on the Navigation of Columbus's First Voyage, by the Earl of Dunraven. 2 vols. 9 x 6½. Pp. xix, 722 E. Grant Richards, 25s. net.

Joyce, P. W. A Smaller History of Ancient Ireland. With 213 illustrations. 7 x 4½. Pp. 574. Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.

[“Treating of the Government, military system and law; religion, learning and art; trades, industries and commerce; manners, customs, and domestic life, of the ancient Irish people.” An abridgment of Dr. Joyce's larger “Social History of Ancient Ireland.”]

LITERATURE.

An Index to the Collected Works of William Hazlitt, edited by A. R. Waller and Arnold Glover. 8½ x 6. Pp. 237. Dent, 5s. net.

[This index is now published, through the collaboration of Mr. A. R. Waller, Mrs. Arnold Glover, and Messrs. J. M. Dent, at a price considerably below cost, in order to place it within the reach of all lovers of Hazlitt, and in memory of Mr. Arnold Glover.]

Rickett, Arthur. The Vagabond in Literature. With 6 portraits. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 205. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.

[Essays on Hazlitt, De Quincey, George Borrow, Henry D. Thoreau, R. L. Stevenson, Richard Jefferies, and Walt Whitman.]

Address on the Study of Shakespeare. By the Bishop of Ripon. Delivered at the Special Meeting of the British Empire Shakespeare Society at the Garrick Theatre, July 2, 1906. 7½ x 5. Pp. 11. British Empire Shakespeare Society, 17 Southwell Gardens, S.W., 1s.; to members, 6d.

Book-Prices Current. Vol. xx. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 745. Elliot Stock, 25s. 6d.

[“Being a record of the prices at which books have been sold at auction during the season of 1906 [from October 1905 to July 1906], with the titles and descriptions in full, the catalogue numbers, the names of the purchasers, special notes on certain books, and a full index.”]

Riedl, Frederick. A History of Hungarian Literature. 8 x 5½. Pp. 293. Heinemann, 6s.

[In the series of Short Histories of the Literatures of the World, edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse.]

LOGIC.

Maclean, Douglas. Reason, Thought and Language, or the Many and the One. A revised system of logical doctrine in relation to the forms of idiomatic discourse. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xvi, 583. Frowde, 15s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Swettenham, Sir Frank. British Malaya. An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. With a specially compiled map, numerous illustrations reproduced from photographs, and a frontispiece in photogravure. 9 x 6. Pp. 354. Lane, 16s. net.

Spelling Reform. Address Delivered October 12, 1906, by James Donaldson, M.A., LL.D., Principal of the University of St. Andrews, at the Opening of Session 1906-1907. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 16. St. Andrews: Henderson, 6d.

Black, F. A. National Phenomena. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 366. Gall & Inglis, n.p.
 [“A collection of descriptive and speculative essays on some of the by-paths of Nature.” There are four essays the subjects of which may be described as meteorological, three which deal more or less with celestial phenomena, and three the subjects of which are of a geographical character.]

The Young People. By One of the Old People. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 202. Murray 5s. net.

[A book of light essays on the happiness of the London life of certain young people well known to the writer.]

Green-Armytage, A. J. Maids of Honour. With portraits. 9 x 6. Pp. 375. Blackwood, 10s. 6d. net.

[Twelve descriptive sketches of single women who have distinguished themselves in philanthropy, travel, nursing, science, poetry, and prose. Hannah More, Mary Carpenter, Caroline Lucretia Herschel, “Sister Dora” (Dorothy Wyndlow Pattison), Mary Kingsley, Adelaide Anne Proctor, Marianne North, Jean Ingelow, Louisa Alcott, Christina Rossetti, Agnes Strickland and Mary Lamb.]

Prickard, A. O. New College, Oxford. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. 7 x 4½. Pp. 99. Dent, 2s. net.

[In the College Monographs series.]

The Old Roof-Tree. Letters of Ishbel to her Half-Brother, Mark Latimer. (August—January.) 8 x 5½. Pp. 271. Longmans, 5s. net.

MUSIC.

Dry, Wakeling. Giacomo Puccini. 7½ x 5. Pp. 114. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.
 [In the Living Masters of Music series.]

PHILOSOPHY.

Royce, Josiah. The Conception of Immortality. Münsterberg, Hugo. The Eternal Life. Crothers, Samuel McChord. The Endless Life. Osler, William. Science and Immortality. James, William. Human Immortality: Two Supposed Objections to the Doctrine (Sixth edition). Each 5½ x 3½. Constable, 1s. net each.

[A new series of Monographs on Immortality.]

POETRY.

Cooper, Alfred B. Flood-Tides and other Poems. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 59. Marshall Bros., n.p.

Walrond, Francis Ernley. The Lady Beautiful, and other Poems. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 64. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.

Fairfax, J. G. The Gates of Sleep, and other Poems. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 62. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.

[Both in the Vigo Cabinet series.]

Graham, Harry. Misrepresentative Women and Other Verses. Illustrated by Dan Sayre Groesbeck. 8½ x 7. Pp. 115. Arnold, 5s.

[Humorous verses, many of which have appeared in Vanity Fair, Punch, and other periodicals.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

A lytell treatyse of the horse, the sheep, and the ghooes. By John Lydgate. Printed at Westminster by Wynkyn de Worde about 1459. 10½ x 7. Cambridge University Press, 10s. net.

The Churl and the Bird. Translated from the French by John Lydgate. Printed by William Caxton about 1478. 10½ x 7. Cambridge University Press, 10s. net.

The Plays and Poems of Beaumont and Fletcher. The text edited by A. R. Waller, M.A. In ten volumes.—Vol. iv. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 412. Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.

[In the Cambridge English Classics series. Reprinted from the Folio of 1679, with a complete record of earlier variant readings. Vol. iv. contains: The Tragedy of Valentinian; Monsieur Thomas; The Chances; The Bloody Brother; and The Wild-Goose Chase. A few addenda to the textual notes on The Elder Brother; Wit Without Money; and The Faithful Shepherdess (vol. ii.) are given in the Appendix, before the notes to the plays contained in the present volume.]

The Essayes or Counsells, Civill and Morall of Francis Lo. Verulam, Viscount St. Alban. 9 x 7. Pp. 281. Cambridge University Press, 21s. net.

[In the Cambridge University Press, New Type series. The text has been printed from a copy of the edition of 1625, and the fragment of an essay “Of Fame,” first printed by Rawley in the “Resuscitatio” in 1657 has been added.]

The Modern Cyclopedia. Edited by Charles Annandale. New edition, revised and extended. Vol. ii.—Bla—Con. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 536. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

[See the ACADEMY of October 20, p. 406.]

Osler, William. Aequanimitas. With other Addresses to Medical Students, Nurses and Practitioners of Medicine. Second edition, with 3 additional addresses. 8 x 5½. Pp. 475. H. K. Lewis, 8s.

The Practice of the Presence of God. Being Conversations and Letters of Brother Lawrence (Nicholas Herman of Lorraine). New and revised edition, with an additional letter. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 60. Heart and Life Booklets. Allenson, 1s. net.

Chambers's Concise Gazetteer of the World. Topographical, statistical, historical, and pronouncing. Edited by David Patrick. Revised edition. 8½ x 6. Pp. 768. Chambers, 6s. net.

Paget, Stephen. Experiments on Animals. With an introduction by Lord Lister. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 387. Nisbet, 4s. 6d. net.

[Third edition, revised. A pamphlet entitled “The Case against Antivivisection” has been added.]

Dunckley, Henry. Lord Melbourne. Second edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 248. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[In the Prime Ministers of England series.]

Symons, Arthur. An Introduction to the Study of “Browning”. New edition, revised and enlarged. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 263. Dent, 3s. 6d. net.

[Bibliography and index to poems.]

Tillyard, Frank. Banking and Negotiable Instruments. A Manual of Practical Law. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 386. Black, 5s. net.

[Second edition, revised and considerably enlarged. Two appendices—Stamp Duty, and Forms Relating to Cheques, Bills of Exchange, etc.—have been added. Index.]

Jackson, Rev. George. A Young Man's Bookshelf. 7 x 4½. Pp. 269. Kelly, 1s. 6d. net.

[Discussions of twenty-three books especially suitable, in the author's opinion, for a young man's bookshelf; reprinted from The Young Man.]

SOCIOLOGY.

Wells, H. G. The Future in America. A Search After Realities. 8½ x 6. Pp. 359. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY.

Williams, W. J. Newman, Pascal, Loisy and the Catholic Church. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 316. Griffiths, 6s. net.

Spence-Jones, Very Rev. H. D. M. The Golden Age of the Church. With a map. 8½ x 6. Pp. 446. S.P.C.K., 7s. 6d.

[In three parts. “The first dwells on the institution of monasticism; the second on the foundation and subsequent story of the first Christian city, Constantinople; the third is composed of some pages of the history of the last years of the old pagan capital, Rome.”]

Bamford, John M. The Burning Heart. 7 x 4½. Pp. 188. Kelly, 1s. 6d. net.

Pope, R. Martin. The Poetry of the Upward Way. Being Studies in the Language of St. Paul. 7 x 4½. Pp. 191. Kelly, 1s. 6d. net.

[Papers reprinted from The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.]

Blyth, P. G. Christianity and Tradition. 8 x 5½. Pp. 215. Watts, 3s. net.

BEAUTIFUL POCKET EDITIONS

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in., and ½ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Postage, 3d. extra.

EVELYN'S DIARY.
LAMB'S WORKS.
THE VISION OF DANTE.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
TENNYSON'S POEMS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS'S POEMS.
DON QUIXOTE.
BACON'S WORKS.
SHELLEY'S POEMS.
PEPYS'S DIARY.
KEATS'S POEMS.
POE'S TALES.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.
THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCY.
BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.
 Cloth, 2s. net. Postage, 3d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the DUCHESS.
GOETHE'S FAUST. A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.
THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY and WILLIAM COLLINS.
A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DEFOS.
SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.
POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.
SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI., XVII., & XVIII. CENTURIES.
POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.
CHEVALIER BAYARD.

Newnes' Devotional Series.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics.
 Super royal 42mo. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net. Cloth, 2s. each net.
 Postage, 3d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH.
THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS.
THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.
THE CHRISTIAN YEAR.
THE SACRED POEMS OF HARRY VAUGHAN.
LYRA INNOCENTIUM.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

RECENT VOLUMES PUBLISHED BY GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

A TECHNOLOGICAL AND SCIENTIFIC DICTIONARY

Edited by C. F. Tweney and G. F. Goodchild,
 M.A., B.Sc. Cloth, 18s. 6d. net; half-morocco,
 21s. net.

NEWNES' ART LIBRARY

CORREGGIO.

With an Introduction by Selwyn Brinton.

INGRES.

With an Introduction by Octave Uzanne.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

With an Introduction by Dr. George Gronau.

3s. 6d. net each. By Post, 3s. 10d.

THE NATIONAL ART GALLERY OF LONDON

Complete in Seven Volumes.

The North Italian School, by Sir Charles Holroyd.

The Central Italian School, by Sir Charles Holroyd

The French, German and Spanish Schools, by Walter Bayes.

3s. 6d. net each. By Post 3s. 10d.

THIN PAPER CLASSICS

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCY

THE TRAVELS OF MUNGO PARK

BYRON'S POEMS. 3 vols.

ESSAYS OF ADDISON

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB

Lambskin 3s. 6d. net per volume; cloth, 3s. net per volume.
 Postage 3d. extra.

DRAWINGS BY GREAT MASTERS

GAINSBOROUGH

By Lord Ronald Sutherland Gower

LEONARDO DA VINCI

By Lewis Hind

7s. 6d. net each. By Post, 7s. 10d.

POPULAR SIXPENNY NOVELS.

THE ISLE OF UNREST. By H. S. Merriman.

AN IMAGINATIVE MAN. By Robert Hichens.

DRINK. By Hall Caine.

THE PEOPLE OF THE MIST. By H. Rider
 Haggard.

HILDA STRAFFORD. By Beatrice Harraden.

FLOTSAM. By H. Seton Merriman.

THE CRUISE OF THE CACHALOT. By F. T.
 Bullen.

PHYLLIS. By Mrs. Hungerford.

By Post, 8d. each

SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

New Book by Dr. Beattie Crozier,

THE WHEEL OF WEALTH:A Reconstruction of the Science and Art of Political Economy on the Lines of Modern Evolution.

By JOHN BEATTIE CROZIER, LL.D.

8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

This volume frankly aims at doing for the Orthodox Political Economy what the Copernican Astronomy did for the Ptolemaic, viz., getting rid of it altogether, both in its general principles and its details, by swinging the science around a new centre of gravity as it were, by giving it a new constructive principle, a dynamical instead of a statical basis, a fresh division of its factors, etc. Incidentally, by the arguments which its dynamical setting has furnished, it lends an out-and-out support to the principle of Protection, as the Orthodox Economy does to that of Free Trade.

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO., 39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

In demy 8vo, bound in buckram, and printed on good paper, with fine margin for notes, price £1 7s. 6d. net.

THE NEW (TWENTIETH) VOLUME OF Book Prices Current

Being a Record of Prices at which Books have been sold at Auction, the Titles and Descriptions in Full, the Catalogue Numbers, the Names of the Purchasers, and Special Notices containing the Prices for the Season 1905-1906.

"Book Prices Current" is published in Quarterly Parts for those who wish to receive early reports of the Sales. They are not sold separately, but must be subscribed for annually.

"Book Prices Current" is a trustworthy guide and a reference book of the greatest value." ATHENÆUM.

An Index to the Second Ten Volumes of "BOOK PRICES CURRENT" will be published shortly, price 25s. net.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No. 1 165 HOLBORN.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumes of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1806.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

PAUL'S INKSARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEERED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Ireland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office:

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office:

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

SELECTIONS FROM THE

AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Publications
(PERMANENT MONOCHROME CARBON).

THE OLD MASTERS.

From the Principal National Collections, including the National Gallery, London; the Louvre, Dresden, Florence, etc. etc.

MODERN ART.

A numerous Collection of Reproductions from the Royal Academy, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery, the Luxembourg, etc.

G. F. WATTS R.A.

The Chief Works of this Artist are copied in Permanent Autotype.

ROSSETTI, BURNE-JONES.

A Representative Series of Works by these painters.

ETCHINGS AND DRAWINGS

by REMBRANDT, HOLBEIN, DURER, MERYON, etc. etc.

Prospectuses of above issues will be sent free on application. Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

ENLARGED EDITION, with Hundreds of Miniature Photographs and Tint-Blocks of Notable Autotypes. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' Names.
Post free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1800

NOVEMBER 3, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

GREAT MALVERN SCHOOL OF ART

H EAD MASTER required, duties to commence in January next. Commencing Salary £120 per annum. Teaching in Schools permitted. Applications, with particulars of qualifications and with sealed testimonials, to be sent on or before November 13 to

Mrs. JACOB (Hon. Sec.),
St. Helens,
Great Malvern,

from whom a Prospectus of the School may be obtained.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LIVERPOOL.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

The Council of the University will, during the present term, appoint a LADY as LECTURER in EDUCATION in succession to Mrs. Meredith. The Department of Education of the University includes Students training both for Secondary and Primary Teaching.

The stipend will be £300 per annum, together with a share of fees. Testimonials will be required not later than Nov. 19.

Further particulars on application to the Registrar.

BELFAST PUBLIC LIBRARY.

CITY AND COUNTY BOROUGH OF BELFAST.

BRANCH LIBRARIAN.

T HE Library and Technical Instruction Committee invite Applications for the Post of Branch Librarian for the new Branch Library, Falls Road. Salary, £100 per annum.

Candidates are required to have had previous experience in Public Library work and organisation, and to state their experience in Classification and Cataloguing.

Age not to exceed 40. Applications, with Copies of three Testimonials, to be addressed to the Chairman, the Public Library, Belfast, marked on the envelope "Branch Librarian," and delivered on or before 13th inst.

Canvassing will disqualify.

G. H. ELLIOTT,
Chief Librarian.

MR. ROBERT SUTTON, Publisher,

H AVING Special Facilities for the Production of Scientific, Educational, Theological, Technical, Biographical, and Art Works

Is prepared to arrange for the issue of same, in a tasteful style, and at most reasonable cost.

Books illustrated by the "Suttonelle" Glass Print, specimen of which will be sent to applicants.

MSS. carefully read. Estimates of costs supplied. Accounts verified by a Chartered Accountant's Certificate.

43 The Exchange,
Southwark Street, S.E.

Books for Sale.

T H O M A S T H O R P,
Secondhand Bookseller,

100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

M ONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

G OOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES
GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE (124 pp.)

JUST OUT

Librarians, Bookbuyers generally and all interested in Literature, are invited to apply for above.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London.

M OLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS, translated by Van Laun, Memoir, Appendices and Notes. Fine Etchings by Lalauze. 6 vols., 8vo, cloth, 30s. Another without etchings, 20s., published by Paterson in 1875.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

S PECIAL BARGAIN.—Dickens's Complete Works, with frontispieces, 21 volumes, neatly bound in cloth, as new 18s. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought or Exchanged. List of "Books Wanted" sent free.—GEORGE T. JUCKES & Co., The Ruskin Book Stores, 85 Aston Street, Birmingham.

F I RST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Books Wanted

C U R R E N T Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

R H Y S LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 11 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Hotel

A B E R Y S T W Y T H . — T H E Q U E E N ' S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Typewriting

T Y P E W R I T I N G (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

T Y P E W R I T I N G , I N D E X I N G , P R O O F R E A D I N G . — Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

T Y P E W R I T I N G . — Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

T Y P E W R I T I N G promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

A U T H O R (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

T O A U T H O R S . — Mr. Sutton, publisher of Museum Studies, is prepared to consider MSS. of Technical, Scientific, Mathematics, Biography, or Art (no Novels).—Address, ROBERT SUTTON, 43 The Exchange, Southwark Street, London, S.E.

Art

E A R L Y B R I T I S H M A S T E R S . — S H E P H E R D ' s Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

T H O M A S B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

DUCKWORTH & CO.THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF LESLIE STEPHEN

By FREDERICK W. MAITLAND.
With 5 Photogravures.
Royal 8vo, 18s. net.
[Ready November 8.]

Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY.
With Photogravure and 125 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
[Immediately.]

The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci

By EDWARD McCURDY, M.A.
13 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net. [Just out.]

Life and Evolution

By F. W. HEADLEY.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.
[November 8.]

Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes

By LINA ECKENSTEIN.
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
A study of a branch of folk-lore, giving new interest and value to familiar things.

☛ Something uncommon in FICTION. Note this Title.

Old Fireproof

Being the Chaplain's Story.
By OWEN RHOSCOMYL. 6s. [Just out.]

A Reader says in a Letter to the Publishers:

"I could not put it down till I had read every word. . . . There are, thank God, a good many such as 'Old Fireproof,' born leaders of men. . . . To command volunteers needs something near akin to a Bayard—one such as 'Fireproof'—Kilmington's 'Tigers' would have gone through the mouth of Hell with him. Such have been our Empire Builders."

His People

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM. 6s.

The Heart that Knows

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.
Author of "The Kindred of the Wild," etc. 6s.
This book deals with the adventurous life of sailors and fisherfolk, and there is a strong and dramatic love interest running through it.

Don-a-Dreams

By HARVEY O'HIGGINS. 6s.

The story of a youth of high purpose but unpractical ideas. The life of a great city, with its grim realities, is presented as the scene of his struggles.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LIBRARY OF ART.

"The excellent Red Series."—TIMES.

Correggio

By T. STURGE MOORE.
55 Illustrations, pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

THE POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART.—New Volume.

Watteau

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR.
50 Illustrations, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

"One of the most original and unconventional attempts in the sphere of criticism. With a subtlety worthy of a Baudelaire he discovers the key to the mysterious fascination of Watteau's art."—DAILY MAIL.

The Placid Pug, and other Rhymes.

By THE BELGIAN HARE (Lord ALFRED DOUGLAS),
Author of "Tales with a Twist."
Illustrated by P. P. Oblong crown 4to, 10 by 8, 3s. 6d.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers.STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS FROM VASARI.

Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY:

*The Binding and Title are Copies of XV. and XIII.
Century Originals.*

ORDINARY EDITION, red buckram, full gilt, gilt tops, about 8½ by 5½ inches, with 24 Half-tone Plates and 8 Four-Colour Plates. 7s. 6d. net.

SPECIAL EDITION, about 9½ by 6½ inches, bound in full parchment, with 4 additional Four-Colour Plates and a Special Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece after Botticelli. 15s. net. Vellum Binding, 21s. net. Prospectus post free.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM BLAKE.

Edited and Annotated by EDWIN J. ELLIS.
In 2 vols., demy 8vo. Half leather, 15s. net; cloth, 12s. net.
Photogravure Frontispiece to each volume.

THE ANNALS of COVENT GARDEN
THEATRE, 1732-1897.

By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM.
45 Illustrations, 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

THE HISTORY OF DEVONSHIRE SCENERY.

By ARTHUR W. CLAYDON, M.A.
With Illustrations, demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
Uniform with "Prayers Written at Vailima."
Large post 8vo, half cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

The St. Martin's Library

Leather,
3s. net
each.

Pocket Volumes.

Printed on fine paper.

Cloth,
2s. net
each.

SOME ADDITIONS.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S
Collected Poems, including Underwood's
Ballads, Songs of Travel.

AUSTIN DOBSON'S
Eighteenth-Century Vignettes. 1st Series.

TAINÉ'S
A History of English Literature.
32 Portraits. 4 vols.

MACAULAY'S
History of England. 5 vols.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S
Reign of Queen Anne. 1 vol.
A History of the Four Georges. 2 vols.
A History of Our Own Times. 3 vols.

Please write for a complete List of this Series.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	435	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		On a Poem by Wordsworth	443
Victorian Novelists	437	Fiction	444
Roman and Hellene	438	Fine Art:
Where the Forest murmurs	440	Professor Clausen's Lectures	445
Two Points of View	440	The Eclectic at Large	446
The Passing of the Gods	441	Mr. Hollier's Exhibition of
The Hymn of Sappho to Aphro-		Portraits	447
dite	442	Music:
Nugæ Scriptoris:		The Last Sonata	447
VII. Compensations	442	Forthcoming Books	448
Professor J. Finckel - Smyth's		Correspondence	449
Second Volume	443	Books Received	450

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

IN a strong number of the Fortnightly Review one of the best articles is that by Mr. C. F. Keary on the technique of poetry. He starts by pointing out that poetry is not a "translation of prose," but "a necessity when the imagination is active." He might have quoted Wordsworth to the effect that all men under the influence of excitement have a tendency to speak in rhythm. According to Mr. Keary, "the first donné, the first thing gained after the 'manifold' of passion that seeks for utterance, is not the words that utter it, but the whole phrase, in poetry most generally the line or verse." If sound was the origin of speech, as many believe, the unit was not the word, the single sound, but the phrase. The poet, then, conceives first his phrase, and then fills it with the words.

We have not space, however, to follow or oppose Mr. Keary through all the points in his suggestive article. The point to be dwelt on at the moment is his insistence on technique, not as a set of scholastic rules made by pedants, but as of the essence of the matter. One thing in particular stands out. It is a rule that the stressed words and the rhyming words must be strong and important words, not insignificant or feeble. He gives as an example this stanza from A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Through the forest have I gone,
But Athenian found I none,
On whose eyes I might approve
This flower's force in stirring love;

and shows how the stressed and rhyming words "give a most a perfect skeleton of the stanza." The phrase, that is, created by the poet's inspiration, is the skeleton, the framework of the verse: if the skeleton is feeble or distorted, the poet is—not showing his independence of pedantry, but lacking in true inspiration.

That principle of the essential nature of technique is one that should be more closely borne in mind by writers both of prose and verse. We are not concerned for the moment with prose, but in the case of prose and verse it is equally true that modern criticism tends to ignore these important matters, to trust to "a feeling for poetry" or for literature, and to shy at the detailed examination of the structure, the bones of the work. Such criticism is not pedantry; it is an inquiry into the very nature of the matter under consideration. A good way of testing verse is to read it aloud, or, better still, to go and hear some really capable reciter—Miss Tita Brand, for instance—speaking it. Any weakness in the structure shows up at once, and it is surprising how invariably the weak structure is accompanied by weak thought.

We cannot altogether agree with Mr. Keary in his view that these "rules" of verse are of no use to the writers of it. "If his imagination working in this medium is not strong enough to make all his ideas and emotions adumbrate themselves in sounding phrases . . . then he will never accomplish those things by taking thought." But

Tasks in hours of insight willed
May be through hours of gloom fulfilled;

and the poet can and does—it is notorious—work hard in hours of gloom on what flowed from him in the hours of insight. Shakespeare may not have blotted a line (and we know what Ben Jonson said of that); other poets have fined and refined. Certainly the young poet must not go away with the idea that he can write poetry without working hard.

In the National Review Three Stars has been interviewing Shakespeare in the Elysian Fields. We regret to have to record it; but these near four hundred years have turned the Bard into a terribly dull dog. "Notoriety is one thing, Fame is quite another" . . . "I should approve [of the modern staging of his plays] if there were no danger of the mounting of the piece diverting the attention of the audience from the play itself" . . . "The lyrical freedom of the ostensibly iambic verse [one of Spenser's] gives it an irresistible charm" . . . "Persons of real distinction must always be few." Pro-di-gious! And his language has deteriorated as much as his thought. He does not forget that theatrical managers must take into consideration the "material results of their enterprise" . . . "That indefatigable manager and all-embracing actor, Mr. Tree" . . . "We were taught something more than the rudiments of Latin, with the assistance of prompt corporal chastisement if we showed a disinclination to master them" . . . "My thrashings, which were richly deserved, were given for being behind-hand of a morning because I had loitered with some rustic sight or sound that arrested me, and suchlike irregularities of conduct." Suchlike irreg—. And this is the man who wrote of the schoolboy and his "shining morning face"! We can only hope that what usually happens in interviews has happened here; the interviewer has put his own words into his victim's mouth. Or can it be that Three Stars mistook for the Elysian Fields a spot called by our delightful contemporary, The Isis, the "Isle of One Man," and that his article represents an interview—after Three Stars—with the author of The Bondman?

How strange it is that the very men who are most engaged in the study of literature and the fine arts—the subjects which are held up to us as being the chief means of cultivating "urbanity," gentleness, suavity, good manners—are the very men who in controversy display those qualities less than the average man of business or professional man! Mr. Clement Shorter disagrees with Mr. Lionel Cust about a certain portrait, supposed of Charlotte Brontë. But he cannot write to the Times to say he disagrees with him without introducing a number of ugly words and uglier hints. "Grossly neglectful," "lied," "offensive"—O Literature, is this the vocabulary you give your servants? And this is, unfortunately, not the only case that has recently come under our notice of temper in controversy. When will the professors of literature and culture learn that they deny their own faith and make a laughing-stock of their claims by such exhibitions?

That "the true University of these days is a collection of books" has been repeated so often that it has become a household word, and like most other "household words" it is always quoted without regard to the context. It is found for the first time in "Heroes and Hero Worship"; but, twenty-six years later, Carlyle repeated the axiom in his inaugural address on being installed as Rector of Edinburgh University, and qualified it by saying: "After you have done with your classes, the next thing is a collection of books, a great library of good books." Lord Rosebery used the quotation, when he opened the new library of the London University last week; to show that books can be only an aid to teaching. But that is not to condemn libraries. Only by research—his own or other people's—can the teacher know what to teach. And we should be very chary of supporting Lord Rosebery's plea for "weeding-out." Much harm can be done by a library out of date and inefficient; and it may be true that "books are like men's souls—divided into sheep and goats. Some of them are calculated to be of very great advantage. . . . Others are going down, down, doing more and more, wilder and wilder mischief"; but the study of error is sometimes the way to truth.

Writing on this subject, a correspondent recalls Elia's description of the education of his cousin Bridget: "Her education in youth was not much attended to. . . . She was tumbled early, by accident or design, into a spacious closet of good old English reading, without much selection or prohibition, and browsed at will upon that fair and wholesome pasturage. Had I twenty girls, they should be brought up in this fashion."

We are sorry that Lord Rosebery should have lent the weight of his name to the panic of the American buyer of rare and valuable books. If the books are in private collections inaccessible to the student, they may as well be in America as in England; if they are in public collections, or in private libraries to which genuine students are admitted, they are at least as likely to be useful in America as here. And that they should be as useful and as much used as possible is all that matters. England is not, like Italy, dependent for its livelihood on the contents of its museums and libraries, and true scholarship knows no limitations of race or place.

It is curious how little known to Londoners is the house at Herne Hill in which Ruskin passed the first twenty years of his life. Only the other week, one of the illustrated papers gave a sketch of Casino House—almost opposite 28 Herne Hill, the lease of which, secured by Ruskin's father in 1821, has still a few years to run—as that of the author of "Modern Painters." Ruskin's actual residence is several yards away from the main entrance, and is to some extent obscured by the circular plot of rhododendrons directly in front. Both in its exterior and interior 28 Herne Hill, now in possession of Mr. Arthur Severn, remains entirely unaltered, and this is the case likewise with 163 Denmark Hill, whither Ruskin removed in 1843 and remained till he left London finally as a place of residence and went to Coniston. The latter house, which has more extensive grounds than those at 28 Herne Hill, is situated near one of the entrances to the new Ruskin Park.

In a Scottish publication called Saint George, a writer summarises the investigations made by Mr. Alexander Carmichael, a veteran Celtic scholar, into the question of Ruskin's ancestors in Scotland. In the eighteenth century a tannery existed near Taymilt, in Argyllshire, and bark was largely used for dyeing purposes. The bark-peelers, it appears, went by the name of "Na Ruskains," as in Gaelic the bark of a tree is "rusk," pronounced "rooshk"; then men who were engaged in the work were termed "ruskers," or "Na Ruskain," i.e., bark-peelers. It is asserted that when they migrated to Perthshire the cognomen went with them. Ruskin's father, "an entirely honest merchant," was born in Edinburgh, but the writer traces the lineage of the family from Argyllshire, and regards the contentions of Celtic scholars regarding the origin of the name of Ruskin as more than a theory.

Manuscripts, fifteenth-century Printing Books, in Black Letter, standard works on Numismatics, rare Bibles and Prayer-Books and extra illustrated books are the principal feature of the sale which Messrs. Sotheby are to hold on November 5 and 6. The books are from the estate of the late Mr. C. J. Spence of North Shields. Of the manuscripts many are illuminated, some very finely, and a number are written on vellum. The Books of Hours are remarkably beautiful. Most of the MSS. belong to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The fifteenth-century printing begins about 1470 and finishes in 1497. The volumes include a rare edition of the Bible printed at Nuremberg by Ant. Koberger in 1479, the Sermons of St. Bonaventura, Paris, 1495, a copy of the well-known Nuremberg Chronicle, 1493, and an extremely rare Book of Hours (Antwerp, 1495) which Hain in his "Repertorium Bibliographicum," mentions with a wrong date, but had not seen a copy. The Black Letter Books include Cranmer's Byble in Englyshe (1540), Lydgate's Boccaccio, and two early editions of Chaucer.

Extra-illustrating is still a favourite pastime with some people; if the truth were known perhaps the extra-illustrator is nearly always a bookseller—a second-hand one, of course. In the present sale there are a dozen examples of this pleasant fad. First comes Didot's finely printed edition of Virgil (1798), extra-illustrated by a collection of nearly four hundred and eighty scarce old classical engravings, closely followed in point of number by Strutt's Biographical Dictionary of Engravers (1785–86), extra-illustrated by the insertion of about four hundred and fifty scarce portraits, views and etchings, and next by a similar book, Pilkington's General Dictionary of Painters (with four hundred and forty proof and other portraits). Another work on Painters comes next in Edwards's Anecdotes of Painters (three hundred and nine extra pictures).

There is a copy of the Pickering edition of Walton's Complete Angler, with notes and memoir by Sir Harris Nicolas, extended from two to four vols. by the insertion of three hundred views and portraits. Other over-developed tomes are William Clarke's (bookseller) Repertorium Bibliographicum (two hundred illustrations), Miller's Biographical Sketches of British characters, with one hundred and thirty-seven portraits, and a fine edition of Granger's Biographical History of England, with plates, the book which first suggested extra-illustrating, consequently often called Grangerising.

The Court Theatre has revived Man and Superman, again without its original third act; but we hear that the Stage Society intends to produce that act by itself during the present season; so that those who do not know the book may learn something of why John Tanner was made the descendant of Don Juan. As played at the Court at present, the play is a maimed play; and yet it holds together, and, in Mr. Bernard Shaw's way, keeps people laughing all the while it is upsetting their dearest prejudices. It is a particularly apt production for the moment when what women can and cannot do is under hot discussion. (And since we are touching on this subject we cannot refrain from expressing our pleasure at the vigour, the "fine fighting form" which Mr. George Meredith reveals in his letter to the Times of last Thursday on Women Suffrage. "Macte virtute puer," we feel inclined to say to the man of nearly eighty who can write such a letter.) The English Drama Society has produced a feeble if sometimes beautiful old masque, The Sun's Darling, by Dekker and Ford—a bad choice, indifferently carried out. It is more likely to do itself justice at Chester on the 29th of this month, when it will perform three of the Chester Mysteries. Meanwhile the society deserves encouragement—and advice.

The new catalogue of the foreign schools at the National Gallery—now that it has at last appeared—is very little improvement on the old. It is practically a reprint, with several misprints repeated and a limited number of additions and alterations. The record of new acquisitions is bewilderingly capricious. Why is no mention made of Fantin's portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Edwards, which has been hanging in the gallery nearly two years, when the landscape by Diaz, presented to the gallery about four months ago, is catalogued and fully described? It would be interesting to know whether this omission is merely due to carelessness, or whether it is proposed to find a new home for the Fantin-Latour. The only alteration of importance will bring a smile to the lips of all who distrust the higher criticism. In the 1901 catalogue it was stated that the Portrait of a Poet (636) "was formerly ascribed to Titian. It has long since been recognised as a fine work by Palma." The 1906 catalogue gives the portrait back to Titian, and airily remarks: "This portrait of an unknown personage was formerly ascribed to Palma." The full humour of these attributions, however, is not appreciated till we discover that both editions contain a footnote to the effect that it is portrait has "more recently" been ascribed to Giorgione.

A new catalogue of paintings by deceased artists of the British School in the National Gallery has also been published, containing too much biographical matter and too little critical comment. It would be more becoming and more instructive to point out the merits of Millais's paintings than to give the date of his marriage—and give it wrong. And if we are to have more than the briefest biographical summary of any artist, why should the life of Millais be given with such indiscreet fulness, and the life of George Frederick Watts entirely ignored?

The Museum of Old Masters at Brussels, on the other hand, has just been provided with a new catalogue worthy of the fine collection it contains. There was no real catalogue till M. A. J. Wauters's modest effort in 1900. During the last six years he has been engaged on the revision and enlargement of this work, and the new edition has now been put in circulation as the official catalogue. It contains a full history of the museum and its collection, and also classifies the pictures under the three heads of schools, alphabetical order of the Masters, and their chronological order, giving besides a sufficiently detailed biographical account of each painter. The most striking feature of the work is the section devoted to the "primitives" of the Netherlands, in which he not merely attempts to identify and name several painters of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries hitherto classified as unknown, but arraigns the attribution hitherto given to many of the works of the early school, and boldly assigns them to different authors. Among these cases it may be noted that he identifies the "Maitre de Flémalle" with Hubert Van Eyck.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—General Monthly Meeting, Monday, November 5, at 5 P.M.

Aristotelian Society, 22 Albemarle Street, W. Monday, November 5, 8 P.M.—Rev. Hastings Rashdall. The Presidential Address: "Nicholas de Ulricuria: A Mediæval Hume."

Philological Society, University College, Gower Street.—Friday, November 2, at 8 P.M. Mr. W. A. Craigie: "On the N Words I am editing for the Society's Oxford Dictionary." Dr. Furnivall will move that "The Philological Society approves of the partial spelling reforms sanctioned by certain American scholars and President Roosevelt."

London Institution, Finsbury Circus.—Monday, November 5, 5 P.M. Professor Sir Robert Ball "On Earthquakes and Volcanoes," Illustrated. Thursday, November 8, 6 P.M. Mr. Carl Armbruster "On the Ballads of Carl Loewe," Illustrated. Monday, November 12, 5 P.M. Mr. Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate: "On the Relation of Literature to Politics."

Elizabethan Literary Society, Toynbee Hall, Commercial Street, E.—November 7 at 8 P.M. Mr. R. B. McKerrow on The Literary Background of Shakespeare's Time.

Art Exhibitions.—Grafton Galleries: Works of the late Archibald Stuart Wortley.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metalwork, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture, lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition. John Baillie: Cheyne Art Club: Pictures and sculpture: October 26 to November 23.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Ryder Gallery: Water-colours by Margaret R. Wansey: November 1 to November 14.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc.: October 22 to January 1.—Graves Galleries: London Sketch Club: October 27 to end of November. Paintings of Flowers in Oil by Louise E. Perman.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—Messrs. Dowdeswell: The Society of Twenty-five English Painters: November 2.—E. J. van Wisselingh. Works by Alphonse Legros, William Strang, A.R.A., and Dorothea Landau. November 1, for three weeks.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—Dickinson. Contemporary Scottish Art. October 27 for three weeks.—R. Gutekunst: Etchings by Rembrandt, Ostade and Van Dyck. November 5 to December 3.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. November 5 for one month.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. November 7.—Tooth and Sons. Pastels by Arthur Wardle. November 7.—Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co., Friday November 2.—Exhibition of the portrait of Lord Milner, painted for the Town Council of Johannesburg, and other pictures by M. Theodore Roussel.

12 Concerts.—Queen's Hall: Robert Newman's annual concert (Wagner programme), November 7, at 8 P.M. November 1, 8 P.M. Royal Choral Society. November 3, 3 P.M. First Symphony Concert.—Bechstein Hall: Tuesday, November 6, Mathieu Crickboom and Frederick Fairbanks; violin and piano. November 8, 3 P.M., Harold Bauer. November 6 at 8.30 P.M., Nora Clench Quartet. November 7, at 3 P.M., Barnes-Phillips. November 9 at 8 P.M., Arthur Argiewicz: violin.—Aeolian Hall: November 8 at 3, Marie Fromm.

Plays: Royalty Theatre: Maeterlinck's Pelleas and Melisande, November 1, evening, and November 2, afternoon. Melisande, Lady Vivian; Pelleas, Mr. Frank Lascelles. November 29 at Chester. Three of the Chester Mystery Plays: The Salutation, The King's Play, The Shepherd's Play. November 20. Professor Gollancz will lecture on the plays at Chester.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. November 8.—Sale of the books, pictures, letters, prints, playbills, etc., of the late J. L. Toole. November 5 and 6. Books and MSS. (illustrated and others) of the late C. J. Spence. November 7. English gold and silver coins and medals of the late W. W. Wooten. November 10. Early printed and rare books and MSS. (illustrated and others) from the Mollington Hall Library formed by the late Canon G. B. Blomfield.

LITERATURE

THE VICTORIAN NOVELIST

Victorian Novelists. By LEWIS MELVILLE. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

IN a review of the writers of fiction who flourished during the reign of Queen Victoria, the first thing that strikes us is their immense number. If we study English literature we find that once in a century or so a really great writer emerges and becomes without doubt one of the immortals. Yet he who looks at any particular period will find that swarms of writers abound, each of whom has admirers who claim for him a place in the first rank. In an old number of Blackwood there is an essay in which the highest eminence is claimed for four women of the time; the Hon. Mrs. Norton and Mrs. Hemans being two. That undoubtedly expresses the judgment of the moment, yet we find that the voluminous novels of Mrs. Norton have not entitled her to a place in this study of Victorian novelists. Those who have been awarded that honour are seventeen in number, but for some inscrutable reason Charles Dickens has been omitted, while places are found for James Payn and Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu. The essays, indeed, are not those of one far removed from the time of which he is writing and therefore capable of forming a detached judgment, but rather of a contemporary whose head is still singing with the rumours of his own time. Later criticism, for example, will not award a very high place to Bulwer Lytton. He did not possess the first requisite for greatness—style. Of Disraeli, who follows, it is even more difficult to form an impartial judgment. The glamour of his romantic career and his fame as a statesman stand in the way of a final study of his work as a man of letters. That he had talent and potentiality few would attempt to deny, but in literature, as elsewhere, it is true that you cannot serve two masters. Disraeli gave the best of his intellect to politics. Mr. Melville, we think, has shown critical aptitude in what he says of "Contarini Fleming." There you have all the poetry that was in Disraeli, all the thoughtfulness, and all the art. With the single exception of "Henrietta Temple," his other work is all done with a purpose. That Douglas Jerrold should follow Lytton and Disraeli must be due to a curious vagary of judgment. If it were claimed that Douglas Jerrold were one of the wits of the time, no denial would be possible, but as a novelist he can scarcely be taken seriously. Of Samuel Lover very much the same might be said. He interested and amused his generation, but there is no need to disinter him from the past. When we come to Thackeray we are on different ground altogether. Here we have a master of style, who like other great writers made his own convention, and no serious objection can be taken to the critic's giving him a place in the history of English fiction second only to that of Henry Fielding. In face of this conclusion, however, the following sentence seems to us a very odd one:

Not the most fervent admirer of Thackeray would claim for him equality with Swift or with Goethe, before both of whom himself did reverently bow; while to assert he has written a book that ranks with The Quixote would be absurd.

"Don Quixote or Resurrection" is indeed a most extraordinary collocation of terms, and one that we venture to think marks the inferior critic. How well one knows the sort of reader who begins by saying how much he has enjoyed Milton, and adds that Jones of Brixton, or Williamson of Peckham Rye, has also written some fine poetry! If the question be looked at from the point of view of art and literature, the conjunction of "Don Quixote" and "Resurrection" is not more grotesque. Of Charles Kingsley it surely might have been possible to say something more original than that his power of description distinguished him above his contemporaries with the exception, perhaps, of Disraeli. We did not imagine that Disraeli's descriptive powers had been so much thought of.

Enough has been said to take away any surprise that the reader might otherwise feel at the extravagant praise bestowed upon Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade. Once more we seem to be listening to the exaggerated contemporary voice:

So long as English novels are read, so long—by virtue of its sadness, its tenderness, its sympathy, and its humanity—The Cloister and the Hearth will rank among the masterpieces. "They don't write such books now," says the old man, re-reading this favourite of his youth; and none may gainsay him.

A moderate admirer of "The Cloister and the Hearth" may be permitted to say that this is more worthy of the reviewer of a daily paper than of serious criticism. Of Anthony Trollope Mr. Melville speaks in equally high terms. Some one has called him a prose Thackeray, but the eulogy of Thackeray cannot go further than saying that his best books are throughout human documents, and his scenes as true to life as his characters. Whyte-Melville will ever be dear to a certain class of reader, and it seems ungracious to grudge him the hospitality of these pages, but he is taken somewhat too seriously. It will be tedious to follow our author through his examination of the other mediocrities that he has grouped together. The criticism he sets forth is not, to use a good old theological word, fruitful. It may be summed up as a mere expression of taste. What we want at the present moment is some one who will suggest lines for a new departure. The novel in its present form is worn rather threadbare. Nearly all the arts by which a plot can be concealed have been exploited to such an extent that the experienced reader can tell at the outset what the end is going to be, and novelists in point of fact are somewhat slow to make use of the new material presented to them. They show wonderful alacrity in getting into their pages such devices as motor-cars and flying-machines, but it is doubtful if one of the practitioners of the art living at the present moment has been able to dive into and realise the romance of the time in which he lives.

ROMAN AND HELLENE

The Silver Age of the Greek World. By JOHN PENTLAND MAHAFFY. (Unwin, 13s. 6d. net.)

How shall we describe Dr. Mahaffy's book? Complimentary reviewers have probably ere now called it a monument of industry, of learning and of research. There are monuments, in Celtic countries for the most part, which are composed of stones heaped together indiscriminately and are known by the name of cairns. Such a cairn, in our humble judgment, is the work before us. Or, if we may vary the simile, we should be inclined to liken "The Silver Age of the Greek World," to a jungle of historical, philosophical and literary facts, into which he who enters must needs walk warily, lest he lose his way. But perhaps there is no need of similes. An old lady is said to have described Johnson's Dictionary as "containing quite a quantity of interesting information, but very unsystematically put together." These words precisely characterise Dr. Mahaffy's book. The facts narrated are valuable and interesting. The author gives copious references, and his erudition is so exclusively his own that it would be unsafe to throw doubt upon his assertions. In passing we may be allowed to remark that Dr. Mahaffy is perhaps a little too fond of giving references to former works of his own. It is hardly possible to open the book before us without coming on a foot-note which directs attention to some of his previous treatises. This may be unavoidable, but it renders the work less readable. Strictly speaking, indeed, like many of our author's older works, "The Silver Age of the Greek World" is a book of reference rather than a history or a philosophical treatise. We must not omit to congratulate Dr. Mahaffy on a distinct improvement in style. He has not, it is true, attained to brilliancy, or gracefulness, but he has kept clear of the stupendous blunders which disfigure so many of his earlier writings.

It is difficult in the extreme to analyse this book, and impossible to summarise it. There is no plan; the narrative and the comments thereon wander hither and thither certa sine lege, as the prosodian of our school-days, Alvary, said of the quantities of the syllables in Greek names. The leading feature of both narrative and comments is bitter hatred of Rome and Romans. For all the methods of government pursued under the Republic, and for most of those pursued under the Empire, Dr. Mahaffy has nothing but reprobation: for the great statesmen of the Republic he has hardly a good word. Cicero he applauds, grudgingly and with faint praise, as a man of letters who helped to Hellenise Rome; but he takes the Mommsenian view of him as a political trimmer. He has, indeed, gone out of his way to quote the retort ascribed to Laberius, that Cicero need never have been squeezed for room, as he usually sat upon two stools; though what Cicero's Roman politics could have to do with Hellenism is not obvious. Indeed, irrelevancy and discursiveness very largely characterise Dr. Mahaffy's method; and this must be our excuse if we seem to be irrelevant and discursive in reviewing him. We have said that he accords faint praise to such men as the Scipios, though he cannot deny that they were just and able governors. But if the rank and file of the Roman pro-consuls, pro-praetors and quaestors—the Civil Service of the Roman Dominion—had all been the corrupt oppressors he believes them to have been, Hellenism would have been extirpated long before the time of Cicero and Cæsar. Or rather, Asia would have been depopulated and the Asiatic Greeks starved out; for on our historian's own showing, the Romans used the Asiatic Greeks to help them in administering regions inhabited by peoples who were neither Roman nor Hellenic, but purely Oriental. We hope we are not unjust to Dr. Mahaffy if we see in his mental attitude something which might be called intellectual jealousy. In a former treatise he had committed himself to the Carlylean theory that it is great men who make history. The failure of Alexander and of his successors—for the Diadochi, if not great men, at any rate had great opportunities and great resources—went some way to disprove the Carlylean view; the rise of the Roman Republic was the crucial refutation. The Dominion of the Roman Republic was created by the Roman People, and even the Empire of the Cæsars was not the individual work of Julius or of Augustus. There is a touch of spite in every passage of Dr. Mahaffy's book in which he refers to the relations between Rome and the subject peoples of the Roman Dominion. In one place, indeed, he goes out of his way to compare the Roman with the middle class Englishman . . . who knows no foreign tongue, respects no foreign habit, recognises no foreign virtue, but walks through the world assuming his English respectability, just as the Roman assumed his gravitas, to be the exclusive property of his superior race.

In like manner the English administration of Ireland is dragged in every now and then, although a little reflection might have taught the author that the parallel is merely superficial. We are grateful to Dr. Mahaffy, nevertheless, for the story of L. Gellius and the philosophers, with the companion anecdote of the Derry Resident Magistrate. We might here point out that the antagonism of Stoic, Epicurean, Cynic and so forth is totally different in kind from the antagonism of a Derry 'Prentice Boy and a Roman Catholic; but we are not dealing with politics. It amuses us also to read of Cato the Younger, inspired by Stoic sentiment, giving parsley crowns as prizes—of Tubero spreading the dinner couches with kid-skins and serving the viands on dishes of Samian ware (or what would now be called Delft)—and of other examples of perverted philosophy, which bring to mind the perverted æstheticism of Bunthorne in the comic opera of Patience. Were the Roman nobles, then, fools as well as tyrants, extortioners and snobs?

We may reasonably surmise that the Dominion of the Roman Republic was on the whole fairly administered, and that the instances of cruelty and oppression cited by Dr. Mahaffy were the exception, not the rule. Asia was rich; Africa and Sicily fertile: and neither region could have attained commercial or agricultural prosperity, however moderate, if it had been ground down as our author alleges. The administration of the Empire was, of course, an improvement on that of the Republic, if only because it was what would in our days be called "co-ordinated"; but to discuss this topic would be to wander into political disquisition. It seems permissible, however, to say that in all probability Asia was, even under the Republic, as prosperous as India was under her Mauryan Emperors; that the masses of the population lived from hand to mouth, as they do to this day; and that the Hellenes on whom our author lavishes pity and praise took every opportunity of enriching themselves by forcing the peasantry to live from hand to mouth. If a pro-consul or pro-prætor made a rich Greek official disgorge, the welkin rang with his cries. Rome was the tyrant—Greece was trampled under foot.

The mention of India reminds us of the exceedingly wide range of subjects with which Dr. Mahaffy has chosen to deal. India never was Hellenised: our author's own chapter entitled "Hellenism in Inner Asia" virtually admits this. Still stronger is the evidence supplied by Mr. Vincent Smith's "Early History of India"—a work, by the way, to which we are pleased to find that Dr. Mahaffy refers in generous terms. Neither Indian architecture nor the Indian drama is derived from Greek sources. The drama in particular is original and indigenous, as it is also in other countries and among races who never came into contact with Greeks.

It is only a small point, but we feel constrained to protest against the use of C with cedilla in transliterating such words as Çiva, Açoka and the like. At the best it is a German over-refinement intended to indicate that the words were spelt with a special form of the letter S in the Pali or the Devanagari alphabet; but it is pedantic and superfluous, and in the instance before us inaccurate into the bargain. Siva (or Shiva) and Asoka are not spelt with the same form of S. We are curious also as to the authority for Massanassa instead of Massinissa, and Mithradates instead of Mithridates. The forms may be correct—probably are, since Dr. Mahaffy uses them—but they are different from those to which we had got accustomed. However, these are but trifles. Let us return to the substance of the work we are discussing. Apologies for discursiveness are out of place, because discursiveness is unavoidable.

The book improves as it goes on. The concluding chapters are more readable than the earlier. The author is less severe upon the Imperial administration than upon that of the Republic. He justly points out that the greater fixity of tenure enjoyed by Imperial officials relieved them from much of the temptation to enrich themselves in haste, which beset the Civil Servants of the Republic. One who might be recalled at the next Consular Election had every reason for making haste to be rich. We are disposed to think that this may have been the principal reason why the officials of the Republic are open to the charge of being extortioners and oppressors, as compared with those who came after them under the Empire. But, as we have already pointed out, the Civil Servants of the Republic could not have been all, or most of them, of the type of Verres. The mere fact that Verres had to stand his trial proves that he was not irresponsible; and this reflection leads us to invite attention to what is perhaps Dr. Mahaffy's most remarkable omission. Will it be believed that there is no mention of Law in the whole volume? that the word Law does not even find a place in the index? We know that the greatest service Rome rendered to mankind was the inauguration of the Reign of Law. It would, of course, be absurd to say that the world could do without Greek art, or Greek philosophy; but it is not unsafe to affirm that civilisation could have done better without these than without Roman Law. Happily, there has been no need to dispense with either; and it may be that this accounts for Dr. Mahaffy's omission. He may think—apparently does think—that the world has heard enough laudation of Rome. He is not the man to suffer the cause which he has at heart to go by default, and he has come forward as the advocate of Hellenism. He has displayed a wealth of learning, and the most praiseworthy zeal. His book is a treasure-house of historical, literary, and artistic facts, many of which are not to be found elsewhere, except it be in scattered writings of Continental savants, difficult of access to the ordinary scholar. Parts of it are also extremely interesting reading, though as a whole it is a difficult book to master. We would especially invite attention to chapters xii. to xvii. inclusive: they are better written than the earlier chapters, besides being freer from the intellectual prejudice which we saw, or thought we saw, in the author's views concerning the Dominion of the Roman Republic. The two chapters on Plutarch, we think, are the best in the entire volume; but we must not omit to direct attention to the interesting narrative quoted from Dion Chrysostom at page 326. Indeed, the whole account of this remarkable man will well repay perusal.

In conclusion, we have to express the wish that Dr. Mahaffy had kept before his mind the magnificent lines in which Virgil contrasts the artistic talent of the Greek with the Imperial genius of Rome. We may feel sympathy with the artist race, which came so near to being a ruling race, and then proved a failure. But we cannot fail to recognise that the Imperial genius was in the inartistic people. Had our author resolutely faced this fact, his book would have been judicial; as it is, he has adopted without reserve the method of the advocate. He has, however, given to the world a volume the value of which for the purposes of reference can hardly be overstated, and which contains many interesting passages, some entertaining and a few which are actually eloquent. We welcome it, therefore, as a notable acquisition to classical and historical study.

WHERE THE FOREST MURMURS

Where the Forest Murmurs. Nature Essays. By FIONA MACLEOD. ("Country Life" Limited, 6s. net.)

THE genius of "Fiona Macleod" is a thing subtle, elusive, apart, defying classification and analysis alike. There are many names, indeed, by which the essays now reprinted from Country Life might be described, had not such names been already used and misused over and over again. The spirit which informs them is that of nature study; but "nature study" in its present-day meaning has a twang of the pedagogue; of communion with nature—but that, again, smacks of an Arcadian pose. It is the absolute sincerity of this work which sets it at once on a totally different plane from all so-called "Celtic revivals," and other literary offshoots of the faddist and the charlatan.

The appeal of this book is to such as love the earth in her varied moods—such as delight in the delicate shades of colour and form, the subtle changes of light and sound which make up the magnificent pageant of the year. The quaking-grass, the lichen, the whimbrel—bird, beast, mountain, tree, star and tide—each has its share in the wondrous fellowship of which "Fiona Macleod's" readers are made free. Allegory there is none here: we are too near to the heart of the wild for that. Not as the back-ground for man's passions, but as a place full of sympathy and comradeship for whoso seeks them—not as a vast symbolic drama, but as a world with its own moods, its own eternal soul—so we see the lonely places of earth through the eyes of "Fiona Macleod." No over-elaboration of symbol or image shows the writer's consciousness of an audience: we feel that, in the words of the dedication, "the writing has risen like the blue smoke out of woods." "Our own Millais," we read in the essay entitled "Still Waters," "when he was painting 'Chill October' near Murthly, in Perthshire, wrote that nothing had ever caused him so much labour, if nothing had ever given him so much pleasure, in the painting." Here, in a sense, is the key to the rich embroidery of words, the wealth of detail, the golden fringe of legend from near and far, with which these essays are adorned.

From such a book as this it is not easy to quote, where in every paper there is the form and completeness of a poem. It is, perhaps, in writing of hills and the sea that "Fiona Macleod's" talents find fullest expression, and that we meet most frequently with those vivid patches of word-painting—or rather of word-tapestry—which give to this volume its distinctive charm.

Well, I must leave Maol-Aitinnach, and the snow-held hills. Everywhere, now, the White Weather may have spread. Far south, listeners may hear the honk-honk of the travelling solander, that most musical and thrilling of all nocturnal sounds or of winter-dawns; or, like phantom-voices from the world of dreams, the kuilliyak-ee, kuilliyak-o of the wild swans, the Clann righ fo gheusan, the Enchanted sons of Kings, who, as they wheel through the snowy twilight under the dawn-star, may remember the dim lands of the north, and a great mountain that rises among white and silent hills and looks down upon a black tarn I know of, so dark in the grip of black-frost, and so strangely spared of the snow, that not a white wing rests there, or floats overhead, but is mirrored as an enchanted sail in an enchanted sea.

Or again:

Still waters; it has the inward music that lies in certain words . . . amber, ivory, foam, silence, dreams; that lies often in some marriage of words . . . moonlight at sea, wind in dark woods, dewy pastures, old sorrowful things. . . . Foam—and the hour is gathered up like mist, and we are amid "perilous seas in faery lands forlorn": Wind—and the noises of the town are like the humming of wild bees in old woods, and one is under ancient boughs, listening, or standing solitary in the dusk by a forlorn shore with a tempestuous sea filling the darkness with whispers and confused rumours and incommunicable things.

Is it this subtle sense of the imaginative values of words which is the secret of these haunting pictures—which holds captive the joy of Spring woods, the sorrowful autumnal undersong, "the song of the missel-thrush tost like spray from bare boughs," "the foam of storm on the skerries of the seaward isles?"

TWO POINTS OF VIEW

Sir John Constantine. By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

Whom God hath joined —. By ARNOLD BENNETT. (Nutt, 6s.)

"LIFE," says Jack Tanner in Man and Superman, "is a more complicated business than we used to think it." How complicated, how various, how apparently irreconcilable, we realise sometimes with a shock, as on reading in the same day the two novels that appear at the head of this article. Mr. Quiller-Couch's hero (for we persist in regarding Sir John Constantine, not his son, Prosper Paleologus, as the hero of the book) is a Bayard or a Quixote; a perfect knight, who devotes his life to the service, knighthood-fashion, of a lady he may never win, and dies gladly in serving her. He is her "man," as chivalric ages would have put it, sworn to her service, and to hers only under heaven. His fortune and his life are his only in trust for her; he dies revering her as the noblest thing ever made by God. And for all the element of the fantastic and the ridiculous which modern prudence will find in his expedition to win the crown of Corsica—Theodore's iron crown—for his son and to rescue his Mistress, now Theodore's widow, from her Genoese toes, no reader but will feel, perhaps in spite of himself, the glow of the philosophy of life that has no better living exponent than Mr. Quiller-Couch. Here is the poetry of human nature; the doctrine feebly enunciated by poor Tavy to be trounced by the eloquent Tanner, that love is all; that a good woman is a thing to be worshipped, the highest thing—again, under heaven—that man knows; that it is his duty, now as of old, to arm himself cap-à-pie in the shining armour of truth, constancy and valiance, and ride forth her very faithful knight to do her behest in pleasure or in pain. That the author of "Sir John Constantine" believes his doctrine, and not merely apes it for purposes of effective fiction, will be plain to the meanest intelligence that reads "The Ship of Stars," or this his latest novel.

Cynics will reply that Sir John Constantine did not marry the lady to whom he had vowed service, and that his son, Prosper Paleologus, himself a perfect knight, married his Camilla only to lose her in a few months. The men in Mr. Arnold Bennett's book did marry; and the wife of one deceived him, while the other deceived his wife in circumstances peculiarly disgusting. The story is of their divorce-cases. One of the women, Phyllis Ridware, is harder than any Ann Whitefield ever invented by Mr. Bernard Shaw; her cruelty is devilish. One of the men, Charles Fearn, takes advantage of his wife's absence from home to entertain his French governess in his own bedroom, and is discovered (Mr. Bennett will spare us nothing) by his young daughter. And so, through a good deal of legal technicality (a legal training inclines the present reviewer to believe that Mr. Bennett is not always accurate—but that is outside our present scope) we reach the Divorce Court, where Phyllis Ridware openly sneers at her husband as himself an illegitimate child, and Annunciata Fearn (the girl's Christian name seems deliberately chosen to shock us the more by its associations) is haled into the witness-box to describe what she saw in her father's house. That she breaks down under the strain and refuses to give evidence is a relief that comes too late.

The workmanship of Mr. Bennett's book is very clever, with any quantity of that brilliant, hard cleverness, all of which we would give for one moment of the breadth, dignity and warmth of Mr. Quiller-Couch. The story is disgusting, sordid, utterly vile. But can we say that it is untrue? We cannot—in the sense that it describes things which do not happen in real life. Such things do happen, every day. Can we say of Mr. Quiller-Couch's story that it is untrue in that same sense? The immediate answer would be: Yes, it is; men do not go knight-errant in these days; they did not even do it in his period, which is 1756 and onwards. A moment's reflection will show that the immediate answer is wrong. Men do go knight-erranting to this day, not in Corsica nor with guns in their hands, but in England, in the streets of London or Manchester, in their own suburban villas. Men give up peace and comfort and money for their ideals, ideals often with so little of the glorious about them that to the rest of the world, if it sees them at all, they seem trivial or even ridiculous.

Life is so complicated, so various, that both Mr. Quiller-Couch and Mr. Arnold Bennett are telling the truth about it; and he would be a hardy generaliser who declared that one view had more of truth in it than the other, that either embraced more of actual humanity than the other. The answer to the question, which of the two it is better for men and women to contemplate, is so obvious that we leave it unstated. There are works—like Man and Superman—which shock us for our good: by forcing us to reconsider our grounds, they shake us from facile acquiescence into reasoned faith. "Whom God hath joined—" is not one of these.

We have refrained from touching on the relative merits of the two books as works of art. The comparison would be hardly fair. Mr. Quiller-Couch has something of the breadth, the enthusiasm, the high faith, above all the humour of genius. Mr. Bennett is only very clever.

THE PASSING OF THE GODS

Time and the Gods. By Lord DUNSANY. Illustrations by S. H. SIME. (Heinemann, 6s. net.)

LORD DUNSANY'S "The Gods of Pegana" (which was noticed in the ACADEMY of March 17, 1906) was an essay in a new style. "Time and the Gods" is written exactly on the same lines as its predecessor, but it is about four times as long. This, which might be called the second of the Sacred Books of Pegana, contains little or no dogma, but is full of suggestions, questionings and the echo of dim tradition. The principal elements in the theogony of Pegana having been treated seriatim in the first book, here may be read the story of certain minor and local deities, even of some rivals of the gods of old, and of many men who sought after unattainable knowledge. Several pleasing and picturesque examples of the myths are to be found, as in "The Coming of the Sea," "A Legend of the Dawn," "When the Gods Slept," and "The Relenting of Sarnidac." The author shows us again his lightness of touch both in humour and pathos, his genial and tolerant satire; but at the same time his mood has suffered a change since he first wrote of his gods. He is more serious, more speculative and less joyful. He probes deeper into ultimate questions, but seems almost to insist that nothing can be found, so frequently recurring is the note of failure. The united experience of the seekers would point only to this: that the questions What? and Why? will for ever remained unanswered, and that all beings, gods and men alike, look forward to an end of everything. For as the life of the worlds is but the game of the gods, so the gods themselves are but pieces in the game played by Fate and Chance; while Time, though he is called 'the servant of the gods, remembers more than they can remember; he has had other masters before them and is like to have others after them. He has seen them grow old, but they have not seen him change. They are afraid of Time, for he has overthrown Sardathrion, their city of pleasure, which they thought should stand for ever:

And a new cry went wailing through the twilight, the lament of the gods for their dream-city, crying:
Tears may not bring again Sardathrion.
But this the gods may do who have seen, and seen with unrelenting eyes, the sorrows of ten thousand worlds—the gods may weep for thee.
Tears may not bring again Sardathrion.

Believe it not, Sardathrion, that ever thy gods sent this doom to thee; he that hath overthrown thee shall overthrow thy gods.

And in what way Time shall overthrow the gods is suggested in another part of the book, where a prophet is foretelling to a king the last journey which he shall take:

At last thou shalt come to a grey place filled with mist, with grey shapes standing before it which are altars, and from the altars rise small red flames from dying fires that scarce illumine the mist. . . . These are the altars of the people's faith, and the flames are the worship of men. . . . And in that place the gods of Old are nearly deaf for the prayers of men grow few, they are nigh blind because the fires burn low upon the altars of men's faith, and they are very cold. . . .

Yes, it is written that a time shall come when the gods, having no more worship, shall be gods no more. But there are some to whom the resulting freedom and disenchantment make no appeal. Hear the words of the chief prophet of the only temple left in the world. He had a vision of gods leaving the world: he saw them climbing up a steep hill, and when they reached the summit they did not take the road leading down again into the valley beyond, but "went straight on and upward, striding as they strode before, as though the hill had not ended nor the road dipped." And he called to the gods, uttering a despairing prayer to them to remain:

O gods, rob not the earth of the dim hush that hangs around all Your temples, bereave not all the world of old romance, take not the glamour from the moonlight nor tear the wonder out of the white mists in every land; for, O ye gods of the childhood of the world, when You have left the earth You shall have taken the mystery from the sea and all its glory from antiquity, and You shall have wrenched out hope from the dim future. There shall be no strange cries at night time half understood, nor songs in the twilight, and the whole of the wonder shall have died with last year's flowers in little gardens or hill slopes leading south; for with the gods must go the enchantment of the plains and all the magic of dark woods, and something shall be lacking from the quiet of early dawn. . . . One strain of music, one song, one line of poetry and one kiss, and a memory of one pool with rushes, and each one the best, shall the gods take to whom the best belongs, when the gods go. . . . The children of earth must now carry their prayers to empty shrines and around empty shrines must rest at last.

The passing away of the gods—the waning of men's imagination and desire for poetry—is one theme which gives a note of melancholy to the book, and the futility of the attempt to solve ultimate problems is another. For the disillusionment is twofold. There is nothing gained by investigation to compensate for the loss of the beauty of ancient myth and worship. Those wise men who will not attend to the priests making the sign of the priests and the prophets making the sign of the prophets, but go on an independent search for knowledge, have but scant reward. They may gain the calm which comes when it is realised that further questioning is useless, but that calm must be reached through the sorrow of search. And "it is well that the sorrow of search cometh only to the wise, for the wise are very few." Some seekers who journey forth to find the truth are smitten by the gods: perhaps they are those who are actuated more by curiosity than by strength of character. One who had grown very old and spent his life in the search found what he called the Ultimate God, when one day he looked beyond and saw other gods, and, behold, they were the gods of Old from whom he had started: it may be that he was too prone to desire change. Another travelled perseveringly along the road to wisdom, and on the way he passed three thousand temples, in each of which were priests calling out that their temple was at the end of the road. But he travelled on to the utter end, where he found there was a great gulf, and at the bottom of the gulf "one small god crept, no bigger than a hare, whose voice came crying in the cold 'I know not.'" And this seeker could not bear the knowledge he had gained, for "he that had travelled to the End fled backwards for a great distance till he came to temples again"; and he entered one and lay down on a couch. And when an old priest came to him and said: "This is the End of Wisdom," he answered that it was very peaceful and that it was indeed the End.

THE HYMN OF SAPPHO TO APHRODITE

RAINBOW-THRONED immortal one, Aphrodite,
Child of Zeus, spell-weaver, I bow before thee—
Harrow not my spirit with anguish, mighty
Queen, I implore thee!

Nay, come hither, even as once thou, bending
Down from far to hearken my cry, didst hear me,
From thy Father's palace of gold descending
Drewest anear me

Chariot-wafted: far over midnight-sleeping
Earth, thy fair fleet sparrows, through cloudland riven
Wide by multitudinous wings, came sweeping
Down from thine heaven,

Swiftly came: thou, smiling with those immortal
Lips and star-eyes, Blessèd One, smiling me-ward,
Said'st, "What ails thee?—wherefore uprose thy crying
Calling me thee-ward?

Say for what boon most with a frenzied longing
Yearns thy soul—say whom shall my glamour chaining
Hale thy love's thrall, Sappho—and who is wronging
Thee with disdain?

Who avoids thee soon shall be thy pursuer:
Ay, the gift-rejecter the giver shall now be:
Ay, the loveless now shall become the wooer,
Scornful shalt thou be!

Once again come! Come, and my chains dis sever, Chains of heart-ache! Passionate longings rend me—
Oh fulfil them! Thou in the strife be ever
Near, to defend me!

ARTHUR S. WAY.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

VII.—COMPENSATIONS

Few perhaps realise the range of the Law of Compensation, as it works through terrestrial life, bringing unexpected things to pass, creating blessings innumerable, and evolving good out of evil. The area through which it operates is at once personal, social, and cosmic. A man suffers from deafness, but what a mass of spoken folly he does not hear! Another laments his loss of memory, but "the gone-things were to go." It is only buried, and is certain to come again from the crypts; for nothing ever dies, and all things reappear. We as seldom note the "blessings of forgetfulness," as we realise the "sweet uses of adversity"; and when the things that once brought anxiety or produced irritation have fled, they need never return with their old surroundings. To the wise in heart life's gains are equal to its losses. We all know that both youth and age have "compensations" denied to those who are in "the midtime of their years." If we are debarred by sickness from the full exercise of our adult powers, less is expected from us; while we are exempted from much of the routine, and from many of the trivialities of work.

Then again, how often we seem to ourselves to succeed, when we really do not. The wheels of intellectual and moral life seem to move swiftly, without friction or arrest. But to what does this fleet movement amount? It is often like the toil of Sisyphus, rolling uphill the marble block that slipped from his hands; or the doom inflicted on the daughters of the Grecian king, who poured water everlastingly into a vessel full of holes. What is success? When we think we have reached it, we are often furthest from it; and, contrariwise, when we imagine we have failed, we are often nearest to attainment. Some of us seem to achieve habitually; others of us never to accomplish anything. But "who knoweth what is good for a man in this life"? It is almost a commonplace to say that things which seemed unbearable in prospect—fraught even with ruin—are seen in retrospect to have been blessings in disguise; their "compensations" have been so numerous.

Another instance. In a life of poverty—and poverty (as all know) is a relative term—there are many wants to be endured; but, on the other hand, there is less expected of us, and less to distract or allure. Confined to a small house, the life led within it may be consolidating and expanding, more than it often does in the mansions of the rich. I have known of a happier and more refined existence spent in a two-roomed cottage than in the manor-house to which it belonged. It is very easy for cultivated men and women to be over-housed; and there are few things more disquieting than the multitudinous attention they are then called to give to "trifles light as air." These sometimes distract the rich, because of the very size of their abodes, and the number of those who serve in them. What can be more embarrassing, or depressing, than the feeling that we cannot make a fruitful use of the things that we possess?

Take now a wider outlook, and this golden thread of "Compensation" will be seen to run through all mundane life, and the changes that occur in it. Institutions seem threatened with disaster, simply because they are growing; and from the continuous operation of the law of evolution, which is one of change. The constitution of a Country, its Church, its Seats of Learning, its municipal Institutions, its Trade, its relationship to other Lands, seem at times to be approaching a crisis, or to be tottering to a fall. It is merely a swing of the pendulum, which is a sign of life. Only what is dead and motionless is exempt from change. In a scientific age like the present, the lament is often heard: "We have no Poets now, none at least like the mighty ones of old; and we have no Seers, with prophetic speech to guide their fellow men." But all that has happened, or is now happening, is merely a transformation, a re-creation, evolution. The noble Science we now have—larger, richer, more fruitful than ever before—is the outcome of what has been maturing for generations. And Poetry is not dead, and will never die. It is only ripening for a new and a mighty outburst. The twentieth century will assuredly rejoice in the work of poets now unborn, but greater perhaps than any that the world has known. And it will produce new kinds of poetic vision. Why should it not be so? Poetry nobler than that of Lucretius, with Darwin's wisdom interwoven, and working through it as a leaven more perfectly than it did even in Tennyson's verse, rising to an idealism finer than Plato's, and more glorious than that of Dante or Wordsworth. And why should we not have still richer Music in days to come, rivalling Beethoven; and loftier Art than has ever yet been evolved; although, perhaps, we cannot expect to have finer Architecture, or Sculpture? Anyhow, "Compensations" for temporary loss are sure to come: and they are even now working their way forward, in subconscious channels.

The realisation of this "Law of Compensations," which operates so wonderfully and beneficently—as the systole and diastole of the world's experience—is one of the best antidotes to depression. It breeds contentment, and produces calm. As an artisan said the other day, "It'll all swing round again, frettin' ain't no use"; or, as the noblest of our poets wrote:

God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

PROFESSOR FINCKEL SMYTH'S SECOND VOLUME*

MASSIVE before us, for not less massive review, there lies at last the second of Professor Finckel-Smyth's volumes on the century wherein (we verily believe) he lives more truly than in his own—the Twentieth; and even at a cursory glance it becomes apparent that the two sections of its contents (the Century considered Locomotionally and Architecturally—Domestic) are not so entirely unrelated as might, to an observer less penetrating than our Professor, have appeared. We hope to make this plain in the course of our review.

As there are some hills by comparison with which others rank as mere valleys, so obstacles that to another would be insuperable become to Professor Finckel-Smyth veritable assistances. Let us for a moment consider the mental divestiture that must be made before there can be begun the reconstruction of an age so remote as that of which the Professor writes. In the first place, they of that far-off dawning of history had navies and armies, but no aery; consequently, the familiar lofty flights of staging of our own streets, whereat, as at an aerial dock, we are taken up and deposited when we pay our calls, and our modern Khatapatasons collect and discharge their freight, were as yet within the limbo that precedes discovery. These ancient cities, again, were lighted by one or another of the forms of direct incandescence, and not, as ours, dephlogistically. In the dynamic production of electricity and the practical control of its forces they of that age were not entirely ignorant (witness those chariots, or motor-cars, scythe-axled, wherein they followed their Boadiceas to battle, examined by the Professor in the section "Vanguard"); but of thermal electricity they knew nothing. These are but the more obvious of the disembarassments that the Professor had to effect before it became possible for him to establish conclusively, in the brilliant passage pp. 405-450, that the deities of these ancient folk, their Datmler, and Panhard, and Levassor, were systematically obliterated with sacrifices of human blood.

Nevertheless, not in every particular do we see eye to eye with the Professor, and leave is taken to question more than one difficult point. It is true that the Professor has settled once for all the hotly-contested question whether, in the year 1906, the wild tribe of the Colquhouns did or did not remain unshakeable in their refusal to abandon, for whomsoever, those peculiar places of their abode, their little wooden huts; but it is disconcerting to find, in the self-same chapter, so erroneous an elucidation of the word "diggings" as that which the Professor, presumably, expects us to swallow. Let us, without going further into the matter, state that the term was not British at all, but Austrian. Not the Britons but the Oesterrichen, dug in the sand those holes wherein their heads reposed, leaving unhoused the rest of their persons. Nor can we accept without reserve the Professor's statement that the Bodegas in which so many of that days spent a great part of their lives were hung with bells at the angles (surely the Professor confounds these with the Pagodas, or Rhodopaeian shrines wherein were dispensed "ices and soda"?), nor that a permanent official, the chukka-raut, was kept to cast the tenants houseless on the pavement at a certain hour of the night. With the Professor's definition of the black-list we in the main agree; but let Professor Finckel-Smyth note that the Eiffel Tower was not an edifice, but a lemonade:

But we must pass to a more important matter, the consideration of the period of domestic building proper with which is associated the name of its inventor, Géré. And we must remember that when Géré laid the foundations of his fame (the phrase is singularly inapt, but let it pass), half-timbering had not yet been imitated in poker-work, stuccoed fronts were not yet elaborately jewelled (see sub-sect. "bijou-residence"), and that the quaint gasometer had not been deflowered of its constructional parts to furnish the iron chimney-lie. The discovery of these things is Géré's title to fame. His, too, is the credit of the discovery of the essential relationship between the villa and the means of speedy locomotion in the opposite direction—for those to whom Géré's ornateness spoke with no unamphibological voice were advertised of the means of escape in the words: ten minutes from tram (q. v.). Of this period Professor Finckel-Smyth writes in tracts of glowing prose. Even of its names he has lovingly compiled a bibliography, and we see again the Rosedenes, the Ingle Neuks, the Wee Nesties, and the "Doctor's Drives" that had their culmination in the Elysiums of Balham and Hither Green. And on this account alone we ought to felicitate ourselves that, in the vast apothec and storehouse of the Professor's knowledge, some trace of these is preserved; for the paper of their plans has long outlived them, and they have for ages been as Tyre and Sidon.

Géré strove after an impossible ideal. The dream that lay at the back of that daring mind was that the wall, already so mitigated as to be little barrier to the passage of sound, should be so dematerialised that neither should it hinder the operation of the function of sight. He grasped the truth that the perfect wall is no wall at all—rather an abstract relationship, an intangible coherence of parts, or rather not of parts, but of the astral idea of parts. . . . we know not how to put it unless we were as great a mystic as he. And his failure quite to accomplish this brings us to the next great epoch of which Professor Finckel-Smyth treats.

And here, in this epoch of Glass, we follow the Professor willy-nilly, step by step, as he unfolds, as a tale of Arabian magic is unfolded, the dazzling splendour in which the era culminated—the glory of Glasshouse Street. Here criticism is silenced; and we see afar off this shining realm, thronged with those forefathers of ours whom we have now come to know so well, each clothed in his jag (see vol. i. Sumptuary), his peacherino on his arm, and countless other jags and peacherinos, half of them broke to the wide (cricketers these), the other half their attendant officers of the sponge, be-mirrored and reduplicated in the lustrous wonder! Well may our Professor exclaim: "Pschorr!" and in a rapturous passage evoke Gumbrinus himself, Spirit of that Glassy Grove, gherkin-garlanded, spaten-braued, schuitzel-crowned, and sceptred with the mystic Wurst!—Ogee, Finckel-Smyth, Ogee!

But already our allocation of space is filled, and consideration of the means of locomotion of the age must be left to a future paper.

G. F.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

ON A POEM BY WORDSWORTH

ONE of the strangest of those works in which the author builded better than he knew, is surely Wordsworth's "Ode on Intimations of Immortality." According to the writer himself:

the poem rests entirely upon two recollections of childhood: one, that of a splendour in the objects of sense which has passed away; and the other, an indisposition to bend to the law of death as applying to our own particular case.

* The review of vol. i. appeared in the ACADEMY of June 9, 1906.

But how plain and obvious in conception the poem would have been, had this been all upon which it was founded! Blake would not then have wept for joy on hearing it read, and Mr. John Morley would not have condemned it as "contrary to notorious fact, experience and truth." As a matter of history, the ode consists of two sets of verses composed at different periods and on different subjects. The earlier composition, in which Wordsworth laments that the pristine indomitableness and irradiance of his soul are gone, is a simple, beautiful lyric with which many reflective men of middle age would sympathise. On the other hand, the later work in which he inquires into the circumstances of that mysterious fall in the nature of man which takes place in the passage from adolescence to maturity,

The Youth . . . is Nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended:
At length the Man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day—is a philosophic poem to the idea of which even writers inclined to mysticism sometimes object. Dr. W. R. Inge, for instance, says in his "Studies of English Mystics:"

There seems to be no reason why, as we get older, we should recede further from knowledge of Divine truth. The natural exhilaration of spirits, which in the child is stimulated by fresh air and fine weather, is in most cases hardly worthy to be called a splendid vision; and the light of common day into which it is said to fade, is, after all, the light of mature intelligence and ripe experience.

As a matter of fact, Wordsworth penetrated into depths of the human soul which no man of science of his age could plumb, and with an incomparable insight which few of his critics even now appreciate. He did not, perhaps, throw any new light on the question of a future existence, but he illuminated one of the most obscure matters of psychology, and his point of view, moreover, has been adopted by many of the advanced psychologists of the modern school. Dr. Stanley Hall, for instance, who seems to be ignorant of his work, has recently developed in a remarkable study of "Adolescence" the main idea of the "Ode on Intimations of Immortality." Men are only dwarfs standing on the shoulders of their former selves. Children are the real intellectual giants.

Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come into the world. Our individual soul is then informed by the over-soul of the race, and in its subliminal regions there abide those recollections of prior states of existence,

Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
Are yet the master light of all our being.

Our intelligence is not the highest of our faculties. The grand powers of human life are those deep feelings and those flashes of insight and imagination in which the experiences of countless generations of men are conserved and expressed. In adolescence we enter into the glorious inheritance of the human mind and expand our nature almost to the general capacity of humanity. Youth is a period of divine madness. Powers of extinct races of men revive in the soul, and excite in it a hunger for those infinite adventures of the spirit in which the human faculties were first deployed and tempered. The young mind is all compact of fancy. As the childish instinct of imitation develops into a poetic power, it finds in the world of reverie a theatre in which its vague, confused aspirations and desires obtain scope and utterance, force and definition. Ah, the vehemence, the range, and the versatility of adolescent imagination! Genius itself is only a remnant of the imaginative power of youth:

Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!
On whom those truths do rest
Which we are toiling all our lives to find;
In darkness lost, the darkness of the grave . . .

Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
Full soon thy soul shall have her earthly freight,
And custom lie upon thee with a weight
Heavy as frost and deep almost as life.

In entering upon the business of existence we commonly make a very bad bargain. For a smattering of practical sense and a few comfortable conventions we barter away our plasticity of mind and ardour of soul. The man who becomes a genius is more prudent. He elects to obtain by slow and difficult experience the knowledge which we acquire lightly and dearly at second-hand. The result is that we narrow and impoverish our nature by confiding in the dictates of our calculating and analytical understanding, while he preserves much of the youthful fullness and power of imagination in which the over-soul of the race manifests itself. This is the idea that underlies the great poems in which Wordsworth relates the history of his own spiritual growth. In order to show that the man of genius is a person who retains in maturity the splendid vision of his younger days, the poet generally and rightly keeps to the facts of his proper experience. He does not, however, do so entirely in the "Ode on Intimations of Immortality," and it is, perhaps, due to this that he there falls into an error which, happily, he corrects in another work. In the ode he appears to attribute to the child the immensity of soul which is more particularly the property of youth. But in the second book of the "Prelude" he confesses that it was not until his seventeenth year that he had the mystic vision of the universe which he describes in the most famous of his shorter pieces.

Among men, as among animals, a prolonged adolescence is the mark of a high position in the scale of nature. No doubt, the desire to enter into every sort of experience, to give to one's soul every sort of shape, may end in a refined form of epicureanism such as that to which Pater seemed at one time to be inclined. And no doubt, the aspiration to develop one's individuality in every possible direction may end in a subtle form of egotism such as that which is sometimes imputed to Goethe. These, however, are merely an exaggeration of certain characteristics of the young mind at the expense of others. It is the heart of youth which keeps its intellect open to fresh influences and prompt to new adventures. Youth is multifarious in its interests because it is catholic in its sympathies. The source of its inexhaustible strength lies in the ardency and liberality of its emotions. It is the impairment in later life of these qualities that makes manhood a finished and finite stage of growth from which no Uebermensch will ever be evolved. Youth, however, with its plasticity and breadth of soul is a possible point of departure for the evolution of a type of man with a nature richer and larger than ours, and of this crowning race every man of genius whose even-balanced soul

From first youth tested up to extreme old age,
Business could not make dull, nor passion wild,

is a forerunner.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Leonardo da Vinci," by Professor C. J. Holmes.]

FICTION

Women and the West. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. (Nash, 6s.)

THESE stories in their collected form are dedicated to Ouida, and in a little letter of thanks that is printed in front of them Ouida points out that the short story requires many qualities in the writer, above all force, self-restraint and simplicity; and she adds that Mr. Marriott possesses these in no indifferent measure. With this we are ready to agree, for we admire and enjoy his work; but, if we were asked to define what we most enjoy and admire, we should say that in the first place he has ideas. He never writes anybody's story. His material is his own before he uses it, and whatever he produces bears the hall-mark of his subtle mind. We believe that, if he honestly tried for a month, he could not write anything that was stale in thought, stale in character and phrase. He has, too, the distinction of nature that separates the tragic in life from an accidental sordidness of circumstance. He can show you a soul's ordeal in a slovenly kitchen, in a small general shop, in the body of a poor old Cornish woman with a dirty skin and an undeniable moustache. He is at his best, we think, in Cornwall and with Cornish fishermen. Take the portrait of Renowden in "The Ferry." It is the second paragraph of the story, and, as it goes on, the reader feels more and more that Renowden is hardly distinguishable from the beautiful setting in which Mr. Marriott places him, a setting of sea and cloud and violet haze where "the island of Porthia, purple and unsubstantial, lay upon the water like a jewelled dragon yearning out to an unattainable star." What actually happens to Renowden seems not to matter much. He is there, as integral a part of the picture as the sky and the rush-grown hillocks and the long white rollers racing in unbroken succession over a flat beach. The whole landscape and the man with it are Cornwall. Indeed, we warn any one who loves the Duchy and cannot be there to avoid these stories, for they cast a spell. All through many of them there are the sight and the sound of Cornish seas.

The Belovèd Vagabond. By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. (Lane, 6s.)

MR. LOCKE has done much good and interesting work; but he has done nothing to approach the quality of "The Belovèd Vagabond." The book is a little masterpiece, possessed of that exquisite charm and refined simplicity which are connected with French writers of the best period. There is nothing laboured or far-fetched about the work, although infinite pains must go to the attainment of such perfect ease and grace. Not the suspicion of a false note occurs in incident, in sentence or in word, to mar the music of the story. There is something a little daring in the use of an epithet of force in a title—fascinating, belovèd, amazing, whatever it may be; when an author throws down such a gauntlet, he is often left to pick it up himself. But we would fight to the last with any one who was procrustean enough to resist the right of Paragot to the term, belovèd. It is absolutely apt. We feel towards him as felt Asticot, the washerwoman's little son whom he made an artist and a gentleman, and who writes this life of his maitre; and we realise that the one trait that linked together all his strange traits, his shaggy strength, his wayward genius, his boastfulness, his wit, his wisdom, and all his absurd impulses was just that trait of absolute, inexplicable dearness, without which he would have been a very unpleasant old fellow. As it is, he is supreme; and the book in which he lives is an achievement worthy to rank with a book as good as "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard."

The Whip Hand. By KEBLE HOWARD. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

MR. KEBLE HOWARD is always pleasant to read; he is gentle and kind, and takes up a theme with considerable care. He paints the characters of three women, who all want the whip-hand of their husbands. Two of the husbands revolt, for the sake of the moral. In real life they would never have submitted. It is such a gentle book that only gentle souls will take its lesson to heart, and they do not need it; but it is pleasant reading, the characterisation is distinct, and if we do not really believe in the incidents we do not disbelieve in the people. They are true, and we could meet them every day in South Kensington or West Hampstead. It is better to meet them in print.

Burnt Spices. By L. S. GIBSON. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

VITTORIA PANDELLI is a fascinating personality in the flesh, but it is her disembodied spirit that in life and after death dominates the story and gives it a strange, compelling interest. Vittoria loves Christopher Marlowe with all the fire of her Southern nature: she fails to detach him from the simple Audry, and in revenge sends her spirit to haunt his chambers. Christopher suffers much, so terribly indeed, that nothing short of exorcism by an expert in occult science rids him of the red-haired visitor who has brought him to the verge of insanity. There is originality in the idea of the story, the characterisation is good, and the dialogue always animated. No one who reads the first chapter of "Burnt Spices" will willingly put it down until the absorbing tale is finished.

The Young Days of Admiral Quilliam. By F. NORREYS CONNELL. (Blackwood, 6s.)

AN old man who yarns about his youth is prone to garrulity, and old Quilliam, for all his charm and gusto, is no exception. He is a little garrulous, and inclined to repeat and underline his old jokes. But then his young days were notable days. By the time he was ten he had punched the nose of Napoleon Buonaparte, stood by the great Nelson on the deck of the Victory at Trafalgar, and met and loved Pientje to whom he remained for ever faithful. He is an amusing young dog—a chip, as they say, of the old block. He will set many a boy's mouth watering for the chance of a tithe of his adventures, and a rightly minded uncle should read and laugh over Quilliam's doings before inscribing Quilliam's book with the name of his pet nephew.

Counsels of the Night. By LUCAS CLEEVE. (Unwin, 6s.)

LUCAS CLEEVE adds a new terror to life in this story, which might be more appropriately entitled "Disturbers of the Night." She suggests that a man may commit a murder, and his son reconstruct it in dreams, with all its horror and detail; his son again inherit the dream, and so carry on the disturbance of domestic peace to the third generation. Three times over the tragedy of George Morris's death is acted for us, without damage except to pillows and nerves; at the fourth repetition an accident happens to somebody, and the moon looks on "languidly, pathetically, curiously, coldly interested." Dorothy Merivale was unlucky; but it was certainly not nice of her to discuss with her son the possibility that his father was a murderer. Believers in dreams, who love a well-sustained mystery, will enjoy this story, but they must be prepared to find it written in rather slovenly English, and with occasional lapses from good taste.

FINE ART

PROFESSOR CLAUSEN'S LECTURES

THE second volume of Professor Clausen's lectures, "Aims and Ideals in Art" (Methuen, 5s. net), is an appropriate supplement to the first series. His earlier lectures were in the nature of a general survey of the field open to modern artists; the later instalment is devoted to showing how that field may best be cultivated. It may be said at once that the author has done his work exceedingly well. The book is one which every practising artist, old or young, might read with profit, if only for one quality which Professor Clausen possesses to an uncommon degree.

That quality is balance of mind. Many books written of recent years show more profound scholarship, a few, perhaps, more decisive insight, not one, I think, has dealt with the problems of modern painting with quite the same impartiality. The author's training and personal preferences in painting mark him as the admirer of the Impressionists, yet he is just to Raphael and Ingres; while appreciating Velasquez, he does not find it necessary to depreciate Watts.

Take for example his estimate of Impressionism; of the modern perception of light and the open-air painting founded upon it. Though he himself practises this very form of art he is no bigot, but recognises frankly that the method has its limits, that it is quite unsuited to many subjects, and that even in its own peculiar field of landscape it loses much beauty which workers on the Old Master tradition obtained. To the Old Masters he is equally just. Velasquez and the great Venetians, Rembrandt and Raphael, have each their due meed of appreciation (their painting is not perhaps quite so much au premier coup as he seems to assume), but their respective technical qualities are reviewed, as they should be reviewed, in strict relation to their subject-matter. The point is one on which it is impossible to lay too much stress in these days, when every school and group of painters or critics has a tendency to cram its chosen formula of pigment and brushwork down the throat of every body else, regardless of their hearers' personal preferences. That the Form of art must be in harmony with its Matter—in reality the first or almost the first principle a young artist should acquire—seems nowadays almost the last thing a man learns, if, indeed, he ever learns it.

On one point alone do I venture to question the soundness of Professor Clausen's conclusions, and that is upon the question of design. He doubts the practical usefulness of any rules of design. Now, bitter personal experience as well as the examination of many thousand modern paintings has convinced me that designs do not for most of us rise up in the mind's eye perfectly spaced and complete. They may seem definite and emphatic enough for a slight sketch, but the test of making a serious picture usually proves too much for our first imperfect conceptions. Either we have to let our designs go out knowing them to be incomplete, or we have to recast and remould them with infinite labour, till they express our idea both emphatically and pictorially without either surplusage or emptiness.

Some such process of recasting has been a habit even with the most gifted designers, as their sketches and studies prove; it is, I believe, an absolute necessity for most serious artists. Why, then, should we deny the usefulness of mechanical aids in supplying missing links in the chain of our composition? To detect the failings of a design by the help of some technical precept mentioned by Hogarth or Sir Joshua or in Burnet's ponderous compendium is quite a different thing from inventing a design by rules. Such analysis grows more and more instinctive as the eye and the mind learn to work together, till in the end the process cannot differ very much from Rossetti's theory of "fundamental brain work" which the author so heartily endorses. The truth probably is that Professor Clausen makes little account of the mathematics of design, because he himself is so fortunate as to stand in no need of them.

C. J. HOLMES.

THE ECLECTIC AT LARGE

IN "The Education of an Artist" (A. and C. Black) Mr. Lewis Hind has invented a new kind of art criticism, a pleasing blend of the Morelli narrative (minus the scientific method) and Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour. He contrives a young man, ignorant like the Russian, Lermoliev, who receives certain artistic impressions faithfully recorded by Mr. Hind and visualised for the reader in a series of engaging half-tone illustrations. The hero's name is itself suggestive—Claude Williamson Shaw. By the end of the book he is nearly as learned as Mr. Claude Phillips; he might edit a series of art-books with all the skill of Dr. Williamson; and his power of racy criticism is nigh akin to that of Mr. George Bernard Shaw. You can hardly escape the belief that these three immortals came from the north and south, gathered as unto strife, breathed upon his mouth and filled his body—with ideas; Mr. Hind supplying the life. But this is not so. The ideas are all Mr. Hind's, and the godfathers only supplied the name. What a name it is, to be sure! It recalls one of Ibsen's plays. "Claude Williamson Shaw was a miner's son—a Cornish miner's son, as you know, or perhaps you didn't know. He was always wanting plein-air." Some one ought to say that in the book, but I must say it instead. At all events, Mr. Hind nearly always refers to him by his three names, and every one must think of him in the same way. Otherwise side issues will intrude themselves—thoughts of other things and people. "O Captain Shaw, type of true love kept under" is not inapposite because Claude Williamson Shaw fell in love with a lady who in a tantalising manner became a religious in one of the strictest Orders, the rules of which were duly set forth in old three-volume novels; and that is the only conventional incident in the book. C. W. S., although he trains for painting, is admitted by Mr. Hind to be quite a bad artist. Apart, therefore, from the admirable criticism which is the main feature of the book, it shows great courage on the part of the inventor, great sacrifice, to admit that C. W. S. was a failure as an artist. Bad artists, however, are always nice people. I do not say that the reverse is true. Indeed, I know many good and even great artists who are charming, but I never met a thoroughly inferior painter (without any promise either of a future or a past) who was not irresistible socially. This accounts for some of the elections at the Royal Academy, I believe: and for the pictures on the walls of your friends whose taste you know to be impeccable. There is more kindness, more recognition of bad art in England than the Tate Gallery gives us any idea of.

I know that the Chantrey Trustees were deprived of the only possible excuse for their purchases by the finding of Lord Lytton's Commission, but I, for one, shall always think of them as kindly men with a fellow-feeling for incompetence, who would have bought a work by Claude Williamson Shaw if an opportunity had presented itself. I have sometimes tried to imagine what the pictures of invented artists in fiction or drama were really like. I fear they were all dreadful performances. I used to imagine that Oswald Avling was a sort of Segantini, but something he says in the play convinced me that he was a sort of Verboekhoven. Then Thackeray's Ridley must have been a terrible Philistine; a sort of Sir John Gilbert. Poor Basil Hallward's death was no great loss to art, I surmise; his portrait of Dorian Gray, Esq., from all accounts was not unlike the miraculous picture exhibited in Bond Street a short while ago. I am not surprised that its owner, whose taste improved, I suspect, with advancing years, destroyed it in the ordinary course after reading something by Mr. D. S. MacColl. It is distinctly stated that Dorian took in the Saturday Review! Frenhofer, Hippolite Schimier and Leon de Lora were probably chocolate box artists of the regular second-empire type. Theobald, we know from Mr. Henry James, was a man of ideas who could not carry out his intentions. It must have been an exquisite memory of Theobald's failures which made Pater, when he wished to contrive an imaginary artistic personality, take Watteau, as being some one in whose achievements you can believe. No literary artist can persuade us into admiring pictures which never existed, though an artist can reconstruct from literature a picture which has perished, as we know from the Calumny of Apelles, by Botticelli. It was, therefore, wise to make Claude Williamson Shaw a failure as a painter. In accordance with my rule he was an excellent fellow, nearly as charming as his author, and better company in a picture-gallery it would be difficult to find. And you cannot visit picture-galleries with every friend; you require a sympathetic personality. It is the Claude—the Claude Phillips in him which I like best; the Dr. Williamson I rather suspect. I mean that when he was at Messrs. Chepstow the publisher, he must have mugged up some of the real Dr. Williamson's art publications. Whether in the Louvre or National Gallery, or in Italian towns, he always goes for the right thing. Sometimes you wish he would make a mistake. Bad artists, of course, are often excellent judges of old pictures, and make excellent dealers, and I am not denying the instinct of C. W. S., but I cannot think it all came so naturally to him as Mr. Hind would indicate.

The reasons why Claude Williamson Shaw discovered "that he would not find a true expression of his temperament" in painting, readers of this ingenious book will discover for themselves. Assuming that he had any innate talent, I do not think he went about the right way to cultivate it. His friend Lund gave him the very worst advice, though we are the gainers. It is quite unnecessary to go out of England and gaze at a lot of pictures of entirely different schools in order to become a painter. Gainsborough and our great Norwich artists evolved themselves without any foreign study, and there was no National Gallery in their days. A second-rate Wynants and a doubtful Hobbema seem to have been enough to give them hints. It would be tedious to mention other examples. The fortunate meeting of Zuccarelli and Wilson at Venice is the only instance I know, in which foreign travel benefited, at all events an English landscape painter. Foreign travel is all very well when the artist has grown up. Paris is the tomb of English art students. M. Bordeaux, who gave Mr. Hind's hero tips in the Atelier, seems to have been as convincing as the famous barrel of the same name. Far better will the English student be under Mr. Tonks at the Slade; or even at the Royal Academy, where, owing to the doctrine of contraries, out of sheer rebellion he may become an artist. In Paris you learn perfect carpentry but not art, unless you are a born artist; but in that case you will be one in spite of Paris, not because of it. But if C. W. Shaw had been a real painter he would have seen at Venice certain Tiepolos which seem to have escaped him, and in other parts of Italy certain Caravaggios. Yes, and Correggios and Guido Renis, too hastily passed by. He was doomed to be a connoisseur.

ROBERT ROSS.

MR. HOLLYER'S EXHIBITION OF PORTRAITS

MR. FREDERICK HOLLYER is at once the painter's friend and his most insidious foe. By means of his beautiful photographs, showing the very brush marks of the master's painting or reproducing with every value preserved the lines and shading of the greatest draughtsmen, the painter is able to familiarise himself with masterpieces he could not see or only on the rarest occasions. Unfortunately for the artist, what is to him an education is to those who should be his patrons a decoration, and Mr. Hollyer, while not ceasing to be a benefactor, remains a serious and not inconsiderable competitor. In the depression of the modern picture-market, of which we are hearing so much, the development of reproductive photography is no negligible factor. A courageous faith in art matters is not a characteristic of the British householder, and he needs courage as well as faith to expend pounds on the paintings and gravings of the artists who are battling, when for fewer shillings he can fill his house with reproductions of works by the masters who have won, and reproductions which even the discomfited painter must acknowledge to be artistic.

The exhibition of portraits which Mr. Hollyer has lately opened at his studio (9 Pembroke Square, Kensington) is remarkable whether our standpoint be that of art or history. If the former, we find arrayed for us examples of masters from Botticelli to Mr. Sargent; if the latter, portraits of celebrated men from Chaucer to Mr. W. B. Yeats. Moreover, we may indulge in comparative portraiture, contrasting the Carlyle portraits by Watts, Whistler and Millais, or the Burns portraits by Nasmyth and Skirving. Additional interest is given when Mr. Hollyer himself comes into competition and hangs his photographs from life alongside his reproductions of paintings of his sitters. By mixing so many years in the company of artists, there is no doubt that Mr. Hollyer has learnt many tricks of the trade, effective composition for instance; and by adjusting his focus so as to soften all outlines and printing on grained paper he secures so pictorial an effect that the layman need feel no shame in failing to detect at the first glance which photographs are from life, which from paintings.

In an introductory note to the catalogue, Mr. Horace Townsend compares Mr. Hollyer's platinotypes with the mezzotints of the eighteenth century, and claims with justice that the photographs have a similar "velvety richness." We do not quarrel with his assertion that "as regards fidelity to the original . . . the photographer is superior"; but we consider his reasoning unsound and his example, Phillips's William Blake, unfortunate. The best mezzotinters and wood-engravers give the "spirituality of expression and delicacy of feature" in the original as faithfully as the best photographer. Where the latter triumphs over the former is in the preservation of technique, the graver, as was pointed out in a newspaper controversy some few years ago, being forced to substitute one surface quality for another, to translate a tone-poem into the language of line. Could any engraver preserve the brilliant brush-work of Mr. Sargent in his famous series of Wertheimer portraits as Mr. Hollyer has done in the photographs which form a notable feature of the present exhibition? Nowadays colour is almost the only quality which photography cannot give, and therefore for the reproduction of drawings it is as perfect a process as could be desired. Mr. Hollyer's Holbein photographs are well known, but his ability to give us an absolute facsimile is still more astonishingly displayed in the photograph of MacIse's pencil drawing of Carlyle as a young man. If it were framed under glass and hung on the wall, we would defy an expert to tell the original from the reproduction until he took them down for minute and searching examination. To insist on the interest of this exhibition would be as superfluous as to comment on the value and importance of Mr. Hollyer's life-work. By his reproduction and multiplication of works precious both as historical documents and as masterpieces of art, Mr. Hollyer is preserving and safeguarding nine-tenths of their value for future generations, and we see no reason why his reproductions, especially those on canvas, should not last as many hundreds of years as the originals.

MUSIC

THE LAST SONATA

IF it be true that the early works of a great man must be viewed from a different standpoint from those of one who never had a future, it is equally true that we look at the last produced of a great chain of works with different eyes from those with which we see even its immediate predecessors. It is not only valued for its own intrinsic beauty or greatness, it is hallowed by its position. We notice each feature which shows its relationship with what went before; we scan it eagerly for indications as to whither its author was tending. Does it suggest that the artist was on the eve of some new phase of development into which he never fully entered, or does he show consciousness that in it he was completing, not beginning his work, by summing up the old rather than by attempting a new departure? Such are the questions which gather round a last work and give it an interest beyond its own, and there is no stronger instance of this than the last of Beethoven's thirty-two sonatas. It was something of a coincidence that lately two foremost pianists should play this sonata at their respective recitals in London on the same afternoon. Mr. Mark Hambourg at Queen's Hall and Signor Busoni at Bechstein Hall did so on Saturday, October 23. The occurrence gave to some critics an opportunity for comparing the readings of the two, since the performances were not given exactly at the same time. As, however, I only heard one performance, I am debarred from doing so, even if I wished to. It is rather because so many music-loving people have recently heard this sonata and because of the special interest attaching to it, that I am tempted to discuss it.

No one is now found to dispute the beauty of this or any of the last five piano sonatas which belong to what is generally called Beethoven's third period, but there must be very many who wonder why it should call forth such statements as: "It is mightiest of the mighty," and "Musically it is a Colossus," phrases with which programme analysts are apt to confuse instead of helping audiences. Having read such remarks through first, those who come new to the work—and it can only be for such that programme notes are written—will be surprised to find that it is a comparatively short sonata. It only contains two movements, a first in regular sonata form, and a slow movement, an "Arietta" with variations. Moreover, the first movement is remarkably short. The Maestoso introduction is only sixteen bars long, and it leads to an Allegro which passes with great rapidity, and in which the development section, that point of all others where a master is wont to reveal himself, is only twenty bars in length. Again, the variations in point of ingenuity bear no comparison with the set on a Waltz by Diabelli, which he composed probably in the next year, nor has each one the individuality of those which end the Sonata in E, opus 109. And yet these remarks which, unsupported by anything but bare statement as to the contents of the movements, look so trite and unconvincing, are all the same perfectly true. It is an example of the truism that it is not the size of the canvas that makes the masterpiece. From each point of view, whether that of expression or technique (the two are of course really inseparable) this sonata is marvellously concentrated. The power of the slow introduction cannot fail to impress the most casual hearer. Its rhythm is that which Handel used to give stateliness to the opening of many an overture, while the interval of the diminished seventh, which begins each phrase, gives a poignancy to the melody of which Handel was incapable. Then the long succession of chords, very far away from the key of C minor but converging with a beautiful diminuendo to its dominant, has at once a wonderful, expressive value, and an architectural use. Beethoven never spoke more simply or more truly than in the short phrases over a dominant pedal which complete this introduction, after which the bass begins to tremble, and rising again to a forte ushers in the chief theme of the Allegro.

In writing an analysis of a great work, especially a modern work, one is often baffled by the complexity of detail, the interweaving of subject with subject, to describe which is impossible, but with this sonata the reverse is the case. The theme announced emphatically in unison is repeated over simple tonic and dominant harmonies, and then a variation of it is treated with a counter-subject which is in a free double counterpoint with it. This dry description chronicles all that happens before the second subject is reached, and yet the use of material is so magical that in hearing the sonata played the theme seems whirled along through the most intricate polyphonic treatment, till at last the right hand plunges from the F above the treble stave to the D flat, followed by the D natural, below the bass stave, and back again to the A flat in altissimo, when we realise that we have reached the summit, and the wildness gives way to the beautiful, whimsical second subject. This is only just heard before an energetic arpeggio passage bursts in again, and a codetta built upon the first three notes of the first subject completes the exposition section. Beethoven's extraordinary power of working miracles, of producing great results from small material is further shown in the compact development which follows. Again it is possible to glance down the page and to detail in a few words the processes to which his principal theme is subjected, and again the result is so forceful, every note so essential, that at the end of these few bars, when the theme bursts out in its entirety in the key of C minor and the restatement is reached, we feel that a revelation of its possibilities has been given, such as another composer might labour through many a complicated page to achieve in vain. Of course the restatement is not mere repetition, but carries the development further though it introduces no new material. When the second subject is reached this time in C major, it is not passed over so lightly as before, but is expanded and lovingly dwelt upon with increasing emotion, till the arpeggio before mentioned, instead of interrupting it, comes as its culminating-point. The codetta passage appears almost as before, except that it is in C minor and ends with some fortissimo chords which introduce the coda proper, a wonderful diminuendo in which the energy of the theme wears itself out, as it were, in the bass and gradually sinks to rest in a profound chord of C major.

Having found the major key Beethoven does not leave it; the melody of the slow movement is one of the most sublime this world has ever heard. Its perfect tranquillity after the turmoil of the first minor movement cannot be anything but a parable of the composer's life experience. It is peace after pain, heaven after earth; whatever words be used for it matters not, its meaning speaks direct to every human heart. I mentioned that the variations which follow are neither very elaborate nor possessed of great individuality of their own. That is not a weakness but a purpose. They are meant to emphasise and to develop their theme, to drive home its meaning, not to express any of their own. They are all in C major; only for a few bars is the key left, when, as if the feeling is too full to be contained in one key, a sort of expansion is made into the key of E flat. At last in a wonderful coda the theme is played, accompanied by a trill which very few pianists can make sufficiently ethereal, and the sonata ends pianissimo with a reiteration of the first and most appealing notes of the theme.

Beethoven's reply that the time was too short, to Schindler's question why he did not add a third movement, is often quoted. Von Bulow in his notes on this sonata refuses to take the reply seriously, and says that it was only an evasion given to Schindler whom he calls a "Strohkopt." The epithet seems well applied, for those who listen to this last movement may answer the question for themselves. It is complete in the great "C major of this life." Beethoven did not write a third movement, because there was no third movement to write.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE poetical works of John Keats are to be added at once to the Oxford library edition of the poets. The volume has been edited, with an introduction and textual notes, by Mr. H. Buxton Forman. It provides in a handy form an authoritative text of the whole of Keats's known works in verse, including some lines which have not been printed in any other edition. Mr. Buxton Forman's footnotes contain a large selection of variorum readings.

It was the especial care of the first Tudor King and his adherents to blacken the character of Richard III. and create the belief that he was both no lawful king and a tyrant who deserved to be swept away. In "Richard III.: His Life and Character reviewed in the light of recent research," a book which Messrs. Smith, Elder will issue immediately, Sir Clements Markham unravels many of these fabrications which appear in the writings of "inspired" Tudor historians, checking them by the few contemporary notices which escaped destruction. The result, we understand, puts an end to many legends about King Richard.—The same publishers announce a translation by Miss Hulda Friederichs of "The Future of Russia," from the German of Regierungsrat Rudolf Martin.

Mr. Elkin Mathews is about to issue a volume entitled "The Songs of Sidi Hammo." The translation of the work of this famous old Berber poet, whose songs are recited daily by the tribes of Southern Morocco, has been made by Mr. R. L. N. Johnston of Mogador, who has lived and studied among the Berbers for many years. The songs, of which a rendering in verse is supplied by Mr. L. Cranmer Byng, have been taken down from word of mouth in the villages of the Atlas Mountains, and are presented for the first time to the English public. The book has been edited, with an introduction by Mr. S. L. Bensussan.

Messrs. Smith, Elder have in the press a new volume by Mrs. C. W. Earle, the author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden," entitled "Letters to Young and Old." Another book which the same publishers promise shortly is "Our Heritage the Sea," by Frank T. Bullen.

November 24 is the date now arranged for the simultaneous publication in this country and America of the first volume of the "Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels," edited by Dr. James Hastings and Dr. J. A. Selbie, which will be completed in two large volumes, similar in size to Hastings's "Dictionary of the Bible." It is, however, a work quite distinct from that Dictionary. The articles are all new, and they are written by new authors with a new purpose. It is first of all a preacher's Dictionary. Messrs. T. and T. Clark are the publishers.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will have almost ready a new book by Mr. Perceval Landon, entitled "Under the Sun": the result of the author's annual visits to India since 1900. The concluding chapter contains information on the later life of Nana Sahib that has never before been published. The book will be illustrated with photo-gravures and coloured plates.

An interesting contribution to Scottish historical literature will be issued in the course of a few days by Messrs. Blackie: "A Sketch of Scottish Industrial and Social Developments," by Miss Amelia Hutchison Stirling. It takes up the industrial history of Scotland during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, bringing together information from a wide field that has not hitherto been grouped in accessible form.

Messrs. Black announce for publication early this month a colour-book entitled "British Dogs at Work," which will deal in a comprehensive manner with the breeding, management and rearing of dogs. The volume contains a series of beautifully executed illustrations in colour by Mr. G. Vernon Stokes, showing the leading points of the varieties depicted. The text is by Mr. A. Croxton Smith.

Mr. Heinemann has secured the services of Mr. George W. Chrystal, B.A., Exhibitioner of Balliol, as Editor of the English edition of the "Hohenlohe Memoirs." The translation of the book has already been completed, and is being revised by Mr. Chrystal. The printing is in the hands of Messrs. Ballantyne and Co., who are working day and night to ensure early publication.

"The Story of the Popes from A.D. 1414 to the Present Day," by Charles S. Isaacson, is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. The work will give a biographical, personal and anecdotal, rather than historical account of the Popes. It will be illustrated by forty reproductions of Papal medals and a contemporary portrait of Innocent XI.

Early in November Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. will publish "The Tourist's India" by Mr. E. A. Reynolds Ball. "The Tourist's India" is not a guide-book, or a book of travel impressions. It does not deal to any extent with the social conditions of the people. It is rather a "conspectus" of the great cities and tourist centres of India, pointing out what a tourist visiting India for the first time can and should see in a three months' trip, and leaving it to the tourist himself to draw his own conclusions. The volume will be illustrated with twenty-six full-page illustrations.

"England's Parnassus" is the title of a little volume of selections by Mr. W. Smith Horder, which Sir Isaac Pitman will publish shortly. It is an anthology of anthologies. The idea occurred to the author that whatever the personal fancies of different editors might be, a consensus of their views would show that, regarding certain works, a practical unanimity prevailed; and he has taken the votes of all the more famous anthologies, and included the most popular pieces.

CORRESPONDENCE

ON EDITING BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The fact that Mr. Waller proposes to add volumes of notes to his edition does not affect the question of the choice of text, and the omitted passages are therefore irrelevant to my argument. It is precisely to his haphazard method of adopting a text and postponing critical inquiry into its authority that I object.

W. W. GREG.

Oct. 28.

Mr. Waller replies as follows:

SIR,—I am sorry Mr. Greg continues to think so ill of me. The scheme of the Cambridge edition was to present a text accompanied by a complete apparatus of variants, without the interference of an editor's personal preferences, either in the choice of the quartos or of variants, and I have endeavoured to keep to that scheme. I am impenitent in the matter of printing one, rather than the other, of the two identically dated versions of The Elder Brother, in verse, in the Appendix, for reasons already given. It might have been better to call the folio under Mr. Greg's suspicion B in the record of variants, but I regard the evidence adduced as insufficient to warrant the conclusion drawn; and I trust that my note of explanation in vol. iv. will be sufficient to indicate (until it is possible to publish in the supplementary volumes of notes evidence as to the relative values of the quartos and folios) that, in the case of The Elder Brother, B may be earlier than A, just as many of the readings in A may be preferable to those in B.

If my use of the words First Quarto to represent indifferently these two identically dated versions (which, I may add, are in substantial agreement with each other, and differ in less than half per cent. of their contents) has misled any one between the dates of publication of volumes ii. and iv., I am sorry; all the variants of both forms are in the hands of readers.

A. R. WALLER.

[Out of courtesy to Mr. Greg we have published his two letters; but we are not of opinion that the facts disclosed justify the form of his attack, which we consider to be premature and expressed with unnecessary acerbity. The correspondence must now cease.—ED.]

THE MODERN PICTURE-MARKET

(WITH A CORRECTION)

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Inaccurate myself, I am the very last person to correct the errors of another, but I really must protest against Mr. F. C. Tilney's perversion of historical and pathological facts, when he says, "witness Beardsley, whose moral suicide led to his premature demise." The italics are mine. Whether Beardsley committed moral suicide or not I do not propose to discuss, but he was consumptive almost from his cradle. When I first saw him he was about sixteen years of age, and to myself and those who were privileged to know him at an earlier period it was very surprising that he lived as long as he did. A very eminent physician who attended him in London once informed me that he thought Beardsley was kept alive by his success and the excitement he enjoyed so thoroughly. It is a notorious fact that precocity is often a symptom of early death. It is not the cause. Popularity never killed any one, even Mr. Hall Caine. Sometimes it kills the artist, witness John Everett Millais, but never the man; witness Pietro Aretino, with whom Beardsley no doubt had much in common.

I believe I was the first London purchaser of a Beardsley drawing, and I can assure Mr. Tilney that even when he was "exploited" by Mr. Dent, Mr. John Lane and Mr. Lionel Smithers, his head was never turned. There was really no time. It is failure which makes people vain (Mr. Hall Caine again being an exception). I think a man's head is turned when he begins to do bad work and imagines that his public will stand anything from him, however shoddy. He is usually right in his supposition, and Millais is, again, a very good instance of what I mean. Beardsley within his own limits never did any bad work at all. The word "exploiters" requires, I think, further definition. As a picture-dealer myself, I wish I could find another Beardsley to exploit, and I am sure Mr. Lane will endorse my wish.

To turn not my head but my pen to Mr. G. S. Layard's interesting letter, I feel it will interest him to know that his proposal has already been worked and with very fair success. There are very few private houses where all the works of art cannot be obtained by purchase when theft would lead to detection. So common has the custom become that a rich client of mine has Not for sale painted on all his most treasured possessions, so bored has he become by the importunities of his guests, most of whom are dealers in petto. The spare bedroom is really a kind of "Bond Street Champêtre." An amiable footman or housemaid can often "get off" an unpopular wedding present or a modern picture with strong domestic interest on a good humoured guest. At a very large country house where I sometimes stay all the rooms are known among the servants by such well-known names as Agnew Attic, the Sulley Boudoir, the P. and D. Colnaghi Smoking Room, the Dowdeswell Drawing Room, according to the works of art which adorn the apartments. What sometimes leads to trouble is that mine host expects such an enormous profit or commission on his sales, and sellers find it cheaper to be cheated by dealers like myself. Modern artists have often paid me the compliment of saying that I was fairer than some of their "fairest" friends who occasionally negotiate their pictures. Of course they are making no reference to my personal appearance.

ROBERT ROSS,
Director of Carfax & Co., Ltd.

THE MODERN PICTURE-MARKET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Layard's letter fills me with a delighted surprise. Who would have thought that the man lived who cared so much for pictures as to make the propositions he does? The success of his idea can only be judged when we see what response it meets with. Some four or five of my artist friends to whom I showed the letter share my views as to the niceness and nobleness of the suggestion; but have fears as to its perfect practicability. They think that Mr. Layard will find but few backers.

For my own part I think that the exhibitions should not be made a first filtering of available works. Through them the mute inglorious ones are not reached; though I confess that it is hard to think of another way of letting the philanthropic householder find his choice. Could a small room be rented as an exchange and dépôt, where the secretary might attend at stated times?

I would willingly find time for any preliminary clerical duties, under a chief, if such were required.

F. C. TILNEY.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent still defends the spelling of tongue; but does not answer my question, viz., would she therefore have us use such spellings as bongue, longue, and songue, instead of bung, lung, and sung? I gather, no. Then why tongue?

Her account of the o in tongue is quite as comic as it is mistaken. She finds in the o "the shade of fulness which I find that the o gains over a possible u." That is, she has (as I supposed) no idea as to how the o got into the word. There is no mystery about it; it is all explained in my "Principles of English Etymology," First Series, p. 404. The "shade of fulness" is all nonsense; the ou in tongue was sounded like the un in sung; there was absolutely no difference whatever, at any period whatever. To this day, we pronounce son and sun alike; the Anglo-Saxon forms are sunu and sunne, and it might easily have happened that the modern forms might have been reversed, or that both might have been spelt alike, as they sometimes were, as regards the vowel-sound.

The reason why spelling reform is so far off is that there is no general scientific study of our spelling. Those who write upon the subject are frequently unaware that our spelling has any history at all. They know nothing whatever, as a rule, of the old pronunciation, which is a sad thing when we consider how large an influence it had upon the modern forms.

Worse remains behind; for I am convinced that a large number of people would rather not know anything about phonetic changes, lest the new information which they would acquire should gradually undermine their present acquiescence in obsolete formulæ.

I think most people are wholly unaware of the terrible inconsistencies and anomalies of the present system. Just consider the following facts.

- (1) There are 21 ways of representing the a in fate.
- (2) There are 24 ways of representing the ee in feet.
- (3) There are 26 ways of representing the aw in hawk.

That is, there are 71 spellings of only three vowel-sounds.

Those who doubt these facts can find them tabulated in Miss Soames's "Introduction to Phonetics."

WALTER W. SKEAT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mis Jones upholdz the value ov the leter, but it iz permissabl to pas it by in honst, often; speech may becom an art, thenz a siens, but that siens must not control speech; the only master speech must acnoej iz the leter, the tail must wag the hed; the leter iz suprem, speech subservient; and the most efectiv fonetic rendering ov our speech iz the prezent spelling! Then we ar told that langwaje shud be the expresion ov the jenas ov a peopl; plial, not academic. Whot chans haz a langwaje to becom flexibl if it haz to bow down to a rijid orthografy, if it haz to play second fiddl? It cannot command, its duty iz to obey; enforst obediens cannot boast ov freedom. Mis Jones charmz, but she does not convins.

If Mis Jones can extract more honey out ov tongue than fung or sung, she iz to be congratulated upon possessing a keen sensitiv eer. Id "gh" lendz a guttural glo to light, why does it chanje its gleaming gladness in "laughter"? Iz the stres, rithm or poetry inherent in "gh," or iz it merely tradishonal? Further, iz "gh" a proper and adequate picture ov a guttural, iz it the hiest, most finisht pees ov orthografic art?

Whot haz Mis Jones to say in favor ov the digraf "ea"? We hav it az ä in heart, ë in breast, ee in weary, ai in break, ee-ä in react, ee-ai in create, etc. It seems az plial az the Vicar ov Bray, but iz hardly wurth waxing eloquent over. The same may be said ov every vowel and difthong. The value ov the 'leter,' so far az concernz the vowelz, iz a very shifting and unsertain wua. Ambiguity iz neither artistic nor poetic.

If the langwaje ov a peopl shud be plial and living, not stereotyped and academic, orthografy must be adaptabl to the mobility ov speech. Mis Jones upholdz and defendz a stereotyped and academic speling. If speech must be free and plial and speling fixt and rijid, ther cannot be a harmonius record ov sweet soundz in comon use, only thoze ov a forgotten and distant past; orthografy then becumz a counterfit and a stumbling-block. The time wil cum when whim and sentiment wil reseev a rude shock. President Roosevelt's decree iz but the rail ov pop gunz; weponz ov grater power wil yet peers the senseless wallz ov sentiment. The baricadez ov waste, folshood and ugliness wil be remoovd, and a more wurthy instrument, a more artistic simblizashon becomz a truer picture ov speech, wil be substituted, bringing speech and script into sublime harmony and unity. To this end I wud invoke Mis Jones' graceful gifts.

H. DRUMMOND.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Although for the sake of uniformity I use this title, I do not admit that the new orthography advocated would be "simplified spelling." It would certainly not be that; it would be spelling gone mad—that is, when thrust upon the English writing- and reading-world forthwith, as the phoneticians seem to desire. If, in the remote future, our orthography shall have evolved into this form, well and good. The people will then be ready for it, and it will seem to them as beautiful as its natural ancestor—our own orthodox spelling—appears to us. I do not suppose for a moment that orthographical evolution will take that line at all; but it will be seen what I mean.

I have used the word "evolution" because Mr. Drummond (good-humouredly enough) scoffs at the idea of growth in this connection. He asks if I have seen it "moov." No, certainly not; neither have I seen it move, if that is what he means. Growth, as a rule, is not a violent phenomenon—to our senses, at all events. Professor Huxley once explained that in a tropical forest, if our ears were sufficiently acute "we should be stunned, as with the roar of a great city" by the sound of the circulating vegetable juices: Poë even speaks of "The murmur that springs

From the growing of grass;"

but I do not recollect encountering even the hint that in the ordinary way growth can be heard or seen. Effusive maiden aunts and others are wont to embarrass their young relatives by exclaiming "Dear me, how you have grown!" but this is only after considerable absence has given opportunity of comparison. So might Shakespeare, revisiting the glimpses of the moon, say of our language to-day: "How art thou grown!" though, if the phoneticians had prevailed, he might lament: "How art thou grown despicable!" Mr. Drummond thinks language—or spelling, rather—does not grow because it is subject to modification by composers and others. But this consideration is a factor in the analogy (for, after all, it is but an analogy—Darwin has nothing to do with it) since it exemplifies the reaction of the environment upon the organism.

Standard spelling, I may tell Mr. Drummond, is the spelling of the day; ludicrous spelling is an arbitrary or ignorant departure from that standard. Chaucer's spelling was not ludicrous and is not so now. It has been a standard spelling and is archaically interesting still.

When did I say spelling could create noble thoughts? Never, certainly. What I did say, or plainly imply, was: that, having created the thoughts, they could not be adequately expressed to the eye in phonetic orthography. Mr. Drummond will soon be quite unable to read current English if he persists much longer in the way he is taking.

Mr. T. Talbot Lodge (or plain T. Talbot Lodge, since he does not like the title of respect) is more likely to accompany the "bubbles" than I am. He would divert the stream into a straitened channel; I merely suggest that we shall be wise to let it take its natural course, which, in spite of all the "grannies," it certainly will do.

J. B. WALLIS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Although I admire Mr. Drummond and other would-be-reformers for the pains they take to enlighten public ignorance of the science of phonetics, and of the refortis they advocate, think, before they can succeed, the public will want much stronger proofs of the superiority of phonetic spelling than have been advanced so far.

I notice phonetic spelling for tutorial purposes only is trotted out again and again! Now, I take it as an accepted fact that, whereas one person never will learn to read and spell correctly, another becomes proficient in much less time than six to eight years. In order to learn English spelling, a little knowledge of the Latin and Greek roots, if not essential, is most helpful, and I am sure a child will learn orthodox spelling quicker and more intelligibly by that means than by having any amount of instruction in phonetics first. It certainly takes a child longer than eighteen months to read with understanding, and, surely, the mere ability to read or write is not an education in itself, nor is the "science of phonetics" a training for the mind, say, like mathematics. Then, if phonetic spelling became general, it is most unlikely that the population at large would trouble to learn the old spelling, too—the key to the past literature.

Our friend, Mr. Drummond, makes a statement that since man has been furnished with a tongue speech must be supreme. From what follows, however, only force is added to my argument that as the spoken language is continually altering, the "poor servant" (the written speech) never could keep pace with it. Hence, is it worth while tinkering about with the written language every now and again? I feel inclined to declare that "mighty as is the tongue, the pen and written word are mightier still." At all events the writing remains, whereas speech does not, except the aid of the phonograph be called in.

F. W. T. LANGE.

MANGOLD WURZELS

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—With respect to the "folk song" about digging up mangold wurzels quoted in your review "Purple and Fine Linen" (ACADEMY, October 27), may I observe that in Ireland (at least) mangolds are always pulled, not dug, a process which is thought to destroy them entirely.

Oct. 30.

JANE BARLOW.

A FOLK-SONG

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be glad if you can give me any information about Folk Songs, through the medium of your paper, the ACADEMY.

While staying in Droitwich lately one Sunday night I saw some children dancing in a ring on the road and singing to the tune of the church bells. The only phrase I could catch was, "We'll wash you in milk," sung, I think, to these notes:

repeated several times.

I could not hear what they sang to the other parts of the tune of the bells.

I very much wish to know the whole of this song and its history, as I think it may be an old custom that has clung to Droitwich and which has now lost its meaning.

(Miss) M. C. MAIN.

AGNOSTICS AND CHURCH SERVICES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Agnostic spider is not to be lured into the theological parlour; and if "Spectator ab extra" had any real knowledge of true Agnosticism his curious article on the subject would never have been written.

We respect orthodox beliefs and are willing to leave them alone now that they have grudgingly conceded our right to live; but to ask us to join in what we regard as their antiquated, meaningless ceremonies, and their "fruitless prayer" is like asking men half-way up a mountain to retrace their steps and begin again the long ascent at the pace of the slowest climber. In this there is intended to be implied no arrogant assumption of superiority; nothing but an indication of the simple fact that, intellectually, the Unknowable of Herbert Spencer is a higher conception than that of the theologians, just as theirs is higher than that of their humbler followers. It is a matter of choice of symbols, not of difference upon the essential reality. The orthodox leaders—even they of the Encyclopædia Biblica—must not get too far ahead of the main body, or their followers will degenerate into a rabble; but Agnostics are under no such obligation. They are in the position of scouts, and their place to-day will be that of the front-rank theologians to-morrow and again of their followers the day after. In that sense, and that only, will Agnostics admit any connection with the churches.

I see Mr. Wm. Scott Palmer, as an Agnostic, agrees with your contributor; but Mr. Palmer is not an Agnostic in the sense I and many more find in the term. He seems, rather, to be one who set forth as a scout on the higher lands, but found the prospect wild and forbidding and has returned to march upward in the more congenial company of the main army. I respect his views and admire his book wherein they are set forth; but his Agnosticism is too much tinged with emotion rightly to claim identity with that of Huxley and Spencer.

No! Mr. "Spectator ab extra," we decline your invitation: it is evidently quite disinterested (has nothing to do, for instance, with the augmentation of collections, as one ungodly might suggest) but we should feel too much like Browning in the little chapel on Christmas Eve:

What, you, the alien, you have ventured
To take with us, elect, your station?
A carer for none of it, a Gallio?

We can stand out on the hilltop in the moonlight and sympathise with every honest creed on earth for sake of the unity of ideal which links them each to each; but we cannot subscribe entirely to any one of them.

J. B. WALLIS.

ORATORY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I read with much interest "A Student of Literature's" letter, and although I do not concur with all that he has written, I must say there is much truth in his assertions.

One has always to grapple with the stereotyped contention that affectation and eloquence are inalienable, but, I ask, is this actually the case? The accomplished orator certainly requires a course of training, and directly or indirectly receives new ideas concerning delivery and tone of voice, of which hitherto he had been wholly ignorant. This objection—a very foolish one too—might be equally urged against the tyro-painter, who wishes to emulate the works of Turner or some other master.

There are, I admit, indications that oratory is a lost art, for to-day there are few men or women who can sway assemblies for long by their speeches. It behoves us then to remedy this decadency, and I would respectfully suggest that oratory should be one of the ordinary subjects in the curriculum of a public or private school.

I do not for a moment say that training alone can turn us into Sheridans, Pitts or any others mentioned in your correspondent's able letter, but at least, we shall have gained confidence, and henceforth it will be a pleasure and not an ordeal to say the customary "few words." One can also learn much from those who are continually on the platform or in the pulpit.

A point sometimes overlooked is that excellence can partake of many forms. In a previous letter to your valuable paper, I stated that oratory is a reflex of character, but to further illustrate this theory of excellences one has only to mention the tact of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, the practicality of Prebendary Carlile, the earnestness of Mr. Haldane or the ardour of Mr. Masterman, M.P. All these qualities and many others constitute excellence in oratory.

I have heard Church Dignitaries, Statesmen and Actors, but as I look back on two and half years of regular residence in London, I can truly say that there is no one who, by virtue of his oratorical powers, has charmed me so much as Bishop Welldon.

Lord Curzon, it was, who in a message to a meeting of the Classical Association at Manchester said, referring to his recent bereavement, that he found solace in books. Books are admirable, but they lack the living expression which is to be found in Oratory.

F. BOOTH.

THE BOOK WAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We have the permission of Dr. James Gairdner, C.B., the eminent historian, to send you for publication a copy of a letter which he has addressed to us on the subject of the Times Book Club.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD.

West View,
Pinner,
October 22, 1906.

DEAR SIR,—I have not thought it necessary hitherto to trouble you with a letter on this unhappy dispute between the publishers and the Times Book Club. Nor do I take it that my individual opinion is worth much on a matter which is in the main commercial. But I am really so astounded at this last move of the Times in putting your firm and those of some other publishers on a black list, and urging its subscribers neither to buy nor to read your books, that I cannot refrain from expressing to you my sympathy in your resolution to oppose such domineering arrogance.

One would think that the Managers of this ancient journal had lost their senses. That the move will be futile is no reason for not protesting against it. For surely it ought to make us all uncomfortable—authors, readers, and the public generally—when a powerful organisation like the Times attempts to boycott the productions of other commercial firms in a way like this. And that, too, at the very time when it professes to make a stand for the principle of free trade in books! Was there ever such inconsistency?

I remain,
Dear Sir,
Yours very truly,

(Signed) JAMES GAIRDNER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Much is being said of the part the Public are supposed to play in the Book War. I, in my capacity of one of the Public, consider they have no part to play whatever. To put the case in other guise, we will say I, "The Public," covet a house of the value of £10,000. To me comes a Book agent—I mean a House agent—who says: "Look here! I'll get you that house for £1000." I say: "But what will the author—I mean the owner of the house say?" "Oh!" says the Agent, "He doesn't count! All you've got to do is to write me a cheque for £1000, take possession of the house and go on your way rejoicing." Naturally I hand my cheque and my conscience to the agent and rejoice according to my instructions. I would dearly like to conclude by building a little niche and placing within it the title of my own last published book, but I refrain.

CONSTANCE SUTCLIFFE,
Writer and Member of the Public.

WHITE NIGHTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A correspondent a short time ago, inquired in your columns as to who coined the phrase, "White nights." From what I can gather, it originated with the French, among whom the expression, une nuit blanche, signifies a restless, sleepless, i.e., blank night; and it doubtless arose from the disturbing effect produced by the moon's rays on the mind of the would-be slumberer. Hence in this instance, "blanche" would denote blankness quite as much as weird light: the same sense as remains in the phrases, blank verse, a blank wall, carte blanche, etc.

On the other hand, the Latin quotation "Ad vergilias albas" cited by Pater, though unfamiliar to me, refers, I think, merely to a moonless, wintry night when the Pleiades are sparkling with increased brilliancy and the Milky Way is clearly visible. So the lover in "Locksley Hall" exclaims:

"Many a night I saw the Pleiad, rising thro' the mellow shade, Glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid."

N. W. H.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

- Ballard, Adolphus. The Domesday Inquest. With 27 illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 283. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
[In The Antiquary's Books.]
- Jackson, F. Hamilton. The Shores of the Adriatic: the Italian Side. An Architectural and Archæological Pilgrimage. With plans and illustrations from drawings by the Author and from photographs taken specially for the work. 9½ x 6. Pp. 358. Murray, 21s. net.
- Masterpieces of Sculpture*. 13½ x 10½. Mudie's Select Library, 1s. 6d.
[Thirty representations of ancient sculpture in Rome.]
- Calthrop, Dion Clayton. English Costume. Vol. iii.—Tudor and Stuart. Illustrated with full-page plates in colour and many diagrams in the text. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 142. Black, 7s. 6d. net.
[The third of four books on English Costume, which Messrs. Black will publish in one volume after the issue of the fourth.]
- Dawson, Mrs. Neilson. Enamels. With 33 illustrations. 6 x 4½. Pp. 207. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
[In the Little Book on Art series.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- The Letters of William Blake, together with a Life by Frederick Tatham*. Edited from the original manuscripts with an introductory note by Archibald G. B. Russell. With twelve illustrations. 8½ x 6. Pp. xlvii, 237. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.
- Barnett, John Francis. Musical Reminiscences and Impressions. Illustrated. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 341. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.
- Pennington, W. H. Sea, Camp, and Stage. 6½ x 4. Pp. 200. Arrowsmith, 1s.
[Incidents in the life of a Survivor of the Balaklava Light Brigade. Paper covers.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

- The Child's Christmas*. Pictured by Charles Robinson. With text by Evelyn Sharp. 10 x 7½. Pp. 227. Blackie, 6s. net.
- Grimm's and Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales*. Selected and edited for Little Folk. Illustrated by Helen Stratton. 13½ x 10. Blackie, 5s.
- Brereton, F. S. With Roberts to Candahar. A Tale of the Third Afghan War. Illustrated by William Rainey. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 353. Collingwood, Harry. Across the Spanish Main. A Tale of the Sea in the Time of Queen Bess. Illustrated by William Rainey. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 351. Farrow, G. E. The Escape of the Mullingong. A Zoological Nightmare. With 58 illustrations by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 148. Blackie, 5s. each.
- Ker, David. Among the Dark Mountains; or, Cast Away in Sumatra. Illustrated by Frances Ewan. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 296. Marchant, Bessie. A Girl of the Fortunate Isles. Illustrated by Paul Hardy. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 292. Blackie, 3s. 6d. each.
- Meade, L. T. Turquoise and Ruby. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 381. Chambers, 5s.
- Molesworth, Mrs. The Bolted Door, and other stories. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 239. Jackberrns, Raymond. The Record Term. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 300. Chambers, 2s. 6d. each.

Williams, Clara Andrews. The House that Glue Built. Drawings by George Alfred Williams. 14 x 18½. The Knight-Errent of the Nursery. With illustrations by the Knight and his Father. 10½ x 12½. Chambers, 3s. 6d. net each.

The Arabian Nights' Entertainments. Selected and re-told for Children by Gladys Davidson and illustrated by Helen Stratton. 13½ x 10. Blackie, 3s. 6d.

The Browns: a Book of Bears. Verses by B. Parker; illustrated by N. Parker. 9 x 12½. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Squire, Charles. The Boy Hero of Erin. A Story of Cuchulain and the Champions of the Red Branch of Ulster. Illustrated by A. A. Dixon. 7½ x 5. Pp. 240. Macmillan, Michael. The Last of the Peshwas. A Tale of the Third Maratha War. Illustrated by Paul Hardy. 7½ x 5. Pp. 240. Blackie, 2s. 6d. each.

Blackwood, Isabella C. The Flower Fairy Tale Book. Illustrated by N. C. Bishop-Culpeper. 8½ x 7. Pp. 170. Nutt, 5s.

Peter Pickle and his Dog Fido: the Diary of a Week of Scrapes. Pictured in Colours by Hilda Cowham. 9 x 10½. Nutt, 2s. 6d.

M'Neil, Everett. The Lost Treasure Cave; or, Adventures with the Cowboys of Colorado. With 8 illustrations by W. M. Cary. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 352. Baldwin, May. Peg's Adventures in Paris. A School Tale. With 8 illustrations by W. Rainey. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 411. Chambers, 5s. each.

Meade, L. T. Sue: the Story of a Little Heroine and Her Friend. With 6 illustrations by Clement Flower. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Powell, Frank. The Wolf-Men. A Tale of Amazing Adventure in the Underworld. With 8 full-page illustrations in colour. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 264. Leighton, Robert. Monitor at Megson's. A Master, a Schoolboy, and a Secret. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 280. Whishaw, Fred. King by Combat. A Fight for Power in a Wild Land. With 8 full-page illustrations in colour. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 272. Reed, Talbot Baines. "Follow My Leader;" or, The Boys of Templeton. A School Story (New Edition). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 376. Cassell, 3s. 6d. each.

Chums. Annual Volume, August 1905–August 1906. 12½ x 10. Pp. 1040. Cassell, 8s.

Little Folks. A Magazine for Young People. 10 x 7½. Pp. 432. Cassell, 3s. 6d.

Morgan, Olga; and Rountree, Harry. Mr. Punch's Book of Birthdays. 8½ x 7½. Pp. 88. Punch Office, 2s. 6d.

Emanuel, Walter. The Dogs of War. With numerous illustrations by Cecil Aldin. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 243. Bradbury & Agnew, 3s.

Bell, R. S. Warren. Cox's Cough Drops. Illustrated by J. R. Skelton. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.

DRAMA.

Williams, A. R. Three New Plays. 9 x 7. Pp. 151. Werner Laurie, 3s. [Flame and the Artist—a play in one act; The Street—a play in three acts; and Jack Hamlin, Gambler—a sketch in three scenes.]

FICTION.

- Bennett, Arnold. Whom God Hath Joined. 8 x 5½. Pp. 419. Nutt, 6s. (See p. 440.)
- Lesueur, Daniel. The Power of the Past. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 304. Nash, 6s.
- Randal, John. The Manager's Box. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 317. Nash, 6s.
- Bindloss, Harold. A Damaged Reputation. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. White, 6s. [Mr. Bindloss at his best.]
- Keith, Marion. The Silver Maple. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 357. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. [A charming little story of Scotsmen and Irishmen in Canada, with religion in the background. The characters are somewhat exaggerated—more the music-hall Scotsmen and Irishmen than the real thing—but the book is well written, and there are some pretty nature sketches.]
- Blyth, James. Lawful Issues. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Nash, 6s. [An unpleasant, dull and unprofitable novel; the chapter-headings are not the least nauseating part. The author is a very different man from the Mr. Blyth who gave us "Juicy Joe" and "Celebrate Sarah." He has ceased to write because he has something to say.]
- Fenn, G. Manville. The Traitor's Gait, and other stories. 7½ x 5. Pp. 296. Digby, Long, 6s. [Eleven short stories, of Roundheads and Cavaliers, [and other things. Readable without being very distinguished.]
- Hardy, Iza Duffus. A Trap of Fate. 7½ x 5. Pp. 304. Digby, Long, 6s. [A story of Brantynhams (titled people, of course), and Lady Marlowe, and the Ashley-Browns and St. Quintins and Dusenburys and Hurstleighs and Wynters and so on, with the necessary complications. Crude and sensational.]
- Corkran, Henrietta. Round Our Square. 8 x 5½. Pp. 314. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Cleeve, Lucas. Counsels of the Night. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Unwin, 6s.
- Phillipotts, Eden; and Bennett, Arnold. The Sincers of War. A Romance of London and the Sea. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 344. Werner Laurie, 6s.
- Reed, Myrtle. A Spinner in the Sun. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 393. Putnam, 6s.
- Wheeler, Ethel. Behind the Veil. Illustrated by Austin O. Spare. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 93. Nutt, 6s. net. [Short Stories.]
- Wilberforce, Wilfrid; and Gilbert, A. R. Her Faith Against the World. 7½ x 5. Pp. 231. Burns & Oates, 3s. 6d.
- Turner, George Frederick. Frost and Friendship. Illustrated by G. C. Wilmshurst. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Adcock, A. St. John. Love in London. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 316. Francis Griffiths, 6s. [Twenty-four sketches of London life.]
- Meakin, Nevill; and Sheringham, Hugh T. The Enemy's Camp. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 366. Macmillan, 6s.
- Williams, Neil Wynn. The Electric Theft. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. Greening, 6s.
- Warden, Gertrude. Robert the Devil. 7½ x 5. Pp. 320. Digby, Long, 6s.
- Cleeve, Lucas. The Confessions of a Climber. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Digby, Long, 6s.

- Leys, John K. A Desperate Game. 7½ x 5. Pp. 288. Digby, Long, 6s.
 Fox-Davies, A. C. The Dangerville Inheritance. A Detective Story. 7½ x 5. Pp. 312. Lane, 6s.
 Albanesi, E. Maria. A Little Brown Mouse. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 287. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
 Smith, Alice Prescott. Montlivet. 8 x 5½. Pp. 443. Constable, 6s.
 Straus, Ralph. The Man Apart. 7½ x 5. Pp. 390. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

HISTORY.

The Cambridge Modern History. Planned by the late Lord Acton; edited by A. W. Ward, G. W. Prothero, and Stanley Leathes. Vol. IV—The Thirty Years' War. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xxx, 1003. Cambridge University Press, 16s. net.

[Contents: The Outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, by A. W. Ward; The Valtelline (1603-1639), by Horatio F. Brown; The Protestant Collapse (1620-1630), by A. W. Ward; Richelieu, by Stanley Leathes; The Vasa in Sweden and Poland (1560-1630), by W. F. Reddaway; Gustavus Adolphus (1630-1632), by A. W. Ward; Wallenstein and Bernard of Weimar (1632-1635), by A. W. Ward; The Constitutional Struggle in England (1625-1640), by G. W. Prothero; The First Two Years of the Long Parliament (1640-1642), by G. W. Prothero; The First Civil War, (1642-1647), by G. W. Prothero and E. M. Lloyd; Presbyterians and Independents (1645-1649), by G. W. Prothero and E. M. Lloyd; The Westminster Assembly, by W. A. Shaw; The Later Years of the Thirty Years' War (1635-1648), by A. W. Ward; The Peace of Westphalia, by A. W. Ward; The Commonwealth and the Protectorate (1649-1659), by W. A. Shaw; The Navy of the Commonwealth and the First Dutch War, by J. R. Tanner; Scotland from the Accession of Charles I. to the Restoration, by P. Hume Browne; Ireland from the Plantation of Ulster to the Cromwellian Settlement (1611-1659), by R. Dunlop; Anarchy and the Restoration (1659-1660), by C. A. Firth; The Scandinavian North (1559-1660), by W. F. Reddaway; Mazarin, by Stanley Leathes; Spain and Spanish Italy under Philip III. and IV., by Martin Hume; Papal Policy, 1590-1648, by Moritz Brosch; Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, by G. Edmundson; The Transference of Colonial Power to the United Provinces and England, by Hugh E. Egerton; The Fantastic School of English Poetry, by A. Clutton-Brock; Descartes and Cartesianism, by Emile Boutroux.]

La France Monarchique. Scènes de la vie nationale depuis le douzième jusqu'au dix-huitième siècle tirées de mémoires contemporains. Avec introduction et notes par George H. Powell and Oswald B. Powell. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 491. Blackie, 6s.

[The entire work is in French, and all extracts are reprinted from the original texts. A general introduction and an historical précis precede the text, and there is a good index.]

LITERATURE.

Bibliography of Folk-Lore, 1905. Compiled by N. W. Thomas. 9 x 6. Pp. xxxvi. Published for the Folk-Lore Society by David Nutt, 1s. net.

[The bibliography includes only works and periodicals published in the British Empire in 1905. "Macculloch, J. A." (18 and 72) should be "MacCulloch, J. A."]

Wyndham, George. Ronsard and La Pélade, with Selections from Their Poetry, and some Translations in the Original Metres. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 266. Macmillan, 5s. net.

Colles, William Morris; and Hardy, Harold. Playright and Copyright in all Countries: showing how to Protect a Play or a Book throughout the World. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 275. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.

The John Rylands Library, Manchester. 9½ x 5½. Pp. 89. Sherratt & Hughes, 1s.

[A brief historical description of the library and its contents, with catalogue of the selection of early printed Greek and Latin classics exhibited on the occasion of the visit of the Classical Association in October 1906. Paper cover.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Eastwick, Mrs. Egerton. The Art of Thinking. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 87. Lane, 1s. net.

Lovell, Arthur. How to Think. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 84. Published by the Author, 1s. net.

Clayden, Arthur W. The History of Devonshire Scenery. An Essay in Geographical Evolution. 9 x 6. Pp. 202. Chatto & Windus, 10s. 6d. net.
 [A geological survey. The author has confined himself mainly to a single district.]

Dewar, George A. B. The Faery Year. 9 x 5½. Pp. 317. Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d.

[Papers on Nature from Week to Week, the substance of which has appeared in the Standard.]

The Church and Kindness to Animals. Illustrated. 7½ x 5. Pp. 195. Burns & Oates, 2s. 6d. net.

[An adaptation of "L'Eglise et la Pitié envers les Animaux." A little book illustrating the attitude of certain Saints and Doctors of the Church towards dumb animals.]

Finsbury Public Libraries: Descriptive Handbook to Juvenile Literature. Compiled by Harry G. C. Cannons. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Bean, n.p.
 [Annotated.]

Gould, F. J. Life and Manners. 7½ x 5. Pp. 340. Issued for the Moral Instruction League. Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. net.

[“A volume of stories suitable for the moral instruction of children.”]

University College of North Wales. Calendar of the Session 1906-1907. 7½ x 5. Pp. 430. Manchester: Cornish, n.p.

PHILOSOPHY.

ckaby, Rev. Joseph, S.J. Free Will, and Four English Philosophers. (Hobbes, Locke, Hume, & Mill). 7½ x 5. Pp. 234. Burns & Oates, 3s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

Fallow, Lance. Silverleaf and Oak. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 122. Macmillan, 3s. net.

Mayne, Cyril. The Olympian Odes of Pindar. Translated into English Verse. 8 x 5½. Pp. 76. Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes, n.p.

A Collection of Poems by Ernest Radford. 7 x 4½. Pp. 72. Gibbings, 2s. 6d. net.

[There are several new pieces. Of those reprinted some have been considerably altered, others have been left untouched.]

Baring, Maurice. Sonnets and Short Poems. 9 x 5½. Pp. 67. Oxford: Blackwell, 2s. net.

[Of the poems collected in this volume some are new, others have appeared before in a book called "The Black Prince," in The Westminster Gazette, and in a play called Mahasena. Paper covers.]

Mackereth, James A. In Grasmere Vale. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 19. Privately printed.

POLITICAL.

Spencer, George. Nationalization of the land showing how £120,000,000 a year may be lawfully restored to the State. 7 x 4½. Pp. 16. Hendersons, 1d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Minor Poets of the Caroline Period. Vol. ii. Edited by George Saintsbury. 9 x 5½. Pp. 611. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d. net.

[Contains: Marmion's "Cupid and Psyche"; Kynaston's "Leoline and Sydanis" and "Cynthiades," or Amorous Sonnets; Poems of John Hall, Sidney Godolphin and Philip Ayres; Chalkhill's "Thealma and Clearchus"; Poems of Patrick Carey and William Hammond; Bosworth's "Arcadius," etc.]

The Poetical Works of William Blake. Edited and annotated by Edwin J. Ellis. 2 vols. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xxxiv, 1043. Chatto & Windus, 12s. net.

The English Writings of Abraham Cowley: Essays, Plays and Sundry Verses. The text edited by A. R. Waller, M.A. 8 x 5½. Pp. 500. Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.

[In the Cambridge English Classics. The first volume of this edition of the English writings of Cowley contained the whole of the poems that were collected for the folio which appeared the year after his death. The present volume contains the poems not included in the folio, its prose contents, and Cowley's English plays.]

Arnold, Matthew. The Scholar-Gipsy and Thyrsis. With illustrations by E. H. New. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 51. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.

Gilchrist, Alexander. The Life of William Blake. Edited with an introduction by W. Graham Robertson and numerous reproductions from Blake's pictures, many hitherto unpublished. 7 x 6½. Pp. xxiv, 533. Lane, 10s. 6d. net.

Heywood, John. The Pardoner and the Friar. The Four P.P. Edited with an introduction, Note-book, and Word-list by John S. Farmer. 7 x 4½. Pp. x, 78. The Museum Dramatists. Gibbings, 2s. net.

The Henry Irving Shakespeare: The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by Sir Henry Irving and Frank H. Marshall. Vols. vii. and viii. With many hundred illustrations, and notes and introductions to each play by various writers. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 258 and 360. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

[Vol. vii contains: Much Ado about Nothing; As You Like It; and Twelfth Night; Vol. viii: Julius Caesar; All's Well That Ends Well; and Troilus and Cressida.]

The Diary of John Evelyn. With an Introduction and notes by Austin Dobson. 3 vols. 9 x 6. Pp. lxxiv, 1254. Macmillan, 31s. 6d. net.

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell: My Lady Ludlow, and other tales. The Knutsford Edition. In eight volumes—vol. v. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 523. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.

[Contains "Round the Sofa" ("My Lady Ludlow," "An Accursed Race," "The Doom of the Griffiths," "Half a Lifetime Ago," "The Poor Clare," and "The Half-Brother"); "Mr. Harrison's Confessions"; and "The Manchester Marriage."]

A Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry. Arranged by Arthur Symonds. 7½ x 5½. Pp. vi, 412. Blackie, 6s.

[An amplification and rearrangement of Mr. Symonds's "Sixteenth Century Anthology" in the "Red Letter Poets." For the use of "Pageant" in the title see the ingenious preface. Notes and tables.]

Gilman, Charlotte Perkins. Women and Economics. With an introduction by Stanton Coit. Fifth Edition. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xxii, 358. Putnams, 6d. net.

[A study of the economic relation between men and women as a factor in social evolution.]

Caird, Principal John. Aspects of Life. Twelve Sermons. A new edition of "Sermons." 7½ x 5. Pp. 304. Allenson, 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

The Sacred Seasons. Readings for the Sundays and Holy Days of the Christian Year, from the Writings of the Right Reverend Handley, C. G. Moule, D.D., Bishop of Durham. Selected by F. M. Y. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 362. Seeley, 6s. net.

Banks, the Rev. Louis Albert. The Great Promises of the Bible. 7 x 5. Pp. 344. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

[Apparently a book of sermons.]

Israel in the Bible and in History. Being 559 verses from the Bible, with introductory remarks by William Pumfrey, and a preface by the Rev. A. Herbert. 7 x 5. Pp. 70. Banks, 8s. net.

[Paper covers.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Northern Spain. Painted and described by Edgar T. A. Wigram. 9 x 6½. Pp. 311. Black, 20s. net.

Smith, Rev. Haskett. Patrollers of Palestine. With illustrations. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 361. Arnold, 10s. 6d.

Maxwell, Donald. A Cruise Across Europe. With 100 illustrations by the author and Cottingham Taylor. 9 x 6. Pp. 254. Lane, 10s. 6d. net.

[Notes on a freshwater voyage from Holland to the Black Sea.]

Cruikshank, J. W. and A. M. Christian Rome. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 374. E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.

[An addition to Grant Allen's series of Historical Guides.]

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says :

"With the ever-widening interest in art fostered by modern methods of reproduction, such books as these, giving a kind of bound portfolio of representative works of the great masters, prefaced by brief introductions written by competent critics, should prove acceptable to a large number of people. The books are strongly bound, as picture-books should be, and are designed with tasteful simplicity."

Newnes' Art Library

Small crown 4to. Quarter vellum. 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d. each.

THE object of this series is to illustrate by adequate reproductions the Paintings, Drawings, and Sculpture of the Great Masters. To this end the illustrations are all full-page, finely printed upon one side only of the paper. Special care is being taken in every detail of the production that the result may be worthy of its great subject. Each volume contains from 55 to 64 full-page plates. In addition there is a Frontispiece in photogravure or two illustrations in colours. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced.

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDREY.
CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.
VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDREY.
GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.
RAPHAEL. By EDGUMBE STALEY.
VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.
G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. PANTINI.
TINTORETTO. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.
FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.
BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.
PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSÈNE ALEXANDRE.
ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.
FRA ANGELICO. By EDGUMBE STALEY.
LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILKS.
GIOVANNI BELLINI. By EVERARD MEYNELL.
THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.
DE LA OROIX. By HENRI FRANTZ.
INGRES. By OCTAVE UZANNE.
CORREGGIO. By SELWYN BRINTON.

The National Gallery

THESE seven volumes are the first of a new series dealing with the Great Galleries of Europe. The scheme of them is very similar to that of the popular Art Library, to which they form a companion series. They consist of 49 to 65 fine reproductions of important works, printed on superior plate paper. These are preceded by essays written by eminent authorities on the schools of painting represented. Complete catalogues of the works in the Galleries are included. Each book has a photogravure frontispiece. The bindings, in blue, gold, and warm grey, are uniform and charming 3/6 net each ; by post, 3/10.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL. By GUSTAVE GEFFROY.
THE FLEMISH SCHOOL. By FREDERICK WEDMORE.
THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.
THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.
THE NORTH ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE CENTRAL ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE FRENCH, GERMAN, AND SPANISH SCHOOLS. By WALTER BAYES.

The SPECTATOR says :

"Not only valuable as a work of reference, but also as a means of study in a painter's style by the comparison of a number of his works. Indeed, these books are far more useful and interesting than the majority of biographies, large and small, that are now pouring from the press."

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

BEAUTIFUL POCKET EDITIONS

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in. and ½ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net ; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume ; Postage, 3d. extra.

EVELYN'S DIARY.
LAMB'S WORKS.
THE VISION OF DANTE.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
TENNYSON'S POEMS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS'S POEMS.
DON QUIXOTE.
BACON'S WORKS.
SHELLEY'S POEMS.
PEPYS'S DIARY.
KEATS'S POEMS.
POE'S TALES.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.
THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCY.
BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.
 Cloth, 2s. net. Postage, 3d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the DUCHESS.
GOETHE'S FAUST. A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.
THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY and WILLIAM COLLINS.
A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DEFOE.
SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.
POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.
SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI, XVII, & XVIII CENTURIES.
POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.
CHEVALIER BAYARD.

Newnes' Devotional Series.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics.
 Super royal 42mo. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net. Cloth, 2s. each net.
 Postage, 3d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA. Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINK-WORTH.
THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS.
THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.
THE CHRISTIAN YEAR.
THE SACRED POEMS OF HARRY VAUGHAN.
LYRA INNOCENTIIUM.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

Macmillan's New Books

PUCK OF POOK'S HILL

Illustrated,
6s.

BY

RUDYARD KIPLING.

VOLUMES I.-V. NOW READY.

HISTORY OF MODERN ENGLAND.

BY HERBERT PAUL.

In 5 vols. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net each.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

MEMORIES AND THOUGHTS.

MEN—BOOKS—CITIES—ART.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN.

With Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON.

New Edition in 3 vols. Illustrated. 8vo, 3rs 6d. net.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 100 copies, £3 3s. net.

RONSARD & LA PLEIADE.

With Selections from their Poetry and some Translations in the Original Metres.

By the Rt. Hon. GEORGE WYNDHAM. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SILVERLEAF AND OAK.

A Volume of Poems.

BY LANCE FALLAW. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

GRANFORD SERIES.—New vol.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE.

BY GEORGE ELIOT.

With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, sixteen of which are reproduced in colour. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SCHOLAR-GIPSY & THYRSIS.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

With Illustrations by E. H. NEW. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH LITERATURE FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO CHAUCER.

BY WILLIAM HENRY SCHOFIELD, Ph.D. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PLAYRIGHT AND COPYRIGHT IN ALL COUNTRIES.

SHOWING HOW TO PROTECT A PLAY OR A BOOK
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

By WILLIAM MORRIS COLLES, B.A., and
HAROLD HARDY, B.A., Barristers-at-Law. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME COMMENCES WITH THE NOVEMBER NUMBER

The Century Magazine.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

The NOVEMBER Number contains:

"FAME IS A FOOD THAT DEAD MEN EAT." By AUSTIN DOBSON.

ATHIRST IN THE DESERT. Narrative of a Perilous Journey over the Kara Kum Sands of Central Asia. By LANGDON WARNER.

JULIA MARLOWE. (Including Comments by Her on Characters She has played.) By ELIZABETH MCCracken.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR'S VOICE. By E. W. SCRIPTURE. With a Brief Essay by the Emperor.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

AND AFTER

NOVEMBER

The Future of Great Britain. By J. ELLIS BARKER.

Liberalism and Labour. By C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P.

A Liberal's Plea for Compulsory Service. By G. G. COULTON.

The Government and the Navy. By ARCHIBALD S. HURD.

The Scotch Deer Forests. By G. T. TEASDALE BUCKELL.

Object and Method in Land Legislation. By R. MUNRO FERGUSON, M.P.

Public Confidence and the Land Tenure Bill. By Sir ROBERT GRESLEY, Bart.

Degree-granting Institutions in Canada. I.—The Maritime Provinces. By WALTER FREWEN LORD.

The Frenchwomen of the Salons. By Mrs. HYLTON DALE.

The Novel as a Political Force. By NORMAN BENTWICH.

The True Darwinism. By the Rev. Professor G. HENSLOW.

The Greek Mysteries and the Gospels. By SLADE BUTLER.

"Féminisme" in France. By CHARLES DAWBARN.

Dawn of a New Policy in India. By AMEER ALI, C.I.E. (late a Judge of H.M.'s High Court of Judicature in Bengal).

The Peers and the Education Bill. By the Most Rev. the ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER.

Convocation and the "Letters of Business." By HUGH R. E. CHILDERS (Actuary of the Convocation of Canterbury).

The Government and the Convocations. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

If you are interested in the War of the Books you should see a Cartoon—"Will you walk into my parlour?"—and an Article dealing with it, which appear in the November BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net.

Publishers: Simpkin Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office:

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office:

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1801 NOVEMBER 10, 1906 PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

GREAT MALVERN SCHOOL OF ART

H EAD MASTER required, duties to commence in January next. Commencing Salary £120 per annum. Teaching in Schools permitted. Applications, with particulars of qualifications and with sealed testimonials, to be sent on or before November 13 to

Mrs. JACOB (Hon. Sec.),
St. Helens,
Great Malvern,

from whom a Prospectus of the School may be obtained.

Typewriting

T YPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

T YPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

T YPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

A UTHOR (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

Art

E ARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD's Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD's GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

Hotel

A BERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale.

T H O M A S T H O R P,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

M O N T H L Y C A T A L O G U E S from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

G O O D C O P Y O F A R C H A E O L O G I A C A N T I A N A, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES
GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL
CATALOGUE (124 pp.)

J U S T O U T
Librarians, Bookbuyers generally and all interested in Literature, are invited to apply for above.

W I L L I A M G L A I S H E R.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London.

S P E C I A L B A R G A I N.—Dickens's Complete Works, with frontispieces, 21 volumes, neatly bound in cloth, as new 18s. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought or Exchanged. List of "Books Wanted" sent free.—GEORGE T. JUCKES & Co., The Ruskin Book Stores, 85 Aston Street, Birmingham.

J U S T P U B L I S H E D—ELEVENTH EDITION.
Royal 8vo, cloth, 45s., strongly bound half calf, 50s.

M A Y ' S P A R L I A M E N T A R Y P R A C T I C E.
A Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usages of Parliament. By Sir Thomas Erskine May, K.C.B., D.C.L., Clerk of the House of Commons, and Benchler of the Middle Temple. Eleventh edition (revised from the Tenth edition of 1893, edited by Sir Reginald F. D. Palgrave, K.C.B., and Alfred Bonham-Carter, Esq., C.B.). Books I. and II., edited by T. Lonsdale Webster, Esq., second Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons; Book III., edited by William Edward Grey, Esq., of the Committee Office, House of Commons.

This, the Eleventh, Edition (although based on the last, or Tenth, Edition of 1893), brings this work throughout up to the present date of publication, and includes the changes that were made by the House of Commons in its procedure up to the adjournment in August last. The additions and alterations that have been necessary in order to bring this work completely up to date in this Revised Edition are indicated in the preface.—London: WM. CLOWES & SONS, Ltd., Law Publishers, 7 Fleet Street, adjoining Middle Temple Lane.

L I F E O F N A P O L E O N, by W. M. Sloane, profusely illustrated, many plates in colour, 4 vols., 4to, cloth extra, published by Macmillan, 1901, at 63s. net, offered for 35s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

C U R R E N T Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

R H Y S L E W I S, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

C R U I K S H A N K (George or Robert), any Books or Pamphlets illustrated by these Artists
Table Book, in parts or cloth, 1845
Omnibus, in parts or cloth, 1742
Fairy Library, any
Fairy Library, Puss in Boots, published by Routledge, late Arnold, green covers
Comic Almanack, a set, 1835 to 1853, in parts or any odd ones
My Sketch Book, in 9 parts, 1834
Scraps and Sketches, 4 parts, 1826-32
The English Spy, 2 vols, 1825-6, or odd vols or parts
Hans of Iceland, 1825
Peter Schlemihl, 1824
Whom to marry, in monthly parts or cloth, Bogue, n.d., or odd Greatest Plague in Life, in monthly parts or cloth, Bogue, n.d., or odd Clement Lorimer, in monthly parts or cloth, 1849, or odd
The Englishman's Mentor, 1829
Sunday in London, 1833
Kit Bam's Adventures, 1849
Uncle Tom's Cabin, in monthly parts or cloth, 1852, or odd Mansie Wauch, 1839
Sir Frizzle Pumpkin, 1836
George Cruikshank's Magazine, parts 1-2
The Brightou Lodging House, parts 1-2

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.O.

B E L G I U M.—Lady highly recommends Ladies' School where unexpected vacancy occurs. Special fees, 40 guineas yearly. French, German, Piano included.—References in England, Mrs. BAYNES, 28 Heathurst Road, Hampstead, London.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late
R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by
E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.
Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.
London: J. CLARKE & CO.

DUCKWORTH & CO.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF LESLIE STEPHEN

By FREDERICK W. MAITLAND.
With 5 Photogravures.
Royal 8vo, 18s. net.
[Ready November 8.]

Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY.
With Photogravure and 125 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
[Immediately.]

The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci

By EDWARD McCURDY, M.A.
13 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net. [Just out.]

Life and Evolution

By F. W. HEADLEY.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.
[November 8.]

Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes

By LINA ECKENSTEIN.
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
A study of a branch of folk-lore, giving new interest and value to familiar things.

Something uncommon in FICTION. Note this Title.

Old Fireproof

Being the Chaplain's Story.
By OWEN RHOSCOMYL. 6s. [Just out.]

A Reader says in a Letter to the Publishers:

"I could not put it down till I had read every word. . . . There are, thank God, a good many such as 'Old Fireproof,' born leaders of men. . . . To command volunteers needs something near akin to a Bayard—one such as 'Fireproof'—Rimington's 'Tigers' would have gone through the mouth of Hell with him. Such have been our Empire Builders."

His People

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM. 6s.

The Heart that Knows

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.
Author of "The Kindred of the Wild," etc. 6s.
This book deals with the adventurous life of sailors and fisherfolk, and there is a strong and dramatic love interest running through it.

Don-a-Dreams

By HARVEY O'HIGGINS. 6s.

The story of a youth of high purpose but impractical ideas. The life of a great city, with its grim realities, is presented as the scene of his struggles.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LIBRARY OF ART.

"The excellent Red Series."—TIMES.

Correggio

By T. STURGE MOORE.
55 Illustrations, post 4to, 7s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

THE POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART.—New Volume.

Watteau

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR.
50 Illustrations, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

"One of the most original and unconventional attempts in the sphere of criticism. With a subtlety worthy of a Baudelaire he discovers the key to the mysterious fascination of Watteau's art."—DAILY MAIL.

The Placid Pug, and other Rhymes.

By THE BELGIAN HARE (Lord ALFRED DOUGLAS),
Author of "Tales with a Twist."
Illustrated by P. P. Oblong crown 4to, 10 by 8, 3s. 6d.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

A SELECTION FROM CONSTABLE'S LIST.

MY PILGRIMAGE TO THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST.

By MONCURE D. CONWAY. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The route Mr. Conway took in his voyage around the world ran through Salt Lake City, San Francisco, the Chief Cities in Australia, and thence to Ceylon and India. The bulk of the book relates to his memories of, and conversations with leading Buddhists, Brahmans, Parsees, Moslems, and others in India. The book is also profusely illustrated with interesting portraits and facsimile letters.

WALT WHITMAN. A Study of his Life and Work. By BLISS PERRY. Crown 8vo, illustrated with Portraits, Facsimiles of MSS., etc. 6s.

THE FLOCK. An Idyll of Shepherd Life. By MARY AUSTIN. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

STUDIES IN SEVEN ARTS. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Contents: Rodin—The Painting of the Nineteenth Century—Gustave Moreau—Watts—Whistler—Cathedrals—The Decay of Craftsmanship in England—Beethoven—The Idioms of Richard Wagner—The Problem of Richard Strauss—Eleonora Duse—A New Art of the Stage—A Symbolistic Farce—Pantomime and the Poetic Drama—The World as Ballet.

A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Selected and arranged by KATE M. WARREN, Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Westfield College (University of London). With an Introduction by Rev. STOPFORD BROOKE, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES GODFREY LELAND ("HANS BREITMANN"). By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. Illustrated. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE KING OF COURT POETS. A Study of the Life, Work, and Times of Lodovico Ariosto. By EDMUND GARDNER, Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

VICTORIAN NOVELISTS. By LEWIS MELVILLE, Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray." Illustrated, with Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. Being his Correspondence with Tobias Lear and the latter's Diary. Illustrated with rare Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

TIME AND CLOCKS: a Description of Ancient and Modern Methods of Measuring Time. By H. H. CUNYNGHAME, C.B. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE CRACKLING OF THORNS. By DUM DUM, Author of "Rhymes of the East," "In the Hills." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

BERNARD SHAW'S WORKS.

MAN AND SUPERMAN. Now being played at the Court Theatre. 6s.

PLAYS PLEASANT AND PLAYS UNPLEASANT. In 2 vols. Sold separately. With a Portrait of the Author by FREDERICK H. EVANS, and the Original Prefaces. Crown 8vo, 6s. each. Vol. I. PLAYS UNPLEASANT.—(1) Widowers' Houses. (2) The Philanderer. (3) Mrs. Warren's Profession. Vol. II. PLAYS PLEASANT.—(1) Arms and the Man. (2) Candida. (3) The Man of Destiny. (4) You Never Can Tell.

THREE PLAYS FOR PURITAN'S. Crown 8vo, 6s. (1) The Devil's Disciple. (2) Caesar and Cleopatra. (3) Captain Brassbound's Conversion. Each play also sold separately. Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT. A Novel. Crown 8vo, 6s.

CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION. Being No. 4 of the Novels of his Nonage. Also THE ADMIRABLE BASHVILLE and an Essay on Modern Prize Fighting. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE COMMON SENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LIMITED,
16 JAMES STREET, HAYMARKET, S.W.

The Diaries of Admiral Sir Thomas Usher, R.N., K.C.B. (on board the "Undaunted"), and John R. Glover, Secretary to Rear-Admiral Cockburn (on board the "Northumberland"). They give lifelike glimpses of the great Emperor, and throw most vivid and interesting side-lights on his personality.

NAPOLEON'S LAST VOYAGES. With an Introduction and Notes, by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

"The book tells us everything that is known about a remarkable woman (Heine's 'Princess'), while it helps to clear up many obscure points in the history of modern Europe."—"The Standard." With Photogravure Frontispiece, and many other Illustrations.

A REVOLUTIONARY PRINCESS: Christina Belgiojoso-Trivulzio, Her Life and Times. By H. Remsen Whitehouse. 10s. 6d. net.

This book appeals to all lovers of old prints. The volume contains a Coloured Frontispiece and 70 Full-page Plates; a Glossary of Technical Terms, and a table showing more than 350 of the principal English and Continental Engravers.

CHATS ON OLD PRINTS. By Arthur Hayden. Author of "Chats on Old China," etc. 5s. net.

This volume is fully Illustrated by Reproductions of Paintings and Engravings by the Great Masters. The Frontispiece is a coloured reproduction of Mr. Sargent's portrait of Miss Ellen Terry as Lady Macbeth.

CHATS ON COSTUME. A Practical Guide to Historic Dress. By G. Woolliscroft Rhead, R.E. 5s. net.

"Counsels of the Night" by Lucas Cleeve; "The Iron Gates," by Annie E. Holdsworth; "At the Sign of the Peacock" by K. C. Ryves (First Novel Library); "The Locum Tenens," by Victor L. Whitechurch; "A Crystal Age," by W. H. Hudson.

THE BEST NEW NOVELS. On Sale at all Booksellers'. Price 6s. each.

(1) "The Story of the Amulet," by E. Nesbit. With 48 Illustrations by H. R. Millar. (2) "The Lady Noggs, Peeress," by Edgar Jepson. Children's Edition, with 16 Illustrations by Lewis Baumer.

THE BEST NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS. Illustrated, 6s. each.

Ready November 14.

Margaret
Baillie Saunders'

New Novel

LONDON LOVERS

Price 6s.

T. FISHER UNWIN

New Announcement List post free to any address.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

FREDERICK YORK POWELL. A Life and a Selection from his Letters and Occasional Writings. By OLIVER ELTON. 2 vols. Vol. I.—Memoir and Letters. Vol. 2.—Writings. With Illustrations, 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN KEATS. Edited, with Introduction and Textual Notes by H. BUXTON FORMAN. With 5 Illustrations, 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

CAROLINE POETS. Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

Vol. I. containing CHAMBERLAYNE'S PHARONNIDA and ENGLAND'S JUBILEE, BENLOWES' THEOPHILA and the POEMS OF KATHERINE PHILIPS and PATRICK HANNAY.

Vol. II. containing MARMION'S CUPID AND PSYCHE—KYNASTON'S LEOLINE AND SYDANIS AND CYNTHIADES—POEMS OF JOHN HALL, SIDNEY GODOLPHIN, and PHILIP AYRES—CHALKHILL'S THEALMA and CLEARCHUS—POEMS OF PATRICK CAREY and WILLIAM HAMMOND—BOSWORTH'S ARCADIUS AND SEPHA, etc. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net each.

New Oxford Tudor and Stuart Library.

Paper Covers, imitating the Contemporary Binding, 5s. net each volume.

THE DEFENCE OF THE REALM. By Sir H. KNYVETT, 1596. Now for the first time printed from a MS. in the Chetham Library, Manchester. With an Introduction by C. HUGHES.

HOWELL'S DEVISES. With an Introduction by W. A. RALEIGH.

EVELYN'S SCULPTURA. With the Unpublished Second Part. Edited by C. F. BELL.

PEPYS'S MEMOIRS OF THE ROYAL NAVY, 1679-1688. Edited by J. R. TANNER.

HERMANN VON HELMHOLTZ. By Prof. LEO KOENIGSBERGER. Translated by FRANCIS A. WELBY. With a Preface by LORD KELVIN. With 3 Portraits, royal 8vo, 16s. net.

THE LETTERS OF ERASMUS. By P. S. ALLEN. Vol. I. 1484-1514. Medium 8vo, cloth, 18s. net.

This is the first volume of what is intended to be a complete edition—the first for two centuries—of the correspondence of Erasmus, including, as was his own wish, the prefaces to his numerous works. It contains some three hundred letters written between the end of the year 1484 and the month of July 1514. It is expected that the work will be completed in five or six volumes.

PRIMITIVE AND MEDIEVAL JAPANESE TEXTS. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Glossaries, by F. VICTOR DICKINS, C.B., sometime Registrar of the University of London. Vol. I., Texts. Vol. II., Translations. The two volumes, 8vo, cloth, with 11 Illustrations, 21s. net, or separately, 12s. 6d. net each.

GUIDE TO THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY. By A. CLARK. Illustrated, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

ALSO PUBLISHED BY HENRY FROWDE.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED, THIRD IMPRESSION.

AUTHOR AND PRINTER. A Guide to Authors, Editors, Printers, Correctors of the Press, Compositors and Typists. With full list of Abbreviations. An attempt to codify the best Typographical Practices of the Present Day. By F. HOWARD COLLINS, with the assistance of many Authors, Editors, Printers, and Correctors of the Press. Second Edition. Third Thousand. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; leather back and corners, 6s. 6d. net.
G. B. S. in the Author.—"Mr. Howard Collins has certainly done this job extraordinarily well."

The World's Classics

87 VOLUMES NOW READY.

In various Styles and Bindings from 1s. net.

NEW VOLUMES JUST PUBLISHED.

THE MEDITATIONS OF MARCUS AURELIUS. Translated by JOHN JACKSON.

MONTAIGNE'S ESSAYS. Vol. III.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SILAS MARNER, THE LIFTED VEIL
BROTHER JACOB. With an Introduction by THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON.

JOHNSON'S LIVES OF THE POETS. With an Introduction by ARTHUR WAUGH. 2 vols.

BACON'S ADVANCEMENT OF LEARNING AND THE NEW ATLANTIS. With an Introduction by Prof. CASE.

SOPHOCLES. Translated into English Verse by Professor LEWIS CAMPBELL.

PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

BLACKIE'S GIFT BOOKS.

A New Volume by Mr. Arthur Symons

A PAGEANT OF ELIZABETHAN POETRY

Edited, with an Introduction, by ARTHUR SYMONS. Crown 8vo, sumptuously bound in quarter vellum, 6s. net.

"Presented in beautiful form is this anthology. It might be described as infinite riches in a decorated room. Mr. Symonds prints many little-known scraps of golden verse, and his notes and introduction are well worth reading."—EVENING STANDARD.

LA FRANCE MONARCHIQUE

SCENES DE LA VIE NATIONALE DEPUIS LE 12ME AU 19ME SIECLE
RECUEILLIES DES MEMOIRES CONTEMPORAINS.

By G. H. POWELL, B.A., and O. B. POWELL, B.A.
Demy 8vo, elegantly bound in cloth gilt, 6s. net.

New Books for Boys

Two New Stories by

CAPT. F. S. BRERETON

THE TIMES says.—"The mantle of Henty seems to have descended on Capt. Brereton."

ROGER THE BOLD

A TALE OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO.

Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

WITH ROBERTS TO CANDAHAR

A TALE OF THE THIRD AFGHAN WAR.

Illustrated by W. RAINY, R.L. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

Uniform with the above. Price 6s.

A New Writer for Boys

By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S.

THE LOST EXPLORERS

A STORY OF THE TRACKLESS DESERT.

Illustrated by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND. Large crown 8vo cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

A NEW STORY by HARRY COLLINGWOOD

ACROSS THE SPANISH MAIN

A TALE OF ADVENTURE.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

CHEAP RE-ISSUE OF HENTY'S MASTERPIECE.

3s. 6d. WITH CLIVE IN INDIA 3s. 6d.

OR, THE BEGINNINGS OF AN EMPIRE.

ILLUSTRATED. NEW EDITION.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

THE CHILD'S CHRISTMAS

Pictured by CHARLES ROBINSON, with text by EVELYN SHARP

Large 4to, cloth elegant, gilt edges, 6s. net.

In this beautiful volume Mr. CHARLES ROBINSON and Miss EVELYN SHARP describe with mingled sentiment and humour all the joyous happenings of the Christmas season. In nearly 200 charming illustrations in colour and black-and-white the artist tells pictorially what the author describes in words—all that makes Christmas a time of pure delight to the young. In the sumptuousness of its get-up, the richness of binding, the quality of paper, and the excellence of printing, The Child's Christmas is a triumph of modern book production.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL

THIRD YEAR OF ISSUE.

A handsome Volume of 192pp., with over 150 illustrations, including 40 full-page pictures in Full Colour by the best Artists.

Picture boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

New Books for Girls

By ROSA MULHOLLAND (LADY GILBERT).

OUR SISTER MAISIE.

Illustrated by G. DEMAIN HAMMOND, R.L. Large crown 8vo, cloth, elegant, gilt top, 6s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

A GIRL OF THE FORTUNATE ISLES.

Illustrated by PAUL HARDY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

By ETHEL F. HEDDLE.

GIRL COMRADES. Illustrated by G. DEMAIN HAMMOND, R.L. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 6s.

By ETHEL F. HEDDLE.

AN ORIGINAL GIRL.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges. New Edition. 3s. 6d.

A SET OF CATALOGUES, BEAUTIFULLY PRINTED IN COLOURS, WILL BE SENT POST-FREE ON RECEIPT OF POSTCARD.

BLACKIE AND SON, LIMITED, 50 OLD BAILEY, E.C.

THE VERDICT.—"Messrs. Blackwood have the reputation of discovering new and gifted writers."

B B B
Blackwoods' Best Books

1

THE VOYAGE OF THE "SCOTIA"

An account of the work of the Scottish National Antarctic Expedition. A book of the greatest interest, of which the "P.M.G." says: "A model to all explorers who desire to write the story of their adventures." It has 105 illustrations and three maps. Price 21s. net.

2

MAIDS OF HONOUR

By A. J. Green-Armytage. A collection of short lives of those maiden ladies who have attained to fame—such as Hannah More, Mary Kingsley, Sister Dora, Jean Ingelow, Louisa Alcott, Christina Rossetti, Mary Lamb, etc. etc. A charming gift-book to a girl, but at the same time a work of great interest and value to "grown-ups." With portrait, 10s. 6d. net.

3

A CENTURY'S PROGRESS IN ASTRONOMY

By H. McPherson, jun. "An extremely interesting, clear, and accurate record, presented in a small compass, of the marvellous progress in astronomy during the past 100 years. A handy book of reference to the astronomical student as well as guide to the general reader." 6s.

New Six-Shilling Novels

Messrs. Blackwood find it impossible to do justice in explanatory notes to their popular novels, which have been received with a chorus of praise from the critics. In the list below you will find mentioned those well worthy of your attention.

SKIPPER

By Gilbert Watson

THE HEIR

By Sydney C. Grier

FISHERMAN'S GAT

By Edward Noble

ADMIRAL QUILLIAM

By Norreys Connell

RICHARD HAWKWOOD

By Neville Maugham

A SERVANT OF THE KING

By E. A. Griffin

THE HEARTH OF HUTTON

By W. J. Eccott

THE SAFETY OF THE HONOURS

By Alan McAulay

THE MARRIAGE OF AMINTA

By L. Parry Trutcott

SCOUNDREL MARK

By Frank Dillnot

[Immediately]

Ask your bookseller for prospectus of the NEW POPULAR EDITION OF GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS, now being issued in special handsome bindings and frontispieces, etc., at 3s. 6d. net a vol. 10 vols, 35s. net the set.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh & London

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	461	An Opal Song	477
Literature :		Nugæ Scriptoris :
Leslie Stephen	463	VIII. A Case for the National
The Old Country	465	Trust	477
A Statesman's Life	465	A Literary Causerie :
Movement and Momentum	466	Leonardo da Vinci	478
Authorised and Revised	467	Fiction	479
Sham History	468	Fine Art :
Poetic Drama and some Efforts	469	Prints and Drawings	480
A Publishing House one hundred		Forthcoming Books	480
years ago	471	Correspondence	481
Additional Announcements	472	Books Received	482
The Most Successful Books of the
Season	475

This number contains an Announcements Supplement.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WHAT are the characteristics of the Vagabond? Mr. Arthur Rickett, the author of a pleasant little book on "The Vagabond in Literature," lately published by Messrs. Dent, says they are three: (1) "Restlessness—the wandering instinct; this expresses itself mentally as well as physically. (2) A passion for the Earth—shown not only in love of the open air, but in a delight in all manifestations of life. (3) A constitutional reserve, whereby the Vagabond, though rejoicing in the company of a few kindred souls, is put out of touch with the majority of men and women." And he goes on to tell of six vagabonds-in-chief—Hazlitt, de Quincey, Borrow, Stevenson, Jeffries and Whitman, in all of whom he finds these qualities.

He does not include Thoreau, in whom, surely, all his three qualities were very strong; he does not include Mr. Meredith, perhaps because he is alive. He does not include Tennyson, because, as he justly says, Tennyson, "looking the handsomest Vagabond to the life, living apart from the world, as if its conventions and routine were distasteful to him, had scarcely a touch of the Vagabond in his temperament. That he had no Vagabond moods I will not say; for the poet who had no Vagabond moods is yet to be born. But he frowned them down as best he could, and in his writings we can see the typical, cultured, middle-class Englishman as we certainly fail to see him in Browning. A great deal of Tennyson is merely Philistinism made musical." Browning, on the other hand, our author claims for a Vagabond, for all his appearance of a prosperous banker and the middle-class Englishman that was so strong in him. There is another Vagabond whom perhaps only the pleasant fact that he is alive robs of mention in Mr. Rickett's introduction—Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, whose preface to the delightful "Pilgrim's Way," lately published and shortly to be reviewed in this paper, proclaims him (what his readers must long have guessed him) a Vagabond of the first water at heart.

"The poet who had no vagabond moods is yet to be born." We might go further than that. Every imaginative writer, and more than half the hack-writers and students of literature are what they are by virtue of one, at least, of Mr. Rickett's three postulated qualities—the restlessness, which we would rather term curiosity. It is essential to creative work. The man who accepts things as he finds them, who is not curious about the great world he lives in, never has anything to say about it. Curiosity is the mainspring of literature, of science, of art, of philosophy—of all intellectual work; and it seems to us that Mr. Rickett might, by a slight series of changes in his arbitrarily chosen qualities, include every writer that ever lived.

One or two good things will greet the reader of Mr. John Francis Barnett's new book of "Musical Reminiscences and Impressions" (Hodder and Stoughton). Mr. Barnett will be better known to posterity by such work as "Down dropp'd the sails" or "The fair breeze blew," from his Ancient Mariner, than by his book; but we like immensely the idea of Romberg's "Toy Symphony" played at St. James's Hall with the following performers: Cuckoo, Sullivan; drum (toy), Randegger; bells, Benedict; quail, Hallé; nightingale, Barnby; rattle, Blumenthal; trumpets (toy), Stainer and Kuhe, with Mr. Barnett and Cowen at the piano, and Cusins, Manns, Carl Rosa, Sankey, Ganz and Daubert for the strings.

He has a good story, too, of the parsimonious committeeman of some society, who objected to paying a man three guineas for the single note on the gong in Cherubini's Dies Irae, and offered to play it himself. Only the threat to fine him ten guineas if he came in wrong with that single note could deter him.

The story of the trombone who tried to play a squashed fly on his score will be familiar to all; Mr. Barnett has a contrast in the case of the theatre manager who, observing a trombone sitting idle during a rest of one hundred and thirteen bars, threatened to discharge him. "I do not pay you to rest, I pay you to play!" said he. We read, too, of E. F. Richter, the counterpoint teacher at the Leipsic Conservatorium, who was so great a smoker that he smoked even in the organ-loft of the church where he gave his organ-lessons. It is curious to note, by the way, that till Mr. Barnett determined to write his Ancient Mariner, many parts of which catch the very soul and spirit of Coleridge's "Rime," he had never read the poem.

Mr. Clement Shorter writes: "In complaining of the use of the word 'lied' in my comment upon the purchase of a wrongly designated portrait by the National Portrait Gallery you misread the literary significance of the word. When Johnson was told that one Pott had said that his play Irene was good he replied, 'If Pott said so, Pott lied,' and so I asserted with obvious indebtedness to Johnson that if, as Mr. Cust states, 'a Mr. Burgess' said 'forty years ago' that he had purchased this particular portrait from the Heger family, it is clear that he lied, as we have the word of Dr. Heger of Brussels that his father never painted; and that any portrait bearing his signature must be an imposture. Probably 'a Mr. Burgess' was himself the painter, in which case he was rather a clever artist as well as a clever rascal."

The autumn lists of new books and new editions are singularly lacking this year in sporting books and books about the country. It can hardly be that such books find no sale, unless, indeed, Bridge has usurped the evening hours that used to be spent in the smoking-room. Possibly the country gentleman likes to take his reading to-day in smaller doses than he used to do, and is content with short articles and magazine essays. But we have had no such books of late as St. John's "Wild Sports and Natural History of the Highlands," or "My Life as an Angler," by William Henderson, or "The Moor and the Loch," by John Colquhoun, books that take the reader straight to nature and so have a special charm of their own. There are plenty of good sportsmen to-day who are careful observers of nature, and they might give the world their experiences as they would. Moreover, there is always Walton's "Compleat Angler" to be re-edited, if there is any one left who has not tried his hand at it already.

For it seems to be the ambition of every angler to edit Walton, much as it is the ambition of all good classics to translate the Aeneid. Edward Jesse, Christopher Davies, Andrew Lang and George Dewar are only a few of the anglers who have been moved of late years to add to the editions of "The Compleat Angler," which now number considerably over a hundred. "Each of the three last centuries," writes Mr. Dewar in his introduction, "has produced a writer on 'the open air' of unrivalled merit, Izaak Walton, Gilbert White, and Richard Jefferies." It remains to be seen whether this twentieth century will be capable of producing a fourth worthy of being classed with them.

The one-day sale which Messrs. Sotheby announce for November 10 consists of one hundred and eighty lots selected from the Library at Mollington Hall, Chester, formed by the late Canon Blomfield, now the property of Mr. Guy Feilden, and comprises Early Printed and Rare Books, Illuminated and other Manuscripts, and some works in fine Old Bindings. There are a score of specimens of the famous Aldine Press among the Early Printed Books and also some fifteenth-century printing.

One of the lots is the rare edition of the Bible printed by Day and Seres in 1549 (Matthew's Version revised by Becke), one of the "Bugge" Bibles. Another lot is Archbishop Laud's Scottish Liturgy, Edin. 1637, with which is bound the 1636 edition of "The Psalmes of King David translated by King James." A book meriting notice is the rare First Polyglot Psalter, edited by Aug. Justinianus, containing as a gloss on the Psalm Coeli enarrant, the first notice of the life and voyages of Columbus and his discovery of America.

A correspondent sends us some figures which tend to show that the "modern picture-market" is by no means depressed. At the Institute of Oil Painters thirty pictures have been sold during the first fortnight, seventeen pictures realising the total of £922 15s.; while thirty exhibits at the Royal Society of British Artists have found purchasers in the past week. Our correspondent concludes by claiming that "indisputable facts, if proving no remarkable appreciation or understanding of the art of painting, do at least expose the fallacy that modern pictures are unsaleable."

Further and weightier evidence of the increasing importance attached to modern painting is furnished by the formation of the Scottish Modern Arts Association. In a preliminary prospectus, signed by Lord Balcarras, Sir Walter Armstrong, Sir Edward Tennant, and many other public men, in addition to Sir James Guthrie and the leading painters of Scotland, it is set forth that "there is not a gallery in Scotland to which the student of art, professional or amateur, resident or visiting, can be referred as containing a permanent collection of work adequately representative of modern Scottish Art." The aim of this new body, therefore, will be first to secure year by year worthy works by Scottish artists, and secondly, as funds permit, to acquire contemporary works, other than Scottish, of outstanding interest. Thus in time Edinburgh, as well as Dublin, is to have its gallery of modern art, and we suggest that artists of secure position should be asked to give examples of their art, as they have already been asked—in most cases successfully—by the founders of the similar movement in Dublin. We are glad to note that "when dealing with living artists the pictures will be bought if possible direct from the artists themselves," and under some scheme of low prices "similar to that employed by the Luxembourg." In this manner the association should avoid another Chantrey scandal, and prevent its income ever being used as a pension or prize fund for any artistic clique. Further particulars of the movement may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Gilbert L. D. Hole, W.S., 172 Braid Road, Edinburgh.

The Library Association is now taking a part in the book war. Without taking sides with either party, it is endeavouring to restore to the public libraries the privileges that have been taken from them. A circular has been issued to the booksellers asking them to use what influence they have with the publishers to induce them to give the same discount to public libraries which is already given to Government libraries. These institutions are recognised as almost "trade," and receive a substantial discount off even net books. The public library, on the other hand, does not obtain any discount, openly, off net books. And in this respect England stands alone. In all other countries the public libraries receive some preference over the retail buyer. It is interesting to note that the suggestion made in these columns some time back by a correspondent was adopted as an additional "influence" to the bookseller. This suggestion was that a co-operative book-supply company should be formed by libraries for the supply of books to themselves.

The Omnibus Library Bill has now been put into its final form by the honorary solicitor of the Library Association, and will shortly be placed in the hands of Mr. Tennant, M.P., who will have charge of it in the House. The Bill now contains an additional clause (a result of the discussion which took place at the Conference at Bradford) giving permission to library authorities to make expenditure on lectures and exhibitions. In the light of Lord Rosebery's remarks at the opening of the London University Library, lectures are essential to libraries. And the efforts of the past and the present have been hampered by the necessity of making the lectures "free" in the sense of costing nothing. Brighton Library Committee has recently decided to give fortnightly lectures through the winter. The first will be an introductory lecture on books, by the Chief Librarian.

The National Home Reading Union is still endeavouring to enlist the aid of the public libraries, and a conference of members and London librarians was held last week. But it would appear that little can be done on the lines of making the public library an adjunct to the Union. If any success is to attend conjunction it must be accepted that, no matter how successful reading circles may be, they can only occupy a subsidiary place in the work of the public library. Another conference which took place in London last week between London librarians and school teachers promises more success. A significant point is that the London County Council has accepted the offer of the Library Association's assistance in drawing up its lists of school prizes.

It is curious that just when in England we are realising the educational importance of illustration the Germans are discovering that it is quite as bad to force the youthful mind to flights beyond its powers. In the October number of the Kunstwart there is an article of protest against the new method of drawing-lessons to illustrate the literature class by asking the pupils to draw or paint the figures of poetry. It would take the imagination of a Blake or a Boecklin to give an adequate idea of Goethe's "Erl-King," and, as the writer points out, there is great danger that the pictures produced by the children will mar or efface the beautiful if vague impression produced on their minds, since inability to give a concrete form to their sensations does not prove such sensations to be absent. Carlyle says that it were ill for us if we had nothing in us beyond what we could express. The article concludes with a warning that it disparages genius to give a child to suppose that he could illustrate one of Goethe's finest ballads.

The German system of forcing the pupils to think for themselves leads sometimes to amusing results. At a finishing school for girls in a small German town a professor of ethics recently set himself the task of rousing the dormant intelligence of a particularly stolid class. After some preliminary lectures on pessimism and optimism, he administered a first shock by asking each pupil to consider before the next lecture whether she was an optimist or a pessimist, and to let him have a paper stating her reasons. The second shock upset the entire establishment, for, after dealing eloquently with the iniquity of suicide, as being in any circumstances opposed to the law of God, he concluded by asking them to let him have papers stating why, when a captain committed suicide by going down with his ship, every one spoke of it as a noble deed. On this occasion the "Directrice" had some very awkward questions to evade, and was heard to regret the excessive zeal of the lecturer. But at the end of the term the pupils went home with awakened minds.

Former members of the Oxford Union will be interested to hear that the fading, peeling frescoes by Morris, Burne-Jones, Rossetti, and others on the walls of the Library—the old Debating Hall—at which they used—or used not—to look up with regret and admiration have been photographed, and that the photographs have been published by the Clarendon Press with an introduction by Professor Holmes, and a history and explanation by Mr. Holman Hunt. The photographs are said to reveal more of the designs than any eye has seen for forty years.

Selby Abbey, for the rebuilding of which a national appeal is being made, holds a unique position, as the one great Benedictine monastery of Northern England which survives as a parochial church. "The monastery of Selby," wrote Freeman, "was a foundation of the Conqueror, and Selby itself was, according to a tradition which its very unlikelihood makes likely, the birthplace of his one English-born child." But if the monastery was the first building at Selby, and it was only just rising in 1068, it is difficult to see how Henry I. could have been born there: though, as Freeman points out, the policy of William in taking care that the future king should be born in that most troubled part of his kingdom would be in exact accordance with the policy of Edward I., when he arranged that the son whom he designed to be Prince of Wales should be born upon Welsh soil.

The bibliographical portion of the new volume of the "Cambridge Modern History" is an exceptional feature, to which attention is called in the preface by the editors of the work. "It seemed a fitting tribute," they write, "to the memory of Lord Acton, the projector of this history, to utilise the noble collection of books brought together by him, and now, thanks to the generous action of Mr. Carnegie and Mr. John Morley, part of the Cambridge University Library, for the purpose of attempting what has never before been attempted in this country—a full bibliography of the Thirty Years War, and more especially of its extant original documents and contemporary narrative and controversial literature." They add that Miss A. M. Cooke is engaged, under the general direction of the University Librarian, in classifying and cataloguing Lord Acton's collection. This classified catalogue, which is to be published shortly, should be of great benefit to all students of modern history in this country.

The following are among forthcoming events:

British Museum (Natural History) Lecture Theatre of the Victoria and Albert Museum. Swiney Lectures on Geology: Monday, November 12, at 6 P.M., Lecture IV., Fauna of Scotland. Wednesday, November 14, at 6 P.M., Lecture V., Fauna of England and Wales. Friday, November 16, at 6 P.M., Lecture VI., Spanish Peninsula and Pyrenees. Illustrated by Lantern Slides.

Linnean Society, Burlington House. Evening meeting, Thursday, November 15, at 8 P.M. Paper: Mr. Horace W. Monckton, "My Recent Researches in Norway." Illustrated by Lantern Slides.

Zoological Society of London, 3 Hanover Square, W. Tuesday, November 13, at 3.50 P.M. (1) Professor R. Burckhardt, C.M.Z.S.: On the Embryo of the Okapi. (2) Mr. F. F. Laidlaw: Zoological Results of the Third Tanganyika Expedition, conducted by Dr. W. A. Cunningham, 1904-05; Report on the Turbellaria. (3) Mr. Oldfield Thomas, F.R.S.: List of further collections of Mammals from Western Australia, including a series from Bernier Island, obtained for Mr. W. E. Balston; with Field-notes by the Collector, Mr. G. C. Shortbridge. (4) Messrs. J. Cosmo Melville, F.Z.S., and Robert Standen: The Mollusca of the Persian Gulf, Gulf of Oman, and Arabian Sea, as evidenced mainly through the collections of Mr. F. W. Townsend, 1893-1905, with descriptions of new species; Part II, Pelecypoda.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus.—Monday, November 12, 5 P.M. Mr. Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate: "On the Relation of Literature to Politics." Thursday, November 15, 6 P.M. Professor Hubert von Herkomer: "On artistic possibilities of the machine."

Art Exhibitions.—Grafton Galleries: Works of the late Archibald Stuart Wortley.—Views of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens by Mary L. Breakell. Open to December 3.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metal-work, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture, lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie: Cheyne Art Club: Pictures and sculpture: October 26 to November 23.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Ryder Gallery: Water-colours by Margaret R. Wansey: November 1 to November 14.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc.: October 22 to January 1.—Graves Galleries: London Sketch Club: October 27 to end of November. Paintings of Flowers in Oil by Louise E. Perman.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—Messrs. Dowdeswell: The Society of Twenty-five English Painters: November 2.—E. J. van Wisselingh. Works by Alphonse Legros, William Strang, A.R.A., and Dorothea Landau. Closes November 15.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—Dickinson. Contemporary Scottish Art. October 27 for three weeks.—R. Gutekunst: Etchings by Rembrandt, Ostade and Van Dyck. November 5 to December 3.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. November 5 for one month.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. November 7.—Tooth and Sons. Pastels by Arthur Wardle. November 7.—Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co., Friday, November 2.—Exhibition of the portrait of Lord Milner, painted for the Town Council of Johannesburg, and other pictures by M. Theodore Roussel. Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours; Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club; Dering Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. November 10: Tinsel Pictures by Miss Birkenruth and Water-colours by C. A. C. Jeffcock.—Messrs. Graves. Nocturnes in oil by Miss Marguerite Verboeckhoven, November 10 to end of month.

Concerts.—November 10, 3 P.M. Second Symphony Concert.—November 10, 2.30 P.M. Chappell Ballad Concert. November 12, 8, London Symphony Orchestra.—Bechstein Hall: November 10, at 3 P.M. Sarasate and Sobrino.—November 12, 3 P.M., Ernest Sharpe.—November 12, 8. Howard Jones.—November 13, 8.15. Bluebell Klean.—November 14, 3.30. Susan Strong.—November 14, 3.30. Parisotti.—November 15, 3. Harold Bauer.—November 15, 8.15. Sigmund Beel.—November 17, 3.15. Pachmann.—November 17, 8. William Ludwig.—November 19, 3. David Bispham.—Aeolian Hall: November 8 at 3, Marie Fromm.

Plays: November 29 at Chester. Three of the Chester Mystery Plays: The Salutation, The King's Play, The Shepherd's Play. November 20. Professor Gollancz will lecture on the plays at Chester.—Stage Society. Scala Theatre, December 9 and 10. The Weavers, by Gerhart Hauptmann, translated by Mary Morison.—November 16 and 17, 8.30. Scala Theatre. In aid of the Little Sisters of the Poor: A Simple Sweep, by F. W. Broughton, music by Father James F. Downes; La Jalouse, by J. A. Bleackley, and The Minstrel, by J. A. Bleackley, music by Father Downes.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. November 10. Early printed and rare books and MSS. (illustrated and others) from the Mollington Hall Library formed by the late Canon G. B. Blomfield. November 15 and 16. English and Colonial Coins, Patterns and Proofs, and the Loveday collection of Crown Pieces.

Messrs. Robinson and Fisher: Willis's Rooms, November 15. Thirty pictures and pastes by Wynford Dewhurst.

LITERATURE

SIR LESLIE STEPHEN

The Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen. By FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND. (Duckworth, 18s. net.)

In this careful and well-written book no attempt is made to estimate the place which Sir Leslie Stephen is likely to hold in English letters. What it does chiefly is to unfold the career of a man whose gifts are susceptible of tolerably exact definition. In literature the highest and at the same time the most profitable talent is that of sympathetic imagination. A man who has the power to create may experience difficulties at the outset of his career, but ultimately, should he succeed at all, his success will be of the highest. But the most ardent admirers of Sir Leslie Stephen would not put forward the claim on his behalf that his genius lay in this direction. We hear in the course of his life of his attempting many things—essays, criticism, history, biography, but there is no indication that he ever felt the inspiration to construct original work. He was not a story-teller, and he was not a poet. Even as a critic it is impossible to place him in the first rank. He wrote agreeably and with much appreciation of the books he loved, but one has only to place the best of his criticism beside the best of that of Matthew Arnold, say, or Sainte-Beuve to see that it wants the illumination of a really first-class mind. He was, however, an excellent journalist. Mr. Frederick Greenwood likened his contributions to the Pall Mall Gazette to coin of the realm. But even in that praise there is something damnatory. Genius is at times more than coin of the realm, and at times much less. The man from whom an Editor may expect a masterpiece is also one who may give forth what is little better than drivel. For ordinary purposes he is not so useful as the sound, capable member of the staff that Stephen must have been. But he was not quite happy in the organs that he wrote for. The Saturday Review in the hey-day of its pride must have been a somewhat curious paper. In theology it was to some extent dominated by its proprietor, Mr. Beresford Hope, who was an extremely High Churchman. Sir Leslie Stephen remarks that:

as few intelligent men, and therefore few Saturday reviewers, agree with him in this matter, the result is to neutralise the paper entirely. It sometimes sneers at the Evangelical party and frequently sneers at religious belief generally, though in terms sufficiently covert to deceive the ordinary British public; but in most church matters it preserves an exceptional silence.

The truth is that in his early days Stephen set himself to catch the tone of the journals to which he contributed, and thereby lost his own individuality. So much was this the case that in 1804, when he was writing his brother's life, he was surprised to find that, on looking over the files of the Saturday, "though he could distinguish his brother's articles, he could rarely distinguish his own by merely reading them." The subjects that he chose to write about then were not such as led to the expression of his inmost thoughts. If we look at a list of articles he contributed during seven weeks of 1869 we find that he reviewed such works as "Fors Clavigera," a novel by James Payn, "The Luck of Roaring Camp," Edmund Yates's "Dr. Wainwright's Patient," and Hutton's "Essays," while his Middles dealt with "London Pauperism," "Our Christian Civilisation," obliquely levelled at the bombardment of Paris, "The Times, and the Terms of Peace," "Government and Vaccination"—which is all journalism, pure and simple. His connection with the Cornhill began in 1866, and here again we find him seeking out the popular topic. His first essay was on American Humour, and he contributed a series of papers signed by "A Cynic," the subjects in 1869 being "The Cynic's Apology," "Idolatry," "Useless Knowledge," "The Decay of Murder," "National Antipathies," "The Uses of Fools," "Social Slavery" and many others. These essays were never published in book form, and the biographer thinks that they were very properly suppressed. They were written from a pose. "Leslie was no cynic, he had no love for cynics; he thoroughly saw of what affectation and egoism professed cynicism is manufactured." Mr. Maitland goes a step further and says: "he had not histrionic power enough to become a good stage cynic, and in some of the qualities that go to make the cynic of real life he was miserably deficient." For "histrionic power" we might effectively substitute the phrase, "dramatic sympathy." It was the lack of this that hindered Stephen from scaling the heights of literature. His tenure of the editorial chair of the Cornhill was not a very distinguished success. The contributors he managed to gather round him were by no means so brilliant that they can be described as "all the talents." If we take a list of the writers of serial stories, we are led to the conclusion that in choosing them Leslie Stephen was largely guided by reputation. He had, indeed, published George Meredith before Mr. Meredith had the name that he now possesses, but the others were handed on to him. We wonder what his letter-bag can have contained. He published many essays by R. L. Stevenson and W. E. Henley. Mr. Maitland says that he could not boast of making any great discoveries, and regards as his boldest venture the acceptance of Mr. Henley's "Hospital Outlines." However, we have some pleasant pictures of him as Editor of the Cornhill. Mr. Edmund Gosse tells how Leslie Stephen, "in his well-known black velvet jacket," called on R. L. S., and Stevenson and he were invited to dine with the great man.

We anticipated—I cannot imagine why—a large collection of literary notabilities, and, in our eagerness, we were hanging about, outside the house, some time before we could present ourselves. But we were the only guests. Leslie Stephen sat at one end of the table, his wife at the other, Miss Annie Thackeray opposite to us two lads. I shall always remember the surprise Leslie Stephen's appearance gave me; the long, thin, bright red beard, radiating in a fan-shape; the wrinkled forehead; the curious flatness of the top of the head, accentuated by the fulness of the auburn hair on either side; the long cold hands; the distraught and melancholy eyes. The dinner was extremely quiet. Scarcely a word fell from either of the Stephens, and we two guests, although chatterboxes engrained, were subdued to silence by shyness.

Mr. Thomas Hardy gives a sketch that may be placed side by side with this. He had called for the first time at 8 Southwell Gardens.

He welcomed me with one hand, holding back the barking "Troy" with the other. The dog's name I, of course, had never heard till then, and I said, "That is the name of my wicked soldier-hero." He answered caustically, "I don't think my Troy will feel hurt at the coincidence, if yours doesn't." I rejoined, "There is also another coincidence. Another Leslie Stephen lives near here, I find." "Yes," he said, "he's the spurious one."

Perceiving, what I had not gathered from his letters, that I had a character to deal with, I made some cheerful reply, and tried him further. We were looking out of the window, and I asked him what made him live in such a new street (he had lately removed thither), with pavements hardly laid, and the road-stones not rolled in. He said he had played as a child with his nurse in the fields hard by, and he fancied living on the spot, which was dear to him, though the building operations interfered with the sentiment much. I felt then that I liked him, which at first I had doubted. The feeling never changed.

We must not conclude without a word about the famous Sunday tramps, "that noble body of scholarly and cheerful pedestrians," as Mr. Meredith calls them. They formed a kind of club or society, which was in existence for fifteen years, and Stephen was leader up to 1891. The two hundred and fifty-second and last walk was taken in 1895. The decay of the society is attributed to golf and bicycles. The usual course was to take a long walk into the country, get a lunch of bread and cheese at the village ale-house and scurry back in time for dinner in town. The following is the best account we can find of Stephen's conversation:

Fully to enjoy Stephen you had to be alone with him. Then if you did not ask too many questions—a catechist was to him of all bores the most abominable—he would chat of men and things, of books and journals, of poetry and prize-fighting, philosophy and pedestrianism, the virtues of guides and the sins of contributors: never dazzling, never epigrammatic, always terse and humorous, always full of good matter and sober sense. It was the talk of a man who had seen a good deal of human nature, who had strong likes and dislikes, but much equity and much compassion. But there! Stephen would have been the first to say that he was no Johnson, and certainly he has found no Boswell. Nor by my fault will he lose so much as some men would. He never "talked like a book"; not in the least; yet those who read his books and letters will, I feel sure, know exactly what his talk was like, for he was homogeneous. Beneath the academic costume, somewhat carelessly worn, a sympathetic eye will easily detect the shooting-coat of the "chief guide."

On the whole, the life of Stephen was full, scholarly and useful. It has been well told in this volume, which will amply repay reading.

THE OLD COUNTRY

The Old Country. By HENRY NEWBOLT. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

MR. HENRY NEWBOLT'S novel, "The Old Country," is a kind of romantic "Time-machine." The motto, which he has chosen for it from Sir Thomas Browne—"In Eternity there is no distinction of Tenses"—vaguely indicates its import. The story begins at the present time, and suddenly shifts to the year in which the battle of Poitiers was fought. The characters for the most part remain the same, nor does the scene change. Stephen Bulmer, in the early chapters, is a young Englishman, of Colonial upbringing, who "speaks of things to come as if he saw them." In the later chapters, he is the same Englishman, modified by an Italian education. But the sense of time has vanished from his brain. Visible things have lost their century, and in spite of a double consciousness, he has gone back five hundred years. "He saw without any amazement"—this is how the transformation is announced—"that here and there in the landscape there were unfamiliar aspects, slight changes such as those to be felt rather than seen after a period of absence; and from the opposite hill the house from which he had come last night had disappeared without a trace, though the avenues and the old walled garden still remained. This was the world he knew, but not the world as he had known it; its form and beauty were the same, but not its relation to himself." In other words, he goes back to the place which once he filled, without wonder or uncertainty, and thus gives Mr. Newbolt an opportunity not merely for a sketch of English life in the fourteenth century, but for the setting forth of a wise parable.

"Life in England," says one of Mr. Newbolt's characters, "has always been possible and intelligible for an Englishman." That is the argument and conclusion of the book. "There is nothing new under the sun," and a man "may conceive himself in the same manner to have lived from the beginning and to be as old as the World." To speak of old and new, of ancient and modern is to court confusion. The trappings of life have changed; the essence remains constant. Or, if we may borrow a metaphor from the battle-field, the tactics of existence shift from age to age, while its strategy is unalterable. There is no difference between the Bishop of Exeter, who excommunicated a recalcitrant priest, and the more modern prelate, who drives a free-thinking preacher into the hedgerow or into the camp of the infidels. The Battle of Poitiers, described by Mr. Newbolt with much spirit, gave the same chance of bravery and heroism as did the fights sternly fought upon the African veldt. Then as now it is called old-fashioned to have a "feeling wider and deeper than mere love of country." In all matters of Church and State one epoch is but a repetition of another, and Stephen Bulmer, suddenly thrown back from the consideration of America and modern politics, is intimately at home in the England of the Black Prince.

"In Eternity there is no distinction of Tenses." But we are not in Eternity, and Time is a rigid convention of our life. It is possible, therefore, that some readers may find Mr. Newbolt's artifice too fantastic for their understanding. At the same time, Mr. Newbolt makes the transition so lightly and so easily, that not even the most indolent brain need be puzzled. He insists upon no violent contrasts; he demands the acceptance of no machinery. The clock is put back—that is all, and you have a practical illustration that "things long past have been answered by things present."

Ingenious as is Mr. Newbolt's thesis, it is not for that that we would most highly praise his book. The story is told with a tact and delicacy rarely found in the modern novel. Not merely is Mr. Newbolt separated by a wide gulf from the common merchants of fiction; he has written many passages which must be judged by a higher standard than that set by his contemporaries. He has painted the West Country with a skill and sympathy which come of knowledge. But it is the picture of Poitiers which is his masterpiece. This is done with a simplicity and a concealment of effort, which are the marks of good prose. It is not a purple patch. It is in perfect tone with the rest. Only, the theme is better suited to the author's style than disquisitions upon politics and theology. In the desert dulness of the mass of novels "The Old Country" is a pleasant oasis, and we are of good hope that Mr. Newbolt will make another essay in the art of fiction. Nor shall we be sorry if next time he forgets Eternity and its lost tenses, and places his characters frankly and wholly in one and the same century.

A STATESMAN'S LIFE

Life and Letters of Lord Durham. By STUART J. REID. 2 vols. (Longmans, 36s. net.)

SIR WILLIAM BUTLER, speaking on the problem of Government in South Africa some little time ago, made the remark that, though Lord Durham's authority lasted but a few months, he did more "in the making of Canada—in laying the foundation of the present state of prosperity and happiness—than had been achieved by all the Governors and Governments of seventy years before him." This was, as Mr. Stuart J. Reid says, a statement as generous as it was bold. In itself it would serve as an excuse, if there were no other, for the book before us, but Lord Durham was in reality one of the most conscientious, high-minded, and honourable statesmen that England has produced, and is worthy, for reasons other than his career in Canada, of the honour now paid to his memory. He belonged to the very old family of Lambtons of the county of Durham. If we were to believe tradition, there were members of the family there in Saxon times, and at any rate there is a signature of John de Lamton who attested the Charter of Uchtred de Wodeshend in the closing years of the twelfth century. The later tradition of the family was a liberal one, and Lord Durham's father, William Henry Lambton, was a remarkable man, who supported the principles of Fox and was a life-long friend of Lord Grey. Thus, as has often happened with members of the British aristocracy, the young statesman grew up in an atmosphere of politics. He himself was born in London in 1792 and was educated partly by a private tutor and afterwards at Eton at the time when Keate ruled the lower school, having for school companions among others Percy Bysshe Shelley and Stratford Canning, afterwards Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. He left Eton at Christmas 1808 and in 1812 eloped with Miss Henrietta Cholmondeley.

The young lovers took coach to Gretna Green, and were there married on January 1, 1812, by that informal parson, Robert Elliot, who in later years used to boast that he had made upwards of seven thousand people happy. The "Annual Register" records the wedding in the following terms: "At Gretna Green, William H. Lambton, Esq., of Durham, to Miss Cholmondeley, daughter of the celebrated Madame St. Alban." It is odd that the bridegroom should be wrongly described, as W. H. Lambton was, of course, his younger brother. Madame St. Alban, in spite of the reputation which she appears to have enjoyed in 1812, is now almost a mythical personage, and her name is not to be found in any list of musical or theatrical celebrities.

The marriage was afterwards repeated in a more seemly fashion by Philip Egerton, Rector of Malpas in the county of Cheshire. The union proved to be a brief one. Mrs. Lambton's health was delicate from the first, and she died early. Of her three children, only one reached womanhood, and she too was cut off at twenty-three. Lambton attained his majority in the spring of 1813, and almost immediately afterwards the representation of the county of Durham fell vacant through the death of Sir Henry Vane Tempest. He became a candidate and was duly elected, representing the constituency until 1828, when he was elevated to the peerage. In Parliament he was not long in asserting his Liberal principles, and was one of the earliest to urge reform on the restless and unhappy England that existed after the Battle of Waterloo. Mr. Stuart Reid gives an attractive picture of him then:

Before the world Lambton stood dauntless, with clean-cut convictions and iron will, equal, in short, to every hazard of fortune. But he was extremely human, very dependent, and altogether lovable in private life, in spite of little foibles of pride and caprice, which only served to throw into relief the generosity and delicacy of a supremely attractive, finely poised, and beautiful nature. He was imperious sometimes to the point of arrogance, and exacting, even to the limits of patience; but these qualities were of the kind which cut two ways—he was incapable of meanness and was the soul of honour.

His history henceforth is largely that of reform, and in consequence has often been told. In 1835 he went as ambassador to St. Petersburg, and in 1837 he was offered the post of Governor-General of Canada, at the time when the Dominion was in urgent need of a strong hand to guide it. With him he had as his Secretary the witty and clever Charles Buller, to whom Thomas Carlyle had been tutor. Of the misrepresentations to which he was exposed and all else pertaining to this interesting chapter of his life, Mr. Reid writes fully and well. We will conclude with an anecdote which illustrates the character of the man better than any disquisition. It was related by the present Duchess of Leeds:

He was dining one night at Lambton Castle with the Countess, and the only other persons in the room were the servants. He spoke unguardedly across the table to his wife, and swept aside her remarks with brusqueness. When the men withdrew, she, the gentlest of women, remonstrated. Instantly, Durham, who had not realised the force of his words until that moment, sprang to his feet, rang the bell, and—fearful that his words had already been reported—ordered the whole of the household into the room. He told the astonished servants that he had been momentarily betrayed into hard and unjust words, declared that he was sorry for the fact, and assured them there was one thing they must remember, which was that, if he ever contradicted the Countess again, he had put himself into the wrong, and she was always right. Then, turning to his wife, he apologised to her in their presence and dismissed them.

MOVEMENT AND MOMENTUM

Some Reminiscences. By WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI. (Brown, Langham, 42s.)

Woolner became hostile to Hunt, Dante Rossetti and Millais. Hunt became hostile to Woolner and Stephens, and in a minor degree to Dante Rossetti. Stephens became hostile to Hunt. Dante Rossetti became hostile to Woolner and in a minor degree to Hunt and Millais. Millais, being an enormously successful man while others were only commonly successful, did not perhaps become strictly hostile to any one: he kept aloof however from Dante Rossetti and, I infer, from Woolner.

THERE is an air of comicality about this paragraph: Mr. Rossetti—who is responsible for its characteristically mathematical precision—introduces it, however, with the observation that it is a sad and humiliating reflection. But any man, at all of the world, will see that it is a reflection very obvious, and, if there be any sadness about it, it is merely the sadness that attaches to all human transactions. We grow old: our friends grow old: we are not what we were: some of our friends claim credit for inventions that we confided to them: we are—and we know it in our hearts—avid of praise that should actually be awarded to some one else, once an old friend. We do not, any of us, remain the men we were, and—better or worse—some of us make love to our friends' wives or the mistresses they had not got when first we knew them.

That is obvious. If you read the inner histories of any movement—whether of the French Revolution or of Christian Science—you will see the same things taking place.

We do not, really, need to hear about it any more than we need to be told that rain-drops fall when clouds dissolve—although any rain-cloud may be a vastly efficient movement. Of course we all love scandals—but we could just as well get scandals from the histories of any seven households in any Bayswater street as in any Memoirs of a Brotherhood. That, in fact, is not the point.

The point of a movement may be expressed mathematically by stating that the effort of A and B acting together is greater in effect than the solitary efforts of A and B. $(A+B)^2$, in fact, equals $A^2 + 2AB + B^2$. And in this formula the $2AB$ is the movement. Mr. Hunt, Mr. Millais, Mr. D. G. Rossetti, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, Mr. F. G. Stephens and the others might have gone on working in silence and apart—and they might never have been heard of. It is just because $(A+B)^2$ is so much more than A^2 added to B^2 that the pre-Raphaelite Movement made the stir that it did. Or you may express it: William Jones cannot carry a two hundred-pound block of stone round a corner, nor can Thomas Robinson. But William Jones and Thomas Robinson together do it very easily. And the main point is that the stone gets carried. It does not really matter that afterwards Mr. Jones punches Mr. Robinson's head because Mr. Jones says that Robinson only helped him to carry, whilst Mr. Robinson says that he was the head of the combination—or because Mr. Robinson insists on making eyes at the pastrycook's girl whom Mr. Jones first met.

What we have to praise the Saints for is the proof, as exhibited in the pre-Raphaelite movement, that any movement of an artistic kind is possible in these islands. For a movement means an attempt to create a standard—and what we are all, as artists, suffering from here is the fact that we have no standards. We may blame the Book Club or the publishers, the booksellers or the literary agents, for the poor estate in which literature finds herself or towards which she is tending. But these things do not matter. What does matter is that there is no literary movement to establish some sort of theory of technique, however imbecile. We suffer from too many books because there is no apprenticeship to the honourable craft of writing. If there were, the weaklings would be discouraged: we suffer from lifeless works because since there is no movement there is no contagion of delight in work for the sake of work: we suffer from hopelessly amateurish works because there is no standard to agree with or differ from.

For the value of the pre-Raphaelite movement was not the intrinsic value of its æsthetic canons, which jumbled up the salutary with the ridiculous and distilled them to a height where no man might work. Mr. Rossetti was never a real pre-Raphaelite, neither was Mr. Millais nor Mr. Woolner. But the mere statement of the pre-Raphaelite laws made them think about their works: it made them, to the measure of their abilities, conscious artists and not befogged geniuses. That is the crux, and that is why the pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood was a phenomenon so important. It showed that movements and brotherhoods—those æsthetic combinations—are possible in painting and writing England: it showed that these may be. And the sooner we have more of them, and the more we have of them and the more noise they make in this quiet world, the better. It will not matter what their tenets prove.

Of course we want, too, illuminating gossip about our remarkable figures. That is why we welcome Mr. Rossetti's reminiscences. We need to know all we can about humanity—not because humanity is pre-Raphaelite, but because it is interesting. We need gossip about a remarkable police constable in Broadway, New York—that is why we read novels; or about, if such a thing be possible, a remarkable member of the British Academy—that is why we read memoirs. And, if we are altruistically saddened or sardonically amused that Woolner became hostile to Hunt and Dante Rossetti and Millais it is because we are interested in their idiosyncrasies. It does not affect the æsthetic importance of the P. R. B. either way.

This fact has become manifest enough to Mr. W. M. Rossetti. He has presented us, not with a memoir of the Brothers, but with a series of minute characterisations of all the people he has met and deemed interesting. These result in a couple of volumes full of quaintnesses and of valuable details. We read of his grandfather, the translator of Milton in Italian, who made mosaic work in wood and shot woodpigeons out of the window of his carpenter's shop. We read, as much as he likes to tell, of his brother, of Hunt, of Browning, of Trelawny, of Byron's mistress, Claire Clairmont, of clerks in the excise office, of ship captains, of the Rev. Charles Gutch, who filled Christina Rossetti with fears of damnation, and of a "black, semi-Persian female cat called Muff."

Of the aloof temper with which Mr. Rossetti approached life, let the following be taken as proof:

... I was reading Mr. J. W. Mackail's Life of William Morris,—a most interesting book, which would make one love the man if one had not done so before. In vol. i. p. 303, I find that Morris, writing to a lady on March 26, 1874, expressed himself as follows as a tag to a "growl" against some of the conventions of society: "Do you know, I have to go to a wedding next Tuesday; and it annoys me to think that I lack courage to say: 'I do not care for either of you and you neither of you care for me; and I won't waste a day out of my precious life in grinning a company grin at you two.'" Now "Next Tuesday" was March 31, and that was the wedding-day of Lucy Brown and myself, and Morris was bidden, though not to the wedding itself, still to the extra quiet wedding breakfast which succeeded it at Brown's house. So I see that the bridegroom whom the latter referred to was no other than myself. That Morris did not care for either of us (he gave us as wedding present a Nuremberg Chronicle of 1493) cannot now be helped; he was mistaken in thinking that I did not, in all reasonable measure care for him. But indeed I had never seen ground for supposing that Morris regarded me with anything that would be called predilection—and I might say the like of Burne Jones. It was Madge Brown (not myself, averse as I am from everything of the sort and most prompt to believe in the aversion of others) who bespoke Morris and his wife to the wedding breakfast at which to the best of my recollection the only other guests were my mother, Christina and Dante Gabriel.

Or the following comment on the reading of a paper before the Shelley Society: "The audience exhibited more tedium than satisfaction so I proceeded no further." And, if Mr. Rossetti is slightly more loyal to the memory of his brother than to himself, he is singularly just, appreciative of and friendly to all his brother's competitors. It would be difficult to find a commentary more useful to those interested in the men and movements of the last sixty years.

AUTHORISED AND REVISED

The Interlinear Bible, (Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d. net.)

"I KNOW of nothing more likely to lead to an intelligent study of Holy Scripture than the use of a Parallel Bible. I am content to await the result of such study." So spake the late Bishop of Durham, himself one of the revisers of the New Testament, when in 1892 the Northern Convocation was discussing the respective merits of the Authorised and the Revised Versions. Since then we have had more than one attempt to combine the two in one volume, and to exhibit their differences by printing their respective texts in separate columns side by side. By the issue of "The Interlinear Bible" a new step has been taken, its purpose being to aid the English reader still further, and to reduce the difficulty of comparison to a minimum.

The plan adopted is as follows. Where the two Versions agree, the text is printed once and in large type: where they differ, both are given, but they are printed in small type one above the other, the upper line containing the Revised Version and the lower the Authorised. The advantage of this scheme is obvious. With a "Parallel Bible" the reader has to turn his eye across the page, and then to rely upon his memory without any assistance from the printer to note all the variations of phraseology and punctuation. But the reader of "The Interlinear Bible" cannot run his eye along the text without having all these differences brought directly before his notice. By taking the large type in conjunction with the upper line of small type, he obtains a continuous reading of the Revised Version, while to discover the Authorised he has simply to pick up the lower line. In the vast majority of cases the alterations are so slight that they can easily be presented by this method of typography. Where the changes extend in length to more than one line, so that the eye encounters four lines, or more, of small type ranged one above the other, there may be sometimes a momentary hesitation as to which belongs to the newer and which to the older translation. In such places, however, the printers have done their best by careful indenture to facilitate the reader's work, and with a little practice he will find no difficulty in securing the text which he requires. Only those who have actually tried to devise a mode of indicating the differences between the two Versions can be aware of the peculiar complexity of the task. And in "The Interlinear Bible" we have what is undoubtedly the most successful venture that has been made.

The time of its publication, too, is opportune. Dr. Westcott's appeal to the next generation is now meeting with its response. And, although the English public cannot be said as yet to have made up its mind as to the superiority of the Revised Version, we have at least reached the stage when comparative study is possible; so that anything which serves to point out with lucidity the contrast between the two translations is sure of a welcome. Strange it is to note the persistence of the suspicion with which the work of the Revisers was greeted a quarter of a century ago. Yet it is consoling to reflect that the Authorised Version was itself subjected to a similar treatment on its issue in 1611. A Dean of that century declared that he would sooner be torn to pieces by wild horses than have had a hand in its production, nor did it come into general use until some fifty years after its first appearance. Even to-day the Psalter appended to the Book of Common Prayer is taken from the Great Bible of 1539, while the Canticles at Morning and Evening Prayer and the sentences embodied in the Order of Holy Communion belong to sources older than the Authorised Version.

The substitution, however, of the Revised for the Authorised Version is now merely a question of time, and "The Interlinear Bible" should do much to hasten the process. Let the reader, to take a single instance, turn to the opening verses of the twenty-eighth chapter of Job—that magnificent description of the work of the ancient miner, which might be read, almost as it stands, as an ode commemorative of the opening of an Alpine tunnel or the completion of some other triumph of modern engineering—and he cannot fail to recognise the immensity of his debt to the revisers. Nor should he allow himself to forget, as he peruses "The Interlinear Bible," that it is not only the textual superiority of the Revised Version which is being placed before him, but also its marked advance in literary appreciation. One of the chief merits of the last revision was that it treated the Bible as literature and not simply as a conglomerate of oracular sentences. The division into chapters, for example, which we inherit apparently from Stephen Langton, was abandoned by the revisers, who arranged their material in paragraphs that bear some definite relation to the sense. Moreover, they were the first to redeem the poetry of the Bible from the reproach of being printed in the same way as its prose. They also omitted the descriptive prefaces of the chapters in the Authorised Version, together with the headlines of its pages, both of which have exercised a baneful influence on the study of the Old Testament by encasing it not infrequently within a framework of Rabbinic artificiality. All these benefits have been incorporated in "The Interlinear Bible." In such an edition the only variations that can be actually exhibited are those of language, spelling, and punctuation. But the editors have adopted the Revised Version as the basis of their literary arrangements, so that the reader is really enjoying throughout some of the most important advantages of the last revision.

This edition also serves to indicate afresh the contrast between the Revised Versions of the Old Testament and the New. No one can turn over the pages of "the Interlinear Bible" without being struck by the fact that the alterations in the latter are much more minute and extensive than in the former, and reminded of the invidious comparison that is still drawn in some quarters between the temerity and pedantic scholasticism of the revisers of the New Testament and the reserve and sobriety of the Hebrew scholars. Such a criticism, however, fails to take into account the difference in the character of the tasks that lay before the respective companies of revision. In the case of the Old Testament the revisers had comparatively no textual difficulties to contend with, as the so-called "Massoretic" text is the basis of all subsequent versions, and they had simply to re-edit a translation, their changes being due as a rule not to an altered reading in the Hebrew but to an alteration in the rendering of the existent Hebrew word. On the other hand, the revisers of the New Testament had first of all to get at the best Greek text, and had therefore to make a comprehensive survey of the vast mass of documentary evidence that has come to light since the issue of the Authorised Version, including two out of the three oldest Manuscripts of the New Testament, viz., the Alexandrian, presented to Charles I. by the Patriarch of Constantinople in 1682, now lying at the British Museum, and the Sinaitic, unearthed by Tischendorf in 1844. The science of textual criticism is an exceedingly delicate and complex study, and the revisers had of necessity to invoke its elaborate apparatus for the purpose of discovering a text, supported convergently by the best authorities, by which they might be justified in amending the Authorised Translation. Investigation will disclose the fact that many of the changes in the New Testament are due to an alteration preferred by the revisers in the underlying text.

It should be remembered also that, while the Version of 1611 is full of inconsistencies, these are more frequent and glaring in the New Testament than in the Old. That the same Hebrew or Greek word should be rendered always by the same English word, seems an axiom to a modern translator. Yet the authors of the older Version deliberately professed a desire to avoid any uniformity in the rendering of the same word, even when it occurred in the same context, in order to familiarise the English people with the variety and elasticity of their mother tongue. However laudable such an object may have been, it could only be attained by a sacrifice of literary truth, such as no modern scholar would be prepared to make. And the chief source of the numerous verbal alterations in the New Testament is the wish of the revisers to reveal the existence of cognate passages and expressions, and not to leave or to introduce differences or identities of language that do not exist in the original.

A word should be added about the references and the marginal notes. None of the former were at first given in the Revised Version, but in 1898 an edition was issued containing the references as revised by a committee of the revisers, and these have been embodied in "The Interlinear Bible." At the foot of each page also the marginal notes both of the Revised and of the Authorised Versions have been printed. In the case of the Old Testament these are of considerable importance, as the marginal renderings often have the support of more than half of the revisers, a two-thirds majority being required to get an alteration inserted in the text.

By its inclusion of these notes and references, as well as by its careful accuracy of workmanship throughout, "The Interlinear Bible" ranks as the most complete and serviceable combination that we possess of the two great Versions, and its publication reflects much credit on the enterprise of the Cambridge University Press.

SHAM HISTORY

Court Beauties of Old Whitehall. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. (Unwin, 15s. net.)

SOMETHING must be amiss with the popular novel. It seems as if the literary confection, so long fashionable, has lost its profit. There are many signs that the mispent energy, once consumed by fiction, is now given to the concoction of sham history and false biography. Every week there comes from the press a fine specimen of this new industry. The titles and the purpose are different, but the style and lack of intelligence are perfectly familiar. We encounter the same slipshod English, the same inapposite garrulity, the same ignorance of human life and human motive. The sham history might, indeed, be fiction, if we considered only its remoteness from the truth. But the new historian, more greatly daring than the old novelist, lays a careless hand upon real names and real epochs, and he would have his reader believe that in his sorry enterprise he is mingling instruction with amusement.

Mr. Trowbridge's "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall" is a fair example of its class. It is no better and no worse than its fellows. There seems no reason why it should ever have been written. Its author displays neither knowledge of his period nor sympathy with the men and women, whose names irrelevantly decorate his page. The criticism and understanding of life elude him, and he has committed the unpardonable sin of blurring a pleasant picture. Nor is there any excuse to be found for his indiscretion. The period which he has chosen—the Restoration—is well known to all. It was fortunate in finding in Hamilton the most brightly sparkling of historians, and where he fails there are a thousand memoirs to fill the gaps and to embellish the narrative. Why should any one, who can read the Memoirs of Grammont trouble his head with Mr. Trowbridge, whose sole achievement is to have garbled an exquisite book, and to have daubed the gay indiscretions of a court with the dingy hues of vice. Imagine the Memoirs of Grammont without a flash of wit, and Pepys's Diary without a feather's weight of authority, and you may get some vague impression of Mr. Trowbridge's hotch-potch.

At first sight we supposed that Mr. Trowbridge had a saintly end in view. We thought perhaps that he had been bold enough to interpret the life of Charles II.'s court for the benefit of the million, that he could at least point a moral, if he could not adorn a tale. We had not read many pages before we were undeceived. We freely confess that there is no cant in Mr. Trowbridge's method. It is his one merit to express no fierce reprobation. "It has always seemed to us one of the strangest psychological phenomena," says he with a wisdom which we readily acknowledge, "that men should fly into a literary passion over the iniquities of persons who have been dead for centuries." Mr. Trowbridge does not fly into a passion. He deals with the dead lives of dead men and women after his own clumsy, prosaic fashion. Indeed, the scandals of the seventeenth century lose nothing in his superfluous retelling. He does but substitute a very heavy hand for the lightness, wherewith eye-witnesses touched the intrigues of their King and their companions; he does but extinguish the last spark of glamour, which illuminates the memoirs of the seventeenth century.

If we may believe Mr. Trowbridge, his early education well fitted him for his task. The name of "La Belle Stuart" carries him back to the time when he "learnt English History out of story-books and picture-books." In his enthusiasm he pictures "the very children of the Board Schools" dazzled by the vision of this "far-off romantic time." We cannot share his enthusiasm, and we can dimly imagine the fierce opposition of Dr. Clifford and his friends, if the Memoirs of Grammont were introduced as a reading-book into our elementary schools. But

Mr. Trowbridge was evidently more fortunate than most of us. "No," says he, "we have not the heart to scold La Belle Stuart; for childhood's sake she is still dear to us."

But knowledge has not brought with it comprehension. Mr. Trowbridge, long familiar with the names, is sadly ignorant of the characters of his heroes and heroines. He is quite sure that Lady Castlemaine suffered from "a disease perfectly well known to medical science." This may or may not be true. But nothing, save a complete absence of humour, can explain or excuse Mr. Trowbridge's corollary. "As Charles had some knowledge of medicine and chemistry," says he, "and was very far from being a fool—as the beautiful shrew once called him to his face—one is almost tempted to hazard the suggestion, as an explanation of his long bondage to this woman, that he found a scientific excuse for her conduct, which has been overlooked by historians." Charles was very far indeed from being a fool, but nothing is more certain than that he never chose a mistress because he took a scientific or chemical interest in disease.

One other instance of Mr. Trowbridge's ignorance, and we have done. He makes very free with Pepys's Diary, and never mentions the Secretary of the Admiralty without displaying a perfect misapprehension of his character. Not content with describing him as a "consummate snob," he rarely mentions his name without attaching to it the epithet "prurient." "Mr. Pepys in his customary prurient curiosity," "the prurient Mr. Pepys," "the prurient gossip"; and so on with damnable iteration. Now, Mr. Pepys may have had his failings, but "pruriency" was not among them. No man was ever less prurient than Samuel Pepys. Why should he, who enjoyed every moment of his life, who never denied himself the gratification of pleasure, be called prurient? Pruriency is the vice of the cloister not of the court, and Mr. Trowbridge could not have chosen a more unfortunate epithet.

However, we need not regard the author or his book too seriously. Indeed, they are worth discussing merely because they warn us of what is to come. When the novel dies of exhaustion, something must be found to take its place on the tables of those for whom reading is merely a soporific. Biography is easy enough; properly treated, it may be as easy as fiction. It does not matter to the fluent journeyman, whether he calls his puppet Mr. Jones or Charles Stuart. But if Mr. Trowbridge's book is a fair sample of the new craft, we can only say that we prefer the novel. That, indeed, when it is not historical, does violence to nothing else than good sense. It does not degrade the great men and beautiful women of the past to the level of tea-table gossip.

POETIC DRAMA AND SOME EFFORTS

Kiartan the Icelander. By NEWMAN HOWARD. (Dent, 4s. 6d. net.)

Savonarola. By NEWMAN HOWARD. (Dent, 4s. 6d. net.)

Constantine the Great. By NEWMAN HOWARD. (Dent, 4s. 6d. net.)

Job. Part i. By MAURICE BROWNE.

The Maid of Artemis. By ARTHUR DILLON. (Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.)

King Arthur Pendragon. By ARTHUR DILLON. (Mathews, 4s. 6d. net.)

Judas. By SYDNEY MOUTRIE.

Aurelian. By SPENCER MOORE. (Longmans, 4s. 6d. net.)

Apotheosis. ANONYMOUS. (Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.)

The Faithless Favourite. By EDWIN SAUTER. (St. Louis: at the Sign of the Leech).

The Poisoners. By EDWIN SAUTER. (St. Louis: at the Sign of the Leech).

HERE are eleven poetic dramas all written by English-speaking men in the twentieth century. With one exception, which is concerned with no definite time or place, they deal with events not later than the time of the Borgias. Has nothing happened since, or nearer home, worthy of the dramatic poet's consideration?

Emerson said:

For the experience of each new age requires a new confession, and the world seems always waiting for its poet . . . We do not with sufficient plainness, or sufficient profoundness, address ourselves to life, nor do we chaunt our own times and social circumstances. . . . Banks and tariffs, the newspaper and caucus, methodism and unitarianism, are flat and dull to dull people, but rest on the same foundation of wonder as the town of Troy, and the temple of Delphos, and are as swiftly passing away.

The seven poets responsible for these eleven volumes, then, are not the poets that the world is waiting for: they "are content to write from the fancy, at a safe distance from their own experience." But if they are not the poets that the world is waiting for, one of them, at least, is a poet for whom, as things go, the world ought to be properly grateful. Mr. Newman Howard's "Christian Trilogy" is real poetry and it is real drama. To say that the first essential of dramatic poetry is that it shall be dramatic sounds like a truism until one remembers that the dramatic quality of all writing, prose and verse, depends less on the kind of language used than on when and how it is used. If the use of violent expressions alone, of "hollow Oh's and Ah's" made writing dramatic, then Mr. Edwin Sauter's The Poisoners ought to come at the beginning instead of at the end of the list above.

In a note to Constantine the Great, the third, though historically the first of his tragedies, each of which "against a background of religious crisis . . . presents a fidelity, religion in essence, and its obverse infidelity, severally to a friend, a cause, and a past," Mr. Howard gives the full and final justification of poetic drama as distinct from prose drama.

Iambic verse is used neither for rhetorical nor lyrical ends, but as the simplest of all rhythms; rhythm being in the pulse of art no less than of life, a condition indispensable. Prose rhythm, except of the free iambic kind used in the Gospels, moves on too large a wave, is more costly of verbiage, hardly closer to ordinary speech, far less suggestive of the desired emphasis, above all less congenial to things poignant and pregnant, and therefore less suitable to the swift and tragic art.

Nothing but praise can be given to Mr. Howard for his use of the chosen medium. His verse is masculine and concise; he uses every licence of the measure but always keeps to the rules. As he himself says: "Action, characterisation and the stage picture are the quest, not that red herring of the poetic drama, the 'purple passage.'" It is quite obvious that in his faithful following of this quest, he has sacrificed many cheap opportunities for popularity. His verse has no specious qualities: in all probability it will be underestimated even by his admirers until it is heard upon the stage. His austere preoccupation with the proper task of the dramatist makes him difficult to treat fairly in a review: he does not lend himself to quotation.

Taking the Tragedies in the order in which they were written, Mr. Howard's progress as a dramatist becomes evident. In Kiartan the Icelander his very care for local colour and characteristic expression makes his meaning sometimes not easy to follow. Possibly in the theatre this difficulty would disappear, though we cannot help feeling that he has been so intent on making his people tenth-century Icelanders that they lose something of their probability as men and women. And not only in their language. Granting that Iceland women in the tenth century were fierce and proud, Gudrun's quick changes between the moods of love and revenge remain hardly comprehensible. Because she believed that Kiartan wooed the Norwegian Princess while he was betrothed to her, she incites her husband to kill him. In face of the murder, on hearing Kiartan's voice, she cries out: "Ah, spare him Bolli!" When the deed is done, she says: "I regret nothing: all men will say it is but just"; and it is not until Bolli confesses that he countenanced a lie in allowing her to believe that Kiartan was false to her, that she shows remorse. Even then it is more for the crime in the abstract than for her murdered lover. The inference would be either that her love for Kiartan was always second to pride, or that it was a reasoned thing dependent upon his fidelity. But her passionate and instinctive jealousy of Hrefna in the latter part of the play shows her to be impulsive and unreasoning, and so she is left unexplained.

In Savonarola Mr. Howard gets nearer to life without any sacrifice of the characteristics demanded by period. He says that he has in this play allowed himself a fuller development both of the theme and character than the staged drama would require. He has, in effect, brought into the texture of the play the colour that on the stage would be supplied by the mounting. Without any sacrifice of dramatic propriety he has so arranged that you see not only the people but their surroundings. As a result, the play is full of the stir and colour of mediæval Italy. Indeed, though he has handled the central theme in a masterly manner, what will delight most readers is the extraordinary sense of atmosphere created by the minor characters. 'Cecco Cei, the incorrigible poet and rake, type of the abstract artist, is particularly well done. He flashes in and out of the sombre tragedy, strumming his lute to a song that you can positively hear the tune of:

Hail to the merry, merry month of May!
Flutter little linnets in the wild-wood spray,
Titter little loves in the shadow of the trees:
'Nozza, 'Nozza is tripping in the leas,
And the red rose blooms in the month of May.

In the final scene when the crowd is waiting for Savonarola at the place of execution, Cei sees a light woman he loved carried away dying, and, in the middle of a ribald song drops his lute and with a cry of anguish goes to her. She dies. Implored by Mazzinghi to distract the superstitious terror of the crowd, with sudden illumination he wildly chants:

Madness and Death! O Scent of blossoms flying!
Rank weeds and flowers of flame, dead roots and darnel!
Roses and rue! O city mad and dying,
Thou canst not numb our senses to this charnel!

And when Mazzinghi taunts him with his unmanly grief over the dead girl he sums up the tragedy, not only of his own butterfly life but of the light, lascivious city that slew her noblest son, in one burning line

Nay, Mazzinghi, nay!
The Gods have ne'er surprised thee in the dark.

It is a small point—but surely "Paraclete" is wrongly applied to the second Person of the Trinity?

Mr. Howard reaches his highest level of workmanship in Constantine the Great. The chief characters stand out with something of the objective reality of sculpture but with all the life and movement of human beings. The dialogue is reduced to its bare essentials, and because no word is allowed for its own sake every word is not only significant but decorative, so that the texture of the verse is as if woven of some precious metal. In this play Mr. Howard gets his background, his atmosphere, mainly by a single figure: that of the little degenerate, Fabius. By an almost savage piece of irony, Fabius is made the victim of the plot to murder Constantine. There is something terribly fine in the last flicker up of the old Roman in the base Maximian when, his plot blown upon and defeated, and himself in face of death, he spits his hate upon his daughter and her husband. The state of paganism at the period of the play is admirably indicated by the priests of Demeter with their pitiful machinery for working an apparition of the goddess Proserpine. Bombo is one of the best clowns out of Shakespeare.

Mr. Howard's work is so fine that it seems captious to point out what we feel to be a defect in it. Though in each of his dramas tragedy is implied in the character of the chief personage, too much of the action is controlled by the persistent malignity of another individual. Free from most of the tricks of the playwright, Mr. Howard still relies too much on his villain. It is questionable whether the villain has any place in pure tragedy, which gains in force and dignity in proportion as it is due to the essential character of the protagonist and not to the machinations of his enemies.

Mr. Maurice Browne's Job derives a fictitious importance from the grandeur of the subject and the majesty of the persons introduced. A dramatic poem in which the characters are the Voice of God, Buddha, Prometheus, the Shadow of Christ, Gabriel and Satan, leaves criticism a little helpless. Bad drawing in an Archangel is not so immediately obvious as it is in a shepherd, for example. In this particular case, too, criticism is rendered more difficult by the fact that only the Prologue in Heaven lies before us.

The final test of every work of art, however, is treatment, and it may be said at once that in our opinion Mr. Browne has gone about his subject the wrong way. His work belongs to the obsolete conventions of Handel choruses, Fuseli pictures, and stucco temples. Throughout all the arts, in proportion as the theme rises in essential dignity it demands an austerity, almost a triteness, a reduction to the bare terms, of expression. Mr. Browne dedicates his poem to the sacred memory of Shelley, and he might reply that he has modelled it on forms that Shelley actually used. But every genius reflects the spirit of his age and it is doubtful whether, if Shelley lived to-day, he would use the forms, or even the diction, that he did. Whether this is a more or a less poetic age than Shelley's is an idle question, but it is a fact that in the intervening years we have learned some valuable lessons and chiefly this: that poetry, and particularly the poetry of great subjects, must keep in touch with common life and every-day turns of expression. Declamatory speech has not the power it had; we have done for ever with the "big bow-wow note"; we recognise that the avalanche of words leaves untouched emotions that respond to the stabbing phrase or the wistful undertone.

In detail Mr. Browne's workmanship leaves much to be desired. His blank verse is full of inversions, for example:

Unto you this day
Me proclamation make the Voice of God
Hath bidden:

and his rhymed measures are jerky and unmusical. Still, when all is said, he is trying a big experiment, and it will be interesting to see how he fares when the development of his theme brings him into closer touch with humanity.

There is little to be said for the other works on our list. Mr. Arthur Dillon's The Maid of Artemis is a pretty poem in the dramatic form, and in King Arthur Pendragon, which is full of hard fighting and hot loving, he has preserved a good deal of the rough spirit of Malory. Mr. Sidney Moutrie is to be commended for his—shall we say humanity?—in trying to gain at least our pity for the arch-traitor, though he might have spared us the pantomime transformation-scene of Judas's vision before hanging himself. In Aurelian, a drama of the Later Empire, Mr. Spencer Moore has performed the astonishing feat of turning a Roman Emperor and an Eastern Queen into a jocular police-court judge and a choleric Bayswater matron. Apotheosis, by an anonymous author, we, frankly, do not understand.

There is something pathetic in the way Mr. Edwin Sauter, for all his desperate expedients, fails to "come off." Even when he is frankly dirty his physiology is wrong. A footnote to The Poisoners darkly hints that "The Fate of Giacomo may yet appear." As Mr. Sauter says in his Prologue to The Faithless Favourite: "What ho!"

THE ACADEMY

NOVEMBER 10, 1906

AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS (ADDITIONAL LIST)

A PUBLISHING HOUSE ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO

JUST at present when the methods and commerce of publishers are so much under discussion, it is interesting to turn back and take a glance at a publishing house exactly one hundred years ago. Through the kindness of Mr. Murray and Mr. Hallam Murray, the present writer has been privileged to visit the historic house in Albemarle Street, and look through a ledger in which are entered certain details of the transactions of the year 1806. A first glance showed one great difference between those days and these. What system of book-keeping was in use in the office in those days an expert might decide; clearly it was not a system that could cope with the transactions of the firm to-day. A year occupies no more space than a single busy month of modern publishing must more than suffice to fill. But the volume was beautifully bound, and the paper of the finest—reminding us that John Murray II. was always very particular about such matters in his publications, and took a keen personal interest in them; and it was a pleasure to handle the book which contained (though not in the year we were concerned with) details of the sale of the first edition of "Marmion," the poem which "the Anak of publishers" startled the literary world by buying for £1000 before it was finished and before he had seen a line of it, and published in a handsome quarto early in 1808.

In 1806 the offices of John Murray were still the "shop" at 32 Fleet Street, where his father, John Murray I., had started business in 1768. John Murray I. was a book-seller as well as a publisher; by 1806 John Murray II. had become the pioneer in the separation of the two branches of the business. When it was proposed that he should take over the London publication of the Edinburgh Review, Constable wrote from Edinburgh concerning, a "miscellaneous order of books from London;" and he replied (December 7, 1805): "Country orders are a branch of business which I have ever totally declined as incompatible with my more serious plans as a publisher;" and publisher to him meant literary adviser, agent, reader, as well as book-producer and distributor. How those "serious plans" were carried out through a life of great activity and success, all who have read Samuel Smiles's "A Publisher and his Friends" will remember. But it was early days yet; 1806 was the year in which he became engaged to be married, and he was able to inform his future wife's trustees that his capital in business amounted to £5000: and such a sum would not go far to-day. But a hundred years ago, a wise publisher could count much more accurately on a return for his money than he can now. There were many books, even then; far more than the world has shown any desire to preserve; but the cheap publishing, which was being mooted a few years later by Charles Knight and others, had not come into being; competition was far less, and there were plenty of people who made a point of buying for their private libraries the handsome and expensive quartos then in favour, just as some years later people bought pictures, and now buy motor-cars and expensive meals. Prices ruled high, and the risk of loss was smaller; and the "good properties" with which the modern publisher pays for his inevitable ill-successes were as much valued then as now. One of Mr. Murray's best properties was Mrs. Rundell's "Domestic Cookery" (1805, etc.). It was called Mrs. Rundell's, and the publisher sent her a cheque, which she acknowledged as a "very handsome and most unexpected present": but Mr. Murray himself chose the title, which was of the greatest service in selling the book, and, at any rate after the first two editions, was as much the compiler as Mrs. Rundell herself. It was his hobby; he even tried to impress the august Lady de Morgan into its service. Moreover, it was a capital property. Eight thousand copies were printed in 1810, and the ledger shows another fifteen thousand not many years later; and the book formed, with "Marmion" and the Quarterly Review, the security for the purchase of Miller's business and premises in Albemarle Street in 1813.

These, too, were the days when publishers shared their risks and losses by the system of "trade-books" which a number of firms joined together to publish in shares. Readers will be well acquainted with the old title-pages bearing scores of names at the foot. The system, if it diminished gains, diminished the risks of loss. On the whole, publishing must have been a much less speculative matter then than now.

It was in 1806 that Murray became the London publisher of the Edinburgh Review, an important appointment for a publisher still so young, and one which largely helped to lead him on to fortune during the two years he held it. What else was he publishing in 1806? His list of new books would look very small by the side of his successors' latest list of autumn books which contains twenty-four pages of new and twenty-four pages of recent works, and but few of his books of that year have survived. Campbell's "Essays and Selections of English Poetry" was proposed in this year, but it was fourteen years before Campbell had it ready. Among the other books of 1806 only a few are remembered to-day. Samuel Cooper's "Dictionary of Practical Surgery," Thomson's "Dispensatory," and a book on the Medical Department of Armies were among the last medical works published by John Murray II.; Krusenstern's "Voyage Round the World," Dappa's "Life of Michael Angelo" (the book which first brought Southey and Murray into communication), and new editions of Fielding's novels and Marmontel's "Tales"—these are the pick of the bunch—and not so interesting, to our ideas, as the corresponding list for 1906. But of the scores of books produced this autumn by modern publishers how many will seem more interesting than these to the readers (in phonetic spelling and stenography) of A.D. 2006?

ADDITIONAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

MESSRS. H. R. ALLENSON

- The Meaning of Christ. Studies in the Place of Jesus Christ in human thought and action, as shown in Dante, Shelley, Browning, Tennyson, Ruskin, Savonarola and Mazzini. By Rev. Richard Roberts 2/6
- Studies in Hebrews. By J. B. Rotherham .. 2/6 net and 1/6 net
- The Booklover's Booklets. Wordsworth. A Lecture by F. W. Robertson, of Brighton net 1/0
- The Heart and Life Booklets. The Practice of the Presence of God, by Brother Lawrence—Everlasting Love (Songs of Salvation), by Dora Greenwell each net 1/0
- The Wife's Trials. By Emma Jane Worboise 7/6
- Slings of Fortune. A Novel by Jonathan Nield 6/0
- Five-Minute Stories. By Laura E. Richards 5/0
- Carmina Crucis. By Dora Greenwell. Edited by Miss C. L. Maynard 3/6
- Selected Poems from Dora Greenwell. Edited by Miss C. L. Maynard 3/6
- After His Likeness. By J. W. Jack 3/6
- The Unfolding Dawn. Sermons by Luther W. Caws 7/6
- Prayers and Meditations. By Dr. Samuel Johnson net 2/6
- The Silver Crown. A Book of Fables. By Laura E. Richards net 2/6
- The Legend of the Silver Cup. By George Critchley net 2/6

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD

Biography and Memoirs

- The Reminiscences of Lady Dorothy Nevill. Edited by her son, Ralph Nevill. Ill. net 15/0
- Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer. By Col. James P. Robertson. Ill. net 12/6
- Letters of George Birkbeck Hill. Arranged by his daughter, Lucy Crump. Ill. net 12/6

Children's Books

- The Land of Play. By Mrs. Graham Wallas. Ill. 3/6
- A Song Garden for Children. By Harry Graham and Rosa Newmarch net 2/6

Fiction

- The Lady on the Drawing-room Floor, by M. E. Coleridge—Occasion's Forelock, by Violet A. Simpson—The Basket of Fate, by Sidney Pickering—Quicksilver and Flame, by St. John Lucas—The Millmaster, by C. Holmes Cautley each 6/0

History

- The Princes of Achaia and the Chronicles of Morea. By Sir Rennell Rodd. Ill.

Miscellaneous

- Individual Ownership and the Growth of Modern Civilisation. By Henri de Tourville. net 12/6
- The Aftermath of War. By G. B. Beall. Ill. net 4/6
- Psychology for Teachers. By C. Lloyd Morgan net 6/0
- Political Caricatures, 1906. By Sir F. Carruthers Gould net 3/6
- A Hunting Catechism. By Col. R. F. Meysey-Thompson net 6/0
- At the Works. By Lady Bell 6/0

Poetry

- Translations into Latin and Greek Verse. By H. A. J. Munro. Ill. net 6/0
- Misrepresentative Women, and other Verses. By Harry Graham. Ill. 5/0

Reprints and New Editions

- My Memoirs. By Henri Stephan de Blowitz 6/0
- A Treasury of Minor British Poetry. Selected by J. Churton Collins 3/6

Topography and Travel

- Western Tibet and the British Borderland. By Charles A. Sherring. Ill. net 21/0
- Abyssinia of To-day. By Robert P. Skinner. Ill. net 12/6
- Patrollers of Palestine. By the Rev. Heskett-Smith. Ill. 10/6

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK

Art

- The Education of an Artist. By Lewis Hind. Ill. net 7/6

Biography and Memoirs

- The Correspondence of Dr. John Brown, ed. by J. Sutherland Black. ..

Children's Books

- Children's Tales from Scottish Ballads. By Elizabeth W. Grierson. Ill. 6/0
- The Children's Book of Edinburgh. By Elizabeth W. Grierson. Ill. 6/0
- Jack Haydon's Quest. By John Finnemore. Ill. 5/0
- The Life Story of a Fox. By J. C. Tregarthen. Ill. 6/0

Colour Books

- Birket Foster. By H. M. Cundall. net 20/0
- Warwickshire. Painted by Fred Whitehead, described by Clive Holland 20/0
- Northern Spain. Painted and described by Edgar T. A. Wigram net 20/0
- English Costume. Painted and described by Dion Clayton Calthrop. Vol. IV. net 7/6

Miscellaneous

- British Dogs at Work. By A. Croxton Smith. Ill. net 7/6
- Savage Childhood. By Dudley Kidd. Ill. net 7/6
- The Sense of Touch in Mammals and Birds. By Walter Kidd. Ill.
- Through the Telescope. By the Rev. James Barkie. Ill. net 5/0

Topography and Travel

- The Romantic East. By Walter Del Mar. Ill. net 10/6
- Mediæval London—Social and Ecclesiastical. By Sir Walter Besant. Vol. II. Ill. net 30/0

MESSRS. W. & R. CHAMBERS

Children's Books

- The Record Term. By Raymond Jackberns. Ill. 3/6
- The Empire's Children. By John Finnemore. Ill. 2/6
- Buster Brown's Pranks., by R. F. Outcalt—Foxy Grandpa's Surprises, by Bunny—The House that Glue Built, by Clara and G. A. Andrews Williams—The Knight-Errent of the Nursery, by Wm. Parkinson—The Up-Side Downs of Little Lady Lovekins and Old Man Muffaroo, by G. Verbeek. Ill. each net 3/6
- The Browns. A Book of Bears. By B. Parker and N. Parker. Ill. 3/6
- Tige: His Story. By R. F. Outcalt. Ill. net 2/6

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co.

Biography and Memoirs

- Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era. By John Fyvie. Ill. net 12/6
- Memoirs of the Houblon Family. By Lady Alice Archer Houblon. 2 vols. Ill. net 31/6

Drama

- The Struggle for a Free Stage in London. By Watson Nicholson net 6/0

Fiction

- The Fighting Chance. By R. W. Chambers 6/0

History

- The Birch-bark Roll of the Woodcraft Indians. By Ernest Thompson Seton net 1/0
- Egyptian Excavations: Biban el Moluk, The Tomb of Hâtshopsîtú. Ill. net 42/0

Literature

- The Pardoner's Wallet. By Samuel M'Chord Crothers net 5/0
- The Poetry of Chaucer. By Robert K. Root net 6/0
- A Bibliography of the Writings of Henry James. A Bibliography of James Russell Lowell each net 12/0

Miscellaneous

- Indian Trees. By Dietrich Brands. Ill. net 21/0
- Cotton. By C. W. Burkett. Ill. net 8/6

Philosophy and Religion

- Mornings in the College Chapel—Afternoons in the College Chapel—Evenings in the College Chapel. By Prof. Francis Greenwood Peabody each net 5/0

Poetry

- Ecclesiastes in the Metre of Omar. By William Byron Forbush net 5/0

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON

Art

- A History of Tapestry, by W. G. Thomson net 42/0
- Dutch and Flemish Furniture, by Esther Singleton. Ill. net 42/0
- Old China Book; Old Furniture Book; Old Pewter Book. All by N. Hudson Moore. Ill. each net 8/6

- In the Border Country. Ill. by James Orrocknet 7/6
In Rustic England. Ill. by Birket Fosternet 7/6
Mary Queen of Scots. Ill. by Sir James Linton and James Orrocknet 15/0
The Old Testament in Art. Vol. II.—The Apostles in Art. Ed. by W. Shaw Sparrow.....each net 5/0, net 7/6, net 10/6, and net 21/0
The Life of Christ, by Great Painters 7/6

Biography and Memoirs

- Literary Lives Series: Ibsen, by E. Gosse—Goethe, by E. Dowden. Ill.each 3/6
The Life of Empress Eugénie, by Jane T. Stoddart. Ill. net 10/6
The Life of T. J. Barnardo, by Mrs. Barnardo 12/0
The Life of Sir George Williams, by J. E. Hodder Williams. Ill. 6/0
Richard Cadbury of Birmingham, by Helen Alexander. net 7/6
J. Thain Davidson, by his Daughter..... 6/0
Musical Reminiscences and Impressions, by John F. Barnett net 10/6

Children's Books

- One of Clive's Heroes, by Herbert Strang—The Story-book Girls, by C. Gowans Whyte—The Adventures of Merrywink, by C. Gowans Whyte—For the Admiral, by W. J. Marx—The Wizard of Oz: The Marvellous Land of Oz: Queen Zixi of Ix, the three by Frank L. Baum. Ill. each 6/0
Samba, by Herbert Strang—The Boy's Life of Christ, by W. B. Forbush—The Carroll Girls, by Mabel Quiller-Couch—Our Great Undertaking, by E. Everett Green—Peggy Pendleton, by E. M. Jameson—The Romance of The Merchant Venturers, by E. E. Speight and R. Morton Nance—The Romance of the King's Army, by A. B. Tucker—The Romance of the King's Navy, by Edward Fraser—Britain's Sea Story, by E. E. Speight and R. Morton Nance—Told by Uncle Remus, by Joel Chandler Harris. Ill.each 5/0

Fiction

- Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens, by J. M. Barrie. Ill. by Arthur Rackhamnet 15/0 and net 42/0
Running Water, by A. E. W. Mason—The Doctor of Crows Nest, by Ralph Connor—The Lady Evelyn, by Max Pemberton. Ill.—The Princess of Vascovy, by John Oxenham. Ill.—The Second Book of Tobiah, by Una L. Silberrad. Ill.—The Patriot, by A. Fogazzaro—The Saint, by A. Fogazzaro—Diana and Destiny, by Charles Garvice—The Wages of Pleasure, by J. A. Steuart—The Mysterious Mr. Miller, by W. Le Queux—The Priest, by Harold Begbie—Check to the King, by Morice Gerard—Shadow and Shine, by Sarah Doudney. Ill.—Waifs of Circumstance, by Louis Tracy—Minvale, by Orme Agnus. Ill.—The Colonel and the Boy, by L. T. Meade. Ill.—Towards the Light, by Dorothea Price Hughes—The Tides of Barnegat, by F. Hopkinson Smith. Ill.—The Wood Fire in No. 3, by F. Hopkinson Smith. Ill.—The Triumph of Tinker, by Edgar Jepson. Ill.—Hills of Home, by Norman Maclean—The Cruise of "The Dazzler," by Jack London. Ill.—The Silver Maple, by Marian Keith—The Philosopher and The Foundling, by Georg Engeleach 6/0
Rosemary in Search of a Father, by C. N. and A. M. Williamson—A Little Brown Mouse, by E. Maria Albanesi—The Adventures of Billy Topsail, by Norman Duncan—Little Stories of Courtship, by Mary Stewart Cutting—Uncle William, by Jeanette Lee. Ill.each 5/0

History and Politics

- Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire. Ed. by Prof. W. M. Ramsaynet 20/0
A Short History of Mediæval Peoples, by Robinson Souttar. Part I. 12/0
A Short History of Social Life in England, by B. M. Syngé 6/0
The Problem of the Far East, by T. F. Millardnet 6/0

Literature

- Prisoners of Hope: An Exposition of Dante's "Purgatorio," etc. By J. S. Carrollnet 10/6
Studies in Mysticism and certain aspects of the great tradition, by A. E. Waitenet 10/6

Theology

- The Cities of St. Paul. By Prof. W. M. Ramsay 12/0
Jerusalem. By Prof. G. A. Smith 12/0
Exposition of Holy Scripture. Second Series.....the set each net 24/0, 7/6, 6/0
The Book of the Prophet Jeremiah. By Prof. S. R. Driver
A History of Congregationalism. By R. W. Dale and A. W. W. Dale 12/0
The Bible Analysed. By G. Campbell Morgan .. per vol. 3/6
The Self-Interpretation of Jesus Christ. By G. S. Streatfeild 5/0
The Lamp of Sacrifice. By W. Robertson Nicoll 6/0
Edinburgh Sermons. By Prof. Hugh Black 6/0

- .. The Other Side of Greatness. By Prof. J. Iverach 6/0
Studies in the Theology of the New Testament. By Principal Fairbairn 12/0
Christianity in the Modern World. By D. S. Cairns 6/0
The Triumph of Life. By William Barrynet 7/6
The Art of Preaching. By Prof. H. E. Garvie 5/0
A Manual of Theology. By J. Agar Beet 10/6
The Problem of Faith and Freedom in the last two centuries. By John Oman.....net 10/6
The Prayers of the Bible. By J. E. McFadyennet 6/0
The Strenuous Gospel. By T. G. Selby 6/0
My Kingdom of Heaven. By Peter Rosegger 6/0
The Gospel View. By P. J. MacLagannet 5/0
The Students of the Old Testament. By Charles Foster Kent. In 6 vols. Vol. III.net 12/0
The Origin and Permanent Value of the Old Testament. By Charles Foster Kent 6/0
Types, Psalms and Prophecies. By David Baron 6/0

Travel

- Panama to Patagonia. By Charles M. Pepper. Ill. ..net 10/6
Alone in the Heart of Japan. By Mrs. Adams Fisher..net 7/6

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS

Belles Lettres

- The Songs of Sidi Hammo. Rendered into English for the first time by R. L. N. Johnston, ed. by S. L. Bensusan; the Verse Renderings by L. Cranmer-Byngnet 2/6
Phases of Marriage. By Edith Escombe.....net 3/6
The Seven Wayfarers. By Dorothea Hollinsnet 2/6
The Sacred Grove, and other Impressions of Italy. By S. B. Night Fall in the Ti-Tree. By Violet Teague. Ill.net 5/0
An Exile from Fairyland. By Rathmell Wilson.....net 1/6
Calendarium Londinense, or the London Almanack for the Year 1907; etched plate, 'Hyde Park Corner.' By William Monknet 2/6

Biography

- The Life of Sir Tobie Matthew, Knight. By Arnold Harris Mathew and Annette Calthrop. Ill.net 12/0

Poetry and Drama

- Poems. By R. G. T. Coventrynet 5/0
New Poems. By William H. Daviesnet 1/6
The Garden of My Heart. By Beatrice Kelstonnet 2/6
Woodlands Press.—Apotheosis. 2/0 net. Wild Oats.net 2/6
Vigo Cabinet Series.—Poems and Translations, by A. J. K. Esdaile—A Window in Whitechapel, by Isabel Clarke—Rainbows and Witches, by W. H. Ogilvie—The Lady Beautiful, by F. E. Walrond—A Book of Masks, by W. Underwood—The Gates of Sleep, by J. G. Fairfax—Poems, by Harold Monro—The Tent by the Lake, by Fred G. Bowleseach net 1/0
Satchel Series.—Paper Pellets. By Jessie Pope.....net 1/6
William Shakespeare: a Play. By William T. Swardnet 2/6
King Arthur Pendragon: a Tragedy.....net 4 6
Guinevere: a Tragedy.....net 2/6

MESSRS. T. NELSON & SON

Children's Books

- Uncle Remus. Ill. in Colour.....6/0 and 5/0
The Defence of the Rock, by Evelyn Everett-Green—A Captive of the Corsairs, by John Finnemore—Firelock and Steel, by Harold Avery—The Duffer, by R. S. Warren-Bell. All Ill. in coloureach 5/0
How it Works, by A. Williams—Play the Game! by Harold Avery—A Girl of the Eighteenth Century, by Eliza Pollard—A Sea-Queen's Sailing, by C. W. Whistler—The Wonder-Voyage, by Edward Shirley. Ill. by Ruth Cobb. All Ill. in colour.....each 3/6
The Fen Robbers, by Tom Bevan—Donald, by E. L. Haverfield—A Heroine of France, by Evelyn Everett-Green—The Chums, by Edward Shirley. Ill. by John Hassalleach 2/6
Doris Hamlyn, by R. O. Chester—The Sleeping Beauty, Ill. by John Copley. Both in coloureach 2/0
The Roskerry Treasure, by Mrs. Henry Clarke—The Magic Beads, by Harold Avery—The Motor Book, ill. by A. Scott Rankie—Music from Fairyland. All ill. in colour each 1/0

Reprints

- The Complete Dramatic and Poetical Works of William Shakespeare. In six vols.per set 18/0, 15/0 and 12/0 single volumes each 3/0, 2/6 and 2/0

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

Art

- The History of Painting. By Richard Muther, Trans. by George Kriehn. 2 vols. Ill.

Biography

- The Life of Goethe. By Albert Bielschowsky, Trans. by William A. Cooper. In three vols. Vol. II. Ill.net 15/0
 Princesses and Court Ladies. By Arvède Barine. Ill. 12/6
 Reminiscences of Bishops and Archbishops. By H. C. Potter, Bishop of New York. Ill.net 8/6
 John Calvin. By Williston Walker. Ill. 6/0

Fiction

- The Shock of Battle, by Patrick Vaux. Ill.—In the Shadow of the Alamo, by Clara Driscoll. Ill.—Bob Hampton of Placer, by Randall Parrish. Ill.—A Spinner in the Sun, by Myrtle Reed—The Sword of Wealth, by H. W. Thomas—Twilight Tales, by Maud Ballington Booth. Ill.each 6/0
 Chloris and Zephyrus, By Julian Kingsteadnet 6/6

History

- Romance of the Italian Villas. By Elizabeth W. Champney. Ill.net 13/0
 American Political History, 1736-1876. By Alexander Johnston, ed. by J. A. Woodham. 2 vols.each net 9/0
 The Ohio River; a course of Empire. By Archer B. Hulbert. Ill.net 15/0
 Notes on the History and Political Institutions of the Old World. By Edward Preissig 10/6
 From Bull's Run to Chancellorsville. By Newton Martin Curtis. Ill.net 9/0
 Gettysburg and Lincoln. By H. S. Burrage. Ill.net 6/0
 The Union Cause in Kentucky. By Capt. T. Speed
 The Story of Old Fort Johnson. By W. Max Reid. Ill. net 10/6
 The Electoral System of the United States. By J. Hampden Doughertynet 9/0

Literature

- Shelburne Essays, Fourth Series. By Paul Elmer More ..net 5/0
 The Book of Tea. By Okakura Kakuzonet 5/0
 The Heart of Hamlet's Mystery. By Karl Werder, Trans. By Elizabeth Wilder
 The Ethics of Wagner's Ring of the Nibelung. By May Elizabeth Lewis

Philosophy and Theology

- The Evolution of Religions. By Everard Bierer
 The Culture of the Soul among Western Nations. By P. Ramanathannet 5/0
 The Borderland of Psychical Research, by James H. Hyslop 6/0

Reprints

- The Last Ride Together, By R. Browning. Ill. By Frederick Simpson Coburnnet 21/- and net 7/6
 The Writings of James Madison, ed. by Gaillard Hunt. In 8 or 9 vols. Vol. VI.; The Writings of Samuel Adams, ed. by H. A. Cushing, In four vols. Vol. III.each net 21/0
 M. Ballads and Songs. By W. M. Thackeray. Ill. by H. Brock 6/0

Travel and Sport

- The Connecticut River and The Valley of the Connecticut. Ill. net 15/0
 Hunting Big Game. By William S. Thomas. Ill.
 On the Great American Plateau. By T. Mitchell Prudden. Ill.
 In Thamesland. By H. W. Wack. Ill.net 12/6
 The Idyllic Avon. By J. H. Garrett. Ill.net 12/6
 Winged Wheels in France. By M. M. Shoemaker. Ill. net 9/0
 Life in the Open. By C. F. Holder. Ill.net 15/0
 Cathedrals and Cloisters of the South of France. By Elise W. Rose. 2 vols. Ill.net 21/0

MESSRS. ALSTON RIVERS

Children's Books

- The Pinatone Library. Christina's Fairy Book, by Ford Madox Hueffer—The Travelling Companions, by Lady Margaret Sackville—Highways and Byways in Fairyland, by Arthur Ransome—The Fairy Doll, by Netta Syrett—Who's Who in Fairyland, by Anne Pyne each net 2/6
 Little Sammy Sneeze. By Winsor McCaynet 3/6
 Willie Westinghouse Edison Smithnet 3/6
 The Magic Jujubes. By Theodora Wilson Wilson Ill. 3/6

Fiction

- The Viper of Milan, by Marjorie Bowen—A Pixy in Petticoats, by Anon—Collusion, by Thomas Cobb—Meriel of the Moors, by R. E. Vernède—The Ivory Raiders, by Walter Dalbyeach 6/0
 Closed Doors. By the Author of A London Girl 3/6

Miscellaneous

- Tibet, the Mysterious. By Col. Sir Thos. Holdich. The Story of Exploration Series. 7/6
 The Faery Year. By G. A. B. Dewar. Ill. 2/0
 The Small House: Its Architecture and Surroundings. By Arthur Martin. Ill.net 1/0
 Signs of the Times, or the Hustlers' Almanac for 1907. By the Authors of Wisdom while you wait.net 1/0
 Sessional: Big Ben Ballads. By the Authors of The Great Crusadenet 1/0

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE & CO.

- The London Library. Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, edited by Sidney Lee—Letters of Literary Men: Sir Thomas More to Robert Burns, edited by F. A. Mumby—Letters of Literary Men: The Nineteenth Century, edited by F. A. Mumby—Life of Goethe, by G. H. Lewes—Life of Shelley, by T. J. Hogg—Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson—Memoirs of the Life of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle—The Interpretation of Scripture, and other Essays, by Benjamin Jowett—Sir Thomas Browne's Works, edited by William Swan Sonnenschein—Beowulf. Translated, with Notes, by Wentworth Huyshe. Ill.
 Belles Lettres, etc. Te Tohunga: The Ancient Legends and Traditions of the Maoris orally collected and pictured by W. Dittmer. Ill.
 English-Greek Dictionary. By S. C. Woodhouse, M.A. For the use of schools
 Miles' Poets and Poetry of the Nineteenth Century, Vol. VII.: Robert Bridges to Rudyard Kiplingnet 1/6 and net 2/6
 The Calore Girl: A Novel. By Henry Tighe
 A New Jack Sheppard. By E. A. Treton
 Library of Historical and Standard Literature. Grote's History of Greece. Revised by J. M. Mitchell and Professor Caspari—Macaulay's History of England. Edited by T. F. Henderson—Sismondi's History of the Italian Republics. Edited by W. Boultingnet each 5/0
 Library of Early Novelists. Early English Prose Romances, by W. J. Thoms. A new edition, with additional romances—Moll Flanders, and Roxana, by Daniel Defoe—Arcadia, by Sir Philip Sidney—Chrysal; or, the Adventures of a Guinea—The Monk, by M. G. Lewiseach net 6/0
 Photogravure and Colour Series. Chaucer: The Story of Patient Griselda. The text modernised by Prof. W. W. Skeat—Dante; Vita Nuova. Translated by D. G. Rossetti—Drayton; The Court of Faery (Nymphidia)—Goethe; Faust. Translated by Anna Swanwick—Irrving (Washington); Rural England—Thomas Lodge; Rosalynde—The Song of Songs of Solomon—Wagner; Lohengrin. With 6 coloured plates by F. C. Tilneyeach net 3/6
 The English Library. The Small Library: A Book for the Owner of a Small Private Library, by J. D. Brown—Shakespeare's Debt to his Predecessors and his Successors' Debt to him. A Collection of Parallel Passages with Translations of the Classical and Foreign Quotations, by William Swan Sonnenschein—Curios from a Word-Collector's Cabinet, by A. Smythe Palmer, D.D.—How to Read English Literature: Dryden to Meredith, by Laurie Magnus, M.A.—History in Fiction. A Bibliography of British, American, and Translated Foreign, Historical Novels and Tales, by E. A. Baker, M.A.each 2/6
 New Universal Library. Matthew Arnold's Essays in Criticism—Bacon's Essays—Berkeley's Principles of Human Knowledge—Borrow's Wild Wales—Bulfinch's The Age of Chivalry—Cowley's Essays—Grey's Polynesian Mythology—Hitopadesa (The). A new translation, with Notes, by B. Hale-Wortham—Hobbes's Leviathan—Hume's Essays—Lytton's Harold—Macaulay's History of England. 5 vols.—Marcus Aurelius: Meditations, translated by G. Long, with Matthew Arnold's Essay—Peacock's Poems—Percival's English History in Verse—The Spectator Essays (6 vols.), vols. iv.-vi.each net 1/0, 1/6 and 2/6
 The Muses' Library. Beddoes: Poetical Works. Edited by Ramsay Colles—Peacock: Poems. Edited by R. Brimley Johnson—Thomson: The Seasons. Edited by H. D. Roberts, with an Introduction by Edmund Gosse—Thomson: The Castle of Indolence; and other Poems. Edited by H. D. Robertseach net 1/0 and 2/0
 The Golden Anthologies. Poems of Life and Death—Poems of Patriotism—Vers de Société—Poems of Romance—Poems of Love and Marriage. Edited by Percival Vivianeach net 1/0 and 2/0
 The Miniature Reference Library. Dictionary of the Bible, by A. M. Hyamson—Dictionary of Classical Mythology, by J. H. Manson—Glossary to Shakespeare, by J. H. Farquharson—Historical Allusions, by Frank Mundell—Shakespearean Quotations, by W. S. W. Anson—English Synonyms, by J. A. Farquharson—Who's Who in Fiction? by H. Swan—Who Wrote That (Foreign Authors)? by E. Latham and Muriel Curle—Who Wrote That (Classical Authors)? by William Swan Sonnenscheineach net 1/0
 Mayne-Reid Library. No Quarter!—The Boy Tar—The Bush Boys—The Cliff Climbers—The Free Lances—The Maroon—The Plant Hunters—The War Trail—The Young Voyagerseach 2/6
 A Beckett: Comic History of England
 Smedley's Frank Fairleigh. Lewis Arundel, and Harry Coverdale. 3 vols.

THE MOST SUCCESSFUL BOOKS OF THE SEASON

BELIEVING that our readers might be interested to know which are the most successful books of the autumn season, we communicated with the publishers, who have kindly furnished us with the following lists:

Mr. George Allen:—Masterlinck's My Dog; Lord Acton and His Circle; The Man in the Moon, by S. L. Benson; The Popular Ruskin: Sesame and Lilies, Unto this Last, Crown of Wild Olive.

Messrs. Brown, Langham:—Some Reminiscences, by William M. Rossetti; Gaiety of Fatima, by Kathleen Watson; It Happened in Japan, by the Baroness Albert d'Anethan; Voyage of the Arrow, by T. Jenkins Haine; Eve and the Wood God, by Helen Maxwell; Hints to Young Authors (new edition), by E. H. Lacon Watson.

The Cambridge University Press Warehouse:—The Cambridge Modern History, Vol. IV.; The Thirty Years' War, The Interlinear Bible, Vol. IV. of Beaumont and Fletcher's Works, The Volumes of the Cambridge English Classics.

Messrs. Cassell and Co., Ltd.:—Gossips Green, by Mrs. Henry Dudeney; Benita, by H. Rider Haggard; Woman of Babylon, by Joseph Hocking; The Dumping, by Coulson Kernahan; Helena's Love Story, by Guy Thorne; Her Grace at Bay, by Headon Hill.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall, Ltd.:—The Whip Hand, by Keble Howard; The Pillar of Cloud, by Francis Gribble; Lady Fitzmaurice's Husband, by Arabella Kenealy; The Future in America, by H. G. Wells; The Comedy of Age, by Desmond Coke; The Moment Series.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus:—Stevenson's Poems (Collected Edition), Stevenson's Christmas Sermon, Swinburne's William Blake, Mrs. Penny's novel, The Tea-Planter, Vasari's Stories of the Italian Artists, and the Medici prints.

Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co.:—Touraine and its Story, by Anne Macdonell; In Constable's Country, by H. W. Tompkins; Sigismondo Malatesta, by Edward Hutton; Court Life in the Dutch Republic, 1638-1689, by Barones van Zuyler van Nuyvelt; Constantine the Great, by Newman Howard; Fairy Gold, edited by Ernest Rhys; Everyman's Library.

Messrs. Duckworth and Co.:—Visits of Elizabeth, by Elinor Glyn; Beyond the Rocks, by Elinor Glyn; The Roadmender, by Michael Fairless; Tristram and Iseult, by Conyns Carr; Scottish School of Painting, by William McKay; A Motor Car Divorce, by Louise Hale.

Mr. Heinemann:—Life of Madame Récamier, by Edouard Herriot; Versailles and the Triansons, by Pierre de Nolvac; Reminiscences of Henry Irving, by Bram Stoker; The Flight of Marie Antoinette, by G. Lenotre; Paul, by E. F. Benson; Joseph Vance, by William de Morgan; The Jungle, by Upton Sinclair.

Messrs. Hutchinson and Co.:—Mary Cholmondeley; Queen of the Rushes, by Allen Raine; The Trampling of the Lilies, by Rafael Sabatini; With Flashlight and Rifle, by Herr Schilling; Five Fair Sisters, by H. Noel Williams; Sir Joshua and His Circle, by Fitzgerald Molloy.

Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack:—Told to the Children Series; Children's Heroes Series; Our Island Story, by H. E. Marshall; The Enchanted Land, by Louey Chisholm; The Golden Staircase, by Louey Chisholm; Child's Life of Jesus, by C. M. Steedman.

Mr. John Lane:—Stray Leaves, by Herbert Paul; The House in St. Martin's Street, by Constance Hill; British Malaya, by Sir Frank Swettenham; Tales of Jack and Jane, by Charles Young; The Beloved Vagabond, by William J. Locke.

Mr. Werner Laurie:—The Sinews of War, by Eden Phillpotts and Arnold Bennett; Letters to a Daughter, by Hubert Bland; The Workaday Woman, by Violet Hunt; The Opal Sea, by J. C. Van Dyke; Lotus Land, by P. A. Thompson; Camp Fires on the Canadian Rockies, by William T. Hornaday.

Messrs. Longmans:—The First Earl of Durham, by Stuart J. Reid; Personal and Literary Letters of Robert first Earl of Lytton, edited by Lady Betty Balfour; English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act; The Parish and the County, by Sidney and Beatrice Webb; Some Irish Yuletides, by E. G. Somerville and Martin Ross; The Principles of Electric Wave Telegraphy, by J. A. Fleming;

The Political History of England, vol. iv., from the Coronation of Richard II. to the Death of Richard III., by C. Oman; An Advanced History of Great Britain, by T. F. Tout; The Orange Fairy Book, edited by Andrew Lang; The Golliwog's Desert Island, by Florence K. and Bertha Upton.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co.:—Lord Acton's Lectures on Modern History; Memories and Thoughts, by Frederic Harrison; Puck of Pook's Hill, by Rudyard Kipling; A Lady of Renee, by F. Marion Crawford; In the Days of the Comet, by H. G. Wells; The Cranford Series edition of Scenes of Clerical Life, with Hugh Thomson's illustrations.

Messrs. Maunsell and Co.:—The Fair Hills of Ireland, by Stephen Gwynn, illustrated by Hugh Thomson; The Shanachie, Second Number; Economics for Irishmen, by "Pat"; The Calendar of the Saints, Patrick, 12 illustrations, by Serghan MacCathmhaoil.

Messrs. Methuen and Co.:—From Midshipman to Field-Marshal, by Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C.; Charles Dickens, by G. K. Chesterton; A Wanderer in London, by E. V. Lucas; The Call of the Blood, by Robert Hichens; The Car of Destiny, by C. N. and A. M. Williamson; The Guarded Flame, by W. B. Maxwell; Queen Louisa of Prussia, by Miss M. Moffat; The Letters of William Blake, edited by A. G. B. Russell; Nelson's Lady Hamilton, by Miss E. Hallam Moorhouse; The Ladder to the Stars, by Miss J. H. Findlater; The House of Islam, by Marmaduke Pickthall.

The Methodist Publishing House:—Ithuriel's Spear, by W. H. Fitchett; The Story of Hedgerow and Pond, by R. B. Lodge; Life and Adventures Beyond Jordan, by G. Robinson Lees; Persecution in the Early Church, by H. B. Workman; The Citizen of To-morrow, by S. E. Keeble.

Mr. Murray:—The Shores of the Adriatic, by F. Hamilton Jackson; The Life of Isabella Bird (Mrs. Bishop), by Anna M. Stoddart; Rezanov, by Gertrude Atherton; From Libau to Tsushima, by E. Politovsky; An Englishwoman in the Philippines, by Mrs. Campbell Dauncey; Imperial Strategy, by the Military Correspondent of the Times.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash:—Famous Beauties of Two Reigns, by Mary Craven; The Chateaux of Touraine, by M. H. Lansdale; A Twice Crowned Queen (Anne of Brittany), by Constance, Countess de la Warr; A Drama in Sunshine, by Horace Annesley Vachell; Women and the West, by Charles Marriott; Lawful Issue, by James Blyth.

Messrs. George Newnes, Ltd.:—Country Life Library: Where the Forest Murmurs, by Fiona Macleod; Golf Greens and Green Keeping, edited by H. G. Hutchinson. Newnes' Thin Paper Classics: The Autobiography and Confessions of De Quincey, edited by Tighe Hopkins. Drawings by Great Masters: Leonardo da Vinci, by Lewis Hind. Newnes' Art Library: Michael Angelo, by Dr. G. Gronau. Fiction: Love Among the Chickens, by P. G. Wodehouse.

Messrs. James Nisbet and Co.:—Frank Brown, Sea Apprentice, by F. T. Bullen; In the Flower of Her Youth, by L. T. Meade; The City at the Pole, by Gordon Stables, M.D., R.N.; The Story of the Teasing Monkey, by the Author of Little Black Mingo; Billy Mouse, by Arthur Layard; The Story of the Bible, by Eugene Stock.

Oxford University Press and Mr. Henry Frowde:—The King's English; The Canadian War of 1812, by C. P. Lucas; Introduction to Mr. Lucas's Historical Geography of the British Colonies, by H. E. Egerton; The World's Classics; The Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.

Messrs. George Routledge and Sons, Ltd.:—Manson's The Salvation Army and the Public; The Court of Faery, all by Thos. Maybank; Robert Bridges to Rudyard Kipling (Poets and Poetry of the Nineteenth Century, vol. vii.); Dowden's edition of Hogg's Life of Shelley; The Nursery Song Book, by H. Keatley Moore; Howard Barrett's Management of Children.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin:—Court Beauties of Old Whitehall, by W. R. H. Trowbridge; The Story of the Amulet, by E. Nesbit; The Dream and the Business, by John Oliver Hobbes; Links in My Life on Land and Sea, by Captain J. W. Gambier; Napoleon's Last Voyages, edited by J. Holland Rose; Chats on Costume, by G. Wooliscroft Rhead; Chats on "Priests," "China" and "Furniture," by Arthur Hayden.

Messrs. F. V. White and Co., Ltd.:—The Etonian, by Alice and Claud Askew; The Nymph, by F. Dickberry; Beneath Her Station, by Harold Bindloss; The Adventures of Alicia, by Katharine Tynan; Whatsoever a Man Soweth, by William Le Queux; A Simple Gentleman, by John Strange Winter.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST

LIFE AND LETTERS OF THE FIRST EARL OF DURHAM, 1794-1840.

By STUART J. REID, Author of the "Life of Sydney Smith," etc. With 17 Photogravure Plates. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s. net.

TIMES.—"An adequate life of Durham, one that should show what manner of man he really was in private as well as in public life, has long been needed; and Mr. Reid has satisfied that need with great, perhaps, indeed, with superabundant, fulness, with a genuine enthusiasm for his very attractive theme, and with conspicuous if not with entirely complete success. At any rate he furnishes us for the first time with copious and well-nigh exhaustive materials for forming our own judgment."

PERSONAL AND LITERARY LETTERS OF ROBERT, FIRST EARL OF LYTON.

Edited by LADY BETTY BALFOUR. With 8 Portraits, etc. 2 vols., 8vo, 21s. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"The biography must take high rank among those of the statesmen of the Victorian Era, for it completes the record of many a half-told history. It reminds the world that the State is served by many and various gifts, that lives full of interests, learning, and imagination are all brought into her service."

HOMER AND HIS AGE.

By ANDREW LANG. With 6 Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

* * * The argument in this book is that the Homeric Epics present a historical unity; a bright, complete, and harmonious picture of a single age, probably a brief age, in its political, legal, social, and religious aspects, in its customs, and in its military equipment.

NEW EDITION. REVISED THROUGHOUT.

SELECTED EPIGRAMS FROM THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

Edited, with Revised Text, Translation, Introduction, and Notes, by J. W. MACKAIL, M.A., LL.D., sometime Fellow of Baliol College, Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. 8vo, 14s. net.

A SMALLER SOCIAL HISTORY OF ANCIENT IRELAND.

Treating of the Government, Military System, and Law; Religion, Learning, and Art; Trades, Industries, and Commerce; Manners, Customs, and Domestic Life of the Ancient Irish People. By P. W. JOYCE, LL.D., M.R.I.A. With 213 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN MASON NEALE, D.D.

A Memoir. By Mrs. CHARLES TOWLE. With Photogravure Portrait and 5 other Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[On Monday next.

* * * Dr. Neale (1818-1866) besides being the author of many books on Theological and Ecclesiastical subjects, was a prolific hymn writer and translator, 'Jerusalem the Golden,' being his best-known hymn.

MRS. WIGHTMAN OF SHREWSBURY;

The Story of a Pioneer in Temperance Work. By the Rev. J. M. J. FLETCHER, M.A., Vicar of Wimborne Minster, and sometime Assistant Curate of Holy Trinity, Shrewsbury. With 14 Illustrations (5 Portraits). 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

[On Monday next.

TWENTY YEARS OF CONTINENTAL WORK AND TRAVEL.

By the Right Rev. Bishop WILKINSON, D.D., of Northern and Central Europe. With a Preface by the Right Hon. Sir EDMUND MONSON, Bart., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., etc., late H.B.M. Ambassador at Vienna, Paris, etc. With Frontispiece Portrait. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A MUCH-ABUSED LETTER.

By the Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL, Author of "Lex Credendi," etc. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

* * * This letter was written by Father Tyrrell to a Professor of Anthropology in a Continental University, who found it difficult, if not impossible, to square his science with his faith as a Catholic.

Extracts more or less inaccurate appeared in an Italian paper, the result being that he has been dismissed from the Order of Jesuits.

Father Tyrrell, in an Introduction to the letter, gives an account of the whole matter, and vindicates the position which he took up in dealing with the doubts and fears of his correspondent.

LONGMANS, GREEN AND CO.,
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & CO.

have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on THURSDAY
THE FIFTEENTH INSTANT,

A. CONAN DOYLE'S

Great Historical Romance entitled

SIR NIGEL

With 8 Illustrations by ARTHUR TWIDLE.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

New Volume by FRANK T. BULLEN.

On NOVEMBER 15. With a Frontispiece by ARTHUR TWIDLE.

OUR HERITAGE THE SEA

By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S.

Author of "The Cruise of the Cachalot," etc. [Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE NETHERLANDS.

By J. ELLIS BARKER, Author of "Modern Germany: Her Political and Economic Problems, her Ambitions, and the Causes of her Success." Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[On November 27.

THE GREAT DAYS OF VERSAILLES:

Studies from Court Life in the Later Years of Louis XIV. By G. F. BRADBY. With Illustrations, small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[On November 27.

THE LIFE OF RICHARD III.

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., Author of "The Life of the Great Lord Fairfax," "The Fighting Veres," etc. With a Portrait of Richard III. and a Map. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[On November 27.

SOCIAL SILHOUETTES.

By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL, SECOND IMPRESSION, 7s. 6d. net.

The GUARDIAN, in a review headed "A BOOK OF GOOD THINGS," says: "Our counsel is to read the book wholly and solely for amusement; above all to look out like Jack Horner for plums, of which there are enough to satisfy even a schoolboy's appetite."

The following Six-Shilling Novels are in great demand:

Sir JOHN CONSTANTINE

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH ("Q").

MORNING POST.—"In 'Sir John Constantine' 'Q' appears to have reached high-water mark. The author has never given us so happy a combination of his buoyant humour and his romantic mysticism."

THE OLD COUNTRY.

A ROMANCE. By HENRY NEWBOLT,

COUNTRY LIFE.—"Mr. Newbolt's work is instinct with knowledge and love of England."

THE STORY OF BAWN.

By KATHARINE TYNAN,

WORLD.—"A vivid picture of country life, such a picture as no one can draw better than Mrs. Tynan."

CHIPPING.

By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

Second Impression Now Ready.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"An unquestionably successful story, founded upon a faithful study of the period, and invested with genuine sincerity of workmanship from start to finish."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

AN OPAL SONG

SHY and wild . . . shy and wild
To my lovers I have been.
Frank and wayward as a child,
Strange and secret as a queen;
Fain of love, and love beguiled,
Yet afraid of love, I ween!

False and true . . . false and true
Is the woman's heart in me . . .
Fair lost faces that I rue,
Golden friends I laugh to see,
Changing, I come back to you,
Never doubt my loyalty!

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

VIII. A CASE FOR THE NATIONAL TRUST FOR THE PRESERVATION OF PLACES OF NATURAL BEAUTY

A PROPOSAL has been made, and is obtaining some local support in Malvern, to construct a funicular railway to the top of the Worcestershire Beacon, and to carry a second switchback one along the ridge of the hills to the Roman Camp. Since it is its magnificent range of hills that gives to Malvern its unique charm in all weathers, and its fascination at every season of the year, this proposal has fallen as "a bolt out of the blue," and given a shock to every lover of the place, its history, and associations.

If such a scheme were carried out, where would be the indefinable quiet and solace of the hills, those

Keepers of Piers Plowman's visions, and their teaching to the sympathetic mind and heart of the wanderer over them? These would vanish for ever were a railway carried along the heights. Many have learned, while walking on them, the meaning of the poet's words, when he wrote of

The silence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is amongst the lonely hills.

But if a funicular railway—with its noise, its smoke, its tumult, its desecration of sacred solitudes, its emptying out of crowds of untaught sightseers on holidays—is constructed, then farewell to all that has made the place so unique and precious for generations. If train-loads of trippers are whisked up the hills and along their ridges, farewell to the use of these hills—as now—to the lovers of peace, who delight in a bracing tonic air breathed in solitude, who ascend the heights on foot because of their hundred associations, and their distant views which can only be seen and appreciated in quiet. It is not too much to affirm that many of the householders of Malvern do not know—or at least do not appreciate at its full value—the rich asset they possess in the almost unparalleled views from their hills, the magnificent vista of the Severn Valley, the sight of three cathedrals, many abbeys, and the mountains of Wales to the west and the north.

"The National Trust for the Preservation of Places of Natural Beauty or Historic Interest," will assuredly have something to say about this proposal; but it may not be inopportune to remind all whom it may concern of what was once done in the Lake District of Westmoreland, when a reckless utilitarian scheme was started to bring a railway from Windermere to Ambleside and on to Grasmere, into the very heart of that sanctuary of peace, which is one of the glories of England. The scheme was started by the tradesmen and hotel-keepers of the district, and by speculative builders, who wished to have more of villadom around them, more people with whom to do business: so as to make money, they being quite indifferent to the damage done to the country by the desecration of one of its shrines. It was opposed by an Association created for the purpose; and, after a long Parliamentary fight, the railway scheme was defeated, and the Lake District (or that side of it) preserved from steam-intrusion and ruin. Surely what was opposed, and defeated, at Ambleside and Rydal, must not be realised at Malvern.

The proposal to attract more visitors to the town, by having "pictorial advertisements at railway stations," is too dreadful for any words of criticism or commentary. Has not this advertising mania spread far enough, vulgarising our fields and fences all along our railway lines; and if a funicular monstrosity was put up, such advertisements would soon be trebled. Let it be granted that such railways are useful in some parts of Switzerland; although many lovers of that country, and of climbing, object to them even there. But whatever their use among the Alps, they are utterly useless and out of place—nay, they would be detestable—in Malvern. Those who find it a strain to ascend the hills on foot, can drive to their summits with ease. As most people know, the well-constructed roadways, with seats for invalids and the aged, are one of the distinctive features of this district. But let the hesitating mind—that halts between the two opinions of conservatism and change—think what would happen when the summit was reached by the tramway-line, were it made. Let it think of the swift rush along the noble ridge, leaving no time for the traveller to receive the influences of ever-changing beauty, the kaleidoscope lights and shadows on the hills, and the hundred points of interest around.

Much may be done to improve the Malvern Hills in the way of planting. New clumps of trees sparingly set down, at well selected places, would do this; but let not the curse of posterity fall upon the householders of this generation, as the disturbers of the peace of ages, or as the vandals of a utilitarian era. Let these proposals, so flagrant in the eyes of many, be thought over dispassionately, and submitted to the calm judgment of the people; and all who are grateful for the heritage they have received will strive to transmit it uninjured to those who come after them.

If shopkeepers think that a funicular railway up and along the hills will help them, by bringing a class of residents to the town who will patronise them exclusively, and not order anything from a distance, they are living in dreamland. To be loyal to Malvern—a devoted lover of it, a promoter and defender of its charms—it is not necessary to turn it into a Blackpool, or a Margate amongst the mountains. We cannot sympathise too much with the wish that the tired artisan, or the traveller of whatever class, may have free access to our hills; and it was a noble ambition that led Mr. James Bryce—now our Irish Secretary—to introduce his "Access to Mountains Bill" year by year into the House of Commons; but that was for pedestrians to walk over them, not for railway speculators to destroy them.

Then it must be remembered in reference to the Malverns that, if a railway is carried along their ridge, no pedestrian could thereafter have unfettered access to them. They would not be allowed to cross the railway except at certain places, and where will be the present "access to mountains" for the schoolboys and schoolgirls of the town, as well as by adults and strangers? If any advocate of a funicular railway goes up Snaefell in the Isle of Man, by the one which exists there, he will be speedily disillusioned. May we in Britain not learn a lesson from America—that land of machinery, and all manner of mechanical triumphs—in this matter of the preservation of our natural sanctuaries, and places of beauty? Our transatlantic kinsmen have secured many great National Parks to be preserved—without railways or trams—for posterity. And only think of the indignation with which a proposal to have electric cars running through the great Central Park in the city of New York would be received by the community!

What, then, is the state of the case as regards the Malvern Hills?

(1) A funicular railway is wholly useless. It can serve no good end to those living in the town, or those coming to it from a distance.

(2) It is wholly pernicious. It will drive residents away, and attract none in their place.

(3) It will hopelessly vulgarise the hills, destroying their charm and attractiveness.

(4) It will seriously injure the town as a health-resort, and as a place for the recuperation of lost power.

(5) It will tell against it as an educational centre, lessening the influence and prestige of its schools.

(6) It will lessen its historic interest and attractiveness to thousands of persons in Great Britain and Ireland, and the wide world besides.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

LEONARDO DA VINCI

AMONG the great names of the Renaissance that of Leonardo da Vinci ranks with those of Michelangelo and Raphael, yet to ninety-nine men out of a hundred who have a general acquaintance with his painting this eminence must at times seem undeserved. Michelangelo on the Sistine ceiling and in the solemn sacristy of San Lorenzo proved himself to be one apart even among the most gifted sons of men. Raphael fixed for three hundred years the types and the illustrative formulæ of religion, mythology, and history; types which in their dignity, amenity, and consistent sympathy with the needs of humanity in general can never be quite superseded; formulæ clothed with an invention so subtle and felicitous that all subsequent use of them seems by comparison feeble or rigid. Raphael in his short life passed from strength to strength, surpassing at each step the contemporary masters with whom he came in contact, until at the last his fame equalled and in some ages eclipsed that of Michelangelo himself. When we consider what Leonardo has left us we may well ask: How does he keep company with these giants?

A ruined fresco, some half-dozen small finished pictures, and perhaps another half-dozen unfinished or touched by his hand, one noble cartoon and the memory of a still greater one—these are the most prominent assets left to those who would estimate Leonardo's genius; and even their value is discounted to some extent by the refinements of modern criticism. When we examine the mass of his drawings we feel it would be rash to assert that they are of as great artistic importance as those of Michelangelo and Raphael in point of actual achievement. Even when we approach his manuscripts we find no sustained literary effort parallel to Michelangelo's sonnets. His art, it is true, has an incomparable quality of its own which raises it at once far above the common level, but it is as inferior to that of Michelangelo and Raphael in effective creation as it is in bulk.

Viewing his case thus suspiciously, we may imagine that Leonardo's charm was largely personal, and that Vasari's famous biography was inspired more by the memory of a splendid and fascinating human being than by the works of art he actually executed. For one Englishman, however, who has read Vasari's life of him there are probably at least a dozen who have read only the exquisite essay which Walter Pater built upon it, and to that essay rather than to any other source the current legend of Leonardo in this country must be traced. There the personal fascination of the man is analysed and insisted upon till Leonardo becomes almost the Virgil of mediæval romance; one who sought if he did not actually attain the secret of illicit knowledge, an alchemist poring over the hidden properties of metals, an astrologer musing over the track of the stars in the sky; if not a necromancer at least a mystic whose goodly gifts of mind and body were absorbed in a vast curiosity about the unseen and the spiritual forces which might control man's destiny and the material universe.

Those who happen to have read the so-called "Treatise on Painting" will have probably found some difficulty in reconciling its tone and character with this legend. The book contains little or nothing that bears on the philosophical aspects of art, it makes no attempt to arrive at any abstract idea of beauty or to analyse the secrets of harmony in composition or colour. So far, indeed, does it neglect these first principles of pictorial design that Hogarth makes a special note of the fact in the introduction to his own neglected book. Leonardo's whole and only purpose in the "Trattato" is the discovery of truth, of the anatomical structures which underlie the form and effect the movements of the human body, and of the phenomena of light as they bear upon the appearance of things. He writes less as an artist than as a teacher of anatomy or optics. That he was the first anatomist of his age is proved by his drawings. His writings prove him also to have been in theory the first Impressionist. One quotation, perhaps, will be sufficient. In one of the Paris manuscripts he writes:

If you are looking at a woman dressed in white in the midst of a landscape, the side of her that is exposed to the sun will be so dazzling in colour that parts of it, like the sun itself, will cause pain to the sight, and as for the side exposed to the atmosphere—which is luminous because of the rays of the sun being interwoven with it and penetrating it—since this atmosphere is itself blue, the side of the woman which is exposed to it will appear steeped in blue. If the surface of the ground near to her be meadows, and the woman be placed between a meadow lit by the sun and the sun itself, you will find that all the parts of the folds (of her dress) which are turned towards the meadow will be dyed by the reflected rays to the colour of the meadow, and thus she becomes changed into the colours of the objects near, both those luminous and those non-luminous.

Here and there he notes that one effect is more beautiful than another, but his attitude in general is to view art as the rendering of natural facts—as the handmaid not of beauty, but of science.

It is curious how the famous portrait of him in old age resembles Darwin in type, and it is only a certain wilfulness, a want of concentration that continually sets his curiosity to work in fresh channels, which seems to prevent him from anticipating even more definitely than he did the discoveries of later savants. We may even speculate what his achievement would have been had fate in early life forced him on to some other road than that which began in Verrocchio's workshop. The intellect which could decide rightly upon the nature of fossils three hundred years before other men, could so enlarge the bounds of anatomy, and could attain such eminence in military engineering in the intervals of making a reputation as one of the greatest artists of a supremely great artistic age, might, if directed into some single branch of scientific study, have accomplished heaven knows what! The rare qualities of fancy and imagination, the powers of eye and hand which he possessed would all have been of inestimable value in the highest walks of science; and a calm survey of his total achievement, if it robs him of some fraction of his reputation as an artist, and of much of the glamour in which legend has wrapped his name, yet leaves an impression of an intellect of almost unequalled range, insight, and logical imagination.

The scientific side of Leonardo's character is specially insisted upon in Mr. E. McCurdy's admirable book ("Leonardo da Vinci's Notebooks," Duckworth), which may be regarded as the definite edition of Leonardo's writings for all but the few who wish to make him a subject of special study, and will therefore turn to the original manuscripts or to Dr. Richter's splendid volumes. One inference, however, the author has neglected to draw from his facts which might possibly serve as a key to the riddle of Leonardo's life. May we not see in the scientific accuracy of his observation the reason why his work as a painter so often seems to come to an abrupt stop—why he was for ever experimenting with art but so rarely produced pictures? Is it not possible that the inevitable antagonism between the facts of natural light and colour which his eye saw with the frankness of a Monet, and the great tradition of Florentine painting, consecrated by early association and by the long chronicle of great masters who had made it, constantly forced him to halt between two opinions; to make drawings, indeed, but to know at the same time that to translate them into paint implied the sacrifice either of nature or of all that he had been taught to recognise as art? May we not even guess that it was for this reason that he set his figures in a land of dreams or in twilight rooms where the traditional tones and methods he employed would not have to contend with the blazing, many-coloured sunlight? I must leave the answer to more learned students of Leonardo. Yet from a painter's point of view the inference seems plausible enough, though, with our present knowledge, it seems likely to remain an inference, for the master has kept his secret well.

C. J. HOLMES.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Literary Feeding-Bottles," by A.]

FICTION

Love in London. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK. (Griffiths, 6s.)

MR. ADCOCK in this volume of short stories gives another instance of his intimate knowledge of London under all aspects, and of many types of Londoners. Nearly all the stories are good; and some are admirable: notably the grim stories, of which none is grimmer or better than "Jenny chooses." It is dramatic and concise and ends with just that snap that should mark the closing of a good knife or the finish of a short story. Of the pleasant stories "The Litt' Un" is the most charming; it tells of a girl who dances her way into the heart of a drunken old underwriter and his wife, and who in the end reforms the old man and softens his wife's hardness. The feature of Mr. Adcock's work is his kindness towards human nature; he is, however, without great insight; his view of things is not shaped by any one attitude towards life; and so his writing is a little lacking in originality.

The Tyranny of Faith. By CARL JOUBERT. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

CARL JOUBERT in "The Tyranny of Faith" has written a fairly interesting novel, when he might have written an extremely interesting one. His subject, the persecution of the Jews in Russia and the strife stirred up by the coming of a new Bishop—himself a renegade Jew—to a peaceful town, hitherto untroubled by religious differences, gives a writer many opportunities. The Bishop uses his power to advance his own interests and seizes the chance afforded by the riots, of which he is the cause, to attempt the seduction of a young Jewish girl. The story is well told, in so far as it keeps the reader interested; but it remains a story told, as the characters do not express themselves, or become, at any time, vital. The writing is simple, but marred by hackneyed expressions which keep it from becoming individual in style. The drawing of the character of Jacob Serkovski, in the opening chapter, leads the reader to expect more careful characterisation throughout, and the book is closed with a feeling of disappointment. The author possesses the power of making improbable situations often appear quite possible, but he sometimes strains our powers of belief.

Little Stories of Courtship. By MARY STUART CUTTING. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)

PRACTICAL, humorous, financial, or romantic are these intensely American little tales: two of them are excellent examples of the art of short-story writing. "Paying Guests" is noticeable for the delicate handling of character and situation. In a few pages, yet in a large and leisurely manner, the author tells us all about Alethea Bennett, her sheltered past, her present struggles, and her happy future. In "Henry" the local colour is rather glaring, and the humour is of the nature of a family joke, not easily understood, and rarely appreciated by an outsider. No British Henry ever "fooled round" to such irritating effect. "The Perfect Tale" is a dainty idyll—fact or illusion, as you take it, and the right kind of story wherewith to end a pleasant volume.

Running Horse Inn. By ALFRED TRESSIDER SHEPPARD. (Macmillan, 6s.)

MR. SHEPPARD's story opens with the return of a soldier from the Peninsular campaign to Running Horse Inn, his home at Herne Bay, on the day that his brother, believing him dead, marries the girl to whom he was engaged. It is an unoriginal incident, but out of this and equally unpromising materials the author has made a really fine historical novel. He has added another to a not very long list of heroes who are scoundrels, but we follow the adventures of his George Kennett with scarce less interest than we followed those of the famous Jonathan Wild, though, having many noble good qualities—of which imperfections Wild was free—he lacks the true greatness of Fielding's consummate scoundrel. Wild was a man who conspired against Fate; Kennett is a man against whom Fate conspires. It is environment rather than inherent vice which makes him a scoundrel; and he goes to the scaffold nobly. There is not a badly drawn character in the book—Delilah and Captain Rockett are delightful—and the workmanship maintains a very high level.

The Night Riders. By RIDGWELL CULLUM. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

THIS is a vigorous story of cowpunchers and horse-thieves, well-written and exciting. Mr. Cullum knows the rough life he is describing well enough to give a convincing picture of the men and their manners; he makes us breathe the strong air of the Wild West. He handles his plot, too, with such skill that the mysterious leader of the cattle-stealing band remains a mystery (and an exciting mystery) until the very moment of his exposure; and the explanation is so ingenious and so possible that it is satisfying and doubly effective. "The Night-Riders" is one of the best stories of adventure which we have had the pleasure of reading for some time, and we recommend it confidently to the young of every age.

The Enemy's Camp. By HUGH T. SHERINGHAM and NEVILL MEAKIN. (Macmillan, 6s.)

A PARTY of young men are living in a houseboat on the river; they have agreed to dispense with all the barbarities of civilisation, such as collars and stiff shirts and razors and dress-coats. So that when they hear news of a rival camp, in which girls, those denizens of all that is civilised, dare to exist, they are naturally wrathful. Many adventures result, very laughable and pleasant adventures; the sun shines; the river flows by; fish are caught. Their life is charming and the authors let none of its charm escape them, as they write of it. The little comedy is delightful and amusing, and ends, as such a little comedy inevitably must, with the capitulation of the house-boat party—on the usual pleasing terms.

The Manager's Box. By JOHN RANDAL. (Nash, 6s.)

MR. RANDAL has hit upon an intricate and ingenious plot for his farce, but his treatment is not so happy as his invention. He is apt to be laboured and explanatory, where lightness and sureness of touch are demanded. His book possesses the charm of gaiety: it should also possess the charm which comes from neat workmanship. The people are so amusing and the situations in which they figure are so cleverly absurd that we cannot but resent the lack of pains taken in their presentation. The author held a really good hand and has played it carelessly.

FINE ART

PRINTS AND DRAWINGS

THE third exhibition of the Society of Twelve is fully equal to its predecessors in interest, although fewer members than before exhibit both prints and drawings, and so far there is less variety. I miss, for instance, Mr. Rothenstein's lithographs and the beautiful proofs of woodcuts by Mr. Ricketts which have been seen in former years, while there is nothing by Mr. Clausen in the inner room and nothing by Mr. Nicholson in either. To this last omission, however, I am easily reconciled by the presence of four beautiful landscape etchings by M. Alphonse Legros, the honorary member of the Society. These include La Vallée des Dunes and Une Vallée en Bourgogne, which may be called the very pick and flower of the master's late etched work; they possess all its good qualities, the clear and silvery atmosphere, the light and graceful foliage, inimitably French, the suggestion in a little space of vast tracts of gently undulating country, while they lack the tortured faces and bodies violently bent towards the ground which have become a mannerism of the veteran when the human figure is an important element in his composition.

Dry-point is all the mode with the younger generation, and here we have Mr. Conder's first experiment, if I am not mistaken, in that technique. The subject, a portrait sketch of a lady with an ill-drawn left hand, is hardly important enough to fill the plate; the print would have gained by concentration if there had been fewer inches to fill; as few, for instance, as Mr. John has allowed himself in his Young Woman Meditating, the best, as I venture to think, of a selection of six prints which does not show to advantage his unequal, but at its best remarkable, talent as an etcher. The largest of these, The Hawker's Van, is one of the least interesting and characteristic of his prints; the tilt of the cart, moreover, should surely be dark, not light, placed as it is with a glowing evening sky behind it. On the other side of the Legros landscapes is an interesting and varied group of Mr. Strang's works, old and new; they include his latest dry-points, fruits of a summer holiday spent near Coutances, Blainville, a landscape dark and rich in tone, and a less successful architectural plate, Château of Pirou, in which the building seems to crave the foreground denied to it. Opposite to these hang four new etchings by Mr. Cameron. Berwick-on-Tweed, a slight work in pure line, light with a high horizon, and Still Waters, dark and decorative, are good examples of his landscape style; of Pluscarden so much cannot be said. St. Merri is another of the florid French Gothic porches that he loves to etch and etches well, but the seated figure is a needless piece of staffage of which I am somewhat weary, being used to meeting her any time in the last twelve years at any latitude from Rowallan to Florence.

Of Mr. Bone's six new dry-points most are slight and airy landscapes, but there are two great architectural plates grandly planned and wrought out in all their multitudinous detail with extraordinary patience and knowledge. Demolition, St. James's Hall, suggests comparisons with Piranesi, but The Great Gantry, Charing Cross Station— how many of us could say offhand what a gantry is?—can only be called modern and original. At the date of the opening of the Exhibition the work on the plate was still in progress, but an unfinished trial proof encouraged one to hope that Mr. Bone's unequalled mastery over such intricate problems of perspective and illumination as the carrying out of such a design involves will be shown even more triumphantly than in Building, which will be remembered as one of the best things of the society's first exhibition. A beautiful pencil study for the composition and effect of light is shown among this year's drawings, but the detail of The Great Gantry is being put in from a much larger and more elaborate drawing which will soon, I believe, be seen in public at another gallery; it was made on the spot last May during the repair of the station roof after its partial collapse.

Last among the prints we come to Mr. Sturge Moore's woodcuts and lithographs by Mr. Shannon. In the former the rich and varied "arabesque," if I may borrow the term from Mr. Moore himself, is what first strikes the eye when it encounters them on an exhibition wall; like his poems they will not yield their charm to the hasty and listless vagrant, but must be pondered over till they reveal the secrets of their quaint symbolism and imaginative interpretation of nature. Mr. Shannon shows once more The Breakwater, largest and most impressive of his new chiaroscuro lithographs; it is accompanied by two of his fine early portrait studies, The Modeller and The Wood-Engraver, and three new fan-shaped lithographs, light and graceful in decorative effect.

The drawings in the first room are good in many ways: I must be content with mentioning Mr. Ricketts's studies for The Argonauts and Laocoon, nervous and expressive line work, full of individuality; a reminiscence of Millet (Fruit Hawkers) by Mr. Strang; one of Mr. John's vivid heads in pencil with eyes full of sparkle and rippling hair; another strong drawing of a head by Mr. Clausen and a night piece by the same artist; a noble group of six London drawings by Mr. Muirhead Bone, and quite a little historical resumé of Mr. Shannon's draughtsmanship from 1890 onwards.

At Mr. Van Wisselingh's gallery may be seen a further selection of drawings by two of the Twelve, M. Legros and Mr. Strang, including portraits of either artist by the other. With them is hung a group of drawings and lithographs by a much more recent pupil of M. Legros, Miss Dorothea Landau.

Of Mr. Gutekunst's new exhibition it need only be said that it contains a few Van Dycks and Ostades, and a good collection of Rembrandts, not of the more sensational kind, but including a fine Death of the Virgin and good impressions of the portraits of Anslo and Asselyn. The exhibition may be recommended to wise collectors who are shy of the prices fetched nowadays by the more fashionable Rembrandts. Some amusement may be derived at the same time from a little group of etchings which may be called in the very strictest sense of the term early Victorian, being the early work of Victoria herself at the beginning of her married life, with one example by the Prince Consort. Neither of these illustrious dilettanti had any notion that an etching should differ from a facsimile of a tame pen-drawing carefully cross-hatched. The most ambitious effort of the late Queen, The Fisherman's Wife, represents in outline a tall distressed female weeping at sunset, with hands clasped, on a cliff about three feet high that rises sheer from the vasty deep.

C. D.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

SIR SPENCER WALPOLE'S "Studies in Biography," which Mr. Unwin will publish shortly, contains monographs on Peel, Gibbon, Cobden, Bismarck, Napoleon III., and the late Marquis of Dufferin.

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes has in the press a new novel entitled

"The Pulse of Life," which will be published by Mr. Heinemann.—Another novel which may be expected shortly is Father Benson's "The Sentimentalists," a story dealing with modern life, announced by Messrs. Pitman.—Messrs. Smith, Elder promise on October 15 Sir A. Conan Doyle's new romance, "Sir Nigel."

The folk-lore of Roumania is a subject which has been little, if at all, treated in English. A book on Roumanian country life, which Mr. Unwin will publish on November 12, is likely therefore to be interesting. In "From Carpathian to Pindus" Mlle. Tereza Stratilesco, herself a Roumanian, deals with the history, religion, economics and social and political life of her fellow countrymen; and the ideas and customs of the peasantry are illustrated by specimens of their folk-songs. These are given, with airs, both in the original and in an English translation.

A fine-art work, "Les Femmes de Versailles," says The Book Monthly, is being issued by Messrs. Goupil at £200 net! It is in five parts, each of which contains ten plates, in the exact colours of the original pictures. These are by artists like Nattier, Labille-Guiard, Vignè, Le Brun, Le Troy, Mignard, La Tour, Van Loo, and Boucher. The text, by M. Pierre de Nolhac, is printed on Japanese paper. There are only a hundred copies of the work.

A volume of "Sea Songs and Ballads," selected by Mr. C. R. Stone, with an introduction by Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge, will be published at an early date by the Clarendon Press.

Mr. Elkin Mathews has in the press a book of verse entitled "New Poems," by Mr. William Davis, the "poet in the doss-house" whose last volume, "The Soul's Destroyer," we noticed at length in the ACADEMY of September 16, 1905.

Mr. H. B. Hulbert, during a residence of twenty years in Korea, has been an eye-witness of all the various phases of Korean political and social life. In "The Passing of Korea," which Mr. Heinemann will publish on Friday next, he gives a history of that country from the earliest times, with an account of the manners, customs, and characteristics of the natives, and shows how its independence, once guaranteed by the Japanese Government, has now reached the vanishing-point.

Mr. Edwin Markham, the poet of "The Man with the Hoe," is preparing a volume of selections from the writings of Thomas Lake Harris, who died in California last March. It is probable that Mr. Markham will be entrusted with the official biography of Harris, with whom he was closely associated for a time at Santa Rosa, and with whose doctrines he is to some extent in sympathy.

The inner history of the last revision of the New Testament is to be narrated in a volume entitled "A History of the Revised Version of the New Testament," by the Rev. Samuel Hemphill, Rector of Birr, promised by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will give an account of the work of revision and the personal views and expressed opinions of many of the revisers.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE SUEZ CANAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I add a word to the recent correspondence about the Suez Canal? It has been shown that the idea of a waterway across the isthmus is a very ancient one. Pharaoh Necho actually had such a waterway constructed. This canal was obviously in connection with the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, and it probably fell into disuse as that channel gradually silted up. But the Mediterranean and the Red Sea remained connected by water in another and a more round-about fashion long after Pharaonic times. For vessels ascending the Nile from the Mediterranean to Bubastis (Zagazig) could there enter a canal which ran eastward along what is now the Wadi Tumilat, and passing on to Heliopolis could so reach the Red Sea. Moreover there was also a direct canal from Bubastis southwards to Heliopolis and thence to a point on the main stream of the Nile opposite the Pyramids. This point is still well marked; it lies at the place called Fum at Khatig in Old Cairo.

Thus apart from the Pelusiac canal across the isthmus, all the great cities of the Delta and of the Nile valley were connected by waterway with both the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. Probably, however, the canal from the region of Memphis north to Bubastic and the Red Sea was useless at low Nile. In any case no long period of neglect was needed to allow the drift of the desert sand to choke it. So it is recorded that the channel was cleared and restored to use by Ptolemy Philadelphus II., and again at a later period by Trajan, after whom it was often known as Amnis Trajanus; and finally Amr, the Muslim conqueror of Egypt in the seventh century, had the canal dug out afresh and rendered navigable in a period of seven months, in order that corn ships might pass from the Nile to the Red Sea to the relief of Mecca and Medina, which were suffering from a severe famine.

But none of your correspondents noted the interesting fact that Amr was so impressed with the lesson of this waterway that he contemplated reopening the Pelusiac canal across the isthmus. The caliph Omar, however, absolutely forbade the project, remarking that with a canal across the isthmus the Roman fleets would be able to enter the Red Sea and to harry the pilgrims or even to endanger the holy places. There was some truth in the remark at a time when the Muslims had no fleet. But considering how rapidly the sea power of the Muslims developed and how long it flourished, it seems strange that the idea of piercing the isthmus was never again revived by any ruler of Islam.

A. J. BUTLER.

Oxford.

THE MODERN PICTURE-MARKET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Robert Ross writes from the dealer's point of view and misses mine. I agree with him that the seller of pictures, who has made a name, does much better "to be cheated by avowed dealers like himself" (I use his own words), than by dealers who pose as collectors, but in reality use their country houses as sale-rooms.

My proposal aims at those whose names are as yet of no marketable value, but whose pictures are, and who in consequence of their obscurity cannot get buyers to look at them.

In my scheme it would be a cardinal point that no profit or commission may accrue to the lender of wall-space apart from the privilege and profit of hanging a work of art on his walls.

Nor, I think, would the dealer suffer in the long run. When, through my scheme, a painter should have sold enough pictures to make a name, he would find it better worth his while to sell his pictures through the ordinary channels. We should discover the Beardsley or the Millais for the dealer, and he would exploit him for all he might be worth.

I have received offers of warm support, in the event of the idea crystallising into practical form, but, as I have said, I am too much engaged on my own work in a kindred art to do more than suggest what some one with more leisure might profitably undertake.

Your correspondent, Mr. F. C. Tilney, says that his artist-friends "share his views as to the niceness and nobleness of the suggestion, but have fears as to its perfect practicability."

I claim no "nobleness" in the matter. If I offer wall-space I offer it for a quid pro quo. I want to have a beautiful picture on my walls and I am prepared to pay rent for the privilege, besides acting as salesman without commission. There is nothing "noble" in this. It is worth my while, that is all, though I may, of course, if I like, take up the philanthropic pose as well. But that is a matter of individual taste. The thing must stand or fall as a matter of business, for artists do not, any more than others, wish to be under obligations to strangers.

And this brings me to one other point which cannot be too much insisted upon. The artist must be content, at first, to sell his pictures for what they will fetch, not for what in his opinion they are worth. This, believe me, is why pictorial art flourishes in France to an extent undreamed of in this country.

Only this year I myself bought a really important picture off the walls of the Salon, by a young and almost unknown artist, for a sum which need not be mentioned. Soon after returning to England I was in the studio of a struggling English artist, and, looking through some portfolios, saw a small drawing of good quality though of no outstanding merit, done as a speculative illustration to a book which may never be published. I asked its price, wishing to make a gift under the guise of a purchase, but when I was faced with an estimate which would have purchased a companion to the Salon picture above-mentioned I confess I mentally buttoned up my pockets and went quickly away.

Now, sir, in the past I have worked for weeks over an article which has been rewarded with no more than four pounds, and I have not grumbled, for it has helped me to earn as much as ten pounds in one day on, I confess, rare occasions since. But, had I been too proud to accept starvation wages then I should have been receiving starvation wages or no wages at all now.

Let the young artist remember that "everything is worth the money that can be got for it" and no more, and the time will probably come when he will find that the money he gets is more, much more, than his work is worth.

I need hardly say that, if Mr. Tilney, or any one else, will undertake and develop the scheme suggested in my first letter, I will gladly be the first subscriber.

G. S. LAYARD

Bulls Cliff, Felixstowe,
Nov. 4.

AGNOSTICS AND CHURCH SERVICES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There are Agnostics and Agnostics. Some are in the stage which I may perhaps be allowed to call panenergism; their "Unknownable" or Unknown is strictly an "Infinite and Eternal Energy" which is only, although incomprehensibly, become self-consciousness in us. Their agnosticism, when they allow it to enter into their true and effective philosophy of life, must, of course, be "tinged with emotion" (to use Mr. Wallis's expression as applied to himself), because they are men; but the emotion need not be religious. If, however, they pass on into the stage where they hold with Spencer that their energy "wells up" in themselves as consciousness, they may slip into panlogism and dally a while, perhaps, or even come to rest, with Hegel, or else wake up to find themselves full-blown Pantheists with a corresponding change in the colour of their emotion. It is a fate against which Leslie Stephen warns them in his "Agnostic's Apology." As pantheist Agnostics, or even as panlogists, they have their chance of seeing in church, as I did, something of what other men mean by their "antiquated, meaningless ceremonies," by their outworn symbols, and by symbols neither outworn nor likely to be outworn, in a world of earth and earthliness.

Obviously no Agnostic, at any stage, is a sceptic; his Unknownable is only partially unknown. He may know just enough to call it energy and guess it to be unconscious—then he is in the panenergist stage. He may know a little more and guess it to be conscious—so he may go on, always with his Unknownable about which more and more is always coming to be known. In every stage the emotion with which his Agnosticism is tinged may or may not be religious. There are Christians who have no religious emotion and no religious practice—their Christianity is not their true philosophy of life. There are Agnostics in the same conditions. Both should stay away from church, and so, I think, should the Panenergists; the rest may learn a good deal, each from the other, there and elsewhere. So, at least, it seems to me; but no Agnostic should go to church unless he wants to learn, and he should choose his church.

WM. SCOTT PALMER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If Mr. J. B. Wallis had laid to heart Burns's lines,

"O wad some Power the giftie gie us
To see ourself as others see us!"

he would know that it is not your contributor's article but his own letter which is emphatically "curious." He tells us with pompous unction that he "respects orthodox beliefs." What ineffable condescension! The colossal genius of Mr. Wallis actually deigns to "respect the beliefs" of Jesus of Nazareth, and Paul of Tarsus, and John the son of Zebedee! Hear, ye Heavens, and give ear, O Earth! Yet he is so ignorant of these beliefs that he writes, "Intellectually the Unknownable of Herbert Spencer is a higher conception than that of the theologians," which is as meaningless as it would be to say: "Intellectually the Differential Calculus is a higher conception than Shakespearean tragedy." If he really imagines that spiritual and moral truth moves on the same plane as mathematical and scientific, and that the same measure can be applied to the Law of Love and the Law of Duty as to the Law of Gravitation, he has prosecuted his studies in Religion and Philosophy to little purpose. He disclaims an "arrogant assumption of superiority," and yet scoffs at "antiquated, meaningless ceremonies and fruitless prayer," and puts forth a ridiculous parable about "men half-way up a mountain." What would he say if I were to compare his "antiquated, meaningless and fruitless" faith in the Unknownable to the negro worship of Mumbo Jumbo? And pray who are the "we" for whom Mr. Wallis claims to speak? Who is he that he should determine what "true Agnosticism" is and implies? How many thousands of Agnostics have with one voice elected him as their Coryphaeus and High Priest? I have the honour to number Agnostics among the personal friends whom I respect and love; but they are happily, like your contributor and Mr. Palmer, of a very different stamp and a very different intellectual calibre from Mr. Wallis.

I fail to understand the sneer, "now that they have grudgingly conceded our right to live." I cannot conceive that any human being would think it worth his while to burn Mr. Wallis, except in a country where fuel was a superfluous commodity.

In conclusion, Mr. Wallis need not with eager vehemence disavow any connection with "the Churches," for "the Churches" hold humility to be one of the distinctive Christian virtues; and humility is the very last virtue of which his bitterest enemy would accuse Mr. Wallis.

A GNOSTIC.

THE SPIDER AND THE FLY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the hope of forestalling possible shafts of wit about "cobwebs in even an Agnostic's brain," and so forth, may I inform the learned persons who, I feel sure, are hastening to set me right, that profound cogitation convinces me I ought to have written "Agnostic fly" instead of "Agnostic spider." I had been reading one of Mr. Drummond's letters a few minutes before, and I think that is partly why I have thus been caught "tripping." It seems for the moment to have cast a spell over me!

J. B. WALLIS.

Nov. 3.

SALOPIAN TRANSLATORS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As an old Salopian, I must tilt a lance with Professor Tyrrell on behalf of the old school. The Professor's dictum that in Salopians' translations "we do not meet happy tours de force, which in neglecting the letter to some extent perfectly preserve the spirit" (a dictum not unlike something he has delivered before in the Saturday Review), is illustrated by "such as . . . another composer's." Unfortunately this example is from the pen of a Salopian! See "Sabrinae Corolla," p. 207.

S. HASWELL.

WASHINGTON AND PUBLIC OPINION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In concluding his notice of "The Letters and Recollections of George Washington," your Reviewer quotes the following sentence from one of the letters:

"I find another of the Federal Judges has by his death occasioned a vacancy in the district of Pennsylvania. As some have and others will unquestionably apply for the appointment, I wish you would use every indirect means in your power to ascertain the public opinion with respect to the fittest character as a successor to Hopkinson. Pursue the same mode to learn who it is thought would fill the present auditor's office (as he will be appointed comptroller) with the greatest ability and integrity."

Commenting on this your Reviewer says: "It would hardly have been thought that Washington cared twopence for public opinion, and the confession brings out an unexpected flaw in his character." This I take to be an entire misapprehension of Washington's motive.

In an earlier letter in this volume Washington, writing to the same person (his secretary) tells him, as the family was about to move to Philadelphia to reside: "As we shall have new connections to form with different tradesmen (to) find out those in each branch who stand highest for skill and fair-dealing." Washington meant no more in one case than he did in the other. He did not "care twopence" for public opinion; and had no desire to conciliate it in making an appointment. What he did desire was, in making an appointment, to take public opinion as a guide (as he could personally know nothing about the majority of the applicants) in selecting the fittest man. The same method is followed in making the majority of Presidential appointments in America to-day.

Even if the reading of the passage were not, as it seems to me, obvious, it would be absurd to base upon it the suggestion of a "flaw" in his character which everything that we know of him—every act of his public life—proves did not exist.

H. PERRY ROBINSON.

October 31.

THE EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY STAGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your review, on the 27th inst., of the eighteenth-century stage there occur some bewildering statements which should not pass without comment. Your Reviewer says: "The world will always contain many Tolstois, Johnsons and Stigginses—men whom either a total ignorance of the drama or a total lack of the power of making-believe renders enemies to the actor and his art." Without discussing the propriety of conjoining the name of Stiggins with those of Tolstoy and Johnson—men of eminent sincerity of character—it may be pointed out that Stiggins long and successfully made believe that he practised the virtue of temperance. The attribution to Tolstoy and Johnson of ignorance of the drama argues at least a grave defect of recollection on the part of the reviewer. Tolstoy is himself a dramatist: his comedy, The Fruits of Enlightenment, was introduced to the English reading public by Mr. Pinero in 1891 in the following words: "This curiously close study of Russian peasant character, and satire on the fads and extravagances of modern society in the land of the Muscovite, will doubtless be eagerly examined by English readers who may be interested in the dramatic methods of a novelist so eminent as the author of 'Anna Karenina' and 'The Kreutzer Sonata.'"

The reference to Johnson is not less mistaken. Johnson's tragedy of Irene was one of his first essays in literature, and was produced by Garrick at Drury Lane in 1740 with the personal assistance of the author at rehearsal. Has it also been forgotten that Johnson's edition of Shakespeare was the next in order of date after that of Warburton?

Your Reviewer proceeds: "The post-Cibber 'reform' of the drama meant the substitution, by Steele and his more lachrymose followers, of the sentimental comedy that was as tearful as the tragedy."

In the first place, the Reviewer's chronology seems to be defective. Steele ceased to write for the stage in 1723, and died in 1729, while Cibber's continued activity is evidenced by his Cæsar in Egypt (1725), Provoked Husband (1727), Love in a Riddle (1728), Damon and Phyllida (1729). Cibber did not retire from the stage until 1730, did not publish his "Apology" until 1740, and did not die until 1757. In what conceivable sense, then, is Steele's work referred to as "post-Cibber"?

But what is to be said of the Reviewer's critical observation that Steele was a lachrymose writer and that his comedies were more tearful than tragedies? The author of such an observation can hardly have taken the trouble (if it be a trouble) to read The Tender Husband.

—that ingenious and most humorous combination of Les Précieuses Ridicules and L'Amour Peintre of Molière. However, "de gustibus non est disputandum": if your Reviewer finds The Tender Husband or The Merry Wives of Windsor tearful, there is little to be said.

My purpose in troubling you with this communication is mainly to provide an illustration of the truth of the remark made in another connection by one of your correspondents, who points out that the care bestowed upon the study of writers in the dead languages is not always bestowed upon writers in the vernacular. What prospect of editorial acceptance would await a review in which it was alleged that Seneca was totally ignorant of the drama, that Cæcilius was a post-Terentian dramatist, and that the Thesmophoriazusæ was the work of a lachrymose writer?

GEORGE NEWALL.

[Our Reviewer writes: Is not your correspondent a little too anxious to prove the ignorance of myself and your readers? Most of us, I hope, know the plays of both Tolstoy and Johnson, though I should not select Irene or the Shakespeare as any proof of knowledge of the acted drama, which was under consideration in my article. Garrick's difficulties in adapting Johnson's tragedy for performance are notorious. I was referring to Johnson's many ill-natured remarks on actors and acting—his "Pooh, sir, Punch has no feelings!" and his "Well, sir, and what are you to-night?" to mention only two—and the passage in Tolstoy's "What is Art?" concerning the opera and the actor with the "fat, white hands"—a passage with which I am sure your correspondent must be well acquainted. The meaning of my sentence I still believe to be perfectly clear. Johnson (who was, indeed, too blind to see the stage well) and Tolstoy are both instances of that lack of the dramatic sense which prevents some from making-believe that the people and events on the stage are "real." For an example of the exactly opposite spirit, see the account of Sir Roger de Coverley at the play in the Spectator. Stiggins, on the other hand, suffers from ignorance of the drama. If your correspondent will read my sentence again, he will see that to accuse me of ignorance in the matter is as unjust as it would be for me to accuse him, in view of the last sentence of his penultimate paragraph, of believing that Steele wrote The Merry Wives of Windsor.

My thanks are due, however, to your correspondent for pointing out a very grave misprint which makes nonsense. The "post-Cibber reformation" should, of course, have read the "post-Collier reformation." That will explain the meaning of my remarks, and remove the stigma of false chronology. I will admit that I seem to be a little hard on Steele and that your correspondent is just in defending him. A less compressed sentence would have made it clearer that I was referring more to Steele's followers—Hugh Kelly, for instance, whom Garrick tried to play off against Goldsmith when Rich produced The Good-natur'd Man—than to Steele himself. Steele is not lachrymose; he is not a little mawkish and so paved the way for the comedy I criticised.

Your correspondent, by the way, is himself a little inaccurate and a little hard on Steele. The Tender Husband is not, surely, a "combination" of Le Sicilien and Les Précieuses Ridicules. Dennis was, I believe, the first to point out that the episode of Clerimont disguising himself as a portrait-painter is adapted (and partly translated) from Le Sicilien; and Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Aitken and others have made the descent of Parthenissa (Biddy Tipkin) from Les Précieuses Ridicules a matter of common knowledge. But the play is not a "combination" of Molière's two, any more than a Christmas pudding is a combination of a half-sovereign and a threepenny bit.]

"WHOM GOD HATH JOINED —"

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—In the absence of Mr. Bennett from England, I trust that you will allow his publisher a few words of comment upon the notice of his book, "Whom God hath joined —" in your last issue.

Your Reviewer describes the story as "disgusting, sordid, utterly vile." These are strong words. But he admits "such things do happen every day." I retain the admission, and plead that it would fully justify Mr. Bennett even if your Reviewer's adjectives were strictly correct. If facts are ugly the first impulse to bettering the conditions of which they are the outcome will surely be derived from the realisation of how ugly they are. Mr. Bennett is dealing not with facts of nature against which man, it may be urged, can do nothing, and the contemplation of which can only move him to despair or morbid delectation; he is dealing with social facts, with conditions resulting from law made by man, and which can be bettered by the reform of that man-made law. Is it, or is it not, true that the existing law of divorce is capable of being worked so as to inflict upon two human beings the atrocious wrong which Mr. Bennett pictures it as inflicting upon Mrs. Fearn and Lawrence Ridware? If it is, and apparently your Reviewer admits this, the writer is justified in setting forth the wrong as unflinchingly as possible. But in so doing I claim that he has scrupulously avoided any appeal to unavowable tastes. In dealing with a painful and unlovely aspect of modern life his work is serious and honest; the facts are set forth unflinchingly, but fairly. The purpose is that of the social reformer as well as of the artist; but inasmuch as he is an artist, Mr. Bennett trusts to his picture telling its own tale, carrying with it its own lesson.

ALFRED NUTT.

[Our Reviewer replies: I am obliged for the opportunity of making it clear, immediately and emphatically, that I had no intention whatever of accusing Mr. Arnold Bennett of writing a pornographic book. He sheds no glamour on the horrors he describes and hints at; his book is not one that would incite the feeblest character to vice. More than this I cannot say without taking up a great deal of space on a discussion of morality and law which would take us too far afield. But I would record my opinion that Mr. Bennett's book does very little to point out deficiencies in the divorce law. The legal quibble which delayed the Ridware divorce for a period did not prevent Lawrence Ridware getting rid of his wife: her sneers would have been as painful to him in private or at a case heard in camera as in open court. Mrs. Fearn, again, had she decided to continue her suit against her husband, could have found ample evidence without calling that of her daughter. At most, if Mr. Bennett's book proves anything, it proves that the machinery of the divorce law is a little cumbrous, not that its principles subject any one to "atrocious wrong." I respect Mr. Bennett's motives; I admire, as I have said, the cleverness of his workmanship: I cannot admit that the terms in which I described his story are too strong.]

"WHITE NIGHTS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reading "Marius the Epicurean" one may almost detect in that selection of "White Nights" the keynote of the book: the hard austerity of purpose, the gem-like flame, which characterises Marius.

Pater has made quite clear what he meant to suggest by that delicate place-name. It is anything but the nocturnal blanc of the French phrase. "White Nights" always appeared to my mind as being invested with a moral atmosphere bringing balm and a deliberate moral tonic. That impression may be a little dimmed now, but it has found an echo in the modernity of Meredith:

"Pure from the night and splendid for the day."

MAX JUDGE.

A SUGGESTION TO SPELLING REFORMERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Now that the question of spelling reform is under discussion, I would like to draw attention to the misspelling of two very common words, which have by long use obtained a firm hold in the language, though the manifest inaptitude of their moulding cannot fail to occasionally arrest the notice of the thoughtful writer and reader. The first of these is "read," the preterite tense of the verb "to read," from the M.E. reden. This last had originally two perfects and two past participles, redde, radde, and rad, red respectively; both of which may be found in "Piers Plowman" and in Spenser. The late Professor Whitney, I think, pointed out long ago that "red" was the correct spelling of the preterite and past participial forms; both on etymological and phonetic grounds, as well as from its analogy to "led." M.E. leden to lead, made also ledde, ladde, led, lad; the last-named being used as a preterite as late as the eighteenth century by Thomson in the "Castle of Indolence" (in imitation of Spenser), when referring to his patron, Lord Lyttleton:

"Aim through their walks the Muses lad."

To illustrate the unpleasant cacophony produced occasionally by the use of the above-named solecism, I will just quote a line I chanced to come across lately in a work of fiction, which ran: "'Read the letter yourself.' She read it through." Here the italicised word, occurring as it does after the first word of the sentence, similarly spelt, but with a different enunciation, causes the average reader to halt his perusal in order to get the author's sense. The word is abused simply from the illogical pronunciation accorded to it by constant habit. How easily, and grammatically, too, this might be set right by shortening the word to "red"!

In much the same way "heard," too, offends the eye, as a fortiori it certainly jars upon the sensitive ear as "heerd" when occasionally coming from the mouth of the illiterate Cockney. In this case doubtless there may be extenuating circumstances, as Mr. Avary A. Forbes demonstrated in the Times of October 8 in a remarkable extract from an old English prose writer, in which I noticed the very word spelt "hard." As the preterite and past principle of M.E. heren, to hear, were herde and herd in Chaucer's time, there would seem to be no radical cause why the word's spelling might not be altered to "herd," conformably to modern ideals.

While certainly loth to advocate changes of a merely capricious kind, and being also entirely opposed to any form of truly phonetic spelling—which in my humble opinion would only produce confusion worse confounded in those priceless treasures of English literature that have been accumulating for centuries—I cannot help thinking, in spite of the wise injunction laid down by the "judicious" Fuller: "Change is not made without inconvenience, even from bad to better"; that a few well-chosen changes in the present orthography of English, more especially in words of Saxon origin—the Romance words are comparatively speaking mere child's play to philologists—would conduce greatly to the conservation and true development of that chastened and virile tongue which has been rendered famous.

by the writings of a Shakespeare, a Milton, a Macaulay, and a Scott. That is to say, some few changes, on the principle of those made at different times in French by the Académie Française, are what I would alone propose.

Scott's orthography, by the bye, particularly in the matter of proper names, is often erratic, and occasionally, I think, abominable.

N. W. H.

Philadelphia.

"SAINT GEORGE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of yesterday's date you refer to "a Scottish publication called Saint George." This quarterly has many claims to interest, but it cannot claim to be Scottish. It was founded in January 1898 as the organ of the Ruskin Society of Birmingham, a society which has always been notable for its list of lecturers. The generous zeal of the lecturers provided a nucleus of material: the quarterly grew rapidly in size and circulation. In 1901 the Journal of the (London) Ruskin Union was amalgamated with it, and it has spread far beyond the limits of these societies. It owes its existence to the genius of Mr. J. H. Whitehouse, the present secretary of Toynbee Hall. Its Editorial Board has, it is true, its Scots in the persons of Mr. Lewis Paton (High Master of Manchester Grammar School) and Mr. G. McGegan. But there is, so far as I know, nothing Scottish in the Editor (except that he was the first secretary of the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust!), nor in his other colleagues, Mr. T. G. Harvey, L.C.C., the Rev. J. B. Booth, and myself. The editorial office has always been at Bournville, and the London publisher is Mr. George Allen.

You were misled, I think, by the rather exaggerated patriotism with which Mr. Sinclair hails the theory (in itself convincing enough) of Ruskin's Scottish origin.

J. A. DALE.

St. George's House,
Bournville, near Birmingham,
Nov. 4.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire. Edited for the Quatercentenary of the University of Aberdeen by W. M. Ramsay. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 391. Hodder & Stoughton, 20s. net.

[See "Books Received," in the ACADEMY of October 20, p. 404.]

Rhead, G. Woodliscroft. Chats on Costume. With 117 illustrations, including 35 line drawings by the author. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 304. Unwin, 5s. net.

[Makes no pretension to be anything more than its title suggests. For reasons of space, neither ecclesiastical nor military costume is dealt with. Bibliography and index.]

Salaman, Malcolm C. The Old Engravers of England in their Relation to Contemporary Life and Art (1540-1800). With 48 illustrations. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 224. Cassell, 5s. net.

Hayden, Arthur. Chats on Old Prints. With 110 illustrations and a coloured frontispiece. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 307. Unwin, 5s. net.

[For the man or woman with a limited income. Bibliography, glossary of terms used, list of engravers, and index.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Maitland, Frederick William. The Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen. 9½ x 7. Pp. 510. Duckworth, 18s. net. (See p. 463.)

[A list of Leslie Stephen's works is given in an appendix.]

Sir Thomas Lawrence's Letter-Bag. Edited by George Somes Layard. With recollections of the artist by Miss Elizabeth Croft. With 22 illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. xv, 296. Allen, 15s. net.

[See the ACADEMY of September 1, p. 209.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Golden Staircase. Poems and Verses for Children. Chosen by Louey Chisholm, with pictures by M. Dibdin Spooner. 9½ x 7. Pp. 361. Jack, 7s. 6d. net.

The Enchanted Garden. Tales Told Again by Louey Chisholm, with pictures by Katharine Cameron. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 211. Jack, 7s. 6d. net.

Jameson, E. M. Peggy Pendleton. With 8 illustrations. 8 x 5½. Pp. 312. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.

Fenn, G. Manville. Hunting the Skipper; or, The Cruise of the "Seafowl" Sloop. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. 8 x 5½. Pp. 208. S.P.C.K., 5s.

Collingwood, Harry. Dick Leslie's Luck. A Story of Shipwreck and Adventure. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. 8 x 5½. Pp. 383. S.P.C.K., 3s. 6d.

Shipley, Mary E. Barbara Pelham. The Story of an Unselfish Life. Illustrated by W. S. Stacey. 8 x 5½. Pp. 256. S.P.C.K., 2s. 6d.

Lovell, Lucile. The Walcott Twins. Illustrated by Ida Waugh. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 211. Turner, Ethel. In the Mist of the Mountains. Illustrated by J. Macfarlane. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 267. The Wonder Book. A Picture Annual for Boys and Girls. 1907 volume. 10 x 7½. Pp. 255. Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d. each.

Saunders, Marshall. The Story of an Eskimo Dog. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 64. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s.

Beasts. Shown to the Children by Percy J. Billingham; described by Lena Dalketh. 48 coloured pictures. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 103. Jack, 2s. 6d. net.

Grimm's Household Stories. Illustrated by Dorothy Furniss. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 64. S.P.C.K., 1s.

Marx, William James. The Gold Hunters. Illustrated by Harold Piffard. 8 x 5½. Pp. 248. S.P.C.K., 2s. 6d.

Brazil, Angela. The Fortunes of Philippa. A School Story. Illustrated by A. H. Buckland. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 208. Blackie, 2s.

Hall, Edith King. The Story of the Scarecrow. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 176. Blackie, 1s. 6d.

I Go A-Walking through the Woods and O'er the Moor. Compiled from "British Birds and their Haunts," by the Rev. C. A. Johns and other works. Illustrations from photographs by Charles Reid. 9 x 5½. Pp. 79. Foulis, 2s. 6d. net.

Simple Simon and his Friends. With illustrations by Charles Crombie. 11½ x 18. Greening, 3s. net.

[An advertisement for a certain flour, disguised as a book for children. The illustrations are admirable, and deserved a better setting. The compiler does not even give the correct version of the well-known "Georgie Porgie" rhyme, and substitutes "When the girls began to cry" for "When the boys came out to play." A reference to the illustration would have shown him his error. We should object to paying 3s. for an advertisement which should have been distributed gratis.]

Scotland's Story. A Child's History of Scotland. By H. E. Marshall. With pictures in colour by J. R. Skelton, John Hassall, and J. Shaw Crompton. 9½ x 7. Pp. 428. Jack, 7s. 6d. net.

DRAMA.

Hill, Graham. Guinevere. A Tragedy in Three Acts. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 108. Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.

Rowell, May C.; and Dilley, Joseph J. Richard's Play. A Comedietta in One Act. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 16. French, post free, 6d.

[French's Acting Edition. Paper covers.]

ECONOMICS.

Macgregor, D. H. Industrial Combination. 9 x 6. Pp. 245. Bell, 7s. 6d. net.

[An attempt to "study the problem of industrial combination from some new points of view." The book, in its original form, was submitted in 1904 to the Fellowship Electors of Trinity College, Cambridge; it has been recast for publication.]

ETHNOLOGY.

Finot, Jean. Race Prejudice. Translated by Florence Wade-Evans. 6. Pp. xvi, 320. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

[A plea for amity among nations.]

FICTION.

Atherton, Gertrude. Resánov. 7½ x 5. Pp. 345. Murray, 6s.

Tales from the Great City—Closed Doors. By the author of "A London Girl." 7½ x 5. Pp. 151. Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.

[A feeble novel, purposeless and dull.]

Gallon, Tom. Fortunes A-Begging. A Romance. 8 x 5½. Pp. 316. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Douglas-Hamilton, Mrs. A. Leone; a Tale of the Jesuits. Edited by her Daughter, Lady Dunbar of Mochrum. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 476. Long, 6s.

Fleming, Guy. A Voyage of Discovery, and other stories. 7½ x 5. Pp. 308. Lane, 6s.

[Three short stories.]

Bashford, H. H. The Trail Together: an Episode. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 233. Heinemann, 6s.

Ewes, Basil. Empire. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 391. Stirling: Eneas Mackay, 6s.

[A novel which embodies an endeavour to assist the working classes—the author uses the word in its broadest sense—to "think Imperially, instead of Parochially."]

White, Percy. The Eight Guests. 7½ x 5. Pp. 316. Constable, 6s.

Gould, Nat. The Pet of the Public. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 158. Long, 1s.

[Paper covers.]

Onions, Oliver. Back o' the Moon, and other Stories. 8 x 5½. Pp. 348. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

[One long and four short stories.]

Watson, Gilbert. Skipper. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 356. Blackwood, 6s.

Mr. R. S. Warren Bell's new book, "Cox's Cough Drops" (Arrowsmith), was announced last week in error as a Children's book. We understand that it is a story for the general reader.

HISTORY.

Hume, Martin. Queens of Old Spain. Illustrated. 9 x 6. Pp. 550. E. Grant Richards, 15s. net.

[Isabel the Catholic; Joan the Mad; Mary of England; Isabel of Valois; Isabel of Bourbon; Mariana of Austria; Marie Louise of Orleans; Mariana of Neuburg.]

Pais, Ettore. Ancient Legends of Roman History. Translated by Mario E. Cosenza. 9 x 6. Pp. 336. Sonnenschein, 15s.

[The majority of the chapters were prepared as lectures for the Lowell Institute of Boston. The others were read before Columba a University, Harvard University, the University of Wisconsin, and the University of Chicago. We are not told from what language the book has been translated.]

Sismondi, J. C. L. History of the Italian Republics in the Middle Ages. Entirely re-cast and supplemented in the light of subsequent historical research, with a memoir of the author, by William Boulting. 9 x 6. Pp. 822. Routledge, 5s. net.

[In the "Library of Historical and Standard Literature." Bibliography, chronological table, and a full index.]

LITERATURE.

- Columbia University Studies in Classical Philology: The Stress Accent in Latin Poetry. By Elizabeth Hickman Du Bois. 7½ x 5. Pp. 96. Macmillan, $1.25.
- Folliott, Thomas. The Poetic Spirit. Studies. 7 x 4½. Pp. 122. Fifield, 3s. net.
- [Contents: A Plea for Poetry—The Spirit of Poetry, The Function of Criticism, The Harmony of Thought, Poetry and the Spirit of Science; and chapters on The Philosophy of Omar Khayyám.]
- Clark, Andrew. A Bodleian Guide for Visitors. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 128. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. 6d. net.
- [Describes the chief things which "absolute strangers" can see for themselves within the library and without; and gives the important facts of its history and fortunes.]
- Lang, Andrew. Homer and his Age. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 336. Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Claremont, Leopold. The Gem-Cutter's Craft. 9½ x 7½. Pp. 296. Bell, 15s. net.
- [By a practical gem-cutter. An attempt to convey, by a few short descriptions and photographs and without technicalities, a general impression of the appearance, etc., of the different kinds of gem-stones, together with an outline of the industry and craft of gem-cutting. Bibliography and index.]
- List of Samplers in the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington*. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 21. Wyman, 1d.
- [Paper covers.]
- Magelsen, A. Norway as a Winter and Summer Health Resort. With a preface by Yngvar Nielson. 8½ x 5½. 1p. 48. Kristiania: Nikolai Olsen, n.p.
- [A scientific account of the peculiar advantages offered by the Norwegian climate, with special reference to the inland health resorts. Rendered into English by John Sørensen. Paper covers.]
- Synge, M.B. A Short History of Social Life in England. 8 x 5½. Pp. 407. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- [Explains that William the Conqueror used his fingers to convey food to his mouth, that the two thousand cooks of Richard II. could not make a mince-pie or a plum-pudding, that George I. had no umbrella, and so on.]
- Morel, E. D. Red Rubber. With an introduction by Sir Harry H. Johnston and 2 maps. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 213. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.
- [The story of the rubber slave trade flourishing on the Congo in the year of grace 1906.]
- Jeppe, Carl. The Kaleidoscopic Transvaal. 8½ x 6. Pp. 266. Chapman & Hall, 7s. 6d. net.
- [This book," says the author, "is not an attempt to write history. It makes no pretension to minute photographic exactness, but should be looked upon rather as an impressionist sketch, giving the broad sweep of hill and valley, light and shade, as the observer sees them, without details of foliage or flower."]
- Arnold, Alfred C. The Englishman in Anecdote and Story. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 224. Stirling: Eneas Mackay, 2s. 6d.
- Merry, Mat. The Turf: its Humour in Anecdote and Story. 7½ x 5. Pp. 191. Stirling: Eneas Mackay, 2s. 6d.
- Signs of the Times; or, The Hustler's Almanac for 1907*. By the authors of "Wisdom While You Wait." Illustrated by George Morrow. 7½ x 5. Pp. 145. Alston Rivers, 1s. net.
- A Question of Colour*. A Study of South Africa. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 328. Blackwood, 6s. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

- Hobhouse, L. T. Morals in Evolution. A Study in Comparative Ethics. 2 vols. 9 x 6. Pp. xvii, 669. Chapman & Hall, 21s. net.
- [The purpose of the present work is to approach the theory of ethical evolution through a comparative study of rules of conduct and ideals of life.]

POETRY.

- Clarke, Isabel. A Window in Whitechapel, and other verses. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 62. Esdaile, Arundell. Poems and Translations. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 62. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net each.
- [In the Vigo Cabinet Series. Most of the pieces have appeared in different periodicals.]
- Lewis, Arthur. The Pursuit of Beauty. 7 x 4½. Pp. 66. Chorleywood: The Wincott Press, 1s. 6d. net.
- Fenton, K. A Farewell to Eton, and other poems. 7½ x 5. Pp. 85. Elliot Stock, 1s.
- [Lyrics, chiefly of a religious character.]
- Blane, William. The Silent Land, and other poems. 7½ x 5. Pp. 244. Elliot Stock, 5s. net.
- [About 100 pieces, mostly written on the Dian and Fields and Gold Fields of South Africa; some have appeared in different English and Colonial periodicals.]
- Κατωρόνης, Η. Σ. Ευσεβείας Στίχοι. 5½ x 4. Pp. vi, 118. The Anglo-Oriental Press, 2s. 6d.
- [Sacred poems in Greek.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Nordau, Max. Paradoxes. Translated from the fifth German edition by J. R. McIlraith. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 343. Conventional Lies of our Civilization. Translated from the seventh German edition. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 346. Popular editions. Heinemann, 6s. each.
- Cooper, Fenimore. The Pathfinder. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 458. Kingsley, Charles. Westward Ho! 6½ x 4½. Pp. 694. Nelson, 6d. each.
- [In the "Sixpenny Classics"; cloth covers.]

- Marsh, Richard. Miss Arnott's Marriage. 9 x 6. Pp. 125. Long, 6d. [Paper covers.]
- Dickens, Charles. A Christmas Carol and The Cricket on the Hearth. 6 x 4. Pp. 118 and 114. Heinemann, 6d. net each.
- [Presented by Mr. Hall Cairé. The first illustrated by John Leech, the second by D. MacIise and John Leech. In "The Favourite Classics."] Napoleon's Last Voyages. Illustrated. Second edition. With introduction and notes by J. Holland Rose. 9 x 6. Pp. 247. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
- [Being the diaries of Admiral Sir Thomas Ussher, R.N., K.C.B. (on board the Undaunted), and John R. Glover, secretary to Rear-Admiral Cockburn (on board the Northumberland).]
- Osgood, Irene. To a Nun Confess'd. Letters from Yolande to Sister Mary. 7½ x 5. Pp. 240. Third edition. Sisley's, 6s.
- Johnson, Mary. Sir Mortimer and Audrey. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 346 and 428. Constable, 2s. 6d. net each.
- Hobson, John A. The Evolution of Modern Capitalism. A Study of Machine Production. New and Revised Edition. 7½ x 5. Pp. 450. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 6s.
- [Considerably altered and enlarged. In the Contemporary Science series.]
- Macleod, Norman. The Gold Thread. New edition, with an introduction by the Very Rev. Donald Macleod. 7½ x 5. Pp. 100. Allenson, 1s. 6d.
- Leighton, Robert. Olaf the Glorious. A Historical Story of the Viking Age. Illustrated by Ralph Peacock. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 351. Fenn, G. Manville. Bunyip Land; or, Among the Black Fellows of New Guinea. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 384. Stables, Gordon. To Greenland and the Pole. A Story of Adventure in the Arctic Regions. Illustrated by G. C. Hindley. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 350. Blackie, 3s. each.
- Heddie, Ethel F. An Original Girl. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 387. Church, Alfred J. Lords of the World. A Story of the Fall of Carthage and Corinth. Illustrated by Ralph Peacock. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 384. Denny, J. K. H. The Clever Miss Follett. Illustrated by Gertrude D. Hammond. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 384. Henty, G. A. Condemned as a Nihilist. A Story of Escape from Siberia. Illustrated by Wal. Paget. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 352. Henty, G. A. Under Wellington's Command. A Tale of the Peninsular War. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 383. Blackie, 3s. 6d. each.
- Hickman, Harold. Ugly Pollo: his Story. Illustrated by Winifred Austen. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 226. Jarrold, 3s. 6d.
- Whistler, Charles W. A Thane of Wessex and King Olaf's Kinsman. Each 7½ x 5½. Pp. 288 and 320. Blackie, 2s. 6d. each.
- Cooper, J. Fenimore. The Last of the Mohicans. Illustrated by J. Jellicoe. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 295. Blackie, 2s.
- Corkran, Alice. Down the Snow Stairs: or From Good-Night to Good-Morning. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5. Pp. 257. Blackie, 2s. 6d.
- Thorn, Ismay. A Golden Age. A Story of Four Merry Children. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 7½ x 5. Pp. 224. Austin, Caroline. Hugh Herbert's Inheritance. Illustrated by C. T. Garland. 7½ x 5. Pp. 287. Blackie, 2s. each.
- [New editions of children's books.]

SCIENCE.

- Macpherson, Hector, Jun. A Century's Progress in Astronomy. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 246. Blackwood, 6s. net.
- [Portions of two chapters have already appeared in an American periodical.]

SOCIOLOGY.

- Kropotkin, P. The Conquest of Bread. 8½ x 6. Pp. 299. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.
- [Chapter on: Our Riches, Well-being for All, Anarchist Communism, Expropriation, Food, Dwellings, Clothing, The Need for Luxury, Agreeable Work, Free Agreement, The Collectivist Wages System, Consumption and Production, The Division of Labour, The Decentralisation of Industry, and Agriculture.]
- Kidd, Dudley. Savage Childhood. A Study of Kafir Children. With 32 full-page illustrations from photographs by the Author. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 314. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY.

- Nicoll, W. Robertson. The Lamp of Sacrifice. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 375. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- [Sermons preached on several occasions.]
- de Félice, Philippe. L'Autre Monde: mythes et légendes: Le Purgatoire de Saint Patrice. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 195. Paris: Champion, 6f.
- [M. de Félice makes an essay in what he aptly calls "Christian folklore." He traces the origin of the legend of the Purgatory of St. Patrick and shows the place it occupies in the ensemble of traditions of the next world. A future volume to trace its influence on English, French, Spanish and Italian literature.]
- Friend, the Rev. Hilderic. The Mosaic of Life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 288. Kelly, 3s. 6d.
- [Studies in Christian experience and thought.]
- The Spiritual Conferences*. Translated from the Ancey Text of 1895 under the supervision of Abbot Gasquet and the late Canon Mackey, O.S.B. 7½ x 5. Pp. 406. Burns & Oates, 6s.
- [In the "Library of St. Francis de Sales."]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Holdich, Col. Sir Thomas. Tibet the Mysterious. With maps, diagrams, and other illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 356. Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net.
- [In the "Story of Exploration" series. Good bibliography and index.]
- Gwynn, Stephen. The Fair Hills of Ireland. With illustrations by Hugh Thomson. 8 x 5½. Pp. 416. Macmillan, 6s.
- Hissey, James John. Untravelled England. With 24 full-page illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 459. Macmillan, 16s. net.
- Henderson, T. F. The Auld Ayrshire of Robert Burns. Illustrated in colour from paintings by Monro S. Orr. 7 x 4½. Pp. 146. Foulis, 2s. 6d. net.

"A Work which should be in the hands of every Craftsman, Scientist and Technical Student."

A Technological and Scientific Dictionary

Edited by C. F. Tweney and
G. F. Goodchild, M.A., B.Sc.

880 pages of text and about 400 Diagrams and other Illustrations.

Royal 8vo, cloth, 18s. 6d. net; half morocco,
21s. net. Postage 8d. extra.

It contains, in addition to many special articles, definitions of the terms generally used in

Art	Chemistry	Photography
Astronomy	Electricity	Printing
Bookbinding	Engineering	Surveying
Botany	Geology	Sculpture
Building Trades	Hygiene	Zoology
Carpentry	Mining	Etc. etc.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

INVALUABLE WORKS OF REFERENCE

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CITIZEN'S ATLAS. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. 156 Maps. Introductory Text, Statistical Tables, Descriptive Gazetteer, and General Index. Extra crown folio, art canvas, 21s. net; half morocco, 25s. net. Postage, 10d. extra.

"A splendid atlas. The very best atlas which can be purchased at the price."
Daily Express.

THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENT'S ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. A Series of 105 Physical, Political, and Statistical Maps, compiled from British and Foreign Surveys, and the latest results of International Research. Under the direction of J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E., F.R.G.S., etc. Royal 4to, cloth, 6s. net. Post free, 6s. 6d.

"A boon to all students of the world's contemporary history."—Daily Telegraph.

THE HANDY ATLAS of the BRITISH EMPIRE. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E. A Series of 120 Maps and Plans, illustrating the Geography of the Colonies, with Statistical Notes and Tables. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE HANDY TOURING ATLAS OF THE BRITISH ISLES. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. Being the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Ireland in miniature, contained in 120 Coloured Maps. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE HANDY SHILLING ATLAS OF THE WORLD. Containing 120 pages of Fully Coloured Maps, by J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, and a Gazetteer with 10,000 entries. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net. Post free, 1s. 2d.

THE INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHY. By Seventy Authors. Edited by HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc., F.R.S.E. With 488 Illustrations. Third Edition, Revised. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. Post free, 15s. 6d.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED,
3 TO 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

BEAUTIFUL POCKET EDITIONS

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in. and ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Postage, 3d. extra.

EVELYN'S DIARY.
LAMB'S WORKS.
THE VISION OF DANTE.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
TENNYSON'S POEMS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS'S POEMS.
DON QUIXOTE.
BACON'S WORKS.
SHELLEY'S POEMS.
PEPYS'S DIARY.
KEATS'S POEMS.
POE'S TALES.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.
THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCY.
BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

Newnes' Pocket Classics.

Super royal 24mo. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.
Cloth, 2s. net. Postage, 3d. extra.

THE CAVALIER IN EXILE. Being the Lives of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. By the DUCHESS.
GOETHE'S FAUST. A Dramatic Mystery. Translated by JOHN ANSTER, LL.D.
THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY and WILLIAM COLLINS.
A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR. By DANIEL DEFOE.
SHAKESPEARE'S POEMS AND SONGS.
POEMS OF GEORGE WITHER.
SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS OF THE XVI., XVII., & XVIII. CENTURIES.
POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.
CHEVALIER BAYARD.

Newnes' Devotional Series.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics.
Super royal 42mo. Lambskin, 2s. 6d. each net. Cloth, 2s. each net.
Postage, 3d. extra.

LYRA GERMANICA, Translated from the German by CATHERINE WINKWORTH.
THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS.
THE CHANGED CROSS. And other Poems.
THE CHRISTIAN YEAR.
THE SACRED POEMS OF HARRY VAUGHAN.
LYRA INNOCENTIUM.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY

Royal 8vo, 16s. net each vol.

Planned by the late Lord ACTON. Edited by A. W. WARD, Litt.D. G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D. and STANLEY LEATHES, M.A.

Vol. IV. of this History, THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR, is just ready. It is the seventh volume to appear of this general history of modern times, the others published being: Vol. I—The Renaissance, II—The Reformation, III—The Wars of Religion, VII—The United States, VIII—The French Revolution, and IX.—Napoleon.

Any volume may be purchased separately, at 16s. net. But subscriptions of £7 10s. net are received for the complete work in twelve volumes. Such subscriptions may be paid either at once in full, or in a sum of 12s. 6d. for each volume ready and the balance in instalments of 2s. 6d. on the publication of each of the remaining volumes.

COWLEY: ESSAYS, PLAYS & SUNDRY VERSES

Edited by A. R. WALLER, M.A.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

This companion volume to the POEMS OF ABRAHAM COWLEY already published in the same series of Cambridge English Classics contains the rest of Cowley's English writings. The earlier volume gave the whole of the poems collected for the folio which appeared the year after Cowley's death. The present gives the poems not included in the folio, its prose contents and Cowley's English plays.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net each vol.

Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by ARNOLD GLOVER, M.A. and A. R. WALLER, M.A.

Vol. IV. of this edition is ready, and contains The Tragedy of Valentinian, Monsieur Thomas, The Chances, The Bloody Brother, and The Wild-Goose Chase. The text of the edition, which is reprinted from the folio of 1679 with a record of all earlier variant readings, will be completed in ten volumes, of which four are now ready. Subscribers for complete sets of the ten volumes are entitled to purchase copies at the reduced rate of 4s. net per volume.

The PRINTERS, STATIONERS & BOOKBINDERS OF WESTMINSTER & LONDON 1476 to 1535

Crown 8vo, 7 plates, 5s. net.

By E. GORDON DUFF, M.A., sometime Sanders Reader in Bibliography in the University of Cambridge.

This book gives an account of the introduction of the art of printing into England and of its spread, and describes the work of the early English printers, of those foreign printers who printed abroad for sale by the "stationers" in England, and of the English bookbinders, from the introduction of printing down to the Act of Henry VIII. which restricted the importation of foreign books.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
LONDON, FETTER LANE—C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 40 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 155 HOLBORN.

FIONA MACLEOD'S POSTHUMOUS WORK.

WHERE THE FOREST MURMURS.

A SERIES OF NATURE ESSAYS.

By FIONA MACLEOD.

Price 6/- Net, by post 6/4.

Morning Post.—"No other than Fiona Macleod could so have transfigured Nature into dream, no other writer could have expressed with such unity of spirit the Celtic attitude in terms of country things. She finds the charm of the mountain in their contemplation from the valley, the forest most vividly itself when the twigs are bare and the mosses shrouded in snow, the most luminous moment of the cuckoo's year in its first days of silence, and her love of all things greatest when they have just been taken away."

Daily Telegraph.—"There is everywhere a sense of the haunting mystery of the processes of the world viewed through the eyes of a simple, unsophisticated nature, which, from perpetual brooding upon the face of the deep, has caught something of the misty air and broken music of the wave. Suggestion, rather than doctrine, is the atmosphere of the work; and in a certain vague, but beautiful suggestiveness, the strange but eager-hearted prose of this writer abounds to the very brim."

GOLF GREENS AND GREEN KEEPING.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

10/6 Net, by post 10/10.

CONTAINING FULL AND EXPLICIT INSTRUCTIONS BY RECOGNISED EXPERTS AS TO THE LAYING OUT AND UPKEEP OF GOLF COURSES ON VARIOUS SOILS. WITH OVER 40 ILLUSTRATIONS.

"A complete green-keeper's vade mecum."—Daily News.

Daily Mail.—"Mr. Hutchinson has collected chapters from the chief experts, and as he has been careful to select those who have had to deal with widely different problems, the result is a volume of the greatest possible value. . . . Its use and value cannot be over-estimated."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Each article is written by a man who knows his subject, and the book is brightened by a number of most admirable and helpful photographs. It will be useful to secretaries of links already established, and even more so to gentlemen who are thinking of pegging out a new course; and we have no hesitation in saying that it should be on the library shelves of every golf club pavilion in the kingdom as a valuable practical treatise."

Yorkshire Daily Post.—"The practical worth of the volume is nearly equal to the combined worth of all the books that have been written on the theory and practice of golf."

Scotsman.—"Is sure to find a place in the library of all golf clubs; and to the green keeper it will be exceedingly valuable."

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," LIMITED, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.; and by GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 7-12 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES

Whole Page	£8 8 0
Half "	4 4 0
Quarter "	2 10 0
Narrow Column	3 0 0
Per Inch, Narrow Column	0 7 6

SERIAL RATES (for not less than 13 narrow columns)

Whole Page	£7 10 0
Half "	3 15 0
Quarter "	1 17 6
Narrow Column	2 10 0

SPECIAL POSITIONS AS ARRANGED

SMALL-TYPE ADVERTISEMENTS

6d. per Line. Minimum, 2/6. The first line is counted as two

Copy for Advertisements must be sent in not later than 12 noon on Thursday.

All Orders for Advertisements are received subject to the space being available and the Proprietors reserve to themselves the right to decline or hold over an Advertisement.

All Communications respecting Advertisements must be addressed to THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER, 20 TAVISTOCK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Royal Exchange Assurance.

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ANNUITIES, ACCIDENTS,
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY,

Head Office :

Royal Exchange, E.C.

West End Office :

29 Pall Mall, S.W.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1802

NOVEMBER 17, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT of the UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW will shortly proceed to appoint the following ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS:

(a) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ARTS, viz.: Five Examiners; (1) in Classics, (2) in Moral Philosophy and Logic, (3) in English, (4) in History, and (5) in Education. The appointment in each case will be for three years from January 1, 1907, at the following annual salaries, viz.: Classics, £80; Moral Philosophy and Logic, £50; English, £40; History, £40; and Education £21 with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(b) EXAMINER in POLITICAL ECONOMY for Degrees in Arts, Science, and Law. The appointment will be for three years from January 1, 1907, at an annual salary of £21. with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(c) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ART and for the PRELIMINARY and BURSARY EXAMINATIONS, viz.: TWO EXAMINERS; (1) in French and (2) in German. The appointment in each case will be for three years from February 1, 1907, at the following annual salaries, viz.: French, £40, and German, £30, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(d) EXAMINERS for the PRELIMINARY and BURSARY EXAMINATIONS, viz.: TWO EXAMINERS, (1) in Classics, and (2) in Mathematics and Dynamics. The appointment in each case will be for three years from February 1, 1907, and the remuneration will be on the scale of 1s. 6d. per paper examined for Higher Preliminary Papers, and 1s. per paper examined for all Lower and Medical Preliminary papers, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(e) EXAMINER in ZOOLOGY for DEGREES in ARTS, Science, and Medicine. The appointment in the first instance will be for a period of three years from January 1, 1907, at an annual salary of £50, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(f) EXAMINER in PHYSIOLOGY for Degrees in Medicine and Science. The appointment in the first instance will be for a period of two years, from January 1, 1907, but the Examiner appointed will be eligible for reappointment for a further period of two years. The annual salary attached to the post is £50, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

Candidates should lodge Twenty Copies of their application and Testimonials with the undersigned on or before December 22, 1906.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary University Court.
University of Glasgow.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON, by W. M. Sloane, profusely illustrated, many plates in colour, 4 vols., 4to, cloth extra, published by Macmillan, 1901 at 63s. net, offered for 35s. net.—WALKER, 7 Br ggate, Leeds.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

GOOD COPY OF ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, vols. 1-25, blue cloth, as issued, £10. Complete set of "The Ancestor," 12 vols., as published, 35s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES
GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL
CATALOGUE (124 pp.)

JUST OUT

Librarians, Bookbuyers generally and all interested in Literature, are invited to apply for above.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED—ELEVENTH EDITION.

Royal 8vo, cloth, 45s., strongly bound half calf, 50s.

MAY'S PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE.
A Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usages of Parliament. By Sir Thomas Erskine May, K.C.B., D.C.L., Clerk of the House of Commons, and Bencher of the Middle Temple. Eleventh edition (revised from the Tenth edition of 1893, edited by Sir Reginald F. D. Palgrave, K.C.B., and Alfred Bonham-Carter, Esq., C.B.). Books I. and II., edited by T. Lonsdale Webster, Esq., second Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons; Book III., edited by William Edward Grey, Esq., of the Committee Office, House of Commons.

This, the Eleventh, Edition (although based on the last, or Tenth, Edition of 1893), brings this work throughout up to the present date of publication, and includes the changes that were made by the House of Commons in its procedure up to the adjournment in August last. The additions and alterations that have been necessary in order to bring this work completely up to date in this Revised Edition are indicated in the preface.—London: WM. CLOWES & SONS, Ltd., Law Publishers, 7 Fleet Street, adjoining Middle Temple Lane.

CHAUCEER.—A Commentary on the Prolog and Six Tales. Rich in new matter. Subscription price, $2.00. Circular on application.—Address, H. B. HINCKLEY, 54 Prospect Street, Northampton, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

AUTHOR (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

Ready Shortly

A NEW AND IMPORTANT
VOLUME

Houses and Gardens

BY

M. H. Baillie Scott

Medium Quarto, 3ls. 6d. net; post free, 32s.

Containing over 200 Illustrations in black-and-white, and 17 Plates printed in Colour on Superfine Plate Paper. The Letterpress is printed on a high-class Wove Paper, specially prepared for this work.

The book is Bound in Morris's Art Linen, with Cover and End-papers designed by the Author.

THE MAIN FEATURE OF THIS WORK IS TO SHOW THE POSSIBILITIES OF BEAUTY WHICH LIE IN THE MERE BUILDING OF A HOUSE. THERE IS NO TOWN OR VILLAGE BUT IS BEING GRADUALLY DISFIGURED BY THE PLAGUE OF MODERN BUILDING, AND THE AIM OF THE AUTHOR OF THIS VOLUME IS TO SEEK TO RESTORE YET AGAIN THAT SERENE AND EARNEST BEAUTY OF THE OLD HOUSE WHICH IS EVERYWHERE BEING REPLACED BY A SUPERFICIAL SMARTNESS POSING AS ART

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
3-12 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Elliot Stock's New Books

Second and Cheaper Edition now Ready.

NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS BY THE AUTHOR OF "OBITER DICTA."

In square crown 8vo, appropriately bound, price 2s. 6d. net.

IN THE NAME OF THE BODLEIAN, AND

OTHER ESSAYS. By the Right Hon. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, M.P., Honorary Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge.

"The delightful essays possess all the characteristics which have given their author a special place in modern literary criticism."—DAILY NEWS.

"Mr. Birrell delights us on every page when he comes before us as essayist. 'In the Name of the Bodleian' is a worthy companion to 'Obiter Dicta.'"—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A RECENT VOLUME OF ESSAYS

CHEAP EDITION. In crown 8vo, appropriately bound, 2s. 6d.

A FIT OF HAPPINESS, AND OTHER

ESSAYS. From The Spectator. By CECIL GRAY.

"In many of these essays there is a vein of pleasant humour, in some a healthy optimism, and a living sympathy with the study of mankind through man, and all are written with freshness and vigour."—SCOTSMAN.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

NOW READY. In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s. net.

THE SILENT LAND, and other Poems. By

WILLIAM BLANE (Johannesburg, South Africa), Author of "Lays of Life and Hope."

"Mr. Blane is a born poet. 'The Silent Land' and 'Creation' are very ambitious themes, but the poet soars high in treating them. The lines depicting the true heart, the kind heart, the brave heart, the proud heart, the sad heart, and the still heart of 'The Rand Refugee' are very touching, and the poem on 'The Victoria Falls, is the best we have read on the subject.'"—SOUTH AFRICA.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, gilt lettered, price 3s. 6d.

THE TRIUMPH OF MAN. By PERCY SCHOFIELD.

"The Triumph of Man" is a Dramatic Poem, and consists of blank verse and rhymed and unrhymed lyrics; is moulded throughout in the manner of a dream. Its dominant purpose is to shadow forth an ideal scheme for the Redemption, through love, of the human race.

In crown 8vo, bound in leatherette, illustrated, price 1s.

A FAREWELL TO ETON, and other Poems.

By K. FENTON, Author of "Dora" and "Easter Memories."

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE DUKE OF ENGHIE, and other Poems.

By F. S. HOLLINGS.

"Interesting and pleasing. The book should find its best pleased readers among those who look for verse and rhyme as giving the proper relief for thoughts too studious and earnest for prose."—SCOTSMAN.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

THE TREASURE OF THE SEA. A Book of Verse. By STANLEY GERALD DUNN.

"Mr. Dunn's work has freshness and brightness. It contains much that is sincerely felt and well worked out into capable and rhythmical verse."—DAILY NEWS.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

FIONA MACLEOD'S POSTHUMOUS WORK.

WHERE THE FOREST MURMURS.

A SERIES OF NATURE ESSAYS.

By FIONA MACLEOD.

Price 6/- Net, by post 6/4.

Morning Post.—"No other than Fiona Macleod could so have transfigured Nature into dream, no other writer could have expressed with such unity of spirit the Celtic attitude in terms of country things. She finds the charm of the mountain in their contemplation from the valley, the forest most vividly itself when the twigs are bare and the mosses shrouded in snow, the most luminous moment of the cuckoo's year in its first days of silence, and her love of all things greatest when they have just been taken away."

Daily Telegraph.—"There is everywhere a sense of the haunting mystery of the processes of the world viewed through the eyes of a simple, unsophisticated nature, which, from perpetual brooding upon the face of the deep, has caught something of the misty air and broken music of the wave. Suggestion, rather than doctrine, is the atmosphere of the work; and in a certain vague, but beautiful suggestiveness, the strange but eager-hearted prose of this writer abounds to the very brim."

GOLF GREENS AND GREEN KEEPING.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

10/6 Net, by post 10/10.

CONTAINING FULL AND EXPLICIT INSTRUCTIONS BY RECOGNISED EXPERTS AS TO THE LAYING OUT AND UPKEEP OF GOLF COURSES ON VARIOUS SOILS. WITH OVER 40 ILLUSTRATIONS.

"A complete green-keeper's vade mecum."—Daily News.

Daily Mail.—"Mr. Hutchinson has collected chapters from the chief experts, and as he has been careful to select those who have had to deal with widely different problems, the result is a volume of the greatest possible value. . . . Its use and value cannot be over-estimated."

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," LIMITED, 20 Tavistock Street, Strand, W.C.; and by GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 7-12 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	491	Nugæ Scriptoris :
Literature :		IX. Renunciation	500
Profundo Pindarus Ore	494	A Literary Canserie :
The "Improvers" of Shake- spears	494	Literary Feeding-Bottles	502
Children of Nature	496	Fiction	502
The King's English	497	Fine Art :
Four Books of Poetry	498	Society Exhibitions	503
The Art of the Needle	499	Music :
The Grave	500	Some Modern Songs	505
Bookshef	510	Correspondence	506
		Books Received	508

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

AN Anthology should always have an object; it should be directed at a certain end and should have certain strongly marked characteristics. No anthology that is intended to fit all moods is likely to fit any mood in particular. It is not meant for study: for that readers must go to the complete works of the poet in question: it is meant for recreation, edification and delight, and it must tell us clearly what we shall find within its covers and where we shall find it, so that there shall be no bad shots and no laborious or disappointed turning over of pages. These needs are being more and more recognised by anthologists and are admirably supplied by two delightful books before us, Mr. Arthur Symons's "Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry," and Mr. Quiller-Couch's "Pilgrim's Way." Both, thanks to the knowledge, taste and purpose of their compilers, are among the best anthologies in the language.

The difference between them is wide; and the difference, as it should be, is clearly marked in the many titles. Mr. Symons's is a pageant; a thing we go to see in holiday mood, leaving our cares behind us, children for the time as much as the street-urchins perched on the railings hard by, intent only on enjoying the "happy tumult," "the sunlight" and the "good marching music." A pilgrimage is undertaken in holiday mood, too; there is the same bravery, the same readiness to enjoy anything that may come; but beneath that lies how grave a mood, how sweet and serious a purpose! When I go on my pilgrimage, writes Mr. Hilaire Belloc, in another brave book, his "Hills and the Sea," "I must get myself into the frame of mind that carries an invisible burden, an eye for happiness and suffering, humour, gladness at the beauty of the world, a readiness for raising the heart and the vastness of a wide view, and especially a readiness to give multitudinous praise to God. . . . It is surely in the essence of a pilgrimage that all vain imaginations are controlled by the greatness of our object."

And that control runs through all Mr. Quiller-Couch's volume. His pilgrimage is the life of man; and his day's march this or that quality that belongs to this or that stage in the pilgrimage. And so, while Mr. Symons gives us the "shining disorder" of the procession bidding us sit still and watch, until the gorgeous music fades into the silence of the grave, leaving us feeling a little sad and lonely but full of remembered joy at the bravery we have seen, Mr. Quiller-Couch takes us by the hand and leads us in a procession of our own, sterner but no less brave, graver but no less full of joy. The difference of attitude is very characteristic of the two compilers; but so wide is the field of life and so lavish are the gifts of literature that both books (each the work of a man who has the right to choose for us) should lie by the bed-head for joy and for consolation.

A dictionary of a new kind, and an ingenious kind, is Miss Elsie M. Lang's "Literary London," which gives in alphabetical order the streets and spots of London and the suburbs where men and women of letters have lived, with brief accounts, occasionally, of what they wrote or did there. There are plenty of books on literary London, not one that we know of which gives its information in so accessible a form. It is a great pity, therefore, that the idea is carried out so baldly and incompletely. Miss Lang still believes that Margaret Roper rescued her father's head from London Bridge, and swallows all the traditions told one on pudding-day at "Ye Olde Cheshire Cheese." She makes no mention under Chelsea of the house of George Herbert's step-father, Sir John Danvers; insufficient details are given of the Ruskin house on Herne Hill; Lamb's residence in Colebrook Row, Islington, the house to which he brought Emma Isola, is not mentioned, nor is Beckford's house in Devonshire Place; and we should have imagined that Garrick—as one of the best epigrammatists of his day if not as playwright—was sufficiently a man of letters to justify the mention of his house in Southampton Street, Strand. The omission of all reference to living authors is perhaps wise, but a companion volume, or the second edition of this, must show much more fully the other side of the picture—the streets and houses of London in imaginative literature. Miss Lang gives "Mr. Tulkinghorne's" in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Pendennis in the Temple; but she treats of Kensington Square without mentioning the Esmond house, and actually touches Vauxhall without referring to Jos Sedley. A chaotic index, which confuses the author of "Erewhon" with the author of "Hudibras" and gives innumerable wrong references, adds nothing to the value of the book.

One of the handiest editions of Shakespeare we have seen lately is that just issued by Messrs. Dent in Everyman's Library. The whole work of the poet is contained in three little volumes, Comedies in one, Tragedies in another, Histories and Poems in a third; and each volume has its glossary, while the introductory matter is confined to a brief biographical notice at the beginning of the Comedies. What text has been followed the editor does not say, but that is a matter in which the general reader will not interest himself so closely as he should. He will doubtless be satisfied to have a truly "pocket edition," in which the type is large and clear and the paper not too thin to turn with ease.

And while we are touching on reprints, we must offer a welcome to a very admirable series just inaugurated by a firm whose reprints are deservedly valued: Messrs. Routledge's new "London Library." We have on our table six handsome red buckram volumes, well printed, well bound, and—what is more—well edited: Jowett's "Interpretation of Scripture" and other Essays, with Sir Leslie Stephen's Life of Jowett; Hogg's Life of Shelley, with an introduction by Professor Dowden; new editions (revised by the original editor) of Professor Firth's Newcastle Memoirs and Hutchinson's Memoirs; Mr. Sidney Lee's Lord Herbert of Cherbury's Autobiography, and G. H. Lewes's Life of Goethe. An excellent selection; one which the true book-lover will long to possess. The volumes are delightful to read and to handle, and portraits and indexes add to their charm and their value. The price (2s. 6d. each) seems incredibly small—even after recent statements made about the cost of book-production.

Professor Wilamowitz-Moellendorf has found the sources of "Baron Münchhausen," alias "Baron Krach," whom many of us, and the fathers and grandsires of most of us, have enjoyed in youth. After the recent taboo of Greek by a contemporary, we can only with bated breath confess that one of the Baron's prototypes is Antiphanes, of Berge. Now "Berge is a village in the land of the Bisaltians, as thou goest up stream along the Strymon, distant from Amphipolis about 200 stades," as Strabo says. And another, whom it is perhaps wicked to mention in or out of Parliament—one Stephen of Byzantium—says that "to be a man of Berge is to speak nothing true." Pytheas and Euhemeros were good liars, but nothing to Antiphanes, who travelled in the North. It was in the Southernmost South, however, that the others found most matter for leeing. The city is anonymous in which Antiphanes "heard the sounds (in summer) which had been frozen the previous winter," in the fourth century, B.C.

Splendide mendax, is Antonius Diogenes, "father of such inventions," who flourished about—or before—Alexander of Macedon. This Antony's "True History" is so carefully compiled that it seems not "to be widowed of witnesses," while all the time its Gasconing is in the Tartarin vein. Occasionally, however, with allowance for latitude and longitude, he accidentally stumbles on banal truth, such as the Midnight Sun in Thule. Ctesias and Sammonicus seem to have committed the same veracity. We may, perhaps, add to the "black list" Timæus and Pytheas. It is so hard to lie artistically and continuously.

This tale of Thule became so famous that "incredible beyond Thule," was a punning description of falsehood of that "fabled" spot, of what was to the north of it, and of what exceeded the stories concerning the same. To do this last was to cap a climax. No doubt, Antiphanes could not have invented the whole of the Baron, as we now have him. Münchhausen is the father of all the flotsam and jetsam mythological, due to two millennia and upward. It was well, however, to show Antiphanes's part in building up the Baron; before the tongue of Hellas is still as Memnon; before the Classics follow Pan into the Silent Land, or quit the world for good, like Astræa.

Some time ago our contemporary The Bookman offered three prizes of £100 each for stories for Boys, Girls, and little Children: and the three winning stories have just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. The Boy's book is "For the Admiral" by W. J. Marx, a tale of France in the days of the sixteenth-century Huguenot troubles: the Girls' Book and the Children's book are both the work of Miss Christina Gowans Whyte; the former being called "The Story Book Girls," and the latter (a most attractive quarto with lots of good pictures by M. V. Wheelhouse) "The Adventures of Merrywink." All three look fascinating and will be examined at greater length shortly. We notice in each volume a slip giving particulars of an ingenious competition for young readers. The competitors are to summarise Mr. Herbert Strang's story, "Samba," and explain what it teaches. For the winner there is a noble prize of three guineas, and five consolation prizes of half a guinea. Would this come under the head of "American methods"?

The sale of the Trentham Hall Library, the property of the Duke of Sutherland, begins on Monday, November 19, at Messrs. Sotheby's, and continues during the five following days. It comprises about one thousand eight hundred lots, and although it is of a general nature on every day books of special interest and unusual value will be brought to the hammer. Amongst the manuscripts we note an unpublished autograph manuscript by Chalonier, a connection of the "Lord Faulconberg" whom he accompanied, entitled, "His Travells in One Thousand Six Hundred and Eighty-Seven with my Ld. Kingston and Lord Fanshaw," and "A Relation of ye Embassy of his Ex^{ty} ye Earl of Faulconberg, Ambassador Extraordinary from King Charles ye 2nd in 1670 to ye Duke of Savoy, ye Republic of Genna," etc.; an heraldic manuscript containing thirteen thousand five hundred painted coats of arms, being an armorial of English Families; "[Speculum Vitae or Mirrour of Life]," an interesting English manuscript Poem, attributed to Richard Rolle of Hampole, the author of the "Pricke of Conscience" and other works of the fourteenth century. This manuscript is on vellum. There are several Books of Hours from early presses, including one with designs by Geoffry Tory, 1549.

Rare books are pretty numerous. We have a first edition of Thomas Coryat's "Crudities hastily gobbled up in five moneths Travells in France" and "newly digested in the hungry air of Odcombe in the County of Somerset," 1611, and a Black Letter copy of Sir Thomas Eliot's "The Boke named the Governour," printed by Thomas Berthelet in 1537; Pynson's Original Edition of Froissart's Chronicles, Black Letter. 1523-5; Berthelet's First Edition of Gower's De Confessione Amantis, Black Letter, 1532; Higden's Polycronicon, 1527; many rare original editions and fine copies of Lutheran pamphlets and books, a large and clean copy of the First Edition, 1584, of Reginald Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft; and a Third Folio of Shakespeare.

Amongst fine books there are Gould's Ornithological Works, original subscriber's copies, beautifully coloured, seventeen volumes, imperial folio; large paper copies of Dibdin's Bibliotheca Spenceriana and other Works, a set in large paper of Francis Grose's Works, the Engraved Works of Piranesi, twenty-three vols.; and the Original Edition of Sibthorp's Flora Graeca, ten volumes, folio, a magnificent botanical work rarely appearing.

The Institute of Oceanography which Paris owes to the Prince of Monaco, was inaugurated last week, when a lecture was delivered by Dr. Joubin, of the Natural History Museum, to a crowded audience in the Geological Theatre of the Sorbonne, the Prince himself presiding. The Institute was formally endowed and connected with the University of Paris in the spring, and to this liberality the Prince added the gift of the laboratories and collections forming the famous Marine Museum at Monaco. These will be installed in special buildings on a site between the Rue d'Ulm and the Rue St. Jacques (behind the Pantheon) acquired by the University in virtue of a subvention from the Prince. The lectures now started are free and open to the public and they will be given four days a week; the cours on Mondays, Thursdays and Saturdays, the conférences on Saturdays. According to the terms of the statutes the scientific work will be directed by an International Committee of Experts, who have made their mark in oceanography. The total value of the gift amounts to about 10,000,000, roughly £400,000, one of the largest sums ever made over to scientific purposes by a single benefactor.

A novel suggestion, which should be welcome to the abused publishers, appears in a recent number of the Oxford Magazine. Referring to Messrs. Dent's new series of College Histories, the editor expresses the opinion that that it ought to be a point of honour with every member of the college described, not only to possess the book, but to know it. He even suggests that the Matriculation Examination should be stiffened by making the history of the college a compulsory subject. It is a good idea: it would lead, we believe, to increased pride in membership of an august and historical body, and might help to lessen the number of cases of such gross ingratitude and selfishness as were displayed in an unfortunate speech made not long ago by a prominent politician. And we feel sure that the publishers in question would not object.

The Italian Ministry of Public Instruction is to be congratulated if, as is credibly reported, it has decided to allow the exportation to England of Sir Henry Layard's famous collection of Old Masters. No other decision could justly be arrived at, for not only were all Sir Henry's pictures, save one, acquired in 1868, that is before the Italian law of exportation came into force; but the collection was in that year housed in England and consequently was brought into Italy from abroad. During the life of Lady Layard it is improbable that the collection will be seen in England, but certain things will eventually come to the National Gallery. Among the most precious of the Layard paintings are Gentile Bellini's Adoration of the Magi, and the famous portrait of Mahomet II., painted during Bellini's stay at Constantinople. A fine Carpaccio, St. Ursula Taking Leave of Her Parents, and works by Montagna, Moroni, Moretto, Alvise Vivarini are all included in this collection, which is peculiarly rich in good examples of the lesser known Florentine and Venetian painters.

The Irish National Theatre Company has begun a new season at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, with the production of two new plays and an old one, by Lady Gregory and Mr. William Boyle. For The Gaol Gate, by Lady Gregory, the term "tragedy" used on the programme is too grandiloquent. There are but three persons and one scene; the high gate of the gaol occupies almost all the stage, and before it two women wait for news of their kinsman. When they learn that he has died rather than betray his comrade, they keen him with a lament that rises to a song of triumph. It is hardly even a "play" in the technical sense of the term, though it is none the less beautiful for its limitations. The archaic peasant dialect which Lady Gregory employs in this piece has already been used by her in Spreading the News and her other lighter studies of West of Ireland life.

The other new production was The Mineral Workers by Mr. William Boyle, a three-act comedy of modern Irish life, which contains much amusing dialogue, intimate knowledge of familiar Irish "types," and some slight psychological interest. The action centres round the familiar figures who discuss the industrial problems of modern Irish life—the Irish-American engineer, the old farmer, the professional politician. To the really fine acting of Mr. W. E. Fay as Fogarty much of the success of the play was undoubtedly due.

In The Arrow, the new official organ of the National Theatre Society, Mr. W. B. Yeats announces that, having developed the peasant play, the Society is now prepared to "take up the life of our drawing-rooms and see if there is something characteristic there, something which our nationality may enable us to express better than others, and so create plays of that life, and means to play them as truthful as a play of Hauptmann's or of Ibsen's upon the German or Scandinavian stage." All this . . . "if but the dramatist arrive." We echo Mr. Yeats's hope that he may.

In the course of a few days the clerical protagonists of the Education controversy each used a quotation divorced from the spirit and intention of its context. The Archbishop of Canterbury led off with a comparison of the Bill to the maid "whom there were none to praise and very few to love." Now the context of Wordsworth's poem shows that this characteristic was, in the poet's view, far from a drawback. Was there no Wordsworthian on the Government benches—say the member who later risked a laugh by describing a clause of the Bill as "one of its charms"—to retort that, if the measure, like the maid, perished, the archbishop, in order to be consistent with his quotation, should be one of its mourners. "But she is in her grave, and oh the difference to me." Dr. Clifford in exhorting his friends to "Awake! arise! or be for ever fall'n"—was quoting Milton's Satan, and is supposed not to have known it. If the devils may quote Scripture for their purpose, may not an angel quote Satan? In any case, Satan and his fellows stand for the spirit of revolt.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—A Christmas course of lectures: 'adapted to a juvenile auditory, will be delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. W. Duddell, on "Signalling to a Distance; from Primitive Man to Radiotelegraphy" (experimentally illustrated). The dates of the lectures are December 27, 29, 1906, January 1, 3, 5 and 8, 1907, at three o'clock.

Royal Geographical Society, the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W.—Monday, November 19: Mr. J. Stanley Gardiner, "The Seychelle Islands."

British Museum (Natural History) Lecture Theatre of the Victoria and Albert Museum, at 6 P.M. Swiney Lectures on Geology: Monday, November 19, Lecture VII., Scandinavia and Arctic Europe. Wednesday, November 21, Lecture VIII., European Alps. Friday, November 23, Lecture IX., Eastern Plain of Europe and Caucasus. Illustrated by Lantern Slides.

Sociological Society, 24 Buckingham Street, Strand.—Monday, November 19, 8 P.M. Paper contributed by Professor Motora (of Japan) on Japanese Character.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, at 8 P.M., Monday, November 19. Cantor Lecture: Mr. A. D. Hall, on Artificial Fertilisers. Wednesday, November 21: Opening address of the One Hundred and Fifty Third Session, by Sir Steuart Colvin Bayley, K.C.S.I., Chairman of the Council.

The Jewish Historical Society of England.—Session 1906-1907. Inaugural Meeting. The Presidential Address will be delivered by the Very Rev. Dr. M. Gaster (Haham), on Monday, November 19, at University College, London, at 8.30 P.M.

Royal Microscopical Society, 20 Hanover Square.—Wednesday, November 21, 8 P.M. Mr. J. W. Gordon on "The Use of a Top-Stop for Developing Latent Powers of the Microscope."

Royal Meteorological Society.—At the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, Wednesday, November 21, 7.30 P.M. Papers to be read: (1) "The International Congress on Polar Exploration at Brussels, September 1906." Report by Hugh Robert Mill. (2) "The Abnormal Weather of the past Summer, and some of its Effects," by William Marriott.

Art Exhibitions.—Grafton Galleries: Works of the late Archibald Stuart Wortley.—Views of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens by Mary L. Breakell. Open to December 3.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metal-work, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie Cheyne Art Club: Pictures and sculpture: October 26 to November 23.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc.: October 22 to January 1.—Graves Galleries: London Sketch Club: October 27 to end of November. Paintings of Flowers in Oil by Louise E. Perman.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—Messrs. Dowdeswell: The Society of Twenty-five English Painters: November 2.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—Dickinson. Contemporary Scottish Art. October 27 for three weeks.—R. Gutekunst: Etchings by Rembrandt, Ostade and Van Dyck. November 5 to December 3.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. November 5 for one month.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. November 7.—Tooth and Sons. Pastels by Arthur Wardle. November 7.—Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co., Friday, November 2. Exhibition of the portrait of Lord Milner, painted for the Town Council of Johannesburg, and other pictures by M. Theodore Roussel.—Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours; Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club: Dering Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. November 10: Tinsel Pictures by Miss Birkenruth and Water-colours by C. A. C. Jeffcock.—Messrs. Graves. Nocturnes in oil by Miss Marguerite Verboeckhoven, November 10 to end of month.—Leicester Galleries: November 24. Arthur Rackham's "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens."—W. B. Paterson: November 17. Pictures by W. Nicholson.—Fine Art Society: November 17. Miniatures by Miss Eulabee Dix. Landscapes in Cornwall and Devon (water-colour) by S. J. Lamorna Birch. Water-colours of Cities of Spain by Henry C. Brewer.—Royal Photographic Society, 66 Russell Square: November 6 to December 22. 11-5. Photographs by Henry W. Barrett. Admission on presentation of card.

Plays: November 29 at Chester. Three of the Chester Mystery Plays: The Salutation, The King's Play, The Shepherd's Play. November 20. Professor Gollancz will lecture on the plays at Chester. The performance will be repeated at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, on December 4, 5 and 6, at 9 P.M., and December 4 and 6, at 3.30 P.M.—Stage Society. Scala Theatre, December 9 and 10. The Weavers, by Gerhart Hauptmann, translated by Mary Morison.—November 16 and 17, 8.30. Scala Theatre. In aid of the Little Sisters of the Poor: A Simple Sweep, by F. W. Broughton, music by Father James F. Downes; La Jalouse, by J. A. Bleackley, and The Minstrel, by J. A. Bleackley, music by Father Downes.

Concerts.—Queen's Hall: November 17. Queen's Hall Orchestra. Bechstein Hall: November 17. Pachmann 3.15.—Queen's Hall: November 18. London Symphony Orchestra (Stanford), 3 P.M.—Queen's Hall: November 19. London Symphony Orchestra (Achter), 8 P.M.—Bechstein Hall: November 19. Bispham, 3 P.M.—Aeolian Hall: November 20. Bühlig, 8.30 P.M.—Queen's Hall: November 21, Joachim, 3 P.M.—Bechstein Hall: November 21. Beecham (orchestral), 8.30 P.M.—Bechstein Hall: November 22. Bauer, 3 P.M.—Bechstein Hall: November 23. Joachim, 8 P.M.

LITERATURE

PROFUNDO PINDARUS ORE

The Olympian Odes of Pindar. Translated into English verse by CYRIL MAYNE, M.A. (Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes.)

JUST thirty years ago teachers and learners alike welcomed the prose translation of the Odes of Victory, by Ernest Myers. It was a real work of art, and is still the only resource for Greekless readers of Pindar, and the best for students and scholars. The verse renderings, of course, cannot pretend to adhere at all as closely to the original. However, there are many who will have their poet in verse, and such will find Mr. Mayne's book a boon. It is as literal as can be reasonably expected, the metres and rhymes are excellent, and we constantly find the glowing fire flashing out from the hard quartz-rock in which it is embedded. I would especially refer our readers to the sublime passage in the second ode which glorifies the abode of the Blest in a future world, and to the story of Iamus in the sixth. The only thing in the nature of a foreword is a very pretty and spirited English sonnet, a charming substitute for the conventional Preface.

It is not long since an article in the ACADEMY treated of Bacchylides, the younger contemporary of Pindar, and touched on some striking differences in their artistic methods. It may be interesting here to consider the "Odes of Victory" as poems. In a future article it may be possible to consider specially the style and peculiar technique of Pindar's work.

Pindar is the lyric poet of Greece, the poet who is as finely touched as Sappho and touched to far finer issues, inasmuch as he has left to us not a mere handful of gold-dust, but a rich casket of shining gems. I doubt if there is a single poet in all literature to whom a formal introduction is more indispensable, and I doubt if ever a student has come to the first reading of Pindar without a sense of disappointment. Here is a poet who was an inspired sage in the eyes of Hellas, who loomed large beside Homer and Archilochus, whose casual utterances were sacred to Plato and Cicero, and whom Horace selected as the type of the inimitable. And yet nearly all of his work which has come down to us consists of what we should call occasional pieces, installation odes, just that kind of literature which seems to us incapable of rising to anything like real greatness.

The verdict accordingly of modern times has been by no means so enthusiastic as that of antiquity. Many modern critics have failed to see why poems dealing with such an apparently inconsiderable theme as (say) the victory of a boy in a wrestling match should be conceived in such a strain—a strain almost burthened with a sense of the importance and dignity of the subject. Hence Voltaire speaks of Pindar as an inflated Theban, a singer of fisticuffs, a First Violin at the court of Hiero. English critics too, though not so outspoken as the French—they never are—secretly sympathise with the Voltairean view and temper formal eulogies with apologies for turgidity and bombast. They burn incense, as it were, with one hand, and snap their fingers in the poet's face with the other. Nor ought we to be surprised at this state of mind when we consider the extraordinary character of those poems of Pindar which have come down to us in a completed state. These are the series of odes, nearly fifty in number, which commemorate victories in the four great national contests of Greece. How is it that these games and these poems kindled in the poet and in the Greeks at large an inspiration and an enthusiasm as vivid as have in other ages been awakened by love, hate, war, destiny, patriotism, religion? *

To answer this question we must briefly consider the public games of Greece. They were to the Greeks not only a test of nationality and an outward and visible sign of Greek unity, but they also gathered about them a thousand associations as social tests and proofs of cultured opulence. The Greek who aspired to be a man of fashion felt that he was nobody until he had contended in the public games. Just as an English nobleman is sent to one of the great public schools, then to one of the great Universities, and finally develops perhaps, into a Master of the Hounds, so an Athenian or Aeginetan young man of fashion entered a four-horse chariot for the race at Olympia or competed in the pentathlon at Nemea. It is remarkable that success in the games was not the essential condition of securing the social cachet aimed at. Pindar often tells with pride how the family which he is glorifying competed generation after generation, though without success; just as an English gentleman likes to think that his people had always gone to Eton or Harrow, to Oxford or Cambridge, though perhaps none of them ever attained any distinction either at the school or at the University. However, victory in the games had its political weight. It is a great help to a modern Prime Minister to win the Derby. It saved Alcibiades at a very critical moment when two of seven chariots entered by him won the first and second prizes on the Elean Plain. Indeed, such a distinction would have been even more valuable to a brilliant young Athenian than the Blue Ribbon of the Turf would now be to a Premier, for we must remember that the poor Greeks were heathens and had no nonconformist conscience.

* In dealing with Pindar I have taken some of my illustrations from an article on the "Odes of Victory" by me, which was published nearly twenty years ago in the Quarterly Review.

There is another remarkable point of contact between the English and the Greek mind. With both the desirability of keeping up the breed of horses assumes almost the proportions of a religion. In eulogising a Sicilian prince Pindar says of him: "August he was in his converse with citizens, and he upheld the breed of horses after the Hellenic wont." Could such a sentiment have proceeded from a poet of any other nation but Hellas, save only England, and could it have been the glorification of any person or personage save an ancient Greek or a modern Englishman?

Not less important were the commercial and religious aspects of the games. During the five days which they occupied a holy truce was proclaimed through all Greece. Busy traffic went on among traders who brought their wares from all parts of the world to the great Synod of Hellas; and the moon looked down on a busy revel by night. The games were a religious rite as well as an athletic test, and to all those influences must be added what Isocrates in his Panegyricus especially emphasises—a kind of prevailing Christmas feeling of peace on earth, goodwill towards men, such as is awakened within us by the great festivals of the Church.

Hence it is that the Ode of Victory is a thing unique in literature, partaking of the nature of an oratorio, a ballad, and a collect. The poet is at the same time a priest, a conductor, a ballet-master, and a preacher of the word, paid, as our clergy are paid for being professional conductors of public worship. The ode was heard with a feeling compounded of that with which one listens to an anthem, and that with which one witnesses the victory of one's old school at cricket.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

(The second article will appear next week.)

THE "IMPROVERS" OF SHAKESPEARE

Alterations and Adaptations of Shakespeare. By FREDERICK W. KILBOURNE, Ph.D. (Boston, U.S.: The Poet Lore Company, $1.50.)

THE author of this little book has produced a useful and convenient handbook to an interesting and somewhat neglected subject. He has given an excellent account of the alterations made by self-elected "improvers" of Shakespeare, but if he had arranged the plays, both in order of merit and in chronological order of the respective improvements, we should have learnt more that we want to know respecting the influence of Shakespeare on the history of the Stage. It may seem unfair for a critic to complain that an author has not done what he never intended to do. At the same time we can say that, as the plays attributed to Shakespeare are unequal in merit, we mete out a larger share of condemnation to the "improvers" of the greater plays than to those who altered the lesser plays; thus those who have maimed Macbeth, Lear, The Tempest and Romeo and Juliet, we look upon as criminals, whose crime is unforgivable, while we are almost indifferent to the vagaries of the "improvers" of Titus Andronicus and Henry VI. The subject is a wide one, and we do not propose to do more in reviewing Mr. Kilbourne's book than to notice the effect of Shakespeare's genius on the Restoration stage, omitting generally the consideration of the alterations made in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The "improvers" of Shakespeare in the seventeenth century were a strange company—there were men who greatly admired Shakespeare and yet showed themselves blind to his beauties when they came to alter his plays for the stage, such as Davenant, Dryden, Lewis Theobald and Otway, and those from whom nothing good was to be expected, such as Tom Durfey, Lacy and Nahum Tate.

The Restoration took the playwrights by surprise, and the managers of the theatres had no new plays ready to perform when they again had the ear of the public; therefore they were forced to present the old ones to their patrons. Many of these had not only been unseen during the Commonwealth, but probably had been little acted during the reign of Charles I. These old plays were divided between the managers of the King's Theatre and the Duke's House. Ben Jonson was the first favourite, then came Beaumont and Fletcher, and third in order of public favour was Shakespeare. Pepys during the nine and half years of his life recorded in the Diary saw twelve of Shakespeare's plays, both altered and unaltered. He saw thirteen if we consider the Two Noble Kinsmen as partly written by the great poet, for Davenant altered this play into one called The Rivals (Diary, September 10, 1664).

This is an excellent proportion, and can be explained by the fact that, although the men of the seventeenth century were unable to appreciate or indeed understand the higher flights of Shakespeare's genius, they were able to admire the strength of his chief characters, which exactly fitted the marvellous power of the great actors of that age headed by Betterton. It is not easy to fix the date of the earliest alterations, because the rewritten plays were often not printed until long after they were acted. The earliest of these appear to have been Davenant's Law against Lovers (Measure for Measure), James Howard's Romeo and Juliet, Davenant's Macbeth, Davenant and Dryden's Tempest, and Lacy's Sawney the Scot (Taming of the Shrew). The alterations of the other plays seem to have become more common about twenty years after the Restoration.

Davenant's Macbeth was first acted in 1663. Pepys saw it in 1664, yet it was not published until 1674, and the original play was published one year before with the names of the actors then appearing at the Duke's Theatre. Oddly enough, as Macbeth was first published in the first folio (1623), this edition of 1673 is the first quarto edition of the play.

Sawney the Scot, or The Taming of the Shrew, by John Lacy, was seen by Pepys in April 1667, but the play was not printed until 1698. In the old play, Taming of a Shrew, which was the foundation of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, the hero's servant is named Sander, and this apparently gave Lacy the absurd idea of turning Grumio into a Scotsman.

The comic and fairy portions of A Midsummer Night's Dream have been more often presented separately on the stage than as a whole. The Fairy Queen was brought out in 1692, and much earlier a dramatic piece was made of the Humours of Bottom the Weaver. During the Commonwealth this droll was acted by Robert Cox, who is supposed to have been the author. There is no record of the acting of the complete play shortly after the Restoration, but Pepys saw it on September 29, 1662, when he expressed the heretical opinion that "it is the most insipid ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life." Now, the droll of the Humours of Bottom was printed in 1661, and to save us from believing in Pepys's glaring want of taste we should be pleased to think that he saw this in 1662. We fear, however, that so trivial a piece was scarcely likely to have been acted at the King's Theatre, but at the same time it is improbable that the original play was acted, as serious pieces of this kind were not suited to the taste of the Restoration public.

One interesting point that is brought out by the investigation of the chronological side of the subject is that two of the greatest plays escaped mutilation, viz., Othello and Hamlet. Garrick was the first to alter the latter play. It is satisfactory to know that the Hamlet in the representation of which character Betterton made his most triumphant success was really the work of Shakespeare.

In order to understand to some extent the ruthless alteration of plots and language, we must remember that the strong French influence among the dominant writers after the Restoration had caused so great a change in the literary language that the men of that period were farther off from the understanding of the vocabulary of Chaucer and Shakespeare than we are to-day. They considered obsolete what we look upon as our common language. Words which are in common use with us were often supposed to need a gloss. Their taste was so vitiated by a widespread belief that theirs was a peculiarly refined age, that they considered language rude which we hold to be supreme in beauty.

We are inclined to resent the form of Voltaire's opinion on Shakespeare, but Dryden and his followers went further than Voltaire in condemnation of his "rude speech." It is strange that Davenant, who is rightly considered to be the main link with the Elizabethans, and was proud of his connection with Shakespeare, and Dryden, who wrote some of the earliest and finest criticisms on Shakespeare, should have been amongst the greatest offenders in the travesty of the poet's works. In the Tempest Dryden doubtless did little to the play himself, but he committed the offence of expressing approval of Davenant's desecration of Shakespeare's art.

Mr. Kilbourne is wrong in his account of the alterations of The Tempest. It is only the 1670 edition for which Davenant and Dryden are responsible. The 1674 edition represents Shadwell's change of the play into an opera, which contains the elaborate stage directions hitherto attributed to Davenant. All subsequent editions, although they contain Dryden's preface, are merely reprints of Shadwell's opera. There is no cause, however, for blaming Mr. Kilbourne, because attention has only lately been publicly called to this point.

It is with pain that a lover of Dryden feels bound to condemn him completely, and the only compensation is the remembrance that under the influence of Shakespeare Dryden composed All for Love, by far his greatest play.

Justice demands that while complaining of the way in which alteration has been carried out we should acknowledge that alteration of a kind was needed to adapt the plays of the Elizabethan age to the altered conditions of the latter half of the seventeenth century. At all times some alterations will be needed, but they should stop before the plot is spoilt and good language is changed to bad. Although the alteration of Julius Cæsar by Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, was never acted, and is therefore hardly a fair example of the others, the rearrangement of Mark Antony's splendid speech is scarcely an exaggeration of the silly alteration of language which was very general. Here is an extract from this:

Friends, countrymen and Romans, hear me gently;
I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.
Lo here the fatal end of all his glory;
The evil that men do, lives after them;
The good is often bury'd in their graves;

So let it be with Cæsar. Noble Brutus
Has told you Cæsar was ambitious;
If he was so, then he was much to blame;
And he has dearly paid for his offense.
I come to do my duty to dead Cæsar.

The æsthetic blindness of these "improvers" of Shakespeare is truly amazing, as when Shadwell said of his version of Timon of Athens: "I have made it into a play"! or when George Granville, Lord Lansdowne, allowed his friend, Bevil Higgons, to praise him so crudely in the prologue to the Jew of Venice, where the ghost of Shakespeare is made to say, partly in the third person:

The scenes in their rough native dress were mine,
But now improved with nobler lustre shine;
The first rude sketches Shakespeare's pencil drew,
But all the shining master-strokes are new.
This play, ye critics, shall your fury stand,
Adorned and rescued by a faultless hand.

This was written of a play in which Shylock was lowered to a semi-comic character taken by the low comedian, Dogget, of whom Downes writes: "he is the only comic original now extant; witness, Ben, Solon, Nikin, the Jew of Venice, etc." Betterton acted Bassanio. Genest gives no notice of the acting of the Merchant of Venice before 1701, when the Jew of Venice was produced. Our grateful appreciation is due to Macklin, who in 1741 valiantly brought back Shakespeare to the stage, although the whole dramatic world was opposed to his bold step. He succeeded, however, and drew from Pope the exclamation: "This is the Jew that Shakespeare drew." Genest (1830) says: "From this time [1741] Lansdowne's 'Jew of Venice' has been consigned to oblivion. May Tate's 'Lear' and Cibber's 'Richard the Third' soon share the same fate."

It is impossible to notice all the plays that have been altered, but something may be said of the happy endings and alterations of plots.

Lear and Romeo and Juliet are the two chief tragedies that have been supplied with happy endings. Nahum Tate was proud of his handiwork in Lear, and we must allow that he was to a certain extent justified by the egregiously bad taste of the public, for a large portion of his alterations continued to be used in the acting version as late as 1824. The clown was expunged from the list of characters, and a love episode provided for Cordelia and Edgar. As to the outrage of continuing life to Lear after all his "living martyrdom," it is enough to refer to Charles Lamb's scathing condemnation, which is known to all. Downes refers to the acting of Lear (probably by Betterton) as its author wrote it.

Davenant was specially unfortunate in his alterations, and, as Mr. Kilbourne says: "A characteristic feature of Davenant's alterations" is the duplication of certain characters as seen in the Tempest and the Law against Lovers. In Macbeth he introduces Lady Macduff in several scenes in place of the one in Shakespeare and gives her one hundred and twenty-five lines to speak. This appears to be in order to pair off Macduff and his wife with Macbeth and his wife. He strikes out the Porter's short speech, and thus spoils the marvellous effect of the knocking at the gate, which suddenly relieves the tension caused by the previous silence.

On the whole this interesting book presents a serious indictment of the bad taste of the playwrights and playgoers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

HENRY B. WHEATLEY.

CHILDREN OF NATURE

Savage Childhood. By DUDLEY KIDD. (Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. DUDLEY KIDD has written a most charming and instructive book about the children whom he found in the iKafir kraals. He has observed them with the closeness of one who loves his task and he has not only described them in admirably chosen language, but has been able to obtain some of the most delightful photographs that we have seen. He says: "The few illustrations given may be better than nothing, but they are inadequate to convey a full impression of the peculiar charm of these delightful little people." Very few would guess from this extremely modest sentence how fine the illustrations really are. But, indeed, in all respects Mr. Dudley Kidd is very unpretentious. He is much more impressed with the extent of the field he has opened, than with the magnitude of his own performance. He begins before birth and sets down the very curious superstitions that affect the woman's conduct before her baby comes into the world.

Even the food the woman eats may most profoundly affect her child. Consequently, when the woman walks about the country, she ties round her ankles small yellow flowers which have the property of undoing evil spells. She keeps in her hut special pots of medicine from which she drinks occasionally. But should any one look into one of the pots the reflection of the face would affect the mother and unborn child, so that the baby would have the likeness of the person who looked into the pot. The mother avoids eating buck lest her baby should be ugly; she does not eat the under-lip of a pig lest her baby should acquire a large under-lip; she takes care not to eat eland, or even to touch its fat, lest her baby's fontanelles should not grow firm and strong. Many women have a dread of porcupines, thinking that the eating of their flesh causes the children to be peculiarly ugly. The doctor therefore gives the woman medicated porcupine to eat, thus ensuring freedom from the danger.

The men pay very little attention to the birth of a child, regarding it purely as a woman's business. But although the folk-lore of the Kafirs is of great interest, the chief attraction of this book lies in the close observation of the children at play. We would like to quote the following, however, which is a lullaby sung by an African woman to her child:

Woye, Woye,
I'm going down South
To Mwandiemudza,
Tshibuwe's daughter,
Who has white eyes,
Like a weasel's,
The cunning weasel,
You see its whiskers,
Are fine and large,
They need a doctor.

In childhood the savage is undoubtedly seen at his best. There is more freedom, both physically and mentally, in the bringing up of a savage child, than in the education of one who has been born in civilisation. There is a tradition, too, in favour of feeding the child well, so that those shown in the pictures are models of health. The story of their play is most curious, as it proves that many of the games popular with these Kafir children are exactly the same as we ourselves have known in childhood. When very young they have dolls, mostly of their own making, and they are in the habit of making pretence that the dolls are living creatures like themselves. Playing at animals comes to a child naturally in whatever circumstances he may be born. Of course, the amusement takes a form coloured by the environment.

Boys make an instrument known as the Bull-Roarer, and whirl the piece of wood round their heads till it makes a sound which is thought to resemble the roaring of lions, and which frightens the small children very much. The natives declare that the boys use these instruments for simple pleasure, though the old women sometimes make the boys stop using them, for they think that the noise will attract the wind. The men also tell the boys not to use these things at night, for they say the noise makes people dream of lions. Whatever may have been the original function of these instruments, the people nowadays have quite forgotten it, and declare that it is simply a plaything of the boys. The game of "horses" is a favourite one, a piece of wood being placed in the mouth to represent a bit, grass string being used for reins.

The children are encouraged to perform all sorts of dexterous tricks with their bodies, as suppleness and elasticity of limb are very essential to their future well-being. The children have swings, and although hoops are unknown, they frequently roll pumpkins down a hill, kicking or hitting them to make them roll the faster.

Tops are made from roots or from broken pieces of old pots. Bangles are spun on their axis in a way similar to that in which we spin coins. Several kinds of leap-frog are played; the game of knuckle-bones, which was known in ancient Egypt, is still a pastime of the Kafir children; and, what is still more curious, cats-cradle in a modified form is played there. Even the rude snares and other contrivances with which the boys amuse themselves bear a very close resemblance to the same sort of things in England. We have given a very sketchy review of this book, but every line of it is full of interest.

THE KING'S ENGLISH

The King's English. Second Edition. (Oxford: at the Clarendon Press, 5s. net.)

THE authors of this book have been happy in their choice of a title. "The King's English" expresses clearly and concisely the subject and scope of the work. The subject of the book is the English language, but the English language treated not as a science but as an art. "The King's English" is not a grammar, giving systematically and exhaustively all the rules for writing the language correctly, nor is it, like Dr. Henry Bradley's work, a book on "the making of English." Its aim is purely practical—to help the King's lieges, who wish to become good writers, to avoid common blunders. The plan adopted is to pass by all rules, however important, that are seldom or never broken by Englishmen, and to warn people against certain specified blunders which are so common that they may be met with in the pages of the most exemplary writers. These blunders are illustrated by examples, taken mostly from the works of living writers—the name of the author or authority being attached to each example.

What should be accounted a blunder in writing? A blunder is made when any word or phrase or construction is used which fails to express adequately the precise meaning of the writer. A writer, in order to be understood by his reader, will take great pains to be direct, simple, brief, vigorous, and lucid. These are the essential qualities of a good writer, which, if kept in view, will prevent a man from making serious blunders. It may be noted that a usage may not be necessarily a blunder, even though it may come into collision with some rule of the grammarian, or with some dictum of the almighty schoolmaster. Language is the instrument of living men; it cannot be bound by hard and fast rules; it does not stand still; it sometimes leaves grammar in the lurch. On the other hand a usage may be a blunder, although the writer may plead in its defence that it has the authority of the best authors in the past or of the most admired authors now living. The best authors are not always free from carelessness or affectation. The fact is, much will be forgiven a writer, if what he says is quite clear—the exact reflex of his thought.

The book under consideration is an admirable monitor on a very difficult subject. It is the work of men who are thorough scholars, and who are endowed with excellent judgment—a book free from pedantry, and abounding in good sound common sense. It is a thoroughly useful, practical book, and may be heartily recommended to every one who wishes to write good English.

The first part of the book is devoted to remarks on various common mistakes made in vocabulary and syntax. Then comes a chapter entitled "Airs and Graces," in which certain affectations to which writers are liable are treated with proper severity. We are then treated to a long chapter on Punctuation in which much valuable advice is given. The rest of the book deals with miscellaneous matters, such as euphony, quotation, tautology, ambiguity, faults of style, and various grammatical points.

I will now try to give some idea of this very interesting book by mentioning a few of the points discussed, and indicating briefly how they are treated. Mistakes in the use of words and phrases may be mentioned first. The use of the word individual for person is gibbeted. The word was so used by Goldsmith and Scott, but of course the only correct use of the word, when applied to human beings, is to denote a single human being as opposed to Society, the State, the Family, etc. The word mutual is often used for common; it is so used in the phrase our mutual friend. The word mutual implies an action or relation between two or more persons or things, A doing or standing to B as B does or stands to A. Writers often speak of a thing as somewhat unique or rather unique or very unique. This is a solecism, for there are no degrees of uniqueness. Aggravating is often met with in Dickens in the improper sense of annoying, exasperating, irritating, and this use is still common in familiar speech. An aggravating circumstance is properly a circumstance which adds to the gravity or seriousness of an offence. Transpire (like perspire) means properly "to escape through the pores of the skin," then "to become known gradually"; to use it as a mere synonym of "to happen" is, as Stuart Mill said, "a vile specimen of bad English." Stevenson uses the verb "to demean oneself" in the sense of "to lower, degrade oneself"; its proper meaning was "to behave" in a certain manner. The word irony is often used as a synonym for satire; it is properly a figure of speech in which the intended meaning is the opposite of that expressed by the words used; the Socratic irony was the pretence of ignorance practised by Socrates and his pretended admiration as a means of confuting an adversary. Recrudescence means properly the breaking out afresh of a disease or epidemic, or of a wound or sore; it is becoming a fashionable journalistic word for all kinds of reappearances: the Times speaks of a recrudescence of Lord Melbourne and Lord Byron! Wind-flower is adduced as an instance of an affected, far-fetched synonym for anemone; the authors do not seem to be aware that the flower is so named in many dialects from the Firth of Forth to the English Channel; it should be noted that the Greek word has probably no connection with wind. Meticulous (French méticuleux), a favourite journalistic word employed by critics (e.g., "his almost meticulous analysis," "the most meticulous critic"), is viewed by our authors with great disfavour, with many other unhappy Gallicisms, such as the half-world, it goes without saying, to orient, to the foot of the letter, the spirit of the staircase. Writers often use arrière pensée as if it meant an after-thought; of course it can only mean in French a thought kept in the background which one does not wish to express. I am sorry that encouragement is given to write naïveté as navity, but this is perhaps a misprint for naivty. In the discussion on Slang the phrase to get "the boot" is mentioned, the Times being the authority; what does it mean? Chronic is said to be slang for remarkable; but this use has not been recorded yet in any Slang Dictionary; and although the word is said to be in popular use in Yorkshire and London, it does not appear in the English Dialect Dictionary.

The use of trite, worn-out phrases is discouraged, such as "it would be a slaying of the slain," "I am old-fashioned enough to think"; the formula, "It stands to reason" is treated as one of the worst offenders. This phrase is constantly used as if the premisses in an argument stand to reason; it is, of course, the conclusion drawn from certain premisses that stands to reason. The legal maxim, "Exception proves the rule" (Exceptio probat regulam in casibus non exceptis) is nearly always misquoted and misunderstood; the Latin exceptio means here the action of excepting, not something that is excepted. That familiar line of Shakespeare, "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," is nearly always misunderstood; there is nothing sentimental in the words; it merely expresses the truth that in this one respect all men are alike—they "all with one consent praise new-born gauds." A curious dovetailed quotation is cited from the Times: "Is there no spiritual purge to make the eye of the camel easier for a South African millionaire?" "The eye of the camel" is good!

Some interesting points in syntax are discussed. In the Bible we find, "Let us make a covenant, I and thou" (Gen. xxi. 44); so in modern English people say, "Let you and I cry quits." Can such a construction be defended? Our authors view it as a bad blunder; Jespersen justifies it, saying that "in these cases the nominative is used in spite of grammatical rules requiring the accusative, because the word is thought of as the subject." What shall we say about "It's me"? Our authors say it is ungrammatical. Sweet says: "It is only the influence of ignorant grammarians that prevents such phrases as 'it is me' from being adopted into the written language, and acknowledged in the grammars." Is than whom permissible? Our authors say it is manifestly wrong, but convenient; Jespersen says: "This use of the acc. after than is now so universal as to be considered the normal construction; that is, to the general feeling than is a preposition as well as a conjunction." The conclusion of the matter is that man is made for grammar and not grammar for man.

A. L. MAYHEW.

FOUR BOOKS OF POETRY

The Fool of the World and other Poems. By ARTHUR SYMONS. (Heinemann, 5s. net.)

A Selection from the Verses of John B. Tabb. Made by ALICE MEYNELL. (Burns & Oates, 2s. 6d.)

Poems. By WALTER DE LA MARE. (Murray, 3s. 6d. net.)

Flood Tides and other Poems. By ALFRED B. COOPER. (Marshall Bros.)

WHEN Mr. Arthur Symons's "morality," The Fool of the World, was played in London in the spring, it was spoken of very highly by a few discerning critics. On reading it, we understand why. It shows, for all its slenderness, strong dramatic power. It asks a question; it leads you on, as you fancy, ever nearer to the answer, working up your eagerness in every line; and suddenly at the close, in the very last word, it flashes upon you the piteous truth. There is no answer; and the shock comes so poignantly, even to the reader, that we can imagine its effect on the stage, if properly treated, to be tremendous. The power of the little play, the amount of passion it enfolds and the force of the climax set us wondering whether, after all, the future of Mr. Symons as a poet does not lie in the poetic drama. The man who can write The Fool of the World needs to know no more of the stage than he knows already; Mr. Arthur Symons certainly needs to know no more than he knows already of the use and effect of language; and it would be well for the poetic drama if we had a poet who would bring to it, as Mr. Symons would, something deeper than the topics it mainly starves on at present. We have a further reason for cherishing the idea; a reason that lies in the very nature of Mr. Symons's work. He is, in essence, a dramatic poet. His very lyrics are dramatic. To read through the volume before us is to ask at the close: Where is the author? We have seen exquisitely painted pictures, with the very spirit of the scene and the hour caught and turned into words; we have shared moods of all kinds, so expressed that we almost believed a reader who knew no English would understand from the mere sound of the words: we have found underlying the many moods and scenes no one man, no one passion, no one idea; none of that unifying personality which is the permanent thing in a great poet. Mr. Symons; that is, is a self-conscious, a dramatic poet. He stands aside and studies the mood or the scene; the mood might be someone else's, the scene imaginary. He never gives the impression of having felt, not of choice but of necessity, the thing he describes; always of having the subtlest appreciation of it and a rare knowledge of the most exquisite means of expressing it. Join these qualities to the constructive dramatic power of The Fool of the World, and we have a great part of the equipment of a poetic dramatist.

There is no need to dwell on the technical beauty of the lyrics in this volume. Some have appeared before; all are fine examples of the work of one who is rather a consummate "artist in words" than a poet. But we might call attention to one characteristic of Mr. Symons; the suppleness and variety of his use of stress. Take as an instance the first two stanzas of "The Crying of the Earth" (the last appears to us to be marred by a wilfully violent image):

I hear the melancholy crying of birds in the night
Over the long brown wrinkled fields that lie
As far along as the starless roots of the sky;
I hear them crying from the water out of sight.

A melancholy and insatiable and inexplicable noise,
A loud whimpering between two silences,
The silence of starry life and this that is
The silence of Earth in pain of travail. . . .

There are other remarkable qualities in those lines than the use of accent; but that use is well worth the study of those who lack Mr. Symons's courage, science and taste.

Those who overlook the little volume of songs collected by Mrs. Meynell from the work of Father Tabb will miss a good thing. To Mrs. Meynell the making of this selection must have been a labour of love, and she has done it admirably; we know several things of this author's which we should like to have seen included; nothing is here that we could wish away. There is, indeed, much in Mr. Tabb that reminds us of Mrs. Meynell's own poetry, and much in Mrs. Meynell's that reminds us of Mr. Tabb. "My silence," sang Mrs. Meynell years ago (we quote from memory):

My silence, life returns to thee
In all the pauses of her breath;
Hush back to rest the melody
That out of thee awakeneth,
And thou, wake ever, wake for me!

Silence, too, appeals to Mr. Tabb:

Why the warning finger-tip
Pressed for ever on my lip?

To remind the pilgrim Sound
That it moves on holy ground,
In a breathing-space to be
Hushed for all eternity.

That is the whole of the poem; and many of these poems are no longer, for Mr. Tabb is perfect in petto; but what an immensity it opens up! Take again a poem that comes two pages later:

Night dreams of day, and winter seems
In sleep to breathe the balm of May.
Their dreams are true anon; but they,
The dreamers, then, alas, are dreams.

Thus, while our days the dreams renew
Of some forgotten sleeper, we,
The dreamers of futurity,
Shall vanish when our own are true.

There is, surely, a touch of genius, of inspiration, in so small a poem which can thus open up by suggestion a spiritual world: a little window that looks upon the infinite. One of Mr. Tabb's leading characteristics is his power of suggesting by the lightest of touches, the most delicate of hints, some mighty truth. His is the work of a mind in which the improving spirit is so strong that its lightest thoughts, its nugae, may be lit by the eternal. And that is one of the reasons why Mr. Tabb is not a mere epigrammatist in verse. For the rest, the deliciously tender songs of childhood, of flowers, of lament, the delicate fancies and symbols (now and then perhaps a little strained), and the sacred poems, which in their union of individuality and universality remind us often of the best of Herbert, are the work of one who is none the less a poet, because four lines often contain his thought.

When Mr. Walter de la Mare has been careful to clarify his thought and is a little stricter with himself in matters of technique, he will be a poet sure of deserved admiration.

Wilt thou never come again
Beauteous one?

So he begins a poem which contains much beauty and nothing so distressing as that terrible accented "one." He has fancy and imagination that are genuinely strong and rich, a large vocabulary and no fear of using it, and in general a sincerity and passion that lift him well above the imitative anæmic minor poet of the common run. In vivid little blank verse portraits, he shows us his reading of some of Shakespeare's characters; and he manages blank verse well. To Mr. Meredith he owes, probably, some of the manner of his expression, but he is no mere copyist. Vividness of feeling, and vividness rather than perfect aptness of expression are his; but it is pleasing to meet with a poet who is not afraid of his language and has thoughts and visions of originality and power.

Mr. Cooper's book is instinct with a grave, devout spirit, which finds expression in grave and appropriate verse. He makes frequent use of the sonnet-form and uses it like one who knows its powers and its limitations, and his lyrics are often supple and musical. There is always room for sincere, accomplished work like this, which, if lacking the magic of great poetry, has a thousand good qualities to make it acceptable.

THE ART OF THE NEEDLE

Etching and Engraving. A Handbook for the use of Students and Print-collectors. By Dr. FR. LIPPMANN. Third edition revised by Dr. MAX LEHRS. Translated by MARTIN HARDIE. (H. Grevel & Co., 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS "Handbook of the Royal Museums, Berlin," was originally compiled by the late Dr. Friedrich Lippmann, who died in October 1903, and it has been revised and added to by Dr. Lehrs and Dr. Elfried Bock. The translator has also added some references to English engravers.

The book aims at being a history of the art of engraving in Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, France, England, and Spain to the beginning of the nineteenth century, and will naturally be of special interest to students and collectors who have access to large collections, such as that upon which it is founded. Its scope is so wide that to the ordinary reader it causes a bewildered amazement at the industry of the authors. Some six or seven hundred artists are separately named, and, as the book consists of only three hundred pages, including one hundred and thirty-one illustrations in the text, there is scarcely space to convey a distinct idea of more than a few, and sometimes two or three are dismissed in a couple of lines. It is, for instance, difficult to learn much of an engraver of whom nothing is said except that he "was as superficial in drawing as he was bungling in technique, and seems to have taken pride in distorting the originals of his prints." But these shortcomings, which are the necessary result of compression, only serve to emphasise the merits of a learned treatise, which is not only comprehensive, but so well written that we scarcely appreciate, as we read, the industry and learning necessary for such a task. It begins with a sketch of the Literature of Engraving, and a careful description of the Technique of Engraving, though the latter is not, of course, brought up to date. The modern method of aquatinting on a dust ground, for instance, is not mentioned.

The first chapter naturally deals with engraving in Germany to the time of Dürer, whose career is carefully followed from his apprenticeship in the goldsmith's shop in Nuremberg to his death in 1528. But the two remaining periods—to the end of the sixteenth century, and to the end of the eighteenth century—are left until later, so as to make the whole scheme chronological as well as ethnological. The book ends with a chapter on colour-prints.

The illustrations give only a faint idea of the beauty and interest of the originals. They are all inserted in the text, which is printed upon a hard, shiny, unsympathetic paper; and in many cases only part of the original design is reproduced. The objects of this method are to show the detail of the same size as the original and to give an indication of the engraver's style, but it is a doubtful expedient, and, to take one or two instances at random, no one unacquainted with the subject could form even a fair idea of the work of Ruisdael or Claude or Rembrandt from the examples given. For purposes of reference it would have been just as well to have given the whole picture on a reduced scale. In his zeal for historical research and the literary side of his subject the author has perhaps been inclined to underestimate the vast importance of design in all original black-and-white work. Claude's Le Bouvier is a case in point. However, even without any illustrations the book would have been of fascinating interest to the numerous and increasing class of people who love prints and are anxious to increase their knowledge of them. As a handy volume for reference it will always be useful to those whose horizon has hitherto been limited by Dürer and Bartolozzi.

The author expresses his opinion on all points with great confidence and is not often detected in an error. He is possibly wrong in estimating Callot's work at only fifteen hundred prints, instead of sixteen hundred and fifty, and it is disappointing to find no clue to the enigma of Van Dyck's connection with the "Iconographie," or Centum Icones. It is scarcely correct to say that excudit refers to publication, and various other positive statements are generally considered open to discussion; but these are small blemishes in so complicated a work.

The description of "nielli" is especially interesting. Mr. Frederick Goulding, the well-known printer, in giving a lecture upon his art to the Art-Workers' Guild some years ago, related Vasari's story of its discovery by the Florentine goldsmith, Maso Finiguerra, in the fifteenth century. The first "proof" from a metal plate was supposed to be an impression taken from an engraved "pax" used in the services of the Church of San Giovanni in Florence. It was discovered by Zani in 1737 in the Print Collection in Paris. Dr. Lippmann, however, states that the story is inaccurate, and that Zani was deceived, because the print not only came from a copy of the Florentine "pax," but the original was probably not the work of Finiguerra at all, but of another Florentine, Matteo Dei. He further states that the complete development of the process of taking impressions from engraved plates was reached in Germany at a much earlier period than the supposed discovery attributed by Vasari to Finiguerra in 1458, and also earlier than the Paris impression of the niello plate executed by Matteo Dei in 1455. He adds that in Italy the art of engraving was plainly developed quite independently of the niello.

By way of substantiating this statement, we suppose, he follows it up with a careful description of nielli and false nielli, and traces the rise of engraving in Italy in the fifteenth century, devoting considerable space to the subsequent influence of Marc-Antonio Raimondi.

The chapter on engraving in England is very brief, and not up to the standard of the rest of the work. It is not planned on the same scale. The only illustration of genuine English work is a poor "detail" of Hogarth's Laughing Audience. We have not seen the earlier editions, but we conclude that for some reason Dr. Lippmann did not include England in the scope of his work. It is obvious from what has been added by the translator that this leaves a considerable gap, and really makes the outline historically defective. The translator has evidently done his share of the work with great care, though it is perhaps not too much to say that the book was not originally written for English readers. It will, however, now interest many of them.

THE GRAVE

"How many guests this house receives!"

Said I, with wondering mind;

"As if in dream these children go

In by that hospitable door which leaves

Not one refused behind.

"Its windows glimmer clear and cold,

Lightless and comfortless;

Untended in its garden grow

Darnel and brier, and gnarled and old

Yew-trees and cypresses.

"But plain it is to see how full

Of joy these children are.

Did ever yet so bright a hue

Burn clear in cheeks so beautiful

Or eyes outshine a star?

"And yet what tears each mother showers!

How lamentable a cry

Breaks from the heart when each hath passed

Into those still and shadowy bowers

Whence cometh no reply!

"Yet never saw I calmer night

Than arches o'er their peace;

Starless and still the dark leaves hang

Where sings the sad bird out of sight

Beauteous in loneliness . . ."

"Dark stood that house; solitary

Rose its unechoing wall;

Faint with faint hope Love seemed to cry

Out of its vast obscurity:

Love's—else no voice at all.

WALTER DE LA MARE.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

IX. RENUNCIATION

WITHOUT the desire to possess, and even to amass, there would be little interest in life, and scarcely any stimulus to work. But to the majority of men and women—at least to the wisest of them—a time is reached when the passion for accumulation has spent itself; and this is succeeded, in all normal experience, by a state of contentedness with little, and a relish rather for giving than receiving. Then it is that the significance of the words "It is more blessed to give than to receive," becomes a matter of experience. But this implies—and carries with it—the virtue of renunciation. There is a conscious surrender, the giving up of much that flesh and blood desire; but the oblation is carried on, in obedience to an inner impulse, prompted and guided by an alter ego in us, which is more or less consciously the Divine within the human. The agent becomes not only willing to renounce much for the sake of other lives—to serve them by giving up what might have been retained, and legitimately enjoyed—but glories in it, as obedience to the chief, perhaps the central, law of the Universe.

Reference is not made here and now to the rich philanthropist giving his goods to feed the poor, parting with things external to benefit those who have need of them: but (what is much rarer) the willingness to forego the means of further intellectual or esthetic life, the pathways to culture and refinement, that others may have fuller access to them. It is a familiar fact that in the straitened circumstances of many a household all its members cannot have equal access to these; and the willingness to sacrifice self in these directions is as rare as it is noble. For—as is well known—self-culture is often pursued in very selfish ways.

But there is more than this. I have known persons extraordinarily endowed with the gift of friendship, with the power of acquiring, retaining, and blessing others by it; and I ask is it possible to renounce even that, for the sake of others? to give up a cherished friendship, that the friend in question might have a richer life with other lives? Is that utopian? and is it unknown? Something like it existed in the great monastic brotherhoods, in their founders and leaders, and the units that belonged to the fraternities. They realised the transiency of every tie, even that which bound them to their own order; and the renunciation of these "saints" was more wonderful than that of Buddha. They felt that "the place which knew them" would soon "know them no more at all for ever," that they would—one and all—be utterly forgotten as individuals; but they believed that their work would live, after they had entered into the Unseen. Friendship may be so intense, and strong, and purified that, even in the act of renunciation the tie which unites kindred souls may be exalted and rarefied. It may become a chain of purest gold, so refined that no future alchemy can alter it, and "neither life nor death nor any other creature" can effect an alteration on it.

There are other aspects of this theme, phases of Renunciation, not to be overlooked. There is, for example, the feeling—which may be not only tranquil, but joyous—that one has passed through an experience, and is done with it, e.g., having possessed property but having no more use of it personally, accompanied with the genuinely serene delight of giving it away to others, and to great causes as well as to less fortunate individuals. One of the very noblest and richest experiences is the luxury of being without much that once was clung to, but has now become a burden, or Something between a hindrance and a help.

Another phase of this almost exhaustless subject is the cheerful setting aside of things, never to be experienced, or taken up again, not because their being so taken up would (so to say) soil the hands of the workers, but because those who formerly dealt with them have other things to think of and to do, other duties to discharge. And so, even a single glance backwards might be a mistake. It might distract and enervate, more specially if the retrospect kept one halting between two opinions, or actions.

But, while there is nothing (me judice) like sacred friendship to uplift a character into higher realms, and make it bear fruit in the noblest ways, it is strange to find that it sometimes falls into channels in which its glory fades. There is such a thing as selfish friendship, the wish "to possess and to be possessed" by another spirit alone—that impossible longing of so many over-ardent spirits. But, per contra, when renunciation blends with attainment, and surrender is the twin-sister of possession, then—and perhaps then only—can the proudest experience be realised of a "peace that passeth understanding."

Many have known what it was to have the collecting mania, and to be carried away for a time by the passion to possess rarities which no one else possesses, be they books, or pictures, or coins, or gems, or bric-a-brac. While at an auction, or in a sale-room, the collector seldom realises that the treasures he secures must themselves be dispersed by-and-by. He glories in his accumulations, as in a hobby or a fad. But how many collectors dispose of their treasures again in their own lifetime? Certainly those who give them freely away, rather than bequeath them by legacy, have a double satisfaction, first that they once possessed them, and secondly that by their renunciation others are now having a new property in them.

How often we gain, by giving away what we possess! the truth embodied in the magnificent motto which suggested to George Frederick Watts his picture The Court of Death, "What I spent, I had; what I saved, I lost; what I gave, I have." But, the Renunciation, which gives its title to this paper, goes even deeper than that. If we give away, in the spirit embodied in the maxim of Him "who spake as never man spake" what we renounce was never our own property, only a thing committed to our keeping for a time; and we recover all our seeming loss in the very act of renunciation. Amongst the arcana of the inner life, however, there are many experiences which are a mystery to those unacquainted with it.

A millionaire was once told "Loss and gain are correlatives. If we gain, in one way, we lose in another, whether we know it, or know it not." "No," he replied, "I like always to gain, never to lose; always to rise, never to fall. That is my 'maxim.'" The answer was, "It is impossible. You will have to part with everything some day. Is it not wise to begin now? Surely fresh accumulation is henceforth quite useless to you." His reply need not be given. But this brief paper may conclude with the words of Abner in Robert Browning's Saul.

I believe it! 'tis Thou, God, that gives, 'tis we that receive;
Would I suffer for him that I love? So wouldst Thou, so wilt Thou!
So shall crown Thee the topmost, ineffablest, uttermost crown,
And thy Love fill infinitude wholly, nor leave up nor down
One spot for the creature to stand in. . . .
He who did most shall bear most; the strongest shall stand the most weak.

'Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for! my flesh, that I seek
In the Godhead! I seek and I find it.

Or, as as one of the saintliest of our hymn-writers put it,

If Thou shouldst call me to resign
What most I prize it ne'er was mine,
I only yield Thee what is thine.
Thy will be done.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

LITERARY FEEDING-BOTTLES

ON the part of many modern authors there seems to be a feeling that our classical writers ought to be translated into the language of our own day. It is a department of literature with which one feels only a very attenuated sympathy at its best, but on a few occasions it has been accomplished with distinction. Even Pope himself was not above simplifying Chaucer, and Charles and Mary Lamb constructed tales for children out of Homer and Shakespeare. Thus good precedent may be quoted for those who set themselves to perform a similar task in our own day. Perhaps here as elsewhere the end justifies the means. I for one cannot help thinking, however, that it is much better to turn out children to graze in a library than to spoil the freshness of great writing by presenting it in the lisps of infancy. We might take the case of Sir Walter Scott as an example. Mrs. Humphry Ward in one of her critical essays years ago remarked that he had many longueurs, and at least two popular novelists, Miss Braddon and Mr. S. R. Crockett, have tried to retell his tales so as to fit them for children. Now, as a matter of fact, the boy or girl who is fitted to appreciate Scott would never discover the dulness to which

Mrs. Humphry Ward made allusion, and the language he uses certainly presents no difficulty to the child of to-day. How many thousands of boys and girls have had some of the most enjoyable hours of their lives following the fortunes of Wilfred of Ivanhoe or Quentin Durward! They might not in their early years enter into a full understanding of the tranquil humour of this great humanist, but we never heard any one of them complain that they could not make out the story.

A still more ridiculous venture has lately been attempted in a book of ballad stories compiled by Miss Mary Macleod. In this case the offence is extremely flagrant, because the ballads were meant for nothing if not for popular song and recitation. It would also take a writer of most exceptional ability to improve their literary merit. It is said that the fashion for old ballads has been considerably on the wane during recent years, but is it to be imagined that the treatment of, say, "Lizzie Lindsay," will send people back to them? The song is one of the prettiest in the Scottish language, and begins without introduction in the dramatic form that children and simple folk love.

Will ye go to the Highlands, Lizzie Lindsay,
Will ye go to the Highlands wi' me?
Will ye go to the Highlands, Lizzie Lindsay,
And dine on fresh cruds and green whey?

However, our authoress has given this an introduction that would be suitable to a story in the Family Herald.

In Edinburgh, two or three hundred years ago, there lived a lady whose name was Lizzie Lindsay.

Many other things are told about her.

She was young and wayward, and had been spoilt, perhaps, by too much flattery.

Donald Macdonald's invitation is thus Englished:

"Will you leave the south country, lassie, and go to the Highlands with me?"

and she answers quite in the style of the prim Board School girl:

"I should like to know first where I am going, and who I am going with."

Perhaps the most celebrated lines in it are those beginning:

And Lizzie's ta'en till her er stockings,
And Lizzie's ta'en till her her shoen;
And kilted up her green claitthing,
And awa' wi' young Donald she's gane.

The passage is thus Englished:

Then up sprang the young lady and drew on her shoes and stockings, and kilted up her green gown, and away she went with young Donald Macdonald.

In Miss Macleod's version, then, the spirit and the humour of the song have been allowed to evaporate completely. Of course she has worked in the variants which will be found in Professor Child's monumental work on ballads, but the result is calculated to give no idea whatever of the charm of the original. This criticism would apply even more to the story which has been worked out of the celebrated John Grumlie, which surely the children of Scotland have not forgotten. In this tale too Miss Macleod does not show that power of arresting attention possessed by the song-maker. She begins:

It was very rough weather; the wind blew and the rain poured down, Jock Grumlie, a small farmer of Auchtermuchty, who could tiddle out a can of beer well enough, loved neither cold nor hunger, and as he yoked his plough in the field he was in a very bad temper. All day he toiled in the driving sleet, and it was evening before he came to the end of the land and could drive his oxen home. As he came in, wet and cold, it added to his bad temper to see his wife sitting dry and clean before a blazing fire, enjoying a bowl of good soup.

The author does not emulate Burns with his direct

John Grumlie swore by the licht of the mune
And the green leaves on the tree,
That he could do more work in an hour
Than his wife could do in three.

She has only paraphrased what needed no paraphrase:

In Auchtermuchty there dwelt a man,
An husband, as I heard it tald,
Wha weel could tippie oat a can,
And neither lovit hunger nor cauld;
Till ance it fell upon a day,
He yokit his pleugh upon the plain,
Gif it be true as I heard say,
The day was foul for wind and rain.

He loosed the pleugh at the land's end,
And drave his oxen hame at e'en;
When he came in he lookit ben,
And saw the wife baith dry and clean,
And sitting at a fire beaking bauld,
With a fat soup, as I heard say,
The man being very weet and cauld,
Between thir twa it was nae play.

What a poor paraphrase of the ballad is the piece we have quoted will be evident from a perusal of the first two verses; and another point is that for modern children the adaptation is incomplete. Take a passage like the following:

He then hastened home to a distaff of tow, and sat down to try to spin; but he made a fine muddle of that, and soon gave up in despair.

It would be necessary to explain about a distaff before children could understand this. The proper translation of the passage would have been:

He then hastened home and sat down to a sewing-machine and tangled the threads.

The humour of the conclusion is completely lost in this:

With that the good-wife took up a stout stick, whereupon Jock quickly made for the door.

"Stop, stop, good-wife, I'll hold my tongue," he cried. "I know I am very much to blame. But henceforth I must mind the plough, and you must bide at home to look after the house."

The verse is:

Then up she gat a meikle rung,
And the gudeman made to the door;
Quoth he, "Dame, I shall haud my tongue,
For an we fecht I'll get the waur."
Quoth he, "When I forsook my pleugh
I trow I but forsook my skill;
Then I will to my pleugh again,
For I and this house will never do well."

It is a still more serious grievance that the poetry which makes these ballads immortal is allowed to go the way of the spirit and humour. Professor Dowden, who to our surprise writes a preface to this extraordinary mangling of old poetry, quotes the well-known saying of Philip Sidney: "I never heard the old song of Percie and Douglas, that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet." It is safe to say that he would have found nothing approaching to a trumpet in the story which is called here "The Hunting of the Cheviot." The death of Douglas, which is the most touching incident of the ballad, is told thus:

With that there came a swift arrow out of a mighty shower, and it struck Earl Douglas in at the breast-bone. Through lungs and liver went the sharp arrow, so that never after he spoke again but once. And this was what he said:

"Fight ye, my merry men, whilst ye may, for my life's days are gone."

But how much more of narrative charm there is in the ballad on the Battle of Otterbourne:

But Percy, with his good broadsword,
That could so sharply wound,
Has wounded Douglas on the brow,
Till he fell to the ground.

Then he called on his little foot-page,
And said, "Run speedily,
And fetch my ain dear sister's son,
Sir Hugh Montgomery."

"My nephew good," the Douglas said,
"What recks the death of ane!
Last night I dreamed a dreary dream,
And I ken the day's thy ain."

"My wound is deep; I fain would sleep;
Take thou the vanguard of the three,
And hide me by the braken bush,
That grows on yonder lily lea."

"O bury me by the braken bush,
Beneath the blooming brier,
Let never living mortal ken,
That a kindly Scot lies here."

He lifted up that noble lord,
Wi' the saut tears in his e'e;
He hid him in the braken bush,
That his merry men might not see.

It would be a distasteful business to go through all these stories from the ballads, and show how their splendid verses have been mutilated and desecrated. We trust that no one who has the reading of children in his charge will ever place before them this introduction to a unique and splendid body of poetry, and a very lively regret must be felt that a scholar of such world-wide fame as Professor Dowden should have lent his countenance to the performance.

A.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Poetry of William Blake," by A. Clutton-Brock.]

FICTION

Rezánov. By GERTRUDE ATHERTON. (Murray, 6s.)

WHEN Luis Argüello, the young Spanish colonist in California, first met Rezánov, the Russian diplomat who arrived one spring morning in 1806, Luis vowed that Rezánov was the one man who had fulfilled his ideal of the grand seigneur. And such is Rezánov. In him Mrs. Atherton has endeavoured to draw a man of far-reaching aims and noble aspirations and the qualities which comprise greatness: but for all her knowledge and good writing she has not been able to endow him with much life. With Concha, the stately Spanish girl, she has been far more successful. Her figure moves brilliantly amidst the life and rich surroundings of the colony, the atmosphere of which has been finely realised. Rezánov is not the most interesting of Mrs. Atherton's books; it is, however, in our opinion, the best written and the most carefully studied work of hers which we have had the pleasure of seeing.

Back o' the Moon, and other Stories. By OLIVER ONIONS. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

MR. ONIONS is a writer of rare power and brilliance. No one who reads "Back o' the Moon" and the few short stories which fill up the volume can miss the extraordinary vividness of the scenes he paints. The means he employs are of the simplest; all seems to flow as easily as could be, and yet it must have taken not only an almost fierce imagination but the unwearied and adroit labour of the file to build up such sharp, living, almost tangible images as the scene round the smelting-furnace on the moors or the moor-fire, in the title-story, or the life-boat episode in "The Fairway." Old Yorkshire is again Mr. Onions's scene and subject; a place of coiners, illicit miners, Bow Street "detectives" as we should call them now, blood, savagery and full, hot life. If his topics are almost brutal, his characters are nearly all good men or women and true, and he draws them in good broad strokes that show them as they were. This is fine work and holds the seeds, we believe, of even finer.

The Modern Way (eight examples). By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

SIX close little studies of the sentimentalities, the loves and the shrinkings of very ordinary people; one queer story of a very extraordinary man which is quite out of place in this drawing-room sort of volume, and one little lecture on economics delivered by a rich man who does not know what he is talking about. The six little studies are all capital, full of minute imagination, observation and dry humour, and told with the skill of a practised author who knows the rules of the game. They present no particular view of life, and are connected by no one idea that we can discover; but they are good comedy. The queer story is very queer and haunting: we can imagine some modern Frenchman of the symbolist school making a picture of it—the thick wood and the white lilies, the corpse being lowered into the grave, the old and bibulous men raising champagne glasses to their tremulous lips, the seedily clad woman throwing on to the coffin a bunch of wax flowers. For the interpretation of the enigma, readers must turn to Mrs. Clifford's story.

Tales of Old Sicily. By ALEXANDER NELSON HOOD. (Murray, 6s.)

MR. NELSON HOOD has already written so well of Venice that he might have been trusted to catch the spirit of Sicily. And in order to do so, he has wisely gone back to classical times, the beliefs and passions and fears of which he links up with those of the present day, believing, and rightly, that the Sicilian of to-day is greatly affected by his ancestor and the worship of which his beautiful island was a centre in its palmy days. There is nothing remarkable, there is much that is old-fashioned and simple in his plots: but in this author's work we care little for the plot. What is to be valued is his atmosphere, his realisation of the spirit of the place, and of history that haunts it; and his work has a strong and individual charm of its own.

The Sinews of War. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS and ARNOLD BENNETT. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

WHEN two such experts as Mr. Eden Phillpotts and Mr. Arnold Bennett lay their ingenious heads together to produce a blood-curdling melodrama, we naturally expect something "perticler 'earty." And we are naturally disappointed to find a story that is at times actually dull and is never really thrilling. There is much clever invention and some charming descriptions of Nature, which are quite out of place, but the novel, as a whole, is a failure, and does not arrest the attention—the kind of failure, however, which, we surmise, took very little time to perpetrate, and paid exceedingly well. Almost the last words of the hero and heroine afford pertinent comment on the point. "Look at the reward!" replied he. "Ah!" she breathed. "Money! Is it worth—?"

A Spinner in the Sun. By MYRTLE REED. (Putnams, 6s.)

THE principal actors in this story are a veiled lady, an erratic store-keeper, a "shirk," and the "shirk's" son—a youth who, at a most inopportune moment, reminds his father that their name (Dexter) "means 'right.'" The reader (if one can be found) will meet the veiled lady returning to a lonely house after an absence of twenty-five years. She came—carrying tea and laudanum—at midnight, but she was "fearless of the night because Life had already done its worst to her!" This mysterious person was, as a young girl, extremely beautiful, and engaged to the "shirk," whom she saved from the result of an explosion at the risk of her life. Being badly burned, she was taken to a hospital, which, curiously enough, contained a similar case bearing a similar name. Owing to this coincidence a mistake arose, and Dexter was told that the genuine Evelina's face would be disfigured for life. It was then that he "shirked." Evelina, on discovering the fickleness of man, veiled her face; but after twenty-five years she threw the veil aside, finding that the erratic store-keeper possessed a heart capable of true affection. The "shirk," overcome by the result of his lack of dexterity in managing affairs, resorted to laudanum, or rather to "the silken petals of the poppies, crushed into the peace that passeth all understanding," and the "right" man was rewarded by the "surpassing beauty" of his unveiled lady. Our description of the plot is sufficient comment.

The Iron Gates. By ANNIE E. HOLDSWORTH. (Unwin, 6s.)

MRS. LEE HAMILTON has done, and can do, better work than "The Iron Gates." Her theme is a good one, and the opening chapters are cleverly written and show unusual observation and sympathetic understanding of the lower classes. But their promise is never fulfilled. The author, once launched upon her book, appears to have been unable to decide what course, if any, she should pursue, and the result of her decision—if she arrived at a decision at all, which we are inclined to doubt—is a feeble mixture of careful and clever work, unconvincing "realism," impossible characters, bathos, and unprofitable and unpleasant attempts at satire. Dunstane Momerie, Miss Cardrew, Malden, Lady Dartmoor, and the rest, are caricatures; and Zo, the only character who appears to have interested the author at all, is spoiled by exaggeration: her speech is as grand as that of Mr. Hardy's Tess. The Miss Cardrew sketched by Mrs. Lee Hamilton would no more have written the book which placed its writer "among the star-crowned company of the immortals" than would a Times reviewer have penned so inane a criticism.

A Little Brown Mouse. By MARIA E. ALBANESI. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)

"THE cutest, cunningest, little creature" is what Corinthia Besant calls the Little Brown Mouse, and her graphic American phrase describes that bewitching little personality to perfection. Corinthia herself is no less fascinating, and the story of her life at the old farm and the manner in which she and the Brown Mouse, between them, manage to free their Lion, John Harland, from the meshes of the net in which he has voluntarily entangled himself is charming in itself and charmingly told. Misfortune has made the Lion surly, and he grows a good deal during the process of his liberation, but the American girl and her little friend work on undaunted. He is released, only to fall captive to Corinthia's bright eyes; what was nearly a tragedy becomes a love tale; and we leave her "crying for happiness on his heart, while upstairs the Little Brown Mouse is singing softly to her dolls."

FINE ART

SOCIETY EXHIBITIONS

No one who has a real love for the fine arts can regard exhibitions otherwise than as necessary evils. A picture, it will be admitted, looks its best in the studio of the painter or in the private apartments of his patron; but since some sort of exhibition seems to be necessary nowadays in order that paintings may find their way from the one to the other, the only point to be considered which is the lesser evil, a limited number of large exhibitions or an unlimited number of small. To compare the merits of either system is a matter of no great difficulty, for the first is as much favoured by France as the second is by England. In some respects the first system has its conveniences. To visit the four great annual exhibitions at Paris, that of the "Independents" in the Spring, the "old" and "new" salons in the summer, and the autumn salon towards the close of the year, is to be conversant practically with all contemporary French art that is worth knowing. If we select as the four most important exhibiting bodies in England the Royal Academy, the New Gallery, the International Society, and the New English Art Club, we feel at once that by limiting our attention to these we shall be ignorant of a great deal that is worthy of study. We should know nothing of the work of Messrs. Footet, Cayley Robinson, Walter Bayes, and J. D. Fergusson, for example; nothing of the graving of Mr. T. Sturge Moore and Mr. Gordon Craig; little if anything of Sir James Guthrie, and many another distinguished Scottish artist. Even if the four English exhibitions already mentioned were conducted in less of a party spirit than now obtains, their scope would have to be greatly extended before they could claim to be fully representative, for the grand total of their combined exhibits does not at present greatly exceed the number contained in the smallest of the four Paris salons.

If the English system saves us the weariness of pacing through the endless galleries of Parisian picture-marts, it nevertheless entails a more continuous attendance of exhibitions. The dealers we have always with us, in Paris as well as London, but in the latter city they are at once more numerous and more insistent. Unholy alliances are made between dealers and societies, and the multiplication of the second appears only to increase the prosperity of the first.

These reflections have been prompted by the opening within the last few weeks of an extraordinary number of society exhibitions, and the announcement of still more to open in the immediate future. Of themselves these exhibitions would be of no great importance, were it not for the fact that among much that is bad or indifferent may be found a little good that is not to be seen elsewhere. The oldest of these societies, the Royal Society of British Artists, would in any case demand special attention this year when it opens under a new president, Mr. Alfred East. The collection of works now on view at Suffolk Street is not greatly different from the collections shown under the presidency of the late Sir Wyke Bayliss, whose painstaking but harsh church interiors are allotted a memorial side-show; and it may be questioned whether the society has not lost more by the absence of Mr. F. Cayley Robinson than it has gained by the presence of Mr. Alfred East and Professor Hubert von Herkomer. A society does not gain in strength by electing members who already possess a more widely known outlet for their best work, and a little serious thinking should have convinced the British Artists that their best hopes for the future lay without instead of within the Royal Academy. If the Suffolk Street galleries are turned into a Royal Academy annexe, as the New Gallery is in summer, they can only suffer like the New Gallery in reputation and individuality. Already the prestige of the Suffolk Street institution is about as low as it could well be, and by opening its doors to work, however feeble, that is sent by a member, and by shutting them to work, however good, that is submitted by a non-member, its prestige is unlikely to improve. If reform is desired it must be twofold; the society must rid itself of those members who bring it no honour, and must welcome work, even by non-members, which will give to its exhibitions an individual character and distinction which at present they hardly possess. Bad as things are, they might be worse, for the society still contains a nucleus of members whose work has distinction. Messrs. Fred F. Footet, W. Graham Robertson, J. D. Fergusson, Wynford Dewhurst, John Muirhead, Tom Robertson, and the new member, Mr. Louis Grier, may be named as the most conspicuous examples, and it is worthy of note that these members, whose work is artistically the mainstay of the society, exhibit seldom, if ever, elsewhere. It must not be inferred that all the remaining exhibits are negligible; there are deft water-colours by Mr. George C. Haite, a well-composed and richly painted Temple of Concord, Girenti (83), by Mr. Arch. H. Elphinstone, Constablesque landscapes and a Whistlerian portrait study by Mr. D. Murray Smith, and two landscapes, decorative if a little lacking in quality, by the president. But though these and a few other works may not be without charm of one kind or another, they do not have the distinction, are not achievements so complete and personal as Mr. Wynford Dewhurst's The Angel Bridge, Henley (40), or Mr. Fred F. Footet's beautiful Sunset: Rose and Gold (142), and his impressive full-length character-study, The Accused (80).

The Society of Twenty-Five English Painters, who are displaying their wares at Messrs. Dowdeswell's galleries, is of less importance to the investigator, because the work of the majority of the members may be seen at the International or other exhibitions. For fear of misunderstanding it may be well to add at once that from a broader artistic standpoint it is far more important and interesting, maintaining a much higher standard of craftsmanship than can be found at Suffolk Street. Although only in its second year the society has undergone considerable changes owing to the death of Mr. James Charles, and the retirement of Messrs. D. Y. Cameron, J. S. Hill, Harrington Mann and Miss Mary Cameron. The defection of Mr. Cameron is a heavy loss to the society, but on the whole it more than maintains its position with the help of its new members, Messrs. R. Anning Bell, J. R. K. Duff, Sydney Lee, W. W. Russell, Montague Smyth and Miss Constance Halford. The work of these painters, and of original members like Mr. Hornel, Mr. Bertram Priestman and Mr. George Houston—the last showing this year a distinct advance—is so well known that our immediate purpose will be better served by directing attention to one of the Twenty-Five who does not exhibit elsewhere. Though he enjoys the esteem of painters themselves of no mean reputation, Mr. Cecil Rea is practically unknown to the public, and therefore the unfamiliarity added to the artistic qualities of his richly coloured nude and a figure composition possessing something of the dignity of Watts and something of the luxuriance of Etty render them the most distinctive works which the society has to offer.

Two minor members of the Twenty-Five, Messrs. Dudley Hardy and H. Hughes Stanton, are more naturally classed with the London Sketch Club, for the most part a modest company of illustrators who now and again escape into colour from the bondage of black and white. The current exhibition of the club at Messrs. Graves's galleries contains a good deal that has charm, but little that shows a distinction and strong personal feeling, if we except Mr. A. J. Mavrogordato's happily caught London scenes and his dexterous impression of Wrestling at the Olympian Games at Athens.

Two more minor society exhibitions deserve notice as much for their promise as their actual performance, the Cheyne Art Club at Mr. Baillie's gallery (54 Baker Street), and the Essex Arts Club in the Essex Museum (Romford Road, Stratford). Saving the president (Mr. Mark Fisher) of the latter body, the contributors to these two exhibitions are artists as yet unknown, having their spurs to win. The Cheyne painters—J. Hodgson Lobley, T. F. Blaylock, and James Wallace especially—are to be praised for the good quality and restraint shown in their painting; the men of Essex, less restrained, for their preoccupation with truth to nature's lighting. Both groups are well worth watching, and in Mr. Charles Pibworth the Cheyne Art Club possess a young sculptor of considerable talent.

It is as easy to be enthusiastic about the House of Lords as about the Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours, whose winter exhibition opened last Monday. Both institutions demand our indulgence by reason of their age, and the docility of those members who "do nothing in particular and do it," if not very well, at all events with tolerable success. To drop the analogy, conspicuous talent is rare at Pall Mall East, and that talent, where present, seldom employed to the best advantage. No one disputes the great gifts of Mr. Walter Crane, but those gifts are not displayed to their best advantage in his semi-realistic sketches of seas and shores. The beautiful drawing, the loving carefulness with which details are expressed but kept in their place, cannot blind us to the fact that Mr. E. R. Hughes, in his highly-wrought portrait, The Mantilla (113), treats water-colour as the "little masters" of Holland treated oils. Of its kind it is beautiful work, but it is done in the wrong medium, and therefore the charm of water-colour is lost without the strength of oil being attained. For sheer distinction Mr. Arthur Rackham's tinted drawings easily bear the palm. Here water-colour is used frankly as an adjunct to pen and ink, and with the mixed medium Mr. Rackham obtains results as personal, as peculiar to himself, in execution as in expression. Whether he is illustrating Mr. Kipling's Puck of Pook's Hill (115, 37), or Grimm's Valiant Little Tailor (44), Mr. Rackham is invariably his original, whimsical self, humorously inventive, decoratively grotesque. In his water-colours, as in his cabinet oils at Dowdeswell's, Mr. Anning Bell shows his natural bent for mural decoration, packed into a portmanteau out of respect for modern demands. Here again is conspicuous talent, and if the best use is not made of it, the blame this time must not be laid on the painter. Mr. Clausen and Mr. Walter Bayes, who seems to be following the former's lead towards the light, are this year content to send moderate exhibits, interesting rather as indications of patient endeavour to interpret nature faithfully than as achievements of technical dexterity. Mr. Edwin Alexander sends some neat little studies of butterflies, far pleasanter to look upon than his larger representations of creatures of a larger growth.

MUSIC

SOME MODERN SONGS

A CLEVER writer has said that German music needs to go to sleep for a hundred years. It may be so, but the writer does not solve the problem by adding an infallible cure for insomnia in infants, and this infant shows itself very wakeful. The music of Max Reger is its latest ebullition of energy. It is as a song-writer that his work seems ripe for discussion. In other directions (his sonatas and other instrumental works) there is a good deal of vague experiment, but he handles the voice and the piano with such certainty of touch, that, whether the result be good or bad, it leaves no doubt that it is exactly what he intended. Moreover, in solo song a certain continuity is traceable through almost the whole line of German composers; Wagner is, of course, the great exception, and the fact that he made practically no contribution to the song-form shows, incidentally, that he stood apart from the general development of his country's music.

Mr. Ernest Sharpe, whose recitals of songs of one composer have been an interesting feature in a dull season of London concerts, lately took for two recitals Hugo Wolf and Max Reger. The songs, with all their modern colouring, follow the principle which German song has followed since it was first enunciated by Schubert—that it is the composer's duty to heighten the effect of the words by making his music express them more vividly, not to weaken them, by breaking the poem into fragments, or by repeating phrases until the form of the lyric is lost. Schubert achieved this by the use of every device known to his time, as regards freedom of harmony, modulation and rhythm, their use being regulated by perhaps the greatest genius for pure melody which has ever been known. We see the same process at work, though less distinctly, in the songs of Schumann, but very clearly in those of Brahms, with whom an infinitely greater power of self-criticism took the place of Schubert's wonderfully spontaneous melody. Whatever form it took, the purely musical element was always strong enough in these compositions to prevent the music sinking to a merely subordinate position while they gave to the words their due, and the result was an extraordinarily happy blend of words with music, which has hardly been equalled in any other species of art in which both words and music have a part.

In modern German song, of which Richard Strauss, Hugo Wolf, and Max Reger may be taken as representative, this principle seems no less strong. With all the resources of sound, which such composers bring to composition, it is remarkable that nothing is allowed to interfere with the continuity of the poem. Repetition of words is almost disused, and their feeling for the accent in the poem is acute. While every one will allow to them these merits, not every one will grant to them the positive sense of musical beauty, which is the other party to the agreement. Of Strauss's idiosyncrasies it is not necessary to speak here. It is, after all, by his orchestral music that he must be judged primarily, but since Wolf's career is ended it appears that his songs were his most important contribution to music, and up to the present the same may be said of Reger. If Wolf carried the art of modulation to its extreme limits, then Reger in going further has dispensed with key altogether. Obviously it is impossible to modulate unless some key is established as a starting-point, but in some of his songs, although for no very clear reason he gives them a key signature, the music never from the first chord till the last bears any definite relation to one key. Schubert experimented in this direction. A very simple case is his "Meeresstille," which, except that it begins and ends on a chord of C major, has no definite key system, but moves on from chord to chord to accompany the free vocal melody. A more extended case is his "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," a song which, starting from the note C, passes by a series of sequences at once through a number of unrelated keys, summing up with passages which make the ending quite clearly in C minor. This might form an interesting comparison with Reger's Präludium, beginning:

Sturm, wie lieb ich dich
Wilden Gesellen,

the wildest song in this respect which Mr. Sharpe sang. It illustrates the fact, which nowadays is becoming somewhat of a truism, that there is no combination or succession of sounds in the musical gamut which cannot be included in the resources of music. Its effect is that of powerful vocal declamation against a background of utterly chaotic musical sound. Only taken in conjunction with other songs is it recognisable as the work of a musician and not that of a madman. Songs such as "Herzensstausch" and "Beim Schneewetter" show Reger dealing with the other end of the long range of musical expression, a simple melody richly, but perfectly intelligibly harmonised by the piano accompaniment. Now, in "Der Himmel hat eine Thräne geweint" and "Haienaacht" and others, we find the same sort of freedom which is illustrated in the songs of Schubert above mentioned, though carried rather further; an intentional vagueness of key occasioned by the rapid though smooth passage from one key to another. Thus far he is easily judged; every change of key or unconventional progression of harmony is justified where it enables him, as in Schubert's "Meeresstille," to gain a more beautiful or expressive melodic outline than the simple progression could give. Often it does this; "Der Himmel hat eine Thräne geweint," for instance, leaves a sense of complete melody roaming freely, yet centring round the key of E major. But there are cases—the little "Sehnsucht" seemed to be one—where although the actual amount of this unconventional movement may be less, one is tempted to ask, is it worth while? There is a feeling that he must have been at some trouble to find a succession of notes which should set the harmony master at defiance, and that his tune would have been better, and his song would have made a surer appeal without such devices. With the "Präludium" there is no such feeling. Good or bad, it must have been conceived as a whole to have been written at all. It is, in fact, a genuine thought, a piece of sound which no one could have dared to put on paper unless he had first heard it inwardly. If there is any such thing as positive ugliness where only the sounds of the chromatic scale are employed, it comes within that category; but if the defence that he meant it to be ugly and that if he had wanted to write something beautiful he could have done so can be granted to an artist, Reger certainly has a right to that defence, in view of his other songs of which specimens have been named. Another case of his use of the extreme possibilities of musical sound to produce his effect is the song with which Mr. Sharpe began his recital, "Merkspruch." Here again the spontaneity of the method of writing cannot be doubted, and the effect of the violent dissonances is indisputable. Reger must be acknowledged to have the whole range of musical sound at his command, and it must further be granted that he uses it with discretion; he does not merely like a child play with his latest acquired toys of dissonance. Is he then a great song-writer? Judged by the standards of to-day he certainly is, but there used to be and still is a quality in the greatest art, which is somewhat overlooked now. The old prophet struck water from the rock, the modern engineer conveys it by an elaborate series of aqueducts and reservoirs; and from the parched and dry harmonies of tonic and dominant the old masters caused a stream of melody to flow which even now refreshes the weary. The musical engineering of to-day is very fine, but where is the miracle?

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE MODERN PICTURE-MARKET

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Layard invites me "or any one else" to undertake and develop the scheme he has proposed. If any one else who has more weight and more status than I have will come along and take up the work it would be expedient that I should retire, in spite of my expressed willingness to help with clerical work. I have positively no leisure to spare. Nevertheless, rather than suffer the scheme to be stillborn, and as, after all, the article which set it afoot was my own, I will stand by. But it must not be one's responsibility alone. Would not the first step be a meeting at some room in town when next Mr. Layard is in London? His warm supporters might also be induced to attend. We could then put the affair upon a proper basis—a thing we could never do at the expense of your correspondence columns.

A word as to your contributor who somewhat disingenuously suggests that my contention of a depressed picture-market is a "mare's nest." He says that thirty pictures have been sold at the Institute in the first fortnight, and thirty at the R.B.A. in the first week. So far from this exposing the "fallacy" I should regard it as strong evidence on my side. Sixty pictures and a population of six millions! in the richest art-centre in the world, where thousands of pounds are spent daily on pure luxuries! The first week or two, it is well known, have practically all the sales in a gallery. After that period it is a question of gate-money. These sixty pictures do not form a very large proportion of, say, the six hundred works at both places (this computation includes a guess at the Institute total) not to mention the crowds of "crowded out."

The matter of the Scottish Modern Arts Association is, of course, delightful reading; but that is something to come, and may be regarded as an alleviation of a deplorable state of things.

F. C. TILNEY.

74 Pellatt Grove,
Wood Green, W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In my letter of last week I ventured to lay it down that "the artist must be content at first to sell his pictures for what they will fetch, not for what in his opinion they are worth . . . and the time will probably come when he will find that the money he gets is more, much more, than his work is worth."

I am therefore the more delighted and surprised that there is at least one distinguished artist who is now acting up to that principle, and is offering his highly individual work at public auction, without reserve. I know nothing of Mr. Wynford Dewhurst personally, and before this appears in print his second annual sale will have taken place at Willis's Rooms, so that there can be no suspicion that this is an artfully contrived advertisement. But he knows that sooner or later his work, from the commercial point of view, is bound to rest upon the firm basis of public opinion as expressed under the hammer and he prefers that this expression shall come sooner than later, assured that thereby the proper relationship between it and the public will be established during his lifetime.

That is good sense. That is good business. That leaves him free from the shackles which stultify the work of "successful" artists who are in league with men of commerce. And I, for one, shall watch the result of his bold bid for proper recognition with eager interest, knowing that if the world wants his work it will say so in the unmistakable language of pounds, shillings, and pence, and that if it does not he had much better, if he wants to make a living, throw aside his brush and take to doing something that the world will pay him for.

G. S. LAYARD.

November 13.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—For sure, all your readers who are possessed of the sporting instinct and who are not artists will welcome Mr. Layard's suggestion: for myself, I simply acclaim it.

Though I have not the advantage of a large or very commodious house, the long walls of my bed-sitting room are nothing if not chaste—nude though they be. This I say for the benefit of the young artist, who would, I am sure, welcome so fair an opportunity of arranging his own scheme of decoration. I would allow him entire freedom in the matter, and if obligation be considered, it is I who would be eternally under the same to him.

As to my prospective buying friends, they are numerous (and costly to me), and I have not the slightest doubt that Jones (whom your readers would best identify by his striking resemblance to Mr. Weevle of "Bleak House" fame) would buy almost anything I deigned to exhibit—always, of course, provided the young artist remembers "everything is worth the money that can be got for it," and NO MORE.

What more can I say? Only that I am thinking or writing to Messrs. Maple and Broadwood with a view to extending this admirable method of sale. The Times does for me all I require (and more?) in the way of books.

Trusting this generous offer will meet with a like response.

M. P.

THE NEW ART CRITICISM

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—I once called your attention to the fact that as a rule the adherents of what is known as the Impressionist School of art are also the adherents of Browning, this being perhaps natural, because both artists and poets of these types produce much that is inexplicable anyhow, and much that is explicable in many different ways. The subject is not available for logical argument, because in poetry, or art, or magic, what is not easily understood, or what is not comprehended at all, is usually set down as above the horizon of the observer by whomsoever is responsible for the poem, or picture, or conjuring trick. But while impressionist pictures and poems and even novels à la Meredith, all of which being more or less creations of fancy, may properly be receptacles for personal illusions and vagaries—while these do not surprise me, I must say I am overwhelmed with astonishment when I note that this same impressionism is making its way into art criticism itself, and actually into the columns of the ACADEMY, whose very name ought to act on the Impressionists as holy water upon the devil. For Mr. Robert Ross has founded a new school of criticism, that is, if he is to be taken seriously; and if not, then he owes to the public a volume to explain his jokes. Are we to understand that his critiques are intended as skeletons which readers must clothe with flesh, as the public are expected to complete a Whistler etching, or are we to understand that Art is so trivial a thing, that its most sacred principles, hallowed by centuries of reverent recognition and tradition, and sanctified by the approval and labour of a muster-roll of great men extending back more than two thousand years, are to be set up as Aunt Sallies to be shied at by articles of flippant irony whenever opportunity arises? If a negative is to be given to these questions, then what is the meaning of his article, "The Eclectic at Large," and particularly of the last section of it, in which are implied the most amazing principles that ever emanated from the pen of a critic. Professor Holmes, who has also a critical article in the ACADEMY of November 3, is perfectly clear. He makes no bones of things. He points out that Mr. Clausen, while an admirer of the Impressionists, is "just to Raphael" (and Ingres). This is evidently not intended for irony, notwithstanding that Professor Clausen apparently "doubts the practical usefulness of any rules of design." (What are we coming to?) But Professor Holmes usually explains what he means, which is an advantage he has over Mr. Ross, who seems to cry: "God save the hundred standards of modern landscape painting, and let whoso will be 'just to Raphael.'" Let us hang a veil over the Sistine Madonna and paste thereon a view of a mist at Battersea Bridge by Whistler.

MAN IN THE STREET.

PARACLETE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your Reviewer, dealing with Mr. Howard's "Savonarola," remarks:

"It is a small point—but surely 'Paraclete' is wrongly applied to the Second Person of the Trinity?"

Some people think small points are of importance. Mr. Howard probably took his theology from the Bible—a wise course surely—where we read (1 John ii. 1): We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." Paraclete is here rendered "advocate," in other passages "comforter," but apart from various renderings the fact remains that the second Person in the Holy Trinity is a Paraclete.

FRED. G. ACKERLEY.

November 13.

A MISPRINT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following misprint may divert some of your readers. Mr. Swinburne in his memoir of William Collins (Ward's "English Poets") said, to point the contrast between Collins and Gray: "The muse gave birth to Collins: she did but give suck to Gray." In Chambers's "Cyclopædia of English Literature," vol. ii. p. 368, I found the sentence thus: "Collins had and Gray had not, the gift of lyric song. . . . The muse gave verse to Collins: she did but give luck to Gray." For fatuity this would be hard to beat.

C. R. STONE.

"LOVE IN LONDON"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your Reviewer speaks so very favourably of this book of mine in the greater part of his notice that I feel it may seem a little ungracious in me to want to question his last three lines, which practically nullify all he has said before. I am not such an ass as to resent any opinion, but he raises a point that rather interests me. He observes that my writing "is a little lacking in originality," because my view of things "is not shaped by any one attitude towards life." I quite see that this might be sound criticism of a book of social treatises or personal essays, but in short stories one deals with characters whose attitudes towards life are various, and the author is concerned to present not his own outlook but theirs. Had I introduced into every story an insistence on my own attitude towards life I think your Reviewer would have found the effect monotonous, have complained of my limited range, my lack of dramatic detachment, the lack of insight that rendered me incapable of presenting any character who was not modelled on myself and endowed with my own views and opinions. I expect he would even have considered it very bad art on my part to be continually obtruding my own private attitude where it was not wanted. Surely a writer of fiction is not lacking in originality because he looks out on life from more than one window?

I hope this does not read like ill-natured quibbling, for I am not writing in that stupid spirit, but simply because I am interested and rather puzzled. Whether I am lacking in originality or not is beside the argument; it is a fact, one way or the other, over which neither your Reviewer nor I have any control; but I should like to console myself with the benefit of the doubt. Hasn't Shakespeare more than one attitude towards life, and is he therefore lacking in originality? Of course, I am not comparable to Shakespeare, but until now I have always regarded that as my misfortune.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

[Our Reviewer writes: I feel sure that you could not spare me the space to explain to Mr. Adcock my views upon attitude and originality; upon the creative instinct and how it is inspired differently at different times, and upon other interesting points. But I should like to point out that the expression "shaped by any one attitude towards life" is not synonymous with "introduce an insistence upon my own attitude," still less so with "continually obtruding my own private attitude" or with "looking out on life from one window."]

MALVERN HILL FUNICULAR RAILWAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As an "Old Malvernian" I beg leave to thank your "Spectator" for protesting against ruining Malvern Hills, celebrated by Macaulay, by Piers Plowman, and by the "Thersytes," for whom Mulciber promised to make arms unbreakable, even by a fall of the glorious "Camp."

H. H. JOHNSON.

PISCIS IN ULMO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The mixed metaphor of Sir William Hart Dyke's which you quote from the Cornhill in your number of October 27 is surely allowable. When the flood-gates of innovation are opened, where would you expect fish, large or small, to be found? Of course, Sir William was thinking of that other inundation mentioned by Horace, Odes, Bk. i. 2. When:

Piscium et summa genus haesit ulmo
Nota quae sedes fuerat columbis.

Evidently if classical quotations are now unknown in the House of Commons, classical allusions are not unknown.

G. G. ATKINSON.

November 6, 1906.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor Skeat seems to think I evaded his question as to whether I would rather spell sung songue, etc. If I did I assure him it was only because, to quote his words, I thought it "all nonsense." I would not spell sung songue, or rung songue, or swum swom, or lung longue; I don't wish to reform spelling. But though inquire and enquire are different forms of one word, I should, if reading or repeating either form, hope to indicate which. In the same way I should hope to indicate the spelling of tongue: without however approximating it to the singular, if there is one, of longs. These hopes, of course, refer principally to speaking in a large room, where it is necessary to speak clearly and avoid slipshod colloquial ways. How the o got into tongue, either according to my supposition or Professor Skeat's conviction, hardly matters; the point is that it is there, and by honourable employment has gained a value. No letters, however correct etymologically, have their full value except through use; and even the unsuccessful manufactured languages might become worthy instruments of expression if they could only be the mother-tongues of literary geniuses. Present-day orthography has acquired its excellence through excellent application.

I do not know Miss Soames's "Introduction to Phonetics," but should like to know whether or not the seventy-one spellings of the three vowel-sounds which Professor Skeat alludes to are all represented without other sound-signs than those employed in standard English; that is, by the unaided letters of our alphabet; but anyway the illustration does not affect my argument that with our present system of sound-signs a truly phonetic spelling cannot be attained. Either speech must be crippled to bring it within the bounds of orthography, or some latitude must be allowed to the individual who renders in speech the written word. So why attempt what must be either stultifying or impossible; allusive and indicative signs are surely better than so-called phonetic spelling which is not perfect.

Mr. Sandbach, in his lectures on "The Sounds of Modern English," delivered at Cambridge, after writing the words "phonetically" with letters and symbols, had occasionally to explain the more subtle distinctions by description and example; for as in different languages the same consonant (I say consonant because there is more analogy between the consonants of languages than their vowels) may be formed in a different part of the mouth, thus making a degree of that variation which in its total constitutes the foreign accent, so in one language almost identical sounds, like the hard c and k, may be differentiated. In beautiful speech the distinction between such sounds is not inaudible, though it is hardly noticeable. An accumulation of slightly mispronounced letters would thrust itself upon the ear.

Most people who have any feeling at all for words will find in reading Mr. Drummond's amusing letters that their pronunciation (or their mental pronunciation, for I hope everybody allows that in reading to oneself one both pronounces and hears mentally) is affected. Famous is contracted to famus, become to becum, would to wud (!); whilst with delightful inconsistency spellers becomes spellerz and spelling speling. Acknowledging some difference between hard c and ch we get diabolic and shock in all their homely familiarity; honey also retains the purity of its standard form (would Professor Skeat pronounce it as if written hunny?), whilst own and known take on a certain vernacular of oan and noun. Weary we are told is pronounced, and therefore I suppose written, weery! Shade of Mr. William Sharp, where would these idol-breakers banish the "inward music," the imaginative power of words?

The spelling arrived at by Mr. Drummond is a vehicle for humour, but for nothing else. It is not even science. And science is only the second stage of knowledge; beyond it, says Plotinus, is the third stage, illumination. It is this third stage which both in speech and literature informs true word-artists, who are the only legitimate reformers of language. They effect their reformation very simply; by influence, not by dogma.

GLADYS JONES.

"SPELLING GONE MAD"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—So long as we can hav letterz from Professor Skeat az the wun in your last issue, Mr. Wallis iz at liberty to designate "simplified speling" az "speling gon mad." It iz wonderful to lern how "simplified speling" wud not becum "simplified speling" but wud be "speling gon mad," becauz ov it being thrust upon the reading and riting wurd, i.e., the method turnz the simplified speling into "madness"; so that, according to Mr. Wallis's logic, it iz not now mad, only it may becum so; and even shud the present formz evolv themselvz into the sujested simplified speling, it wil be "wel and good." Mr. Wallis unwittingly aquits hiz victim ov the ugly charj ov mad'ness. "It iz not mad, Most Noble Mr. Wallis, but it speaks forth the wurdz ov truth and soberness." Not only iz it not mad, but Mr. Wallis picturez it az being "beutiful" in the eyes ov another jenerashon. If Mr. Wallis can thus bespeak a welcum for simplified speling and giv it hiz blessing, we imajin hiz bark iz wurs than hiz bite.

Mr. Wallis iz not happy in hiz defens ov the "groth" argument. I ask him if the wurdz grew, and how they grew? whether the human element woz not the chief factor, and the only reply he givz iz a reluctant confeshon that compositorz and uthertz modify speling, and that an organism is influenced by environment. Just so. If "compositor and uthertz," why not President Roosevelt, Mr. Carnegie, Professor Skeat, Dr. Murray, and "uthertz"?

"Standard spelling is the spelling of the day; ludicrous spelling is an arbitrary or ignorant departure from that standard. Chaucer's spelling was not ludicrous, and is not so now." The "spelling of the day" is Mr. Wallis's idol, ever mindful of what a compositor may bring forth to improve (?) the "standard." Professor Skeat must not offer any more "arbitrary and ignorant departures" from the standard spelling to the British Academy, nor publish pamphlets; nor must President Roosevelt decree that three hundred word-forms be the "standard" forms in government offices; and the "Simplified Spelling Board" must desist concocting departures from the "spelling of the day"!

Mr. Wallis propounds the strange proposition that thots cannot be adequately expressed to the eye in fonetic orthography. Then we may affirm, with certain exceptions, that the thots and aspirations of Greek, Latin, Spanish, German, Welsh, and fonographic riterz are not adequately expressed to the eye. Is this so, or is it not? We are driven to this pass: that the present English orthography is the only fitting medium for the representation of a riter's thots. Is it possible to imagine anything more absurd?

Will Mr. F. W. T. Lange please say what stronger proofs are required for fonetic spelling to succeed? Can he confute any of the facts or proofs proffered?

As I have already cited many authorities who were familiar with more than Latin or Greek roots yet could not spell correctly, so it does not help Mr. Lange's contention very much to suggest the learning of "roots." Further, he should not that the majority of words in use are neither of Latin nor Greek origin; those which are will be little if any changed by the adoption of fonetic spelling.

If fonetic spelling will not afford any training for the mind, does Mr. Lange mean to suggest that the present spelling was deliberately devised for that purpose? Why should fonetics feed the mind? No alphabet was ever constructed for such a purpose, any more than the numeral was, and they have a fixed value. Why not say to a hungry man; "You must not eat food; grind your teeth. This will appease your hunger. It is the 'grinding,' not the food, which strengthens your body." A riter in La Mercurie de France has a different idea to Mr. Lange. He says: "Lovers of fonetic spelling have been endeavoring to reform our spelling by a totally incorrect conception of the value of a written language. To reform spelling in the way they suggest would not only be destroying tradition but would cause serious injury to the brain." I shall not do Mr. Lange the injustice by thinking he would pen such silly stuff, but the idea in the French riter's mind presupposes that fonetic spelling does exercise the brain, to the point of injury. Mr. Lange contends contrariwise. How is correct?

Why should we concern ourselves about what other generations may do with our present spelling? If they want to read books printed in the spelling now current they will be obtainable, just as Professor Skeat, Professor Furnivall and others have provided us with reproductions of Chaucer's and Shakespeare's originals. Which does Mr. Lange read—the reprints or the current issues? If Mr. Lange objects to any tinkering with the written form of our language, is he in favor of permitting the spoken and written to get wider and wider apart? What then, would be the use of written speech? To represent itself?

The other day I was told of a schoolmaster, a most able man, who could not write a letter or have a dozen lines without the dictionary being by his side. His exercise book at college is remembered unto this day, although it is nearly thirty years ago.

H. DRUMMOND.

Hetton-le-Hole.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I suppose that J. B. Wallis (I will not say plain J. B. Wallis lest I should be misdeemed to wish to imply disrespect, which I do not entertain. I simply regard "Mr." as a title without meaning—the perhaps least offensive of a family of titles which in the aggregate is grossly offensive; whose existence warrants, and indeed challenges, the constant protest of intelligence and sincerity) will not forgive me for having referred to him as grannie—tho he may fortify himself within Castle Indifference. This is properly his affair since he has chosen to range himself in this connection with the species grannie. His retort, "You're another," raises a question of sum interest respecting the proper sphere and warrant of ridicule in debate. I submit that the attitude adopted by him in the earlier correspondence invited and merited the thrust of ridicule.

Care in composition and the elision of verbiage would have obviated the perpetration of such a sentence as "Mr. Drummond will soon be quite unable to read current English if he persists much longer in the way he is taking." That sentence well illustrates J. B. Wallis's inability to write English, besides indicating his mental habit of confusing the terms of ideas which require separate formulation. Briefly, he fails to distinguish between things which differ. For instance, he speaks of "our own orthodox spelling" as the "natural ancestor" of the spelling of the future, and suggests the wisdom of letting the reform movement take its "natural course." "It is but an analogy," however—with a very practical limitation.

The mud-hovel, the flint-hed and the coracle of primitive man may be described by those whose breath is analogy, as the natural ancestors of modern structures and implements of industry and commerce; but this description does not conceal the fact that (however the ideas concerning building—and mechanical—construction and concerning the conduct of industrial and commercial processes involve and embrace a continuous dependence of part upon part—a near analogy to growth) yet in plain English the houses, and engines and ships and machinery are made, and do not grow at all in any proper sense of that term. "The natural course" of a building left without architect or craftsmen would be to crumble into decay and ruin; "in the ordinary way" the evolution of machinery without engineer or mechanics would be its conversion into rusty scrapmetal. And without the services of the fonetician the "growth" of spelling is a mischievous absurdity.

A story is told of a popular preacher who, upon his appointment to a new church, delivered the same sermon upon several successive Sundays. Being remonstrated with for having taken such an odd course he replied "I have plenty of other sermons, but I have not yet seen the teaching of this one put into practice." I am reminded of the story by the reference of F. W. T. Lange to the expression "for tutorial purposes only." Much may be said of the value of fonetic spelling after that idea has been properly noted and assimilated. The paragraph in which this reference occurs contains several statements of a speculative nature. Thus it is asserted that a child will learn orthodox spelling more quickly and intelligibly by means of receiving a little knowledge of Latin and Greek roots than by first receiving any amount of instruction in fonetics. But the assurance does not assure, since the statement breaks down under the test of experience. The marked success of the fonetic method of teaching the art of reading over all ordinary methods including that under consideration, definitely places the question beyond controversy.

The English contains many words of Latin or Greek extraction, it does not consist wholly or even chiefly of these elements. And the most commonplace words, the words which first meet the learner and the spelling of which is most illogical and intrinsically the most difficult of acquirement, are not as a rule of Latin or Greek derivation, but are more frequently related to Anglo-Saxon; from which circumstance will appear the futility of teaching Latin or Greek roots.

When we see the statement that the science of fonetics is not a training of the mind like (say) mathematics, we may reasonably ask whether the author of the statement has made a practical acquaintance with that science. As a matter of fact it is strongly claimed for the study of fonetics that it tends to develop the coordinative faculty of the mind by bringing into agreement the impressions of eye and ear, and of thus, apart from any extrinsic value, constituting an exceedingly important training for the mind.

The child who is taught that see-oh-double-you spells cow has its faculty of perception and coordination set at defiance. When the slender analogy which subsists between words of that order as now, how, vow is broken by the spelling of low, snow, show, flow, and the ambiguous row, sow, bow; with scores and hundreds of examples in the commonest words the child perforce abandons the attempt to logically master the art of spelling; and resorts to the practice of learning by rote. Education then ceases and cramming begins.

This is not a fanciful picture either of the spelling itself (see the letter of Walter W. Skeat, p. 450) or of the injurious effect upon the development of intelligence and upon education generally.

The question is an eminently practical one, and educationists who recognize that "the mere ability to read or write is not an education in itself,"—tho that stage is under existing conditions too generally where elementary education ends, cannot afford to oppose a reform of undoubted potentiality for useful service.

T. TALBOT LODGE.

November 4.

THE SUEZ CANAL

Dr. A. J. Butler writes to point out that in his letter on this subject to the ACADEMY of November 10 Heliopolis, in line 11, is a misprint for Heroopolis.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Transactions of the Glasgow Archaeological Society. New Series, vol. v. Part II. 8½ x 7½. Pp. 124. Glasgow: MacLehose.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Jerrold, Maud F. Vittoria Colonna. With Some Account of her Friends and her Times. 6 Photogravures. 8½ x 6. Pp. 336. Dent, 10s. 6d. net. [Genealogical tables and bibliography.]

Fletcher, the Rev. J. M. J. Mrs. Wrightman of Shrewsbury. The Story of a Pioneer in Temperance Work. With 16 illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 300. Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Diverging History of John Gilpin. Showing how he went further than he intended, and came safely home again. Embellished with woodcuts drawn and engraved by Robert Searer. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 48. Constable, 1s. net.

Hohler, Mrs. Edwin. Peter. A Christmas Story. 7½ x 5. Pp. 197. Constable, 3s. 6d.

Brier-Patch Philosophy. By "Peter Rabbit." Interpreted by William J. Long, illustrated by Charles Copeland. 8 x 5½. Pp. 296. Ginn, 6s. net.

Whyte, Christina Gowans. The Story Book Girls. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 339. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Marx, W. J. For the Admiral. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 333. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Whyte, Christina Gowans. The Adventures of Merrywink. With drawings by M. V. Wheelhouse. 10 x 7½. Pp. 199. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

- Ellis, Edward S. Deerfoot in the Forest. Illustrated. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 366. Cassell, 2s. 6d.
- Ellis, Edward S. A Princess of the Woods. Illustrated. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 160. Cassell, 2s. 6d.
- Everett-Green, Evelyn. Our Great Undertaking. A Grandmother's Story. 8 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 311. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
- Hamer, S. H. The Little Folk Book of Wonders. Illustrated. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 7$. Pp. 191. Cassell, 2s. 6d.
- Welch, Ethel. The Granny Growler Stories. Illustrated. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 6\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 178. Drane, 3s. 6d.
- Hamer, S. H.; and Rountree, Harry. The Young Gullivers. Illustrated. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 7\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 78. Cassell, 1s. 6d.
- The Pretty Picture Book, and My Favourite*. Stories for Little People. $11\frac{1}{2} \times 7\frac{1}{2}$. Cassell, 1s. each.
- Some Little Quakers in their Nursery*. Illustrated by the Author. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 112. Clifton: Baker, n.p.
- Gask, Lilian. Through the Gates of the Moon. 9 x 6. Pp. 126. Bumpus, n.p.

CLASSICS.

- Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis. Cornelii Taciti Annalium ab excessu Divi Augusti Libri. Recognovit brevique adnotatione critica instruxit C. D. Fisher. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$, 11 $\frac{1}{2}$. Oxon: E. Typographeo Clarendoniano, 6s.

DRAMA.

- Lee, Sidney. Shakespeare and the Modern Stage, with other essays. 9 x 6. Pp. xv, 251. Murray, 9s. net.
- Rappoport, A. S. The English Drama. 6 x 4. Pp. 130. Dent, 1s. net. [In "The Temple Primers."]

ECONOMICS.

- Kirk, William. National Labor Federations in the United States. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. 150. Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science. Series xxiv. 9-10. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press.
- Hooper and Graham Series. Graham, James; and Oliver, George A. S. Spanish Commercial Practice connected with the Export and Import Trade to and from Spain, the Spanish Colonies, and the countries where Spanish is the recognised language of commerce. Part II. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. xiii, 412. Macmillan, 4s. 6d.

FICTION.

- Whiting, Mary Bradford. The Plough of Shame. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 344. Dent, 6s.
- Roberts, Charles G. D. The Heart that Knows. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 378. Duckworth, 6s.
- O'Higgins, Harvey J. Don-a-Dreams. A Story of Love and Youth. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 412. Duckworth, 6s.
- Duff, Lily Grant. Periwinkle. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 424. Murray, 6s.
- Maugham, H. Neville. Richard Hawkwood. A Romance. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 368. Blackwood, 6s.
- Harris-Burland, J. B. The Broken Law. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 364. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Clifford, Mrs. W. K. The Modern Way (Eight Examples). $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 269. Chapman & Hall, 6s. (See p. 502.) [Eight short stories; seven are published for the first time in book form.]
- Prichard, K. and Hesketh. The New Chronicles of Don Q. Illustrated. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 311. Unwin, 6s.
- Wilson, Rathmell. An Exile from Fairyland, with other writings. $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 92. Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net. [The book is mainly composed of imaginative, mystical stories. By the author of "Hinemoa."]
- Montgomery, K. L. The Ark of the Curse. 8 x $5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. viii, 344. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Fogazarro, Antonio. The Patriot (Piccolo Mondo Antico). Translated from the Italian by M. Prichard-Agnetti. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 433. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Gerard, Morice. Check to the King. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 306. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Barnes-Grundy, Mabel. Marguerite's Wonderful Year. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 400. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 6s.
- Haultmont, Marie. By the Royal Road. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 411. Sands, 6s.
- Graham, Winifred. A Miracle of the Turf. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 307. White, 6s. [Endless improbabilities and kidnapping and murder and sudden death—sufficient incidents to fill half a dozen novels—and at last four hearts that beat in unison (we believe that to be the correct phrase), two and two. "A Miracle of the Turf" is likely to be in great demand at the circulating libraries.]
- Gull, C. Ranger. The Soul Stealer. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 312. White, 6s.
- Balfour, Frederick H. Austin and his Friends. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 315. Greening, 6s. [There is much in Mr. Balfour's book which proves that he can, and probably will, do better work. It is clever in parts, but very unequal.]

LITERATURE.

- A Treasury of English Literature* (from the Beginning to the Eighteenth Century). Selected and arranged with Translations and Glossaries by Kate M. Warren. With an introduction by Stopford A. Brooke. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. lviii, 973. Constable, 7s. 6d. net. [Prose and verse. Intended as a companion to Mr. Stopford Brooke's "Primer of English Literature." The book ends with Burns. Extracts up to the middle of the fifteenth century have been printed in the original spelling; spelling modernised after that date, except in the case of Spenser. Translations into prose. Contents and Index of Authors.]
- Lounsbury, Thomas R. The First Editors of Shakespeare (Pope and Theobald). The story of the first Shakespearean controversy and of the earliest attempt at establishing a critical text of Shakespeare. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. xxii, 579. Nutt, 10s. 6d. net. [Mr. Lounsbury is Professor of English in Yale University.]

- Symons, Arthur. Studies in Seven Arts. 9 x 6. Pp. viii, 394. Constable, 8s. 6d. net.
- [Rodin—The Painting of the Nineteenth Century—Moreau—Watts—Whistler—Cathedrals—The Decay of Craftsmanship in England—Beethoven—The Ideas of Richard Wagner—The Problem of Richard Strauss—Duse—A new art of the stage—A Symbolist Farce—Pantomimes and the Poetic Drama—The World as Ballet.]
- Edmonds, J. M. An Introduction to Comparative Philology for Classical Students. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. viii, 236. Cambridge University, 4s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Machen, Arthur. Dr. Stiggins: his views and principles. A series of Interviews. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 141. Francis Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net. [A satire on modern Protestantism, and the combination of "religion" and business principles which prevails in certain "churches" of England and America.]
- Adams, W. A. Two hundred and Fifty Thoughts. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 78. Moring, 2s. 6d. net. [Major Adams is known already by one or two volumes of poems. His aphoristic "thoughts" are often homely, but generally pointed and worth pondering.]
- Sinclair, Walter M. Supplement to the Catalogue of the Library of the Law Society, 1891-1906. 10 x 6. Pp. 632. Printed for the Society by Spottiswoode & Co., n.p. [Supplements to the fourth catalogue (1891) of books in the library of the Law Society were issued in 1894 and 1898. The present volume embodies these two supplements. It contains all additions to the library during the fifteen years from July 1891 to July 1906; but does not contain the books in the Mendham collection. The total number of volumes in the library is 47,000.]
- Paradise Row*; or, A Broken Piece of Old Chelsea: being The Curious and Diverting Annals of a Famous Village Street nearly Destroyed together with Particulars of Sundry Noble and Notable Persons who in former Times dwelt There to which are added Likenesses of the Principal of them and of their several Houses the whole Collected and Presented by Reginald Blunt. 9 x $5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 199. Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net. [With a plan of Paradise Row, based on Thompson's Survey of Chelsea, 1836.]
- Berens, Lewis H. The Digger Movement in the Days of the Commonwealth, as Revealed in the Writings of Gerrard Winstanley, the Digger, Mystic and Rationalist, Communist and Social Reformer. 9 x 6. Pp. 259. Simpkin, Marshall, 7s. 6d. net. [Bibliography, index, and three appendices: (1) The Twelve Articles of the German Peasantry; (2) Cromwell on Toleration; (3) Winstanley's Laws for a Free Commonwealth.]
- The Quiver*. Annual volume 1906. $10\frac{1}{2} \times 7\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 1199. Cassell, 7s. 6d.
- Frankau, Gilbert. The X Y Z of Bridge. Illustrated by Lance Thackeray. 7 x 10. Pp. 47. King, 1s. [Intended to be humorous. The verse is not worthy of the illustrations.]
- The Pocket Thomas Hardy*. Being selections from the Wessex novels and poems of Thomas Hardy, made by Alfred H. Hyatt. $5\frac{1}{2} \times 3\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 312. Chatto & Windus, 2s. net.
- "Neera." The Soul of an Artist. Translated from the Italian by E. L. Murison, with an introduction by L. D. Ventura. 8 x $5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 126. San Francisco and New York: Paul Elder, n.p.

NATURAL HISTORY.

- Maeterlinck, Maurice. Old-fashioned Flowers and other open-air essays. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. With illustrations by G. S. Elgood. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. vii, 115. Allen, 3s. 6d. net. [Uniform, or very nearly so, with the recently published edition of the same author's "My Dog."]

ORIENTAL.

- The Shāhnāma of Firdausi*. Done into English by Arthur George Warner and Edmond Warner. Vol. ii. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. x, 428. Kegan Paul. Trübner's Oriental Series, 10s. 6d. net. [The first volume was published in December last.]
- Vier philosophische Texte des Mahābhārata* — Sanatsujāta - Parvan — Bhagavadgītā — Mokṣadharmā — Anugītā. In Gemeinschaft mit Dr. Otto Strauss aus dem Sankrit übersetzt von Dr. Paul Essen. 9 x $5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. viii, 1010. Leipzig: Brockhaus, m.22. and m.24.50.

POETRY.

- Tietkens, Ernest A. Star Rays. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 256. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net. [Thoughtful and earnest poems, religious in tone, though the author disdains the churches. But his verse is too pedestrian and bald to be entitled to the name of poetry, and his frequent use of anapaestic measures is unsuited to his subjects.]
- Hacon, Henry. John Packharness: an idyll of the field and factory. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 4\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 55. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. [The story, in blank verse, of a rich young man who worked as a hand in a factory, strove to influence his fellows towards good and married the sister of one of them. Dedicated to "Our British Workmen."]

POLITICAL.

- Ashley, Percy. Local and Central Government. 9 x 6. Pp. 396. Murray, 10s. 6d. net. [A comparative study of England, France, Prussia, and the United States.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- De Goncourt, Edmond. La Faustin. Translated by G. F. Monkshood and Ernest Tristan. $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 250. Gull, C. Ranger. When It Was Dark. $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 427. Greening, 1s. 6d. net each. [Both in "The Lotus Library"!]
- Bonchord, Wilson. Poems. Composed in Prison. Second edition. $7 \times 4\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 74. Ilford: The Cosmopolitan Publishing Co., 1s. net. [A selection of verse written at intervals in the course of a period of five years' penal servitude.]

Dumas, Alexander. The Queen's Necklace. Illustrated. 2 vols. Pp. 430, 436. The She-Wolves of Macheoul. Illustrated. 2 vols. Pp. 571, 580. Each 7½ x 5. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.
[Printed from American plates]

Sinclair, Upton. King Midas. A Romance. Frontispiece by Charles M. Relyea. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 388. Heinemann, 6s.

[Mr. Sinclair's first novel, written when he was twenty-one. He was unable to find a publisher for it, and printed it himself under the title, "Spring-time and Harvest."]

Thomson, James. The Castle of Indolence, and other poems. Pp. 279. The Poems of Thomas Love Peacock. Pp. 404. Each 6 x 4. Routledge, 1s. net each.

[In "The Muses' Library."]

The Japanese Fairy-Book. Compiled by Yei Theodora Ozaki. Illustrated by Kakuzo Fujiyama. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 296. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.

Classic Tales. With an introduction by C. S. Fearnside. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 497. Bell, 2s. net.

[In "The York Library." Based on a collection of classic tales published in "Bohn's Standard Library," in 1882. "Gulliver's Travels" has, however, been replaced by "The Castle of Otranto." The volume now contains Johnson's "Rasselas," Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," and Walpole's "Castle of Otranto."]

Campbell, Lewis. Sophocles. The Seven Plays in English Verse. Pp. 316. Johnson's Lives of the English Poets. 2 vols. Pp. 478, 493. Eliot George. Silas Marner; The Lifted Veil; and Brother Jacob. Pp. 297. Bacon's Advancement of Learning and The New Atlantis. Pp. 275. The Essays of Michael Lord of Montaigne. Translated by John Florio. Vol. iii. Pp. 440. Each 6½ x 4. Frowde, 1s. net each.

[In "The World's Classics."]

Swift, Jonathan. Journal to Stella. With the notes of Sir Walter Scott. Pp. 449. Hare, A. J. and J. C. Guesses at Truth. Two series in 1 vol. Pp. 478. Kirchhoff, Alfred. Man and Earth. The Reciprocal Relations and Influences of Man and his Environment. Translated by A. Sonnenschein. Pp. 223. Browne, Sir Thomas. Religio Medici; Hydriotaphia; The Garden of Cyrus; Christian Morals. With a Glossary by W. S. Sonnenschein. Pp. 264. Pauli, Dr. Rheindold. Pictures of Old England. Translated by E. C. Otté. Pp. 387. Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy. Translated by H. R. James. Pp. 205. The Dramatic Works of Christopher Marlowe. Pp. 448. Church, Dean. Dante, and St. Anselm. Pp. 253. Macaulay's Historical Essays. From "The Edinburgh Review." Pp. 519. Mackenzie, Henry. The Man of Feeling, and The Man of the World. Pp. 424. Hunt, Leigh. Stories from the Italian Poets. I.—Dante and Pulci. Pp. 287. Hitopadesa; or, The Book of Good Counsel. Translated from the Sanskrit text by the Rev. B. Hale-Worham. Pp. 210. Bullfinch, Thomas. The Age of Chivalry. Pp. 277. Each 6 x 4. Routledge, 1s. net each.

[In "The New Universal Library."]

The Complete Works of William Shakespeare. Reprinted from the First Folio. Edited by Charlotte Porter and H. A. Clarke. With an introduction by John Churton Collins. In 13 volumes: each 7½ x 5½. Each play pagged separately. Harrap, net the set £2 2s., 1 p. £4 4s.

[The text of the First Folio exactly reprinted, "the only variations being the substitution of modern type for the long s, the interchangeable i and j, u and v, the occasional y for th, and the abbreviated the for them." What does not appear in the First Folio is placed within brackets. Important deviations from the text of the Globe edition, which has been taken as typical of what Professor Churton Collins calls the Victorian text, are noted, with their sources, in footnotes. The Globe numbering of lines is placed at the top of the page; the First Folio numbering down the sides. Occasional explanations of obscure words in the margins: First Folio words emended, and the authority for the emendations in footnotes. Each play and poem has a separate introduction and glossary of words, grammatical usage and pronunciation, and vol. ii. contains a biography of Shakespeare. The first twelve volumes have each a reproduction of a different portrait or effigy of Shakespeare and the thirteenth has a view of the birthplace.]

The Golden Poets, edited by Oliphant Smeaton. Poems of Coleridge, selected and with an introduction by Professor Edward Dowden. Pp. xlvii, 275. Poems of Sir Walter Scott, selected and with an introduction by Oliphant Smeaton. Pp. liv, 287. Each 7½ x 5½. Jack. Each 2s. 6d. net cloth, 3s. 6d. net leather.

[The first two volumes in the new series of The Golden Poets. The appearance and get-up are certainly very attractive. A simple cover design by Paul Woodroffe, portrait frontispiece and ornamental title-pages by A. S. Hartrick, and eight illustrations in colour. The introductions are biographical and critical, and there are notes, glossary and index of first lines. Those who like selections with introductions will welcome the Golden Poets.]

Everyman's Library. Shakespeare's Comedies. Pp. 843. Shakespeare's Tragedies. Pp. 981. Shakespeare's Histories and Poems. Pp. 888. Each 7 x 4½. Dent. Each 1s. net cloth and 2s. net leather. (See p. 491.)

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell. With Introduction by A. W. Ward. In eight vols. Vol. vi. Sylvia's Lovers, etc. With illustrations. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxxi, 540. Smith Elder, 4s. 6d. net.
[Contains also "An Italian Institution."]

Döllinger, John J. I. The First Age of Christianity and the Church. Translated by H. N. Oxenham. Fourth edition. 9 x 6. Pp. xxv, 448. Gibbings, 6s. net.

SCIENCE.

Headley, F. W. Life and Evolution. 8½ x 6. Pp. xvi, 272. Duckworth, 8s. net.

[A book which has "grown out of lectures delivered to the Haileybury National Science Society." Amply illustrated by plates.]

British Association Meeting in South Africa, 1905. Discussion at Johannesburg on the Teaching of Elementary Mechanics. Edited by John Perry. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 74. Macmillan, 2s. net.

[Contains also a paper by C. E. Ashford on the Teaching of Mechanics by Experiment, read at the York meeting, 1906.]

THEOLOGY.

Pfleiderer, Otto. Primitive Christianity. Its Writing and Teachings in their Historical Connections. Translated by W. Montgomery, and edited by the Rev. W. M. Morrison. Vol. i. 9 x 5½. Pp. 471. Williams & Norgate, 10s. 6d. net.

[Revised and greatly extended. In the "Theological Translation Library."]

Waggett, P. N. The Holy Eucharist, with other occasional papers. 8 x 5½. Pp. 265. Murray, 3s. 6d. net.

[The first paper on The Holy Eucharist was printed some years ago for private circulation; fifteen other unpublished papers are included.]

Driver, the Rev. S. R. The Book of the Prophet Jeremiah. 7½ x 5. Pp. 382. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[A revised translation, with introductions and short explanations. A large part of the volume appeared in The Expositor.]

Burkitt, F. Crawford. The Gospel History and Its Transmission. 8½ x 6. Pp. 360. Edinburgh: Clark, 6s. net.

[Ten lectures delivered in the spring of this year at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in London as the Jowett Lectures for 1906. They were repeated, with very little change, for the author's inaugural course at Cambridge as Norrisian Professor of Divinity.]

McFadyen, John Edgar. The Prayers of the Bible. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 388. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.

[A collection of prayers from the Old Testament and the New Testament, arranged under different headings. Except where it is manifestly wrong, the author has used the Authorised Version.]

Ramsay, W. M. Pauline and Other Studies in Early Christian History. 6½ x 6. Pp. 415. Hodder & Stoughton, 12s.

[Fifteen essays, of which one is entirely new; the rest consist of revised and extended articles which have appeared in different periodicals.]

Cambridge Patristic Texts. επισημογραφία (De Sacerdotio) of St. John Chrysostom. Edited by J. Arbutnot Nairn. 7½ x 5½. Pp. lviii, 192. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.

[Nearly 200 years ago the Cambridge University Press published a separate edition of the "De Sacerdotio." Between that and Dr. Nairn's volume there has been no separate edition in England. Introduction, critical, exegetical, bibliographical, etc.; text with footnotes. Appendix on the bearing of the Scriptural quotations in the "De Sacerdotio" on the textual criticism of the New Testament; Indices.]

Pfleiderer, Otto. Christian Origins. Translated by Daniel A. Huebsch. Authorised edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 295. Unwin, 5s. net.

Crosse, Gordon. Authority in the Church of England. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xi, 283. Wells Gardner, Darton, 6s.

[A short account, for laymen, of the constitution of the Church of England. Appendix: the Report on Ecclesiastical Discipline, 1906.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Stratilesco, Tereza. From Carpathian to Pindus. Pictures of Roumanian Country Life. With a maps and 63 illustrations. 8½ x 6½. Pp. xii, 379. Unwin, 15s. net.

[An account by a Roumanian lady well known in England of her country, which is justly proud of its freedom, and is this year celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of its independence.]

The Guide to South Africa. Edited annually by A. S. Brown and G. G. Brown for the Union-Castle Mail S.S. Co., Ltd. 1906-1907 edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. lxiv, 477. Sampson Low, 2s. 6d.

Vincent, James Edmund. Highways and Byways in Berkshire. With illustrations by Frederick L. Griggs. 8 x 5½. Pp. 443. Macmillan, 6s.

[In the "Highways and Byways" series.]

Kennedy, Bart. Wander Pictures. With 8 illustrations by Tatton Winter. 8 x 5½. Pp. 360. Cassell, 6s.

THE BOOKSHELF

THERE is much in Mr. Orde Ward's small volume of religious essays. The Keeper of the Keys (Francis Griffiths), which is distinctly stimulating. The ruling notion throughout is the Hegelian idea of life and progress, the clash of antagonisms transcended in a higher unity. It is a law that is capable of almost universal application. Mr. Orde Ward sees it everywhere, especially in Christianity, that religion of antinomies, in the progressing world of thought and action and in the life of the individual. To the latter he makes it the trumpet-call of action. Opposition and difficulties are a challenge to faith and effort. They present themselves in order to be overcome. If the method has its advantages, it has also its dangers. Among the latter is the temptation, which this book does not escape, to strain facts in order to bring them under the formula. Another is to imagine that in such a formula we possess a key to all the enigmas and inequalities of life. While we do not accuse the writer of being under this delusion, we cannot help remarking that such is the tendency of the book, a tendency which is more or less shared by all short essays of the kind which touch upon so many problems that they cannot probe to the bottom. The result is that the book, though written with force and fire, contains, as a whole, no solid thinking or really practical suggestions, while passages are not infrequent which might be described as "glorified clap-trap."

From Cloth, 2s., to Real Pigskin, 10s. 6d.

Size 8 x 5½ inches, Handsomely Bound.

The Pig Book

Now, the finest of amusements,
For little and for big
Is to get a brand new Pig
Book,
And draw a Blindfold Pig

For it's Pig Book in the Drawing-room,
It's Pig Book in the train.
It's Pig Book in the nursery,
And Pig Book on the brain!

THE PIG BOOK PARTY.

Reproduced from Thomas Maybank's Full-page Picture
in "THE GENTLEWOMAN."

POURQUOI ?

Every pig has its day (even as a dog), and as there are many dog books, why not a Pig Book? We hasten to explain that a Pig Book is a book having reference to Pigs. We give it this title because it sounds more polite than "Pigs I have met." As most people draw just as well with their eyes closed as open, the inflexible rule of the Pig Book is that the artist shall close his or her eyes, draw a pig on one of the pages, and lift the pencil before putting in (or out, as the case may be) the eye of the Pig. The artist then signs in order to fix the responsibility.

Some people can draw a pig and most people think they can. The line at the head of the title-page is for the use of the owner, so that the page may read, "Mrs. Parkington's Pig Book," or "Chanticleer Hall Pig Book," so to speak, as the case may be.

A PIGGE.

EACH PAGE CONTAINS HUMOROUS SKETCHES OF PIGS, AND IS EMBELLISHED WITH APPROPRIATE LITERARY QUOTATIONS FROM HOMER TO "GORDON GRAHAM."

Of all Booksellers, Stationers, and Bookstalls.

London: DEAN AND SON, Limited,
160a, Fleet Street, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with. Fullset Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. R. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____ months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1803

NOVEMBER 24, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

AN Examination for Two Foundation Scholarships open to girls under 16 years of age, will be held at the School on December 12, 13 and 14. These Scholarships exempt the holders from payment of Tuition Fees. Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Mistress of the School.

Lectures

A Christmas Course of Lectures.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

W. DUDELLI, Esq., M.Inst. E.E., will deliver a Course of Six Lectures (adapted to a Juvenile Auditory) on "SIGNALLING TO A DISTANCE; FROM PRIMITIVE MAN TO RADIOTELEGRAPHY," commencing on Thursday, December 27, 1906, at 3 o'clock; to be continued on December 29; and January 1, 3, 5, 8, 1907. Subscription (for Non-Members) to this Course, One Guinea (Children under sixteen, Half a Guinea); to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas. Tickets may now be obtained at the Institution.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

MICROCOSM OF LONDON, or London in Miniature; 104 Coloured Plates by Pugin and Rowlandson. Methuen's Reprint, 1904; 3 vols., 4to, boards, published at £3 3s. net, for 37s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES

GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE (124 pp.)

JUST OUT

Librarians, Bookbuyers generally and all interested in Literature, are invited to apply for above.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

CRUIKSHANK (George or Robert), Any loose Caricatures, plain or coloured
Any Original Drawings or Autograph Letters
Curry and Rice, published by Day and Son, n.d.
Curtius (Prof.) History of Greece, 5 vols, 1873
Curtis's Botanical Magazine, 1839 to 1890, or any part
British Entomology, 16 vols
Curzon (G. N.), Russia in Central Asia
Persia, 2 vols
Dampier's Voyagers, 4 vols, 1729, 8vo
Dance of Death, 2 vols, 1815-16
Dance of Life, 1817
Dance (G.), Collections of Portraits, 1809-14
Dancing, Books on, before 1850
Dancing (The) Master, 1670
Daniel (G.), Merrie England, 2 vols, 1842
Daniel (Samuel), Whole Works, 1623
Daniell's Press, Oxford any Books or Pamphlets printed at Daniell's (W.) Voyages round Great Britain, 8 vols
Daniell's African Scenery, large folio, 1808
Daniell's Oriental Scenery, 6 vols, large f. lio, 1795-1808
D'Arblay's (Madame) Diary, 7 vols, 1843
Dasent (G.) Popular Tales from the Norse, 1859
Davies (Sir J.) Nosce Teipsum, etc., 8vo, 1636
Davison's Poems, 1621
Dawkins (W. B.), Cave-Hunting, 1874
De Bry, Alphabeta et Characteres (about 50 plates of writing, etc.) 1596. Or his Travels and voyages.
Declaration of Rights, a broadside, Dublin, 1812

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.O.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT
Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-h Gate, W.

Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari.

Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY.

Miss Seeley's volume has been written in the hope of giving an idea of the liveliness of the Renaissance in Italy, and of that exuberant enjoyment of the revived art which finds such vivid expression in the pages of Vasari, the uncontested father as he is the first of artistic chroniclers.

ORDINARY EDITION—Full gold stamped buckram, gilt tops, 8 by 5½ inches. With 8 full-page Coloured Plates 24 Half-tone Plates 7s. 6d. net.

SPECIAL EDITION—Bound in whole white parchment, printed on pure rag paper, deckle edges, 9 by 6½ inches. Contains all the Plates of the Cheaper Edition, with 4 additional Coloured Plates and a Special Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece. 15s. net.
Bound in vellum, 21s. net.

The Binding and Titles in both Editions are Copies of XV. and XIII. Century Originals.

The Poetical Works of William Blake.

Edited and Annotated by EDWIN J. ELLIS.
2 vols., demy 8vo. Photogravure Frontispiece, each volume cloth, 12s. net; half leather, 15s. net.

William Blake: A Critical Study.

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
A New Edition, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s. net.

William Blake.

Etchings from his Works by WILLIAM BELL SCOTT.
Cheaper Issue, 12s. 6d. net.

Containing 8 Steel Plates and 2 Lithographs, all India Proofs, with Descriptive Text.

A Christmas Sermon.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
Uniform with "Prayers written at Vailima." Large post 8vo, half cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

The Annals of Covent Garden Theatre, 1732-1897.

By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM.
45 Illustrations. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

By THE AUTHOR OF "THE FREEMASONS."

Burnt Spices. By L. S. GIBSON. 6s.

"A remarkably interesting story, told with strength. . . A work of unmistakable ability and originality."—WORLD.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

The Tea Planter. By F. E. PENNY. 6s.

"Mrs. Penny has, in our opinion, produced the most finished and artistic work that has yet appeared over her name."—GUARDIAN.

The Man Apart. By RALPH STRAUS. 6s.

"The Man Apart" is a piece of strong work, on which Mr. Straus is to be congratulated."—SCOTSMAN.

To Defeat the Ends of Justice.

By HERBERT COMPTON. 6s.

"A story teeming with incident and colour. . . While the attractive qualities of the principal characters intensify the interest. . . A stirring and delightful book."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

CHATTO & WINDUS,
111 St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST

ON MONDAY NEXT

COMEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA

By JOHN FYVIE, Author of "Some Famous Women of Wit and Beauty."
Demy 8vo, with 8 full-page Portraits in Photogravure, 12s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN SEVEN ARTS.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

RACE PREJUDICE.

By JEAN FINOT. Translated by F. Wade Evans.
Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE CRACKLING OF THORNS.

A Volume of Parodies and Humorous Verse.
By DUM DUM, Author of "Rhymes of the East," "In the Hills."
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

WALT WHITMAN.

A Study of His Life and Work. By BLISS PERRY.
Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 6s. net.

EDINBURGH under SIR WALTER SCOTT

By W. T. FYFE. With an Introduction by R. S. Rait.
Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MY PILGRIMAGE TO THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST.

By MONCURE D. CONWAY. 8vo, fully Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.

The NATIVE RACES OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

A Series of Illustrated Ethnographical Handbooks intended to convey accurate information in a popular and readable form.
Demy 8vo, 6s. net each.

Vol. I.—NATIVES OF AUSTRALIA. By Northcote W. Thomas.
With 32 full-page Illustrations.

GOLDEN DAYS OF THE RENAISSANCE IN ROME.

By RODOLFO LANCIANI, Author of "New Tales of Old Rome."
Royal 8vo. Illustrated from about 100 Drawings and Photographs, 21s. net.

THE BEST 6s. NOVELS.

GROWTH.

By GRAHAM TRAVERS, Author of "Mona Maclean."

TRIBUNE.—"A noteworthy book."

SKETCH.—"A fine book, strenuous and able."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Will be read with great interest by those who as a rule find Scotch 'dourness' a little trying in their fiction, for it is a story of considerable power, and written with commendable seriousness. It is a long story, and one which will bear careful reading. Indeed, it is only by reading it carefully that it can be enjoyed."

MR. PERCY WHITE'S NEW SOCIETY NOVEL.

THE EIGHT GUESTS.

By PERCY WHITE.

TRIBUNE.—"A book that every one should read. The preacher will find in it material for whole series of sermons; the less worthy, a great fund of amusement; those who care for form, some very clever and brisk writing; those who prefer matter, plenty of excitement. . . 'The Eight Guests' may count for the best work Mr. White has yet given us."

BIRMINGHAM POST.—"A very clever society novel in Mr. White's best style."

DAILY GRAPHIC.—"Excellent entertainment."

POPULAR 6s. NOVELS.

GROWTH	Graham Travers
THE EIGHT GUESTS	Percy White
HOLYLAND	Frenssen
THE INCOMPLETE AMORIST	E. Nesbit
MONTLIVET	Alice Smith
THE OPENED SHUTTERS	Clara Louise Burnham
THE MAN IN THE CASE	Elizabeth Stuart Phelps
THE COUNTY ROAD	Alice Brown

A New Book by JOHN FOX, Author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come," entitled:

A KNIGHT OF THE CUMBERLAND.

LONDON: ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LIMITED.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	515	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		The Poetry of William Blake	524
A New Essayist	517	Fiction	526
Mrs. Gaskell	519	Drama:
Profundo Pindarus Ore—II.	520	"The Doctor's Dilemma" at
A Period of European Literature	521	the Court Theatre	527
The Great Riddle	521	Fine Art:
Yesterday, To-day—and for		The Jew in Art	527
Ever?	522	Music:
The Ode of Sappho "To		Elgar's New Oratorio	529
Anaëtoris"	523	Forthcoming Books	530
Nugæ Scriptoris:		Correspondence	530
X. Truth in Error	523	Books Received	532

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE proposal recently set on foot to purchase for the nation the cottage at Nether Stowey, Somerset, in which Coleridge lived from December 1796 to August 1798, is meeting with the support it deserves. In this cottage Coleridge wrote The Ancient Mariner, Christabel (Part I.), the Ode on France, Frost at Midnight, The Nightingale, This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison, and others of his finest poems, and here he entertained William and Dorothy Wordsworth, Charles Lamb, Charles Lloyd, John Thelwall, Joseph Cottle, Humphry Davy, William Hazlitt and others. This is the only one of Coleridge's residences that can now be secured for a memorial purpose.

It is proposed to buy the cottage and vest it with its garden in Trustees, who will either hold them for the nation or transfer them to the National Trust. The aim of the promoters is mainly to preserve the cottage, so far as possible, in the state in which it was during the poet's residence, and to replant the orchard-garden: while the annex, which was put up after Coleridge's time, is to be taken down to make way for a library for the benefit of the village and district. In the cottage itself there will be collected a small gallery of portraits of Coleridge and his friends, pictures of places associated with him (some of them, drawn by distinguished artists, have already been received for the purpose), and a few other memorial relics.

Last week, through the courtesy of Lord Crewe, a meeting of the promoters of the scheme was held in a Committee Room of the House of Lords, under the presidency of Professor William Knight, whose name is already honourably connected with the purchase of the Dove Cottage at Grasmere. A committee was formed, with Lord Lytton as chairman, Professor Knight, Holmleigh, Malvern, as honorary secretary, the Rev. William Greswell, Doddington Rectory, Bridgwater, as treasurer, and Miss Edith Burman, 6 Tedworth Gardens, as secretary; the other members being Lord Crewe, Mr. James Bryce, Sir Edward Fry, Mr. Ernest Coleridge, Canon Rawnsley, Canon Beeching, Mr. G. W. Prothero, and Mr. J. H. Etherington Smith.

A long list of those who have written approving of the scheme and agreeing to help it is already in circulation. From its two hundred and thirty-six distinguished names we can select only a few: Lord Aberdeen, Mr. Asquith, Lord Avebury, Mr. Balfour, the Bishop of Birmingham, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Carlisle, Lord Courtney, Sir Martin Conway, the Principal of Brasenose, Mr. Andrew Lang, Professor Mackail, Mr. George Meredith, Professor Saintsbury, Mr. Swinburne, Sir Edward Tennant, and Dr. A. W. Ward.

Editing and annotating are so often regarded as synonymous that the proposal made by Mr. Henry Barrett Hinckley of 54 Prospect Street, Northampton, Massachusetts, to print a series of notes on Chaucer's Canterbury Tales without hanging them on to a new edition of its text deserves encouragement. The idea that every annotator must reprint his author's text in full as an excuse for his notes is about as reasonable as the Chinese method of roasting pigs. But it is an idea which extensively prevails and it is to Mr. Hinckley's credit that he has broken away from it.

In the sample notes sent us with his prospectus Mr. Hinckley gives some information as to the cult of Thomas à Becket, discusses anew to what extent Chaucer was poking fun at his Prioress for her French of Stratford-atte-Bow, and suggests a possible identification of her with the contemporary prioress of the Stratford nunnery. He collects some instances of the varying meanings in which Chaucer uses the word greves, and supports the theory that Chaucer believed the Teseide and Filostrato to have been written, not by Boccaccio, but by Petrarch. Mr. Hinckley asks for subscribers for his notes at two dollars a copy.

There is at this moment in London a foreign visitor whose person and mission cannot fail to enlist our sympathy and interest. Isaac, Priest of the Samaritans, has come to England in order to sell for a price some of the most valued possessions of his people. Not the most valued; that is the "Roll of the Law of Moses," which is kept in the Samaritan Synagogue at Nablous, and for which its owners claim an antiquity of almost three thousand years. But the Priest must sell, if he can, a copy of this document made one thousand years ago, and a book containing the history of the people which was written as far back as 1150. The compelling cause is poverty. The Samaritans at the present time number only two hundred souls. Oppressed by their more powerful neighbours, they have come to great straits, and stand in need of a considerable sum of money, if their existence as a community is to be preserved. It is hoped that their treasured relics may procure them £5000. But when, in the history of the world, has nationality been brought to such a sorry plight? And as to the Priest, Isaac, to whom these things are vitally sacred, it is as though a monarch should be forced to pawn his crown. Such a sacrifice Boccaccio's hero made, who must kill his falcon, that his love might dine.

Strange are the vicissitudes of books, as of men. While the Samaritans are asking a great price for their records, some one has unwittingly parted with a Caxton for no more than Omar got in exchange for his reputation. We should perhaps say, three Caxtons, for there are three works bound in one volume. These are "The Royal Book, or Book for a King" (1488), "The Book of Good Manners" (1487), and "The Doctrinal of Sapience" (1489). The volume has been discovered by Messrs. Hodgson and Co., of Chancery Lane, among a collection of old English books sent to them from Whitley Beaumont, Yorkshire. The three publications seem to have been bound together shortly after their first appearance, a fact which will, of course, enhance their value. Unhappily, all three are defective and mutilated, "The Book of Good Manners" having suffered least.

Sophus Bauditz, the popular Danish writer, has recently published a story, "A Comedy on Kronborg," the principal character in which is William Shakespeare. According to the story, in 1586, the Earl of Leicester's company of actors went to Denmark. On the voyage one of them, named Will, met with an accident, and on landing at Elsinore was nursed by Iver Kramme, a teacher, and his sister Christence. During his convalescence he read the Latin Chronicle of Saxo Grammaticus, and was greatly interested in the story of Prince Amlet. There were love passages between Will and Christence, who, learning that he had a family in England, died, like Ophelia, by drowning. Among the characters in the story, besides the English actors, William Kemp, Thomas Bull, Thomas Pope, George Bryan, etc., are Preben Gyldenstjerne and Jørgen Rosenkrands. Kramme never suspects the identity of Will (who returns to England immediately after the death of Christence) with Shakespeare, until years afterwards, when the captain of a Danish ship presents him with a copy of the first quarto Hamlet. The story, we hear, is shortly to appear in English.

A ceremony of unusual interest in academic circles took place in the old University buildings in Edinburgh the other day, when Emeritus Professor Campbell Fraser, in the class-room in which, fifty years ago, he began his professorial work as occupant of the chair of Logic and Metaphysics in succession to Sir William Hamilton, received the congratulations of his colleagues and old pupils. Now in his eighty-eighth year, Dr. Campbell Fraser's eye remains undimmed and his physical and intellectual vigour but little abated. No fewer than sixteen pupils of Dr. Campbell Fraser have held or hold University chairs at Oxford and Cambridge, in Scotland, Australia, Canada, and the United States.

A valuable gathering of books will be sold at Messrs. Hodgson's on November 29 and 30. It consists of a collection of books in English literature ranging from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries chosen from an old County Library. First must come Shakespeare. There is a fine and perfect copy of the original edition of his Poems, 1640, with the portrait by Marshall, of which a facsimile is given; the first edition, 1619, of "The whole Contention betweene the Houses of Lancaster and Yorke;" the Merchant of Venice, third edition, 1637; Hamlet, a large copy of the edition of 1637, as well as those of 1676 and 1703, and Pericles, 1635. Of Spenser we have the seldom seen second edition of the Shepheardes Calender, and a copy in fine condition of his Complaints, 1591. A facsimile appears of the title-page of the Calender. There is a Black Letter Chaucer, 1598; indeed, Black Letter books are numerous; a first edition of Milton's Eikonoklastes, 1649, of Butler's Hudibras, 1663-78; Tennyson's Poems, 1830; Carlyle's Shooting Niagara, 1867, autograph presentation copy, and many others. Early American books form an important part of the sale.

A remarkable copy of "The Gownsmen," in the original boards, will be offered, and racing men must be interested in two such lots as the Racing Calendars, 1731 to 1854, 119 vols., and the Sporting Magazine, 1792-1803. The sale also includes many valuable folio fine-art books. The catalogue is well worth preserving for the knowledge and care shown in its collations of the important items. Messrs. Hodgson and Co. have also the very great luck, as book-buyers must term it, on the Friday preceding the momentous sale we have recorded, of bringing to the hammer a library of old English books, containing the three imperfect books from Caxton's press referred to in a previous note.

The new edition of Mr. Brown's Manual of Library Economy will be ready in January. The first edition was addressed in some measure to Library Committees and in that respect has met with the greatest possible success. The new edition, however, has been entirely recast and rewritten with a view to making it of use to the student. It will be the text-book for the classes at present being held at the London School of Economics (London University) as well as for the correspondence classes commencing on December 10.

It reads like a return to the fifteenth century to learn that the Port Elizabeth (S.A.) Library Committee has sent its Sub-Librarian to Europe to search for rare books and manuscripts. Raphael Trichet (Du Fresne), who was one of these early treasure seekers, scoured the world for literary gems for his royal mistress, Christina of Sweden, and, with a laxity perhaps typical of the times, for himself. Trichet's is a little-known figure, but his story is full of romance. The Library he so laboriously gathered together ultimately found its way into what is now the Bibliothèque Nationale. The enterprise of Port Elizabeth throws the public libraries of our own country into unpleasant relief. Although the movement has made great advances during the last few years it is still very far behind that of the Colonies and America, and in some respects of European countries.

The sum of money required in order to erect a monument to Gabriele Rossetti at Vasto in the Abruzzi, where he was born, is still insufficient for the purpose although as much as six hundred pounds has been subscribed. Dante Gabriel tells us of "the lofty brown building" with "a somewhat stately though unadorned aspect" in which his father was born, and complains bitterly that a prophet has no honour in his own country: otherwise the municipality would have bought the house. This they have now done, and have called the piazza after their distinguished townsman. But the youthful student of Dante drifted from Vasto to Naples, where he became an ardent politician, and this led to his flight to "puissant Albion." What happened to him there he tells us himself in his versified autobiography, which Dante Gabriel with filial piety translated for the English reader:

Stately an University had risen
In this enormous capital of the realm
And now the Council, from whose midst emerged
Such ample learning, sacred and profane
Offered me of its own accord the chair
Allotted to Italian literature.

Gabriele Rossetti wrote a book on Dante, whom he seems to have regarded as a sort of freemason, and Arthur Hallam thought it worth his while to pen "a respectful though adverse essay on the subject." But his best claim to the admiration of posterity is that he was the father of his famous son.

Those who are interested in the question of the Modern Picture-Market recently discussed in the ACADEMY, may be glad to have a few details of the sale by auction of his paintings conducted at Willis's Rooms last week by Mr. Wynford Dewhurst, R.B.A. The sale attracted eight new buyers, who were total strangers to the artist, and "fifty-guinea" pictures, which sold for five pounds at the corresponding sale last year, fetched as much as sixteen guineas this year. So far from "offending the dealers," the plan seems to have attracted them, as no fewer than three of Mr. Dewhurst's buyers were dealers, and he has already, as a result of the sale, been offered a free exhibition in Bond Street, whereas he had previously been asked anything from eighty to four hundred guineas for an exhibition, and one dealer had asked so much as half the works exhibited and twenty per cent. on all sales, the artist paying the cost of advertising and cataloguing. The second of the ten yearly sales, therefore, which Mr. Dewhurst has resolved to hold before despairing of modern art as a means of livelihood, has met with some success, and the third will be held in June 1907.

At the last sitting of the French Academy, which numbered nineteen of the immortals, the dates were fixed for the formal admission of three new members. M. Alexandre Ribot will be received on December 20 as the successor of M. Guillaume; next, on January 17, comes M. Maurice Barrès, elected to the chair of M. José-Maria de Heredia, and on February 7 Cardinal Mathieu, who follows Cardinal Perraud. The sponsors are respectively M. Paul Deschanel, M. Melchior de Vogüé, and le Comte d'Haussonville. On February 12 members will discuss the claims of candidates to two other chairs—those left vacant by the death of M. Albert Sorel and M. Rousse—and two days later will proceed to the election. Among the candidates for these two seats are le Marquis de Ségur, M. Maurice Donnay, and M. Marcel Prévost.

Reuter sent some particulars of the journey of Madame Cabra across the Congo State, but in view of its interest the fuller details published in the Belgian Press may be interesting. In April 1905 Madame Cabra left Naples in company with her husband for German East Africa. They reached Dar-es-Salaam, the capital of that colony, in May and proceeded thence via Mombasa and Uganda to Lake Victoria. They crossed the lake to Entebbe, the capital of Uganda. This easy journey, accomplished with little difficulty, reminded a Belgian officer, who covered this route in old days, that of twenty-five Belgian expeditions along the same way little more than twenty years ago only six reached the great lakes. At Entebbe again commences the caravan journey, which was the only known means of locomotion in Africa in the last generation. Madame Cabra and her husband, travelling in this way, reached the region of lake and mountain which extends from Lakes Albert and Kivu to Tanganika. This African Switzerland, in which Ruwenzori represents Mont Blanc, made a deep impression upon the travellers. Here the volcanic region impressed them in particular. The travellers, proceeding westward from Mahagi, reached the Congo River at Kassongo, and thence travelled, sometimes in canoe, sometimes in steamer, down that river to Stanley Pool. This part of the journey occupied a month, and Madame Cabra's observations of the people were not confined to notes, but included numerous photographic records of their mode of life and tribal customs. We have reason to believe that Madame Cabra proposes to publish an account of her journey across Central Africa without delay.

Mr. Tree revived on Monday night, for three weeks, his spectacular production of Richard II. Mr. Tree himself takes the part of the King and his portrait of that spoilt child of fortune is one of the best of his Shakespearean characters. Miss Viola Tree as the Queen, Mr. Lyn Harding as Bolingbroke and Mr. J. Fisher White as John of Gaunt are all effective. The pageantry of the play—the lists at Coventry, Bolingbroke's entry into London, the coronation of Henry IV.—is presented with such splendour that it must be appreciated even by those who pretend to like their Shakespeare unadorned. It is all correct, too, or ought to be, as the York Herald (Mr. G. Ambrose Lee) directs the heraldry and ceremonial; so it is courageous indeed to suggest that the saddlery was that of the twentieth-century yeomanry. But even if a hundred trifling anachronisms were to be detected, the public would be little the worse. The point is that they will go to see Shakespeare finely staged, and will not go to see him otherwise.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—A Christmas course of lectures, adapted to a juvenile auditory, will be delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. W. Duddell, on "Signalling to a Distance; from Primitive Man to Radiotelegraphy" (experimentally illustrated). The dates of the lectures are December 27, 29, 1906, January 1, 3, 5 and 8, 1907, at three o'clock.

British Museum (Natural History) Lecture Theatre of the Victoria and Albert Museum, at 6 P.M. Swiney Lectures on Geology: Monday, November 26, Lecture X., Western Plain of Europe. Wednesday, November 28, Lecture XI., Eastern Mediterranean Region. Friday, November 30, Lecture XII., Western Mediterranean Region. Illustrated by Lantern Slides.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, at 8 P.M., Monday, November 26. Cantor Lecture: Mr. A. D. Hall, on Artificial Fertilisers. Wednesday, November 28: J. W. Gordon, on Patent Law Reform.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus.—Monday, November 26 at 5 P.M. Mr. Raymond Blathwayt on Egypt, Past and Present. Illustrated. Thursday, November 29 at 6 P.M. Rev. W. Manning on The Middle Class.

Art Exhibitions.—Grafton Galleries: Works of the late Archibald Stuart Wortley.—Views of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens by Mary L. Breakell. Open to December 3.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metal-work, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie: Tales and Towns of Italy by Jessie Bayes. Drawings by Annie French. Pastels by T. R. Way. November 28 to December 22.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc.: October 22 to January 1.—Graves Galleries: London Sketch Club: October 27 to end of November. Paintings of Flowers in Oil by Louise E. Perman.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—Messrs. Dowdeswell: The Society of Twenty-five English Painters: November 2.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—R. Gutekunst: Etchings by Rembrandt, Ostade and Van Dyck. November 5 to December 3.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. November 5 for one month.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. November 7.—Tooth and Sons. Pastels by Arthur Wardle. November 7.—Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi and Co., Friday, November 2. Exhibition of the portrait of Lord Milner, painted for the Town Council of Johannesburg, and other pictures by M. Theodore Roussel.—Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours; Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club: Dering Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. November 10: Tinsel Pictures by Miss Birkenruth and Water-colours by C. A. C. Jeffcock.—Messrs. Graves. Nocturnes in oil by Miss Marguerite Verboeckhoven, November 10 to end of month.—Leicester Galleries: November 24. Arthur Rackham's "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens." Water-colours by W. Lee Hankey, P. A. Hay, Hugh Norris, Graham Petrie and Terrick Williams.—W. B. Paterson: November 17. Pictures by W. Nicholson.—Fine Art Society: November 17. Miniatures by Miss Eulabee Dix. Landscapes in Cornwall and Devon (water-colour) by S. J. Lamorna Birch. Water-colours of Cities of Spain by Henry C. Brewer.—Royal Photographic Society, 66 Russell Square: November 6 to December 22. 11–5. Photographs by Henry W. Barrett. Admission on presentation of card.—Modern Gallery, 61 New Bond Street. Mater Christi, by H. Salomon.

Plays: November 29 at Chester. Three of the Chester Mystery Plays: The Salutation, The King's Play, The Shepherd's Play. The performance will be repeated at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, on December 4, 5 and 6, at 9 P.M., and December 4 and 6, at 3.30 P.M.—Stage Society. Scala Theatre, December 9 and 10. The Weavers, by Gerhart Hauptmann, translated by Mary Morison.—New Theatre, Cambridge. The Eumenides of Æschylus in the original Greek, acted by members of the University. November 30 and December 1, 3, 4 and 5 at 8.30 and December 1 at 2.30.—Lincoln's Inn Hall. December 12 and 14 at 8.15. December 13 and 15 at 3.15. Eager Heart, by A. M. Buckton.

Concerts.—Saturday, November 24: Queen's Hall. Chappell Ballad Concert, 2.30. Aeolian Hall: Cherniavsky, 3.—Sunday, November 25: Royal Albert Hall, 3.30.—November 26, Royal Albert Hall: Joachim Quartet, 8.—Monday, November 26, Aeolian Hall: E. Rislen, 8.—Tuesday, November 27, Aeolian Hall: R. Buhlig, 8.30.—Wednesday, November 28, Bechstein Hall: Joachim Quartet, 3.—Wednesday, November 28, Bechstein Hall: Wessely Quartet, 8.30.—Wednesday, November 28, Queen's Hall: Albert Spalding, 3.—Thursday, November 29, Aeolian Hall: Edouard Rislen, 3.—Friday, November 30, Bechstein Hall: Plunket Greene, 3.30.—Friday, November 30, Bechstein Hall: Miss E. Mullen, 8.—Saturday, December 1, Queen's Hall Symphony Concert, 3.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge: November 29 and 30. Sale of English Coins.

Messrs. Hodgson, November 23. Sale of Old English Books from Whitley Beaumont Yorks, including three Caxtons in one volume.

LITERATURE

A NEW ESSAYIST

Winged Words. (Lane, 7s. 6d. net.)

"WINGED WORDS" can scarcely be termed a modest title for this collection of essays. If the author had searched for a phrase that is at once descriptive and familiar, he might have taken Olla Podrida, Trifles, Table Talk, or something of that kind. The book is a long and rambling one, in which the author deals with a vast number of subjects briefly and disjointedly. He writes very well and is fastidious in taste, but we have discovered nothing in the volume that would warrant the title-phrase as a correct description. Indeed, our critic is best when dealing with the infinitely little, as, for example, in his discourse concerning the peculiarities of women. The "winged words" he addresses to them may be guessed at from the following:

Coming out of a theatre one night I beckoned the driver of a hansom who caught my eye; no sooner had he made his way up to the kerb than two women in evening dress pushed violently past me, jumped into the cab and drove off, the driver no doubt imagining that I had hailed the cab for them.

This may be quite true, but it is not very Homeric. Here is another of his delightful little observations.

I overheard once a wealthy lady, who lived in a large country house, explaining to another (as well off as herself) that when it was necessary to hire a vehicle from the station it was 2s. 6d. if you took the fly direct from the station, but if you walked up the station drive and took one in the road outside it was only 2s., adding, "That's what I always do."

He sums up numerically the minor characteristics of the feminine temperament. The first is that "a woman cannot believe that it is really time to start for a dinner engagement or a train;" the second that "women cannot be content to take their own turn at a railway booking-office window;" the third is the very curious one that "a woman cannot draw houses or other buildings vertical in a picture or sketch;" the fourth that "women cannot steer a boat." After discussing the last at some length, he comes to the conclusion that it is "entirely out of the track of her instincts." Here, evidently, is a reformer of manners worth listening to! In his first chapter he makes a protest that certainly has more truth than novelty about it, against the use of slang by both sexes and particularly by young women. We seem to have heard before of the misuse of "quite" for "very," and the employment of "awfully" as an intensive. The example he gives of this is of a little fellow addressing his mother and saying: "Mother, may I introduce Tom Smith; he says you are awfully decent." The girl who says of another: "She's a great pal of mine," and who makes common use of the term "beastly," certainly deserves to be reprehended, even if she may be only following the fashion of the time, and be, in spite of all this, in her own lingo, "awfully nice." We have heard too—to follow our author's example and jump from one theme to another—that London is very provincial. There is a little essay on the saving sense of humour, but we wonder where it was when the author found a title like "Winged Words" for these minute criticisms. It is true that he sometimes approaches higher things; but his meditations on deity and our material surroundings want boldness and depth. Our critic, like a great many others, has lost the anchorage of his youth, and his consolation is that we are the manifestation of the Divine Spirit of the Universe and that:

He who can believe and act upon this conception, can feel it as a reality influencing his daily life and aspirations, has surely no need of the shackles of a formal creed binding him to the services of a personal God, the creation of his own finite imagination.

But it is in his minute criticism that our author is always most delightful. He would be even more so if he would define his terms. What does he mean, for instance, by Philistinism, as used in his discussion of the Philistinism of eminent novelists? Apparently he considers that artist Philistine who does not understand the arts he does not practise. In Jane Austen, for instance, he discovers the Philistinism of "pure and innocent ignorance." His example is the following:

Consider, for instance, the description of the singing at the party at the Westons, when it was a mark of culture and interest on the part of a gentleman to interpolate "a second, slightly but correctly taken," as an accompaniment to the lady's song; and Jane Fairfax's music that was sent to her with the piano: "and here is something quite new to me. Do you know it? Cramer. And here are a new set of Irish melodies." "Cramer" was apparently a name Jane had heard, though she evades any attempt to define the particular composition, just as she never thinks of mentioning the authorship of that wanton play that was rehearsed in Sir Thomas's billiard-room.

Thackeray is described as a rampant Philistine, because he preferred a pantomime overture to classical music. If our essayist had reversed his engine, so to speak, it would have been easy to show that painters, whom he seems to consider the only true artists, usually take a light, airy, and altogether erroneous view of literature. In fact, one of the most amusing chapters is that devoted to misquotation of poetry, where it is shown that artists frequently misquote the bits of verse of which they make titles to their pictures. In a recent Royal Academy catalogue an artist misquoted the final line in a passage of "Paradise Lost:"

And o'er the night her silver mantle threw, instead of "And o'er the dark." Another misquoted Tennyson's

The splendour falls on castle walls,

If we were to examine critically our own author's remarks about some translations, it would not be very difficult to fasten the charge of Philistinism upon himself, but here, again, his glory is found in the infinitely little. He crucifies the translator who translates the "Oui, monsieur" which a French lady will address to her fiancé as "Yes, sir." Miss Blind sinned abominably in translating Marie Bashkirtseff's "Aussi où diable place-t-il l'amour, M. Dumas?" as "Then where the devil does M. Dumas place love?" He points out that it would have been a more correct English equivalent to have said "Where on earth," or "where in the name of goodness," and he concludes resignedly: "But such are the tricks of translators." His comments on verse translations are truisms, only he does not seem to recognise that at the best, language, as Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, is but the algebraic sign of the thoughts in a man's mind, and that those symbols at the best only convey approximately his ideas. The fuller and richer a man's thought, the less easily is he translated. Thus Byron is as good in some of his continental translations as in the original, whereas Burns is untranslatable. By the bye, speaking of Byron, he appears to be one of our author's favourite poets, but though he refers to Byron's "unforgettable stanzas and unforgettable lines," the only one which he gives as being masterly, is this summing up of Voltaire, whose talents

Breathed most in ridicule—which, as the wind,
Flew where it listed, laying all things prone—
Now to o'erthrow a fool, and now to shake a throne.

Poor Byron! one sighs. Is this the most that can be said for you? In the pathos of intense simplicity, the examples he culls are from Rossetti and Shelley. The sentence from the former contains sixty words, which does not seem very simple at a first glance and will not compare for a moment with such an expression as that of Shakespeare:

After life's fitful fever he sleeps well; or the simplicity of the famous dirge in Cymbeline. The Shelley passage is from The Cenci:

And yours I see is coming down. How often
Have we done this for one another! Now
We shall not do it any more.

This is the best quotation in the book. One is sorely tempted to poke a little fun at this author, chiefly for the reason that he takes himself so very seriously. He is not a thinker of any great depth, but he seems to have an alert mind and plenty of sympathy. The writing, as we have already hinted, is excellently clear and good from beginning to end, so that we are seldom in doubt about his meaning. As a volume of table-talk the book will be found entertaining.

MRS. GASKELL

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell. With Introductions by A. W. WARD. 8 vols. (Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net each).

NOTHING that Mrs. Gaskell has written is perfect and eternal like "Cranford," and yet her full reputation is apt to be limited by "Cranford's" immense popularity. For it is almost as exceptional to find a man who does not know "Cranford" as it is to find a man who has read her longer and more serious work, "Mary Barton," her first novel, or "Ruth," or "Wives and Daughters," or "North and South," or those admirable short stories united under the name "Round the Sofa," containing "The Poor Clare" and "The Manchester Marriage." So it is with great pleasure that we welcome this new and comely edition of her works, which is produced under the direction of Dr. Ward. In the preface he explains that he has undertaken the task owing to the express wish of Mrs. Gaskell's daughters, Miss Gaskell and Miss Julia B. Gaskell; and there is certainly no one who could have performed it with equal grace and efficiency. The first volume contains his short but illuminating biography; and to each successive volume he has written a charming and discriminating introduction: his critical acumen only serves to heighten his devoted reverence for Mrs. Gaskell's genius, and his knowledge of the times and places which she interpreted throws new light upon the beauty of her interpretation.

In 1838, when Mrs. Gaskell was twenty-eight years old and had been married six years, she wrote to her friend Mrs. Howett about some work which she had undertaken in collaboration with her husband: it is practically her first literary work, and in her letter she expressed her aim in doing it. This is what she writes:

We once thought of trying to write sketches among the poor, rather in the manner of Crabbe (now don't think this presumptuous), but in a more seeing-beauty spirit; and one—the only one—was published in Blackwood, January 1837. But I suppose we spoke our plan near a dog-rose, for it never went any further.

Her first novel, "Mary Barton," was not completed until 1847, and her manner had changed and developed from the experimental poem; but her aim remained for ever the same. She wrote and wrote always—even to her last work, "Wives and Daughters," which was still unfinished at her death in 1865—in a seeing-beauty spirit. And therein lies her charm and her greatness. That spirit was so much part of her nature that there is no straining after the effect of beauty; there is nothing desperate about her attitude, nothing forced. And the circumstances of her life were beautiful.

Fortune cast no shadows across the path of her personal experiences save such as are the lot of mortality; and the fame which suddenly encircled her brow, before she had yet passed into middle age, was alike unasked and undisturbing. . . . Her husband, who had won her hand in the days of her beautiful girlhood, was the associate of the best and highest thoughts of her womanly maturity; and the honoured name that she left was safe in the care of her dearly loved daughters. On such a life who would wish to look back; to it who is not ready to look up?

Yet sympathy and love enabled her to see the evil and the ugly and the distressing things of life without shrinking: beauty never became suspect. She possessed the quiet strength and great courage which are needed to welcome the colour of beauty; for that colour often makes the dark moment or the ugly sight by contrast more poignant in its effect. A little story of hers called "Libbie Marsh's Three Eras" shows this peculiar ability with exceptional clearness. The spirit informs all her work: in the little story it seems crystallised. Her treatment is exquisite in grace and simplicity. We can think of no writer but Mrs. Gaskell who could have held the poise with such nicety: a moment's lack of grip, the slightest hesitation, and the story must inevitably fall and fall heavily: sordidness and false pathos crouch to catch her. For the story tells of a little cripple-boy, Franky, who dies, and whose death brings a kind of sweetness to his mother, a cross-grained woman whom her neighbours dislike, and establishes a bond between her and Libbie Marsh, the sewing-girl who had come to live in the court and felt very lonely until she sent the little boy a canary as a valentine and became his friend. So after his death the two women live together and Libbie Marsh . . . but this is Mrs. Gaskell's way of moralising:

Do you ever read the moral concluding sentence of a story? I never do, but I once (in the year 1811, I think) heard of a deaf old lady, living by herself, who did; and as she may have left some descendants with the same amiable peculiarity I will put in for their benefit what I believe to be the secret of her peace of mind, the real reason why she no longer feels oppressed at her loneliness in the world—she has a purpose in life; and that purpose is a holy one.

Apparent in this sentence lies the quality which saved Mrs. Gaskell from sentiment—void abyssm!—and that quality is her sense of humour. By the side of it George Eliot's humour pales to bitterwit. It is as much part of her character as the seeing-beauty spirit. The combination of the two (how rarely they go together it is only necessary to think for a moment to realise) form Mrs. Gaskell's greatness. It gives her the breadth of view, which humour alone can give, and balanced insight into character. And so of the conflicting interests, of masters and workpeople, of rich and poor, her treatment is always masterly; and whatever character she touches, whether it be the distinguished Margaret Hale, or the unswerving John Thornton, or the Nonconformist minister Benson and his sister Faith, or Ruth, to whom the Bensons give a home, or countless others, she is always able to endow that character with the charm of loveliness. Rarely, as in the case of Bellingham, who has betrayed Ruth, does that quality desert her, and at once her touch becomes heavy and her treatment prejudiced and unconvincing.

It is to Mrs. Gaskell, of all the Victorian novelists, that we turn to find the quiet beauty of Victorian life. George Eliot was a little beyond her time, and there was bitterness in her writing. The Brontës were too individual; their novels read like prose rhapsodies on their personal griefs. Dickens paints with such a grotesque assortment of colours, laid on so heavily, that his people seem creations of his own genius rather than human beings, though they share his tremendous animal spirits. Disraeli charms and bewilders by his brilliance and display—the exact opposite of Trollope, who soothes us with his laborious care. Mrs. Gaskell was eminently of her age. She alone among them was inspired by what was highest and noblest of her day. Others were stifled by it, like the Brontës, or loved it and sneered at it, like Thackeray, or were brilliant at its expense, like Disraeli. She was kept from sinking into its placidity by her intense sympathy with what was best in it, just as the other novelists (as is more usual) were saved from its lethargy by rebelling against what was worst in it.

The old order must change; but it is delightful to look back on all that was gracious and comely in that old order. And perhaps the best thing of that Victorian life was the instinct of the family. The thief circumstance had spoiled Thackeray's vision of that—"the angry man, with the hungry look in his eyes"—and had embittered George Eliot against it without giving her the right solution to the problems which she saw. But that family instinct informed Mrs. Gaskell's life, even as it informed her work with what Dr. Ward delightfully calls "her sweet serenity of soul."

Knowledge creates new responsibilities, and problems arise quite simply from the effort to adjust these new responsibilities to the old framework. Now, in the creed of the individualist and of the socialist the family is losing its old prestige. It is the day of the young. The duty of the old to the young is more regarded than that of the young to the old. Life has become more complex; and superficially it is harder and more material than when Mrs. Gaskell wrote. So we turn to Mrs. Gaskell and read her books for their beauty and peace and old-world kindliness and charm; such centuries are they removed from the stress of modern thought and the bustle of modern existence.

PROFUNDO PINDARUS ORE—II

The Olympian Odes of Pindar. Translated into English verse by CYRIL MAYNE, M.A. (Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes.)

THOUGH, as I have said, the Odes, from one point of view, formed a part of a religious rite, in fact an act of worship, the poems themselves were anything but religious poems. Pindar often, like the Troubadours in the Middle Ages, speaks of his art as "the gay art"; with him to treat a theme is "to play with" it, and he calls his song "a toy of Apollo's." The effect on the poet of the apparent triviality of his theme is curious. As the event is to the unthinking commonplace, he is resolved that his style and diction shall recoil as far as possible from the commonplace. Hence the elevation of language which some critics have mistaken for bombast. He sings of a boy who defeated four competitors in the wrestling match, and thus escaped the humiliation of returning home defeated. How is this expressed? "He put off from himself on four lads' bodies the home-coming most painful, the tongue to dispraise turned, and the furtive path." When a prosateur would have written "immediately on emerging from boyhood" Pindar says: "when reft from the beardless ones"; a cloak is "warm physick 'gainst the winds of heaven": "he never failed at Nemea" becomes "Nemea clave unto him." The smoke of the sacrifice puffing up in quick jets "kicks the welkin"; the fields after lying fallow "clutch back their strength." When we meet expressions like these we must remember not only how essential it was to maintain elevation in treating of homely themes, but also that Greek words are not exactly conterminous with English. "Methinks a whetstone shrilleth at my lips" seems to us too daring a figure to convey the meaning "here is that which urges me to loud song." But who shall say that ἀκονά came to the Greek ear with precisely that train of associated ideas which "whetstone" bears to ours? Even in our own language words have taken on meanings which now render almost ludicrous phrases which were once sober and dignified. When Chaucer alludes to "That conceited clerk Homere" we know that he intended to describe Homer as possessed of lofty imagination and deep learning, but we cannot help thinking of an overdressed Bank or Post Office functionary, or even

That commonplace type
With a stick and a pipe
And a half-bred black and tan.

Matthew Arnold ascribes to Pindar a kind of intoxication of style. He is steeped in style in a sense which is true of no other artist in words, in which he works with the same unerring touch with which Phidias wrought in marble. That "note of distinction" which the same admirable critic bids us to look for in every work of art is never hard to hear in Pindar, or indeed in any part of Greek lyric poetry. But to hear it aright we must have ears, and educated ears. The stilted and the dignified are as near neighbours as the sublime and the ridiculous. In Pindar we find a spiritual excitement, or exaltation, ever surging up but ever bridled in, as in the acting of Salvini and Sarah Bernhardt. Proverbial philosophy and dark mythical allusion suddenly flash into a semi-epical ballad, sparkling with Homeric jewels, always reset, but always reflecting the glamour of mythland—epic perfumes charged with the sweet associations of "faery lands forlorn," shining gems of speech which are in his own phrase "hid under flowers of fire."

The most amazing quality in the odes of victory is that while they seem to rush on with careless and impetuous might, so that Horace even called Pindar's numbers "lawless," there is good reason to believe that they are the result of the most elaborate but artfully concealed art, that these poems are constructed on a subtle principle almost peculiar to themselves. The ode radiates from a central point or "kernel" (ὀμφαλός) and expands into corresponding branches on each side. It begins with the middle. The kernel contains the myth. It is connected with the "opening" (ἀρχή) on the one side and the "seal" (σφραγίς) on the other by two "links" called the κατατροπή, or "fore-link" and the μετακατατροπή, or "after-link." It is very strange how these different joints (so to speak) of the poem seem in the immense majority of cases to stand in the same relation to each other and to the whole piece. The "opening" tells of the victor and his family. Then comes the "fore-link" which introduces the "kernel" containing the myth, from which again the "after-link" leads us on to the "seal" which recurs to the theme of the "opening." "Opening" matches "seal" and "fore-link" answers to "after-link." These two "links" are easily recognisable. They are invariably subjective, and refer to the poet and his art figuratively and nearly always by means of some nautical metaphor. The links constitute a kind of rubric. The "fore-link" says "here beginneth the myth" and the "after-link" says "here endeth the myth." The Greek mythology, it must be remembered, was in effect the Greek Bible.

When one thinks of the "kernel" thus set between the "links" like a jewel within the bevel of a ring, one is at once struck by an analogy in the sister art of architecture. In the pediment of a Greek temple the central sculpture is flanked on both sides by corresponding pairs of designs, until the whole pediment is embellished; just as the central "kernel" is flanked by the "opening" on one side and the "seal" on the other, to which in longer poems is added another corresponding pair, a "fore-opening" (ἐπαρχή) and an "exit" (ἐξόδοι). So when a stone is thrown into a lake the circles of retreating water are larger and more numerous according to its size. Now Pindar frequently refers to some invention of his as regards the structure of the ode, and there are several passages in which he speaks of this discovery in close connection with some similar device introduced into architecture. It seems then not an unwarranted inference that it was the treatment of the pediment in architecture which suggested to Pindar the peculiar structure of his ode, while to carry out his scheme he availed himself of the technique of the Terpantrian nome. It is very remarkable that those very pediments furnish the theme of some of his most beautiful episodes. Perhaps the finest picture in Pindar is in that Isthmian ode in which he describes the visit of Heracles to Telamon, when he came to seek Telamon's aid against Troy, when Telamon gave his guest a wine-cup rough with gold, and Heracles, as he stood there in the lion's skin, stretched forth his irresistible hands to heaven, and prayed for a son for Telamon of Eriboea's womb, "staunch as this hide which hangeth about me, the hide of the beast that I slew at Nemea: and may his heart be as stout as his hands." Now this is the very theme that embellished the eastern pediment of the temple of Athene in Aegina, which Pindar must often have admired when he conducted many a triumphal cantata in the favoured island, the home of so many victorious athletes. Hence we may well believe that when Pindar looked on the pediment of a Greek temple adorned with its central piece of sculpture and its corresponding groups of statuary on either side until the whole space was embellished, it occurred to him that this fine effect might be borrowed by the sister art of Poetry. Whether he really did borrow this device cannot be said to be ascertained for certain. If he did, it is only in the last few years that scholarship has discovered the mechanism of the wonderful toy, which is all the more beautiful since we have learned the secret.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

A PERIOD OF EUROPEAN LITERATURE

The First Half of the Seventeenth Century. By HERBERT J. C. GRIERSON, M.A., Chalmers Professor of English Literature in the University of Aberdeen. Periods of European Literature Series. (Blackwood, 5s. net.)

PROFESSOR GRIERSON'S book is chiefly valuable on two accounts. It gives one of the best summaries in English of the verse, prose and drama of Holland during the period under discussion, and it pays a more adequate tribute to the greatness of Donne than has been the custom of late in histories of English literature. The chapters on the English drama are somewhat thin, but that was to be expected in a volume which covers so much ground: it is an impossible task to do justice to the period indicated by the names of George Chapman and Shirley within the limits of fifty short pages, but Professor Grierson's chapter, short as it is, may be read without too painful a sense of breathlessness, for he has left out much detail, and wisely confined himself to general statements and a broad treatment. We cannot accept all his judgments. It is a little odd, for instance, to read that "Beaumont and Fletcher cultivated indecency." We agree with the preference given to "metaphysical" as the distinctive name for the poetry that is usually associated with the names of Donne and of his followers: to speak of them as "fantastics" has always seemed to us to be a sheer misuse of language. A sane word of warning is uttered concerning the "hazardous conjectures" of Mr. Gosse in the matter of Donne. Donne, one of the greatest in English literature, still lacks an editor. The work might very well fill a life of medium length, therefore he is likely to lack adequate attention until the study of literature is subsidised by a self-denying Trust. The ideal editor of Donne must be a patient collator, a good bibliographer, a cool critic, he must lack prejudices and be incapable of emendation.

We are glad to see that Professor Grierson has a good word to say for Herbert's poem on Aaron's dress. It is one of the most perfect in music and technique in the English language and it is one of the most neglected. He is less than just to Cowley, but that may be due to the temper of the age; and it is evident that he has never fallen under the spell of Browne's Pseudodoxia Epidemica.

The book would have been greatly improved by further revision. Some of the sentences need to be recast, e.g., speaking of Milton's sonnets, Professor Grierson writes: "the grand style to which he had finally attained in Lycidas is as evident as in Paradise Lost in these splendid, and in the history of English poetry so inspiring, poems." There is a reference to Balzac on p. 187 which does not seem to be indexed; the late Mr. Garnett appears minus one t on p. 193; the author of one of the best biographies in English appears as Mrs. Hutcheson on p. 242 and, on the following page, most tragic of all, Walton's Christian name appears as Isaac. We do not think Professor Grierson need have gone out of his way to cast doubts on Izaak Walton's accuracy. Later research has shown him in some things (e.g., the matter of Herbert's ordination) to be more accurate than modern editors and biographers.

But we would end as we began with an expression of thanks to Professor Grierson for his welcome addition to literary history, a work marked by much insight. It is always pleasant to see one's own thoughts set forth in happy phrase by others, and few sentences in the book have pleased us more than those which summarise what Professor Grierson has to say of Milton. "Milton's heaven," says he, "is not wanting in majesty and splendour. The poet was too deeply read in the Hebrew prophets not to have at his command magnificent images and sublime effects. Still, when we close the poem, we feel acutely that the poet has never caught a glimpse of the Beatific Vision, in which alone could be found the meaning of the great tragedy, and which lesser men than Milton—Giles Fletcher, Crashaw, Vaughan, Vondel—descried at moments. To that vision there is no access 'nisi per charitatem,' and some want of love was Milton's misfortune."

THE GREAT RIDDLE

Christian Theism and a Spiritual Monism. God, Freedom, and Immortality in view of Monistic Evolution. By the Rev. W. L. WALKER. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 9s.)

THE object of this book is to show how, apart from Idealistic philosophy properly so-called, the very argument of mechanical Monism can be turned against itself, and that, in fact, even on its own premisses, the universal supremacy of mind and reason accounts far better for the universe as it is than that of a material "substance."

This, of course, is no new idea: it has been pointed out before how, on the theory that the human brain is the result of a long course of evolution due to the interaction of subject and object from their lower to their higher manifestations, it follows inevitably that the external order, from which mind is thus derived, is itself rational. Nowhere, however, have we seen this thesis more lucidly and convincingly handled than by this able writer.

The first real difficulty he experiences in the course of his argument is when he seeks to pass from the merely immanent God of Nature to the immanent and transcendent God of Christianity.

And it is here, in the first place, that we are inclined to think he does not quite hit the mark. He seems to imagine that there is some danger in the increased emphasis which modern theology lays on the divine immanence. So there would be, from the Theistic standpoint, if the transcendent element were neglected. This, however, is by no means the case. But theologians are beginning to realise the significance of the truth that the idea of transcendence, the thought of the Absolute, itself is immanent in man, in the same way that the sense of externality, on which he rightly insists as that which makes purely subjective idealism impossible, is as much a part of the mental constitution as the idea of self. In fact, the crude notions of the material object and of the transcendence of Deity which belong to the unphilosophic mind stand on exactly the same footing. Mr. Walker so aims at maintaining an empirical position that he seems, if not to support these popular illusions, at least to condone them. And this, perhaps, exemplifies the weakness of this line of reasoning when once the purely phenomenal has been transcended. For, however we may seek to ignore it, we are then at once brought face to face with what is, to all appearance at least, a dualism of ideas which stand one over against the other in correlative opposition, of which the transcendent and immanent, the relative and absolute, are but a few of the terms of the whole series. The transcendence of God leads to another opposition, that between the Christian idea of God and the "cruelty of nature." It is useful, no doubt, to point out that this cruelty has been exaggerated, that we have no right to interpret the sufferings of the lower creation in the light of human consciousness. But, though such a plea may mitigate, it does not solve a problem that extends itself into the world of humanity, in which, for ages, man has inflicted indescribable sufferings upon his fellow man, often in the name of religion, in the name of God Himself. Before this problem can be met, it is necessary that it should be stated in unequivocal and unbiassed terms. This Mr. Walker fails to do. He is doubtless right in insisting that the doctrine of the struggle for existence has been too exclusively emphasised by the older school of evolutionists, and in following Prince Kropotkin and others by giving due prominence to the opposite factors of love and altruism, equally present throughout the whole process. But this serves only to make more evident the dualism that runs through the very core of things. Modern scientific method has shown that the older dualistic notion of two warring principles is untenable, but it has only made more apparent the presence throughout the whole of nature of the opposing forces of love and hatred, which, though complementary in the sense that they work together for a common end, in a common system, are yet, as principles, seemingly irreconcilable. The difficulty is to imagine how the Christian idea of a loving God can be reconciled with the creation of a world, in which every creature devours some other. And his repeated assertion that no other method of creation was possible, in itself a large and unproved assumption, only creates another difficulty in the Theistic concept by imposing upon God a necessity superior to His own will and goodness. Mr. Walker's statement of the difficulty gives but an inadequate idea of its real strength. Of course he would answer, and practically does answer—the whole trend of his reasoning is in that direction—that we must look to the moral results of the development for the real meaning of the process. This is the strength of the evolutionary argument for Theism. But here again he fails to realise the strength of the dualism which is but made the clearer and the more apparently irreconcilable, the further the moral element in man leads him away from the callousness of nature and forces him to criticise the very process of which himself and his moral ideas are the outcome. There is, of course, considerable truth in the view that what is good in a lower stage becomes evil in a higher. But though this may hold true in many cases, it certainly finds no echo in that deep and common sentiment of humanity which recognises the eternal and absolute difference between right and wrong, and therefore the explanation but brings to light one opposition the more. It would certainly seem as if, in the statement of the world-problem, some form of the Hegelian method were the right one, the positing of opposites in their hard abstraction in order that they may be transcended in a higher unity. But here the danger supervenes, in dealing with such very real and vital problems, of falling into mere abstractions and mistaking words for things. Mr. Walker is so far right: the philosophy of the future cannot be mere abstract idealism; it must come into touch with living, concrete facts. And over-generalising leads to looseness of statement and haziness as to facts and details.

Once more, the dualism that exists between phenomenal necessity and the interior sense of freedom receives here no adequate recognition, though the writer has no difficulty in refuting much of the rash and paradoxical reasoning of Mr. Mallock.

One more point must be noticed in this connection. The chief problem he sets himself to solve is the reconciliation of mind and matter, of subject and object. But, though he rightly insists, against Haeckel and his school, that the lower must be subsumed under the higher, the known under the knowing mind, here again he thinks to reconcile apparent dualism by denying its existence. It may be true enough to say that mind and matter are different, but complementary, aspects of the same reality, yet the difference remains, it is not resolved by this admission. Here the philosophy of the man in the street is at one with that of the idealist. The sense of the opposition between mind and matter is profound and radical. And the first analysis only serves to emphasise it, to make broader and deeper the gulf between the ego and phenomena, between the unextended and the extended. It is only by further consideration that the gulf is bridged. Hegellians have bridged it in their own way and have finally reconciled all minor oppositions in the Subject. Mr. Walker is right when he says that the method does not appeal to the ordinary man, but, though his conclusions are identical, his manner of reaching them ever evades the real crux of the problem.

As for the theological structure which he builds on this philosophy, its connections with the previous argument are of the loosest, and this fact is, after the manner of theologians, slurred over and concealed, instead of being made, as it ought to be, perfectly clear. The book is, however, well worth perusal, especially the earlier chapters.

YESTERDAY, TO-DAY—AND FOR EVER?

Some Irish Yesterdays. By E. CE. SOMERVILLE and MARTIN ROSS. (Longmans, 6s.)

THESE sketches of Irish life and character are as charming and as amusing as anything that the authors of "The Experiences of an Irish R.M." have ever done. Take the following account of how ordering meat from the butcher is managed in "a wild western place in Cork:"

When they goes to kill a cow there, they dhrove her out through the sthreet, and a man in front of her ringing a bell, and another man with her, and he having a bit o' chalk (and it should be a black cow). Every one then can tell what bit of her they want, and the man dhraws it out on her with the chalk. But it should be a black cow.

A better example of meiosis could scarcely be given than that in Slipper's A B C of Foxhunting which says:

C is for Check.
If ye go any faster
Ye'll be apt to be dhrawn into chat
With the Master.

It needs an Irishman to cope with the ways of Irish servants in a manner that is at all adequate to the occasion. To an Englishman the humour of the situation is not at the particular moment so apt to appeal. Could any one but an Irish mistress have preserved reticence on the abstraction of a pair of her shoes for use at a village festival?

"Himself's" remark, too, must be given, on finding that his boat had not survived the winter, owing to the pressing demands of the laundresses for wood to heat their coppers. "Begad," he said, regarding the culprits through his spectacles, "I believe you'd burn myself if I'd light"; and Rickeen's description on Mulvaney's dog: "Ye couldn't know what kind of a breed was in him, but ye'd have to like him, he was that spotted." Such touches are strewn thicker than ever through the pages of this book. And yet, when the last one is turned, it is not the humour and the frolic and the fun that linger in the mind, but rather a sense of sadness unrelieved by hope of the future. In the chapter "In Sickness and in Health" is brought out that perpetual wonder, the Irish marriage; the grossest commercial bargain that ever was haggled over, which yet, as years go by, in spite of the poverty and sordidness of its surroundings, becomes a very poem of faithfulness and affection, as in the case of the aged couple here described, of whom it was truly said: "Their hearts were within in each other."

In the last chapter the closing sentence runs:

The very wind that blows softly over brown acres of bog carries perfumes and sounds that England does not know: the women digging the potato-land are talking of things that England does not understand. The question that remains is whether England will ever understand.

And the beauty of the language and sentiments in which this appeal is couched by Irishman and Irishwoman on behalf of their people makes the answer which must be made on behalf of England seem yet more unsympathetic and prosaic. Still, it must be given, and it is this: in this workaday world neither England nor any other country where the men are honestly working out their own salvation by the sweat of their brow can or ever will understand a nation who, living ever in the past, dwelling ever on ancient wrongs, refuse when at home to do a fair day's work for a fair day's wage. In England the women would not be "digging the potato-land."

THE ODE OF SAPPHO "TO ANACTORIA"

[This fanciful completion of Sappho's ode (which breaks off after the first line of the fifth stanza) by adding three stanzas suggested by piecing some of the fragments together, is of course not offered as a serious critical attempt at restoration. The fragments are numbered as in Wharton's 2nd edition, the words in brackets being the connections supplied by the translator.]

BLEST as Gods immortal is he, meseemeth,
Who, when thou dost witchingly speak, may hear thee,
Darling, while his gaze upon thine eyes dreameth,
Sitting anear thee,

Hear thy laugh love-thrilling! In thy net tangled
Then my breast's bird wildly his wings must flutter!
One, one furtive glance—and my breath is strangled;
Nought can I utter:

Palsied fails my tongue; and a wildfire subtle
'Neath my skin is suddenly coursing, searing
These mine eyes blind: throbbeth my pulses' shuttle,
Stunning mine hearing.

Drops of anguish slip from my forehead: quivers
Every limb: parched grass by the sickle laid is Not so pale: my frame in a death-swoon shivers
Close unto Hades.

Yet I blench not!—ev'n to the beggar [gleaming
Treasure shines in dreams, that his sleep is golden:]
So my love hopes ever: in happy dreaming
Still am I holden.*

[Yet my dream is troubled,] as yearning, straining,†
[Empty arms I stretch,] and I wake with weeping.‡
Let the dawn-wind scatter my heart-sick paining
Swiftly down-sweeping!

Aphrodite, crownèd with gold, O give me
Love for my lot,§ [even my heart's dream-treasure!]
This, whereof my rival would fain bereave me,||
[Grant of thy pleasure!]

* . . . ἔγω δ' εὐμαῦτα
τοῦτο σύννομα (Frag. 15).

† καὶ ποθῶ καὶ μάμαι . . . (Frag. 25).

‡ . . . κατ' ἔμον στάλα-γμον· τὸν δ' ἐπιπλάζοντες αἱμοὶ φέροιεν καὶ μελεδῶνας (Frag. 17).

§ αἶθ' ἔγω, χρυσοστήφαν' Ἀφροδίτα, τόνδε τὸν πάλον λαχόν . . . (Frag. 9).

|| . . . ἔγω δὲ κῆν' δτ-
τω τις ἔραται (Frag. 13).

ARTHUR S. WAY.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

X—TRUTH IN ERROR

Is there truth in error? Does it hide in obscurity there? and can it be traced in its lurking-places? Most assuredly it is so; or the latter—the error—could not possibly live one hour. It was Bossuet, a Catholic prelate, who said: "Every error is a truth abused." Whether this applies to every one, or only to the majority, it is certain that it is the truth within it that enables each error to live. Every one knows that it is impossible for the most sincere lover of truth to be wholly free from error, that each opinion formed is a mixed product, that we all see through a glass darkly, and that no finite intellect can discover truth absolutely. It may startle some persons, who imagine they have found it, to be told that to reach "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" is a visionary dream; but it will no longer startle them if they realise that absolute truth is of necessity universal, not many-sided but all-sided. It is truth applicable to every object, in all conditions of existence, and in every possible world; while the small domain to which we are confined is that of the relative, the partial, the one-sided, and the contingent.

But even in this minor sphere of the contingent which we daily traverse, we cannot attain to infallibility. It is only an approximation that can ever be ours. We gather its tiny fragments together and laboriously save them up; but, like the flowers we pluck, they begin to decay as soon as they are gathered. We are subject to scores of illusions in reference to each of them, and even when we attain to a knowledge of what is true, the meaning of it rapidly fades, and we are unable to bring it back to consciousness as it was. Our knowledge becomes entangled in knots which we cannot unravel; and the result is sooner or later a hieroglyphic to ourselves as well as to others. But it is sometimes forgotten that a sadder fate than this would be ours were we able to attain to infallibility. Our symmetrical dogmas, placed as in a cabinet within us, would become fossils, dead petrifications. Nay more, it is the error, or fragmentary view that mingles with our vision of the real, that often makes the latter vital to us. They are a living possession, and they vitalise us, while we are striving to escape from the error and get nearer to the truth itself.

Grant that truth is not that which each man or any man troweth; that it is not a matter of fashion, custom or caprice; in other words that there is a standard of the true, and that the aim of each should be to separate the kernel from the shell in which it is contained. We know that our most firmly held beliefs contain some errors within them, else they would never be outgrown; and that our most erroneous ones possess some truth, else they would not be clung to so persistently. But then no error is ever understood until we discover how it arose. We are not in a position to reject it until we know from what it sprang, and we are bound to search for the root whence it arose; remembering the finite nature of the knower, and the bounded territory of the known. We find that errors often spring out of the exaggeration of a truth, from its being pushed to an extreme, or from our looking only at one of its aspects, forgetting that it has many. We therefore proceed to think it all over again. We place ourselves mentally at the place where it arose; and the very effort to do so gives us a new vision of its nature. If we think a predecessor has failed we put ourselves in his place and try the experiment over again. This almost invariably leads to a kindliness and a tolerance of which the world stands much in need. We come to see how the errors of the wise are more instructive than the truths which the foolish hold. It is because by their repeated cross-examination of received belief the wise are travelling towards the truths which are greater than any that a fool may chance to stumble upon. The question "What is Truth?" is as old as is the history of man; as old as the kindred question, "What is Duty?" And very many of our duties arise out of our answers to the question, "What is 'true'?" This vast inquiry cannot be entered upon here and now; but the question may be asked, "What are the common causes of error?" In answer, we are all of us less or more the dupes of custom. "Convention beats us down." Nolens volens we are influenced and often controlled by the opinions of our fellow men; and they frequently deceive us. What is our remedy, then? Unquestionably it is the exercise of doubt, the practice of a wise, reverent, courageous, honest doubt. Most of us instinctively cling to what we have been taught of old, because it is painful to be in suspense as to the validity of past conviction, or to run counter to the dicta of those who taught us; and thus it is that so many legends pass for history. We have personal, and family (or household) traditions, which we feel we cannot renounce; for,

In deep and awful channels runs
The sympathy of sire and sons.

And while the young reverence the aged, the aged as a rule remain fixed to what they learned in youth. They say "the thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and the thing that shall be, is now."

But if admiration for what is old, and has stood the test of time, is one source of error; fondness for what is new is another one equally great. It is worthy of note, however, that both spring from a healthy root. Regard for what is old may be due to reverence, and fondness for what is new may arise from sympathy with the ever developing spirit of the race, that evolution which brings out of its treasures things new and old. It might be useful to draw out a list of the common sources of error, but only a few need be mentioned: Rashness, precipitation, prejudice, a morbid imagination, jealousy, fear, vanity and conceit, false associations, lack of memory, illusions of the senses or of the fancy, diseased self-consciousness, and others too numerous to mention.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this. We know that error exists, but every error springs from some root of truth: and if the truth is sought for persistently through all illusion it will be found lying perhaps in the crypts of consciousness, or in the far recesses of our ignorance, but found it will be in the end. Its discovery will bring wonder, achievement, and rest. On an old Egyptian papyrus the following is written, "Let not him that seeketh cease till he find, and he that findeth shall marvel, and he that marvelleth shall reign, and he that reigneth shall rest."

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE POETRY OF WILLIAM BLAKE

THE publishers and the enthusiasts will soon have done their duty by Blake. Mr. Binyon's and Mr. Russell's books about his art are still to appear, but now we have an excellent reprint of Gilchrist's life,* a collection of the letters as complete as it can be made at present and very carefully annotated by Mr. Russell,† and a complete edition of the poetical works containing all the Prophetic Books, Jerusalem, the Nights of Vala, and the rest of them.‡ Tatham's Life, never printed before, does not tell us much about Blake that is not in Gilchrist, but it is worth printing, since Tatham in his youth was intimate with Blake, and he gives an account of Blake's character which confirms that of Linnell and others. Mr. Ellis is an enthusiast indeed, and would like to found a Blake society. His enthusiasm exults even in the Prophetic Books. "To understand Vala," he says, "is to understand all Blake," and no doubt he understands Vala almost as well as Blake understood it himself. But if he thinks that there are any deep secrets of life to be discovered in the Prophetic Books, I beg leave to differ from him with all possible deference. There is some disposition now to regard the Prophetic Books as having a kind of magic in them beyond what we find in the works of the great poets, who have said what they meant as plainly as they could. It is quite clear that Blake did not say what he meant as plainly as he could in them; and therefore the question whether they are to be admired as great works of art is one of some importance, since it involves some of the first principles of literature and of all art. It may be laid down as a first principle that one aim of all great literature is to make things as plain as words can make them; and further that the beauties of great poetry are the result of the effort to express things which cannot be completely expressed in words. Thus there is often obscurity in great poetry, as in Shelley's poem, "Light of life thy lips enkindle," but it is an unwilling obscurity, the obscurity of darkness pierced by a bright light; and we wonder, not at the darkness, but at the light that can reach so far into it. The obscurity of the Prophetic Books is of a different kind, it is systematic and often wilful, partly a matter of arbitrary names and catchwords, partly of imperfect allegory, partly of weak construction. In fact, Blake, though the most honest of men, played tricks with himself when he wrote these works. No doubt the indifference of the world discouraged him in the effort to express himself, so that he came to write for himself alone and satisfied his instinct for creation with catchwords and formulæ, which meant something to him through their associations, and which may mean something to us if we can get to understand those associations. But these catchwords and formulæ are really only devices by means of which Blake concealed from himself the fact that what he wrote was not poetry but the rough material for poetry. He always had a strong desire to be definite in every art which he practised. We know how he admired the Florentines for their clearness of outline and hated the Venetians for their vagueness. Nearly all his own pictures and drawings have very definite outlines. But in the inferior ones the definite outline does not express an equally definite invention; and in the same way the names of the Prophetic Books often have the mere definiteness of terms covering a vagueness of idea. They remind one of the strange words which metaphysicians invent when they try to think clearly of the unthinkable.

That the Prophetic Books are only the rough material of poetry we can tell from their form as much as from their matter. Form is produced by a successful effort to express great things. Such efforts have made all the forms of poetry. It is the struggle to make words do more than they can do in ordinary speech that has differentiated poetry from prose; and when that struggle grows weak in poets, their poetry tends to lose its form. When the effort of expression grew weak in Wordsworth he was apt to write formless blank verse. Blake, in the same case, produced the half rhythmical prose of the Prophetic Books. We may be sure that an English poet, when he is inspired, will write verse, since verse is the instrument which the ages have made for his inspiration. We may be sure that Blake, when he wrote the Prophetic Books, was only half inspired. He feared and hated prose like the Devil. Therefore he did not write prosaic blank verse like Wordsworth; but he wrote something which we cannot call poetry because it is too vague for poetry; and poetry, though it deals with difficult matters, is the clearest of all forms of speech. These are plain truths, and there ought to be no need to state them. But unfortunately many writers and readers now seem to be weary of the great ways of literature and to hope that in byways they may find some secrets unknown to the great masters of sense and language. There are no such secrets. It is not symbols or catchwords but the noble use of words that gives to them a sense beyond their plain meaning. That noble use is a sign of the effort to express great things; whereas symbols and catchwords are a sign that the effort is declined. We may be pretty sure that in the long run the Prophetic Books will weigh nothing in the world's estimate of Blake's poetry. If he had written nothing else they might give him a certain curious reputation, but since he has written the Poetical Sketches, the Songs of Innocence and Experience and certain other poems, his fame will be established upon these and it will be established very surely. Indeed, I make bold to say that Blake's finest poems are more sure of that long life which we call immortality than any other poems of his time except some of Shelley's. On second thoughts, they are more sure even than any of Shelley's; for, though Shelley's poetry compared with Blake's is like all instruments beside a lonely flute, yet the general mind of man has passed through many states, and may pass through them again, in which the best of Shelley's poetry would be incomprehensible; whereas no state of mind, short of absolute brutishness, can be imagined that would not take pleasure in Infant Joy, or The Tiger, or The Land of Dreams. These are nursery rhymes that should survive all nurseries and might be sung to wild children in a forest; perhaps will be sung to them when the descendants of the elm trees in Kensington Gardens harbour wild beasts on Notting Hill. When all our litter of bad tunes and bad verses has been cleared away with the fall of our civilisation, it may be that one of the immemorial tunes of the world, one of those that were sung in Babylon, will find the little poem called Infant Joy and will live with it for some hundreds of years, until that poem dies with the English language and the tune must wander about seeking a new mate.

* The Life of William Blake. By ALEXANDER GILCHRIST. Edited with an Introduction by W. GRAHAM ROBERTSON. (Lane, 10s. 6d. net.)

† The Letters of William Blake, together with a Life. By FREDERICK TATHAM. Edited by ARCHIBALD G. B. RUSSELL. (Methuen, 7s. 6d.)

‡ The Poetical Works of William Blake. Edited by EDWIN J. ELLIS. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus, 12s. net.)

At first sight, perhaps, Infant Joy looks as if it were an easy thing to write. Some might say that there was nothing in it; and if it were read aloud by some one with no sense of its beauty there would seem to be nothing in it; for no poem exists in which the sense depends more upon the right stress and the right phrasing:

"I have no name;
I am but two days old."
What shall I call thee?
"I happy am,
Joy is my name."
Sweet joy befall thee!

Pretty Joy!
Sweet Joy, but two days old.
Sweet Joy I call thee:
Thou dost smile,
I sing the while;
Sweet joy befall thee!

It will be noticed that it is a kind of dramatic lyric, a dialogue with the baby's part in it imagined and spoken, as it often is by those who talk to babies; and one seems to see the baby being danced up and down all the while. Besides this the metre insists upon certain stresses just like those laid by people who talk to babies. In the second verse, for instance, there is a strong stress on "pretty," none on the first "sweet," which comes in a rush of tenderness, but a very strong one on the second "sweet," when the word is repeated so naturally that one can almost see the speaker making a sudden rush at the baby's face after the manner of mothers and other fond persons. It is a poem, therefore, which expresses in the most exact manner something which happens every day all the world over. It expresses the most natural and wholesome kind of happiness known to mankind; and does this in twelve short lines without any parade or self-criticism or air of unbending. When Wordsworth writes a simple poem you often feel that he is trying to be simple for your good or his own; and there is too much reason in the Wordsworthian's way of regarding some of his poetry as a kind of purge to be taken for intellectual repletion. There is a Wordsworth Cure; but there is never likely to be a Blake Cure. His finest poems were written in the fulness of delight or sorrow or wonder about simple things; and it is such poems that endure through all changes of mind. We do not know how he came to write them. There is nothing in Gilchrist to tell us that. The Poetical Sketches were first published in 1783, when Blake was about twenty-six years old, about the time when Cowper's first poems were published, and three years before the first of Burns's appeared. Blake is said to have written "How Sweet I roamed from field to field" before he was fourteen, that is to say before 1771, and so about the time when Chatterton's poems appeared. Chatterton and Blake were the very first of the true romantics, but Blake is far the greater of the two, judging him only by the Poetical Sketches. Romantic poetry had been written before; but, except for a phrase or a line here and there, it had been romantic only in subject. The novelty of Blake's poetry was that it was romantic in sound as well as in sense; that the words were so used as to seem to have more power and meaning than was in their literal sense. The poetry of the eighteenth century, speaking generally, relied or tried to rely for its effect upon its sense alone. The romantic poets saw that prose may do that, but that poetry, to justify its existence, must have other means of expression; and in certain pieces in the Poetical Sketches we find these means employed with perfect understanding for the first time for nearly a hundred years.

Whether on Ida's shady brow,
Or in the Chambers of the East,
The Chambers of the Sun that now
From ancient melody have ceased.

Here, indeed, the words have as much power in their sound as in their sense. Here once again poetry is justified by its form, and the poet is no longer content to be merely more concise than the prose writer. One would give a good deal to know more about the early years of a man who thus rediscovered the glory of a great art in his youth; but there are some significant facts told by Gilchrist. When a pupil of Basire, Blake was sent out to make drawings in Westminster Abbey, particularly of the tombs. Thus he certainly got a remarkable understanding of Gothic architecture and sculpture, and, indeed, of the true principles of all architecture. In a letter written in 1800 he says of his cottage at Felpham:

It is a perfect model for cottages, and I think for palaces of magnificence, only enlarging, not altering its proportions, and adding ornaments not principles. Nothing can be more grand than its simplicity and usefulness. Simple without intricacy, it seeks to be the spontaneous expression of humanity, congenial to the wants of man.

In these words there is a clear anticipation of the doctrines of Ruskin and William Morris; and they were written at a time when no one else had a glimmering of these doctrines, when no one but Blake saw the difference between living and dead architecture, or the importance of architecture as an expression of the life of man. In the same way, no doubt, he saw the difference between living and dead poetry. He preferred the Elizabethans to the poets of his own time just as he preferred Gothic to the architecture of his own time. But he was not a mere romantic revivalist who loved past things because they belonged to the past. When he revived the art of poetry he did so to express his own thoughts and emotions. One or two pieces in the Poetical Sketches are like fine Elizabethan songs; but even in that book many of the poems seem more modern to us now than the great works of his successors; and afterwards he wrote poetry that seems newer than anything of our own time, as new, indeed, as some of the choruses of Euripides in Mr. Murray's translation:

Though thou art worshipped by the names divine
Of Jesus and Jehovah, thou art still
The son of morn in weary night's decline,
The lost traveller's dream under the hill.

Mr. Swinburne has explained this wonderful verse and given it a narrower meaning than it seems to bear, a meaning which, no doubt, Blake intended it to have; and yet the words with their sound and cadence seem to convey more than that meaning and to have a power beyond what Blake was conscious of when he wrote them. And so the great poem at the end of the preface to Milton seems to have a significance which may not have been present to Blake's mind when he wrote it:

And did the Countenance divine
Shine forth upon these clouded hills,
And was Jerusalem builded here
Among these dark Satanic mills?

To us that seems the first utterance of Ruskinism, as one must call it for want of the clearer name which no doubt will come in time to a faith that is still too young to have been baptized.

I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

The other great poets of that age seem to have been scarcely aware of the dark Satanic mills that were then growing up to be the tyrants of the future and already were destroying all the beauty of men's handiwork; nor were they much concerned to build Jerusalem in England's green and pleasant land. Wordsworth and Coleridge at this time (1804) were giving up Jerusalem as a bad job. Shelley was to build his city of God in the clouds, and, though eager to better the world by changes in political machinery, even he, the inspired visionary, had no foresight of the real dangers that were beginning to threaten the life of man. We cannot be sure that Blake had as much foresight as this poem seems to imply. His mind worked so strangely and so much by means of images with a peculiar meaning of their own that it is often difficult to tell how much or how little he meant. But whatever it meant to the man who wrote it, this poem seems to us to be more full of the new faith and passion of our own time than any poem of that age, and this cannot be an accident. We may be sure that in the depths of Blake's vast and brooding mind were ideas half formed and prophetic that sometimes forced their way to the light without his knowing all their significance. He was accustomed to express himself with an audacity that shows he had an extreme confidence in the workings of what we should now call his subconsciousness; and sometimes, as in this case, that confidence was wonderfully justified.

A. CLUTTON-BROCK.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Pleiad," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

Periwinkle. By LILY GRANT DUFF. (Murray, 6s.)

MANY writers have depicted fascinating, irresponsible girls who passed through life over the hearts of men and women by some sort of unhuman charm. Periwinkle belongs to this order: but Miss Grant Duff makes her excel all the Pams and the Irresponsible Kitties of whom we have ever heard or read, because she has endowed Periwinkle with deep feeling and an uncommon understanding of what is beautiful. There is nothing fragile or flimsy about her. Her fairy origin only makes her imperiously vital and human. She utters truths which are startlingly profound, and not only utters them; she moulds her life upon them. The character of Periwinkle is a really great conception. The excellence of the treatment lies in its delicacy and amazing freshness—its reckless glad sincerity; and naturally its defects are those of inexperience. The introduction is whimsical and dreary; it has no apparent reason for its existence except perhaps as a sop to the Cerberus of convention, who is afterwards properly ignored. But the faults are trivial—chiefly this tendency to whimsical diffuseness—compared with the many qualities; and we are delighted that such a book should have been written.

Round our Square. By HENRIETTE CORKRAN. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

"CELEBRITIES" and "Oddities" seem to blossom beneath Miss Corkran's pen. A more motley collection of Bohemians than the one she gathers together in the old Bloomsbury square can hardly be imagined. Eight of these genial, but eccentric, souls are authors, two are artists, the rest critics who have been authors or artists in their day. There are also three important cats, Sultan, Tom and Palmyra; a fat white terrier and a black pug. The story is told by a young lady who, judging by her success among the art critics of "the Square," wields her brush with greater skill than her pen. We could wish that she would not hurl her information at the reader's head in short, sharp sentences, which are both irritating and difficult to follow. We are whirled from one subject to another with bewildering rapidity. In one brief, dry sentence we are told that "I promised in a year's time to be his wife." In the next that "Caroline went to stay with her aunt in Paris"; and so on, with a curtness which is almost Ollendorffian in its breathless incoherence.

The Hearth of Hutton. By W. J. ECCOTT. (Blackwood, 6s.)

PRINCE CHARLIE again! All novel-readers love the Stuarts, which is a good reason why novel-writers should love them too. And after all, although historians cry "Fie!" and history-books lament for England's sake, we owe a debt too deep for repayment to these men, weak, vacillating, unadmirable and passionately beloved as they were. We owe to them Jacobite music and Jacobite poetry, and these exert over us the same fascination that inspired the loyalty and devotion of which they tell. Queen Victoria, following as she did the Puritan—the Roundhead—ideal, was proud of her drop of Stuart blood, and listened with joy to the songs that breathe of hatred to her much closer kindred, the Georges. It is in the name of this Stuart cause that we read with interest stories that have not much intrinsic merit; and although "The House of Hutton" is neither a good history nor a good romance, each purpose spoiling the other, yet for the sake of the Stuart motif we read gladly to the end.

Nedra. By GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

THIS is the story of a young couple of rich Americans who, in order to escape from the fuss attendant on the publication of their engagement, arrange to elope on the day following the announcement. But this elopement has to be made to extend over a period of two months owing to the girl being unable, under the terms of a will, to marry until she has completed her twenty-third year. They write down the names of far-off lands and she draws one. Manila is thus chosen, and it is with the events of their lengthy journey, a journey long enough to allow of a change of partners, that the story deals. So farcical a plot demands a very light and humorous touch, and here the author fails, for though he gets amusing situations, the treatment of them is poor, and the dialogue is conspicuously without humour. Moreover, he falls back on pathos here and there to help the story through. We are told of one of the couple who were wrecked on an island, that "the feeble sprout of Christianity was planted by the good British girl;" she also planted a far from feeble sprout of another nature in the heart of the young American, and they waited with some anxiety to hear whether her husband—a wicked peer—had been drowned in the wreck.

Growth. By GRAHAM TRAVERS (MARGARET TODD, M.D.). (Constable, 6s.)

WE can always rely upon finding good work in any novel by the author of "Mona Maclean" and "Windyhaugh." She has generally something to say that is worth hearing, a keen eye for character, and a literary gift. The present volume contains a record of the mental and spiritual growth of a group of students and others; but particularly of Dugald Dalgleish and his friend Thatcher, both sons of Nonconformist ministers. After struggles, doubts and wanderings in worldly byways, Thatcher finds peace in the Roman Catholic priesthood, and Dalgleish becomes a popular preacher. The book repays careful reading, and, if we sometimes feel that we are studying a treatise on "Religion in relation to temperament" rather than diverting our minds with fiction, we honestly admire the author's thoroughness and all-round fairness of view. The tone is dignified and sincere, the story gravely interesting: it is also, though we say it with regret, many pages too long.

Don-a-Dreams. By HARVEY J. O'HIGGINS. (Duckworth, 6s.)

THE structure of this novel is simple, and the characters are pleasing types, but for the most part types we have met before. At first, when we were introduced to the dreamy poetical boy misunderstood by his father and his governess, we thought we were going to be bored. Dreamy poetical boys are usually tiresome. But Don-a-Dreams is lovable, and as soon as he gets to New York he is amusing. In his early youth he had a fight with an unpoetical cousin that astonishes us because we believe on good authority that when boys of Anglo-Saxon blood come to blows they do not bite and scratch, whimper hysterically, whine like criminals, and cry. These boys were English Canadians, and when the author described their fight we think he must have drawn on his imagination. In fact, all the earlier part of the book is shadowy, and hardly prepares us for the vivid, admirable picture of life in New York that comes later. It is not life amongst millionaires, but amongst unhappy men on the verge of starvation, who take to strange trades and accept strange associates in their hunt for their meagre daily bread.

DRAMA

"THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA" AT THE COURT THEATRE

MR. BERNARD SHAW needs a course of the phosphorus pills prescribed by his John Broadbent. His nerves are out of order; he has lost some of his pluck and high spirits. And like people whose nerves are out of order, his individuality asserts itself (in The Doctor's Dilemma), not with the steady pressure of a man in health, but with the vicious little kicks we all deal when our nerves are out of order. We like him to be whimsical, uncertain, self-contradictory, discursive, shocking, and all the rest of it; to be, in fact, as "Shavian" (the world cannot but make free with that excellent word) as he can be. It is what he is "there for." But we like him to be all this consistently and fundamentally, we like to find himself in the stuff, the very gist and soul of his play.

The gist of The Doctor's Dilemma is no more Shavian than is the gist of The Two Roses or Sweet Lavender. It is an ordinary, old-fashioned, sentimental business dating from Sir Patrick Cullen's youth—no more than one of the old ideas which that dear old doctor found cropping up at regular intervals under new names. If new Nietzscheism is only old Calvinism writ large, and inoculation an old, old tale, Sir Patrick would certainly have been able to "place" the new "tragedy." Sir Colenso Ridgion (M.D., etc. etc.) can choose which of two consumptive patients he will cure: a virtuous, middle-aged, inefficient doctor, or a thorough young scoundrel of an artist, with whose legal wife (he had others) Sir Colenso happens to have fallen in love. To save her from discovering her husband's true nature (for that is his chief motive) he decides to let the artist die. And the artist dies. But his wife has seen through Sir Colenso's little scheme; and when the artist is dead, she will not accept "the hand that killed her Louis."

Those words are not a quotation from The Doctor's Dilemma; they come from the play as it would have been written by the dramatist of Sir Patrick's youth. We can all see that play in imagination: the temptation of Sir Colenso, his "better nature" succumbing; the death of Louis Dubedat; all leading up to the "great scene" in Act IV. when the secret will come out and Mrs. Dubedat will refuse with loathing the hand that killed her Louis. Of course, that is not how Mr. Shaw writes it. Sir Colenso's motives are mixed. The great scene is kept for a little epilogue, and is not great at all. Mrs. Dubedat refuses Sir Colenso not because he is a murderer, but because he is middle-aged, and because she happens to have taken a second husband already. But the atmosphere created by the plot is quite as old-fashioned, and to see it treated by Mr. Shaw is to see not Ayesha rejuvenated by the flames, but an old woman in a young hat.

The worst, the very worst, of it is that when the substance of the thing is not true Shaw, some of the decoration—which is true Shaw—looks ugly, and some of the substance looks foolish. The romantic devotion of Mrs. Dubedat to her husband's memory looked very foolish—strained and exaggerated. The death of Dubedat (which will surely make Mr. Archer cautious about challenging dramatists in future), with its antiquated rodomontade about the Creed of Beauty and Mrs. Dubedat's bosom, pointed with the poor humours of a farcical doctor, was mainly tiresome and troublesome, because Dubedat's morals, not his art, are the point at issue, and the world is too old to be taught that infidels and scoundrels can die very comfortably. Dubedat's exposition of his moral code, again, is too feeble and imitative to be interesting: and never before has Mr. Shaw committed so glaring a mistake in construction as to keep Mr. Eric Lewis (as the farcical doctor) babbling misquotations from Shakespeare about death so as to give Miss Lillah McCarthy (as Mrs. Dubedat) time to change her dress. If Mr. Shaw had taken Broadbent's prescription, he would never have allowed himself in his last two acts and his epilogue to fall into the old play-maker's jog-trot, and pretended he was going his own gait by cutting every now and then a higher caper than usual and crying: "It's Shaw after all!" It is not Shaw: it is a poor imitation.

There is, nevertheless, some genuine Shaw in the play. The second act, in which a whole dinner-party of doctors, great and small, with the exception of one Jew, find that Dubedat has privately borrowed money of each in turn, besides stealing a cigarette-case, is one of the best acts ever written. The first act, to an audience expecting what Mr. Shaw's audiences always expect of good things to come, seemed a little long. Half way through Act IV. they were sighing for it back again. For in that first act we had the doctors set working for our delight. The play is no attack on the profession. Of the six doctors, only two are fools—Sir Ralph Bloomfield Bonnington, physician to a certain Household which he always calls "The Family," and the instrument chosen by Sir Colenso for the murder of Dubedat; and Cutler Walpole, an incorrigible surgeon. One, Sir Colenso, is a man of real ability; and another, Sir Patrick Cullen, is a very wise old man indeed. But the characterisation of all is admirable; and (with the exception of Sir Ralph, who has appeared in a hundred plays these last ten years, and generally, as now, with Mr. Eric Lewis to portray him) they are all seen freshly through Mr. Shaw's eyes. Mr. Granville Barker did nearly his best with that pale reflex Dubedat, Miss Lillah McCarthy all hers with the mid-Victorian ghost called Mrs. Dubedat. Mr. William Farren, junior, was really excellent as Sir Patrick, and Mr. Ben Webster, Mr. Edmund Gurney, and Mr. Michael Sherbrooke were all good.

FINE ART

THE JEW IN ART

THE exhibition of Jewish Art and Antiquities at the Whitechapel Gallery should not be missed, either by Jew or Gentile. One of the greatest bores on earth is the Anti-Semite, and for him, at least, the show should be a liberal education. He will be disappointed to find no examples of those peculiar knives used in the ritual murders of young boys—that annual festival which is celebrated with becoming pomp in the brain of M. Edouard Drumont at the time of the Passover; and there is no refreshment stall at which you can purchase cakes leavened with the blood of the victims. On the other hand, the fine specimens of Kiddush Cups, Halla Cloths, and Hanuca Lamps, delightful objects from an archaeological point of view, will more than compensate for the thoughtless oversight of omitting more sensational utensils. And there is a piece of lead which, though catalogued as belonging to something else, I easily recognised as coming from the well in which St. Hugh of Lincoln was drowned. I will confess to a little disappointment myself at the exhibition, but for entirely different reasons. The art is inadequate. History, controversy, and archaeology predominate. No one expects the Jews to forget their wrongs, even in England; but Mr. Zangwill is always here to jog their memories; and hideous news arrives from Russia at regular intervals to remind us that the Jewish question is still a political and economical problem of which we may be sure that social quacks of the Nordau type have not found the solution. For next to the Anti-Semite among bores the Zionist bears the palm.

I should have preferred an exhibition confined to the art and ecclesiology of a great and ancient people to whom we owe our religion, indirectly our modern literature, and the motives of our inspired mediæval art. Europe put away her own sagas for good or ill, and accepted that of the persecuted people for whom the burden of obligation seems to have precluded all idea of forgiveness. Instead of murdering the Jews, England and America consoled them by vulgarising their scriptures, evolving therefrom more grotesque beliefs and abominable prejudices than were ever conceived by the children of Israel. As it would have been impossible to give an adequate survey of the Jewish art throughout the world within the confines of the Whitechapel Gallery, it would have been more harmonious to have limited the pictures, at all events, to those of Jewish artists who have worked or are working in England. Why import that dealers' favourite, Josef Israels, the Hebrew analogue of the Gentile Meissonnier? False sentiment with him takes the place of false atmosphere with the Frenchman. The "values" of both are said to be considerable, but it would be affectation to praise a veteran painter simply because he happens to be a Hebrew.

Had a principle of selection been exercised, we might have been able to gauge the effect of racial genius submitting to alien influence. All art is hybrid in its beginning, but we are seldom in a position to estimate its evolution resulting from the necessary intellectual coition between one nation and another of which art and literature are the natural offspring. Of all invaders the Normans, with the possible exception of the Greeks, have artistically been the most significant: and we find the love-children of these superb Don Juans far north in Durham and in the Palatine chapel at Palermo: just as from similar causes some of the Buddhas of the Hindu Koosh are carved with Greek features though fashioned long after the incursion of Alexander the Great. Since Cromwell's edict of tolerance there has been a steady invasion of England by the Hebrews, and we probably owe a great deal more to them intellectually and artistically than they are themselves aware or than we are ever willing to admit. One of the terrible and debasing qualities of the English is a Puritanism which, needless to say, has nothing in common with the noble Puritanism either of the cloister or the Eastern desert. Cromwell, who invited the Jews to England entirely for financial reasons (he was our greatest economist), had no conception that he was introducing a wholesome antidote to the detestable movement in which he and Milton are the atoning spirits. Where there are Hebrews there is no Puritanism. They have always been the brocanteurs of vertu because of their Oriental love of precious and splendid objects, quite apart from the exaggerated monetary value which has been placed on such things, it should be remembered, by Christian critics and Christian connoisseurs. Too much has been made, I think, of the second commandment. Moses, realising that among the chief defects of his own people was a certain lack of taste (the English have far too much) prohibited the use of human figures in art, except for purely decorative purposes, as the cherubims on the Mercy Seat. Great stress, however, is laid in Genesis on the achievements of Jabal, Jubal, and Tubalcain; and you can see the artistic sense asserting itself in the mysterious story of Micah's mother, the earliest instance of an art theft, resembling that of Gainborough's lost Duchess from Agnew's. In the instance of Rachel and the Laban collection, I think it may fairly be held that she had a sort of lien on the statues, though I do not know what a modern solicitor would have thought of the charge or whether he would have taken up what would be regarded as a fighting case. The elaborate directions given to Aholiab and Bezaleel for the decorations and design of the Tabernacle go to prove that, as in mediæval Italy, artists were kept in their place. It is not very hard to reconstruct in our imagination the exquisite results of their labours. Experts are divided as to how much we can really ascribe to Bezaleel, whom modern critics, in spite of Vasari (I mean Exodus), insist on relegating to the position of a sort of amico or alunno d'Aholiabo. I do not think it is unreasonable to conjecture that after the manner of the Van Eycks and the Limbourg brothers one of them supplied the cartoons and the other actually carried out the work. In this question of attributions and other inexact sciences such as folklore, where there are no facts, you may with perfect propriety invent them. Quite frankly, I do not see the hand of Bezaleel in any of the vestments now at Whitechapel, or that of Aholiab in the sacred vessels used in the beautiful ritual of the Jews.

Among the pictures by deceased artists only those by Solomon Solomon interest me very much, but so many of them are my own that I can praise them unreservedly. Solomon is an excellent instance of what I suggested about foreign racial qualities affecting autochthonous art. The Pre-Raphaelites owed far more to him than any of them, except Burne-Jones, admitted. There was that magic of the Orient in his art, so dismally absent from the West Kensington Hebrews you see in Mr. Holman Hunt's picture of Christ in the Temple. Solomon's father, it is interesting to remember, was the first Jew admitted to the freedom of the City, a privilege of which his son took perhaps undue advantage.

In the upper Room of the Gallery are the Modern Works, and here are several pictures by Mr. William Rothenstein—alone worth going to Whitechapel to study; they are not only interesting items of Hebrew ethnology, but superb examples of contemporary English painting. Mr. Rothenstein is one of the dominating factors in the new English Art Club, and it is obvious to every one how much he has influenced the younger men—Mr. Orpen, Mr. John, Mr. McEvoy—all of whom are now weaned and asserting their own vivid individualities; but how much they owe to Mr. Rothenstein only future Berensons will appreciate. Though Mr. Rothenstein is more of a painter than ever poor Solomon was, he stands in the same relation to his young Christian contemporaries as Solomon did to Rossetti and his circle. I wish it had been possible to have all his pictures brought together in the small single room, where, however, you observe a beautiful binding by Miss Josephine Birkenruth and admirable work by her brother Adolph.

English Art is too effeminate; and this, of course, is due to our unfortunate geographical position which has rendered us immune from military invasion for so many years. English artistic sensibilities are the wall-flowers in the European dance. They have lost their programmes, and you cannot reach them except through a chaperon. Henry VIII., Charles I., or Cromwell, as the case may be, have introduced Holbein, Vandyke or the Jews on different occasions; while in a later age Whistler and Sargent, without any preliminary introduction, have arrived from America with tomahawk and assegai. But the Jews in their capacity of orientals have corrected our primness and prepared us for these shocks. Their genius for music and acting as well as for the finer arts has been an important element in the slow civilisation of the English people and we can hardly be too grateful to them.

ROBERT ROSS.

MUSIC

ELGAR'S NEW ORATORIO

SIR EDWARD ELGAR'S most ardent disciples generally admit that The Apostles is a less successful work than The Dream of Gerontius, speaking of course of artistic, not merely popular, success; but they would add that its more comprehensive aim accounts for this. To some extent it is true; The Dream of Gerontius aims only at depicting certain vivid but limited human experiences as seen through the imagination of another man, while The Apostles tries to build by a series of pictures not only an impression of the human personality of Christ and the more prominent among the first disciples, but also, by reference to the events of the Gospels, to illustrate the founding of the Church with all its theological significance. It is not wonderful if the theme was too big for him, and it is an open question whether a great deal of such subject-matter is fit material for artistic representation of any kind, but to some degree he succeeded, because the qualities which in addition to his great musical gifts made him successful with The Dream of Gerontius come into prominence in The Apostles. Human interest is strong in the conversion of Mary Magdalene, the denial and repentance of St. Peter and the remorse of Judas, and above all these there is the religious element, another thing from the theological one, the devotional beauty with which he surrounds the figure of Christ and which makes the best moments in The Apostles almost an act of worship.

It has been followed by The Kingdom, the recent introduction of which to London by an excellent performance at the Alexandra Palace, with the fact that it is shortly to be heard again at Queen's Hall, makes the present a good opportunity to discuss it. Its scheme is by this time pretty well known to most people; after an orchestral prelude comes the first scene, which purports to be a meditative conversation among the disciples and is really abstract in character, then follows the choosing of Matthias and another chorus, again of the contemplative kind, which ends the scene. In the subsequent scenes the events of the feast of Pentecost, the healing of the blind man at the gate of the Temple, are fully treated, and finally there is one called "In fellowship," in which St. Peter and St. John return to the disciples and tell them of their arrest because of the miracle, after which the sacrament of "breaking of bread" is partaken of, and prayers, including a setting of the Lord's Prayer, are said. This bare statement shows that there is here even less selection than in The Apostles. In the earlier work the fact alone that Elgar passed over the Crucifixion itself shows how carefully he exercised his judgment in choosing his subjects, but here the uninspired incident of the lot falling on Matthias is treated as fully as the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost. The incidents seem to be set to music merely because they are recorded in the early chapter of the Acts of the Apostles; and since not one of them, except perhaps the healing of the blind man, calls for much human sympathy, and as scarcely any can inspire such personal devotion as do the events of the life and death of our Lord, The Kingdom is at the outset robbed of the highest qualities which The Apostles contains. The fact that the composer's own feeling is no less sincere than before does not completely atone for this; no amount of devotional music can remove this lack of interest in the work.

There may, however, be compensations; a badly constructed libretto which throws a composer upon his own resources may compel him to greater beauty of musical utterance, to more careful construction and to more perfectly conceived movements of abstract or contemplative music. In The Apostles the fragmentary nature of the music is its worst fault. Hurried on by the interest of the subject one fragment succeeds another without thought for any kind of musical construction or cohesion, the leit motif principle is made absurd by its indiscriminating use, and when, as in the finale to Part i., the composer tries to sum up what has gone before by a movement of abstract music to the words, "Turn you to the stronghold," his musicianship fails him and he has to fall back upon a few feeble musical platitudes. In the case of The Kingdom we are encouraged at the outset to hope that it will contain improvement in this direction by an orchestral prelude of some importance. It begins with a new theme, which presumably is associated with "the kingdom," and which is combined with the noble bit of plain-song melody which represents the mission of the Apostles. In the course of the prelude several themes appear which are of importance in the work later, and one or two of which are of distinguished beauty; moreover, they are dealt with at some length and used with a feeling for musical contrast which was absent from the prelude to Part ii. of The Apostles; it is, in fact, an effective piece of orchestral music such as Elgar understands well how to write, and no mere catalogue of representative themes. The chorus enters with the words, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and at once the spell which his orchestral music had skilfully woven is broken by the weakness of the choral melody and harmony. Here may be noticed a curious idiosyncrasy frequently indulged in; Elgar here and elsewhere makes his solo voices sing in unison with the several chorus parts, with, of course, no result except that of tiring the singers. In this chorus many ideas are suggested (while none are developed) in a way which would be beautiful could we trust that we should find their fuller development later. One or two other points of workmanship characteristic of the whole work must be mentioned. One is the repetition of the same words to totally different melodic phrases with different accentuation. Thus we have "so He was their Saviour" and "so He was their Saviour," and many other instances which cannot be made clear without music type. Another is the scrappy use of leit motiven so often complained of in The Apostles. Sometimes, when two or three important nouns occur in a sentence, the orchestra can scarcely get through the number of the fragments, which must be suggested by the accompaniment. So in this first scene we find the faults of the composer's earlier work perpetuated, while we are more able to criticise them because they are applied to no powerful theme, at any rate in the episode of casting lots for the new apostle. A fine point is reached where the chorus bursts out with the words:

O ye priests! seemeth it a small thing that God hath separated you to bring you near to himself.

The idea, both in words and in music, is a moment of inspiration and the composer treats it at length, fortunately always using the same melodic phrase at each repetition of the first exclamation. In spite of the fact that this is the only bit of musical material which is made permanent in a fairly long chorus, it is sufficiently powerful to give some feeling of unity to the movement, which no other, except perhaps the chorus, "Men and brethren, what shall we do," possesses. The duet called "At the beautiful gate" is full of the thoughtful beauty which redeems much of Elgar's loosely written music and the continued presence of the "dawn" theme in the orchestra gives it cohesion, but it is an instance of another peculiarity. The names "Mary" and "Mary Magdalene" are added to the soprano and contralto parts, but there is nothing which distinctively belongs to these characters; the only character who is really made clear is that of St. Peter, whose sermon on the Day of Pentecost is treated with dignity in the next scene. Through all the pentecostal music there is a great deal of meaningless complexity; vocal parts which have no identity but which make a brave show on paper, all of which culminate in one of those dreadfully commonplace sequences, to the words "The firstfruits of his creatures," into which Elgar sometimes relapses when his inventive power fails him. Against this must be set the dignified phrase to the words, "In the Name of Jesus Christ," which rescues the ending of this most important section.

In the latter part of the oratorio the same characteristics prevail, save that as the work continues its weaknesses become more wearisome and it is with difficulty that one can do justice to such things as the beautiful meditation at night, sung by the soprano soloist, called Mary, or the reverent treatment of the celebration of the Sacrament. The ending is most impressive, and as we listen to its simple and solemn utterance we realise, as in the ending of The Dream of Gerontius, that this has been the work of a truly lofty spirit in whom there is genius. The thought almost compels one to put criticism aside, and to trust that this latest member of the series of oratorios which Elgar has undertaken is after all a link in a scheme greater than is yet revealed, but it is not quite possible to believe this. The workmanship throughout it and The Apostles shows otherwise. The small points which have been mentioned would be indeed carping criticism did they not point to a more fatal weakness than that of a momentarily inadequate technique. They show that, so far from working on a large scale, the composer writes from phrase to phrase, often without regard for the joining places, and further that he is quite unaware that he is engaged upon a subject of which the interest must decline the further he gets from vital incidents which belong to the first number—The Apostles. It is for this reason that The Kingdom leaves one with a feeling of disaster; it is indeed tragedy to watch such great gifts as Elgar possesses used to less and less good purpose as each new work appears.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. METHUEN are about to issue a "Study of Blake," by Mr. Laurence Binyon, who has devoted many years to the study of Blake's career and influence. It contains a complete set of the illustrations of the Book of Job, reproduced in photogravure in the exact size of the originals. Mr. Binyon's introduction consists of three essays—on Blake the Man, Blake the Poet, and Blake the Artist—followed by a brief introduction to the "Job," and descriptive notes on the several plates.

Mr. A. W. Sijthoff, of Leyden, will publish very shortly as vol. xi. of his "Codices Graeci et Latini photographice depicti" the Codex Vindobonensis Lat. 15 of Livy in the Imperial and Royal Library of Vienna. The price will be £11 5s.; and Professor C. Wessely, of Vienna, will contribute a Latin introduction. The "Codex Lucretii Oblongus," which was promised for the spring of this year, will appear in the spring of 1907.

Mr. Austin Dobson has edited, with introduction and notes, the complete poetical works of Oliver Goldsmith, for Mr. Henry Frowde's series of "Oxford Poets." This volume is based on Goldsmith's "Selected Poems" issued in 1887 by the Clarendon Press; but it contains, besides the supplementary text, making the book complete, new editorial material, the bulk of which has been collected by Mr. Dobson at odd times during the last twenty years. A special feature has been made of the illustrations.

On Tuesday Mr. John Lane will publish a novel entitled "A Boy's Marriage," by Mr. Hugh de Selincourt.

Mr. John Lane announces for publication on November 28 "The Letters and Journals of Samuel Gridley Howe," by his daughter, Laura E. Richards, with notes and an introduction by F. B. Sanborn, and a preface by Mrs. John Lane. Like Byron, Howe volunteered his services to the Greeks, then fighting for their independence. Inspired by a love of freedom, a hatred of cruelty, and an eagerness to relieve suffering, the young American physician willingly sacrificed a remunerative practice to link his destiny with the patriots of a foreign country. His journals give a continuous account of this period.

A very handsome edition of Browning's "Last Ride Together" is announced for early publication by Messrs. Putnam. It will be very fully illustrated and decorated with photogravures and coloured wood-cuts from the designs of Frederick Simpson Coburn.

Messrs. Adam and Charles Black are about to commence the issue of "The Menpes Series of Great Masters," which are facsimile colour productions in picture form of some of the famous paintings in our own and foreign Galleries. The first ten pictures, which will be exhibited in London during December, will include reproductions from paintings by Gainsborough, Reynolds, Romney, Bellini, Botticelli, Greuze, Frans Hals, Rembrandt, and Van Dyck.

An extra number of the Connoisseur will be published on November 28 devoted to the life and works of George Morland, with upwards of one hundred illustrations in colour and monochrome and a complete catalogue of the published engravings.

Mr. John Long is adding the following volumes to his Carlton Classics series: Sonnets and Poems by Edmund Spenser; Essays (Selected) by Joseph Addison; His Book, by Artemus Ward; The Dunciad and Other Poems by Alexander Pope; English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century, by W. M. Thackeray; The Jumping Frog and Other Sketches by Mark Twain; Songs by Robert Burns; Essays (Selected) by Leigh Hunt; Letters of Junius (Anonymous); Confessions of an English Opium Eater, by Thomas de Quincey; Humorous Poems by Thomas Hood; and A Voyage to Lilliput, by Dean Swift.

CORRESPONDENCE

MALVERN FUNICULAR RAILWAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your readers may, I think, be quite easy about the proposed railway up Malvern Hills. I have good authority for stating that neither the Lord of the Manor nor the Board of Conservators of the Hills would for a moment sanction or even entertain any scheme of the kind.

A. J. BUTLER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you allow me, as an "Old Malvernian" who knows and loves the Malvern Hills throughout their entire range, to endorse the remarks of H. H. Johnson in your last issue on the proposed funicular railway to the crest of the hills. The erection of such a railway could only benefit two parties. Invalids who are anxious to obtain the purest air. Trippers who want amusement. The former can drive to the top along well-kept paths. The latter can climb, which would benefit them far more than being carried up.

It is to be hoped for the sake of all those who love beautiful scenery that this act of vandalism will never be allowed to be carried out. If it is, it will be enough to make the ancient Druids from Midsummer Camp, Caractacus from the British Camp, and Jenny Lind from the Wynds Point, all rise in their graves in angry protest against such a scheme. I will sign these remarks with the motto of my old school, as the words may induce the present authorities at Malvern to look into the future, and to pause ere they allow the Hills to be defiled for the comfort of the few, which are now the joy of the many.

SAPIENS QUI PROSPICIT.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The first line of the quotation from Browning in your issue for November 17, p. 501, offers an interesting little grammatical problem for such of your readers as are not wholly engrossed in the reform of spelling. The poet writes: "Tis Thou, God, that gives, 'tis we that receive." If the construction here can possibly be twisted into "It is that Thou, God, gives, it is that we receive," the Verb "gives" is still out of agreement with its Subject in Person. If, on the other hand, the construction be "It that gives is Thou, God, it that receive is we," the Verb "receive" does not agree with the Relative "that." Is this sentence of Browning's grammatically justifiable, or are we to regard it as an example of poetic licence such as Burns's "O thou pale orb, that silent shines" and "O thou . . . Wha . . . Spairges about the brustane cootie"?

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

November 20.

THE SOURCE OF BARON MÜNCHHAUSEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to your notes on this subject last week Rabelais (iv., chap. 55) on Antiphanes of Bergé is as follows:

"Daduantage, Antiphanes disoyt la doctrine de Platon es parolles estre semblable, lesquelles, en quelque contree ou temps du fort huyet, lors que sont proferees, gelent et glassent a la froideur de l'aer et ne sont ouyes. Semblablement ce que Platon enseignoyt es ieunes enfans, a poine estre d'ceulx entendu, lors qu'estoyent vieux deuenuz."

H. H. JOHNSON.

"SPELLING GONE MAD"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read Mr. Drummond's letter under this heading, and I feel impelled to ask him whether he can seriously and sincerely maintain that the spelling used in his letter is an improvement on the standard English spelling. May it with truth be called "simplified spelling"? It seems to me that it may be more properly designated "spelling gone mad." There are inconsistencies in our standard spelling, but those inconsistencies are justified in some measure by the past history of the language. But what shall we say of Mr. Drummond's spelling? Why, it can be easily seen from his short letter that his system (if "system" it can be called) teems with inconsistencies which deprive it of any scientific value, and render absurd any claim it may put forward of being a system of phonetic spelling. There is hardly a symbol he uses which is not made to have two or more phonetic values. There is hardly a sound which is not represented in Mr. Drummond's spelling by two or more symbols. And yet he claims that his brand-new "simplified spelling" should supersede the spelling which has been the gradual product of literary work for ages. Let us take his symbols for vowel-sounds. We will begin with i. In the word simplified the i has three distinct values; in ring one i has the sound in side the other the sound in fill. The symbol a represents distinct sounds in man, any, last, want, able. The symbol u represents the vowel in full and the vowel in but, compare wud, shud, cud with just, thrust, wun, wunder. The symbol o has four distinct sounds in from, told, government, thots. On the other hand the same sound is represented by more than one symbol. For instance: (1) side, by, eye; (2) may, they, training, generation; (3) cauz, thots; (4) truth, grew, hoo; (5) pleez, medium; (6) long, want; (7) lern, wurd, thirty; (8) yet, already, any; (9) use, beutiful; (10) wud, coud, book; (11) last, haaf.

In the treatment of consonants the same inconsistency is found, for instance: (1) shud, isuez; (2) charj, speech, picture, departure; (3) cile, serlain; (4) designate, dezist, hiz; (5) yeur, use.

I cannot for the life of me see what would be gained by adopting Mr. Drummond's "simplified spelling."

A. L. MAYHEW.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is humour in the fact—which I have but lately noted—that Messrs. H. Drummond and T. Talbot Lodge live in the same Durham village. Can we not imagine their meetings and discussions upon this topic of ours? Do we not hear Mr. Drummond, at the close of one such interview, rising into poetry and exclaiming in the impassioned words of Omar Khayyám (slightly altered):

Ah Lodge! could thou and I with Skeat conspire
To grasp the modern Spelling Scheme entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then
Re-mould it nearer to the Heart's Desire!

To which Friend Lodge, mournfully: "But what shall we do with this fellow Wallis? I fear he says too truly that our idea would mean a 'mechanical language'—a scheme sorrier than ever."

"Oh, as to that," rejoins the optimistic Mr. Drummond, "I'll talk boldly about Professor Skeat, and pretend that our opponent has, Balaam-like, blessed our scheme instead of cursing it; while you can make capital of that godsend, Wallis's slight grammatical blunder."

"Of course," now exclaims the other, "you do think of things, Mr. Drummond! I am doubtful which to admire most, your spelling or your logic!" And so the November evening conspiracy closes.

A truce to banter, however: let us now to business. To a large degree my objection to spelling reform in general, and to Mr. Drummond's ludicrous scheme in particular, is an æsthetic one. To most of those who have become familiar with the current spelling, any change therein—even to the dropping of "u" in such words as "honour"—must of necessity be repugnant. ("What," exclaimed the fond swain, "would 'parlour' be without 'u' in it!") But I see, as any one with half an eye can see, that the orthodox spelling is not scientific. A truly scientific scheme must have a sign for every sound, and here it is that Mr. Drummond's idea fails utterly. He thinks we can "get along with the old letters"; but that is a Laodicean notion which would sacrifice literary beauty while falling far short of scientific perfection. A sounder policy would be to do away with the "old letters" altogether and substitute Phonography (Pitman's shorthand). Let all our printing and writing be done in shorthand, and then we shall be as near perfection (of a sort) as fanatic—tut! tut! I mean phonetic—heart could wish. We might then effect that saving of school-time about which Dr. Macnamara and others are so greatly exercised in mind; and we should make every writer an expert penman, for shorthand does not of course lend itself to scrawling. Yet it affords great opportunities of cultivating variety in style, with its upward and downward signs for the same consonant, its contractions, grammalogues, and vocalised and unvocalised outlines. Unlike Mr. Drummond's new spelling with the "old letters," shorthand does not shock the eye. Imagine, for example, the first line of Keats's Endymion in phonographic characters, and compare it with the same in Mr. Drummond's style:

A thing ov buti iz a joi for ever;

or as some of us will have it if we spell "according to our own whim," as Mr. T. Talbot Lodge not quite scientifically proposes:

A thin ov booty iz a ji fer eva, which is somehow suggestive of a smuggler's present to his sweetheart.

Not only is Mr. Drummond's attempt to work with the "old letters" a futile one, but there seems to be no method in it at all. It is correct, I suppose, that his idea is to use the existing letters phonetically? Then why does he not do so? Why does he not drop the second "e" in "departez," why not spell "offises" "ofisez," "thots" "thawts," "driven" "drivun," etc.? Why not drop the aspirated aitches altogether? There is no economy in throwing away a letter oft what Huxley called "a sort of incipient cough." The Greek "spiritus asper" would suffice, and add to the absurdity of the effect, besides pleasing the pedants.

What, we may now ask, do the moderate reformers suggest? If I read them aright, they propose to alter the spelling by surreptitious instalments, popping in a phonetic form here and there when nobody is looking! But who is to give authoritative weight to these innovations? One gentleman talks of an editorial committee "to enforce a gradual change"; but he seems to overlook the difficulty of securing editorial unanimity in the first place; and, in the second place, of getting the great body of the people to accept the new spellings. He may depend upon it that the fighting spirit, if not the literary taste, of Britons would revolt against enforced reform; and the precious committee would break up in less than a month under a hot fire of letters from indignant subscribers of the affected journals. They would regard the innovators as seeking to constitute themselves a literary priesthood to transmit orthographical laws from an academical Sinai, and would, I am sure, resent the idea.

It is one thing for phonetic theorists ideally to construct a new spelling scheme, and quite another practically to apply it. They must not forget that they have to deal with persons; not with machines of one pattern. They must remember that school-life is at best only a fleeting incident in men's lives; that few of the things one learns there survive; and that education proper is obtained in the greater school of life and by one's own effort and experience. They must remember that pedants and reformers are in an insignificant minority and unpopular; and that generations of heredity are against them. They must, in short, remember that, ideally defective as our current spelling may be, it is a distinct evolutionary product which has developed with the growth of the race: and it seems to me they might as profitably essay to alter the character of the race as materially to affect its spelling.

J. B. WALLIS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In order to save any misapprehension, I should like to state that I, for one, do not associate simplified spelling with "spelling gone mad," but am solely concerned with the pros. and cons. of phonetic spelling, which latter is, well! still in nubibus.

Mr. Drummond thinks sufficiently strong proofs of the superiority of phonetic spelling have been furnished, but I regret I have failed to perceive them as, likewise, he has to reply to my arguments for the other side.

The one point, to my mind, on which the "whole hoggers" (phoneticians) might have had anything of a case is concerning the terrible hardships—supposed or real—a poor wretched infant has to undergo in learning to read its own English (or Anglo-Saxon) tongue! (?) Our reformers spoil it, however, by the undoubted exaggeration to which in their ardour they so frequently give way.

Mr. T. Talbot Lodge, as an instance, says that the marked success of the phonetic method of teaching to read definitely places the question beyond controversy (!) Really I utterly fail, on logical grounds, to comprehend how the learning to spell, say, "write" "rite," "phthisis" "tisis," "colonel" "kernel" or "philosophy" "filosofi," can be of such great help to school-children or to any one else. Certainly I have had no opportunity of examining these clever children and so comparing their knowledge of difficult spellings with that possessed by others taught on an ordinary or a derivative principle. I have, though, been given to understand that phonetic shorthand-writers frequently experience difficulty in recollecting the current orthography, and so often make curious errors when transcribing. As regards the school-children, exceptional aptitude must have been evoked thanks, I suppose, to the "science" of phonetics. By the way, since when has phonetics become a science apart from language? I might, also, remind Mr. Talbot Lodge that language is not logic—hence, not alone for English but for the acquirement of any language, it is memory that has to play the great rôle. In fact, it is not at all injurious for a child to have to exercise that most useful of all faculties—memory. Logic and phonetic science a child can dispense with it till grows up, and, presumably, thinks everything ludicrous that has not been fashioned in its day!

To Mr. Drummond I would remark that I consider a study of language and literature more useful than phonetics, and I assert that when in doubt as to the spelling of any out-of-the-way word I always find it helpful to think of the derivation. Any one who has a fair knowledge of Latin, Greek, French, etc., will be more likely to spell English words correctly than one who has not. English of to-day is not Anglo-Saxon only by a long way, but is largely made up of Norman, French, and other tongues. The difficult spellings from Anglo-Saxon source (some few hundred, perhaps) can be learnt off easily enough by a person of average capacity in spite of "the most able scholar who could not write half a dozen lines without the aid of a dictionary."

To instance the impossibility of an entirely phonetic spelling, we have of late years adopted a goodly number of modern French terms, also words from various other tongues, many of them most difficult of articulation to the ordinary Englishman. I should like advocates of phonetic spelling to say, each separately, how they would propose to indicate phonetically ordinary words like, say, boulevard, cheffonier, équiper, hors d'œuvre, voûte, and, then, a few proper names such as Champs Elysées, Tuilleries, Versailles, etc. Much of the difficulty and inconsistency in English spelling has arisen from the continual adoption of foreign words, and it is perfectly useless altering our spelling if we are going to allow any more foreign element to slip into the language. Really, as it is, no two persons ever pronounce even common words exactly alike—so that if we all started writing tomorrow according to our conceptions of the right sounds, English spelling in less than no time would only become "confusion worse confounded."

F. W. T. LANGR.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It needs a singularly delicate tympanum to distinguish between the vowel-sound in tongue and lung. I fail to find dictionary authority for the view of your correspondent. Tongue is more likely to be the invention of some mediæval pedant, desirous of an "ink-horn" setting of a homely English word, than of an endeavour to render the sound of long o. There are many words of Latin origin having the sound of the "dull" vowel, where the substitution of u for o would be a blemish, but the good old Teutonic tongue (tung) is no one of them. The present setting of the word is a masquerade.

While on the subject of spelling reform and before it is crowded out of the press, it may be opportune to inquire as to the opinion of constituted authority at home on the new departure in America. There may be many Britishers who would gladly help on the reform by complying with the request of the Simplified Spelling Board to use the three hundred revised spellings in their private affairs. But it is a daring proceeding and the boldest quails at the suggestion without the sanction of some recognised British authority. The Minister of Education is probably not yet available. But the British Academy whose charter confers a sort of custody of the English language is a tribunal eminently fit to adjudicate. That body has set its imprimatur on the pamphlet of Professor Skeat which repeats the proposals of twenty-five years ago and therewith the proposals of the American reformers and may be suspected of some sympathy for the movement. But a clear expression of opinion on the desirability of spelling reform in general and of the three hundred words in particular would greatly clarify the situation in the British Empire.

INQUIRER.

IN PETTO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Is it not time to protest against a journalistic blunder, which I was sorry to see reproduced in last week's ACADEMY? In an article on "Four Books of Poetry" the reviewer, after quoting a short poem, comments thus: "That is the whole of the poem; and many of these poems are no longer, for Mr. Tabb is perfect in petto." But in petto does not mean "in little." Petto is the Latin pectus; in petto is in pectore, and means "within the breast," "in reserve," "secretly." That is the only meaning, and it will not fit the sentence quoted.

C.

November 18.

LITERARY FEEDING-BOTTLES

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—In your last issue you appear to convey a wrong impression to your readers, which perhaps you will allow me to point out as it is a point of real interest.

The story in the "Book of Ballad Stories" which, as you express it, "is called here 'The Hunting of the Cheviot'" happens to be taken straight from a ballad of precisely that name, the most ancient of the Chevy Chase group, but of which your critic is apparently quite ignorant. He commits the usual blunder of confusing it with "The Battle of Otterbourne," an entirely different poem, which does not even refer to the same event, as a careful study of the two ballads will show. Otterbourne lies many miles south of the Border, while the whole point of "Chevy Chase" lies in the fact that the Percy went over into the Scottish territory of Earl Douglas to hunt. Why then, should the writer of the "Ballad Stories" drag in details from an absolutely different poem from the one under discussion? The death of the Douglas as recorded in the "Ballad Stories" is exactly as described in the ancient "Hunting of the Cheviot"; the only words spoken by the dying warrior were:

Fight ye my merry men, while ye may;
For my life-days ben gane;

and however beautiful the words spoken by his kinsman Douglas at Otterbourne there is certainly no reason why they should be taken from their rightful source and inserted here.

Your criticism conveys a wrong impression that a feeble paraphrase has been given of "The Battle of Otterbourne" instead of comparing it with the real original, "The Hunting of the Cheviot."

The impossibility of these two ballads referring to the same event is ably shown by Professor Hales, in the paper entitled "Chevy Chase" in his volume "Folia Litteraria," where the fundamental points of difference, too many to mention here, are clearly pointed out.

J. W. D.

[Our correspondent assumes that each story in the book mentioned is a paraphrase of a single ballad. But how far this is from being the case may be proved by a single reference. The story called "The Friar of Orders Grey" is in the beginning an expansion of Ophelia's verses in Hamlet.

"And how should I know your true love from many another one?" asked the friar.

"By his hat with a cockle-shell, and his staff, and his sandals, for he, too, is a pilgrim," answered the lady.

When Ophelia is played out, another Shakespearean song is brought in.

"Sigh no more, lady," urged the Friar, "sigh no more. Men were always deceivers, never constant to one thing. Hadst thou been fond to him, he would have been false to thee, and left thee sad and desolate, for since leaves first grew on trees young men were always found to be fickle."

Our critic's point was that in these Ballad Stories the poetry is nearly always left out, as was certainly the case in the death of Douglas.—Ed.]

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I ask your courteous help in making a literary appeal I have been asked to write the biography of G. J. Holyoake, and should be glad to see any letters of interest that some of your readers may have. They will be copied and returned as quickly as possible. The chief documents are already promised to me.

JOSEPH MCCABE.

16, Elm Grove,
Cricklewood, N.W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari. Arranged and translated by E. L. Seeley. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 325. Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.

[The binding design is adapted from a fifteenth-century example in the Laurentian Library at Florence. The title is after the middle-thirteenth-century B.M. Royal MS. 2, B. ii. Eight four-colour illustrations after Fra Angelico, Filippino Lippi, Giotto, Fra Bartolommeo, Pinturicchio, Perugino, Ghirlandajo, and Andrea del Sarto; and twenty-four half-tone plates comprising examples of the work of Cimabue, Giotto, Orcagna, Buffalmacco, Spinello, Andrea della Robbia, Ghiberti, Donatello, Filippo Lippi, Botticelli, Gentile Bellini, Leonardo da Vinci, Sebastiano del Piombo, Raffaello, Monsignori, Lorenzo di Credi, Parmigiano, Perino del Vaga, Bandinelli, Titian and Michael Angelo.]

Lethaby, W. R. Westminster Abbey and the King's Craftsmen: a Study of Mediæval Building. With many illustrations, drawings, and designs by the author. 9½ x 7. Pp. 383. Duckworth, 12s. 6d. net.

[The author's chief purpose is to give an account of the artists—the masons, carpenters, sculptors, painters, and other craftsmen—who built and decorated the Abbey. The introduction and first two chapters are intended to serve as a guide to the Abbey considered as a work of art; three or four chapters which follow are historical and technical, and the larger part of the rest are concerned with the mediæval craftsmen whose works are there preserved.]

- Lawton, Frederick. The Life and Work of Auguste Rodin. 9x6. Pp. 308. Unwin, 15s. net.
[Supplementary list of important pieces of sculpture not mentioned in the text, and a full index.]
- Coxhead, A. C. Thomas Stothard, R. A. An illustrated monograph. 9½x6½. Pp. 237. Bullen, 16s. net.
[Deals mainly with Stothard's work; a short account of his life is given in the first chapter.]
- Theobald, Henry Studdy. Crome's Etchings. 9½x5½. Pp. 107. Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.
[A catalogue and an appreciation, with some account of Crome's paintings.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Olives: the Reminiscences of a President*. By Sir Wyke Bayliss. Edited by his wife; with a preface by Frederick Wedmore. 9x6. Pp. 370. Allen, 15s. net.
- Conway, Moncure Daniel. My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East. Illustrated. 9x6½. Pp. 416. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.
[The bulk of the book is devoted to Mr. Conway's memories of and conversations with Buddhists, Brahmins, Parsees, Moslems, and others in India, and his impressions and observations of the country. Among some of the more famous people with whom he converses are Sir William Hunter, Madame Blavatsky, Sir Alfred Lyall, and such well-known Orientals as Pereira, Ramnathan, Arabi Pasha, Keshub Chunder Sen, the high priest Sumangala, the authors Subhuti and Mitra, and the Braham Positivist Mr. Ghosh. There are also memories of Joseph Jefferson, W. H. Furness, Robert Ingersoll, and John Bright. Illustrated with portraits and facsimile letters.]
- Ruggles, Major-General J. Recollections of a Lucknow Veteran, 1845-1876. 9x6. Pp. 185. Longmans, 5s. net.
- A Queen of Indiscretions*. The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. Translated by Frederic Chapman from the Italian of Graziano Paolo Clerici. With numerous illustrations reproduced from contemporary portraits and prints. 9x6. Pp. 363. Lane, 21s. net.
- Bearne, Mrs. Heroines of French Society in the Court, the Revolution, the Empire, and the Restoration. Illustrated. 8½x5½. Pp. 485. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
[Madame Vigée Le Brun; La Marquise de Montagu; Madame Tallien; and Madame de Genlis.]
- Alexander, Helen Cadbury. Richard Cadbury of Birmingham. With portraits and other illustrations. 9x6½. Pp. 448. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net.
- The Life of Sir Charles James Fox Bunbury, Bart.* With an introductory note by Sir Joseph Hooker. Edited by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry Lyell. With portraits and illustrations. 2 vols. 9x6. Pp. 782. Murray, 30s. net.
[List of his works and scientific papers at end.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

- The Book of Sports and Pastimes, Home Pets, Hobbies, and Many Other Interesting Recreations for Young People*. Edited by J. K. Benson. With 347 illustrations and diagrams. 8½x6. Pp. 314. Pearson, 5s.
- Strang, Herbert. Samba. A Story of the Rubber Slaves of the Congo. 8½x5½. Pp. 342. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

CLASSICS.

- The Satires of Juvenal*. With introduction and notes by A. F. Cole. 7x4½. Pp. 382. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
[In "The Temple Greek and Latin Classics." The text and Gifford's translations (1802) are printed on opposite pages.]
- Sophocles' Antigone*. Translated by Thomas Whitelaw. With introduction and notes by J. Churton Collins. 6½x4½. Pp. xlix, 56. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. net.

DRAMA.

- Peter, Thurstan C. The Old Cornish Drama. 8½x5½. Pp. 49. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.
[With illustrations from ancient Cornish sacred poems and miracle plays of other lands. Originally delivered as a lecture.]

ECONOMICS.

- Pigou, A. C. Protective and Preferential Import Duties. 7½x5. Pp. 117. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION.

- Connor, Ralph. The Doctor of Crows Nest. 7½x5½. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Drake, Maurice. The Salving of a Derelict. 7½x5½. Pp. 338. Werner Laurie, 6s.
[The Daily Mail £100 prize novel.]
- Meade, L. T. From the Hand of the Hunter. 7½x5½. Pp. 384. Long, 6s.
- Somers, Suzanne. A Serpent in his Way. 7½x5½. Pp. 319. Long, 6s.
- Harrison, Mrs. Darent. The Stain on the Shield. 7½x5½. Pp. 338. Long, 6s.
- Gerard, E. Honour's Glassy Bubble. 8x5½. Pp. 356. Blackwood, 6s.
- Gaunt, Mary; and Essex, John Ridgwell. Fools Rush In. A West African Story. 7½x5½. Pp. 327. Heinemann, 6s.
- A Lodge in the Wilderness*. 8½x5½. Pp. 378. Blackwood, 6s. net.
- Thuston, E. Temple. The Realist, and other stories. 7½x5. Pp. 148. Sisley's, n.p.
- Austin, Mary. The Flock. Illustrated by E. Boyd Smith. 8½x5½. Pp. 266. Constable, 6s. net.

GENEALOGY.

- Lawlor, H. C. A History of the Family of Cairnes or Cairns, and its Connections. 10½x7½. Pp. 292. Elliot Stock, 21s.
[Beautifully illustrated; five genealogical tables, and a full index.]

HISTORY.

- Benham, Canon. The Tower of London. 10½x7½. Pp. 104. Seeley, 7s. net.
[In Messrs. Seeley's "Portfolio Monographs." Beautifully illustrated. Index and a plan of the Tower of London from a drawing made between 1681 and 1689.]
- Butler, W. F. The Lombard Communes. A History of the Republics of North Italy. Illustrated. 9x6. Pp. 495. Unwin, 15s. net.

LITERATURE.

- Richter, Helene. William Blake. Mit 13 tafein in lichtdruck und einem druckbendruck. 9½x9½. Pp. 404. Strassburg: Heitz, 6m.
[Bibliography and index of names.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- The Tragedy and Comedy of War Hospitals*. By Sister X. 8½x6. Pp. 185. Murray, 6s. net.
- Bullen, Frank T. Our Heritage the Sea. With a frontispiece. 7½x5½. Pp. 338. Smith, Elder, 6s.
- Robinson, W. The Garden Beautiful. Home woods, home landscape. 9½x6. Pp. 394. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.
- Lang, Elsie M. Literary London. With an introduction by G. K. Chesterton, and 42 photographs specially taken for this book by W. J. Roberts. 7½x5½. Pp. 349. Werner Laurie, 6s.
- The Wayfarer*. Edited by Claude E. Benson. 6½x4. Pp. 252. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.
[An anthology of prose and verse.]
- Miles, Eustace. Life after Life; or, The Theory of Reincarnation. 7½x5½. Pp. 180. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.
- Falkiner, The Right Hon. Sir Frederick R. The Foundation of the Hospital and Free School of King Charles II., Oxmantown, Dublin, Commonly called the Bluecoat School. 9x6. Pp. 314. Dublin: Sealy, Bryers & Walker, 7s. 6d.
[With notices of some of its governors and of contemporary events in Dublin from the foundation, 1668, to 1840, when its government by the city ceased.]
- Settle, James Herbert. Names for Baby. 5½x4. Pp. 140. Pearson, 1s.
["A dictionary of Christian names with" (sometimes) "meanings, derivations, diminutives and pronunciation."]
- Graham, R. B. Cunningham. His People. 7½x5½. Pp. 287. Duckworth, 6s.
[Sketches, mostly reprinted from different periodicals.]
- Winged Words*. 9x6. Pp. 282. Lane, 7s. 6d. net.
[Papers on "Provincialism," "The Old Evangelical Party," "What Shall we Teach Our Children," "The Rodin Craze," "Space," "The Soul's Fortress," and so on. See p. .]
- Wardell, R. J. Highways in Bookland. A survey for general readers. 7½x5. Pp. 125. Kelly, 1s. 6d.
- Eckenstein, Lina. Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes. 7½x5½. Pp. 231. Duckworth, 3s. 6d. net.
- Gibson, W. R. Boyce. Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy of Life. 7½x5. Pp. 168. Black, 3s. 6d. net.
[The chapters were originally delivered as inter-collegiate lectures at Westfield College, University of London, during the Michaelmas term, 1925.]
- The Jewish Literary Annual, 1906*. Edited by Albert M. Hyamson. 8½x5½. Pp. 168. Routledge, 1s. net.

MUSIC.

- Lightfoot, J. The Theory of Music for Students and Teachers. 7½x5. Pp. 263. Ralph, Holland, 2s. net.
["Comprising the elements of music in both notations and elementary harmony; together with a short exposition on the principles of voice production and voice training."]
- Gilman, Lawrence. The Music of To-Morrow, and other studies. 7x4½. Pp. 144. Lane, 4s. 6d. net.
[Seven papers which have appeared in different American periodicals and have been revised for publication in book form.]

POETRY.

- Spensley, Mrs. Calvert. A Sheaf of Songs. 7½x5½. Pp. 46. Gay & Bird, 1s. net.
- Moore, William. The Holy Well, and other Poems. 7x4½. Pp. 115. Kegan Paul, 5s. net.
- Poems by Arthur Pfungst*. Translated from the third German Edition by E. F. L. Gauss. With a preface by T. W. Rhys Davids. Authorised edition. 7½x5½. Pp. 145. Kegan Paul, 5s. net.
- Johnstone, Alfred S. Erniana, and other poems. 7½x5½. Pp. 259. Birmingham: Cornish, n.p.
- Stevens, William. The Truce of God, and other poems. 7x4½. Pp. 155. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
[A new edition, in which some few poems have been omitted and others substituted.]
- Kelston, Beatrice. The Garden of My Heart. 6½x4½. Pp. 55. Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.
- Davenport, David. The Re-Union of Adam and Eve, and other poems. 7½x5. Pp. 43. J. G. Hammond, 1s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The London Library. Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Chisbury. Edited by Sidney Lee. Pp. xli, 214. The Life of Goethe. By G. H. Lewes. Pp. xii, 576. The Life of Shelley. By T. J. Hogg. With an introduction by Edward Dowden. Pp. xx, 585. Memoirs of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle. Edited by C. H. Firth. Pp. xlviii, 232. Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson. Edited by C. H. Firth. Pp. xix, 467. The Interpretation of Scripture, and other Essays. By Benjamin Jowett. Pp. xxiv, 535. Each 8x5½. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net, each.
- The Poets and the Poetry of the Nineteenth Century*. Robert Bridges and Contemporary Poets. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. 6x4. Pp. xxiii, 701. Routledge, 1s. 6d. net.

New and Important Publication

HOUSES AND GARDENS

BY H. M. BAILLIE SCOTT

*Over 200 Illustrations, 17 of which are in Colours
Art Linen, Medium 4to, 31s. 6d. net, post free, 32s.*

The Housing Problem has not only to be solved for the working classes. It is a problem with which all are intimately and personally concerned. In "Houses and Gardens" Mr. Baillie Scott advances principles of house planning which should be studied by all who, dissatisfied with the modern suburban villa, wish to obtain a house or cottage which shall be a real home adapted to meet the actual needs of the daily life of its occupants, both physical and psychical, instead of subscribing to the unworthy ideals of the house agent and the jerry builder as expressed in the modern villa residence.

'GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

SELECTIONS FROM THE
AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Publications
(PERMANENT MONOCHROME CARBON).

THE OLD MASTERS.

From the Principal National Collections, including the National Gallery, London; the Louvre, Dresden, Florence, etc. etc.

MODERN ART.

A numerous Collection of Reproductions from the Royal Academy, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery, the Luxembourg, etc.

G. F. WATTS R.A.

The Chief Works of this Artist are copied in Permanent Autotype.

ROSSETTI, BURNE-JONES.

A Representative Series of Works by these painters.

ETCHINGS AND DRAWINGS

by REMBRANDT, HOLBEIN, DURER, MERYON, etc. etc.

Prospectuses of above issues will be sent free on application.

Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

ENLARGED EDITION, with Hundreds of Miniature Photographs and Tint-Blocks of Notable Autotypes. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' Names.
Post free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA,
INCLUDING CEYLON AND BURMA.

Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Medium 8vo, with numerous Illustrations. MAMMALIA, £1. FISHES, two vols., £1 each. BIRDS, Vol. I., £1, Vols. II.-IV., 15s. each. REPTILIA and BATACHRIA, £1. MOTHS, four Vols., £1 each. HYMENOPTERA, Vols. I. and II., £1 each. ARACHNIDA, one vol., 10s. RHYNCHOTA, Vols. I.-III., £1 each. BUTTERFLIES, Vol. I., £1. COLEOPTERA, Vol. I., 10s.

London: Taylor and Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedlander & Sohn, Carlstrasse 11.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge

THE GOLDEN AGE OF THE CHURCH. By the Very Rev. H. D. M. Spence-Jones, M.A., D.D., Dean of Gloucester. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

THE ARCHÆOLOGY OF THE CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. Rhind Lectures by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Demy 8vo, cloth boards. [In the press.]

INSPIRATION. By the late Rev. F. Watson, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

TISSOT'S ILLUSTRATED LIFE OF OUR SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST. Taken from the Four Gospels, with Notes and Explanatory Drawings by J. JAMES TISSOT. Notes Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR BELL. Edition de Luxe, Imperial 4to, two volumes, half-vellum elegant, cloth sides, gilt top, £3 10s. (Original Price, £12 12s.); leather, £4 10s. (Original price, £14 14s.).

This Work contains over 500 Illustrations, printed in many colours, forming one of the most attractive books ever published on the subject. The Tract Committee, in view of the value universally attached to the Illustrations, have thought it wise to give S.P.C.K. clients the opportunity of purchasing this Work at a low price. The recent death of the artist lends a melancholy interest to this—his life work.

THE GUARDIAN says:—"We wish that every Clergyman could possess the book."

THE HOLY GOSPELS. With over 350 Illustrations from Paintings by the Italian, German, Flemish, and French Masters of the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth centuries. Notes on the Pictures by EUGENE MUNTZ, Member of the French Institute, and a Chronological and Biographical List of the Painters. Cloth, bevelled boards, gilt top, 28s.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS. The Shepherd of Hermas. By the Rev. C. TAYLOR, D.D., LL.D., Master of St. John's College, Cambridge. Vol. II. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

EARLY CHINESE HISTORY: Are the Chinese Classics Forged? By HERBERT J. ALLEN, F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

PROBLEMS IN LIFE AND RELIGION. By the Very Rev. C. T. OVENDEN, D.D., Dean of Clogher. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH IN SCOTLAND, INTRODUCTION TO THE. By the Rev. J. H. SHEPHERD, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S BRIEF ON BEHALF OF HIS NATIONAL CHURCH. By the Rev. THOMAS MOORE. New and Revised Edition. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 8d.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN MODERN LIGHT. By the late WALTER ALLAN MOBERLY, Canon of Southwark. With a Preface by the LORD BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE STORY OF THE APOCRYPHA: a Series of Lectures on the Books and Times of the Apocrypha. By the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE SACRAMENTS OF THE GOSPEL. Lecture Addresses. By the Rev. W. BECK, M.A. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

MODERN CRITICISM AND THE BOOK OF GENESIS. By the Rev. H. A. REDPATH, D.Litt., M.A. New Edition. Small post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d.

EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION, ON THE. With Reference especially to the Emmaus Narrative of St. Luke's Gospel, and to Recent Criticism. By the Rev. E. HERMITAGE DAY, D.D. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 6d.

CHRISTIAN WORSHIP: its Origin and Evolution. A Study of the Latin Liturgy up to the Time of Charlemagne. By Monsignore DUCHESNE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE from the Third Edition of "Les Origines du Culte Chrétien." Second English Edition, Revised with considerable Additions by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 10s.

THE LITURGY AND RITUAL OF THE ANTE-NICENE CHURCH. By the Rev. F. E. WARREN, B.D., F.S.A. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

CHURCH SERVICES AND SERVICE BOOKS BEFORE THE REFORMATION. By the Rev. HENRY BARCLAY, SWETE, D.D., Litt.D. Facsimiles of MSS. Crown 8vo, buckram boards, 2s. 6d.

"CHRISTIAN SCIENCE" CONTRASTED WITH CHRISTIAN FAITH AND WITH ITSELF. By WILLIAM LEFROY, D.D., Dean of Norwich. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE BIBLE AND MODERN INVESTIGATION. Three Lectures delivered to Clergy at Norwich at the request of the Bishop, with an Address on "The Authority of Holy Scripture." By the Very Rev. HENRY WACE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

THE DAWN OF CIVILISATION—EGYPT AND CHALDEA. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged, by Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE. With Map and over 470 Illustrations, including 3 Coloured Plates. Demy 4to, cloth, bevelled boards, 44s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 48s.

THE STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS—EGYPT, SYRIA AND ASSYRIA. By Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and over 400 Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 50s.

THE PASSING OF THE EMPIRES. 850 B.C. to 330 B.C. By Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and numerous Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 50s.

CHEAP REISSUE OF

ILLUSTRATED HANDBOOKS OF ART HISTORY OF ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES.

Edited by Sir E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A., and Prof. T. ROGER SMITH, F.R.I.B.A. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, each 3s. 6d.

ARCHITECTURE: CLASSIC AND EARLY CHRISTIAN. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and JOHN SLATER, B.A.

ARCHITECTURE: GOTHIC and RENAISSANCE. By Prof. T. ROGER SMITH and Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

SCULPTURE: EGYPTIAN, ASSYRIAN, GREEK, AND-ROMAN. By GEORGE REDFORD, F.R.C.S.

SCULPTURE: GOTHIC, RENAISSANCE AND MODERN. By LEADER SCOTT,

PAINTING: GERMAN, FLEMISH AND DUTCH. By H. J. WILMOT BUXTON, M.A., and Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

PAINTING: ENGLISH and AMERICAN. By H. J. WILMOT BUXTON, M.A., and S. R. KOEHLER.

WATER-COLOUR PAINTING IN ENGLAND. By G. R. REDGRAVE.

PAINTING: CLASSIC AND ITALIAN. By Sir EDWARD J. POYNTER, P.R.A., and PERCY R. HEAD, B.A.

PAINTING: SPANISH AND FRENCH. By GERARD SMITH.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43 QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C. BRIGHTON: 129 NORTH ST.

Printed for the Proprietors by BALLANTYNE & CO. LIMITED, Tavistock Street, London, and Published at the Offices of COUNTRY LIFE, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, and GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1804

DECEMBER 1, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

AN Examination for Two Foundation Scholarships open to girls under 16 years of age, will be held at the School on December 12, 13 and 14. These Scholarships exempt the holders from payment of Tuition Fees. Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Mistress of the School.

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT of the UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW will shortly proceed to appoint the following ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS:

(a) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ARTS, viz.: Five Examiners; (1) in Classics, (2) in Moral Philosophy and Logic, (3) in English, (4) in History, and (5) in Education. The appointment in each case will be for three years from January 1, 1907, at the following annual salaries, viz.: Classics, £80; Moral Philosophy and Logic, £50; English, £40; History, £40; and Education £21 with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(b) EXAMINER in POLITICAL ECONOMY for Degrees in Arts, Science, and Law. The appointment will be for three years from January 1, 1907, at an annual salary of £21. with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(c) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ART and for the PRELIMINARY and BURSARY EXAMINATIONS, viz.: TWO EXAMINERS; (1) in French and (2) in German. The appointment in each case will be for three years from February 1, 1907, at the following annual salaries, viz.: French, £50, and German, £30, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(d) EXAMINERS for the PRELIMINARY and BURSARY EXAMINATIONS, viz.: TWO EXAMINERS, (1) in Classics, and (2) in Mathematics and Dynamics. The appointment in each case will be for three years from February 1, 1907, and the remuneration will be on the scale of 1s. 6d. per paper examined for Higher Preliminary Papers, and 1s. per paper examined for all Lower and Medical Preliminary papers, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(e) EXAMINER in ZOOLOGY for DEGREES in ARTS, Science, and Medicine. The appointment in the first instance will be for a period of three years from January 1, 1907, at an annual salary of £50, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

(f) EXAMINER in PHYSIOLOGY for Degrees in Medicine and Science. The appointment in the first instance will be for a period of two years, from January 1, 1907, but the Examiner appointed will be eligible for reappointment for a further period of two years. The annual salary attached to the post is £50, with Hotel and Travelling Expenses in addition.

Candidates should lodge Twenty Copies of their application and Testimonials with the undersigned on or before December 22, 1906.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,
Secretary University Court,
University of Glasgow.

AUTHOR (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

MICROCOSM OF LONDON, or London in Miniature; 104 Coloured Plates by Pugin and Rowlandson. Methuen's Reprint, 1904; 3 vols., 4to, boards, published at £3 3s. net, for 37s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Philz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.
GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue for
DECEMBER Now Ready.
LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.
Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.
All Lists Free on Application.

CHAUCEER.—A Commentary on the Prolog and Six Tales. Rich in new matter. Subscription price, $2.00. Circular on application.—Address, H. B. HINCKLEY, 54 Prospect Street, Northampton, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD's Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD's GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

COLLEGE HALL, BYNG PLACE, GORDON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

RESIDENCE for Women-Students of University College and of the London School of Medicine for Women.

The Slade School Lent Term begins January 7.
Faculties of Arts and Science Lent Term begins January 15.

The London School of Medicine (Royal Free Hospital) Lent Term begins January 3.

Application should be made to the Principal not later than January 1, 1907.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

DECEMBER

- The Government and the Lords. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.
- The Labour Movement. By J. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.
- Amateur Estimates of Naval Policy. By Admiral Sir CYPRIAN A. G. BRIDGE, G.C.B.
- The Balkan Question and International Law. By Professor J. WESTLAKE, K.C., LL.D.
- The Race Suicide Scare. By JAMES W. BARCLAY.
- Islam in India: A Study at Aligarh. By Miss GERTRUDE LOWTHIAN BELL.
- The Escape of the Duchess d'Angoulême during "The Hundred Days." Contributed by Mrs. TRIBE.
- Reincarnation. By Lady PAGET.
- The Reading of the Colonial Girl. By Miss CONSTANCE A. BARNICOAT.
- Francesco Guardi. By GEORGE A. SIMONSON.
- The Study of Furniture. By the Rev. H. MAYNARD SMITH.
- The Ghent School for Mothers. By the Hon. Mrs. BERTRAND RUSSELL.
- The Virginus Incident and Cuba. By RUDOLPH DE CORDOVA.
- Physical Training in Stockholm and Copenhagen. By Mrs. SCHARLIEB, M.D., and Miss ALICE RAVENHILL.
- Friendly Societies. By Sir EDWARD BRABROOK, C.B. (late Chief Registrar).
- Henrius R. versus Thomas Beket. By the Rev. ETHELRED TAUNTON.
- The House of Lords and the Education Bill. By the Right Hon. Lord EVERSLY.
- What Will the Lords Do? By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

A SERPENT IN HIS WAY. By SUZANNE SOMERO.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Narrates some strange happenings in a sea-cave and in a disused cemetery at midnight.

A MINISTER OF FATE. BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Contains an exciting plot, throwing a vivid sidelight on two important social questions.

JOHN LONG, NORRIS STREET, HAYMARKET.

HAVE YOU BOUGHT YOUR BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS?

A. & F. DENNY will send their New Catalogue on receipt of name and address. The largest and most varied stock in London to select from.

A. & F. DENNY, 147 Strand, London.
(Opposite the Gaiety Theatre.)

PAUL'S INKS ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

Ready Shortly

A NEW AND IMPORTANT
VOLUME

Houses and Gardens

BY

M. H. Baillie Scott

Medium Quarto, 3ls. 6d. net; post free, 32s.

Containing over 200 Illustrations in black-and-white, and 17 Plates printed in Colour on Superfine Plate Paper. The Letterpress is printed on a high-class Wove Paper, specially prepared for this work.

The book is Bound in Morris's Art Linen, with Cover and End-papers designed by the Author.

THE MAIN FEATURE OF THIS WORK IS TO SHOW THE POSSIBILITIES OF BEAUTY WHICH LIE IN THE MERE BUILDING OF A HOUSE. THERE IS NO TOWN OR VILLAGE BUT IS BEING GRADUALLY DISFIGURED BY THE PLAGUE OF MODERN BUILDING, AND THE AIM OF THE AUTHOR OF THIS VOLUME IS TO SEEK TO RESTORE YET AGAIN THAT SERENE AND EARNEST BEAUTY OF THE OLD HOUSE WHICH IS EVERYWHERE BEING REPLACED BY A SUPERFICIAL SMARTNESS POSING AS ART

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
3-12 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	539	Nugæ Scriptoris :
Literature :		XI. Action and Reaction ;
The Duke of Cambridge	541	Whence?	549
Homer and his Age	543	The Text of Marston	550
The Future in America	544	A Literary Causerie :
Court Life in the Dutch		The Pleiad	551
Republic	545	Fiction	552
The Light Study of Con-		Fine Art :
chology	545	Portraits	553
That Nineteenth Century	546	Music :
Christmas Books :		Two Biographies	555
Books for Boys—I	548	Correspondence	555
From Rosamor Dead to Favonius		Books Received	557
for whom she died	549	The Bookshelf	558

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WE have received from a correspondent at Oxford some remarks which we find interesting as testifying to three things: a generous enthusiasm, almost mediæval in its tone, which our correspondent shares, we hope, with his fellow students; efficiency and interest in teachers, replacing the languid condescension which many older men remember as characteristic of their lecturers; and a general approximation of teacher and taught which is one of the best results of the modern movement that has made charming youth the most prominent feature of the University of to-day.

"Those who pretend to know," writes our correspondent "deplore that men of great inspiration like Jowett or Sidgwick are no longer to be found in our Universities. This is certainly not true with regard to the teachers of Literature at Oxford. Professor Raleigh has disciples, not pupils. A few weeks ago he was speaking of the relationship of Shakespeare to his age, and was saying that the Elizabethans, when they went to the theatre, wanted two things—murder and madness. He continued: 'They asked for murder—and Shakespeare gave them Hamlet: they asked for madness and he gave them King Lear.' A thrill swept over his audience, half awe, half admiration for a sentence, which contains so much. In the same way Mr. Mackail, the Professor of Poetry, has broken away from the usual disconnected lectures, and, although his lectures are given at irregular intervals, a unifying theme is apparent. Several months ago he spoke of the Progress of Poesy. Last term Homer was his subject. This term he has delivered two addresses full of suggestive reflections on Chaucer. Not only have frequent and delightful illustrations from Homer served to bridge the gulf, but an eloquent coda on Poetry of the higher order provides the thread, thin but not invisible, that attaches these lectures to the inaugural discourse." We are given to understand, too, from another source, that the lectures of the Slade Professor of Fine Arts are devoid neither of vigour nor interest.

The movement in favour of more humanity in the study of the classics, has had some influence even on that staid periodical, the Classical Review. Next year advanced scholars are to have the Classical Quarterly, and the original title is to represent a Review, which will pay more attention to the literary and educational sides of the classics. The names on the Advisory Board show clearly the new tendency. Professor Mackail and Dr. S. H. Butcher, M.P., have each written books, which are read as a joy, not a toil: and M. J. E. Page of Charterhouse is well known as a writer on classical subjects in one of the weekly reviews. It seems clear that, owing to the advent of a more utilitarian education, the standard of classical knowledge among journalists and men of letters is not so high as in former years. Not counting the Laureate's slip which was pointed out by a contemporary, two delicious examples have lately reached us. Mr. Hilaire Belloc recently allowed Dionysius to figure as the god of wine, and in a popular magazine Lucian, by a fine Malapropism, was made to figure as a (presumably) Japanese lady—Lucia of Samosaka.

A number of prominent Irishmen assembled on Saturday last at the grave of Thomas Moore, in Bromham Churchyard, Wilts, when a Celtic cross of Irish limestone, twenty-four feet in height, was unveiled in his honour. This tribute, which his countrymen have paid him, comes, indeed, to borrow his own words:

like a smile from the West,
From his own loved island of sorrow.

Sloperton Cottage, near Bromham, whither he migrated at Lord Lansdowne's invitation, was the home of his later years, and the tradition of his residence has survived among the people of the neighbourhood, who testified their genuine interest in last week's ceremony. Mr. Dillon expressed himself as deeply moved by the kindly welcome which he and his friends received. He dwelt upon Moore's excellence as a political satirist, while Lord Fitzmaurice emphasised his gift of melody.

Few but special students of the period will trouble their heads, nowadays, about Moore's satire; it is by his melody that Moore survives, chiefly in such ballads as "Oft in the stilly night" or "The young May Moon is shining, love," which once heard are not easy to forget. These things are "simple, sensuous," and (perhaps) "sincere." They can only perish when all mankind are more critical than sentimental. It is not long ago that that very able critic, M. René Huchon, raised a little feeling by contrasting, in a speech at Bath, Thomas Moore unfavourably with Crabbe and Bowles; but M. Huchon was undoubtedly giving voice to the best critical opinion of to-day. But no one could grudge Moore his little celebration. He was an Irishman, and a very clever one, and his verse has probably given more pleasure to readers in all walks of life than that of any poet of these last two hundred years. The days when young gentlemen coming to dine "brought their flutes in their pockets" are over. The flute and Thomas Moore have had their days as things of fashion. Nevertheless, there is Mr. Albert Fransella playing divinely on the flute at Queen's Hall, and Thomas Moore still bringing the tear to young and beautiful eyes.

We hope there is nothing offensive in pointing out that the shadow of the national bull was apparent at one part of the Wiltshire celebration. A paper of Mr. Justin McCarthy's was read, in which it was noted that in the works of Dickens there was only one quotation from a poem, and that poem was Moore's. This was mentioned (according to the reporters) as impressive evidence of the popularity attained by an intensely Irish poet among intensely English readers. An extraordinary inference to draw! A single quotation from an author does not go far towards proving that author's popularity, nor do we allege Shakespeare's two citations from (and one parody of) Marlowe as proof of Marlowe's wide acceptance. The most that a Saxon head would deduce from Mr. McCarthy's data is, that Dickens, unlike his own Silas Wegg, was not in the habit "of dropping into poetry."

Duff House, of which the Duke of Fife has recently made a public gift, is not without literary associations. In 1773, on his journey to the Hebrides, Dr. Johnson visited Banff. "I sent Joseph on to Duff House," it is recorded in his "Journal," "but Earl Fife was not at home." At Banff, Boswell tells us, "Dr. Johnson wrote a long letter to Mrs. Thrale . . . He verified his own doctrine," remarks, the faithful chronicler, "that a man may always write when he will set himself doggedly to it." Fourteen years later Robert Burns was more fortunate on the occasion of his visit to Banff, for on being conducted through Duff House he was so struck with the paintings of some of the Stuarts in the great drawing-room that he went over the mansion a second time. Southey, with his friend, Telford, the famous engineer, was in Banff in 1819, and in his diary makes interesting allusion to Duff House.

Giosué Carducci, who has won the Nobel prize, ranks with Gabriele d'Annunzio as one of the great poets of modern Italy. His literary bias is said to be due to an incident in his youth. He had a pet falcon and a tame wolf, but his father wrung the neck of the one and gave away the other. Hence the young Carducci took a violent dislike—not to his father, but to Manzoni, his father's favourite author. The submissive spirit of Manzoni had suited the age of despotism in Italy, but Carducci, who was born in 1836, felt the renovating breath of a new political era, and sought to express new ideas in a new form. His "Hymn to Satan," in which he glorified the spirit that revolts against ecclesiastical authority, produced as great a sensation as the poet wished, but his fame will rest perhaps on his "Barbaric Odes," in which he revives the forms of classical antiquity, and sings as did Horace, but in a modern spirit, of patriotism and the pleasures of wine and love.

Carducci, though he talks oftenest of Homer, Virgil, Dante, and classic personages, has evidently taken interest in English literature. In his "Hymn to Satan," he introduces Wiclif, and in a poem that he wrote to the urn that contained the ashes of Shelley, he alone of the moderns is given a place in "the sacred isle" of poets. In "Brindisi," Carducci alludes to a story about Cromwell. Some "saints" found him drinking. Said Oliver, looking at his boon companions: "They think we're seeking for the Lord, whereas really we're seeking for the corkscrew." Most characteristic of all is the poem in which Carducci represents himself as driving through the Maremma, reading Marlowe. His matter seemed to the reader like the dream of a man who had drunk too much beer. Under its influence the landscape darkened: the forest filled with phantoms; trees took the form of the witches of Macbeth; when suddenly there appeared Argentaro, bathed in sunshine, and the waves of the blue sea breaking into foam at its feet. The nightmare vanished, and the works of Marlowe went circling through the air into a wayside pool.

The coming Basque Conference at Bilbao must be an extremely interesting event to the veteran Basque scholar, Mr. Wentworth Webster of Sare, and would have delighted Mr. Gladstone with his particularist and Basque sympathies. On his last visit to Biarritz Mr. Gladstone devoted much time to the study of the pre-Aryan language under Mr. Webster's guidance. Mr. Butler Clarke also would have followed its proceedings with special knowledge; and so, judging from his literary study of another ancient people—the Calabrians—might Mr. George Gissing, who died within the Basque borders. There seems no doubt that the meeting has some political intentions, but on the Spanish, not on the French side. The French Basques are contented, although their racial peculiarities are completely ignored by their Government; the Spanish Basques on the other hand are so anxious for the full recovery of their local customs, or fueros, that, failing the compliance of the Spanish Government, they might aspire to a Republic, which on racial lines should take a slice out of the Basses Pyrénées. Thus France would be threatened at both ends of the Spanish Frontier, for the Catalan ideal Republic, as sketched at Barcelona, includes those of Catalan race in the Pyrénées-Orientales, whose ancestors once lived under the Spanish flag. But for the world generally and probably for the majority of the Basques themselves, the interest of this gathering will be literary and historical, and, if strangers are admitted, it is to be hoped that some of our English Basque scholars will make a point of attending.

Politicians for their own purposes insist on the exclusive and separatist character of these racial movements; and it is, indeed, possible to turn them into engines of hate and disruption. But their raison d'être—the study by a people of themselves—if faithfully pursued, leads in an opposite direction. The investigations of the anthropologist, the philologist, and the archaeologist make for a wider brotherhood, and no narrow federation. It would be folly, for instance, to affirm that there was no Celtic blood in the English counties outside Cornwall. Many a native of Somerset and Dorset might claim admission to a Brythonic Confederation on the ground of remote Celtic ancestry. Even between the Briton and Basque there is a tie of blood. The Basques are the descendants of the neolithic people—the Iberians—who inhabited the whole of Western Europe before the Aryan invasion; and, in Mr. S. R. Gardiner's words, "they are the only Iberians who preserve anything like purity of descent." But the parent stock survived elsewhere. They were not wiped out, they were absorbed by their Celtic conquerors. They formed, therefore, the original stuff of that mixed race from which the inhabitants of these islands spring, and though here their language perished, many of their characteristics, as Mr. Anwyl has lately pointed out in his suggestive sketch of "Celtic Religion," remained "with marvellous persistence." Research into characteristics on both sides might yield a common denominator between Briton and Basque.

The same question in a slightly different form will be raised at the Congress of the Sociétés Savantes at Montpellier next year, the programme of which has been sent us by our correspondent, Mr. H. H. Johnson. Among the subjects of communication proposed are the areas of Catalan-speaking and Basque-speaking people, as against Langue d'Oc, Gascon and Béarnais. Among the other subjects, which include History and Philology, and pre-Roman, Roman, Mediæval and Musulman Archaeology, there occurs one of topical interest to English people—the political vote of women. "Le vote politique et communal conféré aux femmes en Languedoc . . . au XIV siècle. Examiner dans quelles conditions ce droit s'est exercé, ou a pu s'exercer, dans les cessions de villes ou de villages de la même époque, et notamment lors de . . . 1252."

On Saturday, December 1, Messrs. Sotheby have an interesting sale of autograph letters and historical documents, sign manuals of sovereigns, rare letters of actors and actresses, documents relating to the Civil Wars, and important State papers. Amongst the sovereigns represented are Henry VIII., Queen Elizabeth, Francis I. of France, Queen Anne, George III., George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria. There are also letters from Henrietta Maria, Queen of Charles I., Napoleon I., Napoleon III., and Louis Philippe; and from Dr. Johnson, Locke, Moore, Horace Walpole, Shelley, Racine, George Morland, and J. M. W. Turner, and Garrick and Kitty Clive. On Thursday, December 6, Messrs. Sotheby will sell the library of the late Dr. Richard Garnett. The collection naturally includes a good deal of poetry—mainly modern. Bibliography, biography, and history are strongly represented, there are a large number of presentation copies. Perhaps the most notable feature of the sale will be the three Note-books of autograph manuscript matter kept by Shelley, a considerable portion of which has not been published. Many of Dr. Garnett's own books are, of course, in the sale.

On December 3 commences a three days' sale at Messrs. Sotheby's of ancient manuscripts and valuable and rare printed books, the property of Mr. L. W. Hodson, of Compton Hall, Wolverhampton. The manuscripts are of the twelfth to the fifteenth century and are mostly on religious subjects. Some are from the Library of the late William Morris. There is a large number of fifteenth-century books from the same Library, some of them very fine examples of early printing. On the second day will be sold first editions of William Morris's Earthly Paradise and other works and no less than twenty-five of the Kelmscott Press Publications Printed on vellum. Very few copies—only five to ten—as a rule were printed on vellum. There will also be put up for sale the Original Autograph Manuscripts of twenty-four of Morris's Poems, including the The Earthly Paradise and the Life and Death of Jason.

Yesterday (November 30) the Eumenides of Aeschylus was performed in the original Greek by members of Cambridge University, at the New Theatre, Cambridge; and we have received from Mr. John Willis Clark, the secretary to the committee, a copy of the volume prepared for the performance of the same play in December 1885, containing the text of the acting version, with an English translation by the late Dr. Verrall on the opposite pages, and a brief introduction by the same scholar. Mr. Clark is responsible for the dress, properties, and scenery, the last being the work of Mr. Hemsley, partly repainted from that made by Mr. John O'Connor for the previous performance, and partly new. The tragedy will be played also on December 1, 3, 4 and 5 at 8.30 P.M., with a matinee at 2.30 on December 1. The prices of seats range from 1s. to £2, and are to be procured at the box office of the theatre. Except for Mr. F. R. Benson's abbreviated version in English, when the play took its place as a member of the great trilogy, the Eumenides, or Furies, has never been seen, we believe, on the stage in England since its production in 1815 at Cambridge.

The Heritage of Art in English Book-binding was the subject, although not the exact title of a lecture by Mr. Cyril Davenport at the first monthly meeting of the session of the Library Association at Hanover Square. Mr. Davenport is justly famed for his lantern slides. The colourings of the slides are by his own brush, and all the examples are superb. The work of women binders, and the "style" founded by Mr. Cobden-Sanderson show that a great revival of the art of book-binding, quite distinct from the improvement of the processes from a commercial point of view, has taken place in England within recent times. A new preservative for book-bindings was submitted to the meeting. The "medium" of "Vishnu" is benzine, and it is claimed that cloth and leather treated with it are rendered waterproof, besides being greatly improved, and the life of the material lengthened.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—A Christmas course of lectures, adapted to a juvenile auditory, will be delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. W. Duddell, on "Signalling to a Distance; from Primitive Man to Radiotelegraphy" (experimentally illustrated). The dates of the lectures are December 27, 29, 1906, January 1, 3, 5 and 8, 1907, at three o'clock.—General Monthly Meeting. Monday, December 3, at 5 P.M.

Royal Geographical Society.—The Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W., on Monday, December 10, at 8.30 P.M., "Irrigation in the United States: its Geographical and Economical Results," by Major John H. Beacom, U.S. Army.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, at 8 P.M., Monday, December 3. Cantor Lecture: Mr. A. D. Hall, on Artificial Fertilisers. Wednesday, December 5: Third Ordinary Meeting. Colonel Sir Charles Watson on the Metric System.—At 4.30 P.M., Tuesday, December 4. The Hon. Sir Lewis Mitchell on The Cape to Cairo Railway.

Linnean Society.—General Meeting, at 8 P.M. on Thursday, December 6. Papers: (1) Professor A. J. Ewart, "A Contribution to the Physiology of the Museum Beetle, Anthrenus museorum (Linn.)"; (2) Mr. E. R. Burdon, "Note on the Origin of the name Chermes or Kermes." Exhibitions: (1) Dr. A. T. Masterman, An abnormal specimen of a Dab with three eyes; (2) Rev. H. Purefoy FitzGerald, A Note on Siegesbeckia orientalis, Linn.

Aristotelian Society, 22 Albemarle Street, W.—Monday, December 3, at 8 P.M. Hon. Bertrand Russell on The Nature of Truth.

Philological Society.—University College, Friday, December 5, at 8 P.M. A paper by Dr. H. Oelsner.

Elizabethan Literary Society, Toynbee Hall.—Wednesday, December 5, Mr. John Masefield on An Elizabethan Pirate.

South Place Ethical Society.—Wednesday, December 5, Public Conference. Mr. Robb Lawson on The Shavian Drama.

Art Exhibitions.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metal-work, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie: Tales and Towns of Italy by Jessie Bayes. Drawings by Annie French. Pastels by T. R. Way. November 28 to December 22.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc.: October 22 to January 1.—Graves Galleries: Paintings of Flowers in Oil by Louise E. Perman.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—R. Gutekunst: Etchings by Rembrandt, Ostade and Van Dyck. November 5 to December 3.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. November 5 for one month.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. November 7.—Tooth and Sons. Pastels by Arthur Wardle. November 7.—Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours: Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club: Dering Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. December 3. Sculpture and Drawings by Countess Feodora Gleichen. Medals and Decorative Work by Miss Elinor Hallé. Paintings by Countess Helena Gleichen.—Leicester Galleries: November 24. Arthur Rackham's "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens." Water-colours by W. Lee Hankey, P. A. Hay, Hugh Norris, Graham Petrie and Terrick Williams.—W. B. Paterson: November 17. Pictures by W. Nicholson.—Fine Art Society: November 17. Landscapes in Cornwall and Devon (water-colour) by S. J. Lamorna Birch. Water-colours of Cities of Spain by Henry C. Brewer.—Royal Photographic Society, 66 Russell Square: November 6 to December 22. 11-5. Photographs by Henry W. Barrett. Admission on presentation of card.—Modern Gallery, 61 New Bond Street. Mater Christi, by H. Salomon. Water-colours by Miss H. Donald-Smith till December 22.—Manchester Art Gallery. Exhibition of Works of Mr. Holman Hunt, including some not on view at the Leicester Galleries.

Plays: English Drama Society. Three of the Chester Mystery Plays: The Salutation, The King's Play, The Shepherd's Play, at the Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, on December 4, 5 and 6, at 9 P.M., and December 4 and 6, at 3.30 P.M.—Stage Society. Scala Theatre, December 9 and 10. The Weavers, by Gerhart Hauptmann, translated by Mary Morison.—New Theatre, Cambridge. The Eumenides of Aeschylus in the original Greek, acted by members of the University. November 30 and December 1, 3, 4 and 5 at 8.30 and December 1 at 2.30.—Lincoln's Inn Hall. December 12 and 14 at 8.15. December 13 and 15 at 3.15. Eager Heart, by A. M. Buckton.—Garrick Theatre. December 11 and 13. Matinées of Macbeth. Macbeth, Mr. Bouchier. Lady Macbeth, Miss Violet Vanbrugh.

Concerts.—Saturday, December 1, Albert Hall: Madame Patti, 3. Saturday, December 1, Queen's Hall: Symphony Concert, 3. Saturday, December 1, Aeolian Hall: Mr. Hugo Heinz, 3.—Saturday, December 1, Royal Opera (last night), La Bohème, 8.30. Sunday, December 2, Queen's Hall: Sunday Concert, 3.—Monday, December 3, Queen's Hall: London Symphony Orchestra, 8.—Monday, December 3, Aeolian Hall: Edouard Risler, 8.—Monday, December 3, Bechstein Hall: Joachim Quartet, 8.—Tuesday, December 4, Aeolian Hall: Chamber Music Concerts, 12 noon.—Tuesday, December 4, Aeolian Hall: R. Buhlig, 3.—Tuesday, December 4, Bechstein Hall: Herr Sandor Raab, 3.—Wednesday, December 5, Queen's Hall: Joachim Quartet, 3.—Wednesday, December 5, Aeolian Hall: Mr. Dalton Baker, 3.15.—Thursday, December 6, Aeolian Hall: Broadwood Concert, 8.30.—Thursday, December 6, Aeolian Hall: Edouard Risler, 3.—Friday, December 7, Bechstein Hall: Joachim Quartet, 3.—Friday, December 7, Bechstein Hall: Mme. C. Cahier, 8.30.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge: December 1. Sale of Autograph Letters. December 3-5. Sale of the Library of L. O. Hodson, Esq.

LITERATURE

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE

George Duke of Cambridge. A Memoir of his Private Life.
Edited by EDGAR SHEPPARD, C.V.O., D.D. 2 vols.
(Longmans, 24s. net.)

It was inevitable that the Life of the Duke of Cambridge should carry us into an atmosphere which may be said to have been partly of the Court and partly of the camp. He lived a long and interesting life in the very centre of movement, so to speak, and we might almost say that for generations his figure was nearly essential to official pageants. The part he played in national history rendered him eminently worthy of a biography, although at the same time Dr. Edgar Sheppard might have done well to condense the "memoirs of his private life" into one volume instead of filling two. Of things that might have been left out we may instance those early diaries. They contain entries such as the following:

January 7.—To-day I am sorry to say I do not feel I have acted well in many respects. I showed some signs of cowardice on horseback. I had a very bad Latin lesson and made many careless mistakes in it. I mean to try all in my power to be better for the future. I shot through the bull's eye in shooting at the Target. Finished a drawing for my Aunt Gloucester.

April 11.—I fear I have got a very bad habit of going into the drawing-room not straight to the Queen, which is very vulgar and ill-behaved. I likewise, when I have saluted, have gone away and not returned sometimes till I have gone away. These faults must be avoided.

Remarks such as these excite some astonishment in our mind, because the Duke of Cambridge was nothing of a prig, as any one might know who caught the most casual glimpse of his face. But the explanation follows in due course, and here it is:

Mr. Wood appears to have exercised the very closest supervision over his pupil's diary. After looking over the later entries for 1834, he pronounced them "very childish and bad." "In consequence of this," writes Prince George, "he gave me some good advice about the manner of writing it, and said he was very anxious that I should continue to do it well, as it would be of great use to me to store up my thoughts upon any particular subject . . ."

A boy's diary written under the supervision of a tutor who seems to have thought childishness a vice was certainly not worth reprinting, still less reproducing in facsimile, as is done opposite page 11. It affords no aid whatever to any true understanding of the Duke's life, yet his history was sufficiently full of incident to have made the employment of such devices superfluous.

He was born on March 26, 1819, and baptized with great pomp on May 11. One of the most amusing incidents connected with his childhood occurred when he nearly fell a victim to scarlet fever. The doctors had begun to despair of his life, and a message was sent to his father, who at the time was dining, to the effect that he was sinking:

The Duke was drinking a Rhine wine named Steinberger, and, unable to think of any other means of reviving the boy, he hurried to the sick-room with a glass of this wine and forced the child to drink it. The effect was extraordinary. From that hour the Prince began to mend, and the fever abated, but the effects of the illness left him delicate for some years. Until 1837 Steinberger was always drunk on His Royal Highness's birthday to commemorate his marvellous recovery.

The career of the Duke of Cambridge was dealt with in a full and satisfactory manner in Colonel Willoughby Verner's "Military life of H.R.H. George Duke of Cambridge," so that the interest of the present book lies chiefly in the detail it gives. In the midst of much grave writing we occasionally come across a paragraph that to our day and generation must sound amusing. Take for example this letter from the Queen sent from Windsor Castle on February 6, 1857:

In the midst of so much that is so important, I forgot a trifle, but still which I think ought not to be any longer overlooked. It is the moustaches, as regards the men and officers serving (I don't mean any of the old Generals, etc. etc.) should no longer be optional, but ordered to be worn. The effect in the Ranks altogether is bad, when you see some with and some without them. I think this should now be done without delay . . .

The boy who wrote such very nice diaries proved quite capable of thinking for himself when he grew older. On the subject of marriage, for instance, he had formed very decided opinions by the time he was twenty-one. They were that:

In the choice of a wife no considerations of expediency would be allowed by him to weigh in the balance against the dictates of affection. He was ready and eager to devote to the service of his country unselfishly and unsparingly all his energies and all his abilities, but he claimed that his private life was his own, to be disposed of by him as he might think fit and proper.

Statesmen could not be forgetful of how near he was to the British throne, and politicians put forward, tentatively, the names of many ladies with whom it would be desirable to form an alliance, but:

He had met and fallen in love with Miss Louisa Fairbrother, a actress of great beauty, and he determined to make her his wife. The marriage was, of course,morganatic, and as the Royal consent was neither sought nor granted it followed that there was of necessity a sharp line of demarcation between the Duke's public and private life. Mrs. FitzGeorge, as she became on her marriage, took up her residence in Queen Street, Mayfair, where the Duke devoted to his wife all the hours he could spare from his public duties and private engagements.

The union was a long and happy one, and when she died in 1890 her husband of seventy was as grieved as a young lover could have been. "How I miss her!" he wrote from Cannes. "It is indescribable and nothing more so at this moment when absent than not hearing from or writing to her daily as has always been our habit since we first met."

She bore three sons to him, all of whom adopted the profession of arms. Of course much interest will be directed to the way in which the Duke met his compulsory retirement. He thus records the first intimation in his diary:

May 19.—Had a lengthened conversation with Campbell-Bannerman on a wish expressed that I should, before the end of this year, retire from my command of the Army with a view to great changes being made at the War Office. This decision has filled me with the very deepest sorrow, as I still feel quite equal to the performance of my duties, and never anticipated such a decision being come to without my willing consent, but I must submit as best I can to the inevitable, but I own that I am disgusted with this, to my mind, most unjustifiable proceeding, though Mr. C.-B. was most amiable in all he said.

But complications arose:

After announcement of changes at the War Office and Horse Guards involving my retirement, the Government were defeated by 7 on a War Office Estimate Grant, a censure being cast on Mr. C.-Bannerman, who immediately tendered his resignation. The complication thus created becomes very curious. 22nd.—On reaching home found numerous letters of sympathy and condolence on last night's announcement of my retirement from Commander-in-Chief of the Army, made by Mr. C.-Bannerman. 24th.—The feeling in the Army and indeed in all quarters on the subject of my relinquishing, or being called upon to retire from my post is intense, and a very beautiful amount of sympathy is shown.

And this entry, dated October 31, 1895, marks a pathetic ending to his military career:

31st.—My last day of office! Too sad! Drove to the Old Horse Guards, where a Deputation of the Lieutenancy of London came to present me with an address of regret on my withdrawal from office. From there went to the Pall Mall Office, and at 4.30 took leave of all the Officers of my own Department, and leading Clerks, as also of the Civil side, where a very large number attended and I made them a farewell address, which I believe was good, though extremely painful and distressing to me. In the evening I had a dinner at home, a farewell to all my Horse Guards Staff, Prince Edward and Dolly being the only exceptions. The rest of the party were Buller, Gipps, Evelyn Wood, Grenfell, Duncan, Lowe, Gordon, Grant, Maitland, Lloyd, Augustus, Downe, Algy Lennox, Davidson, Ardagh, MacKiunon, Wilson, Chapman, Luck, Markham, Albert Williams. I made another farewell speech and thus my official duties came to a close. It is a sad moment to me and I feel it intensely, the general feeling of regret at my departure and sympathy with me, as well as appreciation of my long services, being my only consolation. November 1.—So now I am out of Official life, though I have my hands still full of matters connected with my withdrawal from office, dinners, letters of regret, etc.; of course I have ceased to go to the Office.

In reviewing the Life, it is impossible not to recognise that the Duke of Cambridge was a strong, patriotic and self-sacrificing servant of the Crown. At the end of his days, when he looked back on his long career, he must have seen less to regret than most of us, and much cause for thankfulness and pride.

HOMER AND HIS AGE

Homer and his Age. By ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

WE welcome another powerful counterblast from the graceful and vigorous pen of Mr. Andrew Lang against the disintegrators of the poems of Homer. The knife which Wolf put into the hands of critics more than a hundred years ago has been very rashly used by his successors, who have slashed at not only Homer but even Thucydides and Xenophon. In the case of Homer the Wolfian knife has been blunted by the fact that no one now believes in an Iliad and Odyssey orally transmitted from generation to generation. The main position of Wolf was that the poems could not have been committed to writing. It is certain now that they might have been written, and it is therefore presumable that they were. In a previous work, "Homer and the Epic," Mr. Lang has examined the literary objections to Homeric unity, based chiefly on alleged discrepancies in the narrative. But such discrepancies would justify a school of "Chorizontes" impugning the unity of Goethe, and of Sir Walter Scott, who in "The Antiquary" makes the sun set in the east. In the present volume little is said about consistency; the aim is to show that the poet depicts the life of a single brief age of culture, that the poems are the product of a single age, not a mosaic of the work of several (at least four) changeful centuries:

This must be the case—if the life drawn is harmonious, the picture must be the work of a single epoch—for it is not in the nature of early uncritical times that later poets should adhere, or even try to adhere, to the minute details of law, custom, opinion, dress, weapons, houses, as presented in earlier lays or sagas on the same set of subjects.

Poets in uncritical times do not "archaise," they are not careful to give to their heroes the accoutrements of ages long gone by. Even the literary and self-conscious Virgil did not take on his shoulders the burden, under which very late poetasters like Quintus Smyrnaeus "sweat and grunt" to little purpose or effect. And those who postulate archaising poets are not consistent. Even Helbig admits that they sometimes allowed themselves to be influenced by their own environment; they were bad archaisers; as though a modern novelist laying his scene in ancient Rome should refrain indeed from introducing motor-cars, but should make his personæ sit up side by side at table, as we do now, instead of reclining on couches after the manner of the ancient Romans.

Quintus Smyrnaeus consciously archaïses in a critical age with Homer as his model. Any one who believes that in an uncritical age the rhapsodists archaïsed with such success as the presumed late poets of the Iliad must have done, may try his hand in our critical age on a ballad in the style of the Border Ballads. If he succeeds in introducing nothing that will at once mark his work as modern, he will be more successful than any poet who has made the experiment, and more successful than the most ingenious modern forgers of gems, jewels and terra cottas. They seldom deceive experts, and when they do other experts detect the deceit.

It is in archæological discoveries that Mr. Lang finds his most convincing proofs that the Iliad is, speaking broadly, the production of a single age. The argument turns mainly on the Homeric armour.

Dr. Wolfgang Reichel in a remarkable monograph which appeared in 1894, pointed out that the views held hitherto on the subject of Homeric armour are quite erroneous because they contradict the Mycenaean discoveries. The poet speaks of round shields, of shields which are equal on every side. Now those found at Mycenæ are long, and shaped like a figure 8, not circular: and so large as to be hardly portable—hence the chariot, which according to Reichel was useful mainly for carrying the warrior encumbered with his "enveloping shield" from one part of the field of battle to another. But Homer calls the shield κυκλος and παρρός είση, which would seem to mean "circular." Accordingly Reichel, finding the words against him, adopts the attitude of the French theoriser who said

"tant pis pour les faits." He says "tant pis pour les mots," which he proceeds to mishandle violently. The first epithet does not mean "circular" but "made of circular plates," while the second denotes "well balanced on every side." Here one may remark that Dr. Reichel and his followers might, in repudiating the meaning "circular," have given a far more natural sense to είση, which might denote "effective, equal to the purpose which it was designed to serve," just as δαυδς είσης means a meal "adequate, equal to the appetites it was meant to satisfy." "Equally divided" is impossible on linguistic as well as archæological grounds. The epithets ἀμφιβρότη and τερμύεσσα may well describe a buckler which shields the unprotected parts of the whole body. Mr. Lang remarks in a passage introducing one of his characteristic quips, too rare in the present volume for his admirers:

Some scholars, then, believe that the old original poet always described Mycenaean shields, which are of various shapes but never circular in Mycenaean art. If there are any circular shields in the poems, these, they say, must have been introduced by poets accustomed in a much later age to seeing circular bucklers. Therefore Homeric words hitherto understood as meaning "circular" must now mean something else—even if the reasoning seems circular.

It must be noted, however, that the poet seems to recognise some shields which were as large as the Mycenaean (the shape is not mentioned). As Hector walked, the rim of his shield knocked against his neck and his ankles. Either, then, the poet gave to his hero, as a special distinction, the antique shield of which a tradition survived, or the buckler was of the usual size and shape, but was secured by a long strap which galled his neck, while it allowed the buckler to flap against his legs, when not in action. At all events it was not so large as to prevent him from walking under it from the field of battle into Troy.

As regards the θώραξ, the position of the Reichelians is still more difficult. No breastplate, corslet, hauberk, or anything of the kind has been found in the Mycenaean graves. But the corslet pervades the Homeric poems. The Reichelians take a bold course. They declare that θώραξ means not "corslet" in particular but "armour" in general. The verb θωρήσσεσθαι meant "to put on one's armour," though the Mycenaean warriors would appear to have fought practically naked, or in something like bathing-drawers, with a very long shield shaped like the figure 8:

Surely we might as well argue that "waistcoat" might come to mean "body clothing in general," as that a word for the male breast became first a synonym for the covering of the male buttocks, then for apparel in general, then for a bronze breastplate.

The Zoma, Mitre, Zoster are similarly dealt with. The Zoma is the loin-cloth or drawers shown on Mycenaean intaglios, the Mitre is a band of metal worn round the waist under the Chiton, the Zoster a similar belt worn over the tunic—a strange arrangement. Bronze greaves are not found in Mycenaean tombs, therefore the passage in which they are mentioned (Il. vii. 41) is spurious. Against the Procrustean method of Dr. Reichel, Mr. Lang sets a reasonable statement that Homer describes a state of military equipment in advance of that of the most famous Mycenaean graves, but other than that of the late "warrior vase"; and that the words he uses in describing the weapons of his warriors must be understood in their natural sense.

The account in the Iliad and Odyssey of the use of iron and bronze is harmonious, and points to poems composed in a single age, not in five successive centuries. The Homeric house is not the Hellenic house of classical times, and resembles closely the dwellings of Icelandic chiefs, but the account of it is consistent throughout the poems. The chapters on the notes of change in the Odyssey, the linguistic proofs of various dates for the poems, the "Doloneia" and the interpolated speeches of Nestor (supposed to be due to a tradition that Nestor was an ancestor of Pisistratus) are very pleasant and relieve the reader, now somewhat exhausted by the tension of the main theme. The general conclusion is that the Iliad at all events is the work of one age and was a whole—with some interpolations—centuries before Pisistratus.

We welcome so able a champion on the conservative side of the Homeric controversy, and find in his book a new proof of that amazing versatility so well set forth in the charming "Oxford Echoes." Here are the first two verses, with apologies for violating the unity of a ballade:

You ask me, Fresher, who it is
Who rhymes, researches, and reviews,
Who sometimes writes like Genesis,
And sometimes for the Daily News;
Who jests in words that angels use
And is most solemn with most slang:
Who's who, who's which, and which is whose?
Who can it be but Andrew Lang?

Quips, Quirks are his, and Quiddities,
The Epic and the teacup Muse,
Bookbindings, Aborigines,
Ballads that banish all the Blues,
Young married life among Yahoos,
An Iliad, an Orang-outang,
Triolets, Totems, and Tattoos—
Who can it be but Andrew Lang?

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE FUTURE IN AMERICA

The Future in America. A Search after Realities. By H. G. WELLS. (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.)

IN the eighteenth century the English middle classes were the most enlightened order of men of their age. Their intelligence was not, perhaps, so acute as that of the French, but their minds were more comprehensive. Their knowledge was obtained more by experience than by study, and in their novel and extensive experience in matters of trade, manufacture, and politics there were implicit all the principles of modern industrial civilisation. They instituted, as a matter of practice, the movement of illumination which the French bourgeoisie adopted and elaborated as a matter of theory.

Of this movement the present civilisation of America is the most complete monument. The colonial branch of the English middle classes was the only community which was able to break away entirely from ancient custom and build up a new form of government on a strong and fixed framework of eighteenth-century thought. Their work, however, does not appear so glorious a thing in its achievement as it did in its inception. The founders of the American Republic had an inclination towards the political philosophy of their age, and this philosophy was analytical in method and destructive in operation. In an extreme reaction against the mediæval tradition of the restraint and subordination of trade, the writers of the new school resolved society into its individual elements, removed everything that impeded the play of the forces of industrialism, and left those forces to develop and overwhelm the state. Possessed of the resources of a continent and bent wholly on material expansion, the American people embodied the ideas of these writers in their constitution. The result was that they rapidly attained their immediate object, but lost the notion of a commonwealth in the pursuit of private ends, and became subject to the most powerful plutocracy in the world.

In England, on the other hand, where society was more stable and complex, and the controlling power of the state less impaired, the individualistic spirit of the middle classes has been gradually restrained by law, while the movement of enlightenment, spreading from the merchants and manufacturers to the artisans and labourers, has prevented the lower orders from turning to socialism with the blind enthusiasm of the proletariat of the continent. The English race, fortunately, is able to conduct its experiments in its colonies. For instance, it is now as busily engaged in New Zealand in working out the socialistic ideas of the nineteenth century as it was in America in working out the individualistic ideas of the eighteenth century. In the meantime there has been founded in the motherland another movement of enlightenment which threatens to undermine in its progress both the fabric of individualism and the fabric of socialism, and to frame out of the ruin a new form of political thought, of which the structure, however, has not yet been clearly designed. For the men of the new school seem to be more remarkable for critical talent than for constructive genius. Even the inventive mind of Mr. H. G. Wells is unequal to the task of reducing the insubstantial vision of a "New Utopia" to a matter of practical politics. His gift for building up picturesque and grandiose generalisations on a slight ground of fact, makes him more trustworthy as a critic than as a thinker. He has, however, the satirist's trick of suppression and exaggeration, and he employs it admirably. His most striking works are those in which he singles out one of the many streams of tendency in modern life, and depicts a civilisation in which it has become the omnipotent force. "When the Sleeper Wakes," for example, is an astonishing caricature of the inordinate individualism of the American sort. "The Future in America," a sober study of the same subject, is, we think, below it in insight as well as in effectiveness. In his "search after realities" Mr. Wells has discovered some potent and salutary influences which he did not divine in the composition of his romance, but he seems to have overlooked the very matter to which in his work of fiction he attached most importance—the political aims of the plutocracy. America is being rapidly transformed from an indefinite state of republicanism into a definite state of industrial feudalism. In some respects this is a progress. No doubt, if the American people were the most enlightened race in the history of mankind they would be guided more by the logic of ideas than by the logic of facts. As, however, they respond, like most masses of men, more readily to material coercion than to intellectual suasion, they have had to evolve a governing class wielding a force that rests on wealth. They have now arrived at the position which the English people attained in the eighteenth century. Of course, the immediate purpose of American oligarchy is to augment its power at the expense of the populace. But, after all, a strong oligarchy is a good defence against Cæsarism. If this peril be averted, and it is one which is foreshadowed in the present socialistic agitation, it will not be difficult for so spirited a race as the Americans to recover from their plutocracy a large measure of self-government when the political organisation of their immense country has been completed and regulated.

Mr. Wells's book is written rather in a mood of despondency. Energy, initiative, and unintermittent growth—these things he expected to find in America, and these things he has found. But it was not in search of them that he travelled. He wanted to trace some suggestion of a strong and definite national purpose directing the general life of the country, and moulding it into a new kind of State, neither individualistic nor socialistic, about which his own vague ideas of progress might form and play. In the reaction of disappointment he has turned to socialism as the weary agnostic turns to spiritualism. There, he is inclined to think, the confusion of purposes, traditions, and habits is at any rate resolved into a common, ordered intention. But that is true also of Cæsarism, and Cæsarism, unfortunately, is the only effective instrument of destruction which an unthinking populace with little political instinct can employ against an oligarchy. Mr. Wells seldom examines the means to the end which he has in view. The study of science has excited only his imaginative faculty. Science in the making is partly a thing of facts; science in the learning is wholly a thing of generalisations. Mr. Wells was nourished so long at the Royal College of Science on the pap of pre-digested ideas, that he has never been able to acquire a taste for the hard realities of life. He has a mind too impatient of facts to become a sound thinker, and an imagination too high and versatile to become a vulgarisateur. He is a brilliant, suggestive, but one-sided critic of ideas: a novelist with a genius that he has never yet fully displayed ("Kipps," his finest essay in fiction falls to pieces in the middle), and the most powerful satirist of the day. We are afraid, however, that his best work in the satiric vein is accomplished. There was a time when he could have painted a companion picture to "When the Sleeper Wakes" and depicted with equal vividness a civilisation of which the ideas of modern socialism had become the omnipotent force. But that time is gone. Openness and plasticity of mind are qualities of youth that few writers retain in middle age.

COURT LIFE IN THE DUTCH REPUBLIC

Court Life in the Dutch Republic. By Baroness SUZETTE VAN ZUYLEN VAN NYEVELT. (Dent, 16s.)

"Qui veut une place forte voir prendre, Près du Prince d'Orange doit se rendre," was a current saying among Dutchmen in the time of the "Stadtholder," Frederick Henry. A wise and tactful ruler and a fine general, under whom such brilliant soldiers as Turenne, Charles Gustavus of Sweden, Prince Rupert and Monk were not ashamed to fight, his name is associated with the most brilliant period in the history of the pugnacious bundle of provinces known as the Dutch Republic.

What the Elizabethan era was to England, the first half of the seventeenth century was to Holland. . . . A reflection of this glory shone on the Stadtholder's chair, which seemed likely in time to become a throne.

Though this likelihood was never realised, the rôle of Stadtholder became more and more that of a constitutional king, and exiled monarchs did not disdain to accept the support and protection of the occupant of the "chair." First among these was the King of Bohemia, and with his Queen, Elizabeth, daughter of James I., begins the history of the Stuarts in Holland. Four times, between the dates 1623 and 1688, did "the largest village in the world," as Guiccardini termed the Hague, turn out with feasting and rejoicing to welcome royal guests, and no less than three of these triumphal entries were made by Stuarts. The fourth was that of the arch-intriguer, Marie de Medicis, who, weary of exile, had resolved to practise her wiles on the young and rising Republic. It was largely at the instigation of this interfering lady that the idea of a marriage between William, son of Frederick Henry, and Mary, eldest daughter of Charles I. of England, was mooted; an alliance which led to the second triumphal entry (the "glad entry," as it was called) into the Hague; this time of Henrietta Maria and the Princess Mary. The marriage took place at Whitehall on May 12, 1641, the bridegroom being a precocious boy of fifteen and the bride a child of ten. William's feelings on the subject may be gathered from a quaint letter to his father, in which he says that:

At first they (he and his bride) were very serious together, but now quite at home with each other; that she is more beautiful than her picture, that he loves her and thinks she loves him.

It was but natural that Henrietta Maria should turn to Holland in her hour of distress, and her next entry into that hospitable country was of a much less dignified character. Nevertheless her visit was successful, and she sailed away under the escort of the redoubtable Van Tromp, of broomstick fame, the richer by £3,000,000; leaving Princess Mary with her mother-in-law, Princess Amelia, a lady for whom the little princess conceived a violent dislike, which was cordially returned and which lasted until the death of Mary in 1661. After this the Hague became the gathering-place of needy Stuarts. James, Duke of York, was the next to appear, disguised as a girl, his sudden arrival causing much discussion among the worthy burghers as to the amount of ceremony necessary for his reception, the States General eventually deciding that two deputies were enough for the welcome of so young a prince. After him, some ten years, came Charles, Prince of Wales. This amorous prince made hot court to Sophia, daughter of the King of Bohemia, to the joy of that lady's mother and the chagrin of Princess Amelia, who had views for Charles not unconnected with her own rather plain offspring. He assured Sophia that she was "more beautiful than Mrs. Barlow" (Lucy Walters), a delicate compliment which that astute damsel took for what it was worth. She kept her fickle admirer at arm's length, and eventually married the Elector of Hanover and became the mother of George I. of England. Her graphic and often ruthless memoirs are amusing, and give admirable portraits of the various actors in the drama of the day.

In 1650 a new figure appeared upon the stage, Princess Mary giving birth to a boy, William III., afterwards King of England, a land for which he was to feel as much hatred as his mother for her husband's country. Then came a third triumphal entry; this time that of Charles II., who was lodged in the "Mauritshuis," where he received the twelve peers and six commoners sent to invite him to claim his throne. At the sight of him Princess Amelia's match-making instincts revived and she manoeuvred in vain on behalf of a plain daughter Mary. In 1677 there was again a pealing of bells and firing of cannon, this time to welcome another Mary, the daughter of James, Duke of York, and the bride of William III. of Orange. It was not until the latter's acceptance of the unstable throne of his father-in-law and the departure of the young couple for England, that the chain which had bound the Stuarts to Holland for many years was broken. Baroness van Zuylen van Nyevelt pilots the reader ably through the complicated genealogy of the house of Nassau. Her grasp of her subject and her wide sympathy both for the ill-fated and lovable Stuarts and the harder-headed and somewhat uncompromising Princes of Orange, would make a less dramatic period interesting.

THE LIGHT STUDY OF CONCHOLOGY

A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by E. RAY LANKESTER. Part v. Mollusca. (Black, 12s, 6d, and 15s. net.)

WHEN Mr. Brooke, in "Middlemarch" remarked, "Why you might take to some light study; conchology now," he was perfectly serious: and his advice was good. But since the day when conchology was regarded as a "light study," many things have happened and conchology itself has not stood still. Time was, indeed, when its devotees could speak of "the shell and its animal" without incurring any suspicion of "giving themselves away." For in those days the collection of shells, molluscan and otherwise, was followed with the same enthusiasm, and the same lack of intelligence and sense of proportion, as are exhibited to-day in the collection of picture post-cards. It would not be easy, however, to determine what factors brought about the change of method and point of view, in the pursuit of this study. But we may be certain that the present day conchologist is a product of the Darwinian theory. No longer does he speak of the "shell and its animal," but, on the contrary, of "the animal and its shell." Those of the old school were "shell-collectors" pure and simple, in a double sense: they regarded the shell as the prize, the animal by which it was built up as so much "matter in the wrong place." Those of the new school, on the other hand, for the most part prize the animal, no less than the shell.

One of the founders of this new school was Professor E. Ray Lankester, who, in a brilliant treatise on the "mollusca" in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," just a quarter of a century ago, laid the foundation of our present knowledge and methods of investigation. For many years this article remained the only serious work of reference on this subject; and for all time it will continue to permeate the literature dealing with this theme.

Necessarily, since this was written, much has been added to our knowledge; and these new things and much of minor importance that could not well be included within the limits of an Encyclopædia article, are now presented in the volume before us—Part V. of the great "Treatise on Zoology" published by Messrs. Black. This work was initiated, and is edited, by Professor Lankester; but the present volume has been written by Dr. Paul Pelseneer, and revised and translated by Dr. Gilbert Bourne, the Linacre Professor of Comparative Anatomy in the University of Oxford.

In so far as literary merit goes this book is not the equal of its precursor: but it has the merit of being up to date, and presenting us with the last word on a very difficult theme. It is essentially a book for the advanced student, who will find in it a kind of biological extract, very stimulating, and absolutely indispensable. It is a book of desiccated facts, which, under the hands of an expert, can be made to expand into wonders as great as any ever conjured up by the magician's wand.

Here will be found awful examples of the consequences of parasitism: and instances of fertility that would gladden the hearts of those who are bemoaning the decline in the birth-rate. The provisions, indeed, for securing the continuation of the race are, among the mollusca, extremely varied. Where eggs are laid singly they are deposited on rocks or stones: embedded in masses of jelly, or in long ribbons. Some are so disguised, as to shape, that they bear not the remotest resemblance to the conventional egg; while in other cases they so closely resemble the eggs of birds in size and shape, that none but an expert would distinguish them. As to numbers they may range from one to sixty millions, according to the species, and the risks to which they are exposed. If but few eggs are laid, then the most jealous care is taken to ensure their safety: the parent not seldom carrying them about upon her own person—on the shell, between the shell and the body, embedded within the foot, in a brood-pouch in the back, and so on. The egg cases of the common whelk, those yellow masses of horny bladders so common on our beaches, have a strange history. Each little bladder contains a number of eggs, but at the end of the incubation period only one little whelk will be found within, and this because it represents the sole survivor, the rest having been eaten. The inmates of each little cell have, according to whelk tradition, passed their first period of existence in devouring one another till only the strongest survives.

Though the product of a hen's egg is very obviously a chicken, the result is by no means so immediately apparent in the case of the eggs of many molluscs. Where the egg is relatively large, there the young emerges in the form of its parent, or at least as a shell-bearing animal; but where, on the contrary, the egg is relatively small, there will emerge therefrom a little body which bears no sort of likeness to the parent which gave it birth. The sluggish, headless and helpless oyster, for example, when she finally casts abroad her family of some sixty millions—which she has contrived to conceal about her person until a favourable opportunity presented itself for their expulsion—sends adrift a cloud of tiny transparent creatures which swim away propelled by the vigorous movements of a fringe of thread-like outgrowths of the body. Settling down, they speedily develop shells, and henceforth wander no more.

But such young are subjected to a vigorous scourging by Dame Nature. Thousands fall in unfavourable ground and die straightway; thousands more fall victims to adverse currents, or settle so thickly together as to crowd one another out of existence. Hence, of the millions of each brood, but few come to maturity. In our fresh-water mussel the young remain longer within the egg, and emerge in the form of larvæ with a pair of toothed shell-valves; though when expelled from the sheltering mantle of the mother the young float at the surface of the stream, buoyed up by a long rope-like "byssus." Here for a few hours they drift, depending for continued existence on the chance of catching hold of a passing fish by means of a snapping motion of the toothed-shell valves. This done they become encysted in the skin of the fish, and undergo a further phase of growth, when, becoming too large for the cyst, they burst its walls and drop to the bottom of the stream, to complete their normal course of life. But only a few of each brood have the luck to find a fish: the rest perish.

Such is a sample of the early-life history of mollusca; but a book could be filled with descriptions of the various forms of larvæ and their subsequent history. Some of the more remarkable will be found figured and tersely described in the pages of this book.

Similarly, the adult animals present a bewildering series of developmental phases: Adaptations to secure a hold on Life. Among these adaptations are to be reckoned modifications of the shell. Thus, it is obvious that conchology is no longer a "light study." Shells are no longer regarded as so many counters: they have a history; but this history is intimately bound up with a host of other phenomena, all of which must be investigated by the present-day "malacologist." The magnitude of his task will be the more readily grasped when we reflect that there are some thirty or forty thousand distinct species of living mollusca known to science, all of which, at some phase or other of their life-history, bear a shell of some sort. So that, if he confine himself to the shell alone, conscientiously, he has an appalling array of facts to deal with.

Finally, as the author remarks, "The Mollusca . . . afford a very good instance of the progressive modification of organic structure. It would be difficult to name another group of the animal kingdom in which relationships can be more clearly determined, and the pedigrees of the sub-groups more certainly traced: and for this reason no phylum, with the possible exception of the echinodermata, has, in recent years, yielded such fruitful results to the investigator."

W. P. P.

THAT NINETEENTH CENTURY

Progress of Art in the Century. By WILLIAM SHARP; Discoveries and Explorations in the Century. By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS; Progress of Science in the Century. By ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A. The Nineteenth Century Series. (London: W. R. Chambers; Toronto and Philadelphia: The Linscott Publishing Co., each 5s. net.)

In this little pile of books American enterprise already sets its seal on the dead century. In this slower country there will probably be less enthusiasm over attempts like these to generalise, classify, and generally "size up" the nineteenth century than exists in Toronto and Philadelphia. America is a land of globules, and a continent which has digested shiploads of Encyclopædia Britannicas is quite ready to take as its next meal any number of summaries and inventories of a century which is scarcely far enough off to fall into a profitable perspective. Still, surveys are always suggestive, and these particular surveys have been performed with industry and thoroughness according to their kind. The writers are first-class men, but the best man when he attacks a subject of this immensity is inclined to shut his eyes and to go blindly forward.

A rapid perusal suggests the idea that the nineteenth century will, perhaps, after all, come to be known to posterity as the imaginative age. In its material achievements, in its self-expression and in its expectations an imaginative element emerges everywhere. More than any of its predecessors—except, perhaps, the sixteenth century—it was a time of dreams. In the rush of discovery, invention, and wide sweep of change—in the very rapidity and extent of material advancement—men felt themselves on the incoming tide of some vague but high destiny. The tide never came to the full. But in the story of the century's doings we see the power and effect of kindled imagination. In Art the supreme figure is that of a painter who in imaginative qualities has never been excelled. Mr. Sharp in his record of the "Progress of Art in the Nineteenth Century" rightly calls Turner the Shakespeare of painting. Turner's art was the very antithesis of that of the eighteenth century, the era of conventionalism. But the way for the coming of Turner and the imaginative school was being paved even in the eighteenth century. Mr. Sharp takes as the keynote of modern British art the dictum of Hogarth and of Reynolds. "There is only one school, that of Nature." "Truth to Nature" was the axiom which bound together the great artists of the century, however divergent in other respects their aims and methods may have been. Of this movement in art Gainsborough and Constable were the leaders in England, Manet and Delacroix in France.

But by "Truth to Nature" nineteenth-century artists came to understand no mere laboured exactitude of imitative detail. The painful accuracy of the Pre-Raphaelites was, it must be remembered, not one of their articles of faith. It was recognised that Nature must be seen from within, not merely from without the individual: that imaginative power may wrest her meaning from Nature as Realism never can. And Turner wrote this lesson in letters of fire. The art of the nineteenth century achieved a freedom in expression, which the twentieth century may develop—or abuse. We can only be sure that never again will a fashionable painter and connoisseur, in appraising the landscape study of a young artist, inquire "where Mr. Constable meant to put his brown tree."

Mr. Sharp brings out very clearly the great part played by English painters in the art revolution. He will have none of the theory that it is to Paris we must look for all that is noteworthy in modern art. "It is Gainsborough who is to be traced through the whole development of contemporary art." Gainsborough went to Nature and painted what he saw as he saw it. His trees were impressionistic, but they were the living trees, not conventional accessories, nor botanical specimens. He excelled Wilson as Constable excelled him. French artists and critics have generously recognised the influence on modern art of the English masters of the early nineteenth century. But the matter is best summed up by the unknown artist, whom Mr. Sharp quotes: "The Barbizon school is the offspring of Father Millet and Mother Corot, and neither of these would be here had they not been begot by Grandfather Constable."

The nineteenth century discovered no continents, but not even the age of Christopher Columbus was more active in exploration. War, religion, and politics are less and less potent in driving mankind into the remote places of the earth. The needs of commerce are now, as ever, a spur to discovery. But the field of exploration, wherein the nineteenth century stands first, was one which had no rewards of trade, liberty, or dominion to offer its invaders. The quest of the Poles is made in the name of science, but science is here, as often, only another name for Romance. Nothing else is to be won from the lone Arctic regions. They are the last and most awful stronghold of the Unknown on this earth, and the story of the heroic, persistent, and never successful assaults made upon it is some index to the imaginative quality of the nineteenth century. In the volume on "Discoveries and Explorations" in the series before us Mr. Charles Roberts devotes a large part of his space to Arctic and Antarctic Exploration, although the records of the last six years are not included. The external history of the nineteenth century holds no more thrilling story than is related of this wonderful series of Polar expeditions. The actual amount of discovery in Polar seas was enormous, and yet, despite Parrys and Franklins, and all the gallant host of explorers, Nature still keeps intact her ice-bound fastnesses. "It is safe to say," writes Mr. Roberts, "that an unknown continent waits with all its secrets behind the southern ice-packs, whilst in the unmapped area of the North Pole room might yet be found for more than a dozen countries the size of England." In other and less implacable quarters of the globe there is still much to be discovered. In Africa, vast tracts of the Sahara, of the centre and of the East, are unexplored. In South America, an immense district of the North-West is virgin forest land, the old El Dorado still unpenetrated. In Asia, there is darkness still in Arabia and Tibet.

Science in the nineteenth century has been treated by Mr. Arthur Thomson as an introduction to the study of any branch of science. The volume will be of great value. There is an admirable expression of the point of view of the most liberal minds in science at the close of the nineteenth century. Science has become less assertive, more fruitfully suggestive. "Everywhere there is a widening outlook, a more and more intensive analysis, but never a hint of finality." A sense of inter-relations is one of the characteristics of the modern outlook, and "the word ultimate does not appear in the scientific dictionary." The change that has come over the scientific point of view may be gathered from the following passage concerning the unity of science:

Science for its own sake requires to be continually moralised and socialised, oriented, that is to say, in relation to other ideals of human life than its own immediate one of working with an intellectual cosmos. Our science requires at once to be kept in touch with our life and with our dreams; with our doing and with our feeling; with our practice and with our poetry. Synergy and sympathy are needed to complete a synthesis.

Again, there is emphatic recognition of the fact that science is concerned only with "how." It cannot tell us "why." As Professor Poynting says: "a law of nature explains nothing . . . it is but a descriptive formula." But, in finding a descriptive formula which applies to any event, science "improves our account of it by likening it to what we already know." There is the function of science as it is understood to-day.

As to the progress in science, there is the warning against exaggerated impressions. In spite of the enormous and rapid accumulation of natural knowledge, the number of scientific generalisations is small. For form only is such importance claimed—the indestructibility of matter, the conservation of energy, the formula of gravitation, or the theory of organic evolution.

In the world that belongs to science it may be said that its greatest continents are yet unmapped. The pioneers of fifty years ago stood on the peaks and surveyed their discoveries with confident eyes. But the horizon of those new-found countries still widens and recedes.

To take an instance. The theory of organic evolution firmly stands, but the factors in its process are a labyrinth of perplexing uncertainties. The discovery of radium—made since Mr. Thomson's volume was written—has destroyed or suspended generalisations which were written largest on the chart of science. In astronomy it seemed, a hundred years ago, that some star, possibly Sirius, or some point in the Pleiades, would "turn out to be" the hub of the universe, the centre to which all heavenly bodies related. But to-day "the system or goal of the grandest of all movements is unknown." In science, one would say, there was, more than in any other department of human thought, room for the imaginative worker.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

BOOKS FOR BOYS—I

EVERY year as autumn nears its end the number of boys' books upon our table shows an increase upon that of the preceding season. There is—perhaps necessarily, since the writer of a boys' book has no other object in view than to supply goods for which there is an assured sale in the market—a distressing lack of variety, but increase in quantity has not resulted in a falling away in quality. Mr. Herbert Strang and Captain F. S. Brereton—both writers of considerable ability—have fought their way to the front rank of spinners of tales of adventure and bid fair to make good the loss which Young Britain sustained in the death of Henty; but we look in vain for another "Tom Brown's Schooldays."

Of Mr. Strang's "Brown of Moukden" and "The Adventures of Harry Rochester," we spoke last year in terms of high praise. His "One of Clive's Heroes" (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is, if anything, better than either—better than "Kobo," his first successful story. Desmond Burke, the hero, trying to escape from a brutal brother, falls into the hands of a scoundrel who sells him as a slave to an Indian Prince. The boy—a fine character—escapes with some of his fellow captives, and they seize a vessel and make for Calcutta, where Desmond enters the Company's service. Thenceforward adventure follows adventure, and the narration of his hero's escapades gives Mr. Strang an opening for a graphic account of the siege of Calcutta and the tragedy of the Black Hole. The characters are well drawn, and the conversations natural. "One of Clive's Heroes" is a brave book—the best thing Mr. Strang has done. In it he writes of a country he knows; in "Samba" (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.), he writes of a country which we fancy he does not know. It is "a story of the rubber slaves of the Congo," and is based on information which may—or may not—be correct; but we think that the good taste which Mr. Strang has shown in his other works should have suggested to him that it is a subject which would have been much better left alone. It is not in good taste, and it is not worthy of its author. We should hesitate before putting it into the hands of the boys for whom it is apparently intended.—From Captain Brereton, as from Mr. Strang, come two new books. "With Roberts to Candahar," a tale of the third Afghan War (Blackie, 5s.), opens at Cabul, when the British mission under Sir Louis Cavagnari is being attacked by the mutinous troops of the Ameer. Alec Dennison, on his way to Cabul to meet his father, is attacked in a gorge, but escapes. He is appointed aide-de-camp and interpreter to General Sir Frederick Roberts, and joins the punitive expedition. All trace of Major Dennison disappears after the massacre at Cabul, but the youthful Alec sets to work to find and rescue him, as every hero would, and his many adventures and perilous situations, out of which his indomitable courage and resource bring him triumphantly, make up a book which many boys, we fear, after a long day's reading, will smuggle beneath their jackets and finish in bed. In "Roger the Bold," a tale of the Conquest of Mexico (Blackie, 6s.), Captain Brereton takes us into a country which will be new to the majority of his readers. Shortly after the discovery of Mexico Roger joins an exploration party, is taken prisoner, and has a narrow escape from death on the altar of the god of war. His bravery, however, saves him, and the Mexicans offer him the post of cacique and endless treasure—we never knew Mexicans so recklessly generous—if he will aid them in their fight against the Spaniards. Needless to say he accepts, and Captain Brereton, with the reader by his side, follows him—fighting as only a born fighter could—as he dashes from adventure to adventure, at a pace which leaves us breathless but filled with admiration and intensely proud of our country. "Roger the Bold" is a fine piece of work. There is a strong, manly, healthy tone in all Captain Brereton's books, and his military knowledge gives him a grip of his subject which few other authors of boys' books possess.—"Gerald the Sheriff," by Charles W. Whistler (Warne, 6s.), is a historical romance which is likely to find its way into the hands of parents after—but not before—it has been read and possibly re-read by their sons. The story is placed in the reign of William Rufus, and deals with the adventures of Gerald, the Sheriff of Camelford, and Edmund, son of the Thane of Crowcombe, who, outlawed for alleged offences against the Forest Laws, steal Gerald's own ship and begin a series of hazardous enterprises off our western coast. As in his former books, Mr. Whistler has caught the atmosphere of the period; and Mr. Speed's illustrations are admirable.

"Across the Spanish Main," by Harry Collingwood (Blackie, 5s.), is a stirring story of adventures on sea in the spacious days of Great Elizabeth. Two youths, friends from childhood, sail with Cavendish for the Indies. Early in the voyage their three small ships capture or destroy five Spanish frigates. After exciting adventures in Hispaniola one of the heroes is left by accident on a lonely island, but is rescued in time to take part in the capture of a notorious pirate. Further captures of richly laden galleons, attacks on Spanish settlements, and endless minor escapades, follow. "Across the Spanish Main" is a capital sea-story—one that boys of all ages and all dispositions will enjoy. We expect to see it reprinted before long.—"Frank Brown, Sea Apprentice," by Frank Bullen (Nisbet, 6s.), though to some extent marred by a suggestion of patronage, is a book that will serve a double purpose: that of restraining physically weak boys who hanker after sea-life because they believe there is nothing to do on board save fight and conquer bold bad pirates, and that of encouraging physically strong boys possessed of the genuine sea-fever, and making sailors and potential heroes of them. The story of Frank Brown is well told, and it was a story worth telling.—"The Adventures of Billy Topsail," by Norman Duncan (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.), which deals chiefly with the fisheries off the coast of Labrador, is the sort of book which wins popularity, we imagine, among the youth of America, though the British schoolboy is likely to find it tiresome. Billy Topsail is too great a hero.—In "Hunting the Skipper" (S.P.C.K., 5s.) Mr. George Manville Fenn gives a very readable and exciting account of the cruise of the Seafowl sloop. Mr. Fenn is a practised hand, and his book is never dull. The story of the outwitting of Captain Kingsberry by an American trader and the captain's determined chase till he runs his man to earth (metaphorically), and takes his revenge, is well told, and the characterisation is good. "Dick Leslie's Luck," by Harry Collingwood (S.P.C.K., 3s. 6d.), is an excellent story of shipwreck and adventure. Mr. Collingwood writes of the sea with a sympathy and understanding which are all too rare in writers of boys' books, and his hero is a fine character, well drawn.

To Messrs. Seeley both givers and recipients of boys' books have reason to be grateful for their Library of Romance. The volumes are well illustrated, handsomely bound—an ornament on table or bookshelf—and uniformly good. On our desk are four additions to the series. "The Romance of Early Exploration" (5s.), by Archibald Williams, is a companion volume to the same author's "Romance of Modern Exploration," reviewed in these columns last year, and, like it, is an epitome of the best books on the subject, well written and full of good matter. Equally exciting is Mr. J. C. Lambert's "The Romance of Missionary Heroism" (5s.), true stories of the adventures of missionaries with uncivilised man, wild beasts, and the forces of nature in all parts of the world. To young nature-lovers "The Romance of Animal Arts and Crafts" (5s.), by H. Coupin and J. Lea, and "The Romance of Plant Life" (5s.), by G. F. Scott Elliot, will prove enthralling—a welcome relief from the meretricious trash usually served up at this season as "nature-books." The illustrations in the former are much above the average, and both are written in a simple, natural, straightforward style that will appeal to readers young and old. Similar in design and scope to Messrs. Seeley's Library of Romance is their Library of Adventure, the first two volumes of which are "Adventures in the Great Deserts" (5s.), by H. W. G. Hearst, and "Adventures on the Great Rivers," (5s.), by Richard Stead: succinct accounts of adventures that have made history.—Of "The Children's Odyssey, Told from Homer in Simple Language," by the Rev. Alfred Church (Seeley, 5s.), it would be difficult to speak too highly. Mr. Church is a scholar to whom children of all ages owe a heavy debt of gratitude, and it is sufficient to say that the book before us is in no way inferior to any of its long list of predecessors. We should like to see the whole series in the library of every boy and girl with the best inclination to combine serious study with entertainment.

FROM ROSAMOR DEAD TO FAVONIUS FOR WHOM SHE DIED

You loved my rounded cheeks !
They have grown thin and white.
You loved my carmine lips !
They give no more delight.

You loved my flame-bright hair !
Quenched now its gleaming gold.
You loved my fragrant flesh !
'Tis waxen stark and cold.

But ah ! the one thing, Dear,
You did not love in me,
Blooms soft, and red, and gold,
Fragrant immortally.

Not you, nor Time, nor Death,
Have any power to move
One crimson petal from
My perfect rose of Love.

Yet when death calls to you
The breath of Love shall part
The petals of my Rose
And bare its burning heart.

ALTHEA GYLES.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

XI.—ACTION AND REACTION ; WHENCE ?

How strange are the swingings of the pendulum of human life, and how full of mystery the reactions of experience ! Oftentimes evil seems to come out of good, arising from it directly. "The woman, that Thou gavest to be with me, she tempted me, and I did eat." From the poppy that soothes comes the opium that stupefies ; and from barley—which is a staff of life—the means of intoxication and death. Out of a radiant and apparently sinless infancy a querulous youth and selfish manhood have arisen, and from many a marriage untold misery. Out of the richest, purest and most disinterested love the greatest tribulation has sometimes issued. Observing these things the student of human nature very naturally asks, "Are they only the accidents of life, the chance conjunctions of experience ? or are they its component parts ?"

But as he continues his survey he sees, on the other hand, that

Out of evil so much good more.

From the wasting inroads of disease there sometimes issues a new development of strength, out of sickness patience, from strife and tribulation peace, out of discord harmony, from physical disaster moral renovation, from outward losses human spirits refined as by a furnace-fire. This double set of facts seems at first to be contradictory. They appear to point in different directions, and the conclusion drawn from them may be wholly pessimistic or altogether the reverse. But the question of supreme moment is, Are they a mere series of occurrences brought about by the ever working law of action and reaction ? To revert to the illustration already used, are they due to a mere swing of the pendulum of life to right and to left through a succession of cosmic changes ? or, must we go beneath these, below their mere occurrence, for an explanation of how they come about, of how they are produced ?

It seems to some observers that they point to an unseen Power, working in and through our human nature to its ultimate well-being ; not a blind haphazard fate, but an Intelligence guiding the race, what the religious know and describe as Providence. Perhaps one ray of light as to the existence, and the working, of that Providence may come out of the very strife itself, and the way in which it is carried on.

Human beings do not construct the world in which they live, as the sea-polypes do in a bed of coral. They find it constructed for them hour by hour. And so it comes to pass that we do not entirely build or rebuild our characters, but find them built and rebuilt for us continually. Is it not the work of a transcendent Power, which operates on us while we are scarcely conscious of it, or wholly unconscious ? We seldom know the nature, and can scarcely ever trace the source, of those influences that sway us most. If we did, it might interfere with the simplicity, and lessen the directness of our life. But when its drag-weights are temporarily lifted, we make fresh acquaintance with its inner springs, and obtain a new knowledge of that world of which usually we have only broken glimpses. We all know how the rush of trivial interests, and the deceptive glamour of achievement, hide some things from us ; which are the more real, because they have kept so long in lurking-places. But now and then—and usually all of a sudden—they come out, disclosing new possibilities within our reach. Without such disclosures of influence operating on us, and guidance of which we are seldom directly conscious, we could not make much headway against the forces which break our life into fragments. And it is for this reason that, to so many persons, Morality needs the underpropping of Religion.

Take the following as a definition of Morality, in and by itself. "Observation has shown, and experience proved that the happiness, elevation, and prosperity of the race depend upon the recognition of certain laws, and the voluntary fulfilment of them. That acknowledgment and obedience constitute morality." So far, well. But is it not a vague definition ? too weilläufig ? Do we not need something more precise ? something not beyond, but within the law ? Many of us at any rate do not find a lever that can move the will till we transcend the ethical sphere, and discern not a "stream of tendency," but a Power that operates within us. When that comes into living force, the "law" is at once transfigured, the dead "imperative" becomes "a commandment that has life," as Frederick Denison Maurice once put it to the writer. And then, as that distinguished metaphysician Father Dalgairns wrote (the quotation is from memory)—"When God is identified with moral Order the veil is at its very thinnest.

We have but to make allowance for the tremulousness and the idiosyncrasies of the organ by which we apprehend Him, but we have passed beyond phenomena."

Of the Power that works in human nature to upbuild it we do not presume to speak familiarly, or over-confidently. It is at once known, and unknown; felt as an influence or emanation, but usually undiscovered in its mode of action, and incomprehensible in its essence. Like the wind, "it bloweth where it listeth." Its comings and its goings are full of mystery. But if recognised, many of the bewildering discords of our life are lessened; and although enigmas remain by the score, they do not perplex. We realise that they might be greater than they are, and we ourselves can always say "Oremus."

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

THE TEXT OF MARMION

SIXTEEN years ago I collated the doubtful readings of seven early editions of "Marmion" and added the result of my collation to my edition of the poem published by Macmillan and Co. The readings of the editions collated were as follows:

	1st Ed. (1808)	2nd Ed. (1808)	7th Ed. (1811)	Duo- decimo (1820)	10th Ed. (1821)	12th Ed. (1825)	Lock- hart's Edition
2. xxiv. 15	and	and	and	and	nor	nor	nor
xxviii. 3	faith	faith	faith	faith	faith	fate	fate
3 Int. 28	loftier	loftier	lofty	lofty	lofty	lofty	lofty
194	sleights	sleights	sleights	sleights	sleights	slights	slights
228	from	from	from	from	from	for	for
xiv. 17	vail	vail	veil	vail	vail	vail	vail
4 Int. 56	dank	dank	dank	dank	dank	dank	dark
xi. 10	hath	hath	hath	hath	hath	had	had
xi. 13	knots	knots	knots	notes	notes	notes	knots
5 viii. 9	were	were	were	were	was	was	was xiii. 23	vessels	vessels	vessels	vessels	vessels	vassals	vassals
6 Int. 215	review	review	review	review	review	renew	renew
xx. 11	vails	vails	vails	vails	vails	'vails	'vails
xxi. 9	fair	fair	fair	fair	fair	far	far

The original manuscript, of the existence of which I could not then get any information, is now in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh and by the courtesy of the librarian I have been allowed to consult it. On the fly leaf of the manuscript there is the following note signed by Archibald Constable: "This is the original manuscript of 'Marmion' by Walter Scott, Esq., which I requested the Printer might preserve. It is nearly perfect there being only wanting in canto II. stanzas v. vi. vii. viii. and part of iv. and ix., in canto III., stanzas ii. iii. xxxii. and xxxiii." On Constable's failure the manuscripts of "Marmion," "Don Roderick," "The Field of Waterloo," and "The Lord of the Isles" were all bought for £60 by Cadell in 1833. In July 1867 at Cadell's sale at Christie's, Mr. Francis Harvey of 4 St. James's Street, London, bought the manuscript of "Marmion" alone for Sir William Augustus Fraser of Ledecune and Morar for £200 11s. In June 1897 he was commissioned to offer £1500 for the manuscript. Sir William Fraser declined the offer and on his death in 1898 bequeathed it to the Advocates' Library where it has secured an appropriate permanent resting-place.

In all the doubtful readings considered in my collation except one the manuscript agrees with the first edition.

The exception is in 5, viii. 9 where the manuscript agrees with the tenth, twelfth and Lockhart's edition in reading:

For royal was his garb and mien

although the earlier editions read:

For royal were his garb and mien.

It is amusing to find that Dr. Rolfe, who has done more than any other editor to rectify the text of Scott's poems, remarks on this passage that Scott could not have written "was" here. However, he did write "was," although probably he substituted "were" for "was" when correcting the proofs.

In 2, i. v. an important emendation, the correctness of which has, I think, never been disputed, was made independently in an American edition by Dr. Rolfe, and by me in an Indian edition. The full stop, which we removed from the end of the line, is found in the manuscript, but this fact will hardly be worth consideration as an argument against the emendation. All through the manuscript Scott's careless punctuation is manifested. He continually omits full stops that are required, and sometimes puts them in where they spoil the sense, as, for instance, in this passage and at the end of 2, xxii. 5, and 5, xxx. 39.

Dr. Rolfe also condemns the full stop at the end of 2, xxxiii. 9 as "evidently a misprint, though retained (as a colon) in all the more recent editions," and, as we may now add, present in the original manuscript. This is, no doubt, a very plausible emendation. If the full stop is retained, "as tottering" means "while tottering." The use of "as" in a temporal sense with a participle is a rare construction. I find no instance of it in Murray's dictionary. Nevertheless it is to be found in the "Lady of the Lake," 2, xxi. 5:

And high their snowy arms they threw,
As echoing back with shrill acclaim
And chorus wild the chieftain's name, where "as" cannot mean "as if." The construction also occurs in one of Scott's novels, but I have forgotten the reference. Further, although the passage, as it is worded now, would do without the full stop, in the wording of the original manuscript the full stop seems necessary on account of the words that follow, namely:

That night amid the vesper's swell
They thought they heard Constantia's yell, where the words "that night" indicate an interval of time between the hurried flight to upper air and the sounding of the vesper bell, and are evidently intended to begin a new sentence.

In 6, xxxiii., in my edition the comma, inserted after "this" in all the printed editions, is omitted, as it seems clear that "by this" was intended to belong not to the principal sentence but to the subordinate concessive clause. This emendation is supported by the manuscript, which has no comma after "this."

The prophetic reference to the bombardment of Copenhagen by Lord Cathcart in 3, xxiv. is found in the manuscript, and was not added by Scott while correcting the proofs. Copenhagen was bombarded in the first week of September 1807. Therefore this part of the poem must have been written after that date. The lines were probably composed at the very time when the poet first heard the news of the event.

Before leaving the subject of Marmion, I may perhaps be allowed to refer to a phrase which has, I think, been wrongly interpreted by all annotated editions including my own. In 5, ii. we read that the young knights and squires practised "to pass, to wheel, the croupe to gain and high curvett." Scott in his note quotes a passage from the autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury illustrating the meaning of "high curvett." He does not go on to quote the explanation of what is meant by gaining the croupe. "The manner of fighting a duel on horseback," Lord Herbert informs his readers, "I was taught thus.

We had each of us a reasonable stiff riding rod in our hands, about the length of a sword and so rid one against the other; he, as the more expert, sat still to pass me and then get behind me, and after to turn with his right hand upon my left side with his rod, that so he might hit me with the point thereof in the body; and he that can do this handsomely is sure to overcome his adversary, it being impossible to bring his sword about enough to defend himself or offend the assailant: and to get this advantage; which they call in French, gagner la crouppe, nothing is so useful as to make a horse go only sideward until his adversary be past him, since he will by this means avoid his adversary's blow and thrust, and on a sudden get on the left hand of his adversary." It would thus appear that to gain the croupe in a combat on horseback was a manœuvre giving much the same advantage as gaining the weather-gage in a sea-fight.

MICHAEL MACMILLAN.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE PLEIAD

THE sixteenth century was a period of revolution in French arts and letters. In the sculpture of Sluter and the work of Beauneveu, in the poetry of Villon and the craft of her master-masons, France then possessed a fund of living traditions sufficient for the development of a distinct Northern culture. By combining Gothic idealism and Flemish realism she had founded an art as different from that of the thirteenth century as it was from that of the neo-classic school. It was informed neither by a mediæval spirituality nor by a pagan passion for earthly loveliness, but by a lively and catholic interest in the common things of life. The note of the art of the French Renaissance of the fifteenth century was a fine and keen expressiveness, an expressiveness which still endows the verses of Villon and the sketches of Beauneveu with a strangely modern quality. Poet and painter both disregarded a certain conventional beauty in order to achieve a greater fidelity in characterisation, and discovered thereby a novel and admirable kind of natural beauty. They were, in fact, the forerunners of the romantic movement in modern art and literature; and, if the younger generations of French artists and writers had resumed and consummated their work, France might have regained in the sixteenth century the position which she attained in the thirteenth. To her, and not to England, it might then have been given to open up that new world of imagination in which the genius of the Northern races of Europe finally expressed itself.

Unfortunately, at the beginning of the sixteenth century the French mind was so dazzled by the brilliant neo-classic art of Italy that it destroyed its glorious heritage of romance traditions and adopted Italian models in architecture and sculpture as well as in poetry. But, although the neo-classic movement of revolution was more thorough than the romantic movement of reaction which long afterwards ensued, it was more gradual in its operation. In the age of the Pleiad, for instance, French verse had not lost all its wild, native beauty.

"J'aime fort les jardins qui sentent le sauvage," said Ronsard, and the poetry of his school has somewhat of the charm of the gardens that he loved. It is the most delightful thing in French literature, full of art, yet racy of the soil, and incomparable in freshness, delicacy and sweetness. Like the verse of Campion and Herrick, it lacks the poignancy and the passion of the highest sort of lyrical poetry, but in its union of Latin clarity and romantic colour it is perfect of its kind. It is informed only by a light flow of fancies, but the fancies are true and exquisite, and drawn from a lovely source. They are touched with the hues and odours of spring. Ronsard and his companions had a quicker sense of natural beauty than any other French poets. Their finest lyrics seem to have been composed in that delicious moment when upon the air of spring there is wafted the fragrance of summer flowers. There was nothing even in English literature in 1550 of so vernal a grace as Ronsard's verses to Cassandre:

O little maid more tender
Than any bud in May
That rose-bushes engender
To hail the break of day,
In one part green, in one
Flushing vermillion . . .

Nor time nor the misgiving
That other lips may please,
Shall lure my lips, while living,
From living upon these:
And so clasped we will lie
Till in that kiss we die.

You, love, and I your lover,
Both in the self-same breath,
Shall fare out to discover
The pallid house of Death,
And fields assigned by Fate
To lovers fortunate . . .

Along the grassy meadows
Below the shelving dunes,
The river shores and shadows
Re-echo many tunes.
One plays and to him one
Dances in unison . . .

The winds are ever chanting
Soft songs of fitful sound,
And laurels ever slanting
Cool shadows on the ground:
The flowers there never lose
The glory of their hues.

Somewhere in the deep spaces
That happy orchard screens,
We two shall find our places
Where lovers and their queens
Live on without a care
And like them we shall fare.

"The White Thorn" and "The Skylark" of Ronsard are still more redolent of Spring. And how delightful is the "April" of Rémi Belleau!

April, glory of the wood's
Solitudes;
April, gentle hope of fruits
Nursed within the downy womb
Of the bloom
Budding on the younger shoots . . .

April, glory of the song
Winds prolong,
Who, with motions of their wing,
Stretch again between the trees
Nets to seize
Flora for her ravishing . . .

Thou it is, whose gracious mouth
From the South
Lures again the swallows' wing:
Wanderers that ever are Near and far
Hailed for heralds of the spring.

Hawthorn-bush and eglantine,
Celandine,
Pink and rose and lily too,
Ravished by thy lovely weather
All together
Show us that their gowns are new.

And the minion nightingale,
Sweet and frail,
In the shade with nimble tongue
Sets the tune he loves to sing,
Quivering
To the music of his song . . .

May shall boast of breezes sweet,
Fruits to eat,
The abundance of her dew,
Manna, honey too, that swells
Ruddy cells,
Sweetening her grace anew.

But, for me, I give to fame
 One whose name
 Tells of her that from the sea
 Rising through the wreathing foam,
 Saw the home
 Of her new nativity.

The feeling for natural beauty was the one strain of true sentiment in the poetry of the Pleiad. Their shows of passion were scarcely real; their relish for refinements was little more than make-believe; their interest in the general movements of their time was somewhat feeble: but their love of a country life was genuine and deep. Living in a wild age of dissension, tumult, and bloodshed, they averted their eyes from the tragic pageantry of human existence, and sought to forget it in the amenity and quietness of nature. Their delight in the open country is a trait which distinguishes them from Villon, who was essentially a poet of the town, and connects them with the English poets of the Elizabethan period. By the fresh emotion which they infused into it, they transformed the rather formal pastoralism of mediæval and classic tradition, into a vivid and lightsome kind of literature, and from them Spenser and other Elizabethans learned to sing of country ways and country pleasures. And they learned not only the matter but the art of pastoral verse. As Mr. George Wyndham remarks in an introduction to his admirable anthology of the poetry of the Pleiad ("Ronsard and La Pléiade," Macmillan), the music of Spenser's earlier poems was of French origin:

Bring hither the pink and purple columbine
 With gelliflowers;
 Bring sweet carnations and sops-in-wine,
 Worn of paramours;
 Strew me the ground with daffadowndillies,
 With cowslips, and king-cups and loved lilies.
 The pretty paunce
 And the chevisaunce
 Shall watch with the fair fleur-de-lice.

That is written to an air of Ronsard's devising. The leader of the Pleiad won his position in French literature more by art than by inspiration. Materiem superabat opus might truly be said of all his poems. Possessing an exquisite sense of style and an extraordinary fertility in metrical invention, he perfected the orchestration of French poetry and created a hundred new forms of verse. The value of his work resides in its subtle simplicity of diction and its elaborate delicacy of rhythm. He is much more of a poet than Spenser. In him the general reader will find less of the stuff of poetry, and the fellow craftsman more of the manner. And happily for his fame he failed to accomplish that which he intended. He tried to found a new movement of neo-classicism in agreement with the taste of the Court: he succeeded in rallying together the last group of writers of the old romantic school in agreement with the taste of the nation. Neo-classicism was not really established in France until the reign of Louis XIV. Even then it was so opposed to the veritable genius of the French people that, as soon as they were able to express themselves freely, their art and literature again became romantic, and Ronsard was at once recognised by Hugo and Sainte-Beuve as a glorious ancestor.

It is a difficult thing to convey into modern English the peculiar charm of the verses of Ronsard and his associates. Each musical array of sweet syllables and interlacing rhymes is not merely beautiful in itself, but it has acquired an indefinable antique grace from the touch of time. Mr. Wyndham, however, has been uncommonly happy in the series of translations which he has added to his anthology. In some of them he recovers the choiceness, freshness and harmony of phrase which English lyrical poets long since learned from the Pleiad and out of which they fashioned a style with qualities that even Donne and Crashaw and Marvell were never able to sacrifice for others, without losing more than was gained.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Story of a Poem," by C. R. Stone.]

FICTION

Richard Hawkwood. By H. NEVILLE MAUGHAM. (Blackwood, 6s.)

RICHARD HAWKWOOD, like his famous ancestor Sir John, seeks his fortune in Italy, and by good luck enters the service of Lorenzo de' Medici, whose character dominates the book. The typical British youth is commendably truthful, and of bull-dog courage; he does the right thing, and commits the right blunder, and Lorenzo is generous. Life is not dull at the Florentine Court, and Richard's adventures and his wooing are all in accordance with the liveliest expectations and the best traditions. Of Lorenzo the Magnificent we see many sides and many moods, and find warrant for half a dozen views of his private character. The story moves rapidly through conspiracies, historic scenes and daring deeds; it is pleasantly told with a simplicity, almost a bluntness, that imparts a reality to Richard Hawkwood's interesting autobiography.

Behind the Veil. By ETHEL WHEELER. (Nutt, 6s. net.)

THESE stories will not bear the pomp with which they are presented. Mr. Spare's designs and drawings, though they lack originality, possess sometimes a kind of incisive cleverness, which seems in odd contrast to Miss Wheeler's gentle, flowery prose and mildly mysterious thought. Her best story (and it is not as good as it might be) is in the series, Through the Mystic Doors, and is called "The Curl." The idea of an old man giving a life's devotion to a lock of hair which he has found in a bird's nest, and round which he weaves his romance, is delicately imagined; and the swift change of his romance when his friend tells him it must be a young child's hair is delightful. The tale is slight, but it has charm. To this is prefixed the picture of a fat woman floating in mid-air, which suggests an obscene caricature of a drawing by Aubrey Beardsley. If it were not so out of place it might be shocking: as it is, it is only ridiculous.

The Heart that Knows. By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS. (Duckworth, 6s.)

IN Westcock Village the finest, strongest, best-beloved man is the rector. That is, of course, as it should be, and is exactly typical of Mr. Roberts's story, which is as robust and genial as his pre-eminent rector; and the story treats probability with the same swift scorn and deft vigour, as the rector treated the loutish miner when he pitched him into the deep lake and rescued him, angry that he could not swim. The air is fresh with much muscular virtue, of the kind which appeals especially to American novelists; but Mr. Roberts has the skill to strip that virtue of its usual dreariness, and his people have much simple human feeling in them, although chance helps them to exploits and situations which are as exceptional in life as they are common in fiction.

At the Sign of the Peacock. By K. C. RYVES. (Unwin, 6s.)

THIS book belongs to the First Novel Library, and its merit, therefore, deserves double emphasis. It is a clever study of an unusual character, and the circumstances chosen to develop this character are both interesting and natural. The other persons are incisive sketches—it is a book full of real people. The style is terse and amusing, and there are no meaningless interpolations of well-worn adjectives and phrases. The central figure, the cold girl who takes an austere pleasure in sensuous beauties, and is only saved from being "a cat" by a certain aloofness, is well traced through the changes that result from her horrified discovery that she has a heart after all, and has given it away like any other girl.

Leone. A Tale of the Jesuits. By the late Mrs. A. DOUGLAS-HAMILTON. (Long, 6s.)

THIS book has been edited by the author's daughter, Lady Dunbar of Mochrum, and the fact of Mrs. Douglas-

Hamilton's death rather disarms criticism. The story traces the adventures of Lionel Sackville, whose life was certainly full, inasmuch as matter enough for a whole book is hurried over in a paragraph or two. The influence of the Jesuits and the extraordinary means through which they exert it are interestingly exposed, but the book fails in character-drawing, or rather, in expression. If the manner had been as good as the matter it would have been an engrossing story; and it remains an unusual and unhackneyed novel, with a wide knowledge of men and manners behind it.

The Dangerville Inheritance. By A. C. FOX-DAVIES. (Lane, 6s.)

THIS differs from most other detective tales in being the story of a mystery rather than the glorification of a detective. It also differs from them in keeping the solution from even the reader until the last page. Lord and Lady Dangerville seem to have been magnetised to attract mysteries, and mysteries of no mean radius. There is so much action that there is little time for character, but the reader has little time to miss it. Above all, there is an admirable absence of bluster and bustle; although the story moves rapidly, it does so with the swiftness of a well-bred person who is never flurried. It is characteristic of the author of "Armorial Families" that one important clue should rest in a crest: and there is something about the unusual opening circumstances and the magnificent surprise which he reserves for the last paragraph, that leads one to scent a good deal of romance in the calling of an armorial expert. For the lovers of Sherlock Holmes "The Dangerville Inheritance" will be a fine detective story; but as an unusual drama of human life, and as an excellently told history it will have a more discriminating audience.

Her Faith Against the World. By WILFRED WILBERFORCE and A. R. GILBERT. (Burns & Oates, 3s. 6d.)

THE authors of "Her Faith Against the World" deal boldly with subjects usually eschewed by modern novelists. Without being, in any sense, a "novel with a purpose," the book is one in which both religious and political opinions play an important part, and they are treated, as such subjects should be treated, seriously and conscientiously. The political novel is usually either dull or flippant, the religious novel is frequently both; and it is pleasant to meet with writers who deal with such subjects brightly and at the same time sincerely. They are not ashamed to equip their characters with that unpopular attribute, a conscience, for the sake of which they suffer many things. The book is written from the point of view of a Roman Catholic, but without bitterness and intolerance.

A Voyage of Discovery and Other Stories. By GUY FLEMING. (Lane, 6s.)

MR. FLEMING tells us, in the beginning of his second tale, that he merely aspires "to tell the story of one who, in character, was an amalgam of good and evil." This, we imagine, has been the aim of most workers in the world of fiction. That Mr. Fleming should prosecute his task with a prolixity which even a certain dry humour cannot render anything but wearisome is to be deplored. Long digressions after the manner of Sterne, combined with pages of conscientious and wordy description, are apt to make rather heavy reading. The author writes well and carefully, with much quiet humour, and the book is full of touches which show both knowledge and appreciation of human nature. Judicious pruning would have made entertaining sketches of what are now but wearisome essays. Of the three stories in the book, the last, "The Hero of Horndean," is the best. It is an interesting character-study.

Montlivet. By ALICE PRESCOTT SMITH. (Constable, 6s.)

THE end of the seventeenth century in Canada, English and French rivalries, Indian friends and foes, and a prisoner—such are the old materials for a new story into which Miss Smith infuses life and freshness. "Montlivet" is quite a charming romance. The English prisoner (Mary Starling in manly guise) is rescued from torture and death by the chivalrous M. de Montlivet, and carried into the wilderness as a comrade. Montlivet possesses all the qualities demanded of a hero of many adventures and of an honourable romantic lover, while Mary Starling is singularly attractive—a girl of courage, with a mind of fine texture, braced and tempered in a masculine school, a woman of "great and gracious ways," essentially feminine and lovable. The story of these adventurous lovers is more than merely exciting, it is fascinating, and delightfully told.

The Trail Together. An Episode. By H. H. BASHFORD. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THE impression left by this story is that the moral focus is somehow wrong, or at least that Hilary's crime, punishment and regeneration are presented from a point of view that does not satisfy the reader as true or even probable. Hilary is the usual ne'er-do-weel younger son, who drifts to the colonies and loafs through life on a remittance from home. By nature ignoble and base, he is not of the stuff that is purified or elevated by adversity. He robs a dying man, and marries his daughter from reasons of convenience and silence: a girl of such doubtful reputation that even the outcasts of the neighbourhood cut her and despise her husband. This unattractive couple follow the trail together, first to increased prosperity and increased hardness of heart, then to sudden failure, and according to Hilary, to freedom of soul, and "more than liberty." It is an unexpected conclusion and to one reader entirely unconvincing. The Canadian scenes are interesting and have an atmosphere of their own, and the story is well written in a uniformly serious vein.

FINE ART PORTRAITS

WITHOUT going quite so far as Mr. James, whose Gabriel Nash, it will be remembered, held that portrait-painting was "the strongest dose of art that life could give," we can endorse that worthy's insistence on the great peculiarity of portraiture: that it is a revelation of two realities, the man whom it is the artist's conscious effort to reveal, and the man (the interpreter) expressed in the very quality and temper of that effort. The success of our eighteenth-century portrait-painters was very largely due to the happy balance they maintained between these two realities; the failure of so many contemporary portrait-painters, able and technically well-equipped in other respects, is brought about by their neglect of one or other of the two. Which of these two realities is of greater importance depends on the point of view, for portraits are historical documents as well as works of art. By the historian it may be argued that to present the personality of the sitter—especially if he be well known—is the more important matter; but the artist will retort that it is the revelation of the painter's personality which gives the more enduring fame, that it is Velasquez and not Pulido Pareja who is the dominating personality in the portrait of the admiral at the National Gallery. However this may be, both artist and historian will concede that it is by a judicious blending of the two personalities, those of the sitter and of the painter, that masterpieces of portraiture have been produced.

Notwithstanding the absence of some of our ablest portrait-painters—notably Sir James Guthrie, Mr. W. Rothenstein and Mr. Steer—and the imperfect representation of several distinguished contributors, the sixteenth exhibition of the Society of Portrait-Painters at the New Gallery gives the visitor a fair idea of what contemporary British painters are producing in this branch of art. Viewed as a whole, the collection suggests that our painters find it harder to achieve a good portrait than a good likeness, though on this point it is difficult to speak with authority without acquaintance with all the sitters. But if the many exhibits unsatisfactory as portraits are also bad likenesses, then little indeed can be said in their defence, and it seems more charitable to assume that failure has resulted from a preponderant attention to the objective. There are painters, like the Hon. John Collier, who have reduced the stern recording of features in line heightened with colour to so impersonal, if accurate, a science, that no trace of art is left. Such portraits may or may not reveal the reality of the sitter, but of the painter they convey nothing save a dim suggestion of tame respectability, neatness and methodical habits; and, however estimable these may be in a citizen, they are not qualities which give any great distinction to a painter. Indeed, they are qualities more admirable in a machine than in a human being, and for this reason we term any work of art in which they obtrusively occur, mechanical.

To catch a likeness is a part, an important part, of the portrait-painter's trade, but it is not the whole; and to give satisfaction in this respect to a sitter and to his or her family is no sure passport to the favour of posterity. In nine cases out of ten posterity cares far less for the person painted than for the manner of the painting, and therefore there is little cause for wonderment that some of the most famous portrait-pictures of the old masters, as Rembrandt's Night Watch, gave intense dissatisfaction to the persons painted. If report be true, there is to-day a painter, by no means undistinguished, whose portraits are apt to give greater pleasure to his critics than his sitters.

In judging contemporary work, then, it is safer to pay less regard to question of likeness and more to the manner of the painting. There is the more reason to adopt this procedure at the New Gallery since few of the exhibits save M. J. E. Blanche's Thomas Hardy, Esq. (7) and the equestrian portrait of The King of Spain (87), by Senor Ramon Casas, have considerable historic interest, and in these two cases, notwithstanding the sketchiness of the first, the manner of presentation is hardly inferior in interest to the person presented. Conversely, in a few works to which we are first attracted by the dexterity of the painting, we find an unexpected revelation of a sitter's reality. Notably is this the case in Mr. George Henry's Helen, Daughter of W. Stirling Stuart, Esq., M.D. (93), the cleverest and cruellest child-portrait that has been shown for many a year. This perfect presentation of precocious self-sufficiency and self-consciousness should be a revelation to any child—not to mention its parents. Mr. George Henry was commonly admitted to have shown the best portrait at this year's Royal Academy, and his contributions to the Portrait-Painters, which include a fine full-length of that gifted draughtswoman, Miss Dorothea Landau (39), ably maintain his reputation. Another child-portrait, Miss Lamb (120), by Mr. William Orpen, is chiefly interesting as an interior with figure beautifully painted; in the revelation of a personality he has done better things. Mr. W. Q. Orchardson, president of the society, sends two portraits: Mrs. Joseph (31), Humphry Roberts, Esq. (64); Mr. Sargent a single bust portrait of General Leonard Wood, U.S. Army (8); and these, with Mr. Lavery's Mrs. R. B. Cunningham-Graham (11), Signor Mancini's The Marquis del Grillo (76), and Mr. E. A. Walton's J. W. Cruikshank, Esq. (14), are all soundly painted: good if not remarkable examples of the art of their respective painters. Mr. C. H. Shannon's portrait of the landscape painter, Robert Gregory, Esq. (35), working at his easel with coat and waistcoat off, deserves still warmer praise. Simple and natural in conception, it is at the same time decorative in arrangement and the harmony of its subdued colour. No work in the gallery is more successful. Some portraits by Fantin and Carrière, and some sculpture by Rodin—including a bronze mask of his earliest effort, L'Homme au Nez Cassé (227), are imports certain to attract the shillings of the public.

Though it includes two notable landscapes, Crome's Return of the Flock, and Constable's Hampstead Heath, shown at the Paris Salon of 1824, together with The Hay Wain, now at the National Gallery, Messrs. Agnew's annual exhibition in aid of the Artists' General Benevolent Fund is practically a portrait collection. Its chief feature is a pair of portraits by Hals, De Heer Bodolphe and Me Vrouw Bodolphe, painted in 1843, that is to say when the artist was over sixty years of age, a fact which may have some bearing on the reticent handling and sober colour scheme which are the leading characteristics of these works. It is an open secret that these fine examples of Hals's art at its suavest, if not at its most brilliant, are the property of Mr. Pierpont Morgan, and will eventually go to the Metropolitan Museum of New York. Another exhibit at Agnew's, Gainsborough's full-length portrait group of Henry and Edward Tomkinson, will also, it is reported, go to the United States at the conclusion of the exhibition. It is a graceful piece of grouping, and it is interesting to be able to compare this child-group with one of Reynolds, William and George (afterwards "Beau") Brummell, and a third of Vandyck's, Children of the Balbi Family, also at Agnew's. The last group, of three young boys, is said to have been at Genoa in 1621; and, if so, as seems probable, it must be considered a wonderful achievement for a boy under twenty-three years of age. The deep, rich colouring may recall Rubens, but already there is a daintiness in the handling and arrangement which is entirely Vandyck's own. In connection with what has been said above it will not be irrelevant to note that of these groups the Vandyck, which is the most eloquent expression of the painter's personality, is at the same time the most profound in its reading of child-character. The remaining exhibits are what we have learnt to expect from these exhibitions—more or less good, but never bad, examples of Raeburn, Romney, Hoppner, Morland, and Lawrence, the last represented by a good early portrait, Harriet, Lady Aberdeen, painted when this boy-prodigy was just of age. It is better than most of the works he painted, but to see the full strength of Lawrence we must go to another gallery.

At Messrs. Shepherd's Gallery (27 King Street) there is now on view a bust portrait by Lawrence of The Rev. W. Pennicott, which for vigour of handling and intense expression of character that painter probably never equalled. Certainly he never surpassed this effort, which must make his severest critic hesitate to dismiss Lawrence as a pretty painter of pretty women. Had he more often shown the power and insight into character displayed in this remarkable work, Lawrence could not justly be accused of failing, like Mil-lais, to fulfil the promise of his youth. Another interesting portrait at Shepherd's is a half-length of Charles I., by William Dobson, the brilliant pupil of Vandyck, whose brief career and unsuspected genius are only just emerging from the obscurity in which they have too long been hid. But for the civil war Dobson might have succeeded Vandyck as Court painter; but after a brief success at Oxford, where probably he painted this picture, he was overwhelmed by the tide of circumstance and died in want and neglect at the early age of thirty-five. Messrs. Shepherd have a reputation for bringing to light forgotten painters, and it is interesting to compare the flowing planes of colour in Dobson's portrait with the severely drawn Holbeinesque Portrait of a Lady by his Scottish contemporary, C. Jameson. Of its kind Jameson's work is good, but it unmistakably shows that in those days Scotland was behind and not, as many think it is now, before England in the matter of painting. The Lady in Straw Bonnet, which some critics last year were inclined to attribute to Raeburn, has now been given to Andrew Geddes, another Scottish painter of parts whom Messrs. Shepherd may claim to have rediscovered. A fine example of one of De Wint's rare landscapes in oils is a conspicuous feature of this exhibition, whilst among many interesting portraits which we lack space to enumerate is the Mrs Allen, a splendidly preserved, non-bituminous example of Reynolds, that great master of the two realities of portraiture.

MUSIC

TWO BIOGRAPHIES

THE numberless small volumes upon musical subjects, chiefly biographies of musicians and summaries of their work, which are constantly poured forth, may be taken as one indication of widespread interest in matters musical; it may, however, be very easily made to prove too much, for in this age of little books on great subjects music is naturally bound to come in for a share of attention of this kind. It is doubtful whether there are not quite as many little books on painters and their pictures, while if poets come in for less personal attention, the number of small anthologies of English verse can scarce be counted. It is easy to criticise a short book but very difficult to write one; at any rate when the effort to compress the outline of a large subject into a small space is sincere: since the scope of each of these books on music is generally the whole life-work of a great man, this difficulty of compression has constantly to be grappled with, and, be it said, most of these efforts bear the stamp of sincerity, whatever their shortcomings. Two examples are here to be considered: "Tchaikovsky" by Edwin Evans (J. M. Dent and Co.), and "Giacomo Puccini" by Wakeling Dry (John Lane). Where, as in the latter case, the writer deals with a living composer and one who has confined himself to a single branch of the art, the task is very much lightened; but on the other hand the author is breaking new ground and cannot avail himself of the efforts of other writers to any great extent. Mr. Wakeling Dry has one great advantage, that of some personal acquaintance with his subject. He has met and talked with Puccini, and has the art of recording his impressions in such a way as to give a pleasant picture of the man, and one which rings true. This is the chief justification of the "Living Masters of Music" series, of which Mr. Wakeling Dry's book is the latest volume. The illustrated interview has its attractions, and many people will enjoy the book for its illustrations alone. We have Puccini in his motor-car and in his motor-boat, "Butterfly," Puccini shooting, wrestling, snowballing, descending Etna on a mule—in fact, Puccini in every conceivable pose and many inconceivable costumes; all of which is very entertaining until we remember that after all it is only as a musician that he is an object of interest. In this capacity Mr. Wakeling Dry does not bring his readers very near to his subject. The chapters on the individual operas sketch the plot of each fairly fully, and show, by the way, how sordid tragedy invariably seems to Puccini the fittest subject for the exercise of his art, but we know very little more about the music after reading the book than before. A reader who had heard no opera by Puccini would learn nothing of the texture of the music; of those operas which are known a recollection is sometimes brought to mind by a word of description recalling some characteristic of Puccini's colouring, or some mannerism of the melody, such as his favourite one of beginning with a reiterated note. This does not, however, amount to much; it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to convey by words alone to people wholly ignorant of any piece of music an idea of its content, but with the aid of a few quotations something more helpful to the large number of people, who have heard one or two of the operas once or twice, might be written.

Mr. Edwin Evans's little book on Tchaikovsky takes a very different line, as indeed the different circumstances under which it appears demand that it should. He is treading upon well-worn ground; the subject has been treated exhaustively, and he has but to sift the researches of others and to include in his work their most salient features, with the addition of some personal contribution to the criticism of Tchaikovsky's individual works. Mr. Evans's book is much more carefully written than that of Mr. Wakeling Dry. In the latter the signs of haste are too evident and sometimes deplorable. Mr. Evans's English grammar, however, is quite irreproachable, if his style is sometimes a trifle pompous. When we have read his account of Tchaikovsky's life we have none of that comfortable feeling of having hobbled on equal terms with a great man, but we have a clear impression of the course of an interesting life and some idea of Tchaikovsky's curiously blended character. One is grateful, too, for the reticence with which he touches on the tragedy of the composer's marriage, and for the fact that he does not dwell upon the morbid side of his nature except as it helps to explain the works. This much is gleaned from the first part called "Tchaikovsky: the man"; in the second, "Tchaikovsky: the musician," the author discusses the works classified according to their various types. While dealing with the operas he is occupied by the dramatic scheme almost as entirely as is Mr. Wakeling Dry, and with less excuse since, Tchaikovsky's operatic music is of the formal and positive kind, whereas Puccini's merely decorates the dramatic situation. When, however, he comes to the symphonies, concertos and other orchestral works, Mr. Evans makes more definite musical comments, and some of his descriptions, as in the case of the second symphony, are enlightening. His point of view is rather that of the conventional admirer who does not look very deep. For instance, the following comment on the second subject of the last movement of the fourth symphony shows his limit of boldness as a critic. Every one will remember the halting character which the minim rests at the end of each phrase give to the theme. Those rests are the only part which Tchaikovsky invented, the notes are those of a Russian folksong. Mr. Evans says:

There is a characteristic vigour about the original which is impaired by the redundant beats. That may be a trifling blemish in a great work, and it is perhaps ungracious to mention it, but in the opinion of many the finale does not reach the level of the rest of the symphony, and therefore one is to some extent justified in doing so.

The rests are in reality a striking instance of that banalité which over and over again makes some gorgeous piece of orchestral display sound absurd. In this movement most people feel that a great fuss is made about a very commonplace tune, and the tune is not commonplace if its phrases remain unbroken. The writer here and elsewhere does not distinguish the composer's strength from his weakness.

A more critical attitude in both these authors would be helpful, whereas their powers of description would still make their writings pleasant. The average reader wants criticism, not because he wants to be told what to think, but because it forms a starting-point for his thought. A criticism of the "Pathetic" symphony, one which tries according to the writer's point of view to show what is beautiful and what morbid, is not likely to be completely endorsed by any one reader, but it may send many a one back to listen more closely to the next performance of it, to form for himself an individual standpoint, whereas a eulogy has no such stimulating effect. Interest in music is to-day fairly general, but discrimination is limited: these small books might do something more to widen it.

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE HUNTING OF THE CHEVIOT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—According to J. W. D. in your issue of November 24, the ballads of the "Hunting of the Cheviot" and of "Otterburne" are "entirely different poems," and "do not even refer to the same event." Professor Hales is quoted as the authority for the opinion. But on the other hand the late Professor Child held that the two ballads are "founded on the same occurrence," "The Hunting of the Cheviot" being the later of the two, and following in part its own tradition, though repeating some portions of the older ballad. This quotation is from the single volume edition of Child's "English and Scottish Popular Ballads" (Sargent and Kittredge. Nutt, 1905). Child's version of "Otterburne" is from a Cottonian manuscript "of about 1550." He regards the grammatical forms of his version of "The Hunting of the Cheviot" as earlier than those in his "Otterburne," but believes the Otterburne ballad itself to be the earlier. "The Hunting of the Cheviot" describes the battle which it celebrates as that of Otterburne. Verse 56 of "The Hunting" is verse 61 of Otterburne. The same persons are present, and are slain or taken, in both ballads. How, then, can we deny that both ballads "refer to the same event"? The traditions used by the balladists in each case varied considerably, but Hume of Godscroft, in the reign of James VI. and I., seems to have been justified in regarding "Otterburne" as the less remote from the facts of history. I am unable, at this moment, to consult the "Folia Litteraria" of Professor Hales, but it seems hasty to rely on his opinion as decisive.

A. LANG.

"WINGED WORDS" AND WOMEN'S STEERING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—You state in your number of November 24, p. 518, col. 1, that the writer of "Winged Words" says that the fourth minor characteristic of women is that they "cannot steer a boat." To me this is like saying that women cannot ride. Last Sunday afternoon a pretty, blue-eyed Lancashire girl—who is reading for the B.Sc. exam.—steered a single-streak sculling-eight for the first time, and did it capitally, keeping us out of the tide better than one of our best men-coxes did in the morning. Girls frequently steer our light outrigger fours and other boats in the Furnivall Sculling Club; and in the summer my big three-sculler is almost always steered by a girl. In Skiff Club races, girls continually steer, and steer well too. Any girl who can cut out her own blouses and skirts, or play croquet or lawn-tennis, is pretty sure to be able to keep the right line on a river. If the women with whom the writer of "Winged Words" sculls cannot steer properly, he must be to blame for teaching them badly.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

PARACLETE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Referring to my review of Mr. Newman Howard's "Savonrola," in which I questioned his application of "Paraclete" to the second Person of the Holy Trinity, Mr. Fred. G. Ackerley writes: "The fact remains that the second Person in the Holy Trinity is a Paraclete."

True; also, for example, St. Agnes was a Blessed Virgin; but the title "The Blessed Virgin" is generally reserved for a special application.

YOUR REVIEWER.

PALGRAVE'S "GOLDEN TREASURY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics," as a work of art, as "a thing of beauty," is so near perfection, that the presence of the least, most superficial, blemish is especially to be regretted. In the presentation of some half-score of the pieces there appears—and persists down to the latest editions—an unpleasant dislocation and breach of symmetry in the alignment of corresponding stanzas, which ought certainly to be corrected on the earliest opportunity. I hope you will think it worth while to allow me through your columns to draw attention to the corrections required. To save space, I use the sign = to express "should align with"; i, ii, . . . for number of stanza, or strophe; 1, 2, . . . for number of line.

xxii. i. 8=i. 5: ii. 5=i. 5: i. 9=ii. 9: where the lines in question stand at present thus:

- | | |
|-------|----------------------------------|
| i. 5 | But my Sun's heavenly eyes |
| | View not your weeping, |
| | That now lies sleeping |
| 8 | Softly, now softly lies, |
| 9 | Sleeping. |
| ii. 5 | —Rest you, then, rest, sad eyes! |
| | Melt not in weeping! |
| | While She lies sleeping |
| 8 | Softly, now softly lies, |
| | Sleeping! |

xxv. i. 10, 11=ii. 10, 11; and should (surely) be divided thus:

Hearts with a thought, rosy lips
With a kiss still entertaining.

LXXIII. ii. 2, 4, 6, 8=i. 2, 4, 6, 8: ii. 9, 10=i. 9, 10.

xcvii. i. 1, 5, ii. 1, 5=iii. 1, 5, iv. 1, 5: or vice versa.

cxxxiii. i. 5=i. 4: or, perhaps better, i. ii. iii. 5=i. ii. iii. 6.

clix. (The Bard) This is the worst case of all.

(A) i. ii. iv. v. vii. viii. should agree. i. 1=i. 3: ii. 1-4, 9, 10=i. 1-4, 9, 10: iv. 1-4, move en bloc to margin: iv. 9-12=i. (v.) 9-12: vii. 12=vii. 10: viii. 1-4=vii. 1-4.

(B) iii. vi. ix. should agree. vi. 2, 4, 7, 10, 12, 14=vi. i.: vi. 3, 6, 8, 9, 11, 13=vi. 15: ix. 1, 5, 7, 10=ix. 2: ix. 8, 9=ix. 3.

ccxxxvi. ii. 5=ii. 3: iii. 4=iii. 2: iv. 7=iv. 5.

cclxix. ii. en bloc to left, so that ii. 1=i. 1.

ccxc. ii. 9=ii. 6: ii. 10=ii. 7.

ccciv. i. 5, 7=i. 4: i. 6, 8=i. 10: iii. 10, 11=iii. 8.

The edition dealt with is the shilling edition, 1905, reprinted 1906.

A. C. AUCHMUTY.

Edgbaston, November 22.

IN PETTO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent "C." is no doubt right in his derivation of the expression "in petto." It is an Italian word and comes through the Latin "pectus," and, in our English use of it, means "in reserve."

May I illustrate this meaning by a quotation from Sir Walter Scott's "Antiquary," chapter eleven. Mr. Oldbuck says: "Well, what shall we set about? My essay on Castramentation—but I have that in petto for our afternoon cordial."

RANDALL VICKERS.

IRISH YESTERDAYS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the notice of "Some Irish Yesterdays" in your last issue, I see that the Reviewer speaks of the appeal, contained in the last chapter, "by Irishman and Irishwoman" on behalf of their people.

May I point out, what is well known here, that the gifted members of this literary partnership are both women.

Dublin.

L.

[We acknowledge also the receipt of a letter from "Eothen," pointing out that "Martin Ross" is the pseudonym of a woman.—ED.]

APPLAUSE AT CONCERTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—An eccentric writer in a musical paper has just given it as his opinion that "great works, whether sacred or secular, should be listened to in silence," and thinks that "interruptions of any kind are disturbing and, it may be added, inartistic," to which another extraordinary gentleman, after reproducing this astounding dictum, cries "Hear, hear!" Is it, then, actually possible that there are human beings in the world who gravely advocate the abolition of applause after the performance of any great musical composition? No one detests indiscriminate handclapping more than I do, and it is chiefly for this reason that I now very rarely attend concerts, as I cannot stand the encore nuisance, an evil which seems to be growing instead of diminishing. But to argue that no applause is necessary after listening to the movements of a great chamber work or symphony, and to wish that they should be received in silence, is, of course, the very height of absurdity, for how else is one to know whether a composition has met with success or not? In the British Parliament legislators express their approval of a statement or speech by crying "Hear, hear!"; in the concert-room the audience, if they admire anything, clap their hands, and so it will ever continue to be. Things would indeed come to a pretty pass if any kind of applause were abolished. It is, in fact, an utter impossibility.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

November 25.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have no hesitation in saying that 'Tis we that receive is right and that the common method of analysing such sentences is wrong. In the English language the pronoun it never is an antecedent. The relative that is plural and agrees with we. Consequently, It is thou that gives is wrong, though it can be plausibly analysed to give sense. Compare He it is that loveth me, in German, Der ist es, der mich liebet. Again, "It was thou that leddest out and broughtest in Israel," the French version of which is noteworthy—Tu étais celui qui menais et qui ramenait Israël. It is plain that such sentences as It is we, etc., do not logically contain the principal assertion, but merely serve to emphasise the subject and the relative clause contains the main predicate. The examples quoted from Burns are not instances of poetical licence, but are the correct idiom of the dialect in which he writes.

May I be allowed to suggest here that spelling reformers may very properly begin by setting right the spelling of geographical names. The exigencies of the French and Italian languages demand that foreign names undergo a change. English makes no such demand, yet we mutilate Greek proper names, for example, in the same manner as Frenchmen and Italians do.

WM. BURD.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—A real interest and importance attaches to the objection which has been raised against a reform of English spelling by Gladys Jones. The ability to speak well is a valuable personal asset, a possession as delightful as rare. And any circumstance which threatens to restrict this ability and lessen our opportunity of listening to effective speech asks from us as listeners at least careful consideration if not reprehension. The burden of the plea against reform is, I take it, this: that we shall not suffer the best characteristics of good speech to be subordinated to considerations of commercial or scientific expediency. With certain reservations I endorse the plea. But I as cordially disagree with the proposition that the adoption of fonetic spelling would tend to render more difficult of acquirement the art of reading well, or to rob the written or printed page of any of its helpfulness to such an attainment.

On the contrary it will be fairly easy to show that fonetic spelling is theoretically calculated to promote efficiency of speech and that experience has established the theory as sound.

A vein of sophistry runs, unconsciously I suppose, thru the arguments adduced, respecting, for instance, the value of silent letters which are held to be suggestive of mentally audible shades of sounds. The "gh" in "light" is a case in point. A little reflection, however, will show that the ghost (or ghost) of this sound is not in residence in the combination "gh"; but like most other shades is prone to "walk" elsewhere—is, in fact, purely traditional. Of the many values possessed by "gh" tradition decides which is correct. Compare "light," "tough," "hiccough," "cough," "lough," "though," "through." "Allusive" signs are apt to prove elusive, illusive or even delusive, rather than indicative.

Repeated references have been made to music. Think what the effect upon the study of music would be if the musical notation were as inconsistent as the representation of English speech!

Let the lines of a staff of written music run parallel for the space of half a bar; then let the lines occupy the position usually assigned to the spaces; interweave them and introduce occasionally an additional line or two; sometimes use the treble clef to represent the bass; call the note in the bottom space of the staff F in this bar, A in the next; once in a while let it be indicative of "inward music" only; let "rests" be "notes," semibreves be crochets, "sharps" be played as "naturals"; and you will have a fair idea of the service "allusive and indicative signs" will perform for music.

Speech is undoubtedly an art. Spelling is the science of its representation. And in the interests of the art it is most highly desirable that the science be as perfect—that is as simple and consistent, not necessarily as elaborate—as possible. Science may be but the second stage of knowledge; but it is not on that account a hindrance to the attainment of the stage of illumination. The stage of illumination is likely to be more comprehensible if supported upon the basis of science.

T. TALBOT LODGE.

November 20.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Roth, H. Ling. The Yorkshire Coiners, 1767-1783, and notes on Old and Prehistoric Halifax. With numerous beautiful original illustrations by H. R. Oddy, Thomas Binns, C. Praetorius, and others, and chapters on The Making of Halifax, etc., by John Lister, and on the Blackheath Prehistoric Circle, by J. Lawson Russell. 10x8. Pp. xxvii, 322. Halifax: King, 21s. net.

Evelyn's Sculptura. Edited by C. F. Bell. 7½x5½. Pp. lxiv, 183. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.

[In "The Tudor and Stuart Library." Contains the hitherto unpublished second part. The volume before us is divided and numbered in two parts, with separate introductions. The text of the first is, in the main, a reprint of the first edition ("Sculptura, or the History and Art of Chalcography and Engraving in Copper, with an ample enumeration of the most renowned Masters, and their Works. To which is annexed A new manner of Engraving, or Messa Tinto, communicated by his Highness Prince Rupert to the Author of this Treatise," printed in 1662), with some corrections and additions "taken from the Margin of the Author's printed copy," which were incorporated in the second edition (1755). The three plates which appeared in the first edition are reproduced here. The MS. of the second part was discovered by Professor Church in the Library of the Royal Society. The advertisement to Book II. suggests that Evelyn meant to offer nothing more than a translation of the Appendix to Bosse's "Traicté des Manières de Graver en Taille Douce sur l'airain," and Professor Church has compared the two. "The six plates [they are reproduced in the volume before us] with their lettering are exactly described by Evelyn," he says, "while the bulk of the French text is reproduced in the translation. But Evelyn . . . rearranged the original material," and added, altered and omitted.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

George Duke of Cambridge. A Memoir of his Private Life, based on the journals and correspondence of His Royal Highness. Edited by Edgar Sheppard, D.D. With illustrations. Vol. I. 1819-1871; Vol. II. 1871-1904. Pp. xx, 667. Longmans, 24s. net. (See p. 542.)

Orage, A. R. Friedrich Nietzsche; the Dionysian Spirit of the Age. 7½x4½. Pp. 83. Foulis, 1s. net.

[In the "Spirit of the Age" series.]

Fyvie, John. Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era. Illustrated. 9½x6. Pp. 445. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.
[Biographical sketches of Lavinia Fenton, Duchess of Bolton; Charlotte Clarke; Catherine Clive; Margaret Woffington; George Ann Bellamy; Frances Abington; Sophia Baddeley; Elizabeth Farren, Countess of Derby; Mary Robinson—"Perdita"; Mary Sumbel—"Becky" Wells; Dora Jordan; and Harriot Mellon, Duchess of St. Albans.]

FICTION.

Whistler, Chas. W. Gerald the Sheriff. Illustrated by Lancelot Speed. 7½x5½. Pp. 294. Warne, 6s. (See p. 548.)

Love's Trilogy: Julie's Diary, Marie, God's Peace. From the Danish of Peter Nansen by Julia le Gallienne. 7½x5. Pp. 377. Heinemann, 6s.

Tighe, Harry. The Caloré Girl. A Spanish Story of a Gipsy with a Faithful Heart. 7½x5. Pp. 277. Routledge, 6s.

The Simple Plan. The Story of a Primitive Girl. 7½x5½. Pp. 267. Sherratt & Hughes, 6s.

Fox, John, Jr. A Knight of the Cumberland. Illustrated by F. C. Yohn. 7½x5. Pp. 158. Constable, 2s. 6d. net.

de Sélinecourt, Hugh. A Boy's Marriage. 7½x5½. Pp. 307. Lane, 6s.

Turner, Reginald. Davray's Affairs. 7½x5½. Pp. 374. Greening, 6s.

Blackwood, Algernon. The Empty House, and other ghost stories. 7½x5. Pp. 316. Nash, 6s.

[Ten short stories.]
Chesson, Nora. Father Felix's Chronicles. Edited by W. H. Chesson. 8x5½. Pp. 312. Unwin, 6s.

West, Nicholson. The Mysterious Millionaire. 7½x5½. Pp. 352. Greening, 6s.

Cornish, Ernest. Basin's Gold. A romance, 7½x5½. Pp. 253. Greening, 3s. 6d.

Sherard, Robert H. After the Fault. 7½x5. Pp. 272. Sisley's, 6s.

HISTORY.

Stirling, Amelia Hutchison. A Sketch of Scottish Industrial and Social History in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries. 8½x6. Pp. 225. Blackie, 6s. net.

[An attempt to trace the social and industrial progress made by Scotland during the two hundred years since the union of her Parliament with that of England.]

Lanciani, Rodolfo. The Golden Days of the Renaissance in Rome, from the Pontificate of Julius II. to that of Paulus III. Profusely illustrated. 9½x6½. Pp. 340. Constable, 21s. net.

[The early chapters describe the city before the election of Pope Paul III. Then follows an account of the change brought about under him, and a study of the four men who, above all others, fostered or perfected the reform movement: Agostino Chigi in the financial development; Raphael and Michelangelo in the artistic; and Vittoria Colonna in the religious and moral. In dealing with their lives the author has endeavoured to confine himself to particulars either unpublished or little known. In developing the subject one principal aim has been kept in view: to illustrate the few monuments of the period left standing in Rome, mostly concealed under modern superstructures.]

Fyfe, W. T. Edinburgh Under Sir Walter Scott. With an introduction by R. S. Rait. 9x6. Pp. xxi, 314. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

[A "picture" of the social life of Edinburgh at the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth.]

Knyvett, Sir Henry. The Defence of the Realm. 1596. With an introduction by Charles Hughes. 7½x5½. Pp. xxxvi, 75. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.

[In "The Tudor and Stuart" Library. This pamphlet, "scribed in haste and finished the 19th of April 1596"—eight years after the Spanish Armada—is now printed for the first time, from a MS. in the Chetham Library, Manchester.]

LITERATURE.

Crawford, Charles. Collectanea. First Series, 7½x5½. Pp. 136. Stratford-on-Avon: at the Shakespeare Head Press, 3s. 6d. net.

[Papers on: "Richard Barnfield, Marlowe and Shakespeare"; "Ben Jonson's Method of Composing Verse"; "John Webster and Sir Philip Sidney"; "Edmund Spenser, 'Selimus', and 'Locrine'"; and "The Authorship of 'Arden of Feversham'." All save the last, which was published in the Jahrbuch der Deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft, 1903, have appeared in Notes and Queries.]

Brunot, Ferdinand. Histoire de la Langue Française des Origines à 1900. Tome II.—La Seizième Siècle. 10x6½. Pp. 504. Paris: Armand Colin, 15fr.

Carroll, the Rev. John S. Prisoners of Hope. An exposition of Dante's Purgatorio. 9½x6½. Pp. xxvii, 511. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.

[Follows the general plan and method of the author's previous book on the Inferno, "Exiles of Eternity." It is an exposition, canto by canto, "with the special purpose of bringing out the ethical significance of what many Dante students regard as the most interesting, because the most human, part of the Commedia."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mackenzie, W. Leslie. The Health of the School Child. 7½x5½. Pp. 120. Methuen, 2s. 6d.

[Papers on The Hygiene of School Life, Normal Growth in School Ages, Medical Examination and the Supervision of Schools and School Children, The School Doctor in Germany; and notes on the Revaccination of School Children in Germany and on the Plan of a German Elementary School.]

Moncrieff, A. R. Hope. The World of To-day. Vol. vi. 10½x7½. Pp. 380. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

[A survey of the lands and peoples of the globe as seen in travel and commerce.]

McSpadden, J. Walker. Stories from Dickens. 7½x5½. Pp. 245. Harrap, 2s. 6d. net.

The World's Work and Play. An Illustrated Magazine of National Efficiency and Social Progress. Edited by Henry Norman. Vol. viii.—June to November 1906. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 640. Heinemann, 7s. 6d.

Robinson, Alonso Clark. The Poet's Parables. 7 x 4½. Pp. 48. Appleton, 1s. net.

Glasgow Corporation Public Libraries: Index Catalogue of the Dennistoun District Library; and Index Catalogue of the Maryhill District Library. Each 7½ x 5. Pp. 434 and 418. Glasgow: Printed for the Corporation Committee on Libraries at the University Press by Robert MacLehose, n.p.

Reich, Emil. Success in Life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 324. Nash, 5s. net.

MUSIC.

Proceedings of the Musical Association. Thirty-third session, 1905-1906. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 184. Novello, 21s. net.

PHILOSOPHY.

Waite, Arthur Edward. Studies in Mysticism and Certain Aspects of the Secret Tradition. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 348. Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

Pope, Jessie. Paper Pellets. 7 x 4½. Pp. 88. Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net. [Humorous pieces, reprinted from Punch, Vanity Fair, and other periodicals.]

POLITICS.

Worsfold, W. Basil. Lord Milner's Work in South Africa, from its Commencement in 1897 to the Peace of Vereeniging in 1902. With portraits and map. 9 x 5½. Pp. 620. Murray, 15s. net. [Contains hitherto unpublished information.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The Poetical Works of John Keats. Edited, with an introduction and textual notes, by H. Buxton Forman. 9 x 5½. Pp. lxi, 491. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.

[This edition varies from those which Mr. Buxton has prepared before, in that it is neither an exhaustive variorum edition nor a mere unannotated text, but a text illustrated by readings and cancelled passages selected from the great mass of manuscript and printed material. Sixteen lines of "The Eve of Saint Mark," found by the Editor in a Keats scrap-book lent to him by Mr. Frank Sabin, are given in the introduction; and a facsimile of each of the two pages of the manuscript illustrates the poem. These sixteen lines have not been printed in any other edition. There are four portraits.]

Sea Songs and Ballads. Selected by Christopher Stone. With an introduction by Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge. 7 x 4½. Pp. 213. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d. net.

The Works of Shakespeare. Love's Labour's Lost. Edited by H. C. Hart. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 184. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net. [In "The Arden Shakespeare."]

Measure for Measure and King Henry IV., part ii. Edited by E. K. Chambers. Each 6½ x 3½. Pp. 125 and 141. Blackie, leather 1s. 6d. net, cloth 1s. net. [In "The Red-Letter Shakespeare."]

Kirkup, Thomas. A History of Socialism. 17½ x 5½. Pp. 406. Black, 7s. 6d. net. [Third edition, revised and enlarged.]

The Complete Poetical Works of Oliver Goldsmith. Edited, with introduction and notes, by Austin Dobson. Illustrated. 8 x 5½. Pp. xxxvi, 278. The Complete Poetical Works of Thomas Hood. Edited, with notes by Walter Jerrold. 8 x 5½. Pp. xv, 773. Froude, 3s. 6d. net.

[In "The Oxford Poets" series. Chronology of Goldsmith's Life and Poems, and Chronological Table of the Life of Hood. In the appendices a large number of notes are given and there is an index of first lines in the "Poetical Works of Hood." Both volumes are also issued in saten cloth, India paper at 5s. each, and in various leather bindings at 6s. and upwards.]

Dampier's Voyages. Consisting of a New Voyage Round the World, a Supplement to the Voyage Round the World, Two Voyages to Campeachy, a Discourse of Winds, a Voyage to New Holland, and a Vindication, in answer to the Chimerical Relation of William Funnell. By Captain William Dampier. Edited by John Masefield. In two volumes—vol. i. 9 x 6. Pp. 612. E. Grant Richards, 25s. net.

[The text used for the "New Voyage round the World," the "Voyage to Tonquin," the "Description of Campeachy," and the "Discourse of Winds" is that of the sixth edition. The text used for the "Voyage to New Holland" is that of the edition of 1729, which has been collated with the earlier editions.]

Birrell, Augustine. In the Name of the Bodleian, and other Essays. Second edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 214. Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.

Dolling, Robert R. Ten Years in a Portsmouth Slum. With 18 full-page illustrations. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 272. Masters, 3s. 6d. [Seventh edition.]

Pepys's Memoires of the Royal Navy 1679-1688. Edited, with an introduction by J. R. Tanner. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xvii, 144. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.

[In "The Tudor and Stuart Library," Published by Pepys in June 1690, as a defence of the naval administration of himself and his "unhappy master" during the ten years ending 1688. It was intended as a forerunner of his projected work "Navalia," which was never completed.]

Howell's Devises. 1581. With an introduction by Walter Raleigh. 7½ x 6½. Pp. xviii, 104. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.

[In "The Tudor and Stuart Library." An exact reprint of the Bodleian copy of "His Devises for his owne exercise, and his Friends pleasure." About a dozen obvious and trivial misprints have been corrected. Others, to avoid the intrusion of anything like conjectural emendation, have been left standing.]

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell: Cousin Phillis, and other tales. With illustrations. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 727. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net. [Vol. vii. of the "Knutsford Edition," edited by Dr. A. W. Ward. Contains: "Cousin Phillis," "Loie the Witch"; "The Crooked Branch";

"Curious if True"; "Right at Last"; "The Grey Woman"; "Six Weeks at Heppenheim"; "A Dark Night's Work"; "The Shab's English Gardener"; "French Life"; "Crowley Castle"; and fragments of two Ghost Stories found without date or other clue to the period of their production, among Mrs. Gaskell's papers and now printed for the first time.]

Aeschylus: the Seven Plays in English Verse. Translated by Lewis Campbell, Pp. 278. Morley's Rise of the Dutch Republic. With an introduction by Clement Shorter. In three volumes. Pp. 560, 612, 591. The Poems of Matthew Arnold, 1849-1864. With an introduction by A. T. Quiller-Couch. Pp. 353. Essays and Sketches by Leigh Hunt. Chosen and edited with an introduction, by R. Brimley Johnson. Pp. 419. Each 6½ x 4. Froude, 1s. net. per vol.

[In "The World's Classics."]

Mayne Reid's The Scalp Hunters. Illustrated. 6½ x 4. Pp. 462. Defoe's Captain Singleton. Illustrated. 6½ x 4. Pp. 303. Froude, 1s. net each.

[In "The Boy's Classics."]

THEOLOGY.

Tyrrell, George. A Much Abused Letter. 8 x 5½. Pp. 104. Longmans, 2s. 6d. net.

[This letter was written by Father Tyrrell to a Professor of Anthropology in a Continental University who found it difficult, if not impossible, to square his science with his faith as a Catholic. Extracts more or less inaccurate appeared in an Italian paper (without the writer's knowledge or consent), the result being that he has been dismissed from the Order of Jesuits. Father Tyrrell, in an Introduction to the letter, gives an account of the whole matter, and vindicates the position which he took up in dealing with the doubts and fears of his correspondent.]

Roberts, Richard. The Meaning of Christ. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 134. Allenson, 2s. 6d.

["Studies in the place of Jesus Christ in human thought and action"—in Dante, Shelley, Browning, Tennyson, Ruskin, Savonarola, Mazzini.]

Iverach, James. The Other Side of Greatness, and other sermons. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 259. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Cecil, the Rev. Lord William Gascoyne. Science and Religion. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 105. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net.

[Addresses delivered in substance at St. Lawrence Jewry, during Lent.]

Schmid, Rudolf. The Scientific Creed of a Theologian. Translated from the Second German Edition by J. W. Stoughton. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 251. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Granger, M. E. Advent Readings. With an introduction by W. J. Knox Little. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 221. Sherratt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net.

["Arranged for daily study and meditation. With some thoughts for the festival of Christmas, and the Saints' days within the octave."]

The Expositor. Edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll. Seventh series. Vol. i. 9 x 6. Pp. 572. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net.

Miller, J. R. Morning Thoughts for Every Day in the Year. 4½ x 3. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. 6d. net.

Prayers and Meditations composed by Samuel Johnson, LL.D. 6 x 4½. Pp. 157. Allenson, 2s. 6d. net.

[New and revised edition, with additional matter.]

Oman, John. The Problem of Faith and Freedom in the Last Two Centuries. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 443.

[Lectures delivered in the Glasgow College of the United Free Church in fulfilment of the conditions of the Kerr Lectureship.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Hartley, L. Conrad. Wind-Seekers in the Hebridean Seas. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 285. Manchester: Cornish, 6s. net.

["Being the story of a yachting holiday, with many a side-glance at man and his attitudes."]

Becke, Louis. Sketches from Normandy. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 250. Werner Laurie, 6s.

THE BOOKSHELF

IN The Polish Jew, by Beatrice C. Baskerville (Chapman and Hall), we have a book that contains many anecdotes of considerable interest and not a few valuable studies in psychology. As a sociological essay, however, the book is not altogether trustworthy. Instead of viewing the problem she has set before herself as a whole, the author has dealt with a number of individual cases, those which happened to come under her personal notice but which there is no reason to believe are to any extent representative. Judging by her book, we must conclude that, despite the eight years she has spent in Poland, she has never come into real contact with the people of whom she writes. She has never had more than an external view of them, and in her presence, coming, as she did, apparently surrounded by all the anti-Semite prejudices of the Polish petty nobility, the Jews were never at their ease, never in a natural attitude. Whenever Miss Baskerville and her Polish friends appeared upon the scene the Jews felt themselves restrained, for they well recognised that there was no sympathy between them and their visitors. The author has made the mistake of imagining that this restrained attitude was natural, and has judged them accordingly. As an instance of the insufficiency of the volume, we may remark the entire absence of all reference to the new nationalist movement, known as the Ito, founded by Mr. Zangwill. This movement is undoubtedly one of the most living of the forces influencing Polish Jewry to-day, and at present far overshadows Zionism. In Miss Baskerville's pages, however, Zionism is everything, while Itoism does not appear. On the other hand, the importance of the Bund, the Polish Jewish Revolutionary Organisation, is grossly exaggerated. In fact, the whole picture that is given of the Jewry of Poland is distorted and ill-proportioned.

From Cloth, 2s., to Real Pigskin, 10s. 6d.
Size 8 × 5½ inches, Handsomely Bound.

The Pig Book

Now, the finest of amusements,
For little and for big
Is to get a brand new Pig
Book,
And draw a Blindfold Pig.

For it's Pig Book in the Drawing-room,
It's Pig Book in the train,
It's Pig Book in the nursery, and
And Pig Book on the brain!

THE PIG BOOK PARTY.

Reproduced from Thomas Maybank's Full-page Picture
in "THE GENTLEWOMAN."

POURQUOI?

Every pig has its day (even as a dog), and as there are many dog books, why not a Pig Book? We hasten to explain that a Pig Book is a book having reference to Pigs. We give it this title because it sounds more polite than "Pigs I have met." As most people draw just as well with their eyes closed as open, the inflexible rule of the Pig Book is that the artist shall close his or her eyes, draw a pig on one of the pages, and lift the pencil before putting in (or out, as the case may be) the eye of the Pig. The artist then signs in order to fix the responsibility.

Some people can draw a pig and most people think they can.

The line at the head of the title-page is for the use of the owner, so that the page may read, "Mrs. Porkington's Pig Book," or "Chanticleer Hall Pig Book," so to speak, as the case may be.

A PIGGE.

EACH PAGE CONTAINS HUMOROUS SKETCHES OF
PIGS, AND IS EMBELLISHED WITH APPROPRIATE LITERARY QUOTATIONS FROM HOMER TO "GORDON GRAHAM."

Of all Booksellers, Stationers, and Bookstalls.

London: DEAN AND SON, Limited,
160a, Fleet Street, E.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

IT ONLY COSTS SIXPENCE!

You are probably asking, "What books shall I choose for Christmas presents?" The December BOOK MONTHLY gives every part of information about the Christmas Books. Order a copy from your bookseller, or from the publishers,

Simpkin Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1805

DECEMBER 8, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

LECTURESHIP IN ANCIENT HISTORY.

THE University Court of the University of Edinburgh will, on Monday, January 14, 1907, or some subsequent day, proceed to the appointment of a University Lecturer on Ancient History. Tenure three years, which may be renewed. Salary £200 per annum.

The duties of the Lecturer would mainly consist of the delivery, in each year, of two Honours half-courses, of 25 Lectures each, in Greek and in Roman History respectively, one of these half-courses to be given during part of the Winter Session, and the other in the Summer Session.

Each applicant should lodge with the undersigned, not later than Friday, January 4, 1907, twenty copies of his application, and twenty copies of any testimonials he may desire to present. One copy of the application should be signed.

Further particulars on application.

M. C. TAYLOR,

Secretary Univ. Court.

University of Edinburgh.

December 4, 1906.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

COLLEGE HALL, BYNG PLACE,
GORDON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

RESIDENCE for Women-Students of University College and of the London School of Medicine for Women.

The Slade School Lent Term begins January 7. Faculties of Arts and Science Lent Term begins January 15.

The London School of Medicine (Royal Free Hospital) Lent Term begins January 3.

Application should be made to the Principal not later than January 1, 1907.

Books for Sale.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue for DECEMBER Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

CHAUCEER.—A Commentary on the Prolog and Six Tales. Rich in new matter. Subscription price, $2.00. Circular on application.—Address, H. B. HINCKLEY, 54 Prospect Street, Northampton, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

DEFOE'S Works, 20 vols, 1840-1, or vol 4 Delany (Mrs.) Autobiography, both series. 6 vols, 1861-2 Lelices (Les) de la Grande Bretagne, 8 vols 8vo, 1727 Denton's Brief Description of New York, 4to, 1670 Denzil Place, by Violet Fane, 1875 Derby Day (The) 8 coloured plates, Forbes Dr. Freischutz Travestie, 1824 Derome's Relieure de Luxe, Japan paper, 8vo, 1888 Deuchar's Etchings, 3 vols, 4to, 1803 Diary of a late Physician, 3 vols, 1832-8 Dibdin (T. F.), Typographical Antiquities, 4 vols, 8vo, 1810, or his Amer., 4 vols Dibdin (T. F.), Any of his Bibliographical Tours Dickens (Charles), Sketches by Boz 2 vols, first edition, 1836, or either vol Sketches by Boz, second series, 1837 Pickwick Papers, 1836-7, in monthly parts or cloth, or any odd parts Pickwick Papers, part 1, with the words on front wrapper "with four illustrations by Seymour" Pickwick Papers, part 2, with the words "with illustrations by Seymour" on front cover Pickwick Papers, part 3, with the words "with illustrations by R. W. Buss" on front cover Nicholas Nickleby, in monthly parts or cloth, 1839 Oliver Twist, 3 vols, 1838 Sketches by Boz, in monthly parts or cloth, 1839, or any odd parts The Village Coquettes, a Comic Opera, 1836

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

ESSEX HOUSE PRESS BOOKS.—Shakespeare's Poems, hand printed, bound full vellum, published at 42s. net, for 17s. 6d. net. Sir Christopher Wren's Life and Works, hand printed, 20 engravings, folio, published at 73s. 6d. net, for 22s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

YOUNG LADY (22), desires post as Private Secretary or Companion-Secretary after Christmas. Shorthand, Typewriting, etc.—Address, "SECRETARY, c/o ACADEMY, Tavistock Street, London.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

SEELEY & CO.'S XMAS LIST.

*A Dainty Illustrated Catalogue
Post Free on application.*

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

By Canon BENHAM. Author of "Mediæval London," etc. With Four Plates in Colour and other Illustrations. Super-royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; cloth, 7s. net.

"A superbly illustrated volume."—OUTLOOK.

A NEW ANTHOLOGY BY "Q." SECOND EDITION.

THE PILGRIMS' WAY. A Little Scrip of Good

Council for Travellers. Chosen by A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. Thin Paper, leather, 5s. net.

"The very flower of a cultivated man's reading."—COUNTRY LIFE.

THE SACRED SEASONS. Readings for the

Sundays and Holy Days of the Christian Year. By the Right Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, D.D., Bishop of Durham. With initials and borders in red, and Twelve Illuminated Pages after MSS. in the British Museum. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"This beautiful volume . . . sumptuously got up."—LAYMAN.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON

By SIDNEY LEE. New and Revised Edition. With Coloured Frontispiece and 50 other Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Everything that a place book ought to be."—GLOBE.

ELECTRICITY OF TO-DAY: Its Work and

Mysteries described in Non-Technical Language. By C. R. GIBSON, Author of "The Romance of Modern Electricity." With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"One of the best examples of popular scientific exposition that we remember seeing. The author has succeeded to admiration."—TRIBUNE.

GREAT BRITAIN IN MODERN AFRICA

By EDGAR SANDERSON. With Four Portraits and Map. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

"Mr. Sanderson has done a real service by producing this eminently useful volume."—GLASGOW HERALD.

SECOND EDITION

THINGS SEEN IN JAPAN

By CLIVE HOLLAND. With 50 Illustrations. 32mo, cloth, 2s. net; lambskin, 3s. net; buffed leather yapp, in box, 5s. net.

"A really admirable little volume."—DAILY MAIL.

THE CHILDREN'S ODYSSEY

By Prof. A. J. CHURCH. With 12 Coloured Illustrations after Flaxman. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"A charming book."—SPECTATOR.

The Library of Romance—New Volumes

With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, each 5s.

"This series has now won a considerable and well-deserved reputation."—GUARDIAN.

THE ROMANCE OF PLANT LIFE

By Professor G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT, M.A., B.Sc.

THE ROMANCE OF EARLY EXPLORATION

By ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS, B.A., F.R.G.S.

THE ROMANCE OF ANIMAL ARTS AND CRAFTS. By H. COUPIN, D.Sc., and JOHN LEE, B.A.

THE ROMANCE OF MISSIONARY HEROISM

By the Rev. J. C. LAMBERT, D.D.

THE ROMANCE OF POLAR EXPLORATION

By G. FIRTH SCOTT.

The Library of Adventure.

With 16 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, each 5s.

"Among the more interesting of gift books—the kind of material that suits the manly boy."—ATHENÆUM.

ADVENTURES IN THE GREAT DESERTS

By H. G. HYRST.

ADVENTURES ON THE GREAT RIVERS

By R. STEAD, B.A., F.R.H.S.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., LTD., 38 GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

THE MEDICI SERIES

OF

COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS

These Plates are the Product of a new method which ensures absolute fidelity in the rendering of form, and a presentation of the colour of the originals such as has hitherto seemed impossible of realisation. The BURLINGTON MAGAZINE for October says: "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."

I. BERNARDINO LUINI: 1475 (?)–1533.

HEAD OF THE VIRGIN MARY, after the Fresco now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.)
10s. 6d. net

II. LEONARDO DA VINCI: 1452–1519

HEAD OF THE CHRIST, after the unfinished Cartoon now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.)
10s. 6d. net

III. ALESSANDRO FILIPEPI, called BOTTICELLI 1447–1510

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD, Painting in tempera on wooden panel now in the Museo Poldi-Pezzoli at Milan.

(Size of Plate, 24½ by 17½ inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 9½ inches.)
10s. 6d. net

IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI:

THE LAST SUPPER, from the fresco in S. Maria della Grazie, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 41½ by 28 inches; Colour Surface, 32 by 17½ inches.)
21s. net

The Publishers will send a full Prospectus and Note upon the Medici Prints post-free to all applicants. They have arranged to facilitate personal inspection of the Prints by intending purchasers at any address within the United Kingdom. Applications through your Bookseller or Printseller are invited.

Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari.

Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY.

*The Binding and Titles are Copies of
XV. and XIII. Century Originals.*

ORDINARY EDITION, red buckram, full gilt, gilt tops, about 8½ by 5½ inches, with 24 Half-tone Plates and 8 Four-Colour Plates
7s. 6d. net.

SPECIAL EDITION, about 9½ by 6½ inches, bound full parchment, with 4 additional Four-Colour Plates and a Special Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece after Botticelli
15s. net.
Bound in vellum, 20s. net.

The Poetical Works of William Blake.

Edited and Annotated by EDWIN J. ELLIS.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, half leather, 15s. net; cloth, 12s. net.
Photogravure Frontispiece to each volume

William Blake: A Critical Study.

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

A New Edition, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s. net
SECOND IMPRESSION.

The Tea-Planter. By Mrs. PENNY. 6s.

"Mrs. Penny has, in our opinion, produced the most finished and artistic work that has yet appeared over her name."—GUARDIAN.

Burnt Spices. By L. S. GIBSON. 6s.

"A work of unmistakable ability and originality."—WORLD.

The Man Apart. By RALPH STRAUS. 6s.

"The Man Apart" is a piece of strong work, on which Mr. Straus is to be congratulated."—SCOTSMAN.

To Defeat the Ends of Justice.

By HERBERT COMPTON. 6s.

"A story teeming with incident and colour. . . . While the attractive qualities of the principal characters intensify the interest. . . . A stirring and delightful book."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

CHATTO & WINDUS,
111 St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

CHAMBERS'S

"If Mrs. Meade may be regarded as the girls' Mummy, she has a close second in Miss May Baldwin."
—MANCHESTER CITY NEWS.

Books for Boys and Girls

BY
L. T. MEADE
MAY BALDWIN
RAYMOND JACBERNS
FRED WHISHAW
Mrs. MOLESWORTH
G. MANVILLE FENN
EVERETT McNEIL
JOHN FINNEMORE
Handsomely Bound. Beautifully Illustrated.

L. T. Meade's New Books for Girls

THE HILL-TOP GIRL. 6/-

Gilt Edges.

"A most delightful creation."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

TURQUOISE AND RUBY. 5/-

"All girls should hasten to secure 'Turquoise and Ruby.'"

NEWCASTLE CHRONICLE.

SUE. The Story of a Little Heroine and Her Friends. 3/6

"Sure to meet with the unqualified approval of young girls."

GLASGOW HERALD.

Mrs. Molesworth's New Books.

THE BOLTED DOOR, and Other Stories. 3/6

"No writer of the day can draw children and charm them with finer art than this gifted author."—SCOTSMAN.

May Baldwin's New Books for Girls

PEG'S ADVENTURES IN PARIS. A School Tale. 5/-

"Miss May Baldwin has given us in Peg a charming specimen of English girlhood."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

DORA: A High School Girl. 3/6

"One of the most charming children imaginable."

WESTERN DAILY MERCURY.

5s.

'TENTION! By G. MANVILLE FENN.

A Story of Boy-life during the Peninsular War.

"A story that thousands of boys will revel in."—TATLER.

THE LOST TREASURE CAVE. By EVERETT McNEIL.

"All the elements of a good boys' book are here in abundance."—IRISH TIMES.

3s. 6d.

FORAY AND FIGHT. By JOHN FINNEMORE.

The Remarkable Adventures of an Englishman and an American in Macedonia.

"We do not think that Mr. Finnemore has written a more successful boys' book."

DAILY NEWS.

THE BOYS OF BRIERLEY GRANGE. By FRED WHISHAW.

"A capital story for boys, with exceptionally good illustrations by Harold Copping."

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE RECORD TERM. By RAYMOND JACBERNS.

"The most delightful book of the kind of the season."—MORNING LEADER.

2s. 6d.

THE EMPIRE'S CHILDREN. By JOHN FINNEMORE.

"A volume of this sort deserves to be widely known."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

NEW PICTURE BOOKS.

3s. 6d. net.

THE KNIGHT ERRANT OF THE NURSERY.

By WM. PARKINSON.

"Asplendid picture book. The story is delightfully told by a keen and sympathetic observer. The scenes are remarkable for their naturalness and fidelity to the engaging ways of childhood. The colouring is beautiful."—FREEMAN'S JOURNAL.

BUSTER BROWN'S PRANKS. By R. F. OUTCAULT.

"This year our young friend 'Buster' excels the performance of all former years, and is most intensely funny."—NORTHERN WHIG.

FOXY GRANDPA'S SURPRISES.

"Excruciatingly funny. . . . Bunny's ingenuity is amazing."

LIVERPOOL COURIER.

THE HOUSE THAT GLUE BUILT.

"Quite a novelty. . . . There are many hours of delightful amusement in exercising the ingenuity of the youthful mind in these pictures."—STANDARD.

THE UP-SIDE-DOWNS. By G. VERBEEK.

"An extraordinarily ingenious book."—SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.

3s. 6d.

THE BROWNS. A Book of Bears.

Verses by B. PARKER.

Pictures by N. PARKER.

"There will be howls of delight over 'The Browns.'"—YORKSHIRE POST.

"There will be joy in the nursery to which this book finds an entrance."

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

"One of the cleverest and most amusing of the Christmas books. . . . It is full of fascinating drawings and fun."—BRITISH WEEKLY.

2s. 6d. net.

TIGER: His Story. By R. F. OUTCAULT.

"Will be indeed eagerly received by all who are friends of Buster Brown."

THE WORLD.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LTD., 47 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON;
339 HIGH STREET, EDINBURGH.

FROM
THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST.

The De La More Booklets.

Size, pott 8vo, 3½ in. by 6 in.

Price 6d. net each in art wrappers: three in a box for 1s. 6d. net, or six in a box for 3s. net. Also bound in cloth gilt, 1s. net each, in moreen gilt and gilt edges, 1s. 6d. net, or in full lambskin, extra gilt and gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net.

The "De La More" Booklets have won their way into general favour as substitutes for the useless and ephemeral Christmas and birthday card. They are beautifully printed at the De La More Press on very fine paper specially made for them, and are bound very carefully and in an artistic manner. The six new ones selected for this winter are especial favourites, and are already much in demand.

16. Abraham and Isaac: an Old-English Miracle Play.

17. FitzGerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

18. Smart's Song to David.

19. The Book of Ruth.

20. De Quincey's Suspiria.

21. Tom Pinch's Ride to London. By CHARLES DICKENS.

BURMA : a Handbook of Practical, Commercial and Political Information.

By Sir GEORGE SCOTT, K.C.I.E., Author of "The Burman: his Life and Notions." Special Cover Design, with many Illustrations and Map, Appendices on the Shan States, and other subjects. Crown 8vo, cloth 10s. 6d. net.

UNCLE REMUS.

By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS. With 9 Coloured and 50 other Illustrations by J. A. SHEPHERD. Cover Design. Pott 4to, cloth gilt, 6s.

WALLY WANDEROON, and his Story-

Telling Machine.

By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, Author of "Uncle Remus," etc. Illustrated by KARL MOSELEY. New and Cheaper Edition. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

PALEFACE AND REDSKIN, and other

Stories for Boys and Girls.

By F. ANSTEY. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE. New and Cheaper Edition. Pott 4to, cloth, 3s. 6d.

A BOOK of VERSES for CHILDREN

Compiled by ARTHUR VERRALL LUCAS. With Cover, Title-Page, and End-Papers designed by F. D. BEDFORD. New Edition. 6s.

A PACK OF QUEER CARDS.

By MARION FELL. Printed in Red and Black. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE STUDY OF PLANT LIFE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc. London. Designed Cover. Illustrated with Plates and numerous Diagrams. Royal 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

ETIQUETTE FOR EVERY DAY.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY ("Madge" of TRUTH). Designed Cover. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

THE CHILDREN'S CALENDAR.

By LINA OSWALD. With Colour Illustrations by AMELIA BAUERLE. Oblong 8vo, 1s.

THE ENGAGEMENT CALENDAR.

One of the advantages of this Calendar is that the cards are few, and the whole year's engagements can be seen practically at a glance. At the same time the cards are artistically designed, and form a welcome ornament to the boudoir or library. 1s. net.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.
32 George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS

Messrs. Bell's new Miniature Catalogue will be sent post free on application

THE BARSETSHIRE NOVELS OF ANTHONY TROLLOPE

New and Complete Edition, with an Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON

In 8 vols, small crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net each

NOW READY. COMPLETING THE SERIES

THE LAST CHRONICLE OF BARSET. Two vols.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED

THE WARDEN. With Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON.

BARCHESTER TOWERS

DOCTOR THORNE.

FRAMLEY PARSONAGE.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. Two vols.

See also "The York Library."

OF INTEREST TO ALL LOVERS OF PRECIOUS STONES

THE GEM-CUTTER'S CRAFT. By LEOPOLD CLAREMONT, Author of "A Tabular Arrangement of the Distinguishing Characteristics and Localities of Precious Stones" in the Mining Journal. Small 4to, with over 100 Illustrations. 15s. net.

*. Although there are many books on the subject of precious stones, this is the first to be written by a practical gem-cutter. In it every kind of gem is described, and the difficulties of discriminating between precious stones are discussed and removed. The work deals with the practical, scientific, romantic, artistic, and commercial aspects of the subject, and the illustrations are numerous and interesting.

NEW EDITION OF LANE'S "ARABIAN NIGHTS"

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS. Translated by E. W. LANE. Edited with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices by STANLEY LANE-POOLE, M.A., Litt.D. In four vols. 3s. 6d. each. (Bohn's Standard Library.)

VOLS. I. AND II. NOW READY. VOLS. III. AND IV. DEC. 12.

THE POEMS OF COVENTRY PATMORE. New and Complete Edition. In one vol., crown 8vo, with an Introduction by BASIL CHAMPNEYS, with Portrait. 6s. net.

"In recent reprints we know of nothing more acceptable than Messrs. Bell's new edition of Coventry Patmore . . . which no one can fail to welcome who care for this gentle amorist."—Pall Mall Gazette.

UNIFORM WITH THIS VOLUME

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ADELAIDE A NNE PROCTER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY. 6s. net.

INTERLUDES IN VERSE AND PROSE. By Sir G. O. TREVELYAN, Bart. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE POCKET HORACE. The Latin Text, with CONINGTON'S Translation on opposite pages. Limp cloth, 4s. net; stamped sheepskin, 5s. net.

*. Also in Two Parts, limp cloth—viz., "Odes and Carmen Saeculare," 2s. 6d. net; "Satires, Epistles and Art of Poetry," 2s. net.

"A delightful pocket companion for those who do not disdain good English verse alongside the immortal Latin."—Evening Standard.

The York Library

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net. New volumes.

BURTON'S PILGRIMAGE TO AL-MADINAH AND MECCAH. Edited by LADY BURTON. With an Introduction by STANLEY LANE-POOLE. Two vols.

CLASSIC TALES: Johnson's "Rasselas," Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," Walpole's "Castle of Otranto." With an Introduction by C. S. FEARENSIDE, M.A.

TROLLOPE'S BARSETSHIRE NOVELS. THE WARDEN, with Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON, one vol. BARCHESTER TOWERS, one vol. DR. THORNE, one vol. FRAMLEY PARSONAGE, one vol. THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON, two vols. THE LAST CHRONICLE OF BARSET, Two vols.

FULL PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S LIST

"The most important and attractive biography of the year."

THE LIFE & LETTERS OF LESLIE STEPHEN

By FREDERIC W. MAITLAND

With 5 Photogravure Portraits, royal 8vo, 18s. net

WESTMINSTER ABBEY

And the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY

Photogravure and 125 Illustrations, royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net

The earlier chapters serve as a guide to the Abbey considered as a work of art, and other chapters are historical. The illustrations have been prepared with much care.

LIFE AND EVOLUTION

By F. W. HEADLEY

100 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 8s. net

THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LEONARDO DA VINCI

By EDWARD McCURDY

13 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 8s. net

CORREGGIO

By T. STURGE MOORE

55 Illustrations, pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net

WATTEAU

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR

50 Illustrations, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net

NEWEST FICTION NOW IN DEMAND

OLD FIREPROOF

By OWEN RHOSCOMYL

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE HEART THAT KNOWS

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS

Author of "The Kindred of the Wild," etc. 6s.

HIS PEOPLE

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM

6s.

DON-A-DREAMS

By HARVEY O'HIGGINS

6s.

THE PLACID PUG

And Other Rhymes

By THE BELGIAN HARE (Lord Alfred Douglas)

Author of "Tales with a Twist"

Illustrated by P. P. Oblong crown 4to (10 by 8), 3s. 6d.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 Henrietta St., Covent Garden

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	565	The Manger	581
Literature :		A Dancing Song	582
John Evelyn	567	The Deferred Hope	583
Adonis—Attis—Osiris	569	Other People's Children	583
The King of Court Poets	569	Some Children's Books	584
A French Critic on Homer	570	A Literary Canserie :
The Army	571	The Story of a Poem	587
Americans in Procession	572	The Parent: An Educational
Plucking the Goose	573	Problem	588
For Hearth and Home	573	Fiction	589
Sayings of Children—III	579	Music :
A Child's Philosophy	581	Piano and Orchestra	591
Star and Song	581	Correspondence	592
Books Received	593

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

At this season of the year, when kindly uncles and aunts are forcibly reminded of the rapid increase in the number of their present-expecting nephews and nieces, any one who will come forward (as Messrs. Waring's have done in the matter of presents for adults) with a guide to a right and easy choice, is a benefactor. Mrs. Clement Parsons and the Parents' National Educational Union between them have issued such a guide to children's books, old and new. It is divided into sections according to age, sex, subject, and so forth. Books to be read aloud to children are distinguished from books that children read to themselves, and the lists are clear, comprehensive and sensible. Incidentally we may note that Mrs. Clement Parsons has omitted nearly all "snippet" books. The whole book or none of it is her ideal; "a dislike of snippets is my idiosyncrasy [sic] à moi," as she remarks in her Introduction in that characteristic style which adorned her recently published book on Garrick and his circle.

For there is an Introduction, and it is full of good sense and observation. Someone seems to have remarked that they considered Jane Austen too grown-up for a girl of fourteen. In a sense, of course, she is, just as Plato is too grown-up for a schoolboy of thirteen; but the schoolboy can enjoy what he can grasp of the Plato, and the girl will enjoy what she can grasp of the Jane Austen. And it is, in our opinion, much better for a child to read Jane Austen or some other book above his intelligence and understand a little, than to read a book below his intelligence and understand it all. At any rate, here is Mrs. Parsons's rejoinder. "I should like to show [the objectors] a record in the handwriting of a child of twelve, which I happen to possess"—we imagine it, under correction, to be the record, not the child, which Mrs. Parsons happens to possess—"of forty-eight books devoured within three months." Of the forty-eight, eight are "Ginx's Baby," "Thomson's Seasons," Jevons's "Political Economy," "Ecce Homo," "Daniel Deronda," "The Wooing O't," "The Art of Furnishing," and "Athalie." This beats Bridget Elia herself.

Time was, before he became a popular playwright, when "G. B. S." used to bestow his attention weekly upon the dramatists in the Saturday Review, and among them none came in for harder knocks than Shakespeare. Upon the conventionality and middle-class ideals of the Bard "G. B. S." loved to dwell, with that engaging insolence of which he is a master. Those who could not understand his criticism used to console themselves with the quotation from Lamb which will dog Mr. Shaw all his life—that it was "only his fun." But there is no possibility of questioning the serious intention of the writer who attacks Shakespeare in the current Fortnightly and intends, it appears, to return to the attack in future numbers.

"For any man of our time," he writes, "if he were not under the hypnotic suggestion that this drama [King Lear] is the height of perfection, it would be enough to read it to its end (were he to have sufficient patience for this) in order to be convinced that, far from being the height of perfection, it is a very bad, carelessly composed production, which, if it could have been of interest to a certain public at a certain time, cannot evoke among us anything but aversion and weariness." Only "suggestion," the indictment proceeds, can make us receive any other impression "from all the other extolled dramas of Shakespeare, not to mention the senseless dramatised tales, Pericles, Twelfth Night, The Tempest, Cymbeline, Troilus and Cressida." There has been nothing like this since Voltaire's "drunken savage." Statements such as these naturally fill one with amazement, but amazement sinks to rest when those who have followed Count Tolstoy's development or decadence discover that the name at the foot of the article is his.

What the attack comes to is a complaint of the lack of realism in Shakespeare's tragedy of King Lear. Tolstoy cannot understand it. He finds it all unnatural: he thinks the people do not behave as they would in 800 B.C., and the relations of the people do not flow from their characters, nor from the natural course of events. And yet a correspondent, not long ago, was indignant with one of our reviewers who ventured to question Tolstoy's dramatic sense. The man who would complain of Botticelli for not making his Madonna a Hebrew maiden in the accurate costume and surroundings (in the manner of Mr. Holman Hunt) of her date and place cannot judge fairly of Italian art.

The news of the death of Charlotte Brontë's husband the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls, came this week as a surprise to many people who were not aware he had survived his first wife so long. The courtship was a fine instance of "dogged does it." Mr. Nicholls, a strict, decorous, taciturn man, and a poor curate, made up his mind to marry "Curren Bell," and proposed to her at the height of her fame. The lady seems to have been indifferent, her father, the vicar, was furious; Mr. Nicholls had to leave the parish. But he held to his point, corresponding privately with Charlotte Brontë until her father's opposition was sufficiently worn down to admit of the curate being recalled and the marriage taking place, though without the final sanction of the Rev. Patrick Brontë's presence. The simple curate and the lady of genius lived very happily together for something less than a year, when death severed the union. For more than fifty years Mr. Nicholls lived, mainly upon a farm in Ireland, honouring the memory of his wife and—what is more—respecting her family secrets.

Without going minutely into the circumstances that led to the decision, we cannot help thinking it was a desirable thing that the Times should have changed itself into a Limited Liability Company. Presumably this will be done in the same manner as in the cases of such papers as the Morning Post and the Spectator. The advantages of a Limited Liability Company lie chiefly in the accuracy with which interests can be defined, and bequests and so forth made. As Mr. Walter is to be the governing director, it may be assumed that, for some time to come at least, no change will take place in the conduct of the paper. The matter, in fact, is one affecting the proprietors of the Times exclusively and will have no effect whatever on its literary character.

An event of very considerable interest took place at Cambridge on November 30, when the Eumenides of Aeschylus was performed in the original Greek by members of the University. Sir Charles Stanford's music, written for the performance held at Cambridge in 1885, was revived and conducted by the composer, and the play was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The acting throughout was of a very high order, the principal honours being shared between Mr. Carey (Athena) and Mr. Scholfield (Orestes). Mr. Carey's Athena was almost perfect; he spoke his lines with absolute clearness and great beauty of expression, while his dignified and commanding attitude, especially during the long Trial scene, was beyond praise. The Orestes of Mr. Scholfield was an admirable piece of acting, and he triumphed successfully over the difficulties of the part. As Apollo Mr. La Fontaine scarcely gave a sufficient impression of majesty and strength. The Chorus, most ably led by Mr. Young, sang with vigour and expression; but we looked in vain for the mysterious horror which we are led to understand pervaded them. Of the smaller parts, Mr. J. Brooke made the small part of the Pythian Prophetess very convincing, while the others were in competent hands. As a spectacle the revival was most striking. It would be difficult to overpraise the beautiful scene painted for the Prologue, or the scene on the Areopagus with which the play closes. The dresses, too, were, on the whole, most successful, while the play was admirable stage-managed, especially in the last scene.

Nether Stowey, where stands the Coleridge cottage we mentioned a fortnight ago, is a village in Somerset, lying near the sea. It is associated with the happiest period of the poet's life, before he took to opium or went to Germany to study metaphysics. His lectures in Bristol had brought him into contact with Poole, who, struck with his brilliant conversation, offered him the cottage. It was worth seven pounds a year, but it had "a stately kitchen garden." That meant much to Coleridge, who hoped to keep himself partly by manual labour. Here he planned a gigantic epic, which required ten years study of mathematics, psychology, natural history, and other subjects, five years for composition, and five years for correction. Here, too, besides several of his best known poems, he wrote a tragedy, Remorse, which was declined—whether with or without thanks seems doubtful. His main sources of income at this time were a guinea that he received once a week from the Morning Post, and the contributions of his friends. Coleridge continued to live at Stowey till the Wedgwood offer of £150 a year for life which was fully examined by Mr. Thomas Hutchinson in two articles in the ACADEMY of March 24 and 31, 1906.

The tenth of December is consecrated to our Lady of Loreto, a fact that is of more than ordinary interest at the present moment. For an Italian priest has just published a book, in which he endeavours to show with much documentary evidence that the story of the transportation of the Holy House from Nazareth to Loreto is an invention of the sixteenth century. The book has caused much excitement in Italy, especially at Loreto, and the Pope has been asked to consider the matter. The Santa Casa had fallen into the power of the Saracens to the great grief of Christendom, when on December 10, 1294, some shepherds saw it being carried across the Adriatic through the air by angels, who set it down at Loreto. It soon became a famous place of resort for pilgrims. Montaigne has left an account of it: Raphael's uncle carved the ivory on its outer wall. Parallels are not unknown, for at Kieff, one of the holy cities of Russia, there is an imposing ruin, named "The Golden Gate," which is said to have been brought in the same fashion from Byzantium.

The St. James's Dramatic Society, an ambitious little club to whose excellent performances we have referred before, presented last week at the Passmore Edwards Settlement a version of Much Ado about Nothing. This is one of the most difficult of all Shakespearean comedies, but the members of the Club, being undaunted Jacobites, do not shrink from difficulties which might well give professionals pause. Miss Amy Rooker's "Beatrice" was a delightful and intelligent rendering of the part, based on the Ellen Terry tradition; but the defective acoustic properties of the Hall quite defeated her elocution. Mr. F. Stanley Smith, though a little too young for the rôle of Don Pedro, acted with great vivacity, and was ably supported by Mr. C. J. Denny Bower (Don John) and Mr. Gilbert Clarke (Claudio), whose stage presence and fine voice suggest experience on a larger stage. Mr. George Hayes as Dogberry was the great success of the evening, and some of the other dramatic critics must have already turned the young man's head with acknowledging his unusual precocity by exceptional praise which is certainly well deserved. Mr. Charles Gee (Balthazar) carried through the song with great skill, his accompanist playing an entirely different tune. The admirable stage management and the production were due to Mr. Alexander Clifton, a pupil of the Academy of Dramatic Art.

Among Christmas numbers that of Country Life (published to-day) stands out, surely, as exceptional in quantity as well as quality. To begin with, there are no fewer than one hundred and thirty-two pages of advertisements which make in themselves a magazine of the greatest interest. And in the literary portion of the paper we find poems by Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer and Mr. Alfred Noyes, besides a little string of poems by Mr. Henry Newbolt, called, "A Child's Summer Day." Then there is Mr. Charles Marriott writing on the sea, his article being illustrated by wonderful pictures; Mr. Oliver Onions contributes a story; and the pictures of the French château of Vaux le Vicomte do justice to a house of superb beauty and historic dignity.

The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy has arranged with Messrs. Longman and Co. to publish a biography of his father, the late Earl of Cranbrook. The family papers and journal have been placed in his hands for that purpose. Mr. Gathorne-Hardy will be much obliged if friends and correspondents will forward to him at 77 Cadogan Square, S.W., any letters of interest they may have, written by the late Earl. Such letters will be returned in due course.

Mr. Martin Harvey's experiment in producing a new Irish play in Dublin was not altogether successful. The Spell met with a mixed reception, the fall of the curtain being greeted with hisses and groans. The play is the work of Miss Rosamond Langbridge, whose father, the Rev. Canon Langbridge, of Limerick, is part author of The Only Way. The head and front of the young author's offence is not that she has written a bad play, but that she has chosen to use as material for her drama some of the superstitions that still linger in remote West of Ireland districts. Instead of the typical Irish peasant she has taken the abnormal and exceptional; hence the hisses and sheafs of letters to the papers from indignant sentimentalists.

Much the same outcry was raised when Mr. W. B. Yeats's Countess Kathleen was produced a few years ago in Dublin, and more recently by Mr. Synge's Shadow of Glen. The ultra-sensitiveness of some Irish play-goers is one of the chief barriers to the success of literary drama in Dublin. Irish people are inclined to lose the universal in the personal, and in denouncing fancied "insults" in literary and dramatic work they frequently employ a very heavy wheel to break a very small butterfly.

It is more than twenty-five years since the famous Company of the Court Theatre of the Duke of Meiningen visited London. A Committee has now been formed for the purpose of arranging a short season of modern and classical plays in April next. Mr. Otho Stuart will place the Adelphi Theatre at the disposal of the Meiningers Company, if his arrangements permit; otherwise a prominent West-End theatre will be provided. The report will be announced in due course.

It is not generally known that the late F. G. Kitton left the manuscript of a topographical dictionary of the works of Charles Dickens. It is doubtful whether it will ever be published. Dickens, more than any author, except, perhaps, Mr. Hardy, wrote in a biographical atmosphere. He revelled in what Mr. Chesterton calls "the street;" and his books have not received the attention from this point of view which has been bestowed upon them from other standpoints. It is difficult to understand why a subject so interesting has been neglected so long. Changes are constantly taking place in the Dickens country; and it would be safe to say that the ghost of Dickens himself would be lost in the streets of London. Not only are alterations in "permanent progress," but new discoveries are being made in regard to many of the places both in London and in the provinces, mentioned in the novels and the "Pickwick Papers."

Kitton himself, unfortunately, accepts some popular theories in "The Dickens Country," which with a little personal investigation he could have proved to be erroneous. We have mentioned several of the current fallacies in these pages during the past few months. In the early novels, and particularly in the early chapters of "Pickwick," Dickens was careful to hide, in a disguise more or less real, the identity of any of the places he introduced. A work which would elucidate these mysteries and form a guide to the topography of Dickens would be of the greatest interest, and of much more value than the innumerable but incomplete accounts in the many literary geographies that have appeared since first this form of literary study became fashionable.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—A Christmas course of lectures, adapted to a juvenile auditory, will be delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. W. Duddell, on "Signalling to a Distance; from Primitive Man to Radiotelegraphy" (experimentally illustrated). The dates of the lectures are December 27, 29, 1906, January 1, 3, 5 and 8, 1907, at three o'clock.—General Monthly Meeting. Monday, December 3, at 5 P.M.

Royal Geographical Society.—The Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W., on Monday, December 10, at 8.30 P.M., "Irrigation in the United States: its Geographical and Economical Results," by Major John H. Beacom, U.S. Army.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, at 8 P.M., Monday, December 10. Cantor Lecture: Mr. A. D. Hall, on Artificial Fertilisers. Wednesday, December 12: Fourth Ordinary Meeting, 8 P.M. Mr. Cecil H. Hooper on Fruit Growing and the Protection of Birds.—At 4.30 P.M., Thursday, December 13. A. Yusuf Ali on The Indian Mahomedans. Their Past, Present, and Future.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus.—Monday, December 10, at 5 P.M. Rev. J. Stephen Barras on The Churches of the City (Illustrated). Thursday, December 13, at 6 P.M. Mr. J. W. Jenkinson on Tadpoles (Illustrated).

Royal Colonial Institute, Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole.—Tuesday, December 11, 8 P.M. Mr. Arthur W. a'Beckett on The Colonial Press.

Viking Club, King's Weigh House Rooms, Thomas Street, W.—Friday, December 14, at 8.15 P.M. Sveinbjörn Sveinbjörnsson on Northern Folk-Songs, with vocal illustrations.

Art Exhibitions.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metal-work, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie: Tales and Towns of Italy by Jessie Bayes. Drawings by Annie French. Pastels by T. R. Way. November 28 to December 22.—Shepherds; Early British Masters.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc. October 22 to January 1.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—Obach: The Society of Twelve. Closes December 8.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution.—November 7. Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours; Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club; Dering Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. December 3. Sculpture and Drawings by Countess Feodora Gleichen. Medals and Decorative Work by Miss Elinor Hallé. Paintings by Countess Helena Gleichen.—Leicester Galleries: November 24. Arthur Rackham's "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens." Water-colours by W. Lee Hankey, P. A. Hay, Hugh Norris, Graham Petrie and Terrick Williams.—W. B. Paterson: November 17. Pictures by W. Nicholson.—Fine Art Society: November 17. Landscapes in Cornwall and Devon (water-colour) by S. J. Lamorna Birch. Water-colours of Cities of Spain by Henry C. Brewer. Close December 8. Etchings by Axel Haig.—Royal Photographic Society, 66 Russell Square: November 6 to December 22. 11-5. Photographs by Henry W. Barrett. Admission on presentation of card.—Modern Gallery, 61 New Bond Street. Mater Christi, by H. Salomon. Water-colours by Miss H. Donald-Smith till December 22.—Manchester Art Gallery. Exhibition of Works of Mr. Holman Hunt, including some not on view at the Leicester Galleries.—Grafton Galleries. Women's International Art Club. Annual Exhibition, including copies of Velasquez, by Blanche Williams (Mrs. P. Somers-Cocks). December 12 to December 22.—Messrs. Dowdeswell. Water-colours of Brittany by C. G. Kennaway, December 8.—International Art Gallery, 14 King William Street, Trafalgar Square. First Exhibition, consisting of works by Modern British, French and Dutch Artists. December 12 till January 5.

Royal Academy of Arts.—Monday, December 10, 9 P.M. Distribution of Prizes to the Students. Galleries containing competition works open at 8 P.M.; and on December 11 from 11 to 4.

Plays: Stage Society. Scala Theatre, December 9 and 10. The Weavers, by Gerhart Hauptmann, translated by Mary Morison.—Lincoln's Inn Hall. December 12 and 14 at 8.15. December 13 and 15 at 3.15. Eager Heart, by A. M. Buckton.—Garrick Theatre. December 11 and 13. Matinées of Macbeth. Macbeth, Mr. Bouchier. Lady Macbeth, Miss Violet Vanbrugh.

Concerts.—December 8, Queen's Hall: Chappell's Ballad Concert, 2.30. December 8, Queen's Hall: Miss Rolda and Mr. Antoinetti, 8. December 9, Queen's Hall: Sunday Concert, 3.30. December 10, Queen's Hall: London Choral Society, 8.—December 10, Bechstein Hall: West London Männerchor, 8. December 11, Bechstein Hall: Mr. Darbshire Jones, 8.30.—December 11, Aeolian Hall: R. von Wahrlich and R. Zwintscher, 3. Aeolian Hall: Mr. Edouard Risler, 8.—December 12, Bechstein Hall: Miss G. Peppercorn, 3. December 12, Bechstein Hall: Mr. Beecham's Orchestral Concert, 8.30.—December 13, Aeolian Hall: The London Trio, afternoon. Aeolian Hall: Broadwood Concert, 8.30.—Bechstein Hall: Mr. Dressell, 8.15.—December 14, Aeolian Hall: Chamber Music Concert, 12 noon. Aeolian Hall: Mr. York Bowen, 8.30.—December 15, Queen's Hall: Symphony Concert, 3.

The Musical Association.—Second Meeting at Messrs. Broadwood's, Conduit Street, Tuesday, December 11, at 5.15 P.M. Rev. Henry Cart on Spanish Music, with illustrations by Senor Arbos.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge: December 7 and 8. Sale of the English and Irish silver and copper coins of the late Richard A. Hoblyn. December 10. Sale of a portion of the Library of Samuel T. Fisher. December 11. Sale of the Library of the late Clement Scott. December 12 and 13. Sale of the Books and MSS., including the Library of the late J. Edward Gilmore. December 14 and 15. Sale of Books and Ancient Illuminated MSS.

LITERATURE

JOHN EVELYN

The Diary of John Evelyn. With an Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3 vols. (Macmillan, 31s. 6d. net.)

It is John Evelyn's misfortune to have been a contemporary of Samuel Pepys. Had he lived in the eighteenth century, he would have been judged simply on his merits. Living and writing in the seventeenth, he challenges a most disastrous comparison. It is impossible to think of his Diary without remembering the diary of Samuel Pepys, the best work of its kind that ever was written. The two men lived on terms of friendship. Each keenly appreciated the other's good qualities. In Evelyn's Diary you may find many amiable references to the Secretary of the Admiralty, and when that "very worthy industrious and curious person" died, no one paid him a higher tribute than John Evelyn. "He was universally beloved," he wrote, "hospitable, generous, learned in many things, skilled in music, a very great cherisher of learned men, of whom he had the conversation." Pepys's estimate of Evelyn is at once more picturesque and more finely critical. He describes Evelyn's gaiety, when he was in a good humour, with characteristic zest. The two met, when Lord Sandwich had taken some East India prizes. "The receipt of this news," writes Pepys, "did put us all into such an ecstasy of joy, that it inspired into Sir John Minnes and Mr. Evelyn such a spirit of mirth, that in all my life I never met with so merry a two hours as our company this night was." Another time Pepys took a less favourable view of his friend. He paid Evelyn a long visit at Deptford, and returned home not a little bored. Evelyn not only showed him his paintings, and revealed to him the whole secret of mezzotinto, but he read to his visitor much of his discourse about "Gardenage," and much also besides. But Pepys shall tell the story in his own words:

He read me part of a play or two of his making [writes Pepys]: very good, but not as he conceits them, I think, to be. He showed me his Hortus Hyemalis; leaves laid up in a book of several plants kept dry, which preserve colour, and look very fine, better than any herbal. In fine, a most excellent person he is, and must be allowed a little for a little conceitedness; but he may well be so, being a man so much above others. He read me, though with too much gusto, some little poems of his own that were not transcendent.

It is easy to read between these lines that Pepys was bored. He would have been far happier sitting in a tavern with the companions of his choice. Though he doubtless loved literature as much as Evelyn, he was not of those who cared to talk about it, and one is sure that the little poems that were not transcendent tried his patience to the utmost.

The truth is that Pepys and Evelyn had very little in common save the age in which they lived. They frequented the same Court, they sat in the same theatres, they knew the same men and women. But they regarded everything with very different eyes. By the side of Pepys Evelyn appears something of a prig. He writes pompously, and without the gusto which he brought to the reading of his poems. The style of his diary is not unlike the style of his books—dry and unimpressive. Too often he is content to make a bare statement without hazarding an opinion. "I saw Volpone," he says on one occasion, "acted at Court before their majesties." That is all. Pepys saw the same drama and could not suppress his enthusiasm. "Thence with my wife to the king's house," writes he, "there to see Volpone, a most excellent play; the best I think I ever saw, and well acted." There you see an essential difference between the two men. Pepys, greedy for sensation, could look upon nothing coldly. Evelyn, after his demurer method, thought it enough to record that he went here or there, and that he met this one or that, without marking his approval or giving us any impression of what he saw and heard. But there was a still deeper difference between the two men. While both delighted in pictures, and "curiosities," and gardens, Pepys obeyed the master-passion of life, which held small sway over the mind of Evelyn. The interest of Pepys was universal. He cared not whether he ruffled it at Court or took refuge in a blind ale-house. Wherever he was he knew that he would happen upon a fresh experience, and though he loved to get on himself, he did not judge others by the hard standard of social advancement. Evelyn's respectability, on the other hand, is a little oppressive. He was a good, kind, worthy man, and we cannot help thinking that Pepys was very fortunate when he encountered him in the high spirits which silenced the uproarious Sir J. Minnes himself.

However, it is not given to every one to have the genius of Samuel Pepys, and if we regard Evelyn in forgetfulness of his rival, we shall find a good scholar, a sincere patriot, and an amiable man. He understood all the sciences, he appreciated all the arts of the time. He helped to establish the Royal Society, and he was a connoisseur of taste and judgment. While he could appreciate the masterpieces of Vandyck and Mantegna, he had the sense of discovery and the courage to express and defend his own opinion. Few episodes in his career gave him greater pleasure than the finding of Grinling Gibbons. He came upon him, in poverty and unknown, and his pleasure in the discovery is evident from the circumstance with which he describes it:

This day [he writes] I first acquainted His Majesty with that incomparable young man, Gibbons, whom I had lately met with in an obscure place by mere accident, as I was walking near a poor solitary thatched house in a field in our parish near Sayes Court. I found him shut in; but looking in at the window, I perceived him carving that large cartoon, or crucifix, of Tintoretto, a copy of which I had myself brought from Venice, where the original painting remains. I asked if I might enter; he opened the door civilly to me, and I saw him about such a work as for the curiosity of handling, drawing, and studious exactness I never had before seen in all my travels. I questioned him why he worked in such an obscure and lonesome place; he told me that it was because he might apply himself to his profession without interruption, and wondered not a little how I found him out.

But Evelyn did not only find him out; he also made his fortune; and Gibbons's successful career began on the day when Evelyn came upon him by a mere accident in that obscure and lonely place.

Though Evelyn was somewhat narrow in his outlook upon life, he was not a man of unamiable judgments. He lived in a Court given over to dissipations, of which he bitterly disapproved, yet his loyalty was unshaken. While he deplores the manners of his contemporaries, condemning their love of deep play, and the extravagance of the "ladies of pleasure, the curses of our nation," he did not rush into retirement or soothe his scruples with noisy demonstrations. He was wise enough to make the best of his world, and his world, no doubt, benefited by his presence. Though so violent a man as Judge Jeffreys must have daunted his gentle nature, he lived on terms of familiarity with him, and has left us the pleasantest picture we have of the man who held the Bloody Assize in the West. In 1683 Evelyn was present at the wedding of one Mrs. Castle to her fifth husband. And there at the wedding, besides the Lord Mayor, the Sheriff, and several aldermen, were Sir George Jeffreys, newly made Lord Chief Justice of England, and Mr. Justice Wythens, who danced with the bride, and were exceeding merry. "These great men," says Evelyn, "spent the rest of the afternoon, till eleven at night, in drinking healths, taking tobacco, and talking much beneath the gravity of judges, who had but a day or two before condemned Mr. Algernon Sidney." He even looked with a kindly eye upon buccaneers. He spoke well of Sir Henry Morgan, and he dined with Dampier at Pepys's house soon after that famous filibuster returned from his voyage round the world. Dampier, indeed, did not come up to his expectation. "He seemed a more modest man," wrote Evelyn with a tinge of sadness, "than one would imagine by the relation of the crew he had assorted with."

Thus it is that Evelyn throws a steady light upon the history of his time. It is only incidentally that he reveals himself, and here again he presents a striking contrast to his rival. But the historical value of Evelyn's Diary is indisputable, and he writes best, when the greatest call is made upon him. His account of the fire, though infinitely less moving and dramatic than Pepys's, is not merely a document of value; it is also a dignified piece of literature. Wise and just also are his estimates of character, and his account of his daughter Mary shows him a master of pathos. Such a book as his Diary, then, cannot be too often reprinted, nor do we know a better edition than this, skilfully edited by Mr. Austin Dobson. Mr. Dobson's Introduction is marked by the urbanity characteristic of his work. He praises John Evelyn's "silences." We may pay the same tribute to Mr. Dobson's notes. He gives his readers credit for some knowledge of history, and does not attempt to make his annotations perform the duty of a biographical dictionary.

ADONIS—ATTIS—OSIRIS

Adonis, Attis, Osiris. Studies in the history of Oriental Religion. By J. G. FRAZER, Litt.D. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

By issuing a series of monographs as forerunners of the third edition of the "Golden Bough," Dr. Frazer is doing his readers a great service and at the same time advancing his own interests. He picks out one or at most a few of the many threads which run through that work and thus makes the argument easier to follow, and he offers his conclusions to the searching criticism of specialists before incorporating them in the huge fabric which threatens to become encyclopædic in dimensions as well as in learning. The present volume is practically concerned solely with three deities of agriculture or vegetation who bear a close family resemblance. Adonis, also called Tammuz, was worshipped at Babylon and in Cyprus, Attis was the Phrygian counterpart of Adonis, and the Egyptians practised the cult of Osiris. To each of these gods Dr. Frazer devotes a separate section of the work and the sections are divided into a number of chapters varying from seven to fourteen. The result is that the work is infinitely easier to follow than one planned in the somewhat massive form of the "Golden Bough." In connection with Adonis are studied a certain number of deities of unexplained or uncertain character, but this causes no complications in the argument of the work. Put briefly, the myth of Adonis was that he wedded Ishtar, the great mother goddess, but that every year he passed away, leaving the cheerful earth for the gloomy subterranean world; he was followed to the shades by his divine mistress, in whose absence vegetation ceased to flourish and the passion of love was stilled; the queen of the infernal regions allowed the goddess, probably in company with her lover, to return to the upper world and with her reappearance all nature revived. The death of Adonis or Tammuz was mourned about midsummer to the shrill music of flutes, and Ezekiel saw the women of Jerusalem weeping for him at the north gate of the temple. This myth is found in many other forms, but the recurring theme is the death of the god and the lamentation of his goddess-mistress is a common feature.

Readers of the "Golden Bough" know how Dr. Frazer explains this myth, which bears a striking resemblance to the Greek story of Proserpine. Tammuz or Adonis is, together with the Asiatic mother-goddess, a personification of the fruits of the earth; mother and son, they correspond closely to Demeter and Kore in Greek religion, but an erotic motif runs through the Adonis cycle. This part of the story seems to be due to another mythical concept—that the earth goddess and the water god must be conjoined in order that the soil may be fruitful; this mythical marriage of deities, was, Dr. Frazer holds, represented on earth by the marriage of a king, as human representative of the god, sometimes with his own daughter, sometimes with one of the women assigned to the service of the temple. The children which sprang from such unions were their father's successors, when there was a vacant throne, or his substitutes, when the common weal demanded the sacrifice of a royal victim. This hypothesis is an ingenious evasion of the objection which has been brought against Dr. Frazer's well-known theory of the sacrifice of the king: but the success seems to be bought at the price of the theory; for in Dr. Frazer's original view the king was sacrificed, not in order to appease some offended power or to diffuse his magical influence over the land but in order to protect the divine life, incarnate in the king, against the inroads of old age; and no sacrifice of a member of his family could avail if the king were growing decrepit.

No less ingenious is the theory suggested by Dr. Frazer to explain the marriage of fathers and daughters. It seems to be an accepted fact that in Egypt these marriages, familiar to us from the historical examples of the Ptolemies, were no less common in ordinary life; property descended in the female line, and if a son wished to inherit a share of the family property he could do so only by allying himself with his sister. In his work on the origin of kingship, Dr. Frazer has already suggested that a king in ancient Rome succeeded by virtue of his marriage with a daughter of the royal house; following up this train of ideas, he now goes a step further, and sees in father-daughter marriages the logical outcome of inheritance through females. We know that the sacred king at Rome—the Flamen Dialis—was compelled to resign if his wife died; if this was due to the fact that he gained his position by his marriage with her and not in his own right, it may well have been that secular kings were likewise dispossessed of the crown at the death of their queens; if the heiress to the throne was a daughter, not a son, the crown could be regained by wedding her; hence, Dr. Frazer suggests, the many stories of such unions on the part of kings in classical times. The theory is ingenious, but a single example of abdication hardly suffices to establish this novel view; was it not perhaps for reasons of ceremonial purity that the Flamen had to retire? No one knows better than Dr. Frazer the many tabus which superstition imposes upon mourners.

In connection with the myth and rites of Adonis Dr. Frazer considers the position of many other West Asiatic deities—Melcarth of Tyre and Gades, Baal and Sandan of Tarsus, the gods represented by the rock sculptures of the old Hittite kingdom of Boghaz-Keui, the priestly kings of Olba and the gods of Cilicia. Then he deals with Sardanapalus and Hercules, Croesus and Tylon. Of deities and kings alike it is related that they were burnt, and this custom is brought into connection with the volcanic nature of Cappadocia; this is followed by an account of rites connected with earthquakes, of the worship of mephitic vapours and of hot springs. Finally, we return to Adonis, the results of the inquiry are summed up, and the book closes with an account of the "gardens of Adonis"—pots of herbs or flowers tended with care so that they spring up rapidly, which were originally intended as vegetation charms, and are found to this day in Bohemia, Sicily, and other parts of Europe.

The second book is less elaborate; after describing the myth and rites of Attis, the author sets forth the influence of Oriental religions in Europe and traces the celebration and date of Christmas to the source in the cult of Mithra. The third book deals with Osiris; an account of the myth is followed by details as to the Egyptian calendar and the Egyptian farmer's year. The official festivals of Osiris supply Dr. Frazer with an opportunity of considering festivals of the dead; and with the exception of a summary of results the remainder of the book is taken up with a discussion of Osiris in his character as god of vegetation, in his relation to the sun, and in his relation to the moon, an association due in both cases, as Dr. Frazer believes, to secondary causes. Much of this work is, as the author recognises, highly conjectural, but in speaking of "primitive promiscuity" as if it were a proved fact Dr. Frazer is building on the sand; an hypothesis, however many times it may be put forward, remains an hypothesis; it never becomes an axiom by reason of repetitions, vain or otherwise. Dr. Frazer is read no less for his learning than for his style, and his latest book will not be found wanting in any of the qualities which lent charm to his former work.

THE KING OF COURT POETS

The King of Court Poets. A Study of the Work, Life and Times of Lodovico Ariosto. By EDMUND G. GARDNER. (Constable, 16s. net.)

To this work Mr. Gardner has somewhat fantastically given a title suggesting that it is a biography. Its true scope, however, is explained in the preface, namely, to combine a sequel to the author's "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," with "a somewhat full study of the life and works of Messer Lodovico Ariosto." That is kindly and honestly written, for it warns us at the outset of what lies before us. Mr. Gardner does not wish his reader to be in the position of the countryman who purchased the famous work on sheep-folds: he does not attempt to conceal from us that this work is mainly a chronicle of local history such as he revels in—facts and facts and more facts about politics and princes, a wilderness of events of greater or less importance, through which he invites us to follow him. And when we say that we had expected to sail down the river of the Life of Ariosto, Mr. Gardner smilingly explains that for a considerable part of its course it is a buried river, and that the only way to follow it is to traverse the wilderness called the Times of Ariosto. The forest is by no means unexplored, and it is not on the whole of any great interest, but the journey through its undergrowth is good hard work and beneficial to the brain. He will explain to us before we start the sources of the Ariosto, and on our way he will let us sit and rest now and again, at points where the river emerges momentarily into the daylight. Towards the end of our journey we shall be by the river for a whole mile, and on the farther edge of the forest there is a great lake called the Works of Ariosto, across which we can have a delightful sail.

The book, then, begins by tracing the pedigree of the Ariosti from about the year 400 and passes on to describe briefly the surroundings in which Lodovico's childhood was passed. Then comes a fairly full summary of Italian history from the invasion of Ferrarese territory by the Venetians in 1481 down to the formation of the League of Cambrai. From this point onward the treatment becomes much more detailed and minute. Indeed, the main course of history, though never quite lost to sight, seems at times to be almost forgotten, so absorbing is the author's preoccupation with the ins and outs of Estensian diplomacy and intrigue. Into this complicated recital the name of Ariosto is introduced not infrequently and with considerable adroitness, while for one golden chapter we read an extremely interesting account of his daily life while he was in a position of prominence as ducal commissary in the Garfagnana. The fact is that, excepting the evidence of the Satires, almost the only data for a study of a great part of his life are afforded by a number of references to him, often very slight, in the diplomatic and private correspondence of the time. These references, while they throw but a little glooming light on the personality of Ariosto, need themselves a great deal of historical explanation to make them intelligible. But in the three years during which he held this difficult post, Ariosto stands revealed to us, by his enactments and proclamations, his letters to Duke Alfonso and neighbouring States, and by the Satires referable to this period. We see him here, parted from everything that he held most dear, acting an uncongenial part, brave and faithful, honest beyond the standard of his time, over-sensitive, and, as Mr. Gardner says, "struggling against insurmountable difficulties of a kind to which he was totally unaccustomed, failing nobly, almost heroically, in an impossible undertaking."

Next in interest are the later chapters of the book, devoted to a study of the poems. It would probably be difficult to find anything particularly new to say about the "Orlando," and to judge from Mr. Gardner's tone that is not the work which interests him most. The chapter which he devotes to it reads in many places more like an apology than an appreciation. His sympathy is evidently much stronger with those works which reveal the conditions of contemporary court and city life. He has a just admiration for the Satires, from which he gives many interesting quotations, chiefly to illustrate points in the poet's life; and the chapter on the Comedies is a piece of scholarly and genial criticism. Overshadowed as they are by the "Orlando," the comedies and satires have been much neglected by general readers. Yet not only are they necessary to complete our understanding of Ariosto, but in them he appears in a particularly pleasant mood. He satirises so freely the manners of the courts and cities of his day that, remembering that his comedies were performed before Popes and princes, we marvel how it could come about that the same man who wrote these prologues could stoop to the gross adulation which disfigures his epic. Then again his sense of humour, which was the only influence to restrain the exuberance of the "Orlando," has naturally a free play in these minor works. That sixth sense is intensely characteristic both of the poet and of his countrymen. Ready perception of the ridiculous and hatred of sentimentality—eminently Italian qualities—saved many a situation in the "Orlando" while they lift the comedies and satires into the first rank among works of their kind. It seems strange that there should have been so many different opinions about the metre which Ariosto used in his comedies, the verso sobrucciolo, his own invention. We are glad to see that Mr. Gardner is among those who think that in this verse the poet had found the ideal golden mean between poetry and prose, by his masterly use and variation of it at once lifting the language of his comedies above the obviousness of the latter and saving it from the unreality, for purpose of the dialogue, of the former.

A FRENCH CRITIC ON HOMER

Pour mieux connaître Homère. Par MICHEL BRÉAL. (Paris: Hachette, 3f.50.)

CICERO tells us that there is no hypothesis so baseless but that some philosopher has held and maintained it. Critics in different ages have put forward every conceivable theory about the genesis of the Iliad, from that of Voltaire, who believed that Homer might have actually had himself a part in the siege of Troy and might have been personally acquainted with Achilles, Diomedes and Hector, to that of Max Müller, who thought that the kernel of the Iliad is the daily struggle between the darkness and the dawn. We have recently dealt with the work of Mr. Andrew Lang, who jousts against the theory that the poem is the work of five centuries. We have now to consider an elegantly written brochure on the same ever-fascinating subject by a continental scholar, who brings to his work the characteristic finish of style which marks the French savant.

M. Bréal distinguishes between the Homer who amuses his readers—for the idea that he had only hearers not readers must be banished to the limbo of obsolete and outworn hypotheses—with horses that can speak and weep or Athena suddenly coming down the chimney or perching on a tree in the form of a bird, and the Homer who depicts the diplomacy of Odysseus and is capable of the sublime pathos of the scene wherein Priam pleads for the body of his son. But the whole poem, in spite of marked contrasts in handling and method, belongs to a period when the world has outlived its childhood, and when its civilisation is no longer in embryo. We must not suppose that things not mentioned in the epopee did not exist at the time of its composition. Shakespeare does not mention tobacco, with the use of which he must have been familiar. He may have deemed it inartistic; and this may have been the reason why the epopee does not mention writing—though fifteen centuries before Christ there were two separate scripts in Crete—nor statues, nor pictures, nor any circulating medium. A cauldron in good condition is worth an ox, a brazen tripod is value for twelve oxen, a good suit of armour for nine, and a female slave with the usual accomplishments for four.

M. Bréal believes in rhapsodes who archaised. They got their ideas of warriors in chariots from Egypt and Assyria, and ascribed to their heroes that method of fighting, though it harmonises ill with that fleetness of foot which is the salient characteristic of the mightiest of the epical warriors, Achilles. Homer would not so carefully have described the armour of his heroes were he not conscious that he was dealing with antique lore to which his readers were strangers. The traditional epithets, like "solid-hoofed" horses, "fishteeming," or "unvintageable" sea, "perfect" knight, are all "sédiment déposé par un long passé d'essais poétiques"—so traditional that even Aegisthus is called "a parfait knight" (ἀμύμων). So in our ballad poetry every lady is fair, every knight is gentle, and England is merrie even when she is in the throes of defeat. M. Bréal, thus, refuses his assent to those who ascribe the Iliad to the Mycænean age, but denies that the poem is the work of a single age, as Mr. Lang believes. The poems have grown like a mediæval cathedral, and its heroes have developed from outstanding duellists, semi-divine paladins, who decide the battle by their individual prowess, gazed at in awe by the incapable herd of common soldiers (λαοί), into generals who marshal the rank and file and carry out a preconceived plan of campaign. He assigns for the period of its growth about one hundred and fifty years from about 700 to 550 before Christ.

If it be asked how it was that the Iliad and Odyssey had no successors worthy of the name, the answer is to be found in the history of Asia Minor, which in the sixth century before Christ became little better than a Persian satrapy. When she recovered her personality, times were changed. A broken tradition does not revive. In the meantime the genius of continental Greece had grown to maturity. Continental Greece was now the heir of Asia Minor. It is remarkable that among "les inconsistencies et les contradictions" which are detected by M. Bréal in the gradual development of the poem, and which betray the latest hands, are the most exquisite scenes in the Iliad and those which have been most admired in all ages—Helen on the walls of Troy, the embassy to Achilles, the parting scene between Hector and Andromache, the ἀριστεία of the different chieftains, the exquisite dirges of Hecuba, Andromache, and Helen over the dead Hector, and above all the scene in which Priam comes to beg Achilles for the corse of his son, which Gottfried Hermann called the finest thing in the literature of any period or people.

Such, then, is the contribution of M. Bréal "to the better knowledge of Homer." It is marked by very little technical knowledge of the subject, and lacks both the learning and the definiteness of aim which mark the work of Mr. Lang. More than half of the book consists of a Lexilogus, on the basis of the work of Buttmann, for whom M. Bréal claims a French origin as Boudemont. The Lexilogus does not seem to us to be of much value. He does not seem to be in the van of Homeric criticism. If he were, he would not have written ἐπιδημίου ἀκρυβέντος instead of the now generally received reading, ἐπιδημίου κρυβέντος, failing to see that ἀκρυβέντος is an impossible epithet for πόλεμος. He translates νυκτὸς ἀμολγῆ "au fort de la nuit"—literally "à la traite de la nuit"—a metaphor taken from cattle and their milking-time, like βουλνύς, "the evening":

What time the labour'd ox
In his loose traces from the furrow comes.

He takes ἰάων in the phrase δώτηρες (he writes δοτήρες, which would not scan), ἰάων from εὔς, accounting for the fem. termination, which he calls an æolic form, by the suggestion that it is a religious phrase, "locution sacrée." Ἡρίον could hardly be a form of ἥρώιον. He thinks μέρπος refers to the "human face divine," μερ- being connected with βροτός, and the latter part of the word coming from the root found in ὄψομαι. He rejects the view that περπικέρανος is a metathetic form of τρεπικέρανος (qui fulmen torquet) which could not come into a hexameter verse; and says that "delighting in thunder" is quite conformable to Homeric mythology. But the word could only mean "delighting (giving delight to) the thunder," not "delighting in thunder." The metathesis is like that of tarpassita for trapezita (τραπεζίτης) in Plautus. Homer often thus treats words do not come into the hexameter. In τηλύγετος M. Bréal finds the meaning "latest born"; but are the youngest children necessarily the most tenderly loved? Virgil apparently so understood the word, in the line

Care puer, mea sola et sera voluptas:

but it is far more likely that the word means "fine, braw, bouncing," τηλυ- being connected with the root of θάλλω.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE ARMY

A History of the British Army. By the Hon. J. W. FORTESCUE.
Vol. iv. (Macmillan, 42s. net.)

MOST historians have an unduly large share of original sin, for, though they may, if they will, copy the methods of the great, they generally follow some false god of their own. Military history in particular has always been a pitfall, in spite of the fact that most people read, at any rate in their youth, some portion of Thucydides. The turn of the tide may be said to have begun in England when Hamley wrote his book to teach something of the philosophy of the business of war, and, after a long interval, with Captain Mahan. There had been before those days excellent departmental histories such as Napier's, and since then works of great value like those by Colonel Clifford Walton and Mr. C. H. Firth, but it remained for a civilian—Mr. Fortescue—to write what has become a classic, and show the place which the army has occupied in regard to the nation since the days when the standing army first originated. Whether we belong to the Blue-water school, the Blue-funk school, or to any other school, the problem of the army has to be faced, and it is better to face it with a knowledge of the past. Burke's dictum that "history is a preceptor of prudence, not of principles," is peculiarly applicable here, for in Mr. Fortescue's work we may at any rate learn prudence, even if we do not find a solution to the army questions of to-day. If the story which he unfolds were known to all, we might indeed learn from it "to look with remorse upon the past, and to the future with assured hope of better things."

The present volume, published in two parts with the useful maps in a separate cover, covers the period 1789-1801. It is a period for which there is a vast amount of material, and during which the army was set to do a vast amount of work. There were, for instance, the many and complicated operations in the Netherlands, as well as operations in Cape Colony, the West and East Indies, Ireland, Egypt, the Mediterranean, Southern India, Holland, and in fact almost every quarter of the globe. Wellington's European operations were yet to come, but there were several illustrious men such as Abercromby and Moore in the army at home as well as the giants in the navy. Unhappily, there was no Minister during that period able to conduct a war. Pitt was a Minister of peace, and there were two important matters of which he had no knowledge, namely, war and the world. To supplement these defects there appeared Henry Dundas, who was, as Mr. Fortescue says, so ignorant of war that he was not aware of his ignorance. Dundas became in 1794 the first Secretary of State for War, "the very worst man that could possibly have been chosen to found the traditions of such an office. His methods have found faithful imitation by all too many of his successors." With a man of this nature to conduct affairs it is no wonder that this volume affords melancholy reading: its effect may be all the better for that reason, because Mr. Fortescue's aim has been throughout to endeavour to formulate our military experience of the past in all its branches, so as to give warning against repetition of old mistakes in the future. But the failure of our military operations was not wholly due to Dundas, for there were two other civilians at the War Office, the Secretary of State at War and the Under Secretary. They were, it is said:

nominally working together to promote a common military policy, yet each at the same time contending for particular attention to some extraneous operation which exclusively interested himself. Practically, therefore, there were three Ministers of War, instead of one, and there would have been a fourth but for Grenville's firm refusal to be saddled with the military direction of the Royalists in France, which Dundas endeavoured by stealth to foist upon him.

Nothing has been said so far of the histories contained in this work of the several campaigns. It is really superfluous to say anything, since the skill and style with which Mr. Fortescue describes this important branch of the subject are well known. Incidentally, we can trace in this volume the gradual improvement in the efficiency of the army, and especially of the officers, largely due to the good administrative work done by the Duke of York while he was Commander-in-Chief. And what an extraordinary army it was! There was the regular army, varying in strength during the period under review from 100,000 to 140,000, there were all kinds of foreign levies and regiments, the militia, and an infinity of volunteer corps of all arms. Of the last-named class of troops we should have liked a fuller account because so little is known about them, chiefly on account of the haste with which they were raised and of the consequent lack of official records on the subject. They flourished under various names and conditions, and the rapidity with which these Volunteers were raised would be flattering to the national vanity were it not susceptible of a commonplace explanation. By a certain clause in the Act Volunteers were exempted from service in the Militia, upon producing a certificate that they had attended exercise punctually during six weeks previously to the hearing of appeals against the Militia list. This dissociation of the Volunteers from the Militia was a great and disastrous blunder, which has never yet been thoroughly repaired.

There were also the Fencibles to compete with the regular army as well as with the militia and volunteers, so that the task of writing this history becomes all the more difficult. The short and clear exposition, however, which we get of this confused state of affairs is particularly valuable at a time when the Territorial Army is once again in the melting-pot.

Lord Acton, in his inaugural lecture on the study of history, said that the strongest and most impressive characters, like Macaulay, Thiers, Mommsen, and Treitschke, project their own broad shadow upon their pages: he added that it was a practice proper to great men, "and a great man may be worth several immaculate historians." Mr. Fortescue certainly projects his own shadow very often, and we are glad of it, because he has so much knowledge with which to back his opinions, and he shows himself so capable of taking a broad view, that we always feel the shadow to be cast in the right place. His comments are as opportune as his appearance. That there should be good historians at the present time is well, but it is still more comforting to think that a first-rate historian of the army should be at hand to show the lessons and application of history at a time when the army is once more receiving the attention which is only its due.

AMERICANS IN PROCESSION

American Literary Masters. By LEON H. VINCENT. (Constable, 8s. 6d. net.)

It would be a little ungracious—"too bad" as the Americans themselves are fond of saying—to lay any but the lightest of stresses upon our feeling of disappointment over this in many ways good and useful little book. Perhaps the secret of the feeling lies in that unconsidered "little." The volume runs to some five hundred pages, yet after turning the last of them we are left with an impression of slowness, and, though it is freely admitted that the large number of poets and prose writers considered (nineteen in all) precludes a very full treatment of any of them, many of these studies fall something short, as it seems to us, of their possible radius of illumination and suggestiveness. It may be that Mr. Vincent's method of treatment has something to do with it. Following the plan pursued by Emile Faguet in his "Dix-Septième Siècle," he has subdivided his studies into short sections, a method which imposes a severe test upon an author, tying him down as it does to a somewhat monotonous régime. Thus, to take Oliver Wendell Holmes for example, we get I. His Life, p. 337; II. The Man, 341; III. The Writer, 344; IV. The Autocrat and its Companions, etc., 345; V. The Poet, 349; VI. Fiction and Biography, 352. From a certain point of view this might seem to be quite exhaustive, and indeed, if this book is intended for those whose study in American Literature has been but little, we have not a word to say against it. All who seek a convenient synopsis of American literary achievement during the nineteenth century (by the way, no one is mentioned whose reputation does not partially rest upon some notable book published before 1860) certainly owe their thanks to Mr. Vincent. We all fancy we know something of Prescott, Motley, Thoreau, Lowell, Whittier, and Walt Whitman—to say nothing of Washington Irving, Longfellow, Fenimore Cooper, Emerson, Poe, and Hawthorne; yet to buttonhole, say, an average Literary Society with a viva voce upon the works and days of almost any of these writers would be to raise many a blush of ignorance. And if it came to Bryant or Parkman! But with this book in hand any one may acquire a sound working knowledge of all their works and nearly all their days, besides picking up as much wayside information as he pleases. He may note that Hawthorne wrote many of his early tales in the room (overlooking the battlefield) at Concord in which Emerson had written his essay on Nature six years before; that Longfellow once described Hawthorne as "a strange owl, a very peculiar individual with a dash of originality about him very pleasant to behold"; that Prescott, blind of one eye from boyhood through an accident which seriously affected the other, lived to be proud of having confuted Johnson's dictum that no one could write history unless he had good eyes; that Emerson after an unfortunate trip to the Highlands thought that "the scenery of a shower bath must always be much the same." Or he may tabulate, compare, and make lists of dates with the least possible trouble. All the lives are well sketched, the personal characteristics fairly and impartially represented, the scope and intention of each man's work clearly defined. But the essays in criticism, adequate though they are, will scarcely do all that the best critical work should to stimulate the reader's own critical faculty or to leave him impatient to read and judge for himself. Success in begetting that kind of impatience should, we think, be an aim of all criticism, it is the very touchstone of compressed criticism. It is conspicuously attained, to illustrate our meaning, in Mr. Saintsbury's wonderful "Handbook of English Literature," a book which, we should guess, has sent more students of English to the pages of authors previously unknown to them than any other half-dozen similar compilations. That is because Mr. Saintsbury's critical trunks are invariably packed to the brim with knowledge: indeed you will generally find every little interstice stuffed with parenthetical addenda! In unpacking Mr. Vincent on the contrary we sometimes light upon valuable space filled, as it were, with crumpled newspaper, which may or may not conceal something worth having. Take these passages for instance from the commentary on Fenimore Cooper's European Romances:

That the story [The Bravo] contains anachronisms admits of no doubt. It may be that the arraignment of the oligarchy is too unrelieved. On the other hand the virtues of the narrative are many.

That one does not sit down to a table spread with an intellectual feast like that served in the Monastery or The Abbot, is no reason for disdaining the fare served in The Heidenmauer.

Or again:

None of these three romances [The Bravo, The Heidenmauer, and The Headsman] is, strictly speaking, a novel of purpose, and (sic) the least attractive deserves friendlier critical treatment than is commonly accorded to it.

Sentences such as these in short essays where there is so much to be said contribute, no doubt, to a certain sense of prevalent colourlessness as the procession of authors passes by. There are but few quotations. Each "master" carries a list of all the books he ever wrote, but he is not often allowed to open one of his own books himself, unless, indeed, he is a poet, and even then Mr. Vincent sometimes proves a little wilful in the selection of passages. On the whole he is least happy with the poets. Of Longfellow's "ethical lesson" he says: "There is no need of impatience. Longfellow does not invariably preach. Besides all tastes must be taken into account. Many prefer the ethical lesson, unmistakably put." (The italics are ours. Many prefer the worst written hymns in the hymn-book to Shakespeare's sonnets.) On the other hand, the historians are invariably well treated, the essays on Prescott and Bancroft in particular forming capital little introductions to American and Spanish-American history.

PLUCKING THE GOOSE

Principles and Methods of Taxation. By G. ARMITAGE-SMITH, M.A., Principal of the Birkbeck College. (Murray, 4s.)

MR. ARMITAGE-SMITH has produced an admirable book upon a difficult and admittedly unattractive subject. His conclusions are plainly attained and incisively stated, and he is to be congratulated upon the moment of publication, which is peculiarly opportune. Within the past few weeks a political party confessedly pledged to Socialism of the crudest sort has taken definite shape among us as a force which, for a time at least, will exercise its influence upon Imperial taxation; and in the early part of 1907, municipal elections will take place, in which, for the first time, we may expect to see a real trial of strength between combatants where warfare is determined solely by the question of public expenditure in local affairs.

In Colbert's view the art and science of taxation consisted in "so plucking the goose as to obtain the greatest amount of feathers with the least possible squealing," but, as we are reminded throughout Mr. Armitage-Smith's book, it behoves the student of taxation to fasten his gaze primarily and constantly upon expenditure—and here his test must surely be efficiency.

Such service as the State can supply more efficiently than the individual is all that the State should undertake, since "the invigorating stimulus of competition and personal interest is essential for progress"; but we must, in deciding upon any extension of the functions of Government, also balance the increased efficiency against the effect of increased taxation upon the community, for over-taxation must inevitably sap the economic forces of the nation. Our Socialist friend will, we fear, ignore the one, the municipalising enthusiast will dismiss the other of these considerations, each of them inseparable from the true study of the science of Government, whose main duty is to find revenue whether for defence, for education or for social reform.

Great Britain to-day needs for national purposes some one hundred and forty millions per annum, to meet which our Government provides a revenue 84 per cent. of which is raised by taxation. Side by side with this Imperial charge our local rates are being annually absorbed at a slightly lower figure—one hundred and thirty millions. How these huge sums are raised and the effect of the means employed for raising them, are questions which are fully answered in Mr. Smith's treatise. It is, however, interesting to observe that in his view fairness to all classes is the main characteristic of our present system of raising revenue. We have the principle of graduation at work in death duties and income tax—to the latter the contribution of the spending classes is large—while the existence of indirect taxes—imposed for revenue—allows of recourse being had to the poorer classes, who would otherwise contribute little or nothing.

Fresh sources of taxation are, of course, the daily search of Chancellors of the Exchequer, and if the need for them be not of immediate urgency the revelation of them would be regarded as a pleasant discovery, save by the newly taxed; but to those who are full of expedients for taxing the obnoxious rich, Mr. Smith has some pregnant advice. He reminds them that wealth is being constantly consumed and recreated, and that by an excessive burden of taxation we "impair the motives for its reproduction," we "check production and entail widespread poverty."

The author has small mercy for the Fiscal Reformer who proclaims his ability to procure revenue and provide protection for industry by a single system. "The two aims," we read, "are incompatible: in so far as a tax protects it yields no revenue, and in so far as it yields revenue it does not protect the industry."

So long as societies and conditions are liable to change, neither absolute equity nor perfect economic working can be assured, and for the present we can perhaps put the matter no better than Colbert—but it is as well to keep our ears open for the squeal or the growl which we can always faintly hear and to endeavour in the days of peace not to multiply our claims for feathers.

An interesting contribution to the history of British taxation was made by Lord St. Aldwyn when, in a Budget speech some ten years ago, he drew attention to the tendency exhibited by the classes in power to shift the burden of taxation from their own to other shoulders. The contrast between 1841 and 1895 is most instructive in this respect. The Government of this country in the former year was oligarchical in fact, and out of every sovereign then raised by taxation nearly fifteen shillings was paid by the consuming classes and little more than five shillings was contributed by the propertied classes. To-day the burden is borne in almost equal proportions—a change undoubtedly effected by the transference of political power to the working, wage-earning section of the community.

Incidentally we should mention that the historical survey of British taxation contained in Mr. Armitage-Smith's treatise is excellent, and we heartily commend this part of it, and indeed the whole book, to every man who desires to obtain an intelligent view of a question that concerns most closely the well-being of a progressive and a thriving community.

Ordered opinion upon a subject so important is a valuable possession, the power to assert it an incalculable influence for good; and this modest volume of less than two hundred pages will, we are convinced, enable every reader to command the one and stimulate him to exercise the other.

FOR HEARTH AND HOME

The Family. By HELEN BOSANQUET. (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.)

MRS. BOSANQUET'S book may be described as a garden without a gateway. There is no index of any sort; and the Table of Contents gives no detailed analysis of what is within, but only the bare headings of the two parts and the fifteen chapters. The one entry is to climb through the fence; but this once done our pains are rewarded. For the great thesis we find upheld is the permanent importance of the family for sane human life. No doubt this brings the author into immediate conflict with the bulk of the socialist school, who, backed by rather belated anthropology, attribute to the family a very low ancestry, allow it only a transitory importance, and await its dissolution as a consequence of our industrial transformation. It is indeed a characteristic of socialists to reap for their profit the harvest of wild oats sown by sciences in their unregenerate days; and just as Ricardo and Mill, to the embarrassment of their economic successors, have provided grist for the socialist mill, so Bachofen, Herbert Spencer and Morgan have been equally beneficent purveyors. They taught the nightmare doctrine that mankind all passed through a stage of primitive bestial promiscuity, out of which the family somehow evolved, leaving as survivals of the former condition the worst customs of the most degraded savages of modern times. Then the family, having become an economic necessity, was fortunately propped up through many ages by divers superstitions, notably the worship of ancestors, till the time has come when, its economic functions having been removed by the new methods of production, and its religious props removed by the dissipation of superstition, its old form can be dissolved, and marriage can be transformed into the free union of two independent units stripped of economic or religious swaddling-clothes.

★

This doctrine of the family is tripartite: it gives a theory of origins, it proclaims the supersession of the economic functions, and it eliminates the religious element. It is thus an anthropological, a sociological, a theological doctrine; and our current socialist literature is full of it. Mrs. Bosanquet, in all but the last point, has shaken herself free from its domination. She wisely follows on the anthropological question of origins Dr. G. E. Howard's work on "Matrimonial Institutions," Dr. E. Westermarck's "History of Human Marriage," and Professor Ernst Grosse's "Die Formen der Familie." Under such guidance she reduces the "matriarchal" myth to its proper dimensions, and reaches securely the following conclusion:

One of the earliest ways which man devised of expressing his superior wealth or strength was to appropriate, by means of purchase or conquest, more wives than his neighbours. But throughout all changes one husband and one wife has been the constant type, all other forms mere aberrations . . . throughout all changes, again, the characteristic feature has persisted that father, mother and children have formed one group, of which the father has been the head in the sense not only of being the master, but also of being responsible for its protection and maintenance. P. 39.

Here, as elsewhere, Mrs. Bosanquet shows she understands how the great function of the historian is to separate constants from variables. No wonder, then, she is in no way misled by the "economic interpretation of history," which makes man's whole course, social and moral, through the centuries, depend on his material conditions: man ist was er isst—man is what he eats. It is charmingly simple, only it suffers from a defect once claimed as a merit of political economy, "it is independent of facts." And thus, as facts occupy the bench in our Court of Intellectual Appeal, the theory must be dismissed with costs, and we must accept our author's tamer though truer conclusion:

We find that the family in its ultimate form persists through all economic conditions without exception. So far, therefore, there is no justification for the view that, being dependent upon certain economic conditions, it will disappear if those particular conditions disappear. . . . It would seem to be quite as descriptive of the facts to say that the family, by the form it takes, creates its own economic conditions, as that its form depends upon economic conditions. P. 67.

Exactly. Mrs. Bosanquet sees the habitual interweaving of cause and effect, the complications of real life, and the folly of extremists. Take for example her interesting juxtaposition (in ch. vi.) of an extract from Adam Smith on large estates with another just a century later from Froude's "Uses of a Landed Gentry," and her impartial comments on their contradictory judgments; or, again, her temperate criticisms on the "pseudo-domestic" school that would reduce the rôle of woman to that of an efficient but unintellectual cook-housekeeper (ch. xii.). Our good "suffragettes" are a natural and pardonable reaction against such a school.

Nevertheless, there is a great gap in this volume. Mrs. Bosanquet gives us a rich collection of truths; but they are not the whole truth; and without the whole truth the whole picture of the family becomes distorted. For the term Christian Family is not to be found in these pages; the revolution in the world caused by its introduction is wholly ignored; there is no attempt to describe its precepts, though at least a quarter of the actual human race is subjected to them; there is no attempt to describe the effects of abandoning them, though so grave an issue is involved; and if the effect of religion on the family is not altogether passed by, it is confined to ancestor-worship in the patriarchal family, as though religion were a thing of the past. These are amazing omissions; and amazing that, having got so far as to ask pertinently (p. 25) what will happen in Japan, now that ancestor worship is imperilled, she never pauses to ask what did happen when, in the old Greek and old Roman world, the old beliefs passed away that had kept the family sacred. Or has she forgotten so signal a lapse of family life, the all-pervading immorality, the dismal decline of population, and then the restoration by the austere doctrines and practices of the Christian family? In a word, the whole of classical antiquity, the Greece of Plato and of Polybius, the Rome of Cicero and of Juvenal, and the centuries of Christianity, are all boycotted in this book, and virtually boycotted are the modern analogues of antiquity. In their place we have a fancy portrait of "the typical modern family," for which the fruits of eighteen centuries of Christianity are appropriated, though their root is cut away, while the typical fruits of modern life are repudiated, namely the love of luxury, the triumph of individualism, the passion for independence described so graphically from life in Mrs. Van Vorst's "The Woman Who Toils." They are the American version of the French and English "gospel of comfort," and the common fruit is the sterile family, the antecedent of race-suicide—witness the tell-tale statistics alike of Massachusetts, of central France and of the West Riding. We may admire the bushido of the Japanese: we cannot attain to it without centuries of self-subordination in ancestor-worshipping families. We may admire the spirit of the Christian family: we cannot attain to it without years of submission to Christian teaching. Or is the typical factory girl described by Mrs. Van Vorst as "living . . . not to save but to give herself pleasure; not to spare others but to exercise her will in spite of them"—is she to be changed into a good wife and mother by mere phrases such as "higher influences," "true spiritual forces," or even Dr. Howard's "higher altruism" his proffered cure for the American divorce plague? If we want back a solid family life, we must pay the price. We must replace religion as an integral part of the family, or the latter will be maimed and imperfect; we must return to the integral family of historical mankind.

If indeed the gap in Mrs. Bosanquet's presentment of the family be once filled up, then the rest will be seen in right focus, and we can profit by her emphasis on the family as the principal motive for work:

. . . the majority of mankind are saved from mental and physical stagnation by the claims of their children . . . "They must hinder your work very much," I said the other day to a mother busy about the kitchen with a two-year-old clinging to her skirt. "I'd never get through my work without them," was the instant rejoinder. Pp. 312, 313.

And let us apply, not to "the modern family" but to the integral family, whether ancient or modern, Mrs. Bosanquet's inspiring words:

It is the great storehouse in which the hardly earned treasures of the past, the inheritance of spirit and character from our ancestors, are guarded and preserved for our descendants. And it is the great discipline through which each generation learns anew the lesson of citizenship that no man can live for himself alone. P. 342.

C. S. DEVAS.

THE ACADEMY

DECEMBER 8, 1906

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

LORD ACTON.

LECTURES ON MODERN HISTORY.

Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

AT THE BACK OF THE BLACK MAN'S MIND;

Or, Notes on the Kingly Office in West Africa. By R. E. DENNETT. With Illustrations, 8vo, 10s. net.

THE LOWER NIGER AND ITS TRIBES.

By Major ARTHUR GLYN LEONARD. With a Map. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN BERKSHIRE.

By JAMES E. VINCENT. With Illustrations by F. L. GRIGGS. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"In 400 pages of hearty, candid, and characteristically English gossip Mr. Vincent has laid every secret bare that the native cares to recall or the stranger cares to know."

UNTRAVELLED ENGLAND.

By JAMES JOHN HISSEY. With 24 Full-page Illustrations, 8vo, 16s.

THE FAIR HILLS OF IRELAND.

By STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P. With about 40 Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, 4 of which are Reproduced in Colour. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Within the covers of this charming book, wherein author and artist show a rare unanimity of purpose, a great store of myth and record is amassed."

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Written and Illustrated by CLIFTON JOHNSON. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

CORRESPONDENCE OF WILLIAM PITT

When Secretary with Colonial Governors, Military and Naval Commissioners in America. Edited by GERTRUDE S. KIMBALL. In 2 vols., medium 8vo, 25s. net.

VILLAGE SERMONS.

By BISHOP WESTCOTT. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A LAYMAN'S MIND ON CREED AND CHURCH.

By JOHN STEWART TEMPLETON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

PUCK OF POOK'S HILL

Illustrated,
6s.

BY

RUDYARD KIPLING.

THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN.

With an Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. In 3 vols. Illustrated. 8vo, 31s 6d. net.

* * EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 100 copies, £3 3s. net.

COSTUME:

Fanciful, Historical, and Theatrical.

Compiled by Mrs. ARIA.

With 16 Coloured Plates, and many other Illustrations in the Text, by PERCY ANDERSON. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY COLOUR-PRINTS.

An Essay on Certain Stipple Engravers and their Work in Colour. By JULIA FRANKAU. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Rt. Hon. GEORGE WYNDHAM, M.P.

RONSARD & LA PLEIADE.

With Selections from their Poetry and some Translations in the Original Metres. By GEORGE WYNDHAM. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

MEMORIES AND THOUGHTS.

Men—Books—Cities—Art. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Vol.

THE MEANING OF HISTORY,

And other Historical Pieces. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Cheaper Re-issue. Globe 8vo, 4s. net. [Next week.]

CRANFORD SERIES.—New vol.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE.

By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, 16 of which are reproduced in colour. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE POCKET "HARDY."

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each; or limp leather, 3s. 6d. net each.

TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES.
FAR FROM THE MADDING CROWD.
THE MAYOR OF CASTERBRIDGE.
JUDE THE OBSCURE.

THE RETURN OF THE NATIVE.
A PAIR OF BLUE EYES.
TWO ON A TOWER.

December 14.

JASPER.

A Story for Children. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. With Illustrations by GERTRUDE D. HAMMOND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

GIRL'S REALM.—"An admirable story, admirably told."

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE POST FREE.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Digitized by Google

THE Best Books for Christmas Presents

SOME REMINISCENCES. By WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI.

2 vols., 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, £2 2s. [Prospectus on application.]
 "An autobiographic volume of great interest to all concerned in the literary and art history of the whole of the Victorian era. . . . Mr. Rossetti is not only himself a poet and a critic of considerable distinction, but he is a member of a family each member of which is known to fame, and a family which for many years was one of the chief centres of interest in the twin worlds of art and letters."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

EVE AND THE WOOD GOD.

By HELEN MAXWELL. 6s.
 A new novel by the author of that successful book "A Daughter of Thor."

THE GAIETY OF FATMA.

By KATHLEEN WATSON. 6s. [Second Large Edition Now Ready.]
 "Fatma, radiant and loving, half-Arab, half-French, is like a fairy come to earth."—TIMES.

THE VOYAGE OF THE ARROW.

By T. JENKINS HAINS. 6s.
 "The thing is so compactly told that it is impossible to miss a line of it, and in its way it stirs the pulse like a close ride to hounds or a stiff finish to a well-fought race."—STANDARD.

THE SUNSET TRAIL.

By A. H. LEWIS, Author of "The President" and "Wolfville Days." Illustrated. 6s.
 "The smell of the open air haunts every page. One could hardly say more for such a volume than that it is worthy of comparison with Bret Harte at his best, and that can be said without hesitation."—DAILY EXPRESS.

MOONS AND WINDS OF ARABY.

By ROMA WHITE. 5s. Amusing Sketches of Official Life in Egypt.

HAWTHORNE'S ROMANCES.

14 vols. Each volume with Frontispiece. Cloth, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net; Lambskin, 2s. 6d. net. Also bound in 7 volumes, half calf, gilt top, £2 10s. net.
 "A daintier edition of the New England romance writer it would be difficult to hope for."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

NEW EDITIONS.

HINTS TO YOUNG AUTHORS.

By E. H. LACON WATSON. 2s. net.
 "Contains a great deal of advice to the beginner. It tells him how to approach editors and how to deal with books for review; it contains notes on the writing of leaders, poetry, and novels; it discusses the merits and demerits of literary agents, and a hundred other subjects concisely and in a thoroughly practical spirit, and we have no hesitation in commending its purchase to the budding author."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER.

By E. H. LACON WATSON. Limp leather, gilt edges, 4s 6d. net; cloth, 3s. 6d.
 "Mr. Lacon Watson is in his happiest mood in this volume of domestic essays. No one since the great Elia has so caught the spirit of the essay, humorous, semi-melancholy, quite fanciful, as Mr. Watson."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

CHRISTOPHER DEANE.

By E. H. LACON WATSON. A New and Cheaper Edition of this Story of Winchester and Cambridge. With Frontispiece, 3s. 6d.
 "The sketch of Winchester College in this book remains one of the best impressions of public school life that we have."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.
 "A review of 'Christopher Deane' must necessarily harp upon the two notes 'charming' and 'wholesome,' because there is no part of this straightforward story of how two manly boys grew up to be Englishmen of the best public school and university type which does not deserve one or both of these adjectives."—WEEK'S SURVEY.

THREE LITTLE GARDENERS.

By L. AGNES TALBOT. 2s. 6d. net.
 "An exceedingly pretty little book upon gardening for young children."—GUARDIAN

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., LTD., 78 New Bond Street, W.

Elliot Stock's New Books

In crown 4to, tastefully printed and appropriately bound, and fully illustrated, price £1 10s. net.
 THE FIFTH VOLUME OF "THE HISTORY OF WEXFORD."

HISTORY OF THE TOWN AND COUNTY

of WEXFORD. From the Earliest Times to the Rebellion of 1798. With a Chapter on the Village of Taghmon. Being the fifth instalment of the History of County Wexford, now in progress. Compiled from Ancient Records, the State Papers, and many hitherto Unpublished Documents. Edited by PHILIP HERBERT HORE, late of Pole Hore, County Wexford; Member of the Royal Irish Academy, Member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland, etc.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d.

THE LAW CONCERNING NAMES AND CHANGES OF NAME.

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, and P. W. P. CARLYON-BRITTON, F.S.A.

In foolscap 8vo, appropriately bound in cloth, with special design, price 3s. 6d.

L'ENTENTE CORDIALE AUTOGRAPH

ALBUM. Compiled by ELLA OSWALD. In these days, when a spirit of friendliness prevails between the two nations whose shores are divided but by a narrow strip of sea, the compiler of this little book has thought it a fitting opportunity to bring together, side by side, a number of brief passages from the leading authors of both nations, that shall be descriptive of human life and character.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

HOLMWOD PRIDE. Who Had the Best of It?

By ADA HEATH.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, 6s.

MY NEIGHBOUR. A Tale of Our Own Times.

By E. G. STEVENSON.

"My Neighbour" is a tale of our own times, not a sensational novel! It is, as its title implies, a "Tale" of human interest, setting forth the real sorrows and joys of real people, whose doings and feelings are of interest.

SECOND EDITION. In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 6s.

HASTY FRUIT. By HELEN WALLACE, Author of

"The Greatest of These," "Lotus or Laurel?" etc.

"An unusually good book, carefully and restrainedly written."—GUARDIAN.

"A tale of merit, with fine character, and good but not insistent moral tone."—TIMES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 5s.

AMOR VERITATIS: or Love of the Truth.

The Baronet's Story. By M. PENNELL.

"The author has gained two elements of interest for the book: a pleasing love-romance and an 'exposure' of Romish methods and purposes."—DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

NOW READY. 1907 EDITION.

ALL NEW HONOURS AND PARLIAMENTARY CHANGES INCLUDED.

OLDEST PEERAGE VOLUME EXTANT. PUBLISHED IN THREE CENTURIES.

A very mine of information (including Addresses) regarding all living Titled Persons, and the Members of the Collateral Branches of all Peers and Baronets, Bishops, Privy Councillors, Knights and Companions of the various Orders, Precedency, Formal Modes of Address, etc. etc.

DEBRETTS

PEERAGE (with Index to Courtesy Titles), BARONETAGE (with Index), KNIGHTAGE and COMPANIONAGE

Illustrated. Accurate and Up-to-Date.

Also an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

2400 pages, cloth gilt (Royal Edition) 31s. 6d. net; or in two vols., 16s. 6d. net each. Limp morocco (Special Thin Paper Edition, half-weight and thickness of Royal Edition), 50s. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160 FLEET STREET, E.C.

From Mr. GEORGE ALLEN'S LIST

JUST OUT.

THE LIFE, LETTERS, AND WORK OF FREDERIC LEIGHTON

By Mrs. RUSSELL BARRINGTON.

With 154 Reproductions from Drawings and Paintings by LORD LEIGHTON. Including 18 in Colour and 18 in Photogravure.

Two vols., 750 pp., royal 8vo., cloth, gilt top. £2 2s. net.

This important Biography includes the Diaries and Letters written by Leighton, covering a period of fifty years. Among other letters are several from GEORGE ELIOT, RUSKIN, Mr. and Mrs. BROWN-ING, HENRY GREVILLE, Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE, RICHARD DOYLE, GAMBIER PARRY, ROBERT FLEURY, EDWARD STEINLE, and others, many of whom (such as Sir W. B. RICHMOND, BRITON RITTIERE, ALFRED EAST, WALTER CRANE, and Sir W. THISELTON DYER) have also contributed their reminiscences of the great Artist specially for this work.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE'S LETTER-BAG

Edited by G. SOMES LAYARD.

With recollections of the Artist by Miss ELIZABETH CROFT, and letters from PEEL, WELLINGTON, SCOTT, COWPER, THOMAS CAMPBELL, and others.

With 22 Portraits and Illustrations in Photogravure and Half-tone. 320 pages, demy 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 15s. net.

OLIVES

THE REMINISCENCES OF A PRESIDENT

By Sir WYKE BAYLISS.

With an Appreciation by FREDERICK WEDMORE and 20 Reproductions of Drawings by the Author, including 4 in Colour, and 2 Portraits. 400 pages, demy 8vo., cloth, gilt top, 15s. net.

Books, Pictures, Architecture, and Art Criticism are the chief subjects dealt with; but there are also personal reminiscences and charming anecdotes of leading men in the art world—Millais, Leighton, Watts, and Whistler.

LORD ACTON AND HIS CIRCLE

Correspondence containing Criticism on Literature, History and Theology.

Edited, with Introduction, by ABBOT GASQUET, O.S.B., and Portrait. 464 pages, demy 8vo., cloth, 15s. net.

G. F. WATTS.

Reminiscences by Mrs. RUSSELL BARRINGTON.

With 5 Full-page Illustrations in Colour, 4 Photogravure Portraits, and 27 other Illustrations from hitherto unpublished Drawings, mostly by G. F. WATTS, and 3 Facsimiles of Handwriting.

Royal 8vo., cloth, gilt top, with Design on Cover by WATTS, 21s. net. [Third Edition.]

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Pott 4to, half-cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net each.

MY DOG

With 6 full-page Illustrations in Colour by G. VERNON STOKES.

OLD-FASHIONED FLOWERS

Including "News of Spring," "Field Flowers," and "Chrysanthemums."

With 6 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by G. S. ELGOOD.

JOYZELLE : A Drama in Five Acts.

Crown 8vo., half-cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON : GEORGE ALLEN, 156 CHARING CROSS ROAD.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER

20 vols. Crown 8vo.

Vol. I. Natural Religion: the Gifford Lectures, 1888. 5s.

Vol. II. Physical Religion: the Gifford Lectures, 1890. 5s.

Vol. III. Anthropological Religion: the Gifford Lectures, 1891. 5s.

Vol. IV. Theosophy; or, Psychological Religion: the Gifford Lectures, 1892. 5s.

Chips from a German Workshop. 4 vols.

Vol. V. Recent Essays and Addresses. 5s.

Vol. VI. Biographical Essays. 5s.

Vol. VII. Essays on Language and Literature. 5s.

Vol. VIII. Essays on Mythology and Folklore. 5s.

Vol. IX. The Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India: the Hibbert Lectures, 1878. 5s.

Vol. X. Biographies of Words and the Home of the Aryas. 5s.

Vols. XI, XII. The Science of Language: Founded on Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in 1861 and 1863. 2 vols. 5s. each.

Vol. XIII. India: What can it Teach Us? 5s.

Vol. XIV. Introduction to the Science of Religion. Four Lectures, 1870. 5s.

Vol. XV. Ramakrishna: his Life and Sayings. 5s.

Vol. XVI. Three Lectures on the Vedanta Philosophy, 1894. 5s.

Vol. XVII. Last Essays. First Series. Essays on Language, Folklore, etc. 5s.

Vol. XVIII. Last Essays. Second Series. Essays on the Science of Religion. 5s.

Vol. XIX. The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy. 7s. 6d. net.

Vol. XX. The Silesian Horseherd ("Das Pferdurbur") : Questions of the Hour Answered. 5s.

LONGMANS, GREEN AND CO.,
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

ETHICS AND ATONEMENT

By W. F. LOFTHOUSE. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"A book that will count in all future study of the Atonement. To read it has been a delight."—METHODIST TIMES.

"The treatment is specially fresh and stimulating."—GLASGOW HERALD.

"Mr. Lofthouse treats his theme with the breadth and mastery of one who has read widely and thought deeply."—OXFORD CHRONICLE.

METHUEN & CO., 36 ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Readers of the "Academy" are invited to send for a copy of the December "Book-Buyer" before purchasing their Christmas gift-books. Post free on application. Address: "A. B. B." c/o T. Fisher Unwin, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London

Smith, Elder & Co.'s Books for Presents.

NEW VOLUME BY MRS. C. W. EARLE.

JUST PUBLISHED. Small Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

LETTERS TO YOUNG AND OLD.

By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, Author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden."

THE BOOK OF GILLY: FOUR MONTHS OUT OF A LIFE.

By EMILY LAWLESS, Hon. Litt.D. With Illustrations by L. LESLIE BROOKE, Pott 4to, gilt top, 6s. 6d. net.

THE HOUSE OF THE LUCK.

By MARY J. H. SKRINE. With Illustrations by her Daughter, MARGARET S. SKRINE. Pott 4to, gilt top, 6s. net.

THE FRIENDS OF VOLTAIRE.

By S. G. TALLENTYRE, Author of "The Life of Voltaire," etc. With Portraits. Small demy 8vo, 9s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF AN EASTERN CAPITAL.

By F. B. BRADLEY-BIRT, B.A., F.R.G.S., I.O.S.

With 30 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

* A new book on Eastern Bengal, especially interesting in view of the much-discussed "partition" and the formation of the new Province.

THE GREAT DAYS OF VERSAILLES.

STUDIES FROM COURT LIFE IN THE LATER YEARS OF LOUIS XIV.

By G. F. BRADBY.

With Illustrations, small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

TRIBUNE—"Crowded with interesting facts, and written with much vivacity and descriptive skill."

RICHARD III: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER REVIEWED IN THE LIGHT OF RECENT RESEARCH.

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S.

With a Portrait of Richard III. and a Map. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. PALL MALL GAZETTE—"Sir Clements Markham's brilliant and exhaustive vindication of the last of the Plantagenets."

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE NETHERLANDS.

By J. ELLIS BARKER,

Author of "Modern Germany: her Political and Economic Problems, her Ambitions, and the Causes of her Success," small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. SCOTSMAN—"Has every claim to occupy a prominent place among English histories of Holland."

PROVINCIAL LETTERS and other Papers.

By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CATHERINE OF CALAIS.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE FUTURE OF RUSSIA.

Translated from the German of Government-Councillor RUDOLF MARTIN by Miss HULDA FRIEDERICH.

Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [December 11.

SIR NIGEL Second Impression.

6s. By A. CONAN DOYLE. 6s.

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "Its author has done nothing better or more stirring than this splendid narrative. . . . The book is not only the work of a brilliant romancer, but of a stout-hearted patriot."

In 1 vol. of 1464 pp., royal 8vo, 25s. net in cloth; or 32s. net in half morocco.

The Dictionary of National Biography Index and Epitome.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

ATHENÆUM—"We can conceive no volume of reference more indispensable to the scholar, the literary man, the historian, and the journalist."

* Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send an ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of their BOOKS SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS post free on application.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

NELSON'S NEWEST GIFT BOOKS

Messrs Nelson's Gift Books are the work of the BEST WRITERS OF THE DAY. They are beautifully produced and are illustrated by the LEADING ARTISTS. In nearly all their New Books the pictures are in COLOURS, which add to their attractiveness at no increase in cost.

A CAPITAL GIFT BOOK FOR BOYS.

HOW IT WORKS

By ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS

Profusely Illustrated. Cloth. Price 3s. 6d.

Just the book for boys, or for the boy who wants to know how it is done, the boy who breaks open his toys to find out how they work, or the genius who cuts open the bellows to find out where the wind comes from. Here a boy will have a never-failing fund of interest, from the working of his watch to the principles of wireless telegraphy.

THE DUFFER. By R. S. WARREN-BELL. With Six Coloured Illustrations. At 5s.

THE DEFENCE OF THE ROCK. By EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN. With Six Coloured Illustrations.

A CAPTIVE OF THE CORSAIRS. By JOHN FINNEMORE. With Six Coloured Illustrations.

FIRELOCK AND STEEL. By HAROLD AVERY. With Six Coloured Illustrations.

PLAY THE GAME. By HAROLD AVERY. With Four Coloured Illustrations. At 3s. 6d.

A GIRL OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By ELIZA POLLARD. With Four Coloured Illustrations.

A SEA QUEEN'S SAILING. By C. W. WHISTLER. With Four Coloured Illustrations.

THE FEN ROBBERS. By TOM BEVAN. With Two Coloured Illustrations. At 2s. 6d.

A HEROINE OF FRANCE. By EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN. With Two Coloured Illustrations.

DONALD. By E. L. HAVERFIELD. With Two Coloured Illustrations.

DORIS HAMLYN. By R. O. CHESTER. With Two Coloured Illustrations. At 2s.

THE ROSKERRY TREASURE. By Mrs. HENRY CLARKE. With Two Coloured Illustrations. At 1s.

THE MAGIC BEADS. By HAROLD AVERY. With Two Coloured Illustrations.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURY FOR 1907. Coloured Boards.

NELSON'S NEW CENTURY LIBRARY

Large Type. India Paper. 1000 pages = $\frac{1}{2}$ inch.

SHAKESPEARE

Complete in Six Beautiful Handy Volumes for the Pocket.

For beauty and clearness of bold, readable type, neatness of binding, and handiness of size the NEW CENTURY SHAKESPEARE VOLUMES STAND UNRIVALLED.

Cloth, 2s. Leather limp, 2s. 6d. Leather Boards, 3s. each vol. net.

* Complete coloured Prospectus post free on application.

On sale at all Booksellers' throughout the country.

T. NELSON & SONS, 35 and 36 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.; Edinburgh, Dublin, and New York.

SAYINGS OF CHILDREN—III

"THE DIVERTING HISTORY OF JOHN GILPIN" (CONSTABLE)

THERE are certain gestures we associate with the Opera and consider as absurdly untrue. Yet these attitudes, over emphasised as they are upon the stage, have their origin in reality. You may see them in the actions of children, slenderly indicated, but recognisably there. Blynken, for instance, will speak to you with flying eyebrow, hands apart and fingers spread, an epitome of explanatory verve. Or, when he comes to the frightening part of his story, he will crouch forward lowering his voice. A child will supplicate with hands held passionately together, never thinking of the attitude it adopts. And it will shrink, seeking to hide its face against its shoulder, raised to hide its shame.

These gestures of the stage and nursery, widely dissimilar though they be, have a common origin; just as the thick over-scented pot hyacinth is derived from the bluebell of the woods. It loses its beauty, somehow, on the way.

One day Blynken awoke early and began asking questions. "We'll talk when it's eight o'clock," said his mother. "May I sing?"

So he sings cheerfully on the adjoining pillow for a little, while he thinks his mother sleeps. But how can this be seeing that Blynken when in bed and awake rustles like a rat in a rick. "I think I'll get a pencil and paper and write a little," he whispers as he climbs out of bed. Later in the day his mother finds this writing. It is on a half sheet and is headed Wisdom for Fools:

- (1) Never try to make a frog into a lioness.
- (2) Don't fish for grouse.
- (3) Hunt the slug if you will, but don't lose your cart-ridge.

And finally this arresting axiom innocently misspelt.

- (4) Photograph the devel, but don't often look at it.

Blynken had been wide awake that morning.

There is no context to children's conversation. This explains at once the charm and the fatigue of their companionship. For fatiguing it is. The mere adult mind is whisked about as it might be a well-filled fir-cone among a company of irresponsible squirrels.

"You know Nanny has got an uncle who's a chimney-sweep."

"What's the San Graal?"

"But it's a cup, isn't it? It always frightens me, because I feel, somehow, it's got something to do with the Holy Ghost."

But this is said at bedtime, when Blynken is very sensible of the black Night overhead.

"I don't like those statues." He speaks of some marble busts.

"They can do you no harm."

"I know. But if they were to fall down and break in two suddenly, wouldn't something white fly out, shaped rather like a bird?"

In the morning it is quite different. He pelts into the room, with shining morning face, his eyes dancing jigs at you.

"Mademoiselle asked us some sum. O, some big sum; how much is thirty-four times sixty-two—you know the kind—and we asked the housemaid when Mademoiselle went out of the room to fetch something, and the housemaid told us, and we told her and so then, of course, there was a joyful revolution."

One day he went to tea at the Manse and the minister asked him to say grace. "Not now, if you don't mind. I generally say it at the end."

"Certainly, my dear, if you prefer it so."

"Well, one must stand up for one's religion, you know."

Patter-Foot, at three, began to watch things to some purpose. As the drops splashed large upon the surface of the water: "But look at the rain coming out of the Pond!"

And he has noticed certain similarities in design and effect among Nature's handiwork.

"Why are frogs toads?" he will ask thoughtfully, and "Do you know what nettles are? This'les"—with a bow.

Nod has discovered the hollowness of dreams. "I dreamt Ellen was reading to me and I thought I was outside having a good time, but of course I wasn't. I was inside the book all the time, and going to be cooked with half my clothes on."

"If anybody comes to the house, a carpenter, Moth' or somebody, Nanny gives very up-right orders, you know."

"Isn't it like grandmama to have these large, lovely passages in her house? Not the crouched paths most people have in their home."

"Do you think there are really thousands and millions and trillions of gods, only all really one large God? Like as if we were lots of little white china people with a bit of God inside us, and all these little bits of God making really God?"

"I had such an unhappy dream last night, I dreamt you loved another woman's baby, and better than all of us."

"THE ARABIAN NIGHTS" (BLACKIE).

But sometimes his dreams are radiant, he awakes with the joy of them in his voice.

"I thought we were all of us in the orchard you know, Moth', and suddenly in the green meadows some shining soldiers came striding by. O! they looked so lovely with great wooden spears held against their chests.

"I began by chucking apples at them. After that we got friends, and they told us where they came from and I can remember it now. They said: 'We come from Little-Dark-Hole-Land, but the name of our regiment is Kingdom.'"

Patter-Foot has provided a phrase for those who suffer the tedium of a social world. If detained in a room beyond his inclination he swings on a listless foot; and while the conversation goes on around him, says in a consolatory undertone, "That's the door . . . isn't it . . . that's the door . . ."

Blynken one day helped his cousin to unpack her things.

"And here's your brush and here's your comb, and here's your shoe-horn and here's your button-hook and" . . . (coming upon the methylated spirits in metal flask) "and here's Mister God-knows-who, with little head."

One night the children's mother heard a voice from a pillow not far off. The voice seemed to grow out of the darkness, small yet perfect, an attenuated thread of sound.

"I see a wood with a green path in it."

"What a nice thing to see."

"Yes. But horrid animals. It's jungle." His mother lies still, for a conversation from a cot in the middle of the night generally means something enjoyable; nurses, now, might hear gems, but they always say Sssh.

"Horrid animals . . . Owls galloping towards me, with little stings in them . . ."

"Wolves, coming like pug-dogs, at me . . . Foxes too."

A pause, and gentle breathing, so light that you may hardly hear it. Then the voice comes again.

PUCK OF POOK'S HILL (MACMILLAN)

"How would a cow walk if it's an iron leg? . . ."

"No, but how?"

"Now I see a house with wild animals running into it. God sent a great punishment on those animals. He never sent any little cubs to them at all. Then it rained and it rained and it rained, and never stopped off. And it only stopped off raining at forty years . . . Even God was soaking.

"O! now my dreams are nasty. They've got horrid faces. I don't like them. They keep looking at me. And shall I tell you how they make their mouths? They make their mouths long and narrow.

"I've turned myself into a rattlesnake now."

"But I don't like to have a rattlesnake in bed with me."

"Well, a kind lion then, and a tiger with your name on it.

"We'll go along way, Mummie. I've got a lot of animals. Camels to carry, and an elephant, and a j'affe; 'cos he can do the high things.

"I've got a long rope now, and I'm going up to God. . . . I got my rope, and I went up, but I didn't go high enough and I only found a witch . . ."

"She was horrid, but she couldn't do nothing to me. Only a untrue God made her. She was only a toy."

His mother thinks he is sleeping now, for there is a long pause. But soon that voice is out upon the darkness again.

"I'm sitting beside an earthquake now, a terrible earthquake.

"Do you feel my knee here, Mummie? Well, everything outside my knee is walls, tumbling walls . . ."

"Now I'm going into the wood again and I'm sitting beside the water. And deep down, deep down so lovely you can't think, I see a little—boat—made of—moss—"

The voice trails and ceases. His mother listens, but the silence is prolonged. There is nothing but the quiet breathing of a perfect repose.

PAMELA TENNANT.

"MERRYWINK" (HODDER & STOUGHTON)

A CHILD'S PHILOSOPHY

THE ORANGE
FAIRY BOOK

BY ANDREW LANG
AND ILLUSTRATED BY HENRY FORD

"THE ORANGE FAIRY BOOK"
(LONGMANS)

MOTHER, do you know

I seem

Living always in a dream?

All the world is one big bed

Where we sleep till we are dead.

You and I and all the rest

Sleep near those we love the best.

HENRY NEWBOLT.

Do not wake before me, mother:
Let us wake with one another.

STAR AND SONG

WHITHER do ye ride, O Kings,
Through the starry night and cold,
Bearing gifts of precious things—
Myrrh and frankincense and gold?

We have come from very far,
Following a newborn Star.
King and clown shall follow
Over hill and hollow
Through night the unknown Star.

Shepherds, whither do ye fare,
From the wattled folds of peace?
To what monarch do ye bear
Gifts of flesh and milk and fleece?

"FAIRY GOLD" (DENT)

Merrily we trudge along
Led by sweet, celestial Song.
Clown and king must follow
Over hill and hollow
The flying wings of Song.

Sages wherefor do ye bow—
Ye to whom all things are known?
To what wisdom-circled brow?
Unto what age-built throne?

Through the desert ways and wild
We have sought a little Child,
And with happy hearts adore.
Sage and fool shall bow before
The wisdom of a Child.

Yokels, wherefor do ye kneel
In the byre amid the kine?
Crave ye pledge of lambing-weal
From some shepherd-lord divine?

Gilguerillo falls in love with Princess Diamantina

"THE ORANGE FAIRY BOOK" (LONGMANS)

Naught we crave from gods above;
Only in the house of Love,
We with happy hearts adore.
Fool and sage shall bow before
The birth of heavenly Love.

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

THE MANGER

TO-MORROW will be the Birthday
Of Jesus the Undeiled,
And the holiday and the mirth day
Of many a happy child.

For He comes, the heavenly Stranger
To a world that is sin-bested
And the children's hearts are the manger
Where the Saviour will lay His head.

DOROTHY FRANCES GURNEY.

A DANCING SONG

O HIDE your passion from the moon,
When young and slender she appears
In shining gown and silver shoon . . .
And, all her path with stars impearled,
She dances round the darkened world.

O hide your sorrows from the sun . . .
The sun should never see your tears!
Weep, if you will, when day is done . . .
But laugh and sing and clap your hands
While yet the sun in heaven stands.

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

THE DEFERRED HOPE

CHILDHOOD and youth and prime are gone, and soon
The chilly arms of age will hold me fast.
At dawn grew mists were rising, and at noon
The heavens with sombre clouds were overcast.

I thought to see the Sun before he set,
But dusk is deep'ning now, and still the sky
Is hid; the leaden vapours linger yet.
Oh! let me see a star before I die!

FREDERICK BROUGH.

"UNCLE REMUS" (NELSON)

OTHER PEOPLE'S CHILDREN

BY A SPINSTER

As a spinster, I have confined my observations necessarily to the children of others; and, though I know that I have the sincere if silent pity of most of the mothers of my acquaintance, I humbly submit that my melancholy state has its compensations. I know that the mother (I allude of course to the right kind of mother) occupies a unique and ideal position in her children's eyes. To them she is the owner of the most comfortable lap in Christendom; she is "she who understands," or, at any rate, tries to understand (an effort of intelligence deemed unnecessary, by the way, by many of those "grown ups" whose path of life brings them in contact with children); she whose conscientious wielding of the rod of justice is followed by speedy remorseful cuddlings; she who must be obeyed, but may also be wheedled; she who may be approached at all hours of her toilette, and whose jewel-case is open to little poking fingers that itch to "arrange it"; she whose "No teasing, children!" brightens the lot of the persecuted youngest of the family. While her tender encouragement pilots the eldest through heavy years of leggy clumsiness, that bitter period during which the hands dangle, fiery in view, colossal in size, at the ends of inadequate sleeves, and the feet, shamefully emerging in their massive ungainliness from the insufficient skirts and trousers which belong to the transitional stage, seem to have no allotted resting-place, but, while the hands move in restless frenzy from pocket to hip, twine in helpless contortion round the legs of chairs. Then it is that the prejudiced eye of the mother notes each redeeming feature, perceives that the nose, though red, is shapely, and encourages the stumbling wanderer along the stony causeway of the "teens." All this is the mother to her own offspring, but to the children of others what is she? Merely a "grown up," a poor, helpless, unimaginative "grown up." Frequently she belongs to another class as well, that of "visitor," a race which comes and occupies the guest-chamber, thereby making it impossible for the happy impersonator of Robinson Crusoe to live in the spare-room wardrobe, or cruise with Friday on his raft (the spare-room bath). She may be his best friend's mother; but she belongs, for the moment, to a race accursed. It is for her delectation that the hair is placed in curlers o' nights, and combed ruthlessly out again o' mornings; it is to please her eye that the face is rasped with a rough towel, and the victim, encased in clean and prickly muslin, is ushered, shrinking, into the drawing-room after tea. It is to enchant her ear that the embryo musician, with fingers damp with nervousness, falters forth his or her new "piece" upon the piano. This is what, save in a few exceptional cases, the mother is to other people's children, and here is where the spinster has her day. The spinster is still unclassified in the childish mind. "Grown-up" people are mothers and fathers: the spinster is neither; therefore she is not "grown up." At the same time, her skirts are long, she goes down to dinner, and (damning evidence!) she does not like to be clutched by the hair, especially if she wears a hair-net; therefore she is not a child. Herein lies the spinster's chance; it rests with her whether she be ruthlessly relegated to the rank of old maid, or left to wander.

"THE JAPANESE FAIRY BOOK" (CONSTABLE)

unlabelled, in and out of schoolroom and nursery as she chooses. If she be one of those whom the gods love, who indeed die young, be they ninety or a hundred, she will soon break through the barriers of the child's reserve and become the friend and playfellow of other people's children. Sharp-nosed and skinny of form though she be, if her heart be child-like she will be young and foolish once more—in the eyes of other people's children; and if she but own those sacred attributes of the confirmed spinster, a parrot and a cat, she will be doubly dear to their animal-loving souls. The great secret is to meet them on their own level. Do not bend down to them from the dizzy heights of—what? Age? What true spinster would not give all her happiest years to be a child once more, with life before, instead of behind, her? Experience, wisdom? What are they compared to the lightning intuition and clear direct reasoning of the child? Looks? Well, there are plain children, but is there not an infinite number of plain spinsters? And if you may not look down upon the child, by the same token you must not look up to him. Do not sit and worship at his shrine as the æsthetic woman in Punch worships her blue china teapot; do not sing pæans (at least, not in his presence) to his spotless innocence, his unsullied purity. It is very beautiful and it is there, but the child knows nothing about it and the attitude conveys little to him. Meet him on his own ground. It may, if he be an imaginative soul, be a battlefield or a jungle, in which case it is not impossible that you will have to impersonate a Krupp gun or an alligator (there are alligators in the child's jungle, if not in Mr. Kipling's); if he is of the matter-of-fact type you may merely have to bowl for him till you drop, or catch wriggling worms and impale them upon rusty hooks.

"When I was a child I thought as a child, I spake as a

"SAVAGE CHILDHOOD" (BLACK)

"SCOTLAND'S STORY" (JACK)

child, I understood as a child," and to be the friend of children one must be a child once more; for the man who has "put away childish things" there is no hope. Having gained a place in their affections, it is difficult enough to keep it. One slip, one flirt of the cloven hoof of the "grown up" from beneath the pinafore and you lose a position only to be regained by toil and tribulation and much humbling of heart. For there is no scorn so cutting as the scorn of a child and no barrier so impenetrable as the barrier of his reserve. On this account the spinster often finds herself confronted with difficult problems. It has been my melancholy lot to know, having been sworn to secrecy, that a dead mouse lay in state in the governess's bed, just at a point where it would meet the soles of her feet when she retired to rest. I also had the misfortune to like the governess and feel profoundly sorry for her—I confess that my moral cowardice was greater than my feeling for the victim, who was eventually saved at the eleventh hour by an audible giggling behind her bedroom door. This is only one of the many dilemmas in which the child-loving spinster may find herself, for you must have the child's whole confidence or none. Blood-curdling conspiracies will be unfolded to you which you cannot, in honour, divulge; you may have to play traitor to your best friend, engaging her in sprightly conversation about Shakespeare and the musical glasses, while a wet sponge hovers threateningly above her head, or be caught shamelessly secreting sticky dainties about your person at dinner, for the benefit of the Noah's Ark banquet upstairs. They say the child is father to the man. If this be true, when some of my friends grow up, they will be of curiously mixed parentage! One boy of my acquaintance has been a woolly bear, a railway train and a blood-thirsty brigand in one short afternoon, while another imaginative gentleman was Milly, Queen of the Fairies, and, though ostensibly living comfortably at home with his parents, was in reality (for the existence of his imagination was far more vivid to him than his rational life) sharing the Imperial Institute, South Kensington (and the fairy throne) with his sister, Queen Chilly. I admit that these titles sound like would-be-funny inventions, but they are not. They are the genuine products of an imaginative child's brain. What suggested them I do not know, but the game in question was played regularly from the age of seven until the boy went to a public school and came face to face with the "realities" of life. Only once did it pall. His mother had been speaking before him of a poor artist of her acquaintance, and something she said caught the boy's fancy. The crown of Fairyland began to press heavily upon the youthful brow, the Imperial Institute became gloomy in its lonely magnificence, and in five short minutes Queen Milly and Queen Chilly were metamorphosed into a couple of struggling art students, dragging out their poverty-stricken existence in a fireless attic. The change was effected by the pinning of the following notice on the door:

PICTURES PAINTED HERE:
HEAD AND BODY ONE POUND.
HEAD, BODY AND LEGS TWO POUNDS.

This hard life only lasted a few days, however, and before a week was out the two Queens had been triumphantly reinstated on their fairy throne. An ingenious subterfuge was resorted to by two little girls of my acquaintance. They possessed a large and miscellaneous family of dolls, woolley monkeys and china animals, but neither of them could bring herself to play the part of father to the motley collection. They solved the problem by dividing the family into two and each mothering half under the unassuming title of "Mrs.": the argument being that any definite name, such as Mrs. Jones, for instance, would entail the existence of a Mr. Jones, whereas "Mrs." alone did away with the necessity of any such person. I am told that a stand is being made nowadays against the cultivation of the imaginative faculty. It appears that the theory is extant that it interferes with the child's reasoning power. Fairy stories and all tales "out of our heads" are to be put upon the Index, and we are to have "organised play" and pamphlets on the sciences. Though I do not approve of the theory, I am not alarmed. Imagination is a mighty power, and is not to be swept out of existence by any number of hand-book-writing wiseacres. Some imaginative child will read his botany with a difference, and a strange and amusing science it will be when he has finished with it. Fairies will still swing lazily in the petals of the rose and elves play leap-frog among the toad-stools. As to the unimaginative wight, he will read his pamphlets on natural history with the same matter-of-fact precision that he expended on his "Grimm" or "D'Aulnoy." The most imaginative child I know refused for years to say her prayers without blowing loudly and very solemnly on a tin trumpet to attract the attention of her Maker. She said it was ridiculous to suppose that He would notice the petitions of one so small, among so many, unless some sort of warning were given first. Surely there is no want of reasoning power here, and yet the same child had a little (imaginary) sister underneath a chair in the nursery to whom she would talk for hours together.

It is an open question whether the enormous quantity and variety of toys does not tend to sap the child's imagination. I am relieved to see, however, that he still loves his oldest games the best. And it is among the old toys that he will find the spinster, patiently waiting until he should tire of "reality" and come to her to "make believe."

MOLLY THYNNE.

SOME CHILDREN'S BOOKS

OF a total number of some sixty books designed for children in—or just out of—the nursery, sent us for review this season, not one shows very conspicuous merit. We have selected ten for illustration, and the best of them is—need we say?—Mr. Andrew Lang's "Orange Fairy Book" (Longmans, 6s.), illustrated by Mr. H. J. Ford. We have placed it beside its Blue, Red, Green, Yellow, Pink, Grey, Violet, Crimson, and Brown predecessors, that the first small child immured in our house on the first wet day may

Hasten to the shelf where hang
The fairy books of Andrew Lang.

He will not trouble us overmuch with anything save his enthusiasms afterwards.—"Fairy Gold: a Book of Old English Fairy Tales," chosen by Ernest Rhys (Dent, 5s. net), is a delight to handle and to read. The first part contains old favourites, of many of which the editor has found new versions; the second part consists of shorter fables and stories; and the third of fairy tales, and poems from Browning, Elia, Keats, Tom Hood and others. The book is daintily got up and Mr. Herbert Cole's illustrations are excellent. Mr. Ford will have to look to his laurels.—"The Japanese Fairy-Book," com-compiled by Yei Theodora Ozaki (Constable, 3s. 6d. net), was already, we are glad to see, reached a third edition. The tales have been translated from the modern versions by Sadanami Sanjin, but the translator, though retaining quaint Japanese expressions, has added touches of local colour and altered them slightly to suit the taste of Western readers. It is a charming collection of fancies and the illustrations—by a Tokyo artist, Mr. Kakuzo Fujiyama—are in every way worthy of the subjects.—The letterpress of "The Adventures of Merrywink," by Christina Gowans Whyte (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)—which won the £100 prize offered by the Bookman for the best story for children—does not suggest that the competition can have been very keen. The illustrations are unequal, and though some are very feeble, others are exceptionally good.—"Tales of Jock and Jane," by Charles

FINIS!

TALES OF JOCK AND JANE (LANE)

Young (Lane, 3s. 6d.), will be found a capital book for reading aloud to children. It is amusing and the full-page and other illustrations do full justice to the text.—"Uncle Remus," or the Story of the Fox and Brer Rabbit, by Joel Chandler Harris (Nelson, 5s.), will provide plenty of fun for the small children, and relieve the tedium of rainy days. It is illustrated with twelve large coloured plates by Mr. Harry Rountree, and eighty-four illustrations in pen and ink by René Bull, of the humour of which the one we reproduce is sufficient indication.—Even better in many ways are Miss Helen Stratton's illustrations to "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," selected and retold for children by Gladys Davidson, which Messrs. Blackie send us (3s. 6d.).—A new edition of "The Diverting History of John Gilpin," showing how he went further than he intended and came safe home again (Constable, 1s. net), is embellished with thirty quaint wood-cut engravings by Robert Seaver which should win many new admirers for the poem.—"Scotland's Story" (Jack, 7s. 6d. net) is a history of Scotland told in simple language by H. E. Marshall, and illustrated with many handsome coloured pictures by J. R. Skelton, John Hassall, and J. Shaw Compton.—Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Puck of Pook's Hill" (Macmillan, 6s.) was reviewed in the ACADEMY of October 6.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

FREDERICK YORK POWELL. A Life and a Selection from his Letters and Occasional Writings. By OLIVER ELTON. 2 vols. Vol. 1.—Memoir and Letters. Vol. 2.—Writings. With Illustrations, 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

HERMANN VON HELMHOLTZ. By Prof. LEO KOENIGSBERGER. Translated by FRANCIS A. WELBY. With a Preface by LORD KELVIN. With 3 Portraits, royal 8vo, 16s. net.

THE LETTERS OF ERASMUS. By P. S. ALLEN. Vol. I., 1484-1514. Medium 8vo, cloth, 18s. net.

This is the first volume of what is intended to be a complete edition—the first for two centuries—of the correspondence of Erasmus, including, as was his own wish, the prefaces to his numerous works. It contains some three hundred letters written between the end of the year 1484 and the month of July 1514. It is expected that the work will be completed in five or six volumes.

THE EVOLUTION OF CULTURE. and other Essays. By the late Lt.-Gen. A. LANE-FOX PITT-RIVERS, D.C.L., F.R.S., F.S.A. Edited by J. L. MYERS, M.A. With an Introduction by HENRY BALFOUR, M.A. 8vo, cloth, with 21 Plates, 7s. 6d. net.

Oxford Tudor and Stuart Library.

Printed on linen rag paper with the Contemporary Fell types.
Each volume 5s. net

HOWELL'S DEVICES, 1581. With an Introduction by W. A. RALEIGH. Small 4to.

THE DEFENCE OF THE REALME. By Sir HENRY KNYVETT, 1596. Now for the first time printed from a MS. in the Chetham Library, Manchester. With an Introduction by CHARLES HUGHES. Crown 8vo.

PEPYS' MEMOIRS OF THE ROYAL NAVY, 1679-1688. Published in 1690. Now Edited by J. R. TANNER. Crown 8vo.

EVELYN'S SCULPTURA. With the Unpublished Second Part. Printed from the MS. discovered by Professor Church in the Archives of the Royal Society. With a Photogravure of Prince Rupert's mezzotint. Edited by C. F. BELL. Crown 8vo.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN KEATS. Edited, with Introduction and Textual Notes by H. BUXTON FORMAN. With 5 Illustrations, 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Oxford Editions of the Poets.

Crown 8vo, large type, printed on rag-made paper, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. : in leather, from 6s. On Oxford India Paper, cloth, 5s. ; in leather, from 7s. With Portraits.

New Volumes.

GOLDSMITH'S COMPLETE POEMS. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Appendices by AUSTIN DOBSON. With numerous Illustrations.

HOOD'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Edited by WALTER JERROLD.

KEATS' COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Edited by H. BUXTON FORMAN.

* The volumes marked with an asterisk are also procurable in the

New Oxford Editions of Standard Authors (Poetry and Prose).

Each volume contains a Portrait [or other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered on side and back, price 2s. per volume; or in paste grain, price 3s. 6d.

Other New Volumes.

SHERIDAN'S PLAYS. With Introduction by JOSEPH KNIGHT, and numerous Illustrations.

SCOTT'S OLD MORTALITY. With 8 Illustrations.

SEA SONGS. A Collection Edited by CHRISTOPHER STONE. With an Introduction by Admiral Sir CYPRIAN BRIDGE, G.C.B. Fcap 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net.

The World's Classics

95 VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED.

NEW STYLES SUITABLE FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

Full Calf, marbled edges, 5s. 6d. net.

Tree Calf, marbled edges, 5s. 6d. net.

Also, in various other bindings, at 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., and 4s. net.

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS. PROSPECTUSES ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

Messrs. T. & T. CLARK'S LIST

NOW READY, VOLUME I. OF THE NEW

Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels.

Edited by J. HASTINGS, D.D.

To be completed in Two Volumes. Price per vol.:—in Cloth Binding, 21s. net; in Half-Morocco, Gilt Top, 23s. net.

The purpose of this Dictionary is to give an account of everything that relates to CHRIST—His, Person, Life, Work, and Teaching.

"A triumphant and unqualified success. It is a work that will be of constant use to ministers and Bible students. In fact, they will find it indispensable."—BRITISH WEEKLY.

A full Prospectus may be had from all Booksellers, or post free from the Publishers.

The Knowledge of God and its Historical Development. By Prof. H. M. GWATKIN, D.D., Cambridge. Two vols., post 8vo, 12s. net.

The Gospel History and its Transmission. By Prof. F. CRAWFORD BURRITT, M.A., Cambridge. Post 8vo, 6s. net.

Sermons in Accents; or, Studies in the Hebrew Text. A Book for Preachers and Students. By Rev. JOHN ADAMS, B.D. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

The Book of Psalms. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary. By Prof. C. A. BRIGGS, D.D., New York. In two vols. Vol. I. just published. Post 8vo, 10s. 6d. (New Volume, International Critical Commentary.)

The Fourth Gospel. Its Purpose and Theology. By Rev. E. P. SCOTT, B.A. (Oxon). Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Jesus and Nicodemus. A Study in Spiritual Life. By Rev. JOHN REID, M.A. Post 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

A History of the Reformation. By Principal T. M. LINDSAY, D.D. Vol. I. The Reformation in Germany, from its Beginning to the Religious Peace of Augsburg. Post 8vo, 10s. 6d. * Vol. II., dealing with "The Reformation in Lands beyond Germany."

The Authority of Christ. By D. W. FORREST, D.D., Edinburgh. Author of "The Christ of History and of Experience." Second edition, post 8vo, 6s.

A Grammar of New Testament Greek. By JAMES HOPE MOULTON, D.D. Part I. The Prolegomena. Second Edition, 8vo, 8s. net.

The Growth of Christian Faith. By GEORGE FERRIES, D.D. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The New Reformation. Recent Evangelical Movements in the Roman Catholic Church. By Rev. JOHN A. BAIN, M.A. Post 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Christian Theism and a Spiritual Monism: God, Freedom, and Immortality, in View of Monistic Evolution. By Rev. W. J. WALKER, Author of "The Spirit and the Incarnation," "The Cross and the Kingdom." 8vo, 9s.

Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible. Now complete in Five Volumes. Published price per volume, in cloth, 28s.; in dark purple half-morocco, 34s. Sets may also be had in other elegant half-morocco bindings, prices on application.

Full Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, free.

Edinburgh:

T. & T. CLARK, 38 GEORGE STREET.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LTD.

Messrs. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era

By JOHN FYVIE, Author of "Some Famous Women of Wit and Beauty." Demy 8vo, with 8 full-page Portraits in Photogravure, 12s. 6d. net. [Second Impression.]

Edinburgh under Sir Walter Scott

By W. T. FYFE. With an Introduction by ROBERT S. RAIT, Fellow of New College, Oxford. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East

By MONCURE D. CONWAY. Royal 8vo, fully Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.

English Illustration "The Sixties"

By GLEESON WHITE. With 6 Photogravure Plates and over 100 Woodcut Illustrations. Price 12s. 6d. net.

Golden Days of the Renaissance in Rome

By RODOLFO LANCIANI, Author of "New Tales of Old Rome," etc. Royal 8vo, with over 90 Illustrations, 21s. net.

STUDIES IN SEVEN ARTS.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

"With the art of poetry, or of literature in general, I am not here concerned. In this book I have tried to deal with the other arts, as I know or recognise them; and I find seven: painting, sculpture, architecture, music, handicraft, the stage (in which I include pantomime, scenery, costume and lighting), and—separate from these—dancing. Each of these arts I have tried to study from its own point of view . . . and in those contemporary aspects which seem to me most important or most characteristic."—From the Preface.

THE KING OF COURT POETS

A Study of the Life, Work and Times of Lodovico Ariosto. By EDMUND GARDNER, Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

VICTORIAN NOVELISTS

By LEWIS MELVILLE, Author of "The Life of William Makepeace Thackeray." With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF PASTEUR

By RENÉ VALLERY RADOT. Translated by Mrs. R. L. DEVONSHIRE.

New Popular Edition. With Frontispiece Portrait in Photogravure, 7s. 6d. net.

QUINTIN HOGG

A Biography by ETHEL HOGG. With a Preface by the Duke of Argyll. Illustrated. New Popular Edition. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM STUBBS

Bishop of Oxford 1825-1901. From the Letters of William Stubbs. By WILLIAM HOLDEN HUTTON, B.D., Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College, Oxford.

The New "Seton" Book.

ANIMAL HEROES

Being the Histories of a Cat, a Dog, a Pigeon, a Lynx, Two Wolves, and a Reindeer.

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With 200 Illustrations. 6s. net. "I give it as my opinion that as a writer about animals Thompson Seton can't be beaten."—PUNCH.

"This is a delightful book for all who care for animals and animal life, wholly irrespective of age."—OUTLOOK.

"There is no other living writer known to us who has his special faculty of blending healthy sentiment, dry humour, graphic recital of stirring moments, with such a solid foundation of natural history."—FIELD.

A Complete Catalogue of Books published by Archibald Constable & Co. arranged in classes with analytical notes and brief reviews is now ready; also a List of Books issued during the autumn.

Constable's Monthly Book List will be sent regularly, post free, if desired.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., 16 JAMES STREET, HAYMARKET, S.W.

A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

Selected and arranged by KATE M. WARREN, Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Westfield College (University of London). With an Introduction by STOPFORD A. BROOKE, M.A. Demy 8vo, about 1000 pages, 7s. 6d. net.

THE POETRY OF CHAUCER

By ROBERT K. ROOT. Cr. 8vo, with Appendices and Bibliography. 6s. net.

THE SUBCONSCIOUS

A Study in Descriptive Psychology by JOSEPH JASTROW, Professor of Psychology in the University of Wisconsin. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

The NATIVE RACES OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

A Series of Illustrated Ethnographical Handbooks intended to convey accurate information in a popular and readable form. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 6s. net each.

Vol. I., now ready—NATIVES OF AUSTRALIA. By Northcote W. Thomas.

With 32 full-page Illustrations. 272 pp.

RACE PREJUDICE.

By JEAN FINOT. Translated by F. Wade Evans. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

By STEPHEN LEACOCK, B.A., Associate Professor of Political Science McGill University, Montreal. Cr. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE

ENGLISH PATENTS OF MONOPOLY

(Harvard Economic Studies. Vol. I.)

By WILLIAM HYDE PRICE, Ph.D. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

TACITUS & OTHER ROMAN STUDIES

By GASTON BOISSIER, "Author of 'Cicero and His Friends.'" Translated by W. G. HUTCHISON. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

"The study on Tacitus is as able a piece of scholarly writing as we can remember to have read for a long time . . . the book has a historical importance almost as great as its literary merit."—BOOKMAN.

POPULAR 6s. NOVELS.

THE TREASURE OF HEAVEN.

Marie Corelli [Third Edition.]

GROWTH

Graham Travers.

THE EIGHT GUESTS.

Percy White.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE STORY OF A POEM

COLLINS is one of those poets who have won an important position on the strength of a few poems; he is also one of those poets whose various poems appeal very differently to his admirers. He was ignored in his lifetime, smothered with praise after his death, and slowly relegated to an inconspicuous niche where a few votaries bring their modest tapers and a few giants, like Mr. Swinburne, flash their limelight. The tendency is to ignore the fact that Collins was an extremely human poet, and to ascribe his work to spasmodic fits of supernatural and barely sane inspiration. The facts of his life, scattered but illuminating, serve to show Collins, in Gilbert White's words, as "warm in his friendships, visionary in his pursuits:" something of a Bohemian, something of a dandy; a man of lofty principles which he never lost; a man of cheerfulness and wit who called every one a "damned dull fellow who did not think as he would have them." His friends Mr. Ragsdale and Thomas Warton have given the only evidence as to his manner of composition. The former says that he was always writing scraps of poetry and destroying them; the latter wrote that Collins was never tired of altering his epithets, and that his manuscripts bore constant traces of correction and interlineation. We know from his poems that if he took a fancy to an epithet he made little effort to use it in moderation; he borrowed right and left without any attempt to conceal his obligations. Perhaps one of the prettiest problems in textual criticism is the question of the alterations in two odes published in Dodsley's Collection of 1748; some one prepared the Ode on the Death of Colonel Ross and the Ode to Evening for Dodsley; but whether it was Collins himself or another, is a matter for fascinating conjecture. However, this problem must be put aside for the present. In this note—for it is nothing more—I wish to consider the "Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands of Scotland," addressed to Mr. John Home.

The history of the Ode is well known. It was lost for many years; but the two Wartons had seen it when they visited Collins at Chichester 1754, four or five years after it had been written. Dr. Johnson mentioned it in his memoir of the poet, on the authority of Thomas Warton. In 1784 a copy of it was discovered among the papers of a friend of Mr. John Home, and it was read to the Royal Society of Edinburgh by Dr. Carlyle, and subsequently published in the Transactions (1788). It was a prima cura; in fact it was a rough copy which Collins sent to Mr. Home when the latter departed for Scotland after a visit to Thomas Barrow at Winchester, where he had met the poet. The manuscript was in several places corrected; there were gaps in the lines; in one case a whole page was lost containing some twenty-five lines. The text was published with notes on the words which Collins had expunged: the gaps were filled by Dr. Carlyle with more caution than taste, and for the missing fifth stanza and first eight lines of the sixth some verses by Mr. Henry Mackenzie were substituted. Later in the year another version was published in London, the anonymous editor declaring that he had discovered the "perfect copy" of the poem and dedicating it to the two Wartons. It has been generally adopted by later editors "after some hesitation"; but it must be obvious to the meanest intelligence that the thing is a clumsy forgery. I do not propose to knock down imaginary nine-pins: but if anybody still thinks that the silence of the Wartons proves that they regarded the London version as genuine, I would ask him whether the alterations in the text are in the style of Collins; whether, for instance, even Collins would have written "Dancing in mirky night" (l. 92, one of the interpolated lines of the sixth stanza) when, eight lines further down, he was going to write, "At those mirk hours": or, to take the test lines, i.e., those which were left blank in the Edinburgh rough copy, Collins would have inserted:

Lodged in the wintry cave with Fate's fell spear,
To that sad spot where hums the sodgy weed,
There Shakespeare's self, with ev'ry garland crown'd,
Flew to those fairy climes his fancy shoon.
Hence at each sound, imagination glows;
Hence, at each picture, vivid life starts here!
Or, o'er your stretching heaths, by fancy led;
Or, o'er your mountains creep, in awful gloom!"

The words in italics are those which appeared first in the anonymous London edition, to fill the gaps. There are many other reasons, as cogent as these, for agreeing with Mr. Swinburne when, in his memoir of Collins, he speaks of his "magnificent Highland ode, so villainously defaced after his death by the most impudent interpolations on record." In Mr. Barbauld's edition of 1794 the Edinburgh version is printed "for the first time" since its original appearance; and the Colchester edition of 1796 has an entirely new series of insertions, "merely to make the context regular." But later editors have almost without exception reproduced the London version.

What we possess, then, is a rough copy of the ode, perhaps the rough copy. Home and Collins met at Thomas Barrow's house in Winchester for a week or two. It does not matter whether the poet wrote the ode immediately and gave Home the rough copy before he left Winchester or whether, as is more probable, he wrote it some while afterwards (the first stanza implies as much), and hastened to send the ode to Home, although it was unfinished. But it is important to notice that during the following years he polished his work: by 1754 it was in a perfect state, as the Wartons saw it. In the meantime Collins had been very ill; he had been abroad, he had stayed at Bath, at Chichester, in London, at Oxford: he had fought his disease silently and desperately, and when the Wartons saw him in September 1734 he was just rallying from the first serious bout of madness. It is natural to suppose that he spent much of his time at this period in revising his poems, and though we cannot now tell how Langhorne came into possession of revised versions of them, it is clear that the alterations, for instance, in the "Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer" were made by Collins himself. It is interesting to note, by the way, that the odd phrase which occurs twice in the "Ode on the Death of Colonel Ross." Fancy "points the bleeding friend" (line 12), and, in the disputed Dodsley version:

Imperial Honour's awful hand
Shall point his lonely bed . . .

was first used in the 1739 edition of the "Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer," line 120:

Lifts the torn robe and points the bleeding wound.

I believe that Collins revised this epistle during the same period that he was writing the ode to Mr. Home. One of the new lines in the epistle (line 25) was:

With kind concern our pitying eyes o'erflow, and in his "Ode on the Superstition of the Highlands," Collins wrote (line 109):

On him enrag'd, the fiend, in angry mood,
Shall never look with pity's kind concern.

However, there are no important conclusions to be drawn from this assumption.

Collins was not sure of his metre; the first stanza of the Ode contains seventeen lines, the second eighteen; then he settled down to the seventeen-line stanza till he came to the eleventh stanza. Then follow three stanzas of sixteen lines, so arranged that in each case one line is unrhymed. Of course, the variations are due to carelessness: Collins would certainly have reduced each stanza to the seventeen-line model; he may not have noticed the gaps in the last three stanzas; perhaps he left them intentionally as they were, and the futile attempts of subsequent writers to supply adequate lines prove the difficulty which he encountered in the first instance. It is easy to see that Collins would not have written the interpolated lines; but it is not easy to see what on earth he would have written in any of these cases: the sense always runs on naturally just as if the poet had not observed that he was leaving out a line.

The later style of Collins is interesting. Like all poets, he grew chary of double-barrelled epithets, though he still coined such words as "elf-shot arrows," "heart-smit heifer," "fear-shook limbs." Double epithets are less common in the ode to Mr. Home than in the earlier odes: the "hard involving Fate," "sainted growing roof," "deep applauding thunder," "high presuming hopes," are no more found. But epithets in -y are still ubiquitous; "milky store," "creamy bowls," "sheeny gold," "gleamy pageant." And Collins, as he grew older, increased rather than lost his weakness for the commonest epithets of that period, "pensive," "social," "genial," "fairy," etc., which are found on every page of contemporary poems. He was heartily sick of one word, "breathing," which occurs only once in this ode, "breathless corse," in quite a different sense from his usual application of it: it occurs in one form or another at least thirteen times elsewhere in his poems.

Collins fell into one very pretty and seductive trick, that of the negative epithet; the casual reader would be astonished to hear how many adjectives in these poems begin with "un—." He was always fond of them; such words as "uncheated sight," "unboastful Nymph," occur in the earlier poems; but in the Ode to Mr. Home and in the revised lines to Sir Thomas Hanmer they are extremely common. In the former, "unmindful," "untainted," "untutored," "uncouth," "unbodied," "th' unrustling reed," "unblest," "th' unclosing gate," "unbounded," "undreaded," "undoubting." In the latter "unwither'd," "unown'd," in the first ten lines. Many of these epithets are ordinary, but considered altogether they show a great tendency to employ the negative instead of the positive, owing no doubt to the superior euphony of, e.g., "unbounded" compared with "boundless." Other favourite words may be noticed, such as watery, pageant, forceful, magic, chaste, hallowed, shadowy, ruin, cell, seat, fairy, groves. Collins's vocabulary was not very wide, but it was bold and original; and whenever he was pleased with a word, he did not hesitate to make it work hard.

It is easy to see a reason for the choice of particular words, to peep through the keyhole into the workshop, to surprise the poet in a theft, to unmask him as a craftsman. But, as Collins the undergraduate murmured, when Hampton, the translator of Polybius, kicked over his tea-table and scattered bread and butter and china on the floor of the room:

Invenias etiam disjecti membra poetæ.

A close scrutiny of his methods does not destroy but enhance the magic of the poems: a study of the mechanism of the brain leads to wonder, not contempt. And this is exactly the impression which the Ode to Mr. John Home leaves upon us. It is a rough copy of a poem by a man whose other work has been polished indefatigably. All the poetry, the magic, is there; for which reason many critics have singled out the ode as the finest thing that Collins ever wrote. All that is wanting is the refinement and polish which are the distinctive features of the earlier odes. The genius of a poem may generally be traced in the first rough copy; it may be improved, focussed or (as often happens) clouded by subsequent labour. And nobody can do justice to Collins who fails on the one hand to recognise the inspired brilliance of imagery and thought in the "Ode on the Superstitions of the Highlands," and on the other hand to remember that it is a prima cura, hurriedly written and hardly revised.

C. R. STONE.

THE PARENT: AN EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM

A WISE and witty Irishman once said that if you want to educate a child properly, you must begin one hundred years before its birth. Paradox as it is, the saying is far truer than the old idea still widely held that, given a child, you have only to fill him with an ill-specified mixture called Education to convert him into an Admirable Crichton. A hundred years is roughly four generations. Some day, perhaps, far-seeing parents will breed with an idea to their posterity in their next century. To-day we can at least start by training those who are actual or potential parents. The average pedagogue is not flattering when he speaks in private of parents. One with a very wide experience to whom it was suggested that he should write a book on "Parents I have known," bluntly said he would have to begin by stating that the majority of parents were quite unfit to be parents at all.

Certainly, the sins of the parent are many and glaring. Of course the worst case is when one parent or both take no interest in the child, who is left to the tender mercies of nurses and nursery governesses. Here fathers are the more frequent offenders, but some society women neglect their offspring from an earlier date than even the lower animals, which at least protect their progeny till the time of weaning. No wonder their "orphan" daughters turn out badly and their fatherless sons grow up with the vocabulary, if not the mind and manners, of stable-lads.

The commonest faults of parents arise from ignorance or innocence. If the ignorance is self-satisfied, the matter is hopeless, as in the case of the good lady who said: "What! me not know how to bring up children? Why, I've buried ten!" Prudish innocence is equally fatal. Better never mention certain vital questions about health and motherhood than shock certain false notions of delicacy which the middle classes mistake for becoming modesty! One sees an admirable caricature of this skin-deep morality in the attitude of the working-class mother who wrte indignantly to a teacher: "Dear miss, kindly don't teach my Mary any more about her inside, it don't do her no good, and besides it's rude." Lack of method and system is the chief failing even of the well-intentioned. They do not recognise that order or obedience is the first law of the home as well as of heaven, or else they base it exclusively on the fear of punishment, which is but to substitute the régime of hell. Punishment we must have, but it must fit the crime. The child must realise that it is punished for disobedience or for gross carelessness, and it must be clearly stated for which. Otherwise its sense of justice will be puzzled or outraged. Have few rules but many traditions. Few feel the burden of traditions which are based on love and reverence, while rules are based on fear. But chiefest of all is the need of understanding the character of the children. Many women make dolls and pets of their children. Their indulgence at times know no bounds. One fond mother, when summoned for not sending her son regularly to school, stated by way of apology: "Well, you see, we are so very poor. The only pleasure we can afford the child is to let him take a day off." Men frequently go to the opposite extreme and get furious with their offspring for not being rational beings, whereas children to a large extent are a mere bundle of impulses. How many a child does wrong by impulse? "C'était plus fort que lui," as the French say so truly. By all means treat them as "grown-ups," but when they come short of the standard, judge them as children. Make your maximum a high one, and mark them for anything. They never realise how far it is beyond them, and so they accomplish so much. Possunt quia posse videntur.

But childhood goes through many stages. From infancy to four or five years the mother's influence greatly preponderates: after that the father's rôle becomes increasingly important. Some over-conscientious parents are then already fidgeting about their children's future. They would be far better engaged in seeing that their little legs are growing straight, and that their minds are not receiving crooked ideas and ideals.

Then comes, in the case of boys, the greatest break in their youth. They go to school. Should the school be a continuation of the home? The question has been bitterly debated in the United States. Some Americans complain of the isolation, or, as they are pleased to call it, the isolation of the school. But the school, rightly considered, is an apprenticeship for something more than the family. It may hinder the growth of home feeling, but it certainly promotes the sense of citizenship and patriotism. There are, however, too few ties between the school and the home. No doubt the school is often to blame. It takes too narrow or exclusive a view of its functions. It looks on the parents as fools and fails to suffer them gladly. But here we are mainly concerned with the faults of the parents. On the one hand we have the parent who sends his boy to a day school, which he regards as a mere intellectual restaurant. The boy pays a prix fixe and assimilates and absorbs as much as he can. They ignore the unseen influences of the school, and grumble at the subscriptions to the games as merely diverting little Tommy from his books. At times they think the schoolmaster can perform miracles. A Yankee once brought his boy to a headmaster. "I want my son made Senior Wrangler. Money's no object. Only name the price." On the other hand we have many parents who send their sons to boarding schools and expect the school to provide for their mental, moral and social education. They are in many cases only continuing the system of putting out their children to which we have already alluded. In the big public schools the connection between the family and the schools, in spite of the epistolary activity of the headmaster and of the house-master, is hopelessly one-sided. However keen the parent may be on the individuality of his boy, he has little or no voice over his life at school. The school is a universal leveller, bad as well as good. The boy of tender feelings or of rare tastes, often loses his best qualities in a place where the ideals of Sparta and Boeotia are scarcely tempered by a singularly narrow and attenuated form of tolerated Atticism. But when our youthful tiro comes home, after the trimestrial training in these scholastic barracks, both he and his parents seriously consider that he requires to be indemnified by a veritable Saturnalia. The home is converted into a kind of miniature playground, with the result that the girls are turned into hoydens and imitate the slouch and crouch of their brothers. Worst of all the gourmandising that takes place. Certainly the school has done something to curb this besetting sin of youth by putting hampers on the contraband list, and by establishing "tuck" shops. But gluttony at home is still unrestrained. One headmaster of our acquaintance always made it the subject of his sermon on the well-known "Stirrup Sunday" that precedes the Christmas holidays. He attributed, not without reason, the epidemics particularly rife in the Lent term to the boys coming back thoroughly out of sorts from over-eating and late hours and falling thereby a ready prey to measles, chicken-pox, and the like. During the holidays the mother probably steadily loses ground. Community of tastes in many cases happily brings father and son together and makes the former take an interest in the latter, who by his early prowess in the hunting-field or the covers proves himself a "chip of the old block." This is excellent if it does not lead to excessive smoking and tipping. But how tragic is it when the son's abilities lie in another direction, and the fox-hunting father is blest with a bookish son! Most parents would like to create their children after their own image. Unfortunately, heredity is not always so amenable. In that case the clever child often remains an ugly duckling to his parents till the end of the chapter. Yet it should be the first duty of parents to understand their children. The choice of a career for the boy makes it, however, imperative for the most indifferent paterfamilias to bestir himself. Formerly the whole thing was a cut and dried affair. The eldest son went into the army, the younger sons could choose between the bar and the pulpit. To-day competition has made parents less squeamish. But careers are less easy to find. The children hang on at school waiting for something to turn up. The school gives them little or no suggestion in the matter of vocation or ministry. The idea of a life's work is barely recognised in these cloistered retreats of learning for learning's sake. Many a boy is sent on to the University merely to fill up time. The policy of drift finally lands him in an office, where his general slackness seriously obscures the value of a University career in the eyes of the business man. The more hopeless of his fellows are finally shipt off to the colonies.

Such is, far too often, the record of parenthood in upper and middle class families. What then is the remedy? It is easy to diagnose and prescribe, but who is to see that the treatment is carried out? That is the difficulty on which the majority of reformers are discreetly silent. Something may be done by such societies as the Parents' National Education Union, which attempts to give the father and mother some idea of what childhood and its problems are and aims at promoting closer intercourse between the school and the parent. Above all, if parents wish to have children worthy of them, they must take the trouble to understand them. It is not necessary that they should spend with them every hour of the day. But they must exercise supervision, be more or less on the spot, and while delegating their powers retain ultimate control. In a word the family must be run on business lines, just as much as any other business.

But with those who are already parents, there is probably little to be done. The majority, speaking physiologically, have finished their education. They are to all intents and purposes impervious to new ideas. Our hopes must rather rest with the children who are still at school and will become the parents of to-morrow. What is wanted is a judicious reaction from our one-sided, "every man for himself" individualism. We must inculcate a reverence for the past to which we owe literally everything; we must show that we can only pay the interest on this crushing debt by doing something in our time for the race and especially for our own children. Merely to spend on ourselves the mental and material inheritance we have received from our forefathers is absolutely immoral. Such ancestor-worship seems to me to be based on the most scientific and convincing grounds. If mankind has progressed in the lump, as it has, it is clear that, in spite of sundry shortcomings and sins of past generations, an absolutely enormous amount of care, patience, love, and self-denial has been expended by those who went before us to raise us up to the point we have reached. If, deaf to the dictates of gratitude, we are not prepared to make similar sacrifices, our race is doomed to inevitable decadence. But the sense of justice is so strong in the young, one is convinced that once this great and vital obligation is brought home to them they will accept it as one of the most welcome of their duties. If ever there is an age of chivalry it is the age of childhood.

X. Y. Z.

FICTION

Davray's Affairs. By REGINALD TURNER. (Greening, 6s.)

MR. TURNER is quietly making a name for himself. There is no display about his work: it is carefully thought out, and carefully written. For all the care that is expended on it, it is never heavy or laborious, as a sense of humour and a nice irony are continually in evidence, and these qualities bring neatness of phrase and proportion with them. His present novel is fully up to his own high standard of workmanship. It is possible to disagree with the main assumption as to the place of women in a writer's life, an idea which opens out the whole range of that vexed question of the relations between an artist's character and an artist's work; but if the primary point of view be granted, it is only possible to accord praise to Mr. Turner's handling of the theme from his point of view. Davray starts by treating women impersonally as the best exponents of the book of life, until a girl by her freshness and beauty awakens love, of a kind, in his heart. Her he treats as a solace from work, a lit le to her annoyance at first, and finally to her great displeasure, when he comes upon a woman who acts as an inspiration to life and work. But the inspiration fades and he returns to comfort and prosperity as a writer of popular plays. "'Tis art's decline, my son," is hinted by some delicate irony at the expense of Davray's work and wedded bliss.

Sir Nigel. By ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

SIR NIGEL is a fine historical novel, full of stirring incidents and good romantic moments, adroitly introduced. The House of Loring is in the last stage of distress; the monks of Waverley have encroached upon their possessions until the austere old Lady Loring and her grandson Nigel are faced by absolute want: but just at the moment when Nigel is under sentence for contempt of the law, and is defying authority in the court house, John Chandos, famous throughout Europe for his chivalrous exploits, enters and announces the intended visit to Loring of Edward Plantagenet of England. With royal backing Nigel starts on his career of knight at last, and eventually returns to the fair lady to whom he has plighted troth and to whom he has remained magnificently faithful. "Sir Nigel" is a brave book, bravely told; it is as good as "The White Company," and all who read that capital work will welcome the author's return to his early manner.

The Plough of Shame. By MARY BRADFORD WHITING. (Dent, 6s.)

THIS is a well-written story of Ferrara early in the sixteenth century, and the author displays historical and social knowledge of that glowing period in Italian history. We find her canvas full of interest from this point of view, but too crowded for her story. For instance, she suggests in one of the early chapters that the Marchesa Alderoni is slowly poisoning her husband because she wants to replace him by her lover, the condottiere Castellani. The situation is dramatic, but other characters and situations intervene, and we lose sight of the doomed man until we are suddenly asked to follow his funeral procession. We sup full of the dungeons and tortures of mediæval Italy, and these are so powerfully described that they leave the shudder they should in the reader's imagination. The picture of Castellani forced into the hideous pit by no outside hands but by his own insane, increasing horror of it is a haunting one. Ariosto, Tasso and Michael Angelo are all characters in the novel. But we do not believe that in the sixteenth century every one talked exactly alike and in breathless, stilted periods.

The Simple Plan. The story of a primitive girl, (Sherratt & Hughes, 6s.)

THE author of "The Simple Plan" writes an admirable preface. That he does not write an admirable novel is due, we imagine, more to want of experience than to absence of skill. The book has the uncomfortable vagueness usually noticeable in the work of those who have not yet found the medium best suited to the exhibition of their talents. We are told that it is offered "as a tale, not a study," and yet when we read it we find that it is a study, not a tale. There are several charming children in it—bright, clean, natural children—but every now and then, when the reader is beginning to know them, they become unnatural, precocious and old. Here again, we hope, is the inconsistency of a young author. The story was written "to find out how a novel is made"; judging by the preface, when he makes this discovery, the author will produce a good novel.

The Power of the Past. DANIEL LESUEUR. (Nash, 6s.)

THIS is an interesting novel which shows a considerable amount of power. It is a translation of La Force du Passé, and although it is translated into stiff and conventional English the effect is not wholly destroyed. The characters are drawn with much skill and are studied with subtlety and care, and the book as a whole possesses distinction and individuality. The portrayal of a young girl who after a sequestered youth is suddenly brought face to face with some of the unpleasant realities of life is very sympathetic, and the description of her interview with her brother-in-law on the death of her sister is a very convincing piece of writing. Mme. Lesueur is an artist.

The Doctor of Crow's Nest. By RALPH CONNOR. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

A NEW story by Ralph Connor brings its own welcome to thousands of readers on both sides of the Atlantic, and the present one can show many pages as fresh and delightful as can be found in any of the author's previous books. The story—of two brothers and the woman who came between—is very slight, and a considerable part of the volume is filled with sketches and characters excellent in their way, but not essential to the plot. Life at the old mill, at the University, in the railway camps and hospitals, and in the wilderness, affords the author ample scope for his remarkable powers of description. There are homely scenes, scenes of fierce passion, and religious fervour, contrasts of humour and pathos, and a bracing atmosphere of duty and self-denial. It is all very sound and wholesome, even when the violence and virtue have a touch of melodrama about them. If "The Doctor of Crow's Nest" does not quite reach the level of "The Sky Pilot," it is deeply interesting, and always appeals to the best sympathies of its readers.

The New Chronicles of Don Q. By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

DON Q is one of our modern knights errant, the hero of remarkable adventures, each one detached and of the accepted length for a popular magazine. The old-fashioned knight errant was young, handsome and without reproach, but we have changed all that. The new kind is plain, elderly and as a rule wanted by the police. At first sight it seems as if our taste had degenerated and our morals too. But look closely at this entertaining Don Q and you will find him at all the old tricks. To be sure, he is a leader of brigands, but that has from time immemorial been an occupation chosen by the chivalrous and the well-bred; it follows, therefore, as a matter of course, that he is a squire of dames, a protector of the poor and a redresser of wrongs, generous to a fault and a man who would not crush a fly unless the fly fully deserved it. His various adventures are well told, and we shall be delighted to meet him again next time he comes to life.

The Ark of the Curse. By K. L. MONTGOMERY. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

MISS MONTGOMERY has found an admirable subject for an historical novel in the strange race of the Cagots, and the cruel, inexplicable superstitions which banned them from intercourse with other men and from the common rights of all men. "The Accursed Race," Mrs. Gaskell called them in the paper in which she describes their hideous persecution, and the name is terribly apt. Miss Montgomery avails herself of all the advantages of her setting; her story is vigorous, and if her prose be at times somewhat too highly coloured, the mistake is amply atoned by the relish and gusto which enliven her work.

MUSIC

PIANO AND ORCHESTRA

IN this time of many performers and many interpretations there are still a few masters who speak with authority, and London has lately been listening to the voice of at least two whose mastery in their respective lines, the orchestra and chamber music, is undisputed. We have had Richter conducting a set of symphony concerts, and Joachim presenting the chamber works of Brahms in their completeness. Of the latter I look forward to writing something next week, since the series was finished too late in this week for a discussion of the whole. The fourth and last Richter concert of this year will take place on Monday, 17th inst., but as they are to be continued next year until March, there will be many later opportunities for discussing them. While the concerts of the London Symphony Orchestra have naturally been remarkable for performances of important orchestral works under this great conductor, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, whose symphony concerts have been taking place on the Saturday afternoons preceding the Mondays of the Richter concerts, has been doing excellent work of a different kind. Whether by design or otherwise, the programmes have been planned so as to bring into prominence works in which a solo artist is heard with the orchestra. Thus, at the first two concerts were heard two such distinguished but diverse violinists as Señor Sarasate and Lady Hallé in compositions as far apart as Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" and Brahms's violin concerto, while at the third, given last week, the dominating interest was the reappearance here of M. Raoul Pugno, who played two works with the orchestra, those chosen for orchestra alone being merely Beethoven's eighth symphony and the variations from Tchaikovsky's fourth suite, which last have gained popularity at the Promenade Concerts. If the scheme was devised to avoid the appearance of competition with so great an interpreter as Richter, it was wisely done, but at any rate it has had the effect of widening the scope of our recent music by avoiding reduplication. Perhaps it is a compliment which Mr. Henry J. Wood may scarcely relish, but it is in reality by no means an ill one, to say that he is at his best as a conductor when associated in a concerto with such an artist as M. Pugno. Mr. Wood certainly gains much from the solo player, but it shows how sensitive is his own musical temperament that he can respond as completely as he does to the influence of another. The result was an almost perfect performance on Saturday of Mozart's beautiful concerto in E flat (Köchel 271). In no music is the beauty of M. Pugno's playing more fully revealed than in that of Mozart, and no concerto could have been more happily chosen, for in it we see the composer not only as the ever graceful, refined, and symmetrical artist, whose melody at times rises to divine heights, but as the daring innovator in form, a position which we have almost forgotten that he ever held. For the eighteenth century nothing could have been bolder than to write a work ostensibly in three movements, first allegro, slow movement, and rondo, and then to interpolate a minuet into the middle of the rondo; yet this is what Mozart here does. It contains, too, some delightful little escapades which cannot be detailed without a full analysis, which is not now to be undertaken. At present we are more concerned with its performance, as typical of M. Pugno's understanding of Mozart. Most of us have suffered from the playing of pianists and others, who start with the conviction that in all old-fashioned music there is a great deal which is simply padding, and who, having played, say, a second subject melody with some expression, proceed to rattle off the scales and arpeggios which adorn the codetta as if they could contain no musical beauty. M. Pugno's playing is the direct opposite of this. He treats every little cadence figure as though it had been new born for its place in the particular work which he is playing. This is the right attitude, and it results in giving us the work as it actually sprang from the composer's brain. To him the details were all new, since they were part and parcel of a new idea, no matter whether the actual phrases had been heard before or not. M. Pugno values the details at their true worth, neither forcing them into prominence by elaborate care, nor under-rating them, but realising their relation to the whole conception and making each minister to the total expression. It is this quality which gives him something in common with the great interpreters, Richter and Joachim. Many who have heard both at their best have had to confess to a sense of disappointment; they expected to see the conductor's baton produce some mesmeric effect upon his orchestra, or to marvel at the lightning movements of the bow upon the strings of the violin, and there was none of this. Yet, if the listener were at all a musician, he came away with a sense that the music he had heard was exactly what the composer meant to write, and if he were himself an executant, that it was exactly what he would have done had he only known the way. That is why he was not astonished as he expected to be. It is only partial expression which astonishes, by contradicting our previous notions; complete expression fulfils their imperfect aspirations, and leaves us contented. Of this kind is the playing of M. Pugno when his composer is Mozart, and under his influence in the Concerto of Saturday, Mr. Wood and the orchestra rose near to his level, and supported him in the way most needful. Careless "tutti" passages and rough accompaniments can ruin the work of the most perfect solo-player, but in this performance, when the piano left off and the theme was carried on by the orchestra, or when the two were conversing in a dialogue of imitative phrases, the same delicacy of expression was often scarcely less noticeable in the orchestra than in the solo instrument.

Though the Concerto was the real event of the concert, the work which most people had probably come to hear was César Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Djinns," since it had only once been given before at Queen's Hall, and that was some years ago. It is a curious and powerful piece of work, not programme music in the modern sense of the term, but meant to be suggestive of the mood of Victor Hugo's vivid poem. Naturally there is more that is weird and strange than beautiful in the musical presentation of the subject, though it is redeemed by the ending, in which a gentle theme undergoes some thoughtful development, till it dies away to a pianissimo, when "all sound is swallowed up in space." In this work M. Pugno's power of grasping the needs of the music was no less remarkable than in the Mozart, though its needs are very different. Many a clever pianist would rant and "tear a passion to tatters" in the first part, thereby calling attention only to himself and his instrument, instead of to the wild character of the music; but on this occasion the piano was rather a powerful element in the orchestration than a solo instrument, and the whole left a sense of balance very rarely attained in modern attempts to combine piano with orchestra.

Of the other features of this concert it is not necessary to write particularly. The performances were of the average standard associated with Queen's Hall. The eighth symphony, Beethoven's "little one," sounded as happy as it always must, though its lack of importance strikes one afresh each time it is played; and the variations by Tchaikovsky, though among his most refined compositions, have little new to offer after one or two hearings. It was the piano playing which gave the concert its distinction; or rather, since the playing is the last thing that we consciously notice in listening to M. Pugno, it was the music made by the piano with the orchestra that lives in the memory.

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

FALSE LATIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Punch, which used to be scholarly, has a vulgar error in the current number—res angustae, which would not scan. The passage in Juvenal runs:

Haud facile emergunt quorum virtutibus obstat
Res angusta domi.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

University Club, Dublin.
December 3.

LITERARY FEEDING-BOTTLES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you kindly convey to your critic "A." the information that the song "Lizzie Lindsay" of which he speaks is simply verses taken from a long ballad, whose existence he does not seem to be aware of. My version is taken from that, and I have not brought in any "variants" from "Professor Child's monumental work," as he learnedly and wrongly states.

The Ballad in question begins:

"In Edinburgh there lived a lady,
Was ca'd Lizzie Lindsay by name;
Was courted by mony fine suitors,
And mony rich persons of fame."

When in the course of a somewhat lengthy story young Donald asks her to go to the Highlands:

"The lady she turned her about,
And a very loud laugh gaed she:
'I'd like to ken whaur I am gaun first,
And wha I am gaun to gang wi'.'"

I do not in the least object to fair criticism, but I protest most emphatically against being accused of giving feeble paraphrases of ballads I have not dealt with, simply because your Reviewer is too ignorant to know the sources from which my stories are taken. Before dealing wholesale condemnation he should at least be sure that he knows a little about the subject of which he is writing.

MARY MACLEOD.

November 24.

[A.'s comment upon this is to re-quote Miss Macleod's paraphrase of the lines given above in italics: "I should like to know first where I am going and who [sic] I am going with."—ED.]

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The remarks of your correspondent under the heading "A Point of Grammar" in your issue for December 1 would have had greater value had he indicated what he holds to be the wrong but common method of analysing sentences like "'Tis we that receive."

I would remark that one of the lines quoted by me as exemplifying a poet's departure from grammatical usage is from "The Lament," which is not one of Burns's dialect poems, as your correspondent seems to think. A very brief survey of Burns's verse suffices, I consider, to show that not a few of his lapses into native dialect-speech are to be regarded simply as examples of poetic licence. Take, e.g., what I have already referred to—the use of the second person singular of the subject with the third person singular of the verb. In the dialect poem "Scotch Drink" we find clears, cheers, strings, brightens, maks, and comes with thou as the subject. "The Poem on Pastoral Poetry" gives us thou's for ever and thou paints; and thou's occurs in the "Address to an Illegitimate Child" and in the lines "To a Mountain Daisy" and "The Death . . . of Poor Mailie." Dipping anew into the poems we come, in "The Banks o' Doon," upon thou warbling bird, That wantons, and in "Holy Willie's Prayer" upon O Thou, wha . . . sends, and thou might, and thou kens. From an exclusive study of these and similar excerpts from Burns's writings it might be concluded that the author was consistently true to his native dialect. Attentive perusal of his poems, however, reveals the existence of diverse grammatical constructions in close proximity. Thus in the third verse of the "Song of Death" occur the lines:

"Thou srikes the dull peasant—he sinks in the dark, Thou strik'st the young hero—a glorious mark!"

Again, in the "Address to the Tooth-ache," there are totally discrepant constructions;

"But thee—thou hell o' a' diseases—
Aye mocks our groan" (verse 2).

"Thou, TOOTH-ACHE, surely bear'st the bell" (verse 5).

Further, in the "Address spoken by Miss Fontenelle," there is a fine passage that affords two such constructions in one sentence:

"Thou other man of care, the wretch in love,
Who long with jiltish arts and airs hath strove;
Who, as the boughs all temptingly project,
Measur'st in desperate thought—a rope—thy neck."

Turning to other poems, for example those entitled "On Sensibility" and "Grace before Dinner," we read lines of normal grammatical build, such as:

"Thou, my friend, canst truly tell,"

and

"O Thou who kindly dost provide."

To conclude: an examination of the diction of Burns's poems manifests that they were not written in order to pass the scrutiny of carping and pedagogic critics—"those cut-throat bandits in the paths of fame," as he terms them. Still there is no reason why, in thankfully accepting the message of the man, we should seek to explain away as a "correct idiom of the dialect in which he writes" any obvious defect in his mode of delivering it.

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

The Hermitage, Sutton.

December 4.

INFANT JOY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the ACADEMY of November 24 there is a Causerie—hateful word—dealing with the poetry of Blake.

The writer states that "Infant Joy" looks as if it were an easy thing to write. Apparently it is not a poem easy to understand. We are told, a little earlier in the article, that poetry though it deals with difficult matters is the clearest of all forms of speech. One would have thought that scientific definitions could be best so described: but, apart from that, and granting that poetry is a clear mode of expression, how were words and meanings so contorted as to give the remarkable interpretation of Blake's lyric?

Nothing could be more definitely expressed than:

"Joy but two days old,"

and yet we are told that the reader can feel that the child is being danced up and down all the while, that the speaker is making a sudden rush at the baby's face after the manner of mothers and other fond persons.

This is contorted sense gone mad. Is it not more likely that the poem expresses the joy of a mother forgetting the pains of her travail for that she has brought a man into the world?

I do not want to carp further, but cannot we find some English word which will be more fit than Causerie to express a medium through which a critic can play Sir Oracle?

H. G. RICHARDSON.

November 28.

[Our Reviewer replies: I confess I am not quite sure of Mr. Richardson's point; but I take it to be that a mother would not be strong enough to dance her baby two days after its birth; or is it that such treatment would be bad for a baby so young? I don't think that Blake himself would come very well out of this kind of criticism; for babies two days old do not smile, except from wind; and that kind of smile is scarcely a fit subject for a poem called "Infant Joy." But if I have made unwarrantable assumptions, so has Mr. Richardson, for there is nothing in the poem to tell us the sex of the infant.

As for Mr. Richardson's other point about the clearness of poetry, I should need more space than the Editor would give me to argue it; and I should like to know what Mr. Richardson means by scientific definitions.]

SPELLING OF GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. William Burd's suggestion that spelling reformers might very profitably begin by setting right the spelling of geographical names is, in my opinion, an essentially sensible one. I always have contended that it would be much better to give to foreign towns and places the names by which they are known locally, and to preserve as nearly as possible the spelling of the original tongue.

Certainly, it would do away with a great deal of confusion, supposing we were to all agree to call, say, German towns by the proper German term, i.e., Köln (Cologne), München (Munich), Wien (Vienna), Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle), and, similarly, places in Italy by the Italian, not the French equivalent, say, Firenze, Torino, Napoli, etc., instead of Florence, Turin, Naples, etc.

Of course, for some countries like Belgium and Austria-Hungary, where several languages are spoken, there is a difficulty of choice. I think, however, Flemish Antwerpen (Antwerp), Ghent, Brugge, Mechelen, preferable to the French terms, Anvers, Gand, Bruges, Malines; as is also Braso in Hungary to its German equivalent Kroustadt, which latter might easily be mistaken for the Cronstadt in Bohemia, or the port of St. Petersburg in Russia.

F. W. T. LANGE.

St. Bride's Institute, E.C.

A LEGEND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I should like to know whether you or any of the readers of the ACADEMY can explain or throw any light upon the following legend, which occurs on an old brass Dutch alms-dish in the church of Wetton in Derbyshire:

"Amor et caritas est perfecta punitas."

P. MORGAN WATKINS.

December 2.

"SPELLING GONE MAD"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Wallis's epigram and its use as a title has caught on, or, at least has drawn Mr. Mayhew.

Mr. Mayhew's question. I consider "my" spelling an improvement on the standard spelling; further, that any system is better than the orthodox method, designated by the editor of Harper's Monthly as "the greatest monument of human folly held sacred by any people." Had I considered otherwise he might have concluded that I, too, "had gone mad." I contend that any system of spelling which reduces the use of a number of silent letters and puts into better order some of the absurd forms of English spelling "may with truth be called 'simplified spelling.'" How else would he designate it?

Mr. Mayhew makes too statements which are absolutely groundless. I have been riting on this question for twenty-eight years, and I defy Mr. Mayhew to bring forward a single sentence convicting me of laying claim to "my" spelling as being a system of fonetic spelling, or that it—"my brand-new simplified spelling shud superseed the spelling" now current. I do not object to severe criticism, to which every word is open who engages in public question, but I do object to unjust insinuations and aspersions. Mr. Mayhew may shatter "my" spelling to shivers, and I shud not shed a tear, but I crave that my motive may be regarded and gaged accurately. I have no regard for "my" spelling, if I may say that which Mr. Mayhew designates "mine." Any system is welcome to me, provided it is readable and printable. If Mr. Mayhew can suggest a better method, and will guarantee to use it on all occasions, I shall bid good-bye to that which "for the life of him he cannot see any good." He rated Professor Skeat and the whole company of reformers for not adopting their own recommendations, and now falls foul with my poor method. Will Mr. Mayhew do something more than criticize, will he construct, show us the way and walk therein?

It has to have been evident to the veriest novices that by the retention of many current forms there was no justification for ranking such a method as a system, much less a fonetic system. All that could have been claimed was the recognition of a revolt from ordinary usage. Whether that revolt was the wisest, or not, was another consideration.

I prefer Sir Isaac Pitman's fonetic alphabet; as this cannot be printed without permission outside of Bath, it is out of the question; next I prefer a system akin to Sir Isaac Pitman's Old-letter scheme, which, unfortunately, is too radical for the ordinary reader, whose knowledge of fonetics is very limited, hence my adoption of a mongrel method, partially fonetic and partially foolish (vide Mr. W. D. Howell's designation of our spelling being the greatest monument of human folly). I find it easy to write, and young children can read it in manuscript and in print. When told me without solicitation that she liked it, because it helped her to read long words.

I observe that Mr. Mayhew is partial to the current inconsistencies, whilst "my" spelling is said to "teem with inconsistencies." Will he point out a single word which is not in the orthodox notation?

Thanks to Mr. Wallis for his humorous dialogue. His suspicions are pardonable but absolutely imaginary. There is no collusion between Mr. Lodge and I in this correspondence.

I respect Mr. Wallis's esthetic regard for the present spelling so far as my antipathy to it will allow. I shud not mourn were it cast into the depths of the sea. How does he reconcile his love for Keats when that poet indulged in honor and honor in his sonnet on Spenser (vide the Bookman's facsimile)? Why did the printer of the Rev. Donald Gargill's Bible adopt Savior? Were their Covenanting faith questionable and was the Bible repugnant thereby?

It is pleasing to observe Mr. Wallis's admission that our spelling is not scientific. It is singular the same mind shelters behind an esthetic feeling for a thing which is and ever has been unstable in all its ways.

I give full credit to Mr. Wallis's combative bumps, and shud not object to him having "a round," just to appease his fighting spirit and as an advertisement of fonetic spelling. Defenders of antiquated methods do more good than they imagine by stubbornly resisting the march of reason. Reformers may be slain, but truth is ennobled. Killing the body is not the most effective weapon to bolster up a thing against which reason revolts.

Mr. Wallis's last paragraph is true; but he would not have us endure defects because the path of the reformer is not smooth and that prejudices die hard. Personally I am not concerned about the spelling of adults. They may go on in the old way unto the end of the chapter, and I dare say they will do so, however much they may prate about their love of children. If they will not be put out of their way to adopt a saner spelling, they shud countenance a reasonable method for schools.

I trust Mr. Lange does not imagine that a child's memory would cease to be exercised on the introduction of fonetic spelling. There is not a single lesson upon any subject but demands mental effort; and the exercise of a child's mind ought to be rewarded with satisfying results which the spelling puzzle does not accord. Those who have taught fonetic spelling entirely disagree with him.

Is Mr. Lange not unreasonable in demanding as a passport to correct (?) spelling the tuition of Latin, Greek, French, etc.? Apart from an orthographic desideratum the tendency is to lessen this linguistic load. The testimony of educationists is not flattering to Mr. Lange's cure for bad spelling. That Latin and Greek may flourish or decay need not prevent the modification of English spelling. Is it not singular that persons who have no more of those and other tongues are in favor of this reform?

Would it not be more to the point if Mr. Lange could get Englishmen to pronounce alike the French words named. I never yet found too much of French scholars pronounce the same. When the secure uniformity of pronunciation is a fonetic representation will be forthcoming.

Does Mr. Lange not think that "no two persons ever pronounce even common words exactly alike"? Fonetic spelling would lessen this confusion. If orthography does not teach "strait" pronunciation who good is it? The late Miss Dorothea Beale in her preface to Miss Soames' "Introduction to Phonetics," says: "The task (by Miss Soames) of giving an idea of the mode of formation of the articulate sounds) has almost necessarily involved an exposé of the extraordinary anomalies of English spelling. As an educator, I am earnestly desirous for reform, and I trust that this book may shorten the time of waiting. Our spelling is won over the greatest hindrances to the intelligent study of phonology."

H. DRUMMOND.

Hetton-le-Hole.

November 24.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Eighteenth-Century Colour Prints: an Essay on certain Stipple Engravers and their Work in Colour. Compiled, arranged, and written by Julia Frankau. 9 x 5½. Pp. 307. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.

Waters, W. G. Five Italian Shrines. Illustrated. 9 x 6½. Pp. 164. Murray, 12s. net.

[An account of the monumental tombs of S. Augustine at Pavia, S. Dominic at Bologna, S. Peter Martyr at Milan, S. Donato at Arezzo, and of Orcagna's Tabernacolo at Florence. With a prefatory essay on Tuscan sculpture.]

Burton, William. Porcelain: a sketch of its Nature, Art, and Manufacture. With 50 half-tone plates. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 264. Cassell, 7s. 6d. net.

[In no sense a technical treatise; Mr. Burton's aim has been merely to "supply the collector and student of porcelain, as well as the general reader, with a clear and connected account of the various kinds of porcelain made in Asia and Europe."]]

Cundall, H. M. Birket Foster. 9 x 6½. Pp. 215. Black, 20s. net.

[Uniform with "Kate Greenaway" in Messrs. Black's series of Colour Books. Contains 100 full-page illustrations, over 70 of which are reproduced in colour facsimile from original water-colour drawings by Birket Foster; the rest are in monochrome.]]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Barrington, Mrs. Russell. The Life, Letters and Work of Frederic Leighton. 2 vols. 10 x 7½. Pp. 717. Allen, 42s. net.

[With 154 reproductions from drawings and paintings by Lord Leighton, including 18 in colour and 18 in photogravure. Several are now published for the first time. There is an edition-de-luxe of fifty copies (numbered) on Arnold hand-made paper, at £5 5s. net. A list of Leighton's principal works is given.]]

Isaacson, the Rev. Charles S. The Story of the Later Popes from the Great Schism to the First Years of Pius X. (1414 to 1906.) 8½ x 5½. Pp. 301. Elliot Stock, 7s. 6d. net.

[Anecdotal and biographical rather than historical. Illustrated by 40 reproductions of Papal medals and a contemporary portrait of Pope Innocent XI.]]

Memoirs of Prince Chlodwig of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst. Edited by Friedrich Curtius for Prince Alexander of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst. Translated from the first German edition and supervised by George W. Chrystal. 2 vols. 10 x 6½. Pp. 908. Heinemann, 24s. net.

Tallentyre, S. G. The Friends of Voltaire. With portraits. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 303. Smith, Elder, 9s. net.

[D'Alembert: the thinker; Diderot: the talker; Galiani: the wit; Vaubergues: the aphorist; d'Holbach: the host; Grimm: the journalist; Helvétius: the contradiction; Turgot: the statesman; Beaumarchais: the playwright; and Condorcet: the aristocrat.]]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Hueffer, Ford Madox. Christina's Fairy Book. Sackville, Lady Margaret. The Travelling Companions. Ransome, Arthur. Highways and Byways in Fairyland. Syrett, Netta. The Fairy Doll. Pyne, Anna. Who's Who in Fairyland. Each 4½ x 3½. Alston Rivers, 6d. each.

[The Pinafore Library. The five volumes are issued separately or together in a cardboard case at 2s. 6d. net.]]

DRAMA.

Maeterlinck, Maurice. Joyzelle. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 136. Allen, 3s. 6d. net.

Saward, William T. William Shakespeare. A play in four acts. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 120. Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d.

ECONOMICS.

- Economics for Irishmen.* By Pat. 7½ x 5½. Pp 164. Dublin: Maunsell & Co. net.
 ["Less an academic treatise than an attempt to show why Ireland goes out of existence as a nation." Its data are derived from direct observation of actual life and its conditions rather than from books or party propaganda.]
 Avebury, Lord. On Municipal and National Trading. 9 x 6. Pp. 176. Macmillan, 5s. net.

EDUCATION.

- Board of Education: Statistics of Public Education in England and Wales 1904-5-6. Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of His Majesty. 9½ x 6. Pp. lxxi, 517. Printed for His Majesty's Stationery Office by Wyman & Sons, 2s. 5½d.

ETHNOGRAPHY.

- Thomas, N. W. The Natives of Australia. With 32 full-page illustrations and a map. 9 x 5½. Pp. 256. Constable, 6s. net.
 ["The first volume of a new series of illustrated ethnographical handbooks on 'The Native Races of the British Empire,' intended to 'convey accurate information in a popular and readable form.'"]

ETHNOLOGY.

- Leonard, Major Arthur Glyn. The Lower Niger and its Tribes. 9½ x 5½. Pp. 564. Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net.
 [Map of Southern Nigeria and index.]
 Dennett, R. E. At the Back of the Black Man's Mind; or, Notes on the Kingly Office in West Africa. 9½ x 6. Pp. 288. Macmillan, 10s. net.
 ["The object of this little book is twofold," says the author. "In the first place I wish to show that, concurrent with fetishism or Jujuism, there is in Africa a religion giving us a much higher conception of God than is generally acknowledged by writers on African modes of thought. And in the second place, I am anxious to make clear the vital importance of the kingly office to the African communities."]

FICTION.

- Heath, Eda. Holmwood Pride. Who Had the Best of It? 7½ x 5½. Pp. 248. Elliot Stock, 6s.
 Stevenson, E. G. My Neighbour. A Story of Our Own Time. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 222. Elliot Stock, 6s.
 Dawson, Charles. A Minister of Fate. 7½ x 5. Pp. 342. Long, 6s.
 Askew, Alice and Maude. The Baxter Family. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 299. White, 6s.
 Watson, Helen H. Andrew Goodfellow. A Tale of 1805. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 358. Macmillan, 6s.
 Brown, Alice. The Country Road. 8 x 5½. Pp. 341. Constable, 6s.
 [17 short stories.]
 Burnham, Clara Louise. The Opened Shutters. 8 x 5½. Pp. 344. Constable, 6s.
 Fairbairn, John; and Caine, William. The Confectioners. 7½ x 5. Pp. 315. Bistol: Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.
 [Intended to be humorous; we found the book rather distressing.]
 Williamson, C. N. and A. M. Rosemary in Search of a Father. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 263. Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.
 Roberts, Morley. The Red Burgee. Sea comedies. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 265. Nash, 6s.
 Sinclair, Upton. A Captain of Industry; being the Story of a Civilised Man. Illustrated. 8½ x 6. Pp. 50. Heinemann, 6d.

GEOGRAPHY.

- Beazley, C. Raymond. The Dawn of Modern Geography—vol. iii. 9 x 6. Pp. 638. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 20s. net.
 [The present volume, which covers the period from the middle of the thirteenth to the early years of the fifteenth century, with reproductions of the principal maps of the time—concludes the History of Mediæval Exploration and Geographical Science, the first two parts of which were published in 1897 and 1901.]

HISTORY.

- Bradby, G. F. The Great Days of Versailles. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 384. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.
 [Studies of Court life in the later days of Louis XIV.]
The Chronicle of Dino Compagni. Translated by Else C. M. Benecke and A. G. Fenners Howell. 6 x 4. Pp. 284. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.
 [In "The Temple Classics."]

LITERATURE.

- Wyld, Henry Cecil. Historical Study of the Mother Tongue. An introduction to Philological Method. 8 x 5½. Pp. 412. Murray, 7s. 6d.
 [Intended to serve as an introduction to "the more advanced scientific study of linguistic problems in the pages of first-hand authorities." Full subject and word indices and list of authorities.]
 Tuckwell, the Rev. W. Spenser. 6½ x 4. Pp. 85. Bell, 1s. net.
 [In the "Miniature Series of Great Writers." Short bibliography and index.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Russell, Charles E. B.; and Rigby, L. M. The Making of the Criminal. 7½ x 5. Pp. 362. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.
 [A valuable little book in which the authors—who obviously write from knowledge gained at first hand—show how various types of youths sink into criminality, how they are dealt with, and with what results. The comparison of the methods of dealing with young criminals in our Colonies, in America, and on the Continent, is useful and suggestive.]
Toasts and Maxims. "A Book of Humour to Pass the Time." Collected from various sources. Illustrated. 8½ x 6. Pp. 119. Greening, 1s. net.
 Montgomery, Hugh; and Cambray, Philip G. A Dictionary of Political Phrases and Allusions. With a short bibliography. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 405. Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.
 Forbush, William Byron. Ecclesiastes in the Metre of Omar. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 105. Constable, 5s. net.
 [With an introductory essay on Ecclesiastes and the Rubáiyát.]

Who's Who. 1907. 7½ x 5. Pp. 1958. Black, 10s. net.

Who's Who Yearbook for 1907. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 148. Black, 1s. net.

Watson, Robert Spence. The National Liberal Federation, from its commencement to the General Election of 1906. With an introduction by the Rt. Hon. Augustine Birrell. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Unwin, 5s. net.

The Bible in Wales. A Study in the History of the Welsh People, with an introductory address and a bibliography. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 104. Sotheman, 8s. 6d. net.

[For the centenary year of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1904, the committee of the Cardiff Public Libraries decided to bring together for exhibition in the Reference Library as many editions as could be procured of the scriptures in Welsh, or in other languages if printed in Wales; and a desire to record the knowledge thus acquired led to the preparation of this volume.]

Empire-Builders. A course of lectures by the Rev. W. K. Stride. With an introduction by H. E. Egerton. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 109. Murray, 2s. 6d.

[Published under the auspices of the League of Empire. Lectures on Alfred the Great; Drake; Clive; Wolfe; Hawke and Cook.]

Kirkpatrick, F. A. Lectures on British Colonisation and Empire. First series (1600-1783). With an introduction by H. E. Egerton. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xvi, 115. Murray, 2s. 6d.

[Published under the auspices of the League of Empire.]

Earle, Mrs. C. W. Letters to Old and Young. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 384. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.

[Letters written to friends on different subjects.]

Marabell, William. The Rise of Man. An Interlude in Philosophy. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 562. Published by the Author, $1.50.

[A series of dialogues on Life and Literature; Law and Government; Marriage and Morals; Science and Religion; Race, Creed and Colour.]

MUSIC.

Taylor, Sedley. The Indebtedness of Handel to Works by other Composers. A Presentation of Evidence. 11½ x 8. Pp. 196. Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d. net.

Lee, E. Markham. Tchaikovski. 6½ x 4. Pp. 64. Bell, 1s. net.
 [In the "Miniature Series of Great Writers."]

POETRY.

Sabin, Arthur K. The Death of Icarus, and other Poems. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 121. Glasgow: MacLehose, 4s. net.

[Together with a new translation in the original "terza rima" of Canto xxviii. of the Purgatory of Dante.]

Bishop, Grace Conway. Poi Pourri. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 56. Swan Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d.

[A volume of short poems.]

On the Death of Madonna Laura. By Francesco Petrarca. Rendered into English by Agnes Tobin. 8½ x 6. Pp. 127. Heinemann, 7s. 6d. net.

Coleridge, the Hon. Stephen. Songs to Desideria, and other poems. 7½ x 5. Pp. 131. Lane, 3s. 6d. net.

Roe, George. Rubáiyat of Omar Khayyám. With an introduction and many notes and references, and an original "Ode to Omar." 8 x 5½. Pp. 78. Foulis, 7s. 6d. net.

[A new metrical version rendered into English from various Persian sources. In the left-hand margin of the translation is given the number of each quatrain in the leading English, German, French and Italian translations, while the references in the right-hand margin indicate some of the MSS. and reproductions where the Persian text of the stanza may be found.]

SELECTIONS FROM CHARLES SWAIN.

Compiled by his THIRD DAUGHTER. With a Photogravure by EMERY WALKER. Crown 8vo, 276 pages, cloth extra, gilt top, 5s. net.

A representative selection from the whole of Charles Swain's Poetical Works. JUST PUBLISHED

GLIMMERINGS. By C. S. DICKINS. Cloth gilt, 3s. net
 A New Volume of Verse, with a Photogravure of Ada Newton.

THE POETIC SPIRIT. By THOMAS FOLLIOTT.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. net.

"Full of suggestive thought."—New Age.

"By far the best part of the book is a careful, succinct, and masterly study of the inner meaning of the poetry of Omar Khayyám."—Dundee Courier.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY. Sixpence net; Cloth, 1s. net

MR. H. G. WELLS'S NEW BOOK

SOCIALISM AND THE FAMILY

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 FLEET STREET, E.C.

HAVE YOU BOUGHT YOUR BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS?

A. & F. DENNY will send their New Catalogue on receipt of name and address. The largest and most varied stock in London to select from.

A. & F. DENNY, 147 Strand, London.
 (Opposite the Gaiety Theatre.)

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

BOOKS are best for XMAS PRESENTS.

Selection of over 20,000 Volumes in all Branches of Literature.

3d. in 1s. discount.

HENRY F. BUMPUS,

Discount Bookseller,
355 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.
SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.
Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
Full and Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

A light, refined, and digestible beverage, unequalled for nourishment, purity, and strength. The most enjoyable cocoa for invalids as well as for those in vigorous health.

Made under ideal conditions of labour in Cadbury's Garden Factory, amidst pure and healthful surroundings.

EAGLE

Insurance Company

Established 1807

LIVES

ANNUITIES

Head Office

79 Pall Mall
London, S.W.

City

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches

Eagle Insurance Buildings in

BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER

~~~~~
The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

~~~~~
Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1806

DECEMBER 15, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN

ALBEMARLE ST., PICCADILLY, W.

LECTURE ARRANGEMENTS BEFORE EASTER, 1907.

A CHRISTMAS COURSE OF EXPERIMENTALLY ILLUSTRATED LECTURES (adapted to a Juvenile Auditory).

W. DUDELL, Esq., M.I.E.E. Six Lectures on SIGNALLING TO A DISTANCE, FROM PRIMITIVE MAN TO RADIO-TELEGRAPHY. On December 27
(Thursday), Dec. 29, 1906, Jan. 1, 3, 5, 8, 1907, at Three o'clock.

Tuesdays.

Professor PERCY GARDINER, Litt.D., F.S.A.
Two Lectures on THE SCULPTURE OF AEGINA IN RELATION TO RECENT DISCOVERY. On Tuesdays,
Jan. 15, 22, at Three o'clock.

Professor A. C. SEWARD, F.R.S. Two Lectures on SURVIVALS FROM THE PAST IN THE PLANT WORLD. On Tuesdays, Jan. 29, Feb. 5, at Three o'clock.

Professor WILLIAM STIRLING, M.D., LL.D.,
D.Sc. Six Lectures on THE VISUAL APPARATUS
OF MAN AND ANIMALS. On Tuesdays, Feb. 12, 19, 26, March 5, 12, 19, at Three o'clock.

Thursdays.

WILLIAM NAPIER SHAW, Esq., LL.D.,
Sc.D., F.R.S. Two Lectures on RECENT ADVANCES
IN THE EXPLORATION OF THE ATMOSPHERE. On Thursdays, Jan. 17, 24, at Three o'clock.

Major PERCY A. MACMAHON, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Two Lectures on STANDARDS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. On Thursdays, Jan. 31, Feb. 7, at Three o'clock.

Professor W. W. WATTS, F.R.S. Two Lectures on (1) THE BUILDING OF BRITAIN; (2)
RECENT LIGHT ON ANCIENT PHYSIOGRAPHIES.
On Thursdays, Feb. 14, 21, at Three o'clock.

Dr. W. MARTIN. Two Lectures on OLD
DUTCH PAINTING AND PAINTERS. On Thursdays,
Feb. 28, March 7, at Three o'clock.

C. W. SALEEBY, M.D., F.R.S.E. Two Lectures on BIOLOGY AND PROGRESS. On Thursdays,
March 14, 21, at Three o'clock.

Saturdays.

Sir ALEXANDER C. MACKENZIE, Mus.
Doc., D.C.L., LL.D. Two Lectures on LATEST
PHASES OF MUSIC with Musical Illustrations. On Saturdays, Jan. 19, 26, at Three o'clock.

The Rev. WILLIAM BARRY, D.D. Two Lectures on PAPAL DEPOSING POWER. On Saturdays, Feb. 2, 9, at Three o'clock.

Professor J. J. THOMSON, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S.
Six Lectures on RONTGEN, CATHODE, AND POSITIVE
RAYS. On Saturdays, Feb. 16, 23, March 2, 9, 16, 23, at Three o'clock.

Subscriptions (to Non-Members) to all Courses of Lectures (extending from Christmas to Midsummer), Two Guineas. Subscription to a single Course of Lectures, One Guinea, or Half a Guinea, according to the length of the Course. Tickets issued daily at the Institution, or sent by post on receipt of Cheque or Post-Office Order.

Members may purchase not less than Three Single Lecture Tickets, available for any Afternoon Lecture for Half a Guinea.

The FRIDAY EVENING MEETINGS will begin on January 18, at 9 P.M., when Sir ANDREW
NOBLE, Bart., will give a Discourse on FIFTY YEARS OF EXPLOSIVES. Succeeding Discourses will probably be given by Mr. CHARLES
WELCH, Sir ALMROTH WRIGHT, Professor
I. GOLLANCZ, Mr. J. J. LISTER, Mr. DUGALD
CLERK, COUNT de BOSDARI, Professor
D. J. HAMILTON, Professor J. J. THOMSON,
Professor GEORGE LUNGE, and other gentlemen.
To these Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

Persons desirous of becoming Members are requested to apply to the Secretary. When proposed they are immediately admitted to all the Lectures, to the Friday Evening Meetings, and to the Library and Reading Rooms; and their Families are admitted to the Lectures at a reduced charge. Payment: First Year, Ten Guineas; afterwards, Five Guineas a Year; or a composition of Sixty Guineas.

Books for Sale.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue for DECEMBER Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST
PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved
Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERA-TURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY RE-
PRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

CHAUCER.—A Commentary on the Prolog and Six Tales. Rich in new matter. Subscription price, $2.00. Circular on application.—
Address, H. B. HINCKLEY, 54 Prospect Street,
Northampton, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including
Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth;
Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

FITZGERALD (EDWARD), 1809-1883,
the Famous Letter-Writer and Translator of Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam—Life of, by Thos.
Wright. 63 full page plates in colour. 2 vols.,
8vo, Art Linen, new pub., 24s. net for 10s. 6d.—
WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEP-
HERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GAL-LERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes,
Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories,
Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt.
10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M.
OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham,
S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S
HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

COLLEGE HALL, BYNG PLACE,
GORDON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

RESIDENCE for Women-Students of University College and of the London School of Medicine for Women.

The Slade School Lent Term begins January 7.
Faculties of Arts and Science Lent Term begins
January 15.

The London School of Medicine (Royal Free Hospital) Lent Term begins January 3.

Application should be made to the Principal not later than January 1, 1907.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

THE PREPARATORY SCHOOLS REVIEW,

The Official Organ of
THE ASSOCIATION OF PREPARATORY SCHOOLS,
Edited by G. GIDLEY ROBINSON.

No. 35. DECEMBER, 1906. Price 1s.

CONTENTS.

NOTES BY THE WAY.
ALAN ROKEBY LAW.
PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE.
THE CURRICULUM—A Break with Tradition.
BRITISH ASSOCIATION REPORT ON THE TEACHING OF ARITHMETIC. By the Headmaster of Osborne.
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS. I. By C. C. LYNAM. II. By C. SIMMONS.
ROYAL NAVAL COLLEGE, OSBORNE: An Appreciation and Some Criticisms. By A. E. LYNAM.
FIRST STEPS TOWARD LITERARY STYLE. By the Rev. A. N. MALAN, D.D.
PROPOSED CERTIFICATE FOR TEACHERS OF FRENCH.
CORRESPONDENCE.
RUGBY v. ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL.
PREPARATORY SCHOOLS RIFLE ASSOCIATION.
REVIEWS AND NOTICES OF BOOKS.

Oxford: ALDEN & Co. LTD., Bocardo Press.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co. LTD.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57A Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour),
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine
Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
Tudor Street, London, E.C

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS

THE THAMES

From Chelsea to the Nore. A Series of 31 Full-page
Lithographs (5 in Colour). By THOMAS R. WAY.
With a Descriptive Text by WALTER G. BELL. Uniform with "Reliques of Old London," etc. Limited to 250 copies for sale. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

BRITISH MALAYA

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By Sir FRANK ATHELSTANE
SWETTENHAM, K.C.M.G., late Governor of the Straits Colony and High Commissioner for the Federated Malay States, and Author of "Malay Sketches,"
"The Real Malay," and "Unaddressed Letters."
With numerous Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 16s. net. Second Edition.

A QUEEN OF INDISCRETIONS

The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. By G. P. CLERICI. Translated from the Italian by FREDERIC CHAPMAN, with an Introduction by the Translator and numerous Illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits and Prints.
Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE HOUSE IN ST. MARTIN'S STREET

Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. By CONSTANCE HILL, Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," etc.
With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, etc.
Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

A CRUISE ACROSS EUROPE

Notes on a Freshwater Voyage from Holland to the Black Sea. By DONALD MAXWELL, Author of
"The Log of the 'Griffin.'" With nearly 100 Illustrations by the Author and COTTINGTON TAYLOR.
Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM BLAKE

By ALEXANDER GILCHRIST. Edited with an Introduction by W. GRAHAM ROBERTSON. With numerous Reproductions from BLAKE's most characteristic and remarkable designs. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.
net. New Edition.

SALOME By SALOME

A TRAGEDY OSCAR WILDE A TRAGEDY
Edited with an Introduction by ROBERT ROSS.
With 16 Full-page Drawings by AUBREY BEARDS-
LEY. Foolscap 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

AUBREY BEARDSLEY'S Drawings Illustrating
"Salome" are also published separately in a Portfolio at
12s. 6d. net.

NEW POETRY & BELLES- LETTRES

STRAY LEAVES

By HERBERT PAUL, M.P., Author of "Men and Letters," etc. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. Second Edition.

WINGED WORDS

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. Second Edition.
Mr. C. K. SHORTER in SPHERE:—"A singularly interesting book treating of life in a hundred phases, generally with so sweet a reasonableness that one is carried on from page to page with intense interest."

SONGS TO DESIDERIA

By the Hon. STEPHEN COLERIDGE. Crown 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.

NIGHT AND MORNING: A

POEM. By KATRINA TRASK. Cr. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

GOLD, FRANKINCENSE AND

MYRRH, & OTHER PAGEANTS

By W. GRAHAM ROBERTSON. With twelve full-page Illustrations in Colour by the Author. Uniform with "A Masque of May Morning." Foolscap 4to,
7s. 6d. net.

NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS

THE OLD MAN BOOK

Rhymes by R. P. STONE. 32 Full-page Illustrations, etc. by C. G. HOLME. Crown 4to, 3s. 6d.

TALES OF JACK AND JANE

By CHARLES YOUNG. Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by W. H. WALKER. Small 4to,
3s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVELS

THE BELOVED VAGABOND

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE.

A BOY'S MARRIAGE

By HUGH DE SELINCOURT.

RHODA IN BETWEEN

By E. R. PUNSHON.

THE WILDERNESS

By T. B. CLEGG.

THE DANGERVILLE INHERITANCE

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London: & New York

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	599	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Rejected Addresses	610
Keats	601	Fiction	611
Natives of Australia	603	Drama:
A Book of German Revelations	604	"The Weavers" at the Scala	612
The Text of Shakespeare	605	Theatre	612
Two Jesters and a Philosopher	605	Fine Art:
Formal Logic	606	Brabazon and Others	613
Christmas Books:		Modern Silver and Enamelling	614
Books for Boys—II	607	Music:
Books for Small Children	608	The Joachim Quartet Concerts	614
At Nightfall	609	Correspondence	615
Nugæ Scriptoris:		Books Received	616
XII.—Woman	609	The Bookshelf	617

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

M. PASCAL FORTUNY, in his "Variations sur la voyelle anglaise et le spleen anglais," treats of our spelling gone mad as a result of our temperament. It seems that A, which is not A; E, which is not E, etc., are so many expressions of an Anglo-Saxon state of mind apart; of a rêverie; of an imprecise, intermittent phase or soul peculiar to the British; of an innate sympathy for mezzotint thought, for intellectual half and half. (Weighing us psychologically in terms of drink is as good as "mobled queen"!) These qualities, M. Fortuny allows, could be hurtful. But they are not so to us, as they are counterbalanced by our practical character.

We are conjured to look at our City man. After a day of figures, he makes for his "cottage," reading his "fiction"! Figures, fiction and a cottage are the inseparables of a City man, according to our writer in the revue hebdomadaire. The City man, in a brown study of prophets and thieves, adventures exotic and interplanetary, is lost to time and figures—a type of the extraordinary Englishman. The English merchant is an antinomy. His dream (over the prophets and brigands) defies analysis, is different from that of all other peoples or potentialities. It is not fatalist and Russo-Byzantine, lyric and Latin, finely furious and delirious. It is "sinuous," fluctuating, now all haze and anon lucid, more real than reality. It is the English vowel, neither E nor A, neither U nor IU. You swear it is A, and it shades off into E. Your Protean U takes on itself the diphthongal nuance. It is Shelley in the rôle of Byron's Snake. Your Englishman, then, is an antinomy—or an Antinomian. He is nothing if not religious. Infinity, in England, thy name is Religion—especially in Hyde Park. The gamut runs from "the S. A." (no longer vowels, but sonorous, with drums, and trumpets, and harps of gold—in perspective these last) to, say, the Christian Scientists. Many who are experimentalists—and, as such, terre à terre—are, at the same time, given up emphatically to researches transcendental.

In art what difference between the maestro Van Dyck and the British Reynolds and Gainsborough, creators of womankind full of mysterious fascination—in a milieu of formless, imprecise atmosphere—with countenances of thought multitudinous, almost tumultuous! Burne Jones shadows forth legend: D. G. Rossetti is symbolical: Watts's work is instinct with ideas. And that butt of hostility, Whistler—what is he but one of his own symphonies in white, an azure-and-pink harmony, a variation in grey-and-green? And this is but a British attempt at translating the Indefinite, at eschewing pure colour. His Princesses are, after all, not more distinctive of Whistler than his figures ushered out of cloudland. It is all our spleen.

Literature works out splenetically to the same result in England. Our poets are so vague (like the unaccented vowel closing a British polysyllable)! Rich they may be in contrasted dreamings, visions of the night (or day), nocturnes, that cut away the ground under our feet. (This mixture of metaphors at least is not racy of our soil.) But they cradle us in delicious suspense, only to plunge us into profundities of Unrest or to hoist us to vertiginous heights unknown. Englishmen love Maeterlinck, who publishes only (practically) in England. They dote on Debussy, it seems, that musician who has sought after fugitive modulation, who has found construzioni enarmoniche. The spleen and the vowel! The burden of the U and the UI, and of such as cannot, or will not, fashion for to pronounce them aright! The accusation is a grave one, and made by a friendly Frenchman. The allied Nippon attacks our army, and the cordial Gaul our spelling, but neither of the twain with other intention than that of dissembling deepest love.

Some interesting details of author's royalties and other matters of publishing in America may be gathered from Mrs. Gertrude Atherton's letter in the Times of Thursday last. The royalties on a fifty cent book are at most five cents to the copy for paper-bound books and three cents for cloth-bound. On a book sold at one dollar fifty cents the popular author commands a twenty per cent. royalty, and expects to sell some fifty thousand copies. Profit, some fifteen thousand dollars. Even more interesting, however, are Mrs. Atherton's remarks on the novelist's need to live not remote from the world on a small income, "drawing inspiration from the moon," but widely and fully, with travel, society and all the other means of acquiring knowledge of life. More, travel is sometimes a necessity for the actual work in hand. Mrs. Atherton herself travelled from San Francisco to Sitka, a fortnight's journey, for the sake of one chapter in "Rezánov," and "found it quite worth while." But if such conscientiousness were Mrs. Atherton's only quality she would not be the novelist she is.

Too many modern novelists seem to imagine that to fly all over the world and pitch on a new locale for each new book is to achieve variety and breadth. Too many succeed in dishing up old and stale conventions of character under new and often unpronounceable names. The best short story ever written by a leading modern novelist concerned the West Coast of Africa—a continent he had never visited. The few who knew the places mentioned asked: "When was he there? We never met him." It was an illustration of what the poet did not say: "Better five minutes of imagination at home than fifty years of the literary form of commercial travelling."

The American Ambassadors (we leave the correctness of the term to the discussion of the experts) to England have been more remarkable as men of letters than the British Ambassadors to America; but in Mr. Bryce, who is to succeed Sir Mortimer Durand at Washington, we send a historian and biographer of great eminence. The author of the History of the Holy Roman Empire would be already well known in America, if he had never visited the country before; but Mr. Bryce's greatest work is the monumental "American Commonwealth," a study in history, politics and jurisprudence, to which any change in the future of the United States can only add interest and value. The American Ambassador to England is nearly always a good speaker. Those who have heard Mr. Bryce outside the House of Commons speaking on the more serious of after-dinner topics will feel secure in the reflection that no better speaker could have been chosen. There is a dignity, a limpidity, a force about Mr. Bryce's occasional addresses that compel one to listen with admiration. Let us hope that Mr. Bryce will not be too busy to climb the Rockies and catch many a fine fish in American waters.

One of our greatest provincial journalists has passed away in the person of Sir John Leng, of Dundee. It may have been that this somewhat remote town on the East coast would scarcely have afforded scope for his energy and general faculty. But he proved to be much greater than the circumstances by which he was surrounded, and the journals which he brought into being and conducted are the best monument to his ability. In private life he was a very shrewd and kindly man. The writer of this note still remembers, though it is now many years ago, that when he was commencing journalism Mr. Leng gave him some homely maxims to guide his conduct. One may seem a little droll to those who have not thought about it. It was to the effect that no leader should begin with the word "The," as the employment of this particle had the effect, he considered, of destroying interest. Another was the curious command to remember that it was always the women who made or marred the fortunes of a newspaper. Some of the new lights of journalism might, no doubt, consider Sir John Leng old-fashioned, but there was plenty of shrewd common sense in both of these remarks.

The Moore Memorial Committee, through whose efforts a Celtic Cross was the other day placed over the grave of Thomas Moore at Bromham in Wiltshire, propose to follow up this action by the erection of a new monument in Dublin. The curious cloaked figure, supposed to represent the poet, which has given rise to much mirth and which is one of the familiar landmarks of his native city, will therefore at last disappear from College Green. The remarkable fact about these tardy honours is that Moore's poems are probably less read in Dublin at this moment than at any time during the last fifty years. Mangan, on the other hand, to whom a memorial will shortly be unveiled in Dublin, enjoys a steadily increasing popularity.

The Irish language war still rages with unabated fury in the Irish capital. Formerly confined to a few enthusiasts on the one hand and a few more or less obscure opponents on the other, it now engages the attention of the higher powers, and no public pronouncement is considered complete without a reference to the burning question. The Provost of Trinity College is known to be an uncompromising enemy to the teaching of Irish in the schools, and has spared no pains to express his hostility. On the other hand, Sir Horace Plunkett is known to be a more or less active sympathiser with the work of the Gaelic League, which he regards as a force that makes for righteousness and industrial prosperity. Meanwhile, it is amusing to watch the struggles of the postman with Irish-addressed envelopes, and the still more painful efforts of pedestrians to decipher the Irish characters on the sign-posts. For, in spite of the efforts of the Gaelic League, Ireland is still an English-speaking country.

M. Ferdinand Brunetière, who has just died at the age of fifty-seven, showed in his youth many of the characteristics of those who are destined to follow a literary career. He failed in an important examination, because, while he should have been attending lectures on philosophy or writing Latin verses, he was engaged in wandering through the galleries of the Louvre, or in the study of the origin of species, or the history of languages. But in 1871 he was brought into close contact with the realities of life by the Franco-German War, in which he served, in spite of his defective sight. His life, however, was to be spent in fighting with the pen rather than with the sword, and when peace had been signed, he taught in a school, often, after the fashion of schoolmasters, getting up for the first time in the morning what he was engaged to teach in the afternoon. An attack of his on the naturalistic novel in the pages of the Revue des deux Mondes excited much remark and began his long connection with that well-known magazine. In 1893 he was appointed editor.

M. Brunetière was a critic with principles, too rare a species in the present day, when it is the fashion to regard Christianity and Judaism, Greek and Gothic architecture, Raphael and Hogarth, morality and immorality, Nietzsche and St. Francis, God and the Devil, with the same smiling complacency. His distinctive characteristic was that he applied the principles of the evolutionary school to literary criticism, showing that in literature as in animal life there is continued growth and transformation. Unlike the impressionist school, which maintains that criticism depends ultimately upon the amount of pleasure experienced by the critic, M. Brunetière held that the rank of a literary work is determined by its possession of such qualifications as perfect form and fundamental truth. For this and other reasons he preferred the literature of the seventeenth to the literature of the eighteenth century. M. Brunetière was a militant critic, who delighted in hard hitting, and it is not to be wondered at that he had many enemies. Incidentally it may be remarked that he preferred correcting faults to revealing beauties, holding, as he did, that the former course might do some good, while the latter would only encourage the growth of plagiarism.

It is, no doubt, as well that it has been decided not to hand over the Chapel Royal at Holyrood to the tender mercies of the restorer. And yet many a visitor to the abbeys of Scotland must have wished, as he saw them exposed to the destructive agencies of the weather, that some munificent benefactor, such as was the late Marquis of Bute, might arise to bring them back to their original condition. John Taylor, the Water Poet, is one of the writers who has left us an account of "the sumptuous chapell" of Holyrood, "most richly adorned with all appurtenances belonging to so sacred a place." But the Scotch were sorely tried by the religious sympathies of James II., and when the Prince of Orange landed they vented their iconoclastic fury on the church. It is curious to reflect that the right of sanctuary still exists for four miles round Holyrood. Possibly it was to secure immunity from arrest that Charles X. of France chose Edinburgh as his place of exile, and it is known that he loved the chapel, where he hoped that he might be interred.

At Mr. Murray's premises in Albemarle Street may be seen a beautiful example of the modern art of book-making—the Triumphs of Petrarch, translated by Henry Boyd. It is bound in leather, blind-stamped with a fourteenth-century design, and printed on paper specially manufactured in Italy approaching closely to the old hand-made paper. The type has been specially designed and cut for this volume, and is based on the script used by the best scribes of the last quarters of the fifteenth century, the period in which the art of hand-lettering reached its highest point of perfection in Italy. The large initials are in raised gold, the smaller in blue. The book is illustrated with six facsimiles of fifteenth-century etchings, on which Mr. Sidney Colvin contributes a note. There is an introduction by Dr. Guido Biagi. The price of the volume is £8 8s. net, and there is an edition de luxe at £63 net.

Literary criticism of this volume is perhaps out of place, as it is put forward as a book for collectors, not for students. But it seems a pity that in the title the name of the poet is given as "Francesco Petrarch." Would the translator like to be called "Enrico Boyd" we wonder? Certainly Petrarch would not have liked this hybrid version of his name, nor would he have easily recognised his terza rima in Mr. Boyd's metallic and monotonous couplets. The first lines of the Triumph of Time, for instance, are thus rendered:

Behind Aurora's wheels the rising sun
His voyage from his golden shrine begun.

If the object of this edition was to produce a fine setting for Petrarch's work, as is suggested in the prospectus sent out by the publisher, it would have been just as easy and more satisfactory to publish the "Trionfi" in the original Italian. To the collectors of valuable and beautiful books it makes little or no difference what language they are written in.

The first of Gorki's impressions of America has just appeared in a collection of tales published by the Znanie Company, St. Petersburg, under the title of "The City of the Yellow Devil." Succeeding sketches are to be entitled "The Kingdom of Boredom," "The Mob," and "Charlie Maine." Gorki confines himself in this first sketch to the description of the poorest parts of the city. And he spares not, nor slacks invective. Since "The Jungle," nothing has been written which inveighs with more convincing vehemence against Gold, the Yellow Devil who has completely subjugated man and even the elements to his will.

In February next, from 6th to 12th, with matinées on the 9th and 12th, the Oxford University Dramatic Society will present The Taming of the Shrew. Miss Lily Brayton will appear as Katharina. It is just over ten years since the Society gave performances of this play, when it was played alternately with The Knights of Aristophanes.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Royal Institution.—A Christmas course of lectures, adapted to a juvenile auditory, will be delivered at the Royal Institution by Mr. W. Duddell, on "Signalling to a Distance; from Primitive Man to Radiotelegraphy" (experimentally illustrated). The dates of the lectures are December 27, 29, 1906, January 1, 3, 5 and 8, 1907, at three o'clock.—The following are the Lecture Arrangements before Easter; Professor Percy Gardner, Two Lectures on the Sculpture of Aegina in Relation to Recent Discovery; Professor A. C. Seward, Two Lectures on Survivals from the Past in the Plant World; Professor W. Stirling, Six Lectures on the Visual Apparatus of Man and Animals; Dr. W. N. Shaw, Two Lectures on Recent Advances in the Exploration of the Atmosphere; Major P. A. MacMahon, Two Lectures on The Standards of Weights and Measures; Professor W. W. Watts, Two Lectures on (i) The Building of Britain; (ii) Recent Light on Ancient Physiographies; Dr. W. Martin, Two Lectures on Old Dutch Painting and Painters; Dr. C. W. Saleeby, Two Lectures on Biology and Progress; Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Two Lectures on Latest Phases of Music (with Musical Illustrations); and Professor J. J. Thomson, Six Lectures on Röntgen, Cathode, and Positive Rays. The Evening Meetings will commence on January 18, when Sir Andrew Noble will deliver a Discourse on Fifty Years of Explosives.

Royal Geographical Society.—The Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W., on Monday, December 17, at 8.30 p.m., "Nine Years' Survey Work in Northern China and Mongolia," by Col. A. W. S. Wingates.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, at 8 p.m., Monday, December 17. Cantor Lecture: Mr. A. D. Hall, on Artificial Fertilisers, Tuesday, December 18, 8 p.m.—Applied Art Section: Basket Making, by Thomas Okey. Wednesday, December 19, at 8 p.m.—Fifth Ordinary Meeting.—"Modern Developments of Flour-Milling," by Albert E. Humphries.

Royal Microscopical Society.—Wednesday, December 19, 8 p.m. Exhibition of Slides from the Collection presented to the Society by Mr. Jas. Hilton.

Linnean Society of London.—Evening Meeting, Thursday, December 20, 8 p.m. Dr. A. B. Rendle and others. Botanical results of the third Tanganyika Expedition, 1904-5. Mr. F. Chapman, Fossil Foraminifera of Victoria.—The Balcombian deposits of Port Phillip. Exhibition: Albino Woodlice, by Mr. Wilfred Mark Webb.

Sociological Society, 24 Buckingham Street, Strand. Monday, December 17, 8 p.m. Mr. M. Waxweiler on Sociology as a Province of Biology.

The Jewish Historical Society of England.—University College, Gower Street, W.C. Monday, December 17, 8.30 p.m. Mr. H. S. Q. Henriques. On the Political Rights of the English Jews.

Viking Club, King's Weigh House Rooms, Thomas Street, W.—Friday, December 14, at 8.15 p.m. Sveinbjörn Sveinbjörnsson on Northern Folk-Songs, with vocal illustrations.

Art Exhibitions.—The Artificers' Guild, 9 Maddox Street. Metalwork, fabrics, Martin ware, furniture lettering.—Tooth and Sons: Winter Exhibition.—John Baillie: Tales and Towns of Italy by Jessie Bayes. Drawings by Annie French. Pastels by T. R. Way. November 28 to December 22.—Shepherds: Early British Masters.—Natural History Museum, Romford Road, Stratford: Essex Arts Club: Pictures, etc. October 22 to January 1.—Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street.—T. McLean. Winter Exhibition of Cabinet Pictures by British and Foreign Artists. November 1.—New Gallery. Society of Portrait-Painters. November 7.—Messrs. Agnew. Annual Exhibition on behalf of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution.—

November 7. Goupil Gallery: Memorial Exhibition of Works by the late H. B. Brabazon. November 12. Goupil Gallery Salon.—Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours; Pall Mall East: Winter Exhibition, November 12.—New English Art Club: Deriving Yard: November 19.—New Dudley Gallery. December 3. Sculpture and Drawings by Countess Feodora Gleichen. Medals and Decorative Work by Miss Elinor Hallé. Paintings by Countess Helena Gleichen.—Leicester Galleries: November 24. Arthur Rackham's "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens." Water-colours by W. Lee Hankey, P. A. Hay, Hugh Norris, Graham Petrie and Terrick Williams.—W. B. Paterson: November 17. Pictures by W. Nicholson.—Fine Art Society: December 11. Handmade Glass Lancastrian Lustrated Ware, Jewellery, Ornamental Bookwork by various artists. Cabinet Pictures of Holland by Charles Gruppé. December 12. French Towns and Dutch Dykes; Water-Colours by A. Romilly Fedden. Etchings by Axel Haig.—Royal Photographic Society, 66 Russell Square: November 6 to December 22. 11-5. Photographs by Henry W. Barrett. Admission on presentation of card.—Modern Gallery, 61 New Bond Street. Mater Christi, by H. Salomon. Water-colours by Miss H. Donald-Smith till December 22.—Manchester Art Gallery. Exhibition of Works of Mr. Holman Hunt, including some not on view at the Leicester Galleries.—Grafton Galleries. Women's International Art Club. Annual Exhibition, including copies of Velasquez, by Blanche Williams (Mrs. P. Somers-Cocks). December 12 to December 22.—Messrs. Dowdeswell. Water-colours of Brittany by C. G. Kennaway, December 8.—International Art Gallery, 14 King William Street, Trafalgar Square. First Exhibition, consisting of works by Modern British, French and Dutch Artists. December 12 till January 5.—Doré Gallery. Water-colour sketches of English Gardens, by Godfrey Marsh.—Graves & Co., Oil-paintings of Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, by A. Kossak and Jules Falat.

Plays: Lincoln's Inn Hall. December 12 and 14 at 8.15. December 13 and 15 at 3.15. Eager Heart, by A. M. Buckton.

Concert.—Queen's Hall, Monday, December 17. Richter London Symphony Orchestra at 8 p.m.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge: December 17 and 18. Sale of Coins and Medals. December 19, 20 and 21. Sale of Egyptian Antiquities the property of Mr. de Rustafjaell.

LITERATURE

KEATS

The Poetical Works of John Keats. Edited, with an introduction and textual notes, by H. BUXTON FORMAN, C.B. (The Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is not an exhaustive variorum edition but "a text illustrated by readings and cancelled passages selected from the great mass of manuscript and printed material." The illustrations are fullest in the case of the finest poems. Mr. Buxton Forman considers, and no doubt rightly, that improvements which have not ended in any great excellence are of no great interest. The edition contains all the known verse of Keats, and Mr. Buxton Forman has discovered sixteen new lines on the Eve of St. Mark, in a scrapbook lent to him by Mr. Frank Sabin. These have not been printed in any other edition. They come before the passage beginning:

Als writth he of Swevenis and like that passage are a quotation from the illuminated Legend of St. Mark, which Bertha is reading in the poem. It is not certain, Mr. Forman tells us, whether the British museum holograph was written before or after the draft of which this passage is a fragment, and so whether this passage was rejected by Keats or added as an afterthought. Mr. Forman does not print it in his text, and it cannot be said that it adds much to the poem. It is, like the rest of the quotation, a mere archaistic exercise or piece of local colour, and very likely Keats came to the conclusion that there was local colour enough without it. Still, as the Eve of St. Mark, though a mere fragment, is a masterpiece so far as it goes, we are glad to have all we can get of it.

Mr. Forman in his introduction gives a very full account of all the materials upon which this edition is based and of all discoveries that have been made of Keats's manuscripts up to the present time.

It will be remembered that in 1905 the Clarendon Press published, under the editorship of Mr. E. de Selincourt, a facsimile of the autograph manuscript of Hyperion and also the text of the Fall of Hyperion corrected and amplified from the Woodhouse transcript, which had then recently been rediscovered. This publication in itself is enough to justify the production of a new edition of Keats's poems, at least for those who care to examine the process by which he arrived at his highest beauties. The autograph manuscript of Hyperion was probably intended by Keats for the printers, but he was continually inspired to revise it as he copied it out, and most of these revisions are great improvements. Keats, like Beethoven, was an artist who often slowly laboured perfection out of an idea in which only he could have seen the promise of perfection. He could, no doubt, work quickly enough at times; but he often did his best when he worked slowly, and some of his finest things came to him in the course of revision. No laws can be laid down for the processes of genius. It may accomplish its work at a blow; it may have to hunt for inspiration and seem to be casting about aimlessly until some trifling thing, a word, a rhyme or an image, inspires it and the great verses are made. One can see, for instance, from the manuscript of Milton's "Blest Pair of Syrens" that before he produced the greatest lines of that poem, he had to kindle his genius, as it were, upon fine words, writing them here and there disconnectedly upon the paper, and seeming to reach his final result rather through sound and rhythm and association than through any labour of exact thought. And in that manuscript too one can see that in the course of composition he was sometimes misled by lapses of taste. There are words too precious or too homely suggested and finally rejected no doubt for their incongruity; words which recall the fantastic poets rather than Milton. In the same way Keats was hampered by the literary fashions of his time and particularly of the clique to which he belonged. In his earlier poems he often fell a victim to these fashions, using words too pretty or too definite for their purpose, words which draw attention too violently to themselves and away from the main sense of the passage. It was natural, in the full tide of the romantic movement, that Keats, the most romantic of poets, should prefer anything to the colourless abstract vocabulary of eighteenth-century poetry; but unfortunately Leigh Hunt, his first contemporary master, had a very imperfect taste in words, which through its very imperfections was only too well calculated to infect a youth like Keats. The Cockney School, of which Leigh Hunt was the head, still flourishes among us unchastened. But now, besides writing curious little townified poems about green fields, it builds curious little townified cottages in them. It is not so Elizabethan as it was, and sometimes, instead of discovering the buttercups, it discovers "the iron lilies of the Strand" and other strange things. But whatever its fashions may be, it still has all the literary diseases of an unwholesome town life. There is no wonder that Keats should have caught these diseases in his first youth. The wonder is that he should so soon have set to work to cure himself of them with so much resolution and success. Even in Endymion, full as it is of Cockney excesses, the chastening process has begun. For instance, at line 407 of the first book, Keats first wrote:

Now happily, there sitting on the grass
Was fair Peona, a most tender lass.

No doubt he remembered that Shakespeare called Cleopatra "a lass unparalleled." But the word had lost all its dignity in two hundred years, and in this passage it has a very cocknified justicity. So "Peona, a most tender lass" was changed to "Peona, his sweet sister." A little further on is one of the finest of all his revisions. At line 493 he had written:

'Twas a lay
More forest wild, more subtle cadenced
Than can be told by mortal: even wed
The fainting tenors of a thousand shells
To a million whisperings of lilly bells;
And mingle too the nightingale's complain
Caught in its hundredth echo. . . .

which is pretty enough, but not above the powers of Leigh Hunt. This was shortened into:

'Twas a lay
More subtle cadenced, more forest wild
Than Dryope's lone lulling of her child—which Leigh Hunt could not have written. It is worth remarking that the splendid second line may have been suggested to Keats by the rhyme of child with wild. Some poets have wonderful luck with rhymes. Others, alas, are unfortunate in proportion to their ingenuity.

In the autograph manuscript of Hyperion one can still see some faint traces of the Cockney school; but they were nearly all corrected away. They are not so much actual lapses of taste as miscalculations of effect. In his first draft Keats was sometimes definite where he ought to have been vague, and vague where he ought to have been definite. Thus he wrote:

Not so much life as what an eagle's wing
Would spread upon a field of green-ear'd corn.

Then he altered the first line to:

Not so much life as a young vulture's wing, which is stranger but not better.

But then he saw that vulture and eagle alike had nothing to do with the case, and produced the beautiful final version,

Not so much life as on a summer's day
Robs not one light seed from the feathered grass, which is less definite in the first line and more definite in the second, and in both cases rightly.

Before he accomplished the lines:

Upon the sodden ground
His old right hand lay nerveless, listless, dead, Unscathed; and his realmless eyes were closed—

he had to make a choice among a good many epithets. He tried "nerveless, dead, supine," "nerveless on the ground," "ancient eyes," and "white-browed eyes." Keats always tried to make his epithets vivid and definite, and sometimes, as in the case of "white-browed," he made them too vivid and definite. But "ancient" was not vivid or definite enough. So he gave up the attempt to appeal to the eye in this case, and in the epithet "realmless" got just the mixture of pictorial vagueness and emotional exactitude which he required for the description of an "early god." Further on he had the same difficulty again with Saturn's eyes, calling them "faint-blue" at first, and then altering the epithet to "faded," another change towards vagueness. It is easy to understand why, with such a theme, he tell somewhat under the influence of Milton; for no poet knows so well as Milton when it is right to appeal to the eye, and when to the mind, in descriptions of imaginary beings.

One of the finest improvements in Hyperion is the following. Speaking of Thea, Keats wrote in the draught:

She would have ta'en
Achilles by the hair and bent his neck
Or with a finger eased Ixion's toil.

Then he altered the last line to:

Or with a finger stayed Ixion's wheel

The description here is not of Thea's appearance, which is rightly left vague, but of her strength, which requires to be illustrated by an example appealing to the eye. She herself remains a vast and generalised form, to which the staying of the wheel gives reality, just as a shattered tree gives reality to your idea of lightning. At line 205 of the first book a pretty fancy, of a kind common in Endymion, is eliminated.

Then, as was wont, his palace door flew ope,
As opes a rosebud to a fairy's lute.

So it ran in the manuscript, but Keats struck out the second line; and indeed in such a context, the entrance of Hyperion to his Palace, such prettiness suggests the Cockney School. Keats in his earlier verse was always at the mercy of fancy; and in Endymion it led him many an aimless dance. But in his masterpieces the incomparable richness of his fancy is controlled by imagination, as in the famous description in the Eve of St. Agnes:

In all the house was heard no human sound.
A chain droop'd lamp was flickering by each door;
The arras rich with horseman, hawk, and hound,
Fluttered in the besieging wind's uproar;
And the long carpets rose along the gusty floor.

Mr. Buxton Forman gives us in his notes all the preliminary attempts. The thought expressed in the epithet "besieging" promised at first to be a main part of the description. "But noise of winds besieging the high towers" is one cancelled line, and then we have "but the besieging storm," and so this fancy was gradually subordinated to the purpose of making a vivid picture. Then the lamps at first are inclined to behave as they might in the Castle of Otranto: "The lamps were flickering death shades on the walls." Keats had a good deal of trouble with them before he got them to play their part so perfectly in the whole. "The lamps were dying in—" "But here and there a lamp was flickering out," "A drooping lamp was flickering here and there"—these are all rejected attempts; and besides this we have the statement: "Without, the tempest kept a hollow roar," which, with "the noise of winds besieging the high towers," is all telescoped into "fluttered in the besieging wind's uproar." The third and fifth lines seem to have come without any preliminary attempts and very likely their success dictated the treatment of the rest.

In the process of composition Keats differed widely from Shelley, whose imagination had not usually much fancy to master, or at least not much visual fancy. In Shelley the thought was apt to rush so fast as to leave all material things behind. He relied for his effect on speed rather than on richness. He was lost in the clouds while Keats was still choosing from a multitude of flowers. It was only natural, therefore, that Keats should not care much for Shelley's poetry and should advise him to "load every rift with ore." That was his own practice, and up to the time when his powers were weakened by disease he was still embarrassed by his own wealth. He had not reached the time of life when ideas and actions seem more important than objects. He was still a child picking flowers in the meadows of Spring and content with their beauty. But he had learnt already to choose and arrange his flowers; and his intellect was proving its greatness in the exercise of a self-criticism more searching than was exercised by any other poet of his time. Also before his death, as Mr. de Séincourt has pointed out in his valuable introduction to the "Dream of Hyperion," he had grown ambitious to become something more than a poet of objects and dreams; and the "Dream of Hyperion" is an expression of this new ambition, and of his discontent with all that he had done. It is not a very successful expression, perhaps, though it is much too interesting to deserve its present neglect, but it was written when Keats was so weakened by his last illness that a new kind of poetry was beyond his powers. That he failed in it proves nothing about the limits of those powers; and he is the only poet of his time whose measure we cannot take. Shelley, no doubt, was a greater poet in actual achievement; but, though he died at thirty and though he might have written still greater poetry, probably it would not have changed in character. He had not, as Bagehot put it, "an experiencing mind." But Keats had. Like most great poets he spent his youth mainly in learning his craft, and he learnt it so well that he could write poetry magnificently in almost any style. King Stephen is as Shakespearean as Hyperion is Miltonic. But he was not content to be either Shakespearean or Miltonic: and so both Hyperion and King Stephen are mere fragments. He wished to shake himself free of dreams of the past, and to write the great poetry of his own time. Whether or not he could have done this we cannot tell, but at least he laid broader bases for eternity than any other poet of his time.

NATIVES OF AUSTRALIA

Natives of Australia. By N. W. THOMAS, M.A. (Constable, 6s. net.)

THE native tribes of Australia are now very prominent subjects of anthropological study. They are undoubtedly very archaic communities, and represent an earlier stage in human progress than any other people of whom we have knowledge. Mr. Thomas's book on them is addressed to the curiosity of the general reader, who, commonly, cares for none of these things. The book is meant to awaken his interest, and is an introduction to a large field of study, full of disputable matter. As a rule Mr. Thomas avoids controversy, and gives the facts on which all are agreed. His knowledge of Australian arts and crafts, as represented in museums, is wide and minute. His acquaintance with the entire literature of his subject, early and late, is perhaps unrivalled. The earlier information, the better, in some respects, it ought to be, for the first European observers saw the natives still unsophisticated, and were themselves unbiassed by many controversies which had not yet arisen. On the other hand they had not the patience and long practice and scientific training of recent observers like Professor Baldwin Spencer and Dr. Howitt. Mr. Thomas is familiar with all that has been published, early or recently, and his account of native life, in all its practices and usages, is as satisfactory as the limits and scope of his book permit. His photographs are excellent, and whether he writes on the science, art, crafts, laws, food, sports, religion, magic, or myths of the tribes, he may be studied with confidence and profit. His limits, however, make it hard for him to give a readily intelligible account of a topic which various students understand in various ways, the complex system of marriage rule, and of social organisation.

After recommending the book as learned, trustworthy, and, where lucidity is possible, lucid, we shall take a wider survey of a problem so hard as to seem insoluble with our present knowledge. In perhaps the majority of tribes, the name denoting kinship of a sort—the totem name—descends from mother to children of both sexes. In other tribes this name, with all that it involves, is inherited through the father. In very few tribes this name is not hereditary, but inheritance of all heritable things is through the father. Till recently, English inquirers have supposed that inheritance of the totem name, say Crow—with all the duties and privileges of mutual aid and kindness which are attached to the name—was originally through the mother. To inherit the name through the father was regarded by students as a great step in progress. Recently, however, Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, the celebrated explorers, with Mr. J. G. Frazer, and others, have urged that neither mode of descent of the name is more primitive than the other. A tribe might, as soon as the name became hereditary, let it pass in either line. However, it seems to be universally admitted that, while we know many cases of transference of the descent from the female to the male line, we know none of transference from the male to the female line.

A problem now arises which we cannot pretend to solve. Tribes which permit the totem to descend in the male line have a great and obvious advantage in the struggle for existence over tribes in which it descends through females. Where it descends through males society is based both on kinship and on locality. A man is, by totem, a Crow, his sons and daughters are Crows, his sons' sons are Crows, and presently there arises a local clan of Crows, as much united by the sentiment of kinship and community of local habitation as a clan of MacIans in Glencoe. On the other hand, when the name denoting kin is inherited through mothers, any local set of people necessarily consists of a number of different totem kinships, very capable of internal dissensions. Consequently we naturally expect the people who are solidaires both by kin and locality to have a great advantage in organisation over people united by locality but divided in kin. If any groups started originally from male inheritance of the kin name, their power should be the greater, and their rate of progress the more rapid.

Now that does not appear to be conspicuously the case. The Australian tribes which reckon in the male line are not, in any conspicuous way, more powerful than the neighbouring tribes which count descent through mothers. This may be so because there are no intertribal wars for conquest of territory. Again, if to reckon in the male line is a social advance of which many naked tribes are capable, as they are, how did so relatively civilised a people as the Picts fail to make the advance, if they did fail?

How could "Aryans" miss a form of progress—reckoning in the male line—at which many savage black tribes have arrived? A form of progress it is, for the Greeks, in Homer's time, and the Romans as known in history, had, of course, inheritance through fathers; yet Mr. Frazer, in "Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship," gives many reasons for thinking that the early Greeks and Romans, like many Australian tribes, inherited through the mother, in the royal line. But was this form of succession and inheritance universal, or was it peculiar to the kingly house?

"Not one of the Roman kings was immediately succeeded by his son to the throne." In the same way, between 859 and 1034 A.D. no Scottish king was immediately succeeded by his son or grandson. Tarquinius Superbus, like Malcolm II. of Scotland, is accused of getting rid of men who would have succeeded him on the throne—if it had gone by female descent—in the interest of his own lineal descendant. Malcolm succeeded, Tarquinius failed to place a lineal descendant on his throne. Many Greek traditions, not given by Homer, point in the same direction, though perhaps they are capable of another explanation. Thus the genealogies of Highland clans, after the Norman conquest, usually make a Norman noble marry a Celtic heiress. This looks like a survival of descent through women, but it is a mere piece of genealogical snobbishness; and the Greek legends also may have arisen from the desire to claim descent from a heroic ancestor who fought at Troy. If there were no such local hero, a foreigner was put in the genealogy. But in several African kingdoms, infinitely more civilised than the Australian tribes who inherit through males, the kingship goes through royal mothers. Anybody may be the father.

We have, therefore, to choose between two solutions. (1) The Picts and Latins, though well advanced in civilisation, did not take a step in progress which dozens of Australian tribes have made. This, if true, offers a singular anomaly in social progress. Or (2) the descent in the female line, in the royal family, among Picts and Latins, was the result of a determination to preserve the purity of the royal blood, for "it is a wise child that knows its own father." The latter was the old explanation, and, though old, it is not necessarily erroneous. In short, unless we know that the Picts and Latins, universally, inherited through women, that the rule was not confined to the royal house, we are not obliged to suppose that female descent in the royal house, among Latins and Picts, or among Africans having male descent, is a survival of a universal custom of female descent. It may be a new rule devised for making certain that each king in turn has royal blood in his veins. Among some Australian tribes, says Mr. Thomas, "a son would inherit the position of his father" as headman, if he possessed oratorical or other eminent ability. In South-West Australia the chief was at his death succeeded by his eldest son, unless there was some good reason to the contrary; and in Central Australia, the son of the Alatunja, or "head man," is succeeded by his son. Thus there is, in a very archaic society, a strong tendency towards the inheritance in the male line of such authority as exists. Therefore it seems doubtful, when kingship, in much more advanced societies, descends in the female line, that this is a survival from a period of universal female descent. Not inconceivably it may come from quite a different source—a desire to be certain of the purity of royal blood. Can we suppose that among a people so intensely agnatic and devoted to patria potestas as the historical Romans were, the probable female descent of the kingship was a direct survival of the age when such descent was universal?

The present writer at one time inclined to that opinion, in the case of the Picts. But he does not find any cases, where female descent is the universal rule, of any form of authority being inherited in the female line; while, among Australian tribes where inheritance of authority exists it is inherited from fathers.

ANDREW LANG.

A BOOK OF GERMAN REVELATIONS

Memoirs of Prince Chlodwig of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfuerst.
Edited by FRIEDRICH CURTIUS for Prince Alexander of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfuerst. Translated by GEORGE W. CHRYSTAL, B.A. (Heinemann, 24s. net.)

WHEN this book appeared in its original dress it naturally created a considerable sensation in Germany. Prince Hohenlohe had for two generations held a very high place in European politics, and it was known that his memoirs would cast some light on obscure phases of history. Probably, if he had lived long enough to write his autobiography, his discretion would have come into play, and much that set the gossips talking when these Memoirs were first published would have been omitted altogether. But he left his papers to Dr. Friedrich Curtius, who has more than the usual German love of amassing and publishing documents; and he has thrown his material into a couple of large, and truth to say, somewhat heavy volumes. Students of politics will no doubt toil conscientiously through the nine hundred odd pages, but we question whether any one will make this exploration for pleasure. On the other hand, there are a number of episodes in the life of Prince Hohenlohe and in the history of Germany that the curious will turn to with interest. It need scarcely be said that the dominating figure in the book is that of Prince Bismarck. The simple entry "Bismarck, Prince Otto von," is followed by about three hundred references in the index, and this will give an idea of the extent to which the Iron Chancellor fills the stage. Prince Hohenlohe says very characteristically that while he was in power he dominated all, but after his retirement other and smaller personalities swelled like sponges. The relations between Bismarck and the Emperor are discussed in many pages of reading as interesting as any to be found within the covers of these volumes. The light shed on the negotiations preceding the Franco-Prussian War are also of historical value. The account of the plenipotentiaries who met to discuss what afterwards became the Treaty of Berlin is described with acuteness of vision, and there are many other portions of the book that cannot fail to command attention; but, as we have said, to read it as a whole is a formidable task. Among his many interests Prince Hohenlohe did not number a devotion to letters, and accordingly literature and its professors are not often mentioned here.

THE TEXT OF SHAKESPEARE

The Complete Works of William Shakespeare. Reprinted from the First Folio. Edited by CHARLOTTE PORTER and H. A. CLARKE. With an Introduction by JOHN CHURTON COLLINS. In 13 vols. (Harrap, £4 4s. and £2 2s.)

The First Editors of Shakespeare, Pope and Theobald. By THOMAS R. LOUNSBURY. (Nutt, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE reading public cannot be too grateful to the editors and publishers of this Shakespeare for bringing within their easy reach that which has hitherto been accessible only to millionaires and scholars. The general reader, writes Professor Churton Collins, has :

for upwards of two centuries and a half . . . taken what the poet's editors have chosen to give him, and what they have given him has been a concoction the quality and characteristics of which have been determined partly by the idiosyncrasies of particular editors, and partly by the literary tastes and fashions of particular epochs. In fact, the text of Shakespeare presents, in the nature of the modifications it has undergone, an exact analogy to the exhibition of his dramas on the stage. Hamlet, as represented by Burbage and Lewen, by Betterton, by Garrick, by Booth, by Fechter, by Irving, and under the scenic and theatrical conditions in which they represented him, differed scarcely more than the text of the drama as it appears successively in the First Folio, the editions of Rowe, of Theobald, of Hanmer, of Warburton, of Capell, of the Variorum editors, of Andrew Becket, of Charles Knight, of J. Payne Collier, and of the Cambridge editors. The history of Shakespeare's text is, in fact, the history of a text corrupted beyond all precedent of corruption.

The earlier story of this process may be admirably read in the second book that appears at the head of this article. Dr. Lounsbury, with a learning, a penetration and a scholarly thoroughness beyond all praise, has added to his already invaluable Shakespearean labours by attacking the thorny subject of Pope, Theobald, and the text of Shakespeare; has cleared the tangled brake and disclosed matters which had been long forgotten; and, if the main point of his book concerns, necessarily, the eighteenth rather than the sixteenth century, it is a chapter in literary history that needed to be written before Shakespeare could properly come to his own.

What was once his own, or what stands prima facie a greater chance of being his own than any other text, is that of the First Folio here reprinted verbatim and almost literatim (the editors have disused the long s, printed them for its abbreviation the and adopted the modern usage of i and j and u and v) in thirteen handy little volumes, which contain also valuable introductions on the sources and history of the plays, and all the known portraits of Shakespeare.

The story of the First Folio is as follows. In Elizabethan days, as Dr. Lounsbury points out, the playwright cared no more for the manuscript of his play than the modern journalist for that of his article. It never occurred to Shakespeare to collect or publish (and the fact bears on the views of the Baconian theorists) work that was done not for the library, like the poems, but for the theatre. The plays were sometimes taken down by stenographers and published in inaccurate form. In 1623, seven years or so after Shakespeare's death, his friends and fellow players, John Heminge and Henry Condell, published in folio all the plays of his they could obtain (probably all he wrote except Pericles), and they rounded on the Quartos for being "stolne, and surreptitious copies, maimed, and deformed by the frauds and stealthes of injurious impostors." For all that, criticism has shown (the story is admirably told by Dr. Churton Collins) that in five complete plays the First Folio simply reproduced the Quartos; that in passages of (probably) nine other plays, the editor of the Quartos must have had access to the original manuscripts, and that in certain other plays the printer of the Folio used not the original manuscript but a transcript made for the theatre and "cut" possibly by the author himself. The text of the First Folio, then, is not perfect. It is marred, too, by a healthy crop of printer's errors of its own, due sometimes to want of revision, sometimes to the difficulty of deciphering a bad handwriting. How bad Shakespeare's hand may have been may be partly judged, perhaps, from his signature, which, if it be a fair specimen, would certainly entitle him, as Dr. Churton Collins suggests, to be called "the terror of compositors."

The text, however, if not perfect, is of inestimable value. It gives, for one thing, the text of twenty plays which appear in it alone, which might, therefore, but for it, have been lost to the world. For another, it preserves phrases and words which most subsequent editors have altered through not understanding them, but which more recent scholarship is coming gradually to find correct and full of meaning. Its spelling and punctuation, again, are, as Dr. Churton Collins states, in the main, and especially in the great passages, very carefully revised. The effect of reading the passages with their capitals, spelling and stops as in the First Folio is to find constant revelations of new beauties in rhythm and sense. And an edition like this, which supplies within brackets what does not appear in the Folio (e.g., several important passages of Hamlet) is a treasure that no Shakespearean student, even the humblest, can well be without.

It does not do to be too hard on those who have amended and altered the text of the First Folio. It was to an editor, to Theobald, that we owe one of the most beautiful things in "Shakespeare." Of Falstaff's death the Quartos and First Folio make Mrs. Quickly say: "his Nose was as sharp as a Pen, and a Table of greene fields." One emendation was to make of the last words a stage direction—that here (or perhaps elsewhere in the play) was to be brought on a table belonging to Mr. Greenfield, possibly a property master. Theobald, with an apostrophe and two letters made of it this: "and a' babbled of greene fields," a phrase as exquisite in its context as anything in literature. Still, the instances collected in Dr. Churton Collins's introduction of the harm that has arisen from tampering with the text of the First Folio amount of themselves to a terrible warning; and those who have never studied that text will find in these volumes a world of new beauty and meaning awaiting them, which even the best of the composite texts does not contain.

TWO JESTERS AND A PHILOSOPHER

The Placid Pug and other Rhymes. By THE BELGIAN HARE (Lord ALFRED DOUGLAS). (Duckworth, 3s. 6d.)

Misrepresentative Women and other Verses. By HARRY GRAHAM. (Arnold, 5s.)

The Crackling of Thorns. By DUM-DUM. (Constable, 3s. 6d. net.)

"It may not perhaps be not altogether out of place," say the Belgian Hare's publishers, "to state that these rhymes are not intended primarily for children." A first glance at the poems makes the caution seem unnecessary. What should children do with the profound thought, the lofty symbolism, the spacious philosophy, that inform every line of these expositions of spiritual law in the natural world? Philosophy is not, we know, harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose; but the ease and felicity of the Belgian Hare's diction and the music of his rhymes will not blind the enlightened reader to the moral and sociological import of such poems as the "Ballad for Bishops" or the "Versicles for Vegetarians"; while in the "Dirge for Departed Candidates" we have a fine example of a rare species in literature—the examination of a whole system of philosophy conveyed in terms of pure poetry. Mr. Arthur Symonds would probably quarrel with the poem because it has a meaning besides a sound; but we would ask whether any one can find a parallel, in lyric beauty combined with trenchant philosophical wisdom, for this stanza:

Mere non-belief in his existence may Seem, to one emptying a festive flagon
In the interior of the "Wasp and Wagon,"
A very trifling matter anyway.
But it is most annoying to the Dragon.

And the statement disposes at once and for ever of the whole of the idealist system of metaphysics. Irascor—ergo sum, says the Dragon; and Johnson's thump of the stick, Napoleon's "Who made all those?", the famous Occam's Razor: Entia non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem, fade into insignificance as final statements.

Occam's dictum might be raised, perhaps, by untutored minds as a strong objection to the sociological thesis put forward in the "Ballad for Bishops":

For if a nation's moral status
Be measured by prolific habit,
Between man and the meanest rabbit
There is an evident hiatus.

Each year, by lowest computations,
Six times the rabbit rears her young,
And frequent marriages among
The very closest blood relations

In very tender years ensure
A constant stream of "little strangers,"
Who, quickly grown to gallant rangers,
See that their families endure.

But our author has the courage of his opinions: he sees his subject from the point of view of the Coney Hatch, and his teaching comes pat as a valuable support to Father Bernard Vaughan's efforts to secure large families.

We will close our quotations from the work of this epoch-making poet with a simple moral lesson, charged with the profundity of the great thinker and the sweet humility, the wide charity, the lofty patience, of a great soul. He is speaking of the Crab:

No serious student of his life and ways
Will venture to impugn his common sense;
His tact and moderation win high praise
Even from those whose faculties are dense
And blind to the false issues which they raise
When they accuse him of malevolence.

"But, ah!" these shallow hide-bound pedants cry,
"If to the Crab all virtues you concede,
If his intentions are not evil, why
This sidelong walk, these flanking steps that lead
To no advancement of Humanity,
No exaltation of the mortal breed?" . . .

Peace, peace, the Crab adopts a side-long walk,
For reasons still impossible to see.
And if his pride permitted him to talk
To any one who did not do as he,
His instinct would be, probably, to balk
The hopes of vulgar curiosity.

And while the schoolmen argue and discuss,
And fill the air with "whats," and "whens," and "whys,"
And demonstrate as: thus, and thus, and thus,
The Crab will pulverise their theories,
And put an end to all this foolish fuss
By walking sideways into Paradise.

After the perusal of these lofty rhymes, a volume which bears on its flyleaf the warning: "No admittance except on pleasure" must inevitably seem frivolous, worldly, and hollow. Mr. Harry Graham writes (we blush to state it) of Women, Misrepresentative Women. Sometimes, it is true, his muse rises to great heights; his Pegasus soars with unabated wing so high as the consideration of Miss Corelli and Mrs. Grundy. On the other hand his worldly fancy leads him astray to dwell with pleasure on shocking characters like Eve and persons of inadequate sense of respectability like Lady Godiva. But though Mr. Graham is sadly tarred with the brush of this evil world, we must confess—with pain, but with conviction—that we have been hugely amused—have caught ourselves laughing aloud—at his clever, ingenious and sparkling verses. We could only wish that so great gifts as his had been devoted to a higher cause.

The work of "Dum-Dum" is well known, and we need say no more here than that "The Crackling of Thorns" contains all the neat wit, the unobtrusive scholarship, the geniality and the charm of the best of Mr. Kendall's work. No anthology of humorous verse will be complete in future without "Love's Colours."

FORMAL LOGIC

Reason, Thought, and Language. By DOUGLAS MACLEANE, M.A. (Frowde, 15s. net.)

THIS is a pleasantly written, discursive, fairly comprehensive book on logic, and a notable feature of it is the unusual number, variety, and freshness of the examples given. Its main object is stated to be "to strengthen and revivify Formal Logic," and—oddly enough—to do so "by bringing it into closer connection with the living facts of thought and speech."

Such a novel attempt naturally excites the reader's curiosity, since it has hitherto been the attacks on Formal Logic which claim to take especial notice of the living facts referred to. But it soon appears that Mr. Macleane means at different times two very different things by Formal Logic, and that the only defence of tradition he seriously attempts is directed—successfully enough—against a well-known intemperate attack on the Syllogism, made more than twenty years ago, and never reprinted. It is certainly worth while to recognise that all reasoning is syllogistic, but one may at the same time see that formality in logic is only a partly necessary evil, to be discouraged as far as possible; for instance, to the extent of discarding the doctrine of mood and figure, and all that has crept in merely for the sake of it.

Stated shortly, the chief objection which Mr. Macleane has failed to meet is that the more intentionally formal our logic the less can the actual risk of "ambiguous middle" be taken into account. And those who bring the charge explain further that the type of really misleading ambiguity is not simply "a word with two meanings," but any word which is insufficiently defined. The point that is generally missed in this explanation is the qualification "insufficiently." One of the most troublesome of the facts of thought and language is that a definition which suffices for one purpose does not always suffice for another; for instance, it may be true that Smith is a poet, if we mean merely a man who writes verses, but not if we restrict the name to those whose verses are above a certain standard of poetic inspiration. Take any syllogism whose minor premiss says that Smith is a poet, and how are we to deal fairly with the question whether such a syllogism has three terms or four unless we are prepared to ask also in what different senses the premisses are true and false? But then we open the floodgates of those very inquiries into the "matter" which Formal Logic neglects of set design. This is the point which a defender of Formal Logic has nowadays to deal with, and especially if he wishes to take the living facts of thought and language into account. It is not enough to protest, as Mr. Macleane does, that the new logic is as different from the old as a cuckoo from a hedge-sparrow in the latter's nest. Metaphors are cheap, and perhaps the new logic should rather be likened to the railways that killed the coaching industry. At any rate both kinds of logic—if for the moment we allow the newcomer to use the name—recognise that a syllogism with an ambiguous middle is invalid; and the new logic claims to guard better than the old against this pervasive and important kind of fallacy. On what ground—except that of disliking trouble—shall we decide to keep out of sight the kind of ambiguity which, being least obvious to the careless reasoner, is most effectively misleading?

Nevertheless the freedom of Mr. Macleane's illustrations is a step in the right direction, and may by itself help the reader to see how actual reasoning, when its validity is questioned, raises problems of interpretation. Once discover that the validity of a syllogism depends on what its premisses are "meant to mean" and we are well on the way towards seeing that we cannot push questions of interpretation far enough to guard against the four-term fallacy without raising the question how far the premisses are true in fact. In other words, no subtle ambiguity of a middle term can be detected except through inquiries into the matter.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

BOOKS FOR BOYS—II

"FOR THE ADMIRAL," by W. J. Marx (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is a tale which every man who contemplates writing a book for boys should be compelled to read. It is a model which he would do well to follow; for Mr. Marx, though he has done good work before, has never done anything to equal this. Lack of space prevents our doing full justice to it, and we will not spoil the readers' enjoyment by giving them a synopsis. It is by much the best book of its kind sent us for review this season, and stands head and shoulders above its rivals. Not its least merit is that it is original and owes nothing to any book that we have read. It won the Bookman £100 prize, and it deserved to win it. It is an exceptionally well-written and clever piece of work which should take its place among boys' classics.

Of the many books dealing with the subject of exploration sent us, not the least valuable is a handsomely illustrated volume entitled "The World's Exploration Story," by Albert Lee (5s.), sent us by Mr. Melrose. Mr. Lee's object has been to give his readers not only an account of the progress of exploration from the earliest times (and we are glad, by the way, that he does not confine himself to the achievements of British explorers), but also a good working geographical knowledge of the countries of which he writes. His book is a valuable compilation, and we should like to see it in every school library.—"The Lost Explorers," by Alexander Macdonald (Blackie, 6s.), though not of the same value as Mr. Lee's book, is a fine piece of work, which we place many degrees higher than the bulk of tales of adventure written for boys. It deals with the experiences of two boys who, after digging for gold in Australia, in the company of a Scotsman, set out across the "trackless desert" in search of a mysterious mountain. Mr. Macdonald knows the country, and he bases his book on actual experiences. He writes well, and his characterisation is excellent.—"Among the Dark Mountains, or Cast Away in Sumatra," by David Ker (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), is another book based on the author's own experiences. It is packed with exciting incidents—one of the best of which is the account of the eruption of Krakatoa. Mr. Ker's descriptive passages are charming; and his book, taken as a whole, is one of the best that has come into our hands, and worth more than the modest price asked for it.—"Stories of South Pole Adventure," by Frank Mundell (Sunday School Union, 1s. 6d.) is a readable and unpretentious little book, as good as it could be within its limits.

Mr. Michael Macmillan's "The Last of the Peshwas" (Blackie, 2s. 6d.) is a splendid story of the third Maratha War, full of perilous adventures, and in every way worthy of the author of "Tales of Indian Chivalry" and "In Wild Maratha Battle."—In "The Boy Hero of Erin," Mr. Charles Squire, the author of an excellent little popular work on "The Mythology of Ancient Britain and Ireland," re-tells the exploits of Cuchulain and the Champions of the Red Branch of Ulster. It is well done, and we hope Mr. Squire will continue his work and re-tell many more of the old mythological romances of Ireland.—Mr. George Manville Fenn, in "Tention!" (Chambers, 5s.), tells a stirring story of the Peninsular War with his customary skill and spirit. His two heroes, a private and a bugler, become separated from their comrades on the march, and the book is chiefly concerned with their adventures before they rejoin the ranks.—Another rousing tale of adventure sent us by the same publishers is "Foray and Fight," by John Finemore (3s. 6d.), the scene of which is laid in the Balkans.—Mr. Everett McNeil appears to be a practised hand, though we do not remember to have read any of his stories before. "The Lost Treasure Cave" (Chambers, 5s.) is a capital account of experiences with the cowboys of Colorado, which few boys will be able to put aside till the last page is turned—and read. We hope Mr. McNeil will fulfil his promise of a sequel.—"Jack Haydon's Quest" (by John Finemore. Black, 5s.) was for treasure and a missing father, and it led him into many exciting experiences in Burma, which Mr. Finemore recounts with skill.—Mr. Walkey's large circle of admirers will not be disappointed with his "Kidnapped by Pirates" (Warne, 3s. 6d.). His hero is a fine character, who, we cannot help thinking, has faced sufficient adventures to last him for the rest of his life.—Messrs. Nelson send us a nicely illustrated and well-printed book by Mr. Harold Avery, entitled "Firelock and Steel," a story of the "good old days" (5s.), which, though the opening chapters are not strikingly original, grows enthralling as the reader proceeds. It is much better written than the majority of boys' books, it is not overweighted with horror piled on horror's head, and there is about it a more healthy tone than pervades the majority of stories of a similar kind. It is a book we can confidently recommend to any one wishing to make a handsome present to a boy of any age over ten.—Mr. W. J. Marx's "The Gold Hunters" (S.P.C.K.) is worth more than the half-crown asked for it. It is full of adventure—an exciting incident to almost every chapter—and makes excellent reading.—"King by Combat," by Fred Whishaw (Cassell, 3s. 6d.), is a well-told tale of "a fight for power in a wild land"—Rhodesia. Mr. Whishaw knows how to handle his characters, and there is plenty of good fighting in his pages.—In "Deerfoot in the Forest" (Cassell, 2s. 6d.) Mr. Edward S. Ellis, following the precedent of Cooper's Leather-Stocking, brings his hero to life again. The series of adventures which fill the present volume will convince his admirers that his vitality is undiminished. He is the same old hero.—Mr. Frank Powell has certainly found an idea which is at least original in "The Wolf-Men" (Cassell, 3s. 6d.), a tale of adventures in a subterranean country discovered by certain explorers on their way to the North Pole. The author has more than a suggestion of the power and imagination of Jules Verne.

"The Duffer," by R. S. Warren-Bell (Nelson, 5s.), though neither a tale of school-life nor a procession of exciting adventures, should have a large circle of readers among boys who have grown weary of the sameness of the fare provided for them. "The Duffer," as George Dennet is called by his class-mates, does not like school, but he goes a little further in his dislike than most boys, and gets himself expelled. The scapegrace hero, however, is not without strength and manliness, and an artist friend succeeds in bringing out the best that is in him. Mr. Warren-Bell writes naturally, and his story is well illustrated; the "get-up," as in all Messrs. Nelson's books, is excellent.—From the same publishers comes a very valuable book entitled "How it Works," by Archibald Williams, which deals in simple language with steam, electricity, light, heat, sound, hydraulics, etc., and with their application to apparatus in common use. Here the reader will find explained in a concise, straightforward manner the working of everything from a locomotive or a motor-car to a bunsen burner or a Westinghouse brake. The book is profusely illustrated with helpful diagrams, and we are glad to note that an index has been provided. We do not know how the publishers managed to produce it for three-and-six.

Little need be said of the stories of school life. We found Mr. Robert Leighton as good as ever in "Monitor at Megson's" (Cassell, 3s. 6d.). He has the merit of never being dull or tiresome.—Mr. Harold Avery, in "Play the Game" (Nelson, 3s. 6d.), gives us an old dish—the story of the boy suspected and cleared of suspicion in the closing chapters—with new garnishing; and Mr. Fred Whishaw strikes one note of originality in "The Boys of Brierley Grange" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.). All three books are undistinguished, but readable.

We have received from Messrs. Blackie new editions of "Lords of the World," a tale of the fall of Carthage and Corinth, by A. J. Church (3s. 6d.); "Olaf the Glorious," a historical story of the Vikings, by Robert Leighton (3s.); "Bunyip Land," a tale of adventure in New Guinea, by George Manville Fenn (3s.); "To Greenland and the Pole," by Gordon Stables (3s.); "A Thane of Wessex," a story of the Viking raids into Somerset, by Charles W. Whistler (2s. 6d.); "King Olaf's Kinsmen," a story of the last Saxon struggle against the Danes, by Charles W. Whistler (2s. 6d.), and Henty's "With Clive in India"; "Condemned as a Nihilist," a story of escape from Siberia; "Under Wellington's Command"; and "Both Sides the Border," a tale of Hotspur and Glendower, in a uniform edition at 3s. 6d. each, well bound and well printed.

Two handsome volumes sent us by Messrs. Cassell and the R.T.S. respectively, are the bound volumes of "Chums" (8s.), and "The Boys' Own Paper" (8s.).

BOOKS FOR SMALL CHILDREN

"THE BOOK OF GILLY," by the Hon. Emily Lawless (Smith, Elder, 6s. 6d. net) is the story of four months of a boy's life spent on an island off the Kerry coast. It is delightfully written and has all the charm of Kerry hills and lakes, and the music of the Kerry brogue.—"The Land of Play" (Arnold, 3s. 6d.) consists of four charming little stories: "Luck Child," "The Princess and the Ordinary Little Girl," "Professor Green," and "A Position of Trust," of which the first is the best. Mr. Gilbert James's illustrations are worthy of the text.—Among the stream of children's books which pour from the press at this season of the year, one looks instinctively for one from the pen of "E. Nesbit." This Christmas she has given us "The Story of the Amulet" (Unwin, 6s.): a delightful book, destined to be read and re-read by (or to) her small admirers, before a glowing fire on many a chill winter's day. For that is the time to appreciate Mrs. Hubert Bland.—All that makes Christmastide a season of enchantment to children is described by Miss Evelyn Sharp in "The Child's Christmas" (Blackie, 6s. net). Miss Sharp writes simply and well, and though many of the colour illustrations are very crude and the faces of the children remind us of the rag-dolls of our childhood, the publishers have turned out a very handsome volume. Mr. Robinson's black-and-white drawings are excellent.—In "The Enchanted Land" (Jack, 7s. 6d. net), Mrs. Louey Chisholm tells old tales over again in childlike, poetic prose; but here again many of the colour pictures are insipid and leave a great deal to be desired. Miss Cameron can do better.—The letterpress of "Blackie's Children's Annual" (3s. 6d.) is varied and, on the whole, good, and the volume contains capital illustrations.—The same may be said of Messrs. Ward, Lock's "Wonder Book" (3s. 6d.), which is really good value for the money. Both cover and frontispiece are excellent and the end-papers are the best we have seen for a long time.—To their series of "Animal Autobiographies," Messrs. Black have added a new volume: "The Fox," by J. C. Tregarthen (6s.)—a cleverly and brightly written book which should find many readers. We may question whether the reverent young cub would habitually speak of its mother as "the vixen," but the class of reader for whom the book is designed is not critical in such matters, and we can heartily recommend "The Life-Story of the Fox" as an excellent gift-book. The illustrations are good and well reproduced.—A nature book at once useful and interesting—free from technicalities and well written—is Mr. R. B. Lodge's "The Story of Hedgerow and Pond" (Kelly, 5s. net). The coloured illustrations and the pen-and-ink sketches in the margin are much better than those one is accustomed to find in works of this class.—"The Book of Animals," by Horace G. Groser (Melrose, 5s. net), is full of information for a boy with a turn for natural history, but the volume (284 pp. only) is nearly as weighty as one of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Messrs. Jack's beautifully illustrated editions of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" and the Lambs' "Tales from Shakespeare" are volumes which it is now the ambition of every child to possess. This year they send us a "Child's Life of Jesus" by C. M. Steedman, illustrated by Paul Woodroffe (10s. 6d. net), in the same series. It is beautifully bound, printed on good paper, and well written—an ideal present were it not for the illustrations. They are the poorest we have ever met in a volume published by Messrs. Jack. Frankly, we consider them revolting. They are calculated not only to spoil a really good book—to destroy its chances of the success it merits—but to undo any good which the text, by the simplicity and beauty of its teaching, might do. It is the best child's Life of Jesus we have read, but we shall cut out the illustrations before putting it into the hands of any small friend of ours.—The stories in the "Flower Fairy Tale Book," by Isabella C. Blackwood (Nutt, 5s.) will prove attractive reading to the young. Mr. Bishop-Culpeper's illustrations are very fine.—In "Grimm's Household Stories," illustrated by Dorothy Furniss (1s.), and "Pictorial Rhymes and Verses," with drawings by M. Edwards (S.P.C.K.), the children will welcome old favourites which never lose their freshness.

From Mr. George Allen come two of the best little books of the season, "The Man in the Moon" and "The Adventures of Mr. Rabbit and Uncle Fox," both by S. L. Bensusan. The first is an original fairy tale and the second an adaptation from the "Tales of Uncle Remus," and they form the opening volumes of a new Lilliput series (1s. 6d. each). Mr. Bensusan has found in "Carton Moorepark" an admirable interpreter of his charmingly written tales.—Mr. Harry Rountree's illustrations to "The Young Gullivers" (Cassell, 1s. 6d.) are worthy of a much better story than Mr. Hamer tells.—A selection of "Grimm's and Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales" (Blackie, 5s.) makes a fine volume, suitably illustrated by Miss Helen Stratton.—"The Old Man Book" (Lane, 3s. 6d.) is a collection of limericks which can have no possible attraction for a child, while an adult will find many of them merely vulgar. The pictures are the best part of the book.—The same criticism applies to "Round de Ole Plantation" (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), by G. F. Christie. The text consists of "coon songs" suitable for the "niggers" who people the beach at Yarmouth.—"Little Pickles" (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) comprises a series of verses which depend chiefly on the illustrations for their effectiveness.—"The Browns: a Book of Bears" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), by B. and N. Parker is a capital book, and contains very charming pictures. Bruin has never had better interpreters.—From the same publishers comes "The House That Glue Built" (3s. 6d. net), by C. A. and G. A. Williams, a very original and ingenious idea. There are pictures of the various rooms and their furniture—the latter to be cut out and pasted down in the dining-room, library, bedrooms, and so on. It is a book to engross the attention of an enterprising child for many a dark December day.

"Five-Minute Stories," by Mrs. Laura E. Richards (Allenson, 5s.) is full of variety. The author seems to have anticipated the children's every mood and fancy, and the simplicity of language which characterises the book is not its least charm.—"The Silver Crown" (Allenson, 2s. 6d. net) is a smaller volume by the same author, full of pretty fancies.—Mrs. Edwin Hohler, a niece of Mrs. Molesworth, has written an attractive little Christmas story in "Peter" (Constable, 3s. 6d.). To the small hero belongs a fine old English bulldog who plays as important a part as his master. The book is well written and there is no straining after effect.—Mrs. Molesworth herself—who needs no recommendation from us—has added to her long list another story for children, entitled "Jasper" (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.).—The bound volume of "St. Nicholas" (Macmillan, 6s.)

is, as usual, full of good things.—“The Escape of the Mullingong” (Blackie, 5s.), by Mr. G. E. Farrow, is a long way “after” “Alice in Wonderland,” and Mr. Gordon Browne’s pictures are as good as the text—and no better.—Messrs. Jack’s series “Told to the Children” is so well known that it is unnecessary for us to say more than that this year’s volumes are as good as their predecessors. Of a new series entitled “The Children’s Heroes”—issued by the same publishers—we have received volumes on Sir Francis Drake, Lord Roberts, and Lord Clive (1s. 6d. net each). They are admirably done.

AT NIGHTFALL

THE shadows fall,
The night is near,
She spreads her pall
Ghostly and drear.

The stir of toil,
The noise of play,
The hum and moil
Fade with the day.

And brooding sleep
With guardian wing
Her watch will keep
O’er everything.

The leaves shiver
At breath of night;
Reeds in the river
Shake with delight.

Silence grows deep,
No sound is heard
Save the bells of the sheep,
The wing of a bird.

Sweet Sleep o’er all
Her spell has cast.
The shadows fall,
The day is past.

D. M. C.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

XII. WOMAN

To what do the later centuries, and our western civilisation, owe the recognition of woman as man’s equal, and not his inferior or his servant? How has it come about that all the nobler spirits of our race now act on that belief? It has been a long and slow evolution out of many lower states and inharmonious elements, but the dispassionate student of history cannot fail to note the change that has been wrought both in the belief and practices of the race on this matter since the commencement of the Christian Era. Although it has commingled with earlier elevating influences, it is sometimes forgotten that what we now rejoice in is almost entirely the product of the Christian Ethic; that it is due to the growth and working of the “grain of mustard seed,” which has become so mighty a tree that the birds of the air lodge in its branches, to quote from one of the ancient parables of the Kingdom.

It is not, however, the emancipation of women from the fetters by which they used to be held down, when “cabined, cribbed, confined,” within a monotonous circle of demands by taskmasters, that is now referred to. It is their own proved capacity for higher things that has brought about their freedom from these restraints. But the new type of character which has grown up and flourished under that Tree “whose leaves are for the healing of the nations,” has neither been fully appraised, nor always traced to its historic source. In its intrinsic nature it is wholly immeasurable by utilitarian standards. As to its origin it is customary in certain quarters to set it down to the “increasing purpose” of the ages, and the slow evolution of cosmic forces, which have differentiated it from age to age, without any special heritage from Palestine. It is said that the rights as well as the duties of women were recognised both in Greece and Rome; and that provision was made for their realisation. Those who affirm this should surely offer proof of the assertion. There were a few cultivated women in these countries—poets, artists, even philosophers—but their “sphere” was limited to the commonplaces of domestic work. It was often not only menial, but degraded; and it was not until the leaven of Christianity had time to permeate the world, to transfigure its earlier ideals—and to reverse some of them—that real justice was done to women. If we take our stand on the facts of authentic history, we are in a position to affirm that the new type of character, in which the world now rejoices, entered into the world at the birth of Christ. It has been fostered through the reverence paid for centuries to the blessed Virgin; and, in Catholic lands, adoration has kept it up. But it has permeated the world by passing over the visible boundaries of the Church which created it, interpenetrating Christendom. Its influence has also “gone out into all lands, and its words to the ends of the world.” As a result, a new type of graciousness has been developed in woman; and this has reacted in the elevation, and refinement, of the characters of men.

There is no kind of influence which men receive from men, leading to that elevation and refinement, at all comparable to what they obtain from women. It is, as a poet puts it,

An overseeing power to kindle and restrain,

And similarly, there is no influence that women receive from women at all comparable in strength to that which they obtain from men. But, in both cases, the elevation and refinement are due to those influences which the Christian Religion has brought into prominence, and kindled into life. We can trace its many phases from the child to the girl, from the maiden to the matron, and from her to the aged lady. We see it in the new value given to infant life since the Christian era began, in the wondering instincts of girlhood, in the pure devotion of joyous life-companionship, in the sanctity of maternal care, in the serene beauty and glory of old age. Take one of them, as an example of the rest, the unfolding of the promises of infancy in girlhood. A great physician once said to the writer: “I have had large experience of men and women, and I tell you there is nothing in all God’s universe so beautiful as the character of a noble, well-trained English girl. It is the loveliest thing God ever made; its affection, its purity, its aspiration, its sympathy, its self-sacrifice, its gracious goodness; but we owe it all to Jesus Christ. The fashionable world often kills it, the ambition to be known and admired always takes its bloom away; but, in its exalted purity, there is nothing like it to be seen, and known, and rejoiced in, throughout all this world of ours.”

And this leads on to the many-sided charm which every refined spirit knows. The name of Lady is, like

The grand old name of Gentleman,
Profaned by every charlatan, often "soiled by ignoble use," and still oftener misapplied. But what does it include within its all-embracing fulness? This may be stated both positively and negatively. It includes refinement, gentleness, unassumingness, reserve, sincerity, trustfulness, restraint, graciousness; politeness, joyousness, consideration for others, with no love of display, of gossip or frivolity for gossip or frivolity's sake, no loud laughter, or rattling talkativeness, but sweet gentle speech, endless tact, self-effacement, appreciation of others; no artificiality, no mimicry of rank, no desire to be in the swim, to be known of all, or praised by every one; no envy or jealousy, but ceaseless readiness to help other people in works of service. It is not meant that these phases are always to be seen in union, or juxtaposition. They are often latent elements in a character that is many-sided, although its root is one. Their existence in varying degrees gives variety to the stem, and beauty to the flower and leaf, while all are sprung from a central root. At the same time their evolution from that root does not prevent the grafting of additional branches from other trees.

How different they all are from the noisy clamour of the suffragettes—appalling word—those stern advocates of women's rights, with their demand for entrance into the rough arena of masculine achievement, their claim for an equality that would unsex them, in its crude rivalry and indiscriminate ambition. They are the outcome of the noblest altruism, an altruism so disinterested as to be beyond the vision of the self-seeker. Attainments of every sort are prized, all excellences are coveted, but they are rejoiced in less as personal possessions than as gifts conferred for use.

Here again the poets help us. They write of the "domestic Queen, where grandeur is unknown." And of the maiden:

High is her aim as heaven above,
And wide as ether her good will;
And like the lowly reed, her love
Can drink its nurture from the scantiest rill:
Insight as keen as frosty star
Is to her charity no bar,
Nor interrupts her frolic graces
When she is, far from these wild places,
Encircled by familiar faces.

O the charm that manners draw,
Nature, from thy genuine law!

She, in benign affections pure,
In self-forgetfulness secure,
Sheds round the transient harm, or vague mischance,
A light unknown to tutored elegance.

So far some characteristics of the girl, "whose blushes are joy-flushes"; and of the woman, the same poet writes:

I saw her upon nearer view,
A Spirit, yet a Woman too!
A countenance in which did meet
Sweet records, promises as sweet;
A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food;
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles.

A Being breathing thoughtful breath,
A traveller between life and death;
The reason firm, the temperate will,
Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
A perfect Woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command;
And yet a Spirit still, and bright
With something of angelic light.

The formation and development of ideal friendship has been largely due to remote ancestral influences, unconsciously inherited from past generations. But it is more frequently the result of those ties which originate in conscious experience; and there can be little doubt, again to refer to what is central, that the influence of the character of woman on man, and of man on woman—to exalt, ennoble, consolidate, and advance—is the supremest influence at work in this world. It gives the freshest impetus to all endeavour. It dispels life-weariness, and that terrible ennui that is so often due to the decay of enthusiasm. Every one knows the state produced by long pondering of "the riddle of the painful earth," when the questions arise, "cui bono?" "Is life worth living, with all its dreariness and pettiness?" "Is continuance on this earth desirable when even new excitements lose their interest in the fierce struggles for existence, when only the fittest to live survive?" In such states, is there anything as restorative, or full of benediction, as those ideal friendships between man and woman, so refined and glorified that their kingdom is, where time and space are not?

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

REJECTED ADDRESSES

SOME little time ago there came into my hands a short story, written, I should say, about fifteen years since by a novelist who quite recently has published a romance which very good critics have pronounced to be one of the most skilfully written in the English language. I am not concerned for the moment in discussing the merits of that book, but my readers may take it for granted that they are unquestionable. A reviewer who has grown grey in his profession told me not long ago that he kept this particular romance at his side and had read it from beginning to end no fewer than six times, and he is certainly not one to be fascinated by second-rate merit. My point, however, is that in the short story referred to the friendliest eye could discover not a scintilla of the promise that it ought to have contained. The thing was crude, ill-considered, ill-written, with a very bad plot and utterly lacking in any descriptive style or quality. Probably it would never have been preserved but for the fact that it had got into the hands of some kind of literary agent who steadily hawked it about for a decade or so without obtaining a single offer or seeing the ghost of a publisher. This example ought to be very encouraging to young writers. My belief, founded on a good many years of experience, is that the best of them are the most prone to send absolute rubbish to journals and magazines, and that they often do so with the sanguine hope that the editorial eye will discover some shining merit in the stuff. The man of a good all-round talent is much less likely to be what the Scotch call "fushenless," than the youngster of genius. Mediocrity does not possess these shining hopeful eyes that are so deceiving to their owner, and yet so often bring at length his promise to performance. Mediocrity soon learns to keep to its own just level, never rising on the one hand to inspiration, never on the other sinking to futility. And this makes one wish that the average editor would attend more closely to his post-bag. No doubt it is on the whole a wearisome piece of furniture. Morning after morning it comes laden with impossible literary efforts. Any one who has been in the habit of examining these would-be contributions systematically, must have come to the conclusion that the vast majority of those who write have sat down to their self-chosen task without any qualification whatever for it. They do not know that one of two things is essential.

In the first place, he who is not oppressed with the sense of his own genius will do well to consider what it is that a particular publication wants. Before sending off his composition to the editor he might usefully place himself for a moment in the legendary chair, and ask what judgment he would pass on his own offer. If his verdict be even slightly against, he may be sure that a stranger sitting in the seat of judgment will be almost certain to issue a very decided negative. If he have talent only, he must consider times and seasons and that curious intangible quality for which topicality is too gross a name. Ideas at a particular time seem to be lurking in the air or, more properly speaking, in the distance. Out of it they flash, it may be swiftly and for an instant, it may be with a strong and slow gleam, and the success of a writer in many cases must depend on his relationship to this phenomenon. It is a truism to say that no man can escape from his age. In the case of a writer it is a truism in the sense in which the Ten Commandments are truisms. On the other hand, original genius soars like a bird independent of circumstances; only we have to remember what the end is to the attempt of a callow fledgling to perform this aerial manoeuvre. The thing that happens most usually is that it flops helplessly down on the grass. In that case its position is far from being hopeless. Its parents will continue to feed it, wholesome air and sunlight will bring it health and strength, and when the little wings are stronger the ambitious flight may in due time be effected. But meanwhile there is danger enough and to spare. The little bird may in the first place not be of the species whose nature is to soar. The hedge-sparrow will meet with disaster if it try to emulate the lark. In the second place there are ugly things that attack the nestling on the ground, cats and weasels, birds of prey and mischievous children. Yet these are nothing compared with the difficulties and dangers attending potential genius after its first disaster. Worst of all enemies is that within. Fortunately or unfortunately, it is given to genius to be conscious of itself, and the arrows of outrageous Fortune, where they would only hurt a mean spirit, torture one of nobler texture. And it is no paradox to say that in true greatness, humility often attends self-consciousness, so that he who has tried and failed often feels like one born out of due time, who has no place to fill and no task to do in the world wherein he is placed.

But our study of rejected addresses is one to carry hope and cheer to the downhearted. It is good for him to know that genius in the making, and often when it is made, is capable of the most extraordinary bêtises. If we were to seek to buttress this opinion with illustrious examples, it would be extremely easy to find them. Looking back we may profess to find signs and tokens of the "Lotus Eaters" and of the "Passing of Arthur" in Tennyson's Juvenilia, but it is a gross and rank deception. If Tennyson had at an early age been obliged to hawk about his youthful poems until he had got enough money for them to earn the necessary bread and cheese of life, there is a very considerable likelihood that he would have starved in the process. Even Lord Byron, sharply as he retaliated on the Scotch reviewers, achieved very little in his "Hours of Idleness." An exception to the rule may perhaps be found in Dickens, but he was one of those who flowered early. His "Pickwick," written at twenty-one, was at least no worse, and in the opinion of many was infinitely better, than anything that succeeded it. Jane Austen, again, flowered into "Pride and Prejudice" when she was a girl of twenty-one: curiously enough that was also her high-water mark. It is, however, impossible to lay down rules, and one earnestly trusts that no reader of this journal will consider himself a genius for the simple reason that he has perpetrated a bad article, a bad story, or a bad poem. The stupidest is equal to that achievement. But what we mean to say is that a piece of blundering, bad work done at the beginning of a career is by no means decisive as to the want of merit in a writer. Experience has shown—or at least he who indites this meditation thinks so—that out of a perfect sea of bad work inspiration may come at last, or, in the words of the wholesome old proverb, the way to success lies through failure.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Poetry of Christmas," by J. A. MacCulloch.]

FICTION

A Boy's Marriage. By HUGH DE SÉLINCOURT. (Lane, 6s.)

THE average reader may find it hard to grant one, at least, of the two main postulates upon which Mr. Hugh de Sélincourt relies in working out a problem which might well have taxed the resources of a hardened historian of the abnormal. Let it be granted that Beverley Teruel has been so guarded from contact with the world, that even three years of Oxford could do nothing to spoil the fitness of his college nickname of "Girlic." Such characters, though rare, are not unknown, and it is Mr. de Sélincourt's object to show that unless those who arrange the innocence can arrange also the remotest details of the awakening, a sensitive nature so trained is the most likely of all to come to shipwreck. Beverley's father, whose own youth had not been without an "experience," arranged, with Beverley's full approval, that he should marry a girl named Eva; and after a few summer weeks spent in the society of his family, Eva, and the poets, especially the poets, he duly weds. The success of such a marriage must depend upon the character of the wife, and we are asked to believe that Eva is more innocent than Beverley, and that some outrageous words let fall as to the cruelty of the male sex frighten her into raising at the outset the unpardonable barrier against a husband whom she likes. The thing is, to say the least of it, improbable. Had Mr. de Sélincourt a story of de Maupassant in mind? And has he not forgotten that the voice of nature speaks to the purest minds in the plainest words? Still, granting the possibility of two such natures being tied to each other, the conclusion drawn seems to us the right one. Beverley flies into a morbid suspicion of the purity of his perfectly healthy passion. He seeks solace in a platonic affection for a literary woman, finds it difficult to exist without her, disobeys her by rushing to London to see her, and, when severely snubbed, falls an easy victim to the wiles of a woman of the town. During his absence Eva has been making discoveries which impel her towards a whole-hearted bid for her husband's vanished affection. But it is too late. Innocence has given place to morbidity, and everything ends as, granting the premisses, it must end, miserably. The workmanship of the book, though sensitive, is sometimes feeble. There is a good deal of superfluous detail, and the lines are not always clear. But the choice and development of the theme show courage, humour, and a severe logic which promise well.

Fools Rush In. By MARY GRANT and JOHN RIDGWELL ESSEX. (Heinemann, 6s.)

FOR several reasons this story is unusually interesting. It is well and brightly told, it is set with real knowledge and power of description amongst Mahommedan West African tribes, it gives a vivid picture of what white women may be called on to endure when they accompany their men-folk to savage missions, and it demonstrates the profound but not generally recognised truth that fools do more harm than knaves. The people we expect to meet in fiction are there: brave men, beautiful young women, and a blood-curdling villain in the shape of the Fulbe prince, Dan Ali Mon. But the two characters that give salt to the story are the fussy, stupid, credulous missionary, Horace Webley, and the cheerful Cockney trader, Peter Addie. The picture of the two Englishwomen at the mercy of the brutal Fulbe chief and his savage followers is one to make zealots think. "All the Gospel that was ever preached on this earth ain't worth a half of what them poor women suffered," says Peter Addie; and he was not speaking of imaginary heroines but of real, live, white women, who were not rescued in the nick of time.

The Empty House. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. (Nash, 6s.)

MR. ALGERNON BLACKWOOD is to be congratulated on having produced one of the best books of "horror" since the appearance of Mr. Bram Stoker's "Dracula." "The Empty House" is a commonplace title enough, and we opened the book in anticipation of a dull hour among flapping white spirits and headless spectres. When we say that the hour was an enthralling one and that we rose at the end of it with a sensation of chill and a certain undefinable distrust of the dark corners of the room, we are doing scant justice to Mr. Blackwood's powers. It is not so much that the tales are original (we have met most of these ghosts under one form or another before): it is the convincing manner in which they are told which compels admiration. We have some difficulty in deciding which of these ten stories is the best. Save two, they are of a supernatural character and all are gruesome in the extreme.

Andrew Goodfellow. By HELEN H. WATSON (Mrs. HERBERT A. WATSON. (Macmillan, 6s.)

THE large novel-reading public which demands no more from a book of fiction than a story will find much that is pleasing in this tale of the early nineteenth century, in which such interesting personages as Nelson and Mrs. Jordan appear. The writing is unilluminated by those qualities which distinguish literature from mere story-telling. This lack of artistic treatment is to be regretted, as the author has made an interesting choice of characters—a choice which calls for individuality in description. This, as a first book, lacks equally the faults which tell against, and those which promise well for, future success—that is success in literature. Success, in a measure, as a popular story-teller, will quite possibly be the fate of this writer.

The Country Road. By ALICE BROWN. (Constable, 6s.)

A DOZEN excellent stories by the author of "Paradise"—what better entertainment could a reader desire for a rainy day? The simple annals, the love-affairs, the comedies and tragedies of married life of shrewd New England folk, these are the materials of which Miss Brown weaves her charming tales. "The Tree of a Thousand Leaves," "Bachelor's Fancy," "A Day Off," are perhaps the best, but all are good. In the last-mentioned story, Abigail, driven to desperation by a meddling, obtuse husband, indulges in a joyous and successful day of lying in aid of her daughter's love-affairs, and does not repent: "I've had a splendid day. I've had the best time I've had for years. I aint ever going to have another like it. I don't dast to." None of the tales touch upon the darker aspects of life, all are optimistic in tone, and delicately humorous in treatment.

A Knight of the Cumberland. By JOHN FOX, JUNR. (Constable, 2s. 6d.)

NEVER were more opposing forces brought into contact than those we find in this book. Nothing could equal the incongruity of a Mediæval Tournament, at which "jousting at the ring" forms the principal attraction, held at a small mining town in America. And it is this very incongruity which renders the tale fascinating. The rough mountaineers clad in uncouth trappings, from football shorts to chain armour, riding into the lists and answering to such high-sounding titles as "The Knight of the Green Valley" and "The Knight of the Holston" to receive the "Charge" delivered by the Hon. Sam Budd, a Southern, stump-speaking politician, make a picture which lays hold of the reader's imagination and compels his attention, as much from sheer surprise at the audacity of the plot as by the skill with which it is carried out. The defeat of the "Knight Discarded" who, for his comfort, is given the hand of the "Queen of Love and Beauty" (known in every-day life as "The Blight"), ends this attractive and original tale.

Honour's Glassy Bubble. By E. GERARD. (Blackwood, 6s.)

MISS GERARD is not of those who hold that the duel was not without influence for good upon morals and manners. In her story of three generations she gives a "truthful and impartial picture of the misfortunes resulting from this barbarous practice," in Eastern Europe. With careful art she interests us in two brothers, or lovers, or husband and wife, and then just at the most charming or most interesting part of their story a duel ends it all. A fresh start is made, new expectations aroused, and at the next dramatic moment comes the fatal duel again. Six duels to one story is a liberal allowance and does not leave much time for rejoicing, but the intervals between the tragedies have their pleasant incidents, the characters are uncommon, and—especially the ruffianly autocrat, Count Attila—boldly drawn. Stories written with a purpose rarely present so many attractions as this anti-duelling novel, and comparatively few of any kind are so well worth reading.

DRAMA

"THE WEAVERS" AT THE SCALA THEATRE

THE effect which this play of Gerhart Hauptmann produces upon the mind is a very strange one. As was said with less justice of The Voysey Inheritance, there seems at first no particular reason why the fifth act should be the last, why the play should not quietly proceed on its way from act to act, each additional act adding perhaps a little to the effect of the whole by giving fresh instances of the horror of the weavers' existence. Such is the first impression received, but another comes to take its place; for the play is one of haunting power, and remains in the mind at length almost uncannily shaping itself there, in much the same way as a remembered dream. This is due in part to the novelty of the theme and of the theme's handling; instinct fights knowledge to pick out from the crowd of weavers the one who is to be, if not the actual hero, at least the most important character; and just in so far as instinct triumphs in picking out Becker or Tueger, the young strike-leaders, or old Baumerl, the venerable drunkard, or old Hilse, who remains loyal to his sense of duty, does the true meaning of the drama escape. But the chief reason is that the play is something more than the representation of particular injustice and misery, lived through years and years ago, among a particular group of Silesian work-people. Were that the case, the Stage Society, or any other management, would be ill-advised indeed to revive it. The fact is that Hauptmann, a dreamer always, took the recounted trials of his grandfather's youth as the merest peg on which to hang the fabric of a great idea. As Euripides in The Trojan Women shows the beauty that is part of all tragedy, so Hauptmann in The Weavers shows all the ways in which a man may meet misfortune. He lifts the play from the pettiness of a struggle between weaver and manufacturer, or master and man, until it becomes a symbol of the eternal conflict of human existence, the conflict between Man and Destiny. "Out of misery and shame and evil he makes Tragedy," as Professor Murray wrote concerning The Trojan Women. This deeper meaning grows slowly from the actual setting, but once in being the drama assumes its true and perfect shape.

And very little would seem to be lost from the inability of the actors to present exact character-studies of Silesian workpeople in the Forties. Under Herr Hans Andresen's admirable management the nature of the characters, essential to the play's wider significance, was preserved in all its proper variety, and expressed by the actors with great care and with a general success that is highly praiseworthy under the unusual hurrying conditions of the drama's action. Where the work of all was good and spirited, it would be invidious to mention particular names. The Stage Society did well to produce the play; it has only once before been given in English, and under disadvantageous circumstances, when Mr. Charles Charrington presented it at the Crystal Palace in 1901 on the occasion of the First of May Labour Day Festival. The play is not only of interest by reason of clever stage-craft; it is a permanent work of art.

FINE ART

BRABAZON AND OTHERS

IN the whole history of painting it would be difficult to find a career parallel to that of the late Hercules Brabazon Brabazon, a memorial exhibition of whose work is now open at the Goupil Gallery (5 Regent Street). Two dates give a hint of his unique position—1821, the year of his birth; and 1892, the year in which he made his first public appearance, when the discerning were astounded at the revelation of a new development of water-colour by a master whose existence was unsuspected. In the life-time between these dates Brabazon had lived outwardly the ordinary life of a cultured country gentleman. He was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled extensively in France, Spain, Italy, Egypt, and India, and for the rest lived quietly on his Sussex estate, a model landlord in his dealings with his tenants, but unconcerned with the worlds of politics and sport. By his neighbours, among whom was Mr. Francis James, the flower-painter, he was known to spend much of his time sketching, but such was his modesty that it required the repeated urging of distinguished professional painters—Mr. Sargent, Mr. Steer, and Mr. J. J. Shannon among the number—before he could be persuaded that his colour-notes of places he had seen and of master-pieces he admired were worthy of public exhibition.

It was not till he was seventy that his objections to publicity were overcome. In November 1891, he was elected a member of the New English Art Club, to whose next Spring Exhibition he contributed, and in the following November his first "one-man-show" was held at the Goupil Gallery. Mr. Sargent was his introducer on that occasion, and in a preface to the catalogue the great portrait-painter lucidly expounded the technical merits of Mr. Brabazon's art, his "gift of colour," and "exquisite sensitiveness to impressions of colour."

A French artist [wrote Mr. Sargent] on seeing some of these drawings resumed in a word another secret of their charm and of their power: "C'est la fin d'une vie!" Only after years of the contemplation of Nature can the process of selecting become so sure an instinct, and a handling so spontaneous and so freed from the commonplace of expression is final mastery, the result of long artistic training.

Although Brabazon's art has now been before the public for fifteen years there is little to add to the estimate then made by Mr. Sargent. For whereas other painters only gradually reveal themselves to us as artists in the making, Brabazon burst upon us in his first exhibition as an artist already made, in complete enjoyment of a perfect mastery of his medium. Ensuing exhibitions only confirmed the justice of what had already been said, but added no fresh knowledge save what was afforded by the artist's late experiments with pastel, a medium he used as perfectly and individually as he did water-colour. Some early sketches at the Memorial Exhibition indicate the "long artistic training" of which Mr. Sargent speaks, but though these have their interest as showing Brabazon's patient study of form during his long apprenticeship, his fame rests not on his delineation of form, but on his magical interpretation of colour. Form he studied sufficiently for his purpose, but with him it was always a secondary interest. And in this he showed himself to be a true child of his century, just as in another respect he stood out as a genius ahead of his age. The interpretation of light in landscape was beyond question the salient characteristic of the art of the late nineteenth and dawning twentieth centuries. And Brabazon was as fully concerned with problems of light as the French Luminists who, like himself, drew their inspiration from Turner. Brabazon's art is the exact parallel to the French impressionist movement, but he made use of a different medium, our national medium of water-colour, which he carried to ethereal heights unscaled by any previous artist. Less grand than Turner's, Brabazon's water-colours are even more exquisite, for to what he learnt from the older masters of water-colour he added qualities of his own, qualities of delicacy and refinement which rank him with them, perhaps above them.

There are critics who would depreciate Brabazon's art because he never attempted canvases of imposing size, but confined his efforts to water-colours of modest dimensions. The contention is uncritical, since excellence in art is a matter of quality, not of quantity, but it so happens that Brabazon's wise restraint in this matter was an unconscious preparation for the needs of the future and entitles his drawings to be regarded as the typical art product of the age in which he died. If we accept Mr. George Moore's statement that "art is merely the embodiment of the dominant influence of an age," and his argument that the villa was the dominant influence of the mid-nineteenth century, then surely we must believe that the dominant influence of the century now dawning is the flat. Hence it follows, according to Mr Moore's theory, "that artists of to-day will produce more lasting work by supplying the 'flat' with an art suitable for the 'flat,' than by supplying it with a traditional art descended from the palace or the cathedral." "It is better," says Joubert, "to be exquisite than to be ample," and Brabazon in choosing the better part was unconsciously supplying the community in which he lived with the æsthetic comestible best suited to their taste and needs.

Bereft of Brabazon, and with Mr. D. S. MacColl an absentee, the water-colour wall of the New English Art Club's current exhibition might be expected to be less interesting this year than usual. Nevertheless it compares well with the oil section of the exhibition, though in both many things are included which might have been omitted with advantage to the collection as a whole. Mr. Tonks, who sends no oil paintings this year, is strongly represented on the water-colour wall with a vigorous impression of schoolboy life, The Stonethrower (28), full of action, and two freshly painted visions of Poole Harbour (30) and The Town from Corfe Castle (24), very beautiful and truthful in colour. Mr. Francis James's flower paintings, the landscapes of Mr. Rich and Mr. Steer help to maintain the standard of the wall, which is threatened by the inclusion of such dry "British-Museumy" drawings as Mr. Unwin's La Cour d'Albane, Rouen (12) and such unfeeling colour as that displayed in Mr. Noel Rooke's St. Julien, Brionde (3). Among the drawings the most notable contributions are Mr. Muirhead Bone's grand composition, The Great Gentry—Charing Cross Station, 1906, which has been purchased by subscription for presentation to the British Museum, and Mr. Orpen's rhythmical pencil study, The Sleeping Child (11). No member comes better out of this exhibition than Mr. Orpen, who, in addition to his drawings, sends the three most important oil paintings. His recumbent nude, A Woman (97), has obviously been inspired by the Velasquez Venus, which it recalls even in its grey and flesh-tint colour scheme. The curious insistence on the curve of the hip, the disappearance of the feet beneath drapery, and the scamped treatment of the drapery itself militate against the delightful abandon of the pose, the splendid rendering of the shoulders and back, and the beautiful light effect. Mr. Orpen's other nude, The Reflection (90), is more pleasing as a whole, though here again there are contradictions; for the draped back standing erect does not seem to fit the slightly bent pose of the reflection in the mirror—a delightful piece of flesh-painting. More complete than either of these is Mr. Orpen's third oil-painting, The Eastern Gown (84), in which textures have been studied and rendered with fair success in a composition of considerable charm. Mr. Conder's Wood Nymphs (121), a sylvan phantasy of lovely colour, is one of the most successful of the larger pictures he has yet exhibited, while Mr. Steer's The Bend of the River (119) and The School Girl (123) are pleasant if not remarkable examples of his skill in landscape and portraiture. Of Mr. Will Rothenstein's two oils, both landscapes, Threshing in Burgundy (92) is a brilliant sunlight effect treated in a style akin to that of Mr. Clausen, but lacking his tender ruggedness of handling. The Abbey Church (61), a moonlight effect, is more successful, the subject lending itself better to Mr. Rothenstein's more polished and less impassioned style. Mr. Chowne's admirable still-life, Peaches (89), and Fantinesque flower-pieces, the scholarly landscapes of Professor C. J. Holmes, and two fresh and unpretentious oil-sketches by Mr. John, In the Tent (95) and The Camp (91), are among the most pleasant contributions from the older men. Mr. F. H. S. Shepherd's tranquil Interior—Man Drawing (110) and Mr. Glyn W. Philpot's grave "Old-Masterly" oil studies are among the best things sent in by the new recruits. But as a whole the collection must be pronounced disappointing, for none of the members except Mr. Tonks and Mr. Orpen add to the laurels they have already gained, while few of the new-comers beyond the two above mentioned justify by their works the favour shown them by the jury of selection.

Mrs. Mary McEvoy, one of the most interesting of the exhibiting non-members of the club, is represented by a single work, A Lady Playing (52); but her gently austere art, her love of the petits maîtres of Holland, and her ability, like them, to endow homely domestic scenes with a beauty derived from insight into the mysteries of light, are satisfactorily and amply displayed in the exhibition of her works now open at the Chenil Gallery in Chelsea.

MODERN SILVER AND ENAMELLING

THE exhibition of work by Mr. and Mrs. Dawson at the Leicester Galleries will be found of considerable interest to all who care for the silversmith's craft. The applied arts, although a good deal talked about just now, are not practised with so much skill that we can afford to overlook the productions of this accomplished lady and gentleman. For the more utilitarian pieces shown we have nothing but warm admiration. The simple silver knives and entirely new forks, the handles of which are made after a cleverly adapted design based on the typical Chippendale chair-back, the plain but distinguished salt-cells and other pieces for table use are admirably and substantially wrought. But many of the more elaborate examples are fashioned in silver that is far too thin. This is a common fault of our age. Mr. Dawson invents excellent designs, the enameller bejewels the object, the public rush in to buy, some one receives a charming present and all goes well. But in a decade or two what will become of these examples of Mr. Dawson's skill? The thin metal will be cracked and the silver bowl will be broken and the beauty of the original lost to a future generation. A Stuart or Georgian example of silver is often nearly as perfect to-day as when produced, but our terrible desire for low prices will rob future generations of the pleasure of seeing such work as this to any advantage. In the cases devoted to jewelled ornaments are many excellent examples of fine workmanship. Mr. and Mrs. Dawson also show some enamelling on gold. This facile and graceful decorative art is one that they understand historically, practically, and, we suspect, commercially.

MUSIC

THE JOACHIM QUARTET CONCERTS

IN spite of the fact that all the seats for the Joachim concerts in the Bechstein Hall were subscribed for long before the concerts took place, and that Queen's Hall was very full on both occasions when it was used, it is difficult to put aside the feeling that musical London has scarcely realised the importance of the event which has just taken place. Perhaps it is because a certain apathy on the one hand is balanced by an indiscriminate enthusiasm on the other that we are inclined to doubt the discernment of each side, who together make up the concert-going population of London. The enthusiasts are more than enough to fill the Bechstein Hall, and nearly enough to fill Queen's Hall, which does not argue a very widespread appreciation of the art of the Joachim quartet and those associated with it. Fortunately, however, it is not needful here to discuss either how far the admiration for Brahms's music as played by Joachim is genuine, or whether the apathetic have any justification for finding that playing less perfect than once it was. Certain disadvantages had of necessity to be contended with; for example, the fact that Bechstein Hall was too small for the audience and Queen's Hall too large for the performers, or rather that the latter is quite unsuited to performances of chamber music. Few will contend that Dr. Joachim has at command the body of tone he once had, and the consequent thinness of tone aggravated the difficulty of the hall. There was the further disadvantage that the chamber works of Brahms with the two sets of "Liebeslieder" Waltzes are just too many to be arranged comfortably in six programmes, with the result that at the last concert at Queen's Hall the magnificent pianoforte quintet, op. 34, was listened to by a tired audience, whereas it particularly requires fresh and alert perceptions for its full enjoyment. Really the "Liebeslieder" Waltzes might have been omitted, for, since they were sung by a mediocre quartet of singers, their performance was in no way a parallel to that of the instrumental works. Instead of the first set the early form of the trio, op. 8, might have been given. This was composed in 1854 and revised and republished by Brahms in 1891. The later form was played at the concert on December 3 and it is that which is generally known. It may be argued that Brahms would have wished the later form only to survive, that it contains what is worth hearing in the early work and perfects its expression; but this is not quite true, for in the edition of 1891 he discarded large sections of the early trio, whole trains of thought which his youthful fancy followed willingly, but which his older judgment refused. As it is, the only chamber composition which dates from the 'fifties we would gladly hear it as he first conceived it; but Dr. Joachim may have had personal reasons for deciding otherwise, which the committee would of course respect.

With these exceptions no fault could be found with the general scheme; the arrangement of the six programmes was rightly governed by principles of musical effect rather than by an historical sequence. From this it practically resulted that in almost every programme the works were disposed so as to represent at least three decades of Brahms's life. Thus, in the first two concerts at Bechstein Hall, the two early sextets followed upon late trios, op. 114 and 101, while the quartets, op. 60 and 67, began the concerts. This reversal of the chronological order even in the single programmes was wise, since the sextets, with their clear cut form and simple themes resembling Schubert, are listened to with ease when the audience is a little tired after giving serious attention to music of a more involved kind. At the same time, to those who took the trouble to compare and contrast, each concert might represent an epitome of Brahms's life; this was particularly striking in the first given at Queen's Hall, which only contained two instrumental works, the piano quartet in A major, opus 26, and the clarinet quintet, opus 115. The first illustrated Brahms's earliest manner, when the instinct for formal beauty was dominant and proclaimed him even more the successor of Mozart than of Beethoven; the second showed that instinct still potent, but tempered by the experience of a lifetime and brought to serve rather than to rule, to produce a work of exquisite tenderness and human pathos. Dr. Joachim, an intimate sharer in that life experience, interpreted both its beginning and its close, and the others of his quartet, only a degree further removed from the composer, entered with wonderful insight into his meaning. Herr Mühlfeld too, whose beautiful tone and masterly phrasing inspired, not surely the thoughts of the clarinet quintet itself, but rather the manner of their expression, was there once more to show of what sound Brahms was thinking when he placed the clarinet in his score. It was impossible to listen and not to feel that here was the most authoritative presentment of Brahms's attitude towards music that could be given. Details of tone and balance dropped into the background; Dr. Joachim's mental leadership was as forcible as ever, if sometimes his hand was less sure. A fresh, young spirit pervaded the piano quartet, which reached a climax in the boyish good humour of the finale, while the slow movement of the clarinet quintet had the solemnity of a funeral sermon which does not lament the departed but tells the noble record of his life.

In so long a line of artistic works there must necessarily be a certain flow and ebb in clearness and expression. With Brahms there was never any fluctuation in the earnestness of his aim, but there was inevitably variation in the actual results. One of the great benefits of hearing his works through several complete programmes is that we can then note the moments at which the tide of clear inspiration runs highest, and it is remarkable that such moments invariably leave an impression of exceptionally good performance, though it is impossible to doubt that the same care was given to less perspicuous works. In the clarinet trio, opus 114, played on November 23 by Herr Mühlfeld, Professor Hausmann and Mr. Leonard Borwick, the third movement shone out after the clouded slow movement like a ray of sunshine, and again the first movement of the string quartet in A minor, played on December 3, sounded so wonderfully ethereal that one was tempted to judge hastily that the Joachim quartet needed to be heard alone to be enjoyed; the later movements showed that the truth is that in this first movement Brahms caught more of the peculiar magic of the stringed instruments than he often did in writing for them alone. Other instances will occur to every discriminating hearer, where Brahms seems to express suddenly with perfect ease what at another time is somewhat obscure.

Apart from the opportunity for critical study that these concerts have given, they stand unique as a record. Now that musicians are becoming satiated by sensational devices, which have been pressed in to give new colour to modern art, it is a happy time to review our resources, to take stock—as it were—of all that has been achieved in the past. Undoubtedly in the chamber music of Brahms possibilities for the future of the art are shown, which latterly have received but little attention. No more powerful recall could be made to the principles which Brahms represents than a complete recital of his chamber works by those who know and understand him best. If, as has been suggested, such a recital shows where he attained highest and where inspiration was less clear, it is illuminating in the utmost degree. Dr. Joachim has added this crowning service to his life of devotion to his art, that he has clearly shown what was the last decisive word in chamber music, and that in it lie the premisses from which the future of that branch of music must to a large extent be evolved.

H.C.C.

CORRESPONDENCE

A FRENCH CRITIC ON HOMER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following passage occurs in Professor Tyrrell's review of "Pour Mieux Connaître Homère." (ACADEMY, Dec. 8, p. 570.)

"It is remarkable that among 'les inconséquences et les contradictions' which are detected by M. Bréal in the gradual development of the poem, and which betray the latest hands, are the most exquisite scenes in the Iliad and those which have been most admired in all ages—Helen on the walls of Troy, the embassy to Achilles, the parting scene between Hector and Andromache, the apoteia of the different chieftains, the exquisite dirges of Hecuba, Andromache, and Helen over the dead Hector, and above all the scene in which Priam comes to beg Achilles for the corpse of his son, which Gottfried Hermann called the finest thing in the literature of any period or people."

This is not very intelligible, for M. Bréal says (p. 3). "We must look for the true Homer . . . in the description of the embassy to Achilles . . . or let us take the last Book of the Iliad, when Priam comes to beg for the body of his son." M. Bréal then exclaims: "Passages foreign to the original redaction! Passages added après coup! . . . It is not yet the moment for the discussion of these theories. . . . The passages which advance the action, or lead to the necessary conclusion, which paint situations or reveal character, are not added après coup" (p. 4). In these sentences M. Bréal rejects the opinions assigned to him by Professor Tyrrell, as regards the embassy to Achilles and the ransoming of the body of Hector. In page 126, M. Bréal returns to this subject, and rejects the system which detects such additions in the scenes of Helen on the tower; the farewell of Helen and Andromache, the various apoteia; the embassy to Achilles, the ransoming of Hector, and the dirges over Hector dead. M. Bréal says, "I have not to estimate at present a system which brings the Iliad down to the level of a French tragedy under the first Empire."

Professor Tyrrell has inadvertently attributed to M. Bréal the opinions which he twice repudiates. His book is astonishing enough! He states that he knows little of the archaeology of the subject (p. 85) and discusses the Homeric problems without venturing further into archaeology than the amazing statement that poets of 600–550 B.C. at the Court of Croesus and other Lydian Kings, knew Mycenaean relics much as we know them. "Doubtless they were then more numerous and in better condition. . . . The poet placed his heroes in this antique setting," (p. 85)—as a Scottish peasant wears a kilt on a holiday!

The notion of a Scottish peasant dressing in Highland costume on a holiday is not so surprising as the theory that the Homeric poet "got up" his "local" colour from Mycenaean relics on view in 600 B.C. I ought to say that M. Bréal does not, in so many words, speak of plaid and philabeg as the holiday attire of the Scottish peasant. He says that the Scot puts on "un costume dont il ne songe à savoir ni la date ni l'origine." I suppose him to mean the Highland costume.

Every student of Homer will observe that M. Bréal is inadequately equipped for his task of criticism. But he is too good a literary critic to suppose that "the beauties of a work are contributed by its interpolators" (p. 127).

ANDREW LANG.

ἐπιδημιου δεικνύοντος

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor R. Y. Tyrrell, in accepting the change of above into—loo κρυβεντος, stultifies, I submit, his own adhesion to Monroe's fourth foot rule and its corollaries. This would be kind to such poets as Xenophanes, who were unaware of such a rule—not true universally, and not to be pressed too far. But, meanwhile, we have a single word forming partly or wholly three hexameter feet, a consummation devoutly to be deprecated.

H. H. JOHNSON.

Rennes University, France.
December 12.

THE POEMS OF FATHER TABB

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I would ask you to notice a few errata in the volume of selections from my verses which you reviewed in the ACADEMY of November 17. Banister, my middle name, has but one n. Of "Ave atque Vale" upon the last page the second verse is, strangely, found on p. 64. In the lines "To Silence," which you quote, my in the second line is a misprint for thy. In "December" there is a slip—winding for whining; and in "The Boy Bishop" all should be deleted. Thanking you for your kind notice,

JOHN BANISTER TABB.

St. Charles College,
Ellicott City,
Maryland.

THE GARDENS OF ADONIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "gardens of Adonis" mentioned in your review of Dr. Frazer's book, as being still found in Sicily and elsewhere, must have been well known in England in the time of Shakespeare—witness the lines in Henry VI. (Pt. i. Act i. Scene vi.):

Thy promises are like Adonis' gardens,
That one day bloom'd and fruitful were the next.

E. MARTINENGO CESARESCO.

December 9.

A LEGEND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—These Latin words mean "perfect unity is charity and love." The initial letter of "punitas" is, no doubt, a mistake on the part of the maker. Brazen alms-dishes were imported in great quantities into Spain from the Netherlands, in the sixteenth century; and on many of them there are inscriptions in which even greater blunders than the above are observable.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

December 7.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Costume: Fanciful, Historical and Theatrical. Compiled by Mrs. Aria. Illustrated by Percy Anderson. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 259. Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.

Taylor, Henry. The Ancient Crosses and Holy Wells of Lancashire. 10½ x 8. Pp. 516. Manchester: Sherratt and Hughes, 42s. net.
["With Notes on the pre-Reformation Churches, Monastic Institutions, and Superstitions of the County Palatine."]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Saint Catherine of Siena and her Times. By the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." 9 x 6. Pp. viii, 300. Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.

DRAMA.

Pinero, Arthur W. His House in Order. A Comedy in four acts. 6½ x 5. Pp. 224. Heinemann, 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

Skrine, Mary J. W. The House of the Luck. Illustrated by Margaret S. Skrine. 8 x 6½. Pp. 247. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.

Macaulay, R. Abbots Verney. A novel. 7½ x 5. Pp. 291. Murray, 6s.

HISTORY.

Whish, C. W. The Ancient World. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xlvii, 345. Luzac, 5s. net.
["A Historical Sketch, with Comparative Chart of Principal Events: being vol. ii. of 'Reflections on Some Leading Facts and Ideas of History: their Meaning and Interest,' with special chapter on The Bible Lands."]

The Hammermen of Edinburgh and their Altar in St. Giles Church. With introductory notes by John Smith. 9 x 5½. Pp. 201. Edinburgh: Published at John Knox's House by William J. Hay, 10s. 6d. net.
[Extracts from the Records of the Incorporation of Hammermen of Edinburgh, 1494 to 1558.]

Allen, Herbert J. Early Chinese History. Are the Chinese Classics Forged? 8 x 5½. Pp. 300. S.P.C.K., 5s.

Semenoff, Captain Vladimir. The Battle of Tsu-Shima between the Japanese and Russian Fleets, fought on May 27, 1905. Translated by Captain A. B. Lindsay. With a preface by Sir George Sydenham. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 165. Murray, 3s. 6d. net.
[Captain Semenoff was on board the Kynas Suvoroff, the Russian flag-ship, during the engagement.]

LITERATURE.

Old German Love Songs. Translated by Frank C. Nicholson. 8 x 5½. Pp. 196. Unwin, 6s.

[Translations from the Minnesingers of the twelfth to the fourteenth century. The translator's object has been "to present English readers with a selection from Minnesong sufficiently varied and extensive to illustrate roughly the nature and range of the art and indicate the main lines of its development."]

Westminster Versions. Renderings into Greek and Latin Verse, reprinted from the "Westminster Gazette." Edited by Herbert F. Fox. 7½ x 5. Pp. 106. Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Underdown, Emily. Medallions from Early Florentine History. 8 x 5½. Pp. 253. Swan Sonnenschein, 5s. net.

[The author's object has been to "detach from the phantasmagoria of mediæval Italian politics certain of the more striking and important events connected with Florence . . . some of the most picturesque incidents, some of the most attractive personages"; and to "place them before the reader as a sequence of medallions . . . to display them thus, hung as it were separately and with space for each to be viewed against its own background."]

Bayley, R. Child. The Complete Photographer. With over one hundred illustrations. 9 x 5½. Pp. 410. Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.

Provincial Letters, and Other Papers. By the author of "Pages from a Private Diary." 7½ x 5. Pp. 343. Smith, Elder, 5s. net.
[Papers mostly reprinted from the Cornhill.]

Live Stock Journal 1907 Almanack. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 246. Vinton, 1s.

Mountmorres, Viscount. The Congo Independent State. A Report on a Voyage of Enquiry. 10 x 6½. Pp. 166. Williams & Norgate, 6s. net.

Read, C. Stanford. How to Keep Well. 7½ x 5. Pp. 199. Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.
["Practical home hints on common ailments." They are not intended to take the place of a visit to the doctor; but, says the author, with no excess of modesty, "amid the myriad indispositions to which we are liable, there are many that are doctored at home, and . . . it should be well that some authoritative guidance should be at hand."]

Saltus, Edgar. Historia Amoris. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 278. Sisley's, 5s. net.
["A history of love ancient and modern."]

List of Annual Subscriptions to English and Foreign Newspapers, Magazines, etc. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 102. Dawson & Sons, Cannon House, Bream's Buildings, E.C., n.p.

[Contains particulars of over five thousand newspapers, etc., with rates—including postage—at which they can be mailed to residents in Great Britain, the Colonies, or abroad. Sections are devoted to British periodicals (there is a classified as well as an alphabetical list), American and Canadian, Australian, French, German, Indian, Italian, Russian, Spanish, Portuguese, and so on.]

Debrett's Peerage, Baronage, Knightage, and Companionship, 1907. Comprising information concerning all persons bearing Hereditary or Courtesy Titles, Privy Councillors, Knights, and Companions of all the various Orders; and the Collateral Branches of all Peers and Baronets. Illustrated with 1500 armorial bearings. Revised by the Nobility and Aristocracy. 8½ x 6. Pp. 1346. Dean, 31s. 6d. net.

Fox-Davies, Arthur Charles; and Carlyon-Britton, P. W. P. A Treatise on the Law Concerning Names and Changes of Name. 7½ x 5. Pp. 118. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.

[A revision and extension of a series of articles which appeared in the Genealogical Magazine.]

POETRY.

Rickards, Marcus S. C. Lyrics of Life and Beauty. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 123. Clifton: Baker, 3s. 6d. net.

Coventry, R. G. T. Poems. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 120. Elkin Mathews, 5s. net.
[Some are new; others have been reprinted from The Academy, Country Life, the Pall Mall Gazette, and the Westminster Gazette.]

Davies, William H. New Poems. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 75. Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.

Ogilvie, Will H. Rainbows and Witches. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 88. Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.
[Poems reprinted from different periodicals.]

The Belgian Hare (Lord Alfred Douglas). The Placid Pug, and other Rhymes. With illustrations by P.P. 8½ x 10½. Pp. 47. Duckworth, 3s. 6d. (See p. 605.)

Adams, Arthur H. London Streets. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 44. Foulis, n.p.

Nichols, Wallace Bertram. Firelight Fancies. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 96. The Tallis Press, 2s. 6d.

[Poems written, the publishers inform us, by a boy, between the ages of 13 and 16.]

POLITICAL.

Gould, Sir F. Carruthers. Political Caricatures, 1906. 11 x 14. Pp. 104. Arnold, 6s. net.

[Cartoons which have appeared in the Westminster Gazette between December 1905 and November 1906.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Wells, H. G. The Food of the Gods, and How It Came to Earth. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 317. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

Duff, H. L. Nyasaland under the Foreign Office. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 422. Bell, 7s. 6d. net.

[Second edition, with a new introduction dealing with the changes which have taken place in Nyasaland since the book was first written.]

Rose, J. Holland. Napoleonic Studies. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 398. Bell, 5s. net.
[Second edition, revised.]

The Works of Mrs. Gaskell. Wives and Daughters. An Every-day Story. With illustrations. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 761. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.
[The eighth, and last, volume of "The Knutsford Edition."]

A New German and English Dictionary. "Compiled from the best authorities in both languages." Revised and considerably enlarged by Karl Breul. 8½ x 6. Pp. 1343. Cassell, 10s. 6d. net.
[A revised and much enlarged edition of Miss Weir's German-English and English-German dictionary.]

Spencer, Herbert. The Data of Ethics. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 264. Williams & Norgate, 3s. net.

[Originally issued as a separate volume, these chapters afterwards formed part i. of vol. i. of "The Principles of Ethics" in the series entitled "A System of Synthetic Philosophy." They are now reissued in the original form.]

Arnold, Matthew. Essays Literary and Critical. With an introduction by G. K. Chesterton. 7 x 4½. Pp. 380. Dent, 1s. net.
[In the "Everyman's Library."]

The Modern Cyclopaedia. "A handy book of reference on all subjects and for all readers." New revised edition. Edited by Charles Annandale. Vols. iii. and iv. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 536 and 536. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

Broughton, Rhoda. Lavinia and A Waif's Progress. Each 7½ x 5. Macmillan, 2s. each.

Crawford, Francis Marion. The Heart of Rome. A Tale of the Lost Water. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 395. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

The Christmas Numbers of "Household Words." Edited by Charles Dickens. 9 vols. Each 6 x 4½. Chapman & Hall, cloth 1s. net, leather 2s. net per vol.

["The Wreck of the Golden Mary"; "Perils of Certain English Prisoners"; "A House To Let"; "The Holly-Tree Inn"; "The Seven Poor Travellers"; "A Christmas Tree"; "Christmas As We Grow Older"; "Stories by the Christmas Fire"; and "More Stories by the Christmas Fire," in a cardboard case. The names of the contributors of each chapter are given.]

Selected Poems from the Writings of Dora Greenwell. With an introduction by Constance L. Maynard. 7½ x 5. Pp. 222. Allenson, 3s. 6d.

Thackeray, William Makepeace. The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century. With bibliographical introduction by Hannaford Bennett. 6 x 4. Pp. 182. Long, cloth 6d., leather 1s.

[A new volume in Mr. John Long's wonderfully cheap "Carlton Classics." It is neatly bound and well printed, and the introduction is commendably brief, though it hardly deserved to be called bibliographical.]

Dumas's The War of Women (pp. 315); Olympe de Clèves (2 vols., pp. 1037); and Black: the Story of a Dog (pp. 400). Each 7½ x 5½. Dent, 2s. 6d. net per vol.

[Printed from American plates. Each volume is illustrated.]

Villani's Chronicle: being selections from the first nine books of the "Croniche Fiorentine" of Giovanni Villani. Translated by Rose E. Self, and edited by Philip H. Wicksteed. Second edition, revised. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 461. Constable, 5s. net.

Russell, George W. E. The Household of Faith. Portraits and essays. Third edition. 9 x 5½. Pp. 419. Mowbray, 5s. net.

Pitt-Rivers, the late Lt.-Gen. A. Lane-Fox. The Evolution of Culture, and other Essays. Edited by J. L. Myres. With an introduction by Henry Balfour. 21 plates. 9 x 6. Pp. xx, 232. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.

["Reprinted to supply the needs of candidates for the Oxford Diploma in Anthropology and of the numerous visitors to the Pitt Rivers Museum in Oxford." The essays are reprinted substantially as they were first delivered and published, but "verbal errors" and actual misquotations have been corrected, and allusions to specimens or diagrams exhibited during the original discourse have been replaced so far as possible by references to similar objects figured in the plates.]

Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas His Pilgrimes. Containing a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Lande Travells by Englishmen and others. By Samuel Purchas, B.D. In twenty volumes—vols. xvii, xviii, and xix. 9½ x 6. Pp. 549, 540 and 549. MacLehose, 12s. 6d. net per vol.

Poetical Works of Robert Burns, with Life and Notes by William Wallace. With 21 illustrations from original drawings by W. D. M'Kay, C. Martin Hardie, G. O. Reid, R. B. Nisbet, and G. Pirie. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 553. Chambers, 3s. 6d.

Reid, John. The Scots Gard'ner, together with The Gard'ners Kalendar. Edited by Alfred H. Hyatt. With an Appreciation by the Earl of Rosebery. 6½ x 5. Pp. 196. Foulis, 2s. 6d. net.

[First published in 1683.]

Breul, Karl. The Teaching of Modern Foreign Languages, and the Teaching of Teachers. Third edition, revised and enlarged. 7½ x 5. Pp. 156. Cambridge University Press, 2s. net.

Cousins, James H. The Quest. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 56. Dublin: Maunsell, 2s. 6d. net.

Schofield, Percy. The Triumph of Man. A dramatic poem. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 74. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

Millington, J. P. John Dalton. 7½ x 5. Pp. 225. Dent, 2s. 6d. net. [In the "English Men of Science" series. List of John Dalton's works and index.]

THEOLOGY.

Westcott, the late Brooke Foss. Village Sermons. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 360. Macmillan, 6s.

Otto, Dr. Rudolf. Naturalism and Religion. Translated by J. Arthur Thomson and Margaret R. Thomson. Edited, with an introduction, by the Rev. W. D. Morrison. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 374. Williams & Norgate, 6s. [In the "Crown Theological Library."]

A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. Edited by James Hastings, D.D., assisted by John A. Selbie, D.D., and (in the reading of the proofs) by John C. Lambert, D.D. In two volumes—vol. i. Aaron—Knowledge. 11 x 8. Pp. 936. Edinburgh: Clark, 21s. net.

[The purpose of this dictionary is to give an account of everything that relates to Christ—His Person, Life, Work, and Teaching.]

Reid, the Rev. John. Jesus and Nicodemus. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 288. Edinburgh: Clark, 4s. 6d. net.

["A study in spiritual life."]

Lethbridge, Arthur. Country Communion Classes. With a preface by V. S. S. Coles. 7½ x 5. Pp. 318. Mowbray, 3s. 6d. net.

[A series of outline addresses for services of preparation for Holy Communion.]

Clifford, John. The Ultimate Problems of Christianity. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 356. The Kingsgate Press and James Clarke, 6s.

[Eight lectures delivered in 1906 at Regent's Park College.]

The Book of Isaiah According to the Septuagint (Codex Alexandrinus). Translated and edited by R. R. Otley. II.—Text and Notes. 7½ x 5. Pp. 418. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.

[Greek text, and 297 pages of notes. Technicality in terms and in treatment has been, as far as possible, avoided. Biblical references are given according to the chapters and verses of the Authorised Version. Translations from the Greek and Hebrew were given in the first volume on facing pages.]

The Writings of Saint Francis of Assisi. Newly translated into English, with an introduction and notes, by Father Paschal Robinson. 8 x 5½. Pp. 208. Dent, 3s. 6d. net. [Short bibliography and index.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Dick, Stewart. The Heart of Spain. With illustrations in colour and black and white by the author. 7 x 4. Pp. 155. Foulis, 3s. 6d. net. [An artist's impression of Toledo.]

Rix, Herbert. Tent and Testament. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Williams & Norgate, 8s. 6d. net.

["A camping tour in Palestine, with some notes on scripture sites." An attempt is made to discriminate between the true and the false Bethlehems, Capernaums, Jerichos, and other "Bible places" visited by most pilgrims to Palestine.]

Bradley-Birt, F. B. The Romance of an Eastern Capital. With 30 illustrations and a map. 9½ x 6. Pp. 349. Smitn, Elder, 12s. 6d. net.

[The history of Dacca, the old Mussulman city in the heart of Eastern Bengal, which has now, after the lapse of two hundred years, once more attained the dignity of a Capital.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Il Vero Edgardo Poe (Rome, Ganguzza-Lajosa, l.2.50) is a violent little book from the pen of Professor Raffaele Bresciano, consisting of a hundred pages of biographical introduction and fifty pages of translations, in rhythmical prose, of some of Poe's best-known verses. It is true that, if the writer of a study of this kind holds a brief for his author, he is more likely to please his readers than if he makes it his business to expose and depreciate. But in this case the bias is so unconcealed and the admiration is so unbalanced, that we begin very soon to wish that the Professor would become more analytical and detached, and not write as if he were defending his dearest friend from a dishonourable and unjust charge. What was "the true Edgar Allan Poe"? It will probably startle most people in this country to hear that he was "a great poet, a lyrical writer of mighty genius, well worthy to figure in the glorious company of Lenau, de Musset, Keats and Leopardi." This remark, coming as it does on the first page of the book, is calculated to shake the reader's confidence at the outset, because it betrays a curious inability to appreciate proportionate values. Unfortunately the whole of the introductory sketch is in that vein; it is not critical; it is a sort of totus pulcher es from beginning to end. The accusations which have not unreasonably been brought against Poe are here met, not in a spirit of criticism and research, but in a manner which suggests the pugilist rather than the man of letters. Was Poe, for instance, a drunkard? "No! However scarce may be our documentary evidence, we do not hesitate to proclaim before the world that Poe was not a common drunkard; that he is not to be classed in the unworthy company of a Villon and a de Quincey!" He was not a drunkard, but "overcome by grief, he would run to the retailers of liquor, in order to forget the squallor of his unsuccessful life, seeking in alcohol a moment of forgetfulness." This will serve as an example of our author's method: we need not follow up his argument in detail. Poe, he thinks, was an almost perfect man, whose literary productions were masterpieces, "the glory, not of America only, but of the whole world." Yet that excessive admiration, which detracts considerably from the value of Professor Bresciano's little biographical study, stands him in good stead as a translator. His work is that of an enthusiast, his versions being faithful and adequate and not without a certain literary value of their own. Of course many of the poems—notably "The Raven"—lose most of their character when translated and turned into prose. Perhaps "Annabel Lee" is the cleverest of the renderings in the volume; while it is interesting to notice that the translation of one of Poe's simplest and most poetical pieces—the lines beginning "Helen, thy beauty is to me"—makes far and away the most pleasing piece of Italian prose of any in the volume.

We can imagine in what nervous haste our enthusiast would turn over the leaves of another little volume on Poe which has reached us, Edgar Allan Poe, the Man, the Master, the Martyr, by Oliver Leigh (Chicago, the Frank M. Morris Co. $1.25 net), to find out if the author be a "gentleman in yellow gloves"—the professorial description of Griswold and his partisans—or a fellow worshipper. Mr. Leigh's book is, of course, controversial; but, where the Italian defends Poe by clamour and assertion, the American employs a continuous flow of satire and jocosity. There is very little connection between the various parts of the book; but we see by the title-page that it is No. 1 of "The Dilettante Series," so perhaps pedantic criticism of it would be misplaced. The first section is a slight study of the various portraits of Poe, with reference both to art and phrenology. The conclusion arrived at is that Poe's head was swelled on one side and that he was half mad; and further, that if both sides of his head had been swelled he would have been quite mad, but if both sides had been shapely he would have been quite sane. Having given this as a specimen of what may be found in the book, we will not trouble our readers with a systematic examination of all the sections. The most interesting part deals with the satire called "The Poets and Poetry of America" issued as a pamphlet and signed "Lavante," which Mr. Leigh believes, and very nearly manages to prove, to be by Poe, Ethnographic Notes in Southern India. With forty plates. By Edgar Thurston, Superintendent Madras Government Museum. (Madras Government Press, 1906, price 6s.)—Some years ago the Government of India decided on making a systematic ethnographic survey of the whole of India, and superintendents were appointed in each presidency and province to collect all the material and information available. Mr. Thurston was entrusted with this task for Southern India, and he has already made a considerable ethnological collection which will form the subject of a magnum opus in size, and we have no doubt, in merit also. Mr. Thurston says the time is not yet ripe for this work, so he gives instead these notes as a sort of anticipatory volume on the sociological and ethnological questions that have so long engaged his attention. This volume, as he admits, is not for the general reader. It is not light reading, there is no attempt to propitiate the reader's good will by making the subject interesting, and the style is that of an official report. Still, the book has a distinct value, and the curious facts, customs, prejudices, and superstitions preserved in its six hundred pages make up a strange and striking record of primitive human life and society. The subjects about which Mr. Thurston has collected information come principally under the headings of Marriage and Death ceremonies, and he has a very full list of omens and superstitions besides. But still more curious and far less known are the relics of torture, mutilation, and slavery of which he has found abundant evidence in Southern India. The majority of these cases belong, of course, to a past state of society, mutilation, for instance, having been freely practised by Tippoo Sahib who cut off the noses and ears of his English prisoners. Without going to the past, the practice of finger-chopping and even hand-cutting is still in vogue among the Morasas, a tribe spread over a considerable part of the Madras presidency. A far more general form of mutilation is branding. The chapter on torture is also very instructive, and should be read by all who believe that such barbarities are only to be found in Central Africa. There are alleged to have been eighty-five different forms of torture practised in Southern India, and it is certainly very remarkable to find that one of them called the "crocodile ordeal" was absolutely identical with one of the practices in the Congo State. This was to make the accused swim across a river or other piece of water infested with crocodiles. If he escaped he was held to be innocent. This ordeal used to be common along the Malabar coast. The chapter on slavery is also remarkable. Notwithstanding the various penal acts passed against slavery down to the last act in 1862, there is reason to say that among the Cherumar many are still "bought and sold and hired out" as slaves, although of course in secrecy. These facts are interesting for several reasons. They show the extraordinary difficulty any Government experiences in eradicating bad and brutal customs among primitive races, especially as they are usually covered and protected by their superstitious usages. The most primitive aboriginal tribe of Southern India is still higher in the scale of civilisation than the negro in Central Africa, and the eradication of cruel practices will take a longer time there. We have been engaged for fifty years in systematically stamping them out in the Madras Presidency, and we have met with considerable but not absolute success. The process will take longer in Central Africa, but this will not be displeasing to ethnological students for, as Mr. Thurston quotes, "when there are no more aborigines" aboriginal research will have come to an end also.

Dr. Ferries's Growth of Christian Faith (Edinburgh: Clark), attempts to show that the devout contemplation of the life and teaching of Christ supplies a germ which leads to the full acceptance of Christian doctrine, of which, in his view, the crowning point is the Atonement by the death of Christ. But Dr. Ferries does not make clear his own view of the Atonement. In common with many other theologians, he does not seem to realise that there are really but two forms of the doctrine between which choice can be made. They shrink from the first, yet, at the same time, are not inclined to relinquish, as preachers, the peculiar attraction which some use of the old forensic terms still undoubtedly exercises over a certain class of mind. And further, his precise aim is obscure, for he does not make it at all clear whether, in his far too diffuse descriptions of this subjective growth, he intends to indicate the norm of the process, or only what is applicable to certain temperaments and circumstances. Such a process certainly cannot be regarded as a necessary logical development, and whatever value it possessed could only be due to the psychological interest attaching to a particular instance or instances in which it had occurred. Yet there is nothing in the book to show that this is intended. Even if it were, it would have no value, for, though, in such a case, one does not look for necessary logical connection, one must at least be made to feel that, for the subject of the narrative, the transition from one state of mind to the other could not, in the circumstances, have been different. The arrangement of the book is very defective. Recent writers on the Atonement are introduced several chapters before Anselm, and St. Paul comes last in the so-called historical portion of the work, which is of much the same emotional and semi-hortatory character as the rest.

Messrs. Sands and Co. send us a second edition of Dr. Oswald Hunter-Blair's translation of the Regula Sti Benedicti, the "Holy Rule" of St. Benedict (3s. 6d. net.). The text of the Rule and the translation have been revised, and, as before, the Latin occupies the left-hand page and the English translation the right. There are a few interesting explanatory notes and an index. It is needless nowadays to call attention to the value of the Rule, not merely as a means of devotion, in which aspect this edition chiefly regards it, but as a work of historical interest, "one of the most powerful instruments of the civilization of Europe," as the editor well calls it. It is, indeed, a golden book from first to last, and we are glad to see that there is still a demand for so scholarly and sound an edition of it as this.

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S LIST

"The most important and attractive biography of the year."

THE LIFE & LETTERS OF LESLIE STEPHEN

By FREDERIC W. MAITLAND

With 5 Photogravure Portraits, royal 8vo, 18s. net

WESTMINSTER ABBEY

And the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY

Photogravure and 125 Illustrations, royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net

The earlier chapters serve as a guide to the Abbey considered as a work of art, and other chapters are historical. The illustrations have been prepared with much care.

LIFE AND EVOLUTION

By F. W. HEADLEY

100 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 8s. net

THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LEONARDO DA VINCI

By EDWARD McCURDY

13 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 8s. net

CORREGGIO

By T. STURGE MOORE

55 Illustrations, pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net

WATTEAU

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR

50 Illustrations, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net

NEWEST FICTION NOW IN DEMAND

OLD FIREPROOF

By OWEN RHOSCOMYL

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE HEART THAT KNOWS

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS

Author of "The Kindred of the Wild," etc.
6s.

HIS PEOPLE

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM

6s.

DON-A-DREAMS

By HARVEY O'HIGGINS

6s.

THE PLACID PUG

And Other Rhymes

By THE BELGIAN HARE (Lord Alfred Douglas)

Author of "Tales with a Twist"

Illustrated by P. P. Oblong crown 4to (10 by 8), 3s. 6d.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 Henrietta St., Covent Garden

Please write for a full Prospectus and Note upon
THE MEDICI SERIES

OF
COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS
 AFTER THE OLD MASTERS

A new method which ensures absolute fidelity in the rendering of form, and a presentation of the colour of the originals such as has hitherto seemed impossible of realisation.

- | | |
|--|--------------|
| I. BERNARDINO LUINI: 1475 (?)–1533.
HEAD OF THE VIRGIN MARY, after the Fresco now in the Brera Palace, Milan.
(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½
by 10½ inches.) | 10/6
net. |
| II. LEONARDO DA VINCI: 1452–1519
HEAD OF THE CHRIST, after the unfinished
Cartoon now in the Brera Palace, Milan.
(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½
by 10½ inches.) | 10/6
net. |
| III. ALESSANDRO FILIPEPI, called BOTTI-
CELLI: 1447–1510
THE VIRGIN AND CHILD, Painting in tempera on wooden panel now in the Museo Poldi-Pezzoli at Milan.
(Size of Plate, 24½ by 17½ inches; Colour Surface, 13½
by 9½ inches.) | 10/6
net. |
| IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI:
THE LAST SUPPER, from the fresco in S.
Maria della Grazie, Milan.
(Size of Plate, 40½ by 28 inches; Colour Surface, 31½ by 16 inches.) | 21/-
net. |

The BURLINGTON MAGAZINE for October says: "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."

Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari.

Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY.

ORDINARY EDITION—Full gold stamped buckram, gilt tops, 8 by 5½ inches. With 8 full-page Coloured Plates, 24 Half-tone Plates. 7s. 6d. net.

SPECIAL EDITION—Bound in whole white parchment, printed on pure rag paper, deckle edges, 9 by 6½ inches. Contains all the Plates of the Cheaper Edition, with 4 additional Coloured Plates and a Special Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece 15s. net.
Bound in vellum, 21s. net.

The Binding and Titles in both Editions are Copies of XV. and XIII. Century Originals.

The Poetical Works of William Blake.

Edited and Annotated by EDWIN J. ELLIS.

2 vols., demy 8vo. Photogravure Frontispiece, each volume cloth, 12s. net; half leather, 15s. net.

Burnt Spices. By L. S. GIBSON. 6s.

"A remarkably interesting story, told with strength. . . . A work of unmistakable ability and originality."—THE WORLD.

The Tea Planter. By F. E. PENNY. 6s.

"Mrs. Penny has, in our opinion, produced the most finished and artistic work that has yet appeared over her name."—GUARDIAN.

To Defeat the Ends of Justice. 6s.

By HERBERT COMPTON.

"A story teeming with incident and colour. . . . While the attractive qualities of the principal characters intensify the interest. . . . A stirring and delightful book."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The Man Apart. By RALPH STRAUS. 6s.

"The Man Apart" is a piece of strong work, on which Mr. Straus is to be congratulated."—SCOTSMAN.

The St. Martin's Library.

LEATHER,
3/- net
each.

POCKET VOLUMES.
Printed on Flax Paper.

CLOTH,
2/- net
each.

SOME ADDITIONS:

POCKET AUTHORS.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
COLLECTED POEMS, including Underwoods, Ballads, Songs of Travel.

By H. A. TAINÉ.
HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.
In 4 vols. With 32 Portraits.

By AUSTIN DOBSON.
EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY VICINETTES
First Series, With 3 Illustrations.

THE POCKET R.L.S.
THE POCKET RICHARD JEFFERIES.
THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD.
THE POCKET CHARLES DICKENS
THE POCKET THACKERAY.
THE POCKET EMERSON.
THE POCKET THOMAS HARDY.

PLEASE WRITE FOR A COMPLETE LIST.

CHATTO & WINDUS,
111 St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

HAVE YOU BOUGHT YOUR BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS?

A. & F. DENNY will send their New Catalogue on receipt of name and address. The largest and most varied stock in London to select from.

A. & F. DENNY, 147 Strand, London.
 (Opposite the Gaiety Theatre.)

THE ACADEMY

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES

Whole Page	£8 8 0
Half	4 4 0
Quarter	2 10 0
Narrow Column	3 0 0
Per Inch, Narrow Column	0 7 6

SERIAL RATES (for not less than 13 narrow columns)

Whole Page	£7 10 0
Half	3 15 0
Quarter	1 17 6
Narrow Column	2 10 0

SPECIAL POSITIONS AS ARRANGED

SMALL-TYPE ADVERTISEMENTS

6d. per Line. Minimum, 2/6. The first line is counted as two

Copy for Advertisements must be sent in not later than 12 noon on Thursday.

All Orders for Advertisements are received subject to the space being available and the Proprietors reserve to themselves the right to decline or hold over an Advertisement.

All Communications respecting Advertisements must be addressed to THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER, 20 TAVISTOCK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15 Piccadilly, London.

A HISTORY OF ORIENTAL CARPETS BEFORE 1800.

By F. R. MARTIN.

Three Parts, atlas folio, with 40 (or more) superb Plates, Coloured, Part-Coloured, and Plain. 250 Copies printed.

Subscription price, £16 net. Parts I. and II. ready for delivery.

The original scheme as to the number of plates, etc., having been much enlarged, it will be necessary to limit the number of subscribers at £16. After a reasonably short interval the price of the book will be raised to £20. The work is uniform in size and style with that issued by the Austrian Government.

FAITHS OF MAN: A Cyclopædia of Religions.

By the late Major-General J. G. R. FORLONG, F.R.A.S., F.R.S.E., etc.

3 vols. royal 8vo, cloth, £5 5s. net.

"A noble effort to meet a want that is being felt day by day with increasing urgency. . . . In this object he has admirably succeeded. But he has left us also a monument of a charming personality . . . the pioneer movement in a department of scientific inquiry that is of the first importance to mankind." Dr. T. W. RHYS DAVIDS, Journal of Royal Asiatic Society.

"There are about three thousand articles in these three volumes . . . The book is not only erudite, but thoroughly modern, and is simply indispensable for a comprehensive knowledge of religions. The author was no ordinary man . . . in writing this book he has reared a fitting memorial to a most genial, sincere, and inspiring personality."—Rev. Dr. J. GRASSE, Review of Theology and Philosophy.

"It is almost an unique circumstance that one man should have possessed the ability, the time, the money, and the inclination necessary to carry out such labour; and the volumes now published will form a standard source of information for the increasing circle of those who are interested in the comparative study of human beliefs . . . the reader of this Cyclopædia cannot fail to recognise that the author was a man of truly religious nature, of fine tolerance, and of earnest desire to learn and maintain truth."—Blackwood's Magazine, April 1906.

"The book is clearly of an erudition immensely wide . . . conveniently arranged for purposes of reference of facts, and points of recondite learning, concerning religion in general, and Oriental religions in particular."—Scotsman, May 5, 1906.

"It is altogether a remarkable book, and will be found extremely useful by all students of religion . . . This book is the crowning glory of a most industrious, strenuous, and devoted life."—Dundee Advertiser, April 12, 1906.

THE SAGA LIBRARY.

THE STORIES OF THE KINGS OF NORWAY, CALLED THE ROUND WORLD (HEIMSKRINGLA.)

By SNORRI STURLESON.

Done into English out of the Icelandic by WILLIAM MORRIS and EIRIKR MAGNUSSON.

4 vols. crown 8vo, Roxburghe Binding. JUST COMPLETED, £1 15s. net.

Sold separately: Vols. I.-III., each 7s. 6d. net; Vol. IV., 12s. 6d. net.

THE BRITISH MOSS-FLORA.

By R. BRAITHWAITE, M.D., F.L.S., etc.

3 vols. royal 8vo. With 128 Plates, containing Thousands of Figures.

In 23 Parts, sewed (Subscription Price, £6 10s. 6d. net), reduced to £1 16s. net. Bound in 3 vols. cloth, £2 8s. net.

"Mr. Dixon, in his Preface to his 'Student's Handbook of British Mosses' (1896), referred to the book now under review as 'Braithwaite's splendid and elaborate work . . . which has done so much to stimulate the study of these plants in our country, and which will doubtless remain our standard work for many years to come.' In this generous appreciation by one botanist of the work of another we cordially agree, and we rejoice for ourselves, as well as for the author, at the completion of a noble piece of honest work."—Nature, August 31, 1905.

AN ARABIC-ENGLISH LEXICON.

By E. W. LANE.

8 vols royal 4to, cloth (published £10), reduced to £4 4s. net.

AN ENGLISH-ARABIC LEXICON.

By G. P. BADGER.

1 vol. royal 4to, cloth (published £9 9s.), reduced to £2 2s. net.

The Two Works together (published £19 9s.), for £5 15s. net.

COLOURED FIGURES OF THE EGGS OF BRITISH BIRDS.

With Descriptive Notices.

By HENRY SEEBOHM.

Edited by R. BOWDLER SHARPE.

1 vol. royal 8vo, with Portraits and 59 Coloured Plates containing many hundred Figures, cloth (published £3 3s. net), reduced to £1 16s. net.

This is the standard book superseding all else on the subject,

THE ROMAN FORUM AND THE PALATINATE,

According to the Latest Discoveries.

By HORACE MARUCCHI.

8vo, pp. 384, with 2 Plans and numerous Engravings in the Text, sewed, 5s. net; bound in half-red morocco, 6s. net.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1807

DECEMBER 22, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointment Vacant

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

THE Council of the University of Sheffield is about to appoint a Librarian who must have high academic qualifications. Copies of not more than three testimonials, and the names of two referees, must be sent, by January 23, 1907, to the Registrar, from whom full particulars may be obtained.

W. M. GIBBONS,
Registrar.

Lectures

A Christmas Course of Lectures.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

W. DUDELL, Esq., will, on Thursday next, December 27, at three o'clock, begin a Course of Six Lectures (adapted to a Juvenile Auditory) on "SIGNALLING TO A DISTANCE; FROM PRIMITIVE MAN TO RADIOTELEGRAPHY" (experimentally illustrated). Subscription (for Non-Members) to this Course, One Guinea (Children under sixteen, Half a Guinea); to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas. Tickets may be obtained at the Institution.

Books for Sale.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue for DECEMBER Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

FITZGERALD (EDWARD), 1809-1883, the Famous Letter-Writer and Translator of Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam—Life of, by Thos. Wright. 63 full page plates in colour. 2 vols., 8vo, Art Linen, new pub., 24s. net for 10s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

DICKENS (Charles) Songs, Choruses, and Concerted Pieces in the Operatic Burletta of the Village Coquette. The Strange Gentleman, a Comic Burletta by Boz, with frontispiece by Phiz, 1837. £30 offered. Sketches of Young Gentlemen, first edition, cardboard covers, 1838. Great Expectations, arranged for a Reading, 8vo, n.d. [186-], a pamphlet. Proceedings Thirteenth Festival, Roy. Gen. Theatrical Fund, 1858, in yellow wrapper. Speech; Administrative Reform Association, Theatre, Drury Lane, 8vo, 1855. Sketches of Young Couples, cardboard covers, 1840. Master Humphrey's Clock, in monthly or weekly parts, 1840-1. A Christmas Carol, first edition, 1843. Battle of Life, 1846, with publisher's names on vignette title-page, as well as on printed title. 30s. offered. Martin Chuzzlewit, in monthly parts or cloth, 1844, or odd. David Copperfield, in monthly parts or cloth, 1850. A Child's History of England, 3 vols, 1852-4. Story of Little Dombey, paper wrappers, 1858. The Poor Traveller, paper wrappers, 1858. A Tale of Two Cities, in monthly parts or cloth, 1859, or any odd parts. Oliver Twist, in monthly parts or cloth, 1846, or any odd parts.

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street W.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT
Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, . . . 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: CLARKE & CO.

IDEAL GIFT BOOKS

The Fairy Library

Handsomely bound in cloth, with Picture Covers.

5/- net each. Post free 5/5

Jack the Giant Killer Puss in Boots

Each volume contains Eight Full Page Illustrations in Colour by H. M. BROCK, each picture being beautifully mounted.

The Daily Graphic says :

"Really fine children's books, in which Mr. Brock gives some delightful specimens of his colour-work."

A NEW NOVEL BY MORICE GERARD

A story of great power and originality, the scene of which is laid on the West Coast of Cornwall.

The Secret of the Moor

Cloth, 3/6 net; Post Free, 3/10

In this novel, Mr. Morice Gerard is in turns mysterious, stirring, pathetic, and tender, while the mystic air of the Cornish moors pervades the whole story.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND,
LONDON, W.C.

NOW READY. 1907 EDITION.

ALL NEW HONOURS AND PARLIAMENTARY CHANGES INCLUDED.
OLDEST PEERAGE VOLUME EXTANT.
PUBLISHED IN THREE CENTURIES.

A very mine of information (including Addresses) regarding all living Titled Persons, and the Members of the Collateral Branches of all Peers and Baronets, Bishops, Privy Councillors, Knights and Companions of the various Orders, Precedency, Formal Modes of Address, &c. &c.

DEBRETTS

PEERAGE (with Index to Courtesy Titles),
BARONETAGE (with Index),
KNIGHTAGE and
COMPANIONAGE

Illustrated. Accurate and Up-to-Date.

Also an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

2400 pages, cloth gilt (Royal Edition), 31s. 6d. net; or in two Vols., 16s. 6d. net each. Limp morocco (Special Thin Paper Edition), half-weight and thickness of Royal Editions, 50s. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160 FLEET STREET, E.C.

The book-year ends this week—on Monday anyhow. On Wednesday, at the psychological moment for the Christmas trade, there appeared the January BOOK MONTHLY, bringing the record of the book-year down to its close.

Besides lists, it has bright articles and beautiful illustrations dealing with Christmas books, with publishers' marks, with the triumph of the woman novelist in 1906, and with other literary subjects. Now is the time to become a subscriber to the BOOK MONTHLY, which only costs sixpence. Write for a specimen copy to the publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	623	A White Night	635
Literature :		Nugæ Scriptoris :
Popular Criticism	625	XIII—Symbolism	635
Westminster Versions	626	A Literary Causerie :
The Man Columbus and his		The Poetry of Christmas	636
Idea	627	Fiction	637
Theories and Facts	628	Fine Art :
A Woman of Mark	629	Recruits for the Picture-market	638
Criticism and Criticism	629	Music :
In Erin's Isle	630	Sullivan and Popular Music	639
The Caged Whirlwind	631	Correspondence	640
Newman and Scientific Method	631	Books Received	641
The Library Table	633	The Bookshelf	642
Christmas at Cairo	635

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

AT this season of the year the spirit of good-will is abroad, and while wishing our readers all the compliments of the season, we must congratulate them on the fact that the Angel of Peace has so little to do. No war-worn veterans are facing each other on the field of battle. No weary campaigners are sighing for a brush of the angel's wing. If we may be permitted to descend from this poetical language to a more colloquial style, it may be said that the angel has only a few small jobs on hand. He ought not to find it difficult to reconcile such well-meaning foes as the Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Birrell, or to illumine the deathless face of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman with a beatific expression towards Mr. Balfour. The Lords and Commons are not so much in earnest over their fight that they cannot lie down at Christmas like the lion and the lamb in Revelations. It may not be quite an easy task to make Mr. Moberley Bell smile sweetly to Mr. John Murray and Mr. Edward Bell, or cause Mr. Asquith to beam on the suffragettes, but happy is the country where no fiercer disputes are raging!

Abroad there may be more to do. It would probably tax even an angel's gifts to make peace between the German Emperor and his Socialist subjects. "The Païpe, that pagan fu' o' pride," has got into a quarrel with some of his French antagonists that may survive even the amenities of Christmas. In America the angel may be prayed to waken some kinder feeling between President Roosevelt and the fashionable and childless women at whom he is so continuously girding. Most of us have known Yule-tide in which darker and more formidable passions were raging. It seems but yesterday that Japanese and Russian soldiers were fronting each other on the field of battle, and not much longer than yesterday since the soldiers of the Queen were celebrating Christmas Day with bullets whistling about their ears. Those who remember these events are entitled to have their smile at the little tiffs between Lords and Commons, or even between Jupiter Tonans and the publishers.

From a publisher—Arthur Herbert Limited—at Porte St.-Catherine, Bruges, we have received a little book by Louis Thomas, called "La Maladie et la Mort de Mau-passant." It is a kind of publication of which we have had several deplorable examples in this country, but one to be strongly reprehended. After a writer's death we have his work to judge him by, and it seems intolerable that because a man has attained to a certain degree of fame all the privacies of his life, vices, pleasures, intrigues, and amusements should be, as it were, subjected to the microscope, and his secrets laid bare to the world. No good purpose can be served by this sort of thing. It is body-snatching of the worst possible description, and we trust that the custom of making these morbid studies will not spread. Surely the dead have a right to rest in peace.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have published two very pretty little books on Tennyson and Stevenson, tiny and finely printed pamphlets of some forty pages each, with good illustrations. How they are produced for sixpence we do not know, but even in a brochure issued at that modest price Mr. G. K. Chesterton might take the trouble to get his quotations right. The following appears in his not very illuminating discourse on Tennyson:

... The battle-bolt sang from the three-decker out on the foam,
Many a smooth-faced, snub-nosed rogue would leap from his counter or till,
And strike, were it but with his cheating yardwand, home.

We give the proper version for Mr. Chesterton's benefit. He talks a great deal about the melody of Tennyson, but he has spoiled it considerably in his garbled quotation:

For I trust if an enemy's fleet came yonder round by the hill,
And the rushing battle-bolt sang from the three-decker out of the foam,
That the smooth-faced, snub-nosed rogue would leap from his counter and till,
And strike, if he could, were it but with his cheating yardwand, home.

The Stevenson in the same series is popular and pretty, but Mr. Robertson Nicoll and Mr. Chesterton, who do the small booklet between them, have omitted to mention what is really the most instructive and interesting point in Stevenson's career—that which gave occasion to the famous and ill-expressed article of W. E. Henley. Henley was not a writer who had mastered the art of making his meaning clear to those who were not more or less in his own position, but his complaint was not ungrounded. It was one of the saddest disappointments to his manly and steadfast heart that Robert Louis Stevenson had not proved true to the aspirations with which the two young men set out. Henley's opinion was that his friend had "taken his ease in Zion," and that he had not lived fully and truly up to his convictions, but had gone astray after the strange gods of popularity. The true Stevenson found expression in one of his short stories, and some who had studied him to purpose believed that never again was he absolutely and austere true to himself, careless of what might follow.

A curious specimen of American humour reaches us in the shape of "The Auto Guest Book of Mobile Maxims." The decorations with which this banquet of automobilia wit is served up have a turn of criticism that will be quite welcome. Here are a few examples: "An auto at speed is a friend indeed"; "Remember, never to mend too late"; "Little ditches cause big fears"; "Haste makes 'chased'"; "Spare the oil and spoil the ride"; "A fair exchange is no garage"; "Pity not thy horse, which can boast both sire and dam; thine auto hath no damn but thine to comfort it"; "Where there's a bill there's a way"; "Of thy chauffeur, tell the truth; it won't shame the devil"; "A girl in the auto is worth two in the push." On the whole automobilia wit does not seem to be very dazzling.

Of a similar nature, though less "cheap," is "A Century of Misquotations" sent us by the same publishers (Messrs. Paul Elder). "The puzzled reader" is informed that "each number composing this selection of misquotations is formed by welding two selections into one," and he is asked to separate these parts and to assign to each the rightful author. It is a form of amusement which ought to be popular for a winter's night. The following are samples:

On the road to Mandalay, where the flying fishes play,
I'm to be queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be queen o' the May.

Strange all this difference should be 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee:
Who shall decide when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt, like you and me?

Many of them are too simple, as :

The King of France went up the hill
With twenty thousand men ;
Stormed at with shot and shell,
Boldly they rode and well,
Into the jaws of Death,
Into the mouth of Hell.

The following is at least funny :

Imperious Caesar, dead and turn'd to clay,
Might stop a hole to keep the wind away :
He left the name at which the world grew pale
To point a moral, or adorn an ale.

How many people could tell us offhand whence these four lines come :

He is a fool who thinks by force and skill
To turn the current of a woman's will,
For if she will, she will, you may depend on't ;
And if she won't, she won't, so there's an end on't ?

The Senate has decided that the ashes of Zola are to rest in the Pantheon, but those who dislike Zola may console themselves with the thought that he will not remain there for ever. There is an ambiguity about the Pantheon which must have puzzled many a visitor, and the nature of the fame that it confers is somewhat doubtful too. For the Pantheon is a church without an altar: it is a classic edifice built in memory of a mediæval saint. Its aisles are not veiled in seemly gloom, but are flooded with light, as is natural in a temple designed in the century of Voltaire. On the dome is a painting of St. Geneviève, the prophetess; on a pediment is a bas-relief that represents the Fatherland rewarding its great men. The Parisians saw at once that the Pantheon was no church, and they made it a place of interment for distinguished people. Mirabeau was the first to be buried there, but he was not allowed to stay, and the same fate befell Marat. So, too, it is only the tombs of Voltaire and Rousseau that are shown: at the Restoration their ashes were flung into the Seine. Lannes, the hero of Saragossa, was more fortunate. Victor Hugo has been there for some twenty years. In 1848 the Pantheon became for the second time a church. It is the Campo Santo or the Westminster Abbey of Paris, but with a considerable difference.

Steps are being taken to erect a memorial to Gerald Griffin, who has described Irish life and character with remarkable fidelity and charm. Griffin's literary career was interesting, but not extraordinary. At twenty-one he found himself in London with a play, Gisippus, which he could not get accepted, but which Macready produced at Drury Lane, after the author's death, with much success. He earned a living by writing for the magazines, and he also worked for an editor, who sent him from time to time three-volumed novels to review with a request that he would not cut the leaves. But some people will think that his critical sagacity must have been a little defective, for he thought the Lake school and Landor "stupid and prosy," and talked of the "trash" of Alfred Tennyson. He attained to fame with the publication of "Collegians," the tale of a clandestine union of a man with a girl of inferior rank, and with "Suil Dhuv," a story of robbers. Griffin was of the stuff of which true authors are made, for when he was questioned as to his method of writing "Collegians" he replied that "it used to write itself." He retired to Ireland, joined the Christian Brothers, and died in 1840.

"Dingley the Famous Author" is a book of which we may perhaps hear more. It is the work of two French writers, and has just won a prize offered by the Goncourt Academy. The book is a study of an Englishman, whose prototype is perhaps Kipling. In any case, he has won fame at forty: soldiers sing his verses when they set out for a campaign, and he is known for his patriotism and his belief in the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race. But it is the moment of the Boer War, and English pride had been sorely wounded. Dingley wishes to offer some consolation to his country and sketches out a plan for a novel in which a miserable loafer enlists and under the influence of the war develops into a hero. To get the local colour he goes to Capetown with his wife and child. Leaving them there, he starts for the veldt. But the child sickens and the father is recalled. A Boer who captures him lets him go and helps him on his way, and he reaches his child in time to kiss it before it dies. The Boer is taken fighting and is condemned to death. Dingley, who might have saved him, refuses to intercede. His novel has an immense sale, and when its incidents are represented by means of a bioscope in a public hall in London, the picture of the execution of the Boer is received with tumultuous applause.

"Posh," for whom a subscription has been opened by one of the daily papers, occupies a great place in the life of the translator of "Omar Khayyam." Edward Fitzgerald, who was mourning the loss of a friend, was according to his own account wandering about the shore at night, wondering whom he would meet to fill up the vacant place in his heart. It was in these circumstances that he made the acquaintance of "Posh" the skipper, whom he describes as "a man of the finest Saxon type, with a complexion vif, mâle et flamboyant, blue eyes, a nose less than Roman, more than Greek, and strictly auburn hair that any woman might sigh to possess." In addition to all this Fitzgerald saw in him so many virtues that he never would believe that anything he did was wrong. Once after enjoying an Homeric banquet with Fitzgerald, "Posh" lay down upon the sofa. Some friends of Fitzgerald seemed inclined to regard this as an unwarrantable liberty, but he only exclaimed, "Poor fellow, see how tired he is!" The two were constantly together, and as Fitzgerald's manner sometimes verged on the eccentric strangers at Lowestoft were apt to regard him as a lunatic and "Posh" as the keeper. It was for "Posh" that Fitzgerald built a fishing lugger, and he also had his portrait painted so that it might hang side by side with the portraits of his other two friends, Thackeray and Tennyson. It is possible that some of "Posh's" sealore may have got into Tennyson's poems via Fitzgerald, and his remark that "the spoon-drift flew so thick over the vessel as to cut the sun right into little stars" is a gem.

What has been known for many years as the "fiction bogey" was brought before the Library Association at its meeting at Hanover Square by Mr. E. A. Baker (Woolwich). The quarrel with the critics is not now whether fiction should be admitted to public libraries, but whether a discretion should be exercised. There is a difference of opinion as to what is good and what is bad fiction. A standard of selection is necessary, and this can only be based on a consensus of opinion. Before this opinion can be formed it is necessary to study the objects of the public library. There are two methods of arriving at this—the historical and the sociological. In both cases the conclusion is the same. In the speeches and evidence at the passing of the first Act in 1850 there is not a word about supplying the material for educational debauchery. Everywhere even at that period the object was the education and enlightenment of the people, and libraries were recognised as the schools of grown men. The so-called popular novel is not really popular. If the number of readers of inferior fiction were counted, instead of the issues of this class of book, the number of individual readers would be found comparatively small. It is true the public libraries are supported by the people, but the popular control is exercised through qualified representatives or skilled specialists.

There are only two tests of the percentage of fiction (if there is any reason why fiction should be singled out any more than poetry or music or any other class of book, seeing that there is more than enough of bad poetry and of music without harmony)—the "time" test, and the test of cost. These represent two points of view, that of the library, and of the reader. On a recent occasion Mr. Carnegie stated that, taking the time expended upon the reading of novels of all kinds as the test of their use in public libraries, the proportion of fiction in relation to other classes would be found to be about 15 per cent. And the cost of the books and their upkeep is, if anything, rather less. (Mr. Philip, Gravesend.) At the same time, much of the responsibility of the fiction question rests on the librarian, Committees are usually guided by their officers. (Rev. Canon Beck.) Nevertheless, the public library is answering the question itself by educating the readers. Since public libraries were first established under the Act the fiction percentage has been going down (Mr. Kettle, Guildhall). The fundamental thing is to get the material—the reader—into the library, and then improve his taste (Mr. Jast, Croydon).

Booksellers' catalogues are of importance to every one having anything to do with books. And Mr. Burt (Handsworth) followed Mr. Baker with a contribution on the subject, read by Mr. Prideaux. The originator of this method of advertising was George Wither, of Strashourg, who published his first catalogue in 1554 or 1564, probably the latter. The first catalogue said to have been published in England was one of English books, issued in 1680, and continued to 1685. But an earlier specimen of 1595, dedicated to Queen Elizabeth and somewhat on the lines of a subject index, is in existence. These old catalogues are usually very meagre in the information they offer, and the prices of the same books vary considerably. The quantity of catalogues at the present time increases daily, but there is still much to be desired in their arrangement. A well annotated catalogue is not only a guide to the purchaser, but a good speculation for the bookseller. One of the chief objections to the catalogues of the present day is that the single entries are sometimes under author, illustrator, title or subject, and all mixed up in one alphabetical sequence, so that it is impossible to find any particular book. As the increase of cost precludes the multiplication of entries, a systematic scheme of classification with author entries should be uniformly adopted, and a summary of the subject headings at the commencement of the catalogues would make reference easy. Not only do many catalogues not observe any uniformity of entry, either under author, title or subject, but where the entry is under the last of these, startling transpositions are found. Perhaps the greatest objection to the greater number of catalogues is the omission of the most important particular—the dates of publication of the books.

Mr. Murray has in the press a new series of books on English literature, dealing with the subject somewhat in the manner in which Mr. Mackail deals with Latin Literature in his manual, and Mr. J. R. Green and Mr. C. R. L. Fletcher deal with English history. That is, not giving merely a dry record of writers and their books, but tracing the growth of English literature and the causes to which its force and wealth are due, and introducing just so much of biography and incident as may serve to link the narrative on to the history of our country. The volumes are intended primarily for educational purposes, and the first will deal with the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth century and will be accompanied by three graduated volumes of extracts, each complete in itself and designed for upper, middle and lower classes in schools respectively.

LITERATURE

POPULAR CRITICISM

The Bookman Illustrated History of English Literature. By THOMAS SECCOMBE and W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton, 15s. net.)

DURING the past few years several important works on the history of English literature have appeared, and the authors seem to differ greatly in the conception they form of the task they undertake and the objects they seek to attain. Professor Courthope's bulky work, for example, is valuable chiefly as showing the threads by which the literature of various times and different countries is connected. The work on which Professor Saintsbury is engaged is, in a sense, much more explanatory and critical. Some years ago Mr. Heinemann published a book similar to this, but it differed in so far that the authors, Mr. Garnett and Mr. Gosse, aimed less at popularity. Its principal feature lay in the illustrations. Museums had been ransacked in order that pages, head-pieces, colophons, title-pages, and autographs might be reproduced. The authors evidently desired to carry the imagination of their readers back to the conditions in which early writers had to work. Those we have mentioned will all be treasured by the student of literature chiefly as works of reference. An earlier work of the same nature used to be to many of us a source of inspiration. We refer to the first edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia of English Literature. It was not so thorough or so critical as more modern works, yet that book had a charm which in our opinion the others lack. We remember what a delight it was in youth to take it down and turn over the pages, not for the history and criticism but for the delightful quotations. Many an author who subsequently became a great favourite owed his first introduction to the public to the judicious extracts which struck the eye as one turned its leaves. Mr. Thomas Seccombe and Mr. Robertson Nicoll have not attempted to do the same thing in their book. The pictures, for instances, may be described as decorations rather than illustrations proper. The portraits are well chosen and finely reproduced, but most of the other pictures, however pleasing to look upon, have absolutely no value as illustrations of the text. Stothart's clever painting, "The Canterbury Pilgrims," embodies only the painter's conception of Chaucer's text. It has no solid or scholarly value. Mr. Walter Crane's drawing of "The Wedding of the Medway and the Thames" to illustrate a passage in "The Faery Queen" is again purely decorative. "Cordelia's Portion," from a painting by Ford Madox Brown, "Malvolio and the Countess," from a painting by Daniel Maclise, and "The Play Scene in Hamlet," by the same artist, Ford Madox Brown's "Romeo and Juliet," Boughton's picture of "Milton's Meeting with Andrew Marvell," and Landseer's "Defeat of Comus;" in the first volume may be all classified together as purely useless ornaments to the text, and in the second volume, "Dr. Johnson waiting for an audience with Lord Chesterfield," "The Vicar of Wakefield," "The Meeting of Burns and Scott," "Isabella, or the Pot of Basil," must be placed in the same category. To have shown the handwriting of the authors, or indeed anything that was part of them, and to some extent an indication of their character or their surroundings would have had a more definite value for the serious student of literature. Leaving the subject of illustration, however, it is a fair question to ask for what purpose these essays are intended. The authors have not been able to strike the keynote of a great historical epic, as, for example, J. R. Green did in his "Short History of the English People," where the trend of thought and the generation of movements were steadily followed from century to century. The plan they have adopted bears a close resemblance to that with which the University Extension Lecturer is generally credited. That is to say, they have industriously gathered together the main facts of a writer's life, and have managed to say, generally, the correct thing about him; but surely that involves a somewhat low ideal of the purpose of a history of English literature. Its aim, we take it, is not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Those who have read widely in English letters are not likely to require to have opinions formed for them from the outside. Voltaire once said that he would "have preferences, but no exclusions," but that is a counsel of perfection. Each true lover of literature will form likings peculiar to himself. Some things he will like and some he will not like, but whatever the opinion of his critics he will have his own private anthology. Nor is it at all desirable that formulated opinions should be forced upon his mind. On the other hand, the youth who is just beginning to open up the ploughland of letters will, we are sure, be more enticed into reading by judicious extract than by the gravest homily. We have to remember that although to us who have travelled over the ground the beauties of it are mostly familiar, they are still fresh and undiscovered to the younger generation, and who knows what effect may be produced by a haunting phrase picked up at random from a history of literature? The single line, "Ah! wanton, will ye?" has led many a one to read everything that he could lay hold of that bore the name of Lodge, and the ever fresh and ever delightful cuckoo song, "Somer is icumen in, loud sing cuckoo," has cost more searching among our earliest poetry than the learning of all the philosophers. Marlowe's "Is this the face that launched a thousand ships, and burned the topless towers of Ilium" has brought many a worshipper to the shrine of that dramatist. No writer is so familiar but that some new admirer will be attracted by a well-chosen quotation. Indeed we can scarcely imagine a true lover of literature discoursing on the works of those men whose lines have been familiar to him from childhood without wishing to repeat some of them.

We cannot but consider it, therefore, to be a grave defect of this book that it contains so much in the way of exposition and argument and is so penurious in quotation. Curiously enough the ballads that form the natural introduction to literature, coming as they have done for ages past from the mouths of those who knew them, are altogether omitted. Such phrases as that "Tom Jones" was a pivotal novel where a word that has got into critical slang of to-day is used as far as we can see without any definite meaning or that Tennyson produced "yearnful music" speaks more of Fleet Street than of the study. To go a little deeper into the matter and to judge the writers by a very high standard indeed, it seems to us that they have not heard what Gladstone once called the solemn voice of the ages. The poet, or for that matter the prose writer, to act as the interpreter of his time, must yield more or less to the atmosphere into which he was born and in which he lives. There must be some good reason to account for the gaiety as of a bird's carol in such early music as that cuckoo song to which we have already alluded, and the profound melancholy with which Arnold in our own day heard the breaking of the waves on Dover beach. Impulses, like great summer clouds, have from time to time swept over the face of intellectual England and nowhere has the effect been more marked than in the poetry. But our authors, clear and keen and acute as they are within the range of their activity, seem to lack the breadth and depth that would have carried them into this wide field of thought. The book is one to make conversation with. Those familiar with its pages will be able to give a fairly intelligent opinion—or rather the echo of a fairly intelligent opinion—upon almost any author or book that happens to be mentioned, but the thoughtful reader will miss that suggestiveness which would have set his own thoughts to work without perhaps furnishing him with matter for superficial conversation. Nor does the intelligence of the authors find expression in fineness of appreciation and discrimination. There is a passage in which it would almost appear that they believe that the style of Henry Fielding was not better than that of Tobias Smollett. The essay on Jane Austen is altogether unworthy of the pages. It surely might have occurred to the writers that a novelist so beloved of Tennyson, so highly thought of by Macaulay, and so much cherished by every true writer, ought not to have been dismissed with this jejune and insufficient notice. The assertion that she "carves profiles on a cherry-stone" is one of the most fatuous we have ever met with in criticism professing to be serious.

WESTMINSTER VERSIONS

Renderings into Greek and Latin Verse from the "Westminster Gazette." Edited by H. F. Fox, M.A. (London and Oxford, 8s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a book to be welcomed for various reasons. It shows that the standard of Greek and Latin verse-writing is as high as ever in the two great English Universities, and that such is the fascination of a graceful and scholarly art that the most accomplished of modern scholars have been tempted to take part in a competition started by an enterprising London newspaper. The little book of about a hundred pages is nicely got up and fits easily into the coat pocket. The English pieces afford very good reading, and are of necessity quite out of the beaten track of English poetry, seeing that for the purpose of the competition the pieces set must be such as are not included in any of the many published collections of Greek and Latin verse.

The compositions are pretty well divided between Oxford and Cambridge; perhaps we meet oftenest the well known initials E. D. S., which do not indicate Edwards's Desiccated Soup, but that more potent and delicate essence, the extract of the spirit of Greek and Latin Poetry prepared by Mr. E. D. Stone, late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. We think, however, that Mr. Dames-Longworth, scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, "wipes his eye" in his rendering of a poem by G. J. Romanes beginning,

Be it not mine to steal the cultured flower
From any garden of the rich and great.

Mr. Stone gives

Ne mihi furari libeat, quem pinguibus hortis
Eximio florem nomine Croesus alit.

But there is no suggestion of anything so dainty as floriculture in the name of the Oriental monarch, though, of course, the Lydian gardens were famous in antiquity. F. D.-L. has dexterously caught the idea in a happy echo from Juvenal's Senecae praedivitis hortos:

Non ego, quos nimia Crassus praedives in hortis
Arte colit flores, surripuisse velim.

Mr. Dames-Longworth has also contributed a very clever version of the mock-metaphysical "Death of Space" from the Bon Gaultier Ballads. He would find a similar congenial theme in "Bright breaks the warrior o'er the ocean wave" by James (or was it Horace?) Smith in "The Comic English Grammar." A version of it in Greek dithyrambic strophes and antistrophes is essayed in the very last number of Kottabos, p. 332 of vol. ii. (new series).

Oxford, admirably represented by Godley, Sidgwick, and Morshead, is in the van with Greek iambs. Mr. T. C. Moss of St. John's College, Cambridge, falls into an error (p. 52) in making φαιβος mean the Sun. It never has that meaning, though in Latin Phoebus is a synonym of Sol. So nympha is never "a girl" in the Latin poets, though old-fashioned composers use it as a synonym of puella.

The same scholar gives us (p. 57) a masterly version of Browning's

You never know what life means till you die.

Mr. F. R. Shilleto as a composer is a worthy son of his father, but "my tender brother" is not well rendered by ἀδελφῶν ἡπιώτατον κάρα, and surely θηλύνουσι is a misprint for θηλύνουσι on p. 41, l. 9 from bottom.

In hexameters Mr. Stone is again to the fore. Mr. Ramsay has a very happy version from Tennyson on p. 75. Mr. Godley and Mr. Bailey give some grand Lucretian hexameters which end the little volume. This is the former's version of a fine poem of Matthew Arnold's which would not at first sight suggest hexameters, though it is really eminently suited to that measure:

Is it so small a thing
To have enjoyed the sun,
To have lived light in the spring,
To have loved, to have thought, to have done;
To have advanced true friends and beat down baffling foes—

That we must feign a bliss
Of doubtful future date,
And, while we dream on this,
Lose all our present state,
And relegate to worlds yet distant our repose?

Usque adeo nihil est quod puro numine solis viximu' laetantes? quod ver sensus hilaravit?
multas concepissem animo gessisse manu res quod licuit nobis et amantes invicem amasse?
tamne inimicorum nil est frustrantia coepta vincere vi, veris vel amicis auxiliari, ut procul hinc homines dubium se laetitiae capturos fructum sperent et tempore longo tandem venturam, veniat si forte, quietem, atque futurorum cupidi praesentia perdant?

Hear now Mr. Bailey:

An nihil est, solis blandos sensisse calores et venum carpsisse diem, flagrasseque amore, digna manu fecisse, animo dum magna volutes?
nil, quod constantes iam sorte bearis amicos obstantesque tibi dextra confluxeris hostes?
quid prodest aliae tibi fingere praemia vitae atque aevi dubio splendori inhiare futuri, huius si aetatis praesentia praemia perdas, nec prius otia captaris quam moenia mundi transieris profugus?

The latter rendering is hardly so redolent of the Lucretian style as Mr. Godley's, but it is a fine piece of manly Latin verse, and is not without the sombre note of the great poet-philosopher of the Roman Republic.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE MAN COLUMBUS AND HIS IDEA

Christopher Columbus and the New World of his Discovery. A Narrative. By FILSON YOUNG. 2 vols. (E. Grant Richards, 25s. net.)

MR. FILSON YOUNG has some of the qualities which went to make Columbus a hero. He has a superb confidence in his native ability to achieve great things in unaccustomed spheres. There is probably no sea into which he would not plunge his literary barque assured of his skill in navigation, uncharted though the waters were. He writes a novel of an unconventional sort with the same facility that he advises the expert motorist, and he feels as much at home on board a caravel with Columbus as on a car touring familiar highways.

In the present "Narrative" he attempts to bring to life in the twentieth century one of the great personal forces of the fifteenth. The task is one demanding the genius of a Froude and a power of imagination denied to average mortals. It were as easy for a Senior Wrangler to enter into the sentiments and live the life of the Village Duffer, for a lady of Fashion to set forth a laundress's most intimate thoughts and doings, as for a man in the days of steam and electricity and Dreadnoughts, when every part of the world save the North Pole is open to his knowledge if not his personal exploration, to visualise and re-create the conditions and the people of a time when the Atlantic was an Ocean of Fables, when men were startled at the discovery of a way round the southern extremity of Africa, when the most enlightened could only speculate on the possibility of reaching the Far East by voyaging West. That the earth was spherical was an idea of the ancients. Cartographers and mariners had probably most of them made up their minds on that point long before Columbus sailed on his first memorable voyage. But what was to be found beyond the Atlantic was a mystery. When Columbus started there were few who did not regard his errand as the maddest project that had ever entered a sailor's head, and if he had not been a man of infinite resource, diplomatic as well as physical, he would never have succeeded in getting his crew of superstitious gaolbirds and adventurers beyond a point at which it was imagined they would go clean over the side of the world into space or something worse. How completely in the dark Columbus himself was as to realities is sufficiently shown by the fact that when he was in Española he thought he was in Asia. He certainly never suspected that a continent and another ocean divided the Atlantic from the land of the Great Khan.

Any student eager for the hard facts of Christopher Columbus's life may put his hand on a plethora of material without difficulty. The industry of latter-day inquirers like Mr. Henry Harrisse and Sir Clements Markham and Mr. Edward Payne has probably left little or nothing to be discovered. Mr. Filson Young is "amazed" at what seemed to him "a striking disproportion between the extent of the modern historians' work on the subject and the knowledge or interest in it displayed by what we call the general reading public." He is—as we should all be—surprised to find "how many well-informed people there are whose knowledge of Columbus is comprised within two beliefs, one of them erroneous, the other doubtful: that he discovered America and performed a trick with an egg." It is therefore to bridge the gulf between the labours of the historians and the indifference of the modern reader that Mr. Filson Young has imposed upon himself the burden of telling the story of Columbus's doings from the time he learnt weaving in Genoa till he died at Valladolid a querulous, gout-ridden, disappointed old man of fifty-five or thereabouts. Mr. Filson Young brushes Washington Irving's claims on one side with the contemptuous remark that "all that can be said for him is that he kept the lamp of interest in Columbus alive for English readers during the period that preceded the advent of modern critical research"—and, it might be added, of Mr. Filson Young prepared to give us the final and authentic portrait.

Mr. Filson Young's Columbus has many merits. It is picturesquely, vivaciously and vigorously written, with here and there a touch reminiscent of Carlyle; it leaves an indelible impression of the Man dominated by an Idea, of the indomitable persistency with which he prosecuted his ambition, of the life starting in poverty, attaining a dazzling zenith of glory and closing in clouds and darkness; of the call of the sea which few can ignore but which to Columbus was imperative, irresistible; of the crash of fifteenth-century Christianity into the midst of the unsuspecting Earthly Paradise which henceforth was to know only fire and slaughter at the hands of civilisation more cruel than Carib barbarism itself—all this and a vast deal more Mr. Filson Young conveys in a way which will win him readers. He does not, however, strike us as an infallible witness, and "modern historical research," which may dispose of Washington Irving, is not perhaps always on the side of Mr. Filson Young. He speaks of John Cabot as a Venetian, though Mr. Harrisse, we imagined, had long since made it clear that Cabot was Genoese, like Columbus, and in any case only a naturalised Venetian. What does Mr. Filson Young mean by saying that "It is an error continually made by the biographers of Columbus that the purpose of Prince Henry's explorations down the Coast of Africa was to find a sea road to the West Indies by way of the East. It was nothing of the kind"? Prince Henry certainly did try to find a way to India and the Spice Islands by an eastern sea route, but the prevalent notion was not that the West would be reached by going East, but that the East Indies could be struck by going West. Mr. Filson Young makes no reference to the offer of Columbus to Henry VII. which was delayed through his brother Bartholomew being captured by pirates. But for that misfortune Columbus might conceivably have sailed under the English flag as Cabot did a few years later. Or does our author dismiss the story altogether as the result of his "modern scientific research"? According to Hakluyt, Bartholomew Columbus was in England in 1488; according to Mr. Filson Young he returned to Lisbon at the end of that year with Diaz after rounding the Cape. In a book appealing to the British public this incident, if true, would be of extreme interest; if untrue, as perhaps Mr. Filson Young can show, it is worth disproving.

THEORIES AND FACTS

- The Lower Niger and Its Tribes. By Major ARTHUR GLYN LEONARD. (Macmillan, 12s. 6d.)

MAJOR LEONARD has many of the qualifications necessary for the student of the less civilised races. He has sympathy; he can "think black," in his own phrase. He recognises a natural fellow creature, "very much like you and me," in the simple, subtle, sensitive, and "slim" native of the Niger delta. He can allow for the influence of a climatic environment "in which nature is at her worst." He knows that the tribes of the Niger are thinkers, as all natural people are, that their curiosity about ultimate problems is keen, but that it is easily satisfied by crude spiritualistic theories. The people are in the higher barbarism, and have strong commercial tendencies.

Sympathetic, unprejudiced, observant, and intelligent, Major Leonard, I fear, while he "thinks black," is too apt to "write white." The defect of his book is its verbal exuberance, and its overflow of theories about the origin of religion. We want facts, and we get many facts, nantes in gurgite vasto, the wide waste of reflections on the facts.

From considerations of space I shall try to cling to the statement of fact about philosophy and belief on the Lower Niger. "The belief in the existence of the human soul is universal. . . . To these natural people the terms 'soul' and 'spirit' are synonymous, in spite of the fact that they have a separate word for each." Soul is "Nkpulohe," "Moa Moa" is spirit. There is really a distinction, I venture to think, corresponding to that noticed by Mr. Dudley Kidd, among the Zulus, between Idhlozi and Itongo. The Idhlozi is the soul of a person from life to death, the Itongo comes to him from, and finally returns to, the corporate community of the Hinatongo, the ancestors. (Kidd, "Savage Childhood," pp. 281-289.) The Nigerian Nkpulohe, in a similar way, is the soul confined in the human body " (with power to wander in dreams), the Moa Moa is "the spirit when at large, or when confined in an object or an organism outside the human."

Here Major Leonard gives us that most desirable thing, a text, or at least a sort of a text, the statement of an Ibo of the interior, whose name implies "Hand of God." "God" appears to enter into Nigerian as into old Hebrew personal names. It would have been well to state whether the man spoke in English or in Ibo, and whether his account of beliefs was taken down at once, on the spot, or was written from memory. The soul is represented as "the fruit of the body," while the spirit is "the soul whose material body has deceased or decayed."

The soul "does not perish with the body, because it is the only thing which the great Spirit wants from each person individually, so that as soon as the body dies, the soul naturally goes back to God, except in certain cases, where it is claimed by evil spirits."

Here we are not told the native Ibo word for "Great Spirit," or "God." This is unfortunate. It appears, however, that by "Great Spirit" or "God," the native theologian meant Tsi, spoken of as "Supreme God," and "Creator." Into the original meaning of Tsi, which appears to be both "darkness" and "daylight" (p. 530), only accomplished linguists can follow Major Leonard's researches. I am reluctant to enter into theory, but it is plain that Major Leonard's hypothesis of the origin of the conception of Tsi will not hold water. He says: "There can be no doubt about it, that it was through them" (that is, through deified human ancestors); "that the god-idea originally evolved, and it was in this way that the origin of the human ancestors, connected and associated as they were with the human gods, was unconsciously traced back to the Supreme Generator or Creator" (p. 419). The "God-idea" is traced through "primeval adoration of the father in the flesh," combined, later, with belief in soul or spirit, whence rose the worship of the human father in the spirit, next, of certain deified ancestors, whence, with a blend of "the phallic principle," men "arrived at a worship of the Supreme God" (p. 68).

The manifest obstacle to this old theory is that in many respects corresponding beings to Tsi—for example supreme or superior beings to whom go the souls of the dead—occur among very low races, the natives of South East Australia and the Andamanese, who neither worship the human father in the flesh, nor worship ancestral spirits of known ancestors. I have stated these objections, with the evidence, in "The Making of Religion." Major Leonard has not understood my case, which (p. 85) he presents all wrong, while he prints what he supposes to be a statement of my ideas within inverted commas, as if it were a textual quotation. I cannot guess where he found his quotation; it reads like a summary by an unintelligent reviewer, and no reference is given to book and page of mine. A better statement will be found in Herr Ehrenreich's essay, "Götter und Heilbringer" in the last number of Zeitschrift für Ethnologie (1906, Heft. iv. u. v.). Mr. J. G. Frazer will probably be surprised to hear that he "sees in the universal traditional worship of trees and plants the most primitive form of religion." I have not understood him in this sense, and Major Leonard gives no references. His is not a scientific method of dealing with theorists, and one returns, in search of facts, to his Ibo witness.

The soul, after burial, goes to the Creator, and "after it has been consulted or interviewed by him" (what is the Ibo word for "to interview"?) it is allowed, according to its taste, to remain for ever in spirit land, or to return to this world. Each soul hopes to meet his dead kinstolk.

Here the statement of Odinaka Olisa, whose name means "Hand of God" (though Tsi is not apparently a component part of it), ceases, and we are told that burial is important, "for they are of opinion that it enables the soul to go to God," and that, if the body is unburied, other spirits boycott the soul. This is the view of the shadows of Patroclus and Elpenor in the Iliad and Odyssey. The soul of the unburied man goes forth as a ghost, haunting houses, or takes the form of an animal.

Suicides are not buried, as a deterrent of self-murder, just as Aias, a suicide, is said, though not by Quintus Smyrnaeus, not to have been burned after his suicide. Homer was not of this opinion, for in his Odyssey, Aias is in Hades, where, unburned, he would not have been admitted. Individual or collective percipience of phantasms of the dead is so rare (that is in men who are not "witch doctors"), that Major Leonard only heard of two cases. Unluckily he gives no details, except that "both, curious to say, were in the afternoon." Why this is "curious" I know not. As a rule phantasms of the dead are seen only in dreams: here we have the account of a native. He speaks just as Lucretius does of these dreams, and of the separability of the soul in sleep, but Lucretius insists on waking percipience of phantasms of the dead, whereas the native says, "Why we see souls only when we are asleep, and not when we are awake, we cannot tell." It is a mystery with "the Great Spirit that rules over all, and with the spirit fathers." There are re-incarnations of souls, "always in the same family."

It is not clear how "everlasting and inevitable Karma" can be part of native belief, as is asserted (p. 152), for a native writer, Izikewe, says that "we make no distinction between the good and the evil" (p. 186). "However good or however bad people are when they die, if they receive proper burial their souls will go up to the land of spirits, for there is no allotted locality of any kind." The next world is much like this: a mixture of good and evil, so many people who have had hard lives wish to go into inanimate objects (p. 221). Totemism, in so far as Major Leonard has observed it in the Niger delta, is animistic. The ancestral spirit, within the actual totem animal or other object, is that to which the delta natives trace their descent. They believe "that these objects were chosen by their ancestors as suitable and convenient objects to reside in. . . ." No such explanatory myth is known in Australia. Major Leonard believes that totemism, "regardless of locality or race, is nothing more than emblemism pure and simple, as it now exists among the tribes of the Niger Delta" (p. 297). Totemism "is but the selection by a clan, community or household of a symbol living or otherwise, to represent the ancestral soul" (p. 197). Totemism among the most undeveloped races lends no corroboration to this theory. Major Leonard's facts are much more valuable than his hypotheses, for example his case of "possession" (pp. 233-238), or of secondary personality, is most interesting to the psychologist. It is new to me that "Mr. Traill Taylor and others" have proved that "with the isolated aid of the camera, in conjunction with the magnetic emanation thrown off by the artist . . . it is possible for photography to obtain phantasmal impressions," while natives "may receive a distinct mental impression of the phantasma in question." This is most interesting, but no reference is given to records of Mr. Traill Taylor's experiments.

Want of space makes it impossible to examine Major Leonard's chapters on language, witchcraft, and tabu, with many other matters. We can only try to give a view of his method and results, and recommend the book, with the curious speculations on "the primitive philosophy of words," to the grateful consideration of students.

ANDREW LANG.

A WOMAN OF MARK

The Life of Isabella L. Bird (Mrs. Bishop). By ANNA M. STODDART. (Murray, 18s. net.)

MISS STODDART has succeeded in the very difficult task of presenting in her biography a vivid portrait of her friend, Mrs. Bishop. Infinite tact is necessary to hold the balance between reckless eulogy, which is fatally uninteresting, and the blunt outspokenness which would offend. Miss Stoddart has done her work admirably and her Life is not only a tribute of affection, of intimate interest to those who knew Mrs. Bishop, it is also a well-written biography.

Miss Bird was born at Boroughbridge Hall in Yorkshire on October 15, 1831. Her father was a clergyman and came of a stock famous for upholding Causes, and she and her sister, Henrietta, were in contact with their leaders during all the second quarter of last century. Discipline was the order of that day: the modern cult of the child was not dreamed of. The children stood all through the long Sunday service and Isabella with them, in spite of the spinal weakness which was in evidence then, and against which her resolute spirit fought during the whole of her lifetime. At the age of six she had said to a gentleman who was canvassing in his own interest and making pleasant speeches to little Henrietta: "Sir Malpas de Grey Tatton Egerton, did you tell my father my sister was so pretty because you wanted his vote?" so that it is not at all surprising that at sixteen, when she was living at Birmingham, she wrote an argumentative pamphlet in favour of Protection. In 1853 she made her first journey through Canada and America. It is interesting to note that through her physical weakness—the journey was taken at the doctor's orders—she found her life's chief work, which was travelling. She was a fine example of one who "turned necessity to glorious gain." And so she continued her life; always active, always sought after, always in touch with people of interest. She travelled through China and Japan and Morocco, visiting places where no white woman had been—endowed with incredible endurance, recording carefully all that her wonderful gifts of observation showed her, avoiding no difficulty, turning back from no danger. And at home she was ceaselessly engaged in good work, erecting cabman's shelters, building hospitals, organising improvements for the slums, superintending her schemes of colonisation or lecturing about the strange people or strange plants she had seen upon her travels. But in all the busy stress of her life she found time for abiding friendships. Miss Stoddart brings out the gentle side of her nature by admirable little personal touches, which are of themselves attractive and light up by their quality the extraordinary strength of Mrs. Bishop's personality. She was eminently a capable woman, but she was more than that: she was a gentle woman.

Of course Miss Stoddart is exceptionally equipped for her work. She possesses the confidence coming from the knowledge that Mrs. Bishop personally asked her to write the Life, if a Life were needed: she possesses the quality of mind which is required to keep pace with Mrs. Bishop's manifold interests; the strong affection which enables her to understand and sympathise with them; and the experience which knows how to arrange the mass of material at her disposal, and to keep everything under control and in proportion. As biographer the one mistake which, in our opinion, Miss Stoddart is inclined to make is that she underlines the religious side of her subject's character. Not that she gives it in any way undue importance. That would not be possible. But religion is a person's very being: and a biographer who dwells, as Miss Stoddart is apt to dwell, on special moments of religious emotion, is liable to convey the impression that religion was not the vital mainspring, but of the nature of an observance, and that is the impression above all others that Miss Stoddart would least wish to convey. It is as though for a moment she thought of one small portion of the public who are interested in Mrs. Bishop, and to whom such passages would be pleasing, and forgot the main issue. But these passages are exceptional, and the momentary quivering of the balance serves to draw attention to its usual fine steadiness.

CRITICISM AND CRITICISM

Studies in Seven Arts. By ARTHUR SYMONS. (Constable, 8s. 6d. net.)

THERE are three kinds of critics of importance. The critic of the first order is a man of feeling, to use a faded phrase, in whom exquisiteness of taste is carried to the point of genius and transformed into the power of creation: the critic of the second order is either a philosopher with an extraordinary force of intellect who takes some province of the kingdom of art by violence, or a man of great learning with an uncommon versatility of mind who invents some new method of criticism: the critic of the third order, to end our catalogue, is an admirable rhetorician with a gift for re-stating the sentiments and ideas of more original writers. Now, it is difficult to decide at first glance whether Mr. Symons is a critic of the first order or a critic of the third order. He himself does not seem to be certain of his own position, and his vacillation of mind is reflected in his vacillation between the two different ways of dealing with a subject.

Owing to his trick of taking as the text of many of his observations a remark by Pater, Baudelaire, or some other amateur of things of strange beauty, one is tempted to regard him as a man of rhetorical talent. His essay on Gustave Moreau in "Studies in Seven Arts," for instance, is little more than a glittering amplification of Rodin's saying that the French painter in question was only a great combiner of the ideas of other men. Criticism of this kind, that relies for its force on a reference to the dicta of some person of authority, Rodin or Sir Joshua, Baudelaire or Coleridge, is criticism of the third order. It is useful work in its way, and written in the picturesque and musical diction that Mr. Symons commands it is delightful work in its way, but it can be done by a man of common ability. The artistic temperament, to use another faded phrase, is not, in its many varieties, a rare endowment. It is a characteristic of every lover of fine literature. It is often manifested in a feeling for the beauty of art so vague and diffused that it can never discover for itself the things that it learns at last to relish with avidity. A critic with this sort of after-wit may sometimes appear to be wildly original, but his eccentricity is merely the reflection of an unusual course of reading. Perversely academic, he follows some strange leaders of taste in art and literature with that confidence in the infallibility of their judgment which only the delight and the relief at finding some novel and useful authority can provoke and sustain. Thereby he acquires a certain narrowness of view, and perhaps a certain compensating intensity of vision, while his sense of the particular kind of beauty which he has been taught to recognise may become at last quick and passionate; nevertheless he remains a critic of the third order.

This, as we have said, is what the author of "Studies in Seven Arts" seems sometimes to be. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Symons is a critic of the first order, whose only fault is that, in his last book especially, he has been too bold in one respect and too timid in another. As he showed in some of the essays in "Studies in Prose and Verse," he is a student of the exquisite and lovely things of man's making, with a poignant and individual sense of the delicacies of fine literature. At his best, he practises criticism as an art, as an art by means of which a writer of taste and feeling recreates in the mind of his readers the precise emotion of joy excited in him by the contemplation of some beautiful work. This is the highest sort of criticism, the criticism of a creative kind in which Lamb and Hazlitt excelled. Examples of it occur in "Studies in Seven Arts," but more rarely than in "Studies in Prose and Verse." In his last book Mr. Symons has adventured in search of new sensations and new moods into unfamiliar fields of art, where he has occasionally lost confidence in himself and followed the advice of every person of authority he chanced to encounter. When he confides in his own faculty of insight he is still an admirable interpreter of the eternal miracles of beauty: when he mistrusts his own powers he becomes merely a conscientious student of the opinions of other men. No doubt it is a profitable experience to wander in the artificial paradises that Baudelaire, Pater, and Mallarmé have built for themselves; but every man of genius must frame in his turn a world of imagination of his own: the poet of genius out of his impressions of nature: the critic of genius out of his impressions of art. Criticism distilled from criticism is wanting in life and personality: it is a branch of the dead sciences.

IN ERIN'S ISLE

The Fair Hills of Ireland. By STEPHEN GWYNN. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. (Dublin: Maunsell; London: Macmillan, 6s.)

"SURE this is blessed Erin"—and Mr. Stephen Gwynn. And Mr. Gwynn is a lover of his country, and a blithe singer of her charms. But he loves old age better than youth, and we are inclined to quarrel a little with his point of view. His song is of her past; yet age cannot wither her, and he forgets her perennial juvenility.

Far dearer unto me than the tones music yields
Is the lowing of her kine and the calves in her fields,
And the sunlight that fell long ago on the shields
Of the Gaels on the fair Hills of Eire, O!

sang Red Donough Macnamara. Like Red Donough's lyric, whence it borrows its title, Mr. Gwynn's book is in praise of Ireland. The difference is at once apparent: to the poet the kine and the calves and the sunlight on the hills and the sea were the things that mattered; to Mr. Gwynn it is the Gaels—or their historical or legendary equivalent. That Mr. Gwynn appreciates the kine and the calves and the sunlight on the hills and the sea which appeal to the poet, no one who has read his "Highways and Byways in Donegal and Antrim" will deny; but beyond appreciation he never goes. They do not call to him, they never move him to emotion, they seem never to have cast a spell over him. He knows that they are beautiful because, being a man of letters, he knows the poets; but their beauty leaves him cold. He tells us of the sidhe and the fairies dispassionately: we feel that he has never seen them dancing on the rath o' nights, or caught the glint of their small red jackets flitting hither and thither in the moonlight, or pursued the leprechaun for the phantom gold upon his back.

The silence that is in the starry skies,
The sleep that is among the lonely hills have no message for him. He lacks imagination, and so the secrets of the brown old earth have never been revealed to him.

Sure maybe ye've heard the storm-thrush
Whistlin' bould in March,
Before there' a primrose peepin' out,
Or a wee red cone on the larch;
Whistlin' the sun to come out o' the cloud,
An' the wind to come over the sea . . .

Sure maybe ye've heard the cushadoo
Callin' his mate in May,
When one sweet thought is the whole of his life,
And he tells it in one sweet way.

We are a little angry because Mr. Gwynn does not understand. He can wander round the north coast and pass the Head of Garron in early spring, when the slopes, rising hundreds of feet almost sheer from the road beneath, are ablaze with the yellow of mile upon mile of primroses, when the valley leading up into Glenariff is carpeted with the starry windflower, and the dewdrops hang glistening like shaken silver from the boughs overhead, yet he sees it all without enthusiasm, his mind absorbed in the doings of MacUillín's galloglaghs back at Dunluce. The black-faced sheep cease cropping the bare herbage on the mountain-side and raise their heads inquisitively, the wind rises, a mist drifts over, and Garron Tower emerges a very palace of fairyland, suspended in mid-air; but Mr. Gwynn is thinking of the salmon-fishing away in dear Donegal.

Yet, as we have said, he is a lover of his country, and a blithe singer of her charms. Our quarrel with him is that he does not sing of the fair hills at all. His song is of Fionn MacCumhail and Diarmuid and Gráinne: of the Ireland that was thousands of years ago, and of the Ireland that never has been save in the minds of her imaginative sons of generations long past but never to be forgotten. And he sings his song of love and war so charmingly, and with such sympathy and intuitive understanding, that it seems ungenerous to complain that his book is not what its title implies. Let us confess that we speedily forgot our sense of disappointment in the glamour of his pages. He lacks imagination, but a legend or a fact once heard is never forgotten, and of almost every place we have known and loved he has something to tell us that we did not know before, or some fading memory to revive. His book has already found its place upon our shelves beside the heroic romances of Ireland, and it is destined to be re-read not once but many times. It is a book which every Englishman who has the least desire to know anything of Ireland should buy. Some day Mr. Gwynn may "take to the hills" and the promise of his title-page may be fulfilled. It remains to add that Mr. Thomson's illustrations are—Mr. Thomson's.

THE CAGED WHIRLWIND

Napoleon's Last Voyages. Being the Diaries of Admiral Sir THOMAS USSHER, R.N., K.C.B. (on board the Undaunted), and JOHN R. GLOVER, Secretary to Rear-Admiral Cockburn (on board the Northumberland). With introduction and notes by J. HOLLAND ROSE. (Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

IN 1895 a storm in a teacup raged about the Undaunted and the Northumberland. It was the year when Mr. Fisher Unwin published these records in a volume which, by an omission of bibliographical detail, tempted reviewers to thrill 1895 with the "finds" of 1840 and 1833. One reviewer with marvellous insight discovered the reason for the reticence which he condemned: not satisfied with a Latin motto for his title-pages, Mr. Unwin secretly thrived on a wicked precept of Thucydides! That reviewer will be inclined to "take it all back" when he gazes on the volume before us, which, if less portly, might be described as a feather in his cap. It is annotated, illustrated, indexed and confessed—if the word may serve us—in a manner which disarms criticism.

These interesting records exhibit a genius who survived himself and became commonplace to escape the sensation of the grave. Any one who has seen Cruikshank's vile caricature with viler verses, published on May 5, 1814, entitled "Boney's Elb(a)ow Chair," will realise the psychic impossibility of Napoleon's position after the Treaty of Fontainebleau. Any one who reflects that the wife of the ex-governor of St. Helena could remain six months on the same small island as Napoleon and quit it without troubling to see him, can imagine that "la politique de Longwood," however lively, failed to convince Napoleon that he lived.

There was plenty of good talk in the "homme mort," and it was readily forthcoming, as those "Miss Balcombes," whose "every possible question" Napoleon answered "without the slightest possible reserve," found at St. Helena. These romps gave us, alas! no record of their playfellow in blindman's buff, who was to them but "Boney" and a living French Exercise. But Thomas Ussher and John R. Glover, secretary and "ghost" (we infer) to Rear-Admiral Cockburn, realised the literary chance of their lives, though Ussher unfortunately did not record the anecdotes which Napoleon related to him of his boyhood. With Ussher Napoleon doubtless felt at ease. This officer had been wounded and captured by the French, and though worthy to be named with Nelson for coolness and courage, admired Napoleon greatly and possessed so much tact that he chatted with his charge about the Walcheren expedition. Ussher observed the Emperor and Sovereign of the island of Elba not only as the self-styled "homme mort" but as philosopher.

He spoke of his intention of taking possession of Pianosa, a small island, without inhabitants, about ten miles from Elba. He said: "All Europe will say that I have already made a conquest." Already he had plans in agitation for conveying water from the mountains to the city.

Unfortunately Napoleon's Lilliput was an island and its liquid boundaries being all visible from one hill, he found that he could see his whole empire in two coups d'œil. On that hill was a chapel. "Some one remarked that it would require more than common devotion to induce persons to attend service there. 'Yes, yes; the priest can say as much nonsense as he wishes.'" Thus did Napoleon, at a moment of humiliation, his new empire having been revealed to him as a toy, disclose the freedom from religious veneration which made his bond less reliable than another man's word.

The voyage to St. Helena saw him under the observation of colder eyes than Ussher's. To John R. Glover he was "the Scourge of Mankind"; but his status was officially only that of an unemployed general. It was noticed now that he used his fingers instead of a fork; Ussher had only noticed that he dined. Glover has the meanness or regard for historic minuteness to note that Napoleon on one occasion was piqued because British heads were not uncovered to his fallen majesty. He also makes an instance of Napoleon's rudeness to Mme. Bertrand much worse by calling her his "favourite" when as a matter of fact he did not like her because she had "spasmodic ways" and endeavoured to dissuade her husband from sharing his exile.

But though Napoleon was in a chilly atmosphere on board the Northumberland, he conversed much of his own affairs, not omitting Josephine and Maria Louisa. He represented the Queen of Naples as saying of Maria Louisa, after an acknowledgment from the latter that she really liked him:

"My child, when one has the happiness to be married to such a man papas and mamas should not keep one away from him whilst there are windows and sheets by which an escape to him might be effected."

This, said for the ears of an admiral who disapproved of Sunday card-playing—to say nothing of Napoleon's other delinquencies—was true humour. The day after Napoleon had told the anecdote of the Queen of Naples he expatiated to the admiral on his becoming a Musselman when in Egypt. The faithful expressly permitted him and his followers to drink wine, "provided that on opening every bottle they would determine to do some good action."

Perhaps Napoleon's most important verbal contribution to history on the Northumberland was the avowal that he was responsible for the death of the Duke D'Enghien—an avowal which was accompanied by the opinion that the fact that this nobleman was taken from the territory of the Duke of Baden was not a reason why his life should have been spared. A few days after the chat about the Duke D'Enghien the English passengers were amusing themselves by "surveying the stupendous barren cliffs of St. Helena, whose terrific appearance seemed to but ill accord with the feelings of our guest."

To appreciate the misery awaiting Napoleon in that island it would indeed be idle to discuss the question whether rats or white ants annoyed him at Longwood, though we are sure they did not.

Cannon his name,
Cannon his voice, he came.
Who heard of him heard shaken hills.

"Cannon he came," but cannon or no cannon, he went to Beadledom.

NEWMAN AND SCIENTIFIC METHOD

Newman, Pascal, Loisy and the Catholic Church. By W. J. WILLIAMS. (Francis Griffiths, 6s.)

Newman. Essai de biographie psychologique. Par HENRI BREMOND. (Paris: Librairie Bloud et Cie.)

THE strong feature of Mr. Williams's book is its advocacy of the "relative infallibility" of the organic, as against the individual, reason. Others, notably Hegel and Comte, have developed a similar line of thought. Individual thinkers are, like coral-insects, all working piecemeal on a plan, are engaged in elaborating an Idea which is too wide for them to grasp, which indeed is never fully realised except in the Absolute.

Mr. Williams finds this idea in Newman's theory of development. The Catholic Church represents this process more fully and systematically than any existing organisation. From one point of view it is no more than a symbol of the process, owing to the narrowness and exclusiveness of its authorities. But, while its wonderful unity, continuity and power of assimilation mark it as the symbol of this age-long process in humanity, it is far more than a symbol, inasmuch as it contains within itself the actual results of the past and therefore the potentialities of the future. The narrow action of authority may suppress, in the present, the manifestations of this developing principle, but cannot destroy it, for it is really the world-process, the movement of Humanity towards a universal synthesis, of which the main elements are religious and moral, in the only organised, continuous and international society which exists. Other forms of Christianity are stamped with the marks of individualism and parochialism. If, then, Humanity is, in the future, to realise and embody in itself the common Idea, the unity of standpoint towards which history indicates it as working, the actual, living synthesis which has been already achieved must form its germ and rallying-point. Even if we grant the writer this much (and he certainly makes a very strong case for his position), yet it must be pointed out that he seems somewhat to underestimate the strength of the reactionary spirit in the Church, and the debt it owes to outside bodies since the "Reformation." For instance, though he rightly claims Simon as the pioneer of Biblical criticism, there is no such vital connection as he finds between him and other enlightened Catholics down to Loisy. They stand isolated and apart, condemned by the authorities of their Church. He does not seem to realise how utterly the principles of Simon were suppressed, so that, apart from the vigorous stimulus of German Protestantism, there would have been no resurrection. He does recognise this after a fashion, but not adequately. He admits, but grudgingly and by the way, the debt of Loisy to German criticism. He does not explicitly recognise that, even if Catholicism be taken as offering the only consistent and positive basis for a future synthesis, the analytical work of Protestantism is equally necessary to it.

To turn to another point. A short treatise of this kind must doubtless make philosophical and psychological assumptions which it must leave unanalysed. Yet there are some so vital to Mr. Williams's thesis that it is really unfortunate that he could not see his way to enlarge his book by a couple of chapters, so as to give them at least some brief consideration. These are the questions of the real value and meaning of "the religious sense" and the actual significance of dogma. He alludes, indeed, to these questions, as was inevitable, but so briefly and cursorily that he does not even make clear his own position. He apparently accepts dogma in the "symbolic" sense, but, without further explanation, this may mean much or little. The sense in which Newman accepted it was certainly very different, so far as can be gathered, from that of Mr. Williams. Not that Newman's mind was essentially narrow, but, owing to his environment, he never quite freed himself from the constraint of the convert who, taking as his motto—"Credo quia impossibile"—thinks it the most necessary part of humility and what M. Bremond calls his "intellectual asceticism" to bring all his thoughts into subjection to what he conceives to be the "living voice of the Church"—i.e., the narrow and antiquated interpretations of dogma which her authorities attempt to enforce upon the Catholic conscience.

Mr. Williams is a liberal theologian: Cardinal Newman hated liberalism in theology, and that, because, pace Mr. Williams, he distrusted reason. As regards this latter point our author ingeniously defends Newman on the ground that the mechanical reason does constantly go wrong, owing, as Newman contended, to its being supplied with false premisses. But why should Newman have assumed that those of theology were necessarily right? One of the most important functions of reason is to analyse its premisses. This is just what, except with arbitrarily fixed limitations, Newman would not do.

This writer apparently fathers the whole of his broad philosophy upon Newman. But it is in Newman, as in the Catholic Church, more in posse than in esse, more implicit than explicit. Mr. Williams's book, though his ideas are good in themselves and well worked out, is, for this reason, very misleading so far as it claims to give an account of Newman's thought.

No doubt, in his "Development" and in the "Grammar," Newman did what no one but himself could have done, in indicating a broad philosophical basis for the future progress of ideas. But even here, in the "Development," it is strange that our author does not seem to realise the effect of modern historical criticism upon Newman's a priori "tests," as from his own standpoint he certainly might have been expected to do. Not that it has entirely destroyed their value, since, in some shape or other, they must remain as the categories which are contained in the very idea of organic development. But it has so widened their scope and altered their content that, in Newman's sense at least, they are no longer tenable. And, for that reason, they can no longer be used to determine a priori the difference between corruptions and true developments, since, on the contrary, it is they themselves whose meaning is determined by the actual facts of history, and also because, from the organic point of view, the development must be regarded as one whole and not in the abstraction of its details. In short, what we reach finally is the historical determinism of Harnack and of Loisy, the difference of value which they respectively assign to the facts depending upon their ideal and subjective standpoint.

The value of Newman's theory consisted mainly in its ingenious reconciliation of the old view of an absolute revelation with the facts of history, in providing a bridge over the gulf between mediæval and present-day thought. It was an argumentum ad hominem against the hard-and-fast views of Protestant and Catholic theologians of the day. If Mr. Williams had considered it from this point of view, he would have been far nearer the mark than in defending the a priori "tests" against Dr. Fairbairn, or quietly claiming them as truly representing his own philosophy.

In Loisy we have passed the transitional period and have reached an idea of development which is at once historical and scientific. Yet Mr. Williams seems altogether to blur, or, at least, to ignore this distinction.

Another considerable blot on his valuable work is that he is continually ascribing certain opinions or sayings to Newman without quoting his words, or without giving references where he professes to be quoting him.

Quite the opposite of this is the method of M. Bremond, a large proportion of whose book consists of extracts from Newman, with the references given below. Students may disagree with certain details of his interpretation of Newman's mind, but, at least, the method is sound and far more empirical and objective, as a study of Newman, than Mr. Williams's own, though Mr. Williams places the advocacy of empiricism in the very forefront of his work. M. Bremond claims no finality for his interpretations, but acknowledges Newman to be an unsolved mystery. Such, indeed, to a great extent, he is, and it must be said that M. Bremond's effort towards the solution of that mystery is not only most careful and painstaking but affords lively and interesting reading. We understand that his work is shortly to be published in English.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Minor Poets of the Caroline Period. Vol. ii. Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. (Oxford; Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d. net.)

WE are glad to welcome the second volume of Professor Saintsbury's admirable corpus of the "minor" poetry of the Caroline Age, and we note with pleasure that the original scheme of two volumes is to be expanded into three. The present instalment contains Marmion's "Legend of Cupid and Psyche," Kynaston's "Leoline and Sydanis," and his "Cynthiades, or Amorous Sonnets," John Hall's poems, those of Sidney Godolphin and Philip Ayres, Chalkhill's "Thealma and Clearchus," the poems of Patrick Carey and William Hammond, and Bosworth's "Arcadius and Sepha." There are more authors but fewer pages than in the first volume, and the method of editing is, of course, the same. We should like especially to draw attention to the section containing the poems of Sidney Godolphin, now first collected. Many of Godolphin's poems are here printed for the first time from manuscript, and it is a great boon to students of seventeenth-century literature to have them side by side with their almost equally rare, though previously printed, companions, the poems of Kynaston and his peers. Professor Saintsbury's notes are, it need hardly be said, good reading: they are sane and suggestive, and he is, happily, but slightly bitten with the craze for emendation. Of course, he is a heretic in the matter of modernising his spelling: a note on p. 540, on "the extreme futility of preserving original spelling," because one line gives "imbrac't" and the next "embrac't," shows that Professor Saintsbury has not fallen under the spell of inconsistency in spelling, so refreshing in these cast-iron days, although earlier (on p. 272) he uses the happy phrase "liberal in its spelling," which would seem to hint that, in his heart, he is not so much of a heretic after all.

The volume is embellished with several facsimiles of title-pages and illustrations; it and its companion give the student texts not obtainable in any other form; and we will but add that we wish the publishers had devised a format less calculated to make the reader's arms ache.

Sea Songs and Ballads. Selected by CHRISTOPHER STONE, (Frowde, 2s. 6d.)

TO Mr. C. Stone's selection of verse relating to the sea, Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge has supplied an excellent introduction, in which he points out that we should have to go back to a remote period in order to reach the days when British sailors had a set of folk-songs, which they alone cared to listen to or to sing, and regrets the disuse of the "Fore-bitter"—as the folk-song was called, owing to the circumstance that the singer's stage or rostrum was usually the fore-bitts—explaining how it was gradually superseded by Dibdin's songs and airs and more recently by importations from the music-halls. We are not quite sure which among the songs in this collection we are to accept as the typical fore-bitter, but no doubt several are included. Certainly among the variety which Mr. Stone has brought together there are not a few that will please both the seaman and the landsman. As Sir Cyprian Bridge says, the collection is a sort of rapid epitome of our maritime history for some five hundred years:

In it are brought before us the ill-defined distinction between the war and the mercantile fleets of early days; the risks of the peaceful trader from other foes besides the storm and the shoal; the ill-requited labours of the sailor; the perils to which his calling specially exposed him; his conflicts with opponents as gallant as himself; his love of country; his triumphs over its enemies. Besides this, we can learn something about the sailor's private life. The picture is exaggerated, to be sure, but it is not all untrue. We see at least something of the way in which he spent his few hours of leisure afloat and shore. We learn a little about those who were, or professed to be, his friends: and, although in reality he may be caricatured, some of his real qualities are brought to our knowledge.

Nearly all the songs in this selection were written before Trafalgar, and although a very satisfactory reason is given for not following closely the chronological order, we regret that the editor did not add the dates where it was possible. The earliest song of all is taken from a manuscript in the library at Trinity College, Cambridge, and has been printed by the Early English Text Society. Admiral Bridge remarks of several of the phrases that they are still extant, and we may quote two verses:

Bestowe the boote, bote-swayne, anon,
That our pylgryms may play thereon;
For som ar lyke to cowgh and grone,
Or hit be full mydayght.

Hale the bowelyne! now, vere the shete!
Cooke, make redy anon our mete,
Our pylgryms have no lust to ete,
I pray God yeve hem rest.

This song was apparently written by a seaman on board a passenger steamer carrying pilgrims to Compostella. Of a different nature is a later one which Admiral Bridge believes to be founded on a genuine fore-bitter. It has for title "The Praise of Saylor's Here set Forth, with the Hard Fortunes which do befall them on the Seas, when landmen sleep in their beds." The following verse, with little alteration, will be very familiar to many seamen:

When as the raging Seas do fome,
and lofty winds do blow,
The Saylor's they go to the top,
when Landmen stay below.

But we might pick gems from almost every page. The little volume should have a very large circulation and nowhere will be more heartily welcomed than on the mess decks of our warships. We have nothing but praise for the scholarly notes and the attractive form of the volume.

Lithgow's Rare Adventures. (Glasgow: MacLehose, 12s. 6d. net.)

WILLIAM LITHGOW, the eldest son of James Lithgow, Burgess of Lanark, was, according to the publisher's note, born about 1582, according to Sir Walter Scott was "bred a tailor," and according to himself started on his peregrinations "in the stripling age of mine adolescence." His wanderings lasted on and off some nineteen years, during which he visited most parts of Europe and various places in Asia and Africa, his career narrowly escaping summary termination at the hands of the Spanish Inquisition. In "three deare-bought voyages," he says, his "goings, traversings and returnings, through Kingdomes, Continents and Ilands, which my paynefull feet traced over (besides my passages of Seas and Rivers), amounted to thirty-six thousand and odde miles, which draweth neare to twice the circumference of the whole Earth." It is a record of the most varied and often diverting character, written with a spirit and in a style which should ensure a large sale for the reprint before us. In dedicating his work "to the High and Mighty Monarch Charles," Lithgow points out that "the Generall Discourse it selfe, is most fixed upon the Lawes, Religion, Manners, Policies and Government of Kings, Kingdomes, People, Principalities and Powers," and that is the best short description which can be given of this most instructive chronicle. His pictures of Constantinople, Cairo, Jerusalem and Fez are as vivid a presentment of the characteristics of those cities as the most expert of latter-day tourist-journalists could hope to furnish. Dr. Margoliouth possibly might not endorse Lithgow's vigorous denunciation of Mahomet—"deceitfull, variant and fraudulent as may appeare in his Satanicall Fables, expressed in his Alcoran"—and of necessity much that he reported was only hearsay. There was, however, a vast deal more that he saw with his own eyes. Of the reality of his adventures his "martyred anatomy" as exposed to the King after his escape from the tortures of Malaga was sufficiently eloquent proof. The King sent him at his own expense to Bath and he recovered health, "although my left Arme and crushed bones be incurable." Unfortunately, there being no hope of redress from Spain, Lithgow must needs assault Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador, whose promises were lightly broken, and he was sent to the Marshalsea. He afterwards spent some years in Scotland and in 1632 he published the collected edition of his travels, from which the present admirable edition is a reprint. He wrote other books—the last was published in 1645—but what became of him ultimately is apparently unknown.

English Furniture and Furniture Makers of the Eighteenth Century. By R. S. CLOUSTON. (Hurst & Blackett, 10s. 6d. net.)

So many excellent books have been written on this now widely appreciated subject that one would hardly expect much new light on the

Many things divinely done
By Chippendale and Sheraton

and the large number of excellent cabinet-makers, more or less closely connected with these names; but the author feels that there are revolutionary views to be put forward and fresh facts from which new deductions can be obtained. Apart, however, from the pride of original research, which is here somewhat over-estimated, the volume offers to all students of the arts of the eighteenth century home a pleasing magazine of knowledge. To the sociologist the furniture used in any modern period is as important as the clothes worn or the food consumed. For such an inquiry the present volume can be freely recommended, for all sources of information now open have been drawn upon by the author, who pursues with indefatigable skill the history of a curve of a chairback or the nice conduct of a Pergolesi decoration. The delightful work of the period in furniture is reviewed with excellent discretion and acute criticism, the chapters on Robert Adam being especially well worth notice; and the particulars of the lesser men—Ince and Mayhew, Manwaring, Lock, Shearer, and so forth—will no doubt be new to many readers. A few years ago we would have welcomed the illustrations, but the admirable photographs reproduced in half a dozen recent books on the subject have spoilt us for the somewhat worn and familiar blocks now employed.

The Complete Photographer. By R. CHILD BAYLEY. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

WITH an admirable sense of proportion, Mr. Bayley divides his subject into its historical, technical, pictorial and social aspects, and over the wide range of his material he skims with graceful ease. The completeness of his book, however, lies more in the fact that scarcely a single point is left untouched, than that any particular point is exhaustively treated; and in this respect the work, admittedly, does not challenge comparison with cheaper specialised brochures already on the market. Mr. Bayley gives but few formulæ, and in the discussion of processes chats with, rather than instructs, his reader. His chapter on lenses would be scarcely comprehensible to one absolutely fresh to the subject, and in the whole book there seems to be no mention whatever of the anachromatic lens, for which recent pictorial claims have been made and maintained. Similarly, under the heading of colour-photography, the name of Lippmann is introduced and dismissed in three and a half pages, whilst Sir William Abney is allowed more than four in which to dilate upon his particular system of projecting upon a screen three separate colour-images which coincide to make a coloured picture. The only real and true colour-photography that has yet been discovered is that of Lippmann, which gives at one operation a fully-coloured view upon a single plate. The fact that, so far, this perfect colour-photography has not been able to lend itself to commercial ends is no excuse for the author's silence upon its characteristics and the details of its discovery and manipulation. Miss Acland, the Brothers Lumière, and Mr. Sanger Shepherd are all dismissed with the scantiest mention. Much of this misadjustment is obviously due to the author's attitude towards his task. He has feared to make his book dry and stodgy, and has therefore approached it with a light heart and a freedom from anxiety which result merely in four hundred and twenty-six ample pages on how photography, past, present and to come, strikes Mr. Child Bayley. As a delightful picture-book it will find many admirers. All the illustrations—there are over a hundred—are selected from the best pictorial work of the past and particularly of the last few years. We are glad to find Mr. William Crooke's magnificent "Zuleika" among the chosen; it is a beautiful head which recent attempts by other workers have not surpassed. Of many good pictures it would be invidious to mention a few; but it may safely be said that their praiseworthy selection and adequate printing will give the book a great value, and create a better status for pictorial photographs than is supplied by ephemeral magazines.

Links in My Life on Land and Sea. By Captain G.W. GAMBIER. (Unwin, 15s. net.)

CAPTAIN GAMBIER is a typical naval officer—at one moment outspoken almost to the point of offensiveness, at another diplomatic and reticent; quick-tempered on occasion, but always ready to forgive and sometimes ready to forget—and his memoirs have this merit, that they are always entertaining. To read his book is to imagine oneself in the privacy of Captain Gambier's smoking-room, listening to very pleasant after-dinner gossip. A career full of adventure began in the Baltic fleet during the Crimean War, and subsequently our author journeyed, in different capacities, to Norfolk Island (of his reception in which he gives a delightful account), Rio de Janeiro, Egypt, Cyprus, New Zealand, the Andaman Islands, New Caledonia, China, Japan, and other places, acting after his retirement as Times correspondent in the Russo-Turkish War. There are almost as many good stories in his book as there are epithets. After a characteristic comment on the "monstrous cupidity," the "incompetence," etc., of Hobart Pasha, Captain Gambier proceeds to justify the former charge by an amusing anecdote. Having been invited to visit the Turkish Admiral on his yacht, "knowing what to expect at his table":

I took the precaution [he says] of sending some very good claret on board for our joint messing, which, if I remember right, was to cost me £2 a day. . . . At our midday breakfast Hobart's steward gave me some execrable claret—absolutely poisonous—and I naturally requested him to bring me some of my own.

"Oh," said the man, with a gentle chuckle, "His Excellency the Pasha ordered me to take your three cases up to his house last night, and bring off this."

And Captain Gambier had to drink the poison. "Charlatan" and "windbag" were two of the mildest epithets which follow. On board a steamer in which our author and other war correspondents travelled from Trieste to Constantinople, the story was circulated by an American that an unknown passenger—who proved to be Earl Minto—was a linendraper:

I have often made mistakes like this [says Captain Gambier], notably when once I took the Duke of Somerset—then first Lord of the Admiralty—for the dockyard rat-catcher. The Duke had strolled on board my ship, the Sylvia—then in dock—during the men's dinner-hour, and came up and asked me to say he wished to see the Captain.

"Nonsense!" I said, "you can't see the Captain about your job. Be off!"

He remained quite undisturbed, and said, "Will you kindly inform him that the Duke of Somerset wishes to see him?"

Then Captain Gambier discovered that he was not a rat-catcher. Lack of space prevents our quoting many similar anecdotes to be found in these pages, and we must leave the reader to discover them for himself.

CHRISTMAS AT CAIRO

HERE all goes on as if His Name
 The city scarcely knew,
 Its tide of business flows the same,
 No sign of Him in view.

Yet as I walk the busy street,
 So secular and strange,
 The very stones beneath my feet
 Dissolve away and change;

The buildings and the men around
 Dim and unreal seem,
 And on the breeze there comes a sound
 Of bells, as in a dream.

Familiar faces meet my eye,
 Friends smile to me and speak,
 As through the village they and I
 The old stone portal seek.

And borne upon the Spirit's wing
 I kneel on Christian earth,
 And hear the Christmas Hymn they sing
 In church at Kenilworth.

W. H. D.

A WHITE NIGHT

SOFT as palest petals of cherry-blossom
 Slowly drifted earthward by Maytime breezes,
 Came last night our Lady of Snow's handmaidens,
 Bidden to greet me.

Fancies fair and frail as themselves they brought me,
 Tender thoughts too shy for the Day's possessing;
 Hopes more sweet and strange than a dreamland vision
 Came with their coming.

ANGELA GORDON.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

XIII. SYMBOLISM

It is curious how little the common mind realises that it thinks (and must think) through pictures, and that it uses symbols—which are only “figures of the true”—in almost every sentence it makes use of, or constructs. But so it is. All educated persons know that language is an imperfect medium for the expression of thought, or the conveyance of ideas from one mind to another; and that, in consequence, all human speech is a mosaic inlaid with metaphor. We describe our mental states in terms of the physical world, and we invariably characterise that world in terms fetched from our own consciousness. We speak of hard times, of a bright idea, of a sweet tune, an acute remark, a clear proof, a keen thinker, and so on; where all our adjectives describing what is mental are drawn from the material world. When we say of a human soul that it is candid, or sincere, we use terms the former of which takes us back to the custom of presenting applicants for office in white robes, and the latter to the possession of pure honey without wax. Conversely, when we say the sea roars, the wind whispers, the lake sleeps, etc., we describe the outward world in terms of the inner. All that is obvious enough: but it is not so easily seen that in no case can we find any descriptive term that is an exact mirror of the thing we wish to characterise. All our words are imperfect; and, therefore, all our definitions—however nearly they approach to accuracy—are of necessity incomplete.

It is one of the aims of philosophy to enable us to escape from the fetters of symbolic thought and allegoric speech; to break for us the shells of metaphor that we may get at the kernel of truth; but at the same time to use our symbols and metaphors wisely, for we cannot dispense with them. And this almost universal habit of describing the two realms of mind and matter, each in terms of the other, may perhaps be taken as an indirect proof that they are kindred at the core; and that a monism, of which we are not usually conscious, underlies their dualism. Of that unity we are at times aware (although it reaches us as an apocalypse), else we would not make use of the terms which suggest it. When we realise the harmony of opposites which exists within us and around, our recognition of the abiding unity is real, although it comes and goes; and it is perhaps our inability to comprehend it continuously as a whole that leads us to adopt a dualistic mode of speech, so subtle as well as evanescent is the sense of unity.

But is it not the case that we all have—or may have—apocalyptic visions of what transcends the common consciousness, and momentary glimpses of what it is impossible to express in words? We become transcendentalists, and then know what it is to be face to face with the innermost reality of things, beneath all show and semblance. At such times the poet and the musician speak to us, while the philosopher is silent. The latter knows that the visions which his friends behold will pass, that the curtain will fall, and silence supervene; but he acquiesces gladly, for he has learned the advantage to all mankind, of seeing through a glass darkly, of using symbols, of speaking in parables, and rejoicing in them as “figures of the true.” Is it not so, as a matter of experience? We all have times of clear vision, followed by a misty outlook. Our perceptions of reality are succeeded by times in which neither sun, nor moon, nor stars are visible. We realise, we know, that we are “one with the Infinite,” and soon afterwards we seem to ourselves a mere bundle of contradictions and commonplaces; and the entire race to which we belong a collection of atoms. Such is the rise and the fall of the tide within us, the comings and the goings of experience!

But they may perhaps be explained by the action and reaction of the two realms already referred to—that of mind, and of matter—and, in consequence, the necessary use of symbolic thought, of metaphoric speech, and parabolic utterance. Without adopting Goethe's way of putting it,

Name is but sound and smoke
 Shrouding the glow of Heaven, may not every one of us make the freest possible use of allegoric terms, realising that they are all symbolic, and try to overcome the defects of each by the subsequent use of others? Even the loftiest of them is sure to mislead, if we confine ourselves to it alone. For example, we speak of the Infinite Being as King, Judge, and Father; but, if we do not drop the metaphor from the mind after using it, or in the very act of using it, we narrow the fulness of that which, in its limitation, it is intended partially to disclose.

It is a noteworthy fact—but one not always remembered—that the greatest truths that have moved the world, and been epoch-making in consequence, have always reached it clothed in metaphor, draped with symbolism; that they have been presented to mankind, and been by mankind adopted, not only associated with—but through the very medium of—pictures which reflected the zeitgeist, that is to say the transient notions, or passing spirit of their age. All esoteric truth has come into the world of necessity wrapped up in an exoteric; and this not for the sake of the many, the illiterate, "hewers of wood and drawers of water," the "dim common populations," but for the sake of the most highly educated and the farthest-seeing as well. The vision of the latter would soon fade, if they had always to walk by the light of "pure reason" along the avenues of demonstration. No sage or prophet has ever been able to dispense with metaphor, and the wisest of them have been thankful for parables. Although they all see through them and beyond them, they—as well as the many of mankind—are safeguarded by means of them.

Allegory is not history, and there is of necessity much of the former in all revelation from whatsoever source it comes. But only think of a Revelation as to the Infinite entering the world like the propositions of Euclid! What could the world make of it? How could a set of algebraic formulæ ever lay hold of the heart of man?

A question may be put in closing, viz., what is the abiding value of Symbolism in Art? And why is it higher and deeper than realistic or photographic Art can ever be? It is surely not because of what it discloses, but of what it suggests. The landscape art of Turner, of Alfred Hunt, and of some on whom their mantle has fallen, the symbolic figure-painting of François Millet, and George Frederick Watts, have the supremacy—the higher vision, and the wider range—because of what they hint at, and do not attempt to explore. Like consummate stylists, and the great teacher-poets, they move us most by what they leave unexpressed, by taking us to the entrance-door of "the house called beautiful," and leaving us there to enter in ourselves, alone.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE POETRY OF CHRISTMAS

APART from the numerous carols which are associated with the Christmas festival, and which sprang directly from its liturgical and dramatic celebrations, poetry in this country has hardly done justice to Christmas. Indeed it is in the carols that we must look for an expression of some of the associations of Christmas—the mirthful joy, the overflowing of kindness, the contrast of indoors and out-of-doors, the cheerful fire, the hospitable board, the kindly greetings, and without, the wind howling in the pines, the driving snow, the voices of the storm. Our poets have dwelt principally on the devotional and doctrinal aspects of the festival, while not omitting its mirth and jollity. Of the former, none has ever surpassed Milton's "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity," with the full-blast of its magnificent organ music, its exquisite cadences, its almost daring application of pagan ideas to the Christ. What a power of imaginative skill is in the verses telling of the defeated gods, followed by the last stanza with its suggestion of peace and quietude:

But see the Virgin blest
Hath laid her Babe to rest.

Exquisite, too, is the stanza in which allusion is made to the voice heard crying "Great Pan is dead," when Christ was born. Earlier than Milton, Giles Fletcher had told how "the cursed oracles were stricken dumb" in that section of his poem on "Christ's Victory and Triumph" which deals with the Nativity. His verses are nobly conceived, and have a majestic opening:

Who can forget, never to be forgot,
The time that all the world in slumber lies,
When, like the stars, the singing angels shot
To earth, and heaven awaked all his eyes
To see another sun at midnight rise?

Earlier than either, Southwell wrote a poem, "The Burning Babe," which Ben Jonson wished he had written. The poet has a vision on a hoary winter's night as he stands shivering in the snow, of "a pretty Babe, all burning bright." Love is the fire with which He burns, yet, he complains, "none approach to warm their hearts" at His fire. The poem expresses the doctrine of Christmas in a series of quaint conceits, with which also, a century later, George Herbert filled his sonnet on Christmas. The poet rides up to an inn tired of the search for pleasures:

Then when I came, whom found I but my deare,
My dearest Lord, expecting till the grief
Of pleasures brought me to Him, readie there
To be all passengers' most sweet relief.

And he prays that as Christ was born among the beasts of the stall, "To man, of all beasts, be not Thou a stranger." The pendant verses to the sonnet, "The shepherds sing; and shall I silent be?" are equally quaint and form a fair specimen of the attractive high church pietism of the seventeenth century.

Herrick returns over and over again to the subject of the Nativity, but not always with the same feeling of dignity. His "Christmas Carol, sung to the King in the Presence at Whitehall" is indeed worthy of the subject and the occasion. Christ's coming has turned December to May, and "all things here seem like the spring-time of the year." The musical part was composed by Mr. Henry Lawes, a note to the poem tells us, and as we read the poem we seem to catch a strain of that Christmas music in the Presence at Whitehall before the Royal Martyr had left it to return no more till the day of his doom. In another poem Herrick describes our Lord as "a pretty Baby," but it has this dainty verse:

Instead of real enclosures
Of interwoven osiers,
Instead of fragrant posies
Of daffodils and roses,
Thy cradle Kingly Stranger
As gospel tells
Was nothing else
But here a homely manger.

But quaintest of all are his lines bidding a child carry a flower to the Saviour, and stick it there

Upon His bib or stomacher.

Religion, if it caused blood to flow in that bygone century, was naïve and innocent in its conceptions. It had hardly escaped from what seems to us the bathos and blasphemy of the Middle Ages, but what was really an attempt to make the ideas of Christianity consort with every phase of life.

Coming to more recent times one is surprised at the poets who had no eye for the suggestive beauty of the festival. Dryden, Marvell, Pope, and a host of lesser lights are silent; Thomson and Cowper have plenty to say of the miseries and joys of winter, but seem to have forgotten that Christmas was a winter festival, though the latter translated some very classical and conventional lines on the subject by Madame Guyon. One cannot remember that Wordsworth, even in his Ecclesiastical Sonnets, makes any reference to the festival. Byron and Moore seem indifferent to it; Keats was too much of a Greek, Shelley too anti-Christian, to trouble about it. Coleridge, however, wrote a Christmas carol, in which the Virgin is made to rejoice at the coming of peace. Should she not rather rejoice at "sweet music's loudest note, the poet's story," at glory and fame, at the youthful king War hailed as he is by "Earth's majestic monarchs?"

Tell this in some more courtly scene,
To maids and youths in robes of state!
I am a woman poor and mean,
And therefore is my soul elate.
War is a ruffian, all with guilt defiled,
That from the aged father tears his child.

She is "the mother of the Prince of peace":

Joy rises in me, like a summer's morn,
Peace, peace on Earth! the Prince of Peace is born.

The poem, if unworthy of Coleridge as a poet, is worthy of him as a transcendental philosopher. Christmas finds Southey a traveller in the mountains of Italy. And it reminds him "how many hearts are happy at this hour in England," of the cheerful fire, the gathering of the members of the family round the festive board. He recalls his childish joy in the festival long ago:

As o'er the house, all gay with evergreens,
From friend to friend with joyful speed I ran,
Bidding a merry Christmas to them all.

Fond memory recalls these things and it brings thoughts of the absent, of those who remember me, and fill

The glass of votive friendship.

In spite of the subject, the poem seems forced and written to order. There is no real feeling of Christmas in it, such as a carol can produce with much less striving. But Tennyson's exquisite art enabled him to pen some marvellous Christmas verses in In Memoriam:

The time draws nigh the birth of Christ:
The moon is hid, the night is still;
The Christmas bells from hill to hill
Answer each other in the mist.

Memory, too, is active with him: the bells "controlled me when a boy"; but "they bring me sorrow touched with joy." The welcome guest who enriched "the threshold of the night" is gone for ever. It seems a mockery to dress church and hall with holly, yet let it be done for use and wont. And then we hear of the sadness in the Christmas rejoicings, the "awful sense of one mute Shadow watching all." The lines voice, alas, too often, the feelings of older folk during the merriment of the children's Christmas. They see the Shadows which, let us be thankful, the children do not see.

Browning's "Christmas Eve" is a splendid discussion on the philosophy of Christianity which it is good to read as the festival comes round, if not for its lofty teaching at least for its vision of the Christ and its pictures of His worshippers, Protestant, Catholic, and rationalist. Philosophic in its own way also is Longfellow's "Christmas Bells." He hears them in war-time when the cannons drown the message of peace and goodwill, and he despairs of peace. But

Then pealed the bells more loud and deep:
God is not dead; nor doth he sleep!
The Wrong shall fail,
The Right prevail,
With peace on earth, goodwill to men.

The same optimism mingled with strongly ethical lessons, characterises Lowell's "Christmas Carol" and Whittier's "Christmas Carmen," the latter with its refrain:

The dark night is ending and dawn has begun;
Rise, hope of the ages, arise like the sun,
All speech flow to music, all hearts beat as one.

These trans-Atlantic poems remind one of Charles Kingsley's musical "Carol."

With our own Miss Rossetti, we return to the mystic quaintness of the seventeenth-century versifiers:

Angels and archangels may have gathered there,
Cherubim and seraphim thronged the air,
But only his mother, in her maiden bliss,
Worshipped the beloved with a kiss.

The editors of "The English Hymnal" which has frightened the bishops, have wisely included this delightful carol in their collection. Here, too, is a noble verse from her other series of carols:

Whoso hears a chiming for Christmas at the nighest
Hears a sound like Angels chanting in their glee,
Hears a sound like palm boughs waving in the highest,
Hears a sound like ripple of a crystal sea.

With that exquisite music we might fitly leave the poets' Christmas choir, but we must not forget the other aspect of the festival—its jollity and glee. We find in George Wither's Christmas verses beginning:

So now is come our joyfulest part;
Let every man be jolly,

and ending:

Then, wherefore, in these merry days,
Should we, I pray, be duller?
No, let us sing some roundelays
To make our mirth the fuller:
And, while we thus inspired sing,
Let all the streets with echoes ring:
Woods, and hills, and everything,
Bear witness we are merry!

Wither had a merry heart in spite of his Puritanism. Nor indeed did Herrick write only quaint spiritual conceits on Christmas, for he has some mince-meat and plum-pudding verses appropriate to the occasion;

Come, bring with a noise
My merry, merry boys,
The Christmas log to the firing,
While my good dame, she
Bids ye all be free,
And drink to your heart's desiring.

These are the verses of men who took actual part in the prolonged wassail of Yule. But Scott's magic minstrelsy, in a land where among the bulk of the people the very name of Christmas had well-nigh been forgotten, revived for us the old times, the old scenes, in his famous verses in "Marmion."

Heap on more wood!—the wind is chill;
But let it whistle as it will,
We'll keep our Christmas merry still.

We hear of the religious pageantry, of ceremony doffing his pride, the union of gentle and simple, the glowing logs, the boar's head, wassail, pies and pudding, the carols, the masquerade:

'Twas Christmas broach'd the mightiest ale;
'Twas Christmas told the merriest tale.

The old miracle-plays dramatised the Christmas story, and Longfellow attempted something of the same kind in his "Golden Legend." Is it possible to revive a Christmas mystery, combining, perhaps, the spiritual and material aspects of the Festival? Here is a chance for our modern poets! Which of them will lead the way?

J. A. MACCULLOCH.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Lotus-Eaters," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

Abbots Verney. By R. MACAULAY. (Murray, 6s.)

R. MACAULAY has written an interesting book. Her work is sound and careful, and illumined by occasional flashes of insight. Its chief defect is an inclination to diffuseness, and her characters at times become dim and even lost in the fog of detail and explanation: its chief quality is absolute sincerity. The story is simple and reasonable, relying for interest, as such a story should, upon the play of circumstance on character. The three generations of Ruths are realised and expressed with admirable distinctness. The misery of Verney Ruth when he becomes involved in the disgrace of his father and is disinherited by his grandfather, is finely described, and his pride, his sensitive reserve, his pluck are brought out with great skill; though we are unable to sympathise (as we seem expected to) with his resentment against Rosamond for not giving him all, when by her strength and kindness she had already given him much. We read the book with the interest that real sincerity almost always commands. The author's prose is usually good: occasionally it is distressingly harsh, as when she writes of "phlegmatic practicality," but, happily, such phrases are rare, and we recommend the book without hesitation.

The Flock. By MARY AUSTIN. (Constable, 6s. net.)

It may come as a surprise to many tolerably well-informed people that a book all about sheep and shepherds in California can offer such delightful reading as is to be found in "The Flock." The author knows her subject thoroughly, she understands the trials and fascinations of life on "The Long Trail," and she has friends among the shepherds and the art of eliciting confidences. They tell her of strange experiences on the track, curious anecdotes of men, wonderful stories of their dogs, and—more diffidently—they relate the story of their own perils and achievements. There is hardly a page without its incident, information, or picturesque description; to turn a leaf too hastily is to miss some interesting fact or vivid picture. Mrs. Austin writes with distinction, and "The Flock," embellished with numerous marginal illustrations, should find a place among the popular gift-books of the season.

The House of the Luck. By MARY J. H. SKRINE. (Smith, Elder, 6s. net.)

THE "Luck" of the house of Darley died in the seventeenth century, but his spirit visits a latter-day heir to the estates and whispers brave and bracing counsels to him in the watches of the night. The author tells a tender and graceful story of Tony, the invalid lad, who is the hope of his house. He discovers for himself the needs and wrongs of the "peasant-people," and why they look to him to restore the old rule of justice and kindness. There is nothing goody-goody about Tony, he is artless and engaging, and quaintly wise as childhood often is. His story is interesting and touching, yet not overclouded with sentiment, and there is the saving salt of humour in Tony's experiences among the villagers and old servants. It is a charming book, both for young people and grown-up readers, but the grown-ups will like it best.

The Realist. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. (Sisleys.)

THE five short stories which comprise this little volume are all strongly told and powerful, with just that admixture of thought which makes it necessary to take Mr. Thurston's work seriously. In these stories he begins by expounding the idea and then proceeds to the tale in hand. But the tale does not fit nicely: it seems to lose its proper effect, and sink to the insignificant place of an illustration to a text, and not always, we must add, an apt one. "The Low Comedian" is the last, and it is also the best—chiefly because the story is allowed to stand on its merits, to suggest rather than to express thought.

Rosemary in Search of a Father. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)

A CHILD is the chief character in this story, but it is not a book for children unless they are unusually precocious. The five-year old Rosemary at Monte Carlo, seeing that her mother is sad, sets out to find a lost father, and meets with such extraordinary good luck that we can only suspect the intervention of Christmas fairies. They send Rosemary a wonderful father, far more attractive than the real one, and just the man her mother most desired to meet again. So with the help of an old-love affair, an American millionaire, a pretty French adventuress, a profusion of jewels, and costly raiment such as might haunt the delirious dreams of a milliner's girl, the tale runs on to a happy conclusion. It is a brisk, highly coloured story, of the lightest possible construction even for these authors who know how to make the most of trifles, and it has its gay moments and its touches of pathos, and may be read with some pleasure, and more amusement.

After the Fault. By ROBERT H. SHERARD. (Sisley, 6s.)

WE are wholly out of sympathy with the accepted premiss of the story, from which all the tragedy springs. The point of view from which a wife is regarded as an attractive species of property is both vulgar and commonplace; and so far are we from feeling the sorrow which we are expected to feel for a hero whose wife has, as he would say, betrayed him, that we become hardened and glad that he should have suffered almost as much as he deserved. The man is held up for admiration, but the pride which prevents him from allowing his wife the pleasure of sharing her good fortune with him, is as ignoble and selfish as the love which causes him to ape intolerably the air of an injured saint. Mr. Sherard writes with much clever fluency, but his book is stuffed with false sentiment and a kind of respectable anger towards life.

A Serpent in his Way. By SUZANNE SOMERS. (Long, 6s.)

IRELAND has always been a land of romance, and, judging from "A Serpent in his Way," her days of wild deeds are not yet over. The plot is that of the Babes in the Wood in a modern setting, complicated by the interpolation of Cinderella's Wicked Sisters and a Knight Errant. The twentieth-century atmosphere necessitates a coroner's inquest and other touches not to be found in the original legend, but the story is practically the same. The Wicked Uncle, after fruitless attempts to destroy the hapless Babes, who, supported by their doughty Knight Errant, invariably rise and confront him with his villainy, at last acknowledges himself beaten and betakes himself with his unprepossessing family to a third-rate French pension and the whisky-bottle. The female Babe, in accordance with the dictates of romance, marries the Knight Errant and they "all live happily ever after."

The Baxter Family. By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW. (White, 6s.)

THE moral of this story seems to be that good intentions often have evil ends. John Grant, the innocent cause of Harry Baxter's death, tries to make up to the dead man's family in some degree by improving their worldly circumstances. But the more he does for them the more he harms them; he sees it himself at last, and goes away, not without hurt to his own peace of mind. But between his appearance and the moment when he leaves them for good, many things have happened, and the authors have made the most of many opportunities for character-drawing. Lydia and Agatha are finely imagined girls, well drawn and interesting. The men are less convincing, but old Mrs. Baxter is delightful. Although the action takes place in England, the strange fascination of "The Shulamite" and "Anna of the Plains" is not wanting, proving how little local colour, how much the author's personality, has to do with success.

FINE ART

RECRUITS FOR THE PICTURE-MARKET

NOTWITHSTANDING the rumours current as to the depressed condition of the modern picture-market, there are no signs of either artists or dealers losing heart. On the contrary, within the last week a new society of portrait-painters—which is to hold its first exhibition at the Royal Institute early next year—has been founded, and two new galleries have been opened, both within a few yards of Trafalgar Square.

Of these two newcomers, one is practically an extension of a familiar gallery, Messrs. William Marchant and Co. having acquired an additional suite of rooms over their well-known Goupil Gallery. To the house-warming of the Goupil Gallery Salon nearly a hundred exhibitors were invited, with the result that close on two hundred exhibits adorn the walls of the new premises. In some respects—certainly in that of mere dimensions—the full-length portrait of Mlle. Salomé by M. J. E. Blanche is the most important exhibit, but despite his technical dexterity this artist repeatedly fails to give his painting a pleasing surface quality, and in seeking to catch the gleam of a silk dress, he endows his whole canvas with the shininess of an oil-cloth. Far more satisfying to those who value repose and reticence in painting is M. Le Sidaner's Maisons à Bruges, a poetic harmony of lovely colour in which nothing is assertively stated and all things are dreamily suggested. It is true of Le Sidaner's paintings, as Mr. Symons has well said of Whistler's, that "when you come near them they seem to efface themselves, as if they would not have you even see them too closely," for like the "Master" Le Sidaner has the supreme art of concealing the means by which his effects are obtained. But at the proper distance his mysterious houses materialise as if by magic from the seeming chaos of paint-streaks which alone await our too curious investigation. Mr. Ludovici's London park-scenes are as pleasantly reminiscent of Whistler as Mr. Alexander Jamieson's Parisian crowds are of Manet's Jardin des Tuileries, but though neither of these graceful painters can be dismissed as a mere imitator, his art is too derivative to give a clear revelation of his own personality. M. Le Sidaner, too, has learnt much from Whistler and the Impressionists, but he has made use of the knowledge thus derived to make his own deductions from Nature. At present Messrs. Ludovici and Jamieson have not gone further than restating, very pleasantly it is true, conclusions at which their predecessors had arrived.

A pastel portrait of a lady's head by M. Aman-Jean, and a landscape and a marine by M. Cottet encourage the hope that with a larger space at his disposal Mr. Marchant will show us later representative collections of the work of these two distinguished French artists, who are little known on this side of the channel. In The Old Farm, a veritable hymn in colour to Apollo, Mr. Clausen again demonstrates that the vividness of hot sunshine can be expressed without aridness of paint, and that for treating brilliant light with tenderness and truth he has no living rival save the veteran Monet. In addition to characteristic examples of many capable painters with whose work frequenters of the Goupil Gallery are well acquainted, the collection includes some new recruits, prominent among whom is Mr. Orpen. His little water-colour of a girl sitting by a window is equally notable for the lovely contour of the figure, the well-balanced design of the whole, and the full colour obtained without losing lustre or quality. A little collection of black-and-white work is full of good things, summary impressions of Spain by Mr. Pennell, happily observed and deftly recorded views of Jumieges and Caudebec by Mr. Hanslip Fletcher, and rich, romantic charcoal landscapes by Messrs. Frank Mura and Paul Henry, the last also showing a portrait study which, taken with his poetic landscapes, warrants high hopes for his future.

Black-and-white work is also well to the fore in the first exhibition of the International Art Gallery (14 King William Street), where there are some remarkably vigorous lithographs of rustic subjects by H. Becker, as well as characteristic examples of the better known lithographer M. Belleruche, and two beautiful studies of a Head and Drapery by the sanest and strongest of our neo-classicists, Albert Moore, and more sugary drawings of feminine face and figure by M. Lucien Monod. Among the oils in this gallery is a masterly Roses and two other flower-pieces by Fantin, a Chardinesque Still Life by the little-known Zakarion, and examples of Mauve, J. Maris, de Bock, and others of the Modern Dutch School. Messrs. Coutts Michie, Moffat Lindner, W. Llewellyn, Harold Speed and Buxton Knight are well represented, but it must be confessed that the British contributors do not show to any great advantage. The chief interest of the exhibition is the opportunity it affords of becoming acquainted with several young Dutch and French painters comparatively unknown in this country. Among these none makes a braver bid for distinction than M. Jeanès, whose The Wave and Sunrise at Venice have the vigour and life of big effects economically expressed. Their greatest blemish is that they are done in a wrong medium, water-colour being used on a rough paper to resemble pastel. The style of the painter suggests that oils will eventually be his chosen medium, but if he would control his strength, diminish his dimensions, and preserve the purity of his washes, he should produce some astounding water-colours.

MUSIC

SULLIVAN AND POPULAR MUSIC

THE revival of the Savoy Opera recalls us to old tunes and old jokes, which come back enriched, not only with the memories of the days when the productions were the personal work of composer, librettist and manager, two of whom are no longer with us, but for most of us with some personal association. In the case of The Yeomen of the Guard the songs, both words and music, are its strongest part, that for which it is most loved. Its tragic ending robs us of the laugh with which the curtain was wont to fall on these operas, and in the course of the play the dialogue is less sparkling than in The Mikado, for instance; but the songs have become the personal property of each of us, and as we listen to them again in their own surroundings, they bring to mind numberless occasions when they formed the most successful feature of a village concert or a Christmas party, or best of all, to some of us they recall snug evenings in So-and-so's rooms, when we were light-hearted undergraduates and sang through several Sullivan operas at a single sitting. How many people have cultivated their sense of humour, and perhaps even acquired a reputation for wit among their friends, solely on the fun of Mr. W. S. Gilbert it is impossible to say, but they are certainly numerous. One would like to know, too, how many people have awakened to a love for music chiefly through the light opera of Sir Arthur Sullivan. Young men and women, especially the former, used to go home and try to sing the songs as they heard them at the Savoy, and then were led on to try the concerted pieces together, and found them hard to do, but still worth the work they cost. The famous "Madrigal" in The Mikado has been the practising ground of many a successful vocal quartet party, who would never have tried to sing together, but would have contented themselves with a wearisome succession of drawing-room ballads, had they not found this genial and charming bit of vocal writing ready made for them.

It is scarcely possible to over-estimate the practical value of these works in cultivating the popular musical taste in England. Their secret is that they are not made of music which plays down to the popular taste (which always means playing rather below it), but that their music emanates from the best qualities of that taste; the natural love for free moving and simple melodies, emphatic rhythms and plain harmonies which need little thinking, all decorated with bright and piquant effects of orchestral colouring, which, however, are not essential to the charm of the music—these are the qualities which make their appeal to people uneducated in music, and the presence of one of them in a work otherwise crude and vulgar enough is sufficient to ensure its acceptance. Sullivan partook of all these primitive instincts of musical expression in much the same way as does the uneducated public, with the additional possession of a strong creative faculty; while the fact that he early mistook himself, and was mistaken for a composer in the "grand manner," won him a thorough musical education, which gave him the power to express these simple ideas of melody and rhythm in artistic terms. He could not, of course, escape from some of the disadvantages attendant upon such a position; the tendency to be misled as the public is misled, and to perpetrate things crude and vulgar would occur when, for instance, a poem of commonplace or weak-minded sentiment came in his way. Every one will remember instances among his songs where his gifts are used to very inferior ends, and the piano-organ and street hawker still loudly proclaim their fatal popularity. In writing for the Savoy, however, he had no such temptation; his association with Mr. W. S. Gilbert saved him from ever descending to find the musical counterpart to clap-trap words. Instead, he had to express real humour, or else things graceful and charming, with sometimes, as in the case of The Ycomen of the Guard, simple and genuine pathos. To such situations Sullivan was quite equal, by virtue of the popular instinct which was his naturally and the artistic musicianship he had attained, and the result was that his works gained a wider influence than those of any English composer of the nineteenth century.

He is a happy man who discovers the work to which he is exactly suited and does it. At the present day, when we hear so much of the need for encouraging British composers, one is inclined to wonder whether the reason that much effort seems to run to waste is not really to be found in the fact that a good deal of the musical output is misdirected energy. There are surely among our older composers some who have been working all their lives honestly in the cause of what they conceive to be serious art, who might have done more direct and living work could they have realised that it is not the fact of writing in the noble forms of symphony, concerto or extended chamber music which primarily helps this cause, but that the steps must be gradual, that the small forms of music must reach people first: the song, the vocal trio and quartet, the dance tune, and that the first need is to supply artistic and genuine music in these simple shapes if the art is really to be brought into touch with everyday human wants. Among young artists the love for large canvases is proverbial, and young composers, whose ranks are even stronger than those of the elder generation, must needs hasten to write for huge orchestras and choruses; but we want songs we can sing, pieces we can play; something to supplant the miserable travesties of music found in the songs of musical comedy, or the morbid sentiment of the drawing-room ballad. For this purpose the off-shoots of a composer who is superior to these things are useless. The occasional song or little piece for piano which he deigns to publish in the interval between his symphony and his oratorio is likely to miss the mark altogether. For such work men are wanted who can be content to write tune after tune of the most elementary kind, who are moved by the most simple emotion, and yet who cannot leave their work without giving it the utmost artistic finish that its limits allow. Of home music there has been practically none since the production of the operas of Gilbert and Sullivan furnished it thus indirectly. It would be possible to name several among English composers now living who have shown that they could give this if they thought it worth while. That it should be little considered is indeed extraordinary, since it is only from audiences trained by active and personal effort in practical music that the advanced forms of the art can receive healthy appreciation.

H. C. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

A FRENCH CRITIC ON HOMER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I did not mean to attribute to M. Bréal the opinion that the striking scenes enumerated on p. 126 do not belong to the original redaction. I took his list of five scenes, and wished to say that it is remarkable that there should be a school of critics ascribing them to late hands. However, I suppose I did not express myself with sufficient clearness, and I admit that Mr. Lang's reading of my words was quite justified. Yet does not the second paragraph of my review imply that the ransom-scene at least is due to the original poet in the opinion of M. Bréal? The word "detected" in the passage quoted should have been "enumerated." Certainly M. Bréal does not regard these exquisite passages as late additions to the Iliad. That is a theory held by critics whom he condemns.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

ἐριθυλὸν ὀκρυβέρος

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Johnson does not understand the rule promulgated by Munro (not Monree). It is that a dactyl in the fourth foot of a Greek hexameter must not have a caesura after the first short syllable of the dactyl. Now in ἐριθυλὸν there is no caesura at all and therefore no violation of the rule, the whole dactyl of fourth foot being contained in one word.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

CHAUCER AND YWAINE AND GAWIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Among the literary models that influenced the art of Chaucer a place should probably be assigned to Ywaine and Gawin (Y&G), a metrical romance in a northern dialect. This poem is of very considerable merit, greatly surpassing the average of English poetry from 1300 to 1350; and nothing could have been more natural than for the young Chaucer to study it carefully if he ever saw it. Evidence that he actually did so is found partly in parallels like the following: Y&G 421-2:

And then he bar me sone bi strenkith
Out of my sadel my speres lenkith;

to be compared with The Knight's Tale (A 2645-6):

And kyng Emetreus, for al his strengthe,
Is borne out of his sadel a swerdes lengthe;

and this, where each member of the parallel precedes the account of a duel: Y&G 633-4:

To speke of lufe na time was thar
For aither hated uthur ful sar;

and Knight's Tale (A 1649):

There nas no "Good day," ne no saluyng,

But such parallels—I do not give them all—are far less interesting than an alliterative description of a combat (Y & G 3531-59) which seems to have suggested to Chaucer the idea of alliteration in his two most celebrated fighting scenes (A 2603-2616 and Legend of Good Women 635-648). I know of no other place than these three in Middle English poetry where alliteration is conspicuously added to the regular rime to give vigour to a description of contest, and I cannot resist the conclusion that Chaucer imitated the northern poem. That the great poet, Chaucer, imitated the minor poet is probable from the rude vigour of the latter, who, had he been the imitator, would probably have been more graceful, less vigorous and also addicted to Midland, and even Southern forms. And I observe that Professor Schofield refers the Ywaine and Gawin to the first half of the fourteenth century as against the Oxford Dictionary which assigns circa 1400 as the date of it. If Professor Schofield is correct my hypothesis becomes wholly tenable.

But once we admit that Chaucer intimately knew and was considerably influenced by Ywaine and Gawin, I find it difficult not to suggest an important inference concerning the English version of the Romaunt of the Rose.

The presence in all parts of this poem of southern forms renders it likely that it is not the work of a northern poet, but rather of one from further south, purposely writing, perhaps, in an eclectic dialect. Such southern forms are the following: Periphrastic do and did, vv. 3162, 4917, 5025, 5156, 7185; present plural indicative in -th, 1540, 2790, 5681, 5810, 6548; prefix y- to the past participle, 1419, 1510, 1610, 5505; noun plurals in -en: honden 6665; lambren 7013; and numerous Kenticisms in all parts of the poem.

That the northern forms of the Romaunt (RR) were partly prompted by intimacy with Ywaine and Gawin (Y&G) is at least suggested by the following parallels; where ringing words or phrases are separated by a colon (:): RR 1853-4 thar: mar (MSS. thore: more) and Y&G 235-6 thare: mare; RR 2215-6 mar: ar, and Y&G 3945-6 mar: ar; RR 2263-4 wel sittand: hand, and Y&G 637-8 hand: wel sittand; RR 5457-8 bare (adj): ware (were) and Y&G 3161-2 war

(were): bare (adj); RR 4593-4 wille: hvm tille, and Y&G 2309-10 him till; wyll; and others. To the same influence may be referred, though in a less degree, the assonant and other imperfect rimes of the Romaunt.

The following show that neither northern forms nor imperfect rimes are confined to the so-called B-fragment of the Romaunt, but occur also in the A- and C-fragments: northern forms: 38 hatte (be called); 102 buskes; 506 ware (were) riming on care; 716 their (Glasgow MS.); 6565 ther (Glasgow MS.); their (Thynne's edition): Rimes: 103-4 lefeis: slevis; 1601-2 perilous: Narcissus; 6469-70 force: croce. The case of those who maintain that the Romaunt is the work of two or three different authors is not therefore so strong as it has been represented.

Freely admitting that evidences like the above are inconclusive, I nevertheless hold that, added to the arguments of Professor Lounsbury, they make it probable that the English Romaunt of the Rose was the work of a single author and that that author was Chaucer. The points that differentiate it from Chaucer's later work would then be due to the fact that Chaucer made the translation very early—in 1360 or even earlier; and those which differentiate the different portions of the translation—and this, we have seen, they do not do in any absolute way—to the restless experiments of a youth hampered by a dearth of English models, and by the necessity of choosing, and to some extent even constructing, his very dialect. Two centuries later Spenser faced the same difficulties, and solved them in a far more artificial way.

HENRY BARRETT HINCKLEY.

Northampton, Massachusetts.

December 5.

CUI BONO?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Let me call attention to another journalistic blunder, of a peculiarly flagrant type, which I venture to think the ACADEMY and its contributors ought to shun. In slap-dash journalism it is only too common; but I was not a little surprised to find it in last week's Nuga, by so practised a writer as Spectator ab extra. "Cui Bono?" does not mean "What is the good of it?" but "Who gains by it?"—literally, "To whom is it for a good?" The phrase is used by Cicero in two or three places as a sort of police inquiry: "Who benefits by this act? Tell us that, and we shall find out who did it."

C.

TRAILING CLOUDS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I regret to observe that your Reviewer is not quite sure of my meaning when questioning his remarks on "Infant Joy." I wished to emphasise what I believed to be obvious: that two days after her child's birth a mother would not be capable of the actions attributed to her; and also that such treatment would mean injury to the child. As for a child smiling not at all after birth except from wind I confess that my knowledge of the psychology of childhood does not permit me to refute the statement; and I doubt whether scientific psychologists would venture an opinion in either direction. But I have heard humbler folk, nurses and mothers, contemplating an infant of somewhat older growth, declare with certainty which smiles were the expression of pleasure and which but facial contortions, the result of physical suffering.

Well, I think that a child might conceivably smile—and not from wind—two days after birth; that the mother might interpret the smiles to express her own happiness; and that Blake, catching the idea, composed his poem in the form of a dialogue. But, alas! for the clearness of poetry, your Reviewer holds a very different view. Of course, the two days may not be an essential part of the poetry: or a day may be taken to mean a year—or an aeon. The poem may be an allegory signifying the creation of the world and the joy of the Creator. It matters little so long as the poem induces a sensation of pleasure to the reader. But these differences of interpretation are a sad comment on the view that poetry is the clearest of all forms of speech—clearest, I take it, to the reader or hearer, since clearness to the artist means very little without the materialised conception.

Your Reviewer would like to know what I mean by scientific definitions. To define is to state the necessary connotation of a term: a definition is a statement of those attributes without which a thing is not referred the particular class to which nothing is admitted unless it possesses them—I abstain from technical language. Examples of this are Mill's definition of money as general purchasing power; the definition of a curve as a line, no part of which is straight. There can hardly be a misconception as to the meaning of these statements: and could all terms be exactly defined we could speak without ambiguity. But this being impossible, our nearest approach to univocal expression is scientific definition: it is hardly possible to string a few sentences together using only words whose meanings are or can be exactly defined.

To describe poetry as the clearest of all forms of speech may be, in some ambiguous use of the superlative of clear, a sufficiently near approach to truth—I know not—but it is certainly misleading. For poetry, if described at all—even if we do not attempt definition—should be brought into some relation with æsthetics, and clearness, in so far as it is clear, is no part of beauty. Nor can clearness, in the usual acceptance of the word, be attributed to poetry as a proprium; for in discussing "Infant Joy" it is not, and hardly can be, denied that the lyric is poetry, and yet no attribute of clearness can be shown to follow from those attributes which constitute it poetry—rather the reverse has, indeed, been demonstrated. Clearness is, in fact, an accident where it is at all an attribute of poetry.

I seem to have discussed de omnibus rebus, but I must needs say something of quibusdam aliis. I have not any views as to the sex of the child in "Infant Joy": my use of the word man was a harmlessly intended employment of synecdoche, founded upon an imperfect recollection of the Scriptures.

H. G. RICHARDSON.

December 13.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Smith, Vincent A. Catalogue of the Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta. Including the Cabinet of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. Vol. i. 10 x 6½. Pp. xviii, 346. Published for the Trustees of the Indian Museum. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 30s. net.

[In three parts (i.—The Early Foreign Dynasties and the Guptas; ii.—Ancient Coins of Indian Types; iii.—Persian, Mediæval, South Indian, and Miscellaneous Coins), issued separately at 15s. net, 6s. net, and 10s. 6d. net respectively.]

Rea, Hope. Titian. 6½ x 4. Pp. 56. Bell, 1s. net. [In the "Miniature Series of Painters."]

CLASSICS.

Herodotus: Histories—Books I. to III. Translated by G. Woodruffe Harris. 7½ x 5. Pp. 225. Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net. [In the "New Classical Library."]

Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology. Edited, with revised text translation, introduction and notes, by J. W. Mackail. 9 x 6. Pp. x, 433. Longmans, 14s. net.

[The volume published under this title in 1890 has been for some years out of print, and in issuing a new edition the opportunity has been taken to revise the text, translation and notes carefully throughout, to rewrite considerable portions of the introduction, and also to make some modifications in the contents of the selection.]

FICTION.

Edge, John H. An Irish Utopia. A Story of a Phase of the Land-Problem. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 296. Dublin: Hodges, Figgis, 3s. 6d.

Porter, Helen. The Second Bloom. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

Wright, R. H. The Outer Darkness. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Greening, 6s.

HISTORY.

Fisher, H. A. L. The History of England from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Henry VIII. (1485-1547). 9 x 6. Pp. 518. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.

[Volume v. of Messrs. Longmans' twelve-volume "Political History of England."]

LITERATURE.

Secombe, Thomas; and Nicoll, W. Robertson. The Bookman Illustrated History of English Literature. 2 vols. Vol. i.—Chaucer to Dryden; Vol. ii.—Pope to Swinburne. 12 x 8½. Pp. 522. Hodder & Stoughton, 15s. net. (See p. 625.)

Macdonald, Frederic W. In a Nook with a Book. 7 x 4½. Pp. 222. Horace Marshall, 2s. 6d. net.

Platt, Hugh E. A Last Ramble in the Classics. 7 x 4½. Pp. 208. Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Escombe, Edith. Phases of Marriage. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 199. Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.

Reich, Emil. An Alphabetical Encyclopædia of Institutions, Persons, Events, etc. of Ancient History and Geography. 7½ x 5. Pp. 224. Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.

[In the "New Classical Library."]

Goff, A.; and Levy, J. H. Politics and Disease. 7½ x 5. Pp. 291. King, 3s. 6d. net.

[Papers on Vivisection, Vaccination, The Lunacy Laws, and so on.]

With Byron in Italy. Edited by Anna Benneson McMahan. With 60 illustrations from photographs. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 327. Unwin, 5s. net.

[A selection of the poems and letters of Byron which relate to his life in Italy.]

Schofield, Alfred T. The Home Life in Order, or Personal and Domestic Hygiene. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 345. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net.

The number of pages in Debrett's Peerage was erroneously given in our last issue as 1346. There are two sections, separately numbered, comprising in all 2400 pages.

POETRY.

Underwood, Wilbur. A Book of Masks. 6½ x 5½. Pp. 46. Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Arnold, W. T. The Roman System of Provincial Administration to the Accession of Constantine the Great. New edition, revised from the author's notes by E. S. Shuckburgh. With a map. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 288. Oxford: Blackwell, 6s. net.

Dumas, Alexandre. The Black Tulip. With an introduction by S. J. Adair Fitz-Gerald. 7 x 4½. Pp. 259. Greening, 1s. 6d. net. [In "The Lotus Library."]

White, Gleeson. English Illustration—"The Sixties": 1855-70. With numerous illustrations by Ford Madox Brown, A. Boyd Houghton, Arthur Hughes, Charles Keene, M. J. Lawless, Lord Leighton, Sir J. E. Millais, G. du Maurier, J. W. North, G. J. Pinwell, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, W. Small, Frederick Sandys, J. McNeill Whistler, Frederick Walker, and others. 10 x 7½. Pp. 204. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.

[A re-impression of the original edition of 1897. A few small errors have been corrected.]

The Dramatic Writings of Richard Edwards, Thomas Norton, and Thomas Sackville. Comprising Palamon and Pithias and Gordobuc, or Ferrex and Porrex, and Note-Book and Word-List. Edited by John S. Farmer. 7 x 4½. Pp. 191. Six Anonymous Plays (Second Series). Comprising Jacob and Esau—Youth—Albion, Knight—Mio-gonus—Godly Queen Hester—Tom Tyler and his Wife—Note-Book and Word-List. Edited by John S. Farmer. 7 x 4½. Pp. 478. Privately printed for Subscribers by the Early English Drama Society, n.p.

[In the "Early English Dramatists" series.]

The Æneid of Virgil. Translated into English Verse by James Rhoades. New Edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 359. Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.

Cobbett's English Grammar. With an introduction by H. L. Stephen. 7 x 4½. Pp. xvii, 232. Cobbett's Advice to Young Men (From the edition of 1829). 7 x 4½. Pp. 303. Froude, 2s. 6d. net each.

SCIENCE.

The Science Year Book, with Astronomical, Physical and Chemical Tables, Summary of Progress in Science, Directory, Biographies, and Diary for 1907. Edited by Major B. F. S. Baden-Powell. Third year of issue. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 407. King, Sell, 5s. net.

The Year-Book of the Scientific and Learned Societies of Great Britain and Ireland. Twenty-third annual issue. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 330.

[A record of the work done in science, literature and art during the session 1905-1906 by numerous societies and Government institutions.]

THEOLOGY.

Seaver, Richard W. To Christ through Criticism. 8 x 5½. Pp. 211. Edinburgh: Clark, 3s. 6d. net.

[Contains the substance of the Donellan Lectures delivered before the University of Dublin, 1905-1906.]

Wordsworth, Chr. The Precedence of English Bishops: and the Provincial Chapter. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 95. Cambridge: University Press, 2s. 6d. net.

Literary Illustrations of the Bible: The Epistle of James. 5½ x 4½. Pp. 139. Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. 6d. net.

The Literature of the New Testament—The Fourth Gospel; its Purpose and Theology. By Ernest F. Scott. 9 x 5½. Pp. 379. Edinburgh. Clarke, 6s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

A VERY charming little volume of translations of some of our English poems into Italian has been brought out by the Istituto di Arti Grafiche in Venice (Versioni da Thomas Gray, John Keats, Lord Byron, Percy Bysshe Shelley, Robert Browning. Di Taddeo Wiel). Signor Taddeo Wiel gives proof of his skill by turning into Italian verse Gray's "Elegy"; Byron's "Lines on Thyrza"; Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale"; Shelley's "Sensitive Plant" and "The Cloud"; and Browning's "A Toccata of Galuppi's". The translations are prefaced by an Introduction on the art of translation in Italian; and that Signor Wiel is a master of his beautiful mother-tongue is amply demonstrated by the scholarly Italian in which this introduction is written. The translations themselves are, with one exception, in the same metre as the originals. To reproduce such poems faithfully, with a strict adherence to the English form, metre, rhyme and sense, is no small achievement, and Signor Wiel may be congratulated on having performed his task admirably. We welcome the translation of some of our finest English lyrics into Italian, and appreciate the interest taken in our literature by one who evidently knows and loves our language. The volume is a beautiful example of the binder's and printer's arts, and is, we understand, the first of its kind published by a newly formed Institute which bids fair to carry on the traditions of Venetian printing in the city where Addo once lived and laboured. It may be obtained in London of Mr. James Bain, 14 Charles Street, Haymarket.

Mr. John Masefield, in A Sailor's Garland (Methuen and Co.), has provided an effective anthology of sea poetry, which, as was to be expected from the author of "A Mainsail Haul," is not without merit. On the other hand, as the same author's "Sea Life in Nelson's Time" would lead us to apprehend, the exercise of a little more judgment might have made it so much better. Mr. Masefield, we believe, is a poet who has been to sea, but, possibly by reason of his poetic temperament, he can only observe sea life from the point of view of one whose stomach squirms at blue water. We are led to assume that the sullen outlook he takes, and the gloomy colouring which pervades his prefatory remarks, is to be traced to this cause, since he tells us himself, that, "Nearly all the English poets, from Chaucer to Keats, have a dislike for, or a dread of, the sea, and a hatred of sea life and no high opinion of sailors." It may have been so, although we would have preferred to have it on better authority, but the more popular notion is expressed in the words of the song, "They all love Jack." With regard to his assertion it may also be asked whether there is any other calling or profession the members of which have received wider recognition from the British poets, or have inspired more sympathetic poetry than our seamen. Surely too, it was a little injudicious of Mr. Masefield, seeing he has such a poor opinion of seamen, to select for the title of his collection

"A Sailor's Garland." We may doubt whether this be quite the kind of garland that such a sailor poet as Captain Edward Thompson would have woven, or for the matter of that, Captain Marryat either, if we may judge from some of his poetry; but obviously this Garland is neither for sailors nor their sweethearts. Of the collection itself, it may be said that it is fairly representative, both as regards poets and poetry. There are indeed some notable omissions, as for example the metrical description of a sea battle by Peter Langtoft, probably the earliest in our history. Hardyng too gives a spirited account of a fight, while John Rastell draws for us the picture of a Tudor seaman. Among the ballads, we miss "Black Eyed Susan," and "Sweet Poll of Plymouth," two of the most popular in the eighteenth century. There is nothing quite so quaint in its way as the old song on the fight between the Nottingham and the Mars in November 1746. Of truly representative poetry, we may mention Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic," a contemporary poem on the loss of the Birkenhead, and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's pathetic verse inspired by the wreck of the Eurydice. Manifestly also, in "A Sailor's Garland" we should expect to find something of Gilbert's, and could well have spared a portion of the reprinted article on "Chanties," in which there are two questionable assertions, one that the "Chanty" is an invention of the Merchant Service, the other that the silent routine in the navy "must be very horrible to witness." Among minor blemishes indicative of carelessness or haste we note several names wrongly spelt, as Edmund for Edward, Thompson's Christian name; characters attributed to the wrong author, as Captain Mizen, an invention of Charles Shadwell in the "Fair Quaker of Deal"; and poems which appear with the descriptions, "anonymous," when their authors are well known, as "Admiral Hosier's Ghost," the work of Richard Glover.

Mr. Donald Maxwell's A Cruise Across Europe (Lane, 10s. 6d. net) is a light, humorous chronicle of a freshwater voyage in a small boat, from Holland to the Black Sea, by way of Ludwig's Canal, a waterway begun by Charlemagne which unites the basins of the Rhine and Danube, but is seldom used and little known, despite the fact that, as Mr. Maxwell says, it enables barges and craft to "climb to a height of over fifteen hundred feet from the sea by means of tortuous windings and bold leaps over wild and yawning chasms." The author writes entertainingly of the people he met, the country he passed through, and the incidents of his voyage; and Mr. Collington Taylor's illustrations are delightful.

Big towns are more graced by gossip than big counties. There are many books to prove this statement, and Mr. Vincent brings yet another (Highways and Byways in Berkshire. With illustrations by F. L. Griggs. Macmillan, 6s.) to add to the weight of argument. But in spite of this fact he has managed to make his book readable enough. He has inserted in it a large amount of solid fact, and, if he has slurred over some districts with which, apparently, he is not very familiar, he has on the whole written proportionately. This must have been difficult, for the interests of Berkshire are many. The river and the downs, the forest country and King Alfred's country, Windsor and all the other places of antiquarian and historical interest called for mention, and have received it. Despite the fact that Mr. Vincent lives near Abingdon, we suspect that at heart he prefers the town life. An enterprise like that of Lord Wantage moves him to a state of ecstatic admiration, but flowers and birds do not appear to interest him much, and it has been left to Mr. Griggs, in his excellent pictures, to supply the note of sympathy which his fellowworker lacks. The chapter tacked on at the end of the book, about the Civil Wars and Berkshire's share in them, is not always intelligible and not well conceived, for although the author has at times a happy and ready pen he cannot write military history. His style is weighed down with mannerisms; and there is in the book too much about Mr. Vincent, with the result that Berkshire often comes off second best.

Moons and Winds of Araby. By Roma White. (Brown Langham, 5s.) A visit to Egypt, not as a tourist, but as an inmate of the prettiest home within a hundred miles of Cairo, is turned to amusing account by the author of "Moons and Winds of Araby." She sets down anything that interests her, and many curious things, grave and gay come under her lively sympathetic observation. She gives us airy gossip, sketches of chance acquaintance, descriptions of life in an Anglo-Egyptian household, odds and ends of information about native ways and customs, with the glamour of the East over all. We learn how to make a garden in the desert "out of Nile mud, battle-axes, Arabs and camels; we are called upon to sympathise with the golfers when the "red flags disappeared from the golf-course and reappeared as the principal decoration of a village wedding"; and again, when the "she-camel scattered the teeing ground literally to the winds of heaven." Over the sand torment of the demoralising Khamseen she is eloquent through many pages: "a sponge is an instrument of torture, and when you brush your teeth you might as well be cleaning knives." So the book runs merrily on in a succession of bright pictures, experiences and anecdotes: it might perhaps have ended more neatly and crisply if Iadue's reminiscences of India in plague time had been entirely omitted.

Jack the Giant-Killer and Puss in Boots. Illustrated by H. M. Brock. (Newnes, 5s. each.) We commented a short time since on the fact that of some hundred gift-books designed for children sent us for review this season, not one showed any considerable originality. Writers of fairy-books are content, for the most part, to follow in the beaten track, and it is not, therefore, surprising that children prefer the old favourites. The books before us are the most ambitious—and, we may add, the most successful—attempts to illustrate well-known tales in colour that has come under our notice. We welcome them not only because the illustrations, in themselves, are clever, but because the publishers have recognised that black-and-white makes no appeal to the child mind, and that, although elaboration distracts, crudity is equally fatal. A child's sense of humour is broad, but it asks something more than splashes of red and black. A few of Mr. Brock's pictures suffer from excess of detail, but for the most part they are clear and strong—too much so a fastidious critic might object. He has humour and a sense of the grotesque—perhaps the most strongly developed of a child's faculties—and in each of the incidents he has illustrated, the central character or characters, and the incident itself, stand out conspicuously, as they should, and the setting is never given undue prominence. Take, for example, the scene in which Jack the Giant Killer finds the three ladies in the Castle suspended by means of their hair; the figures themselves are clear; attention is never distracted by the mouse or the frog on the floor. In the two volumes—both printed in clear type on one side of the paper—there is only one illustration which lays itself open to the charge of crudity. "Jack the Giant-Killer" is obviously intended for older children than its companion; for here Mr. Brock's strength is his weakness. His figures are a little too robust—too demonic. Among many good things it is difficult to choose; but we think Mr. Brock is most conspicuously successful in the picture which shows the two fat rabbits creeping into the bag, while Puss in Boots hides behind a tree, waiting to pull the string.

Among the Christmas Gift-books sent us are several intended for girls. We have met most of the stories before, and we look in vain for an original character or an original book. Raymond Jackberns might easily improve on The Record Term (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), which is, as its title indicates, a girls'-school story. It is not distinguished by good writing, although, as there is a good deal of "hugging" in it, it will be read with avidity by many a schoolgirl.—The Bolted Door (Chambers, 3s. 6d.) is a series of pleasantly-written short stories by Mrs. Molesworth, a writer on whom we may always rely with confidence to turn out something simple and good.—No list of Christmas books would be complete without something less than a dozen from Mrs. L. T. Meade. Turquoise and Ruby (Chambers, 5s.) will sustain Mrs. Meade's reputation, but we do not advise any one to buy it and present it to daughters or nieces.—The same remark applies to The Colonel and the Boy (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), which is full of unpleasant suggestion.—Barbara Pelham (S.P.C.K., 2s. 6d.), by Mary E. Shipley, is the story of a child's unselfish life—a quiet, interesting tale, quietly told.—Not often have writers of girls' books as fine a story to tell as has Miss Eliza F. Pollard in A Girl of the Eighteenth Century (Nelson, 3s. 6d.). The scene is laid in the stirring times of the American War and the French Revolution; and the writing is attractive and the tone healthy. The book is made interesting by the introduction of famous men and women—John Wesley, Madame le Brun, and others. It is the best girls' book on our table.—A Heroine of France (2s. 6d.), by Evelyn Everett-Green, is another of Messrs. Nelson's new books. The heroine, of course, is Joan of Arc, and Miss Everett-Green handles her subject well and with restraint, but she has not been able to make it live.—Miss Everett-Green is more successful in her A Motherless Maid (Melrose, 3s. 6d.), a mild little love-story which will interest many girl-readers. From the same publisher we have A Girl of Dreams (3s. 6d.), by Lily Watson. The girl in question has literary dreams and any fellow sufferer will hasten to find out what happened to Rosemary.—The heroine of Lady Gilbert's tale, Our Sister Maisie (Blackie, 6s.), gives up brilliant prospects to devote herself to her step-brothers and sisters, left without provision or a protector, and carries them off to her Irish island, from which she draws a small sum in rents. Lady Gilbert has written a capital book which will, we think, find readers outside the ranks of the girls.—Girl Comrades, by Ethel F. Heddle (Blackie, 6s.), is also a tale of a struggle to keep the wolf from the door. Eilidh and Morag Chandos (why not Mary and Anne Brown?) lose their inheritance through the disappearance of a will, and go to London to seek their fortunes. No girl with a taste for reading would thank us for outlining the "plot"; but to our old-fashioned ideas we think it not altogether in good taste to call two old ladies "Acid Drops."—To The Story-Book Girls (6s.), by Christina Gowans Whyte, went the Bookman one hundred pound prize for the best girl's book. The author seems to have set herself the task of turning out a "smart" school-girlish novel; and the smartness invariably takes some such form as the following:

"Mabel was sitting with Cuthbert when the Story Books called. They really did call.
And nothing could have been more unpropitious. . . .
Adelaide Maud was with Mrs. Dudgeon.
Adelaide Maude was in blue.
Adelaide Maude seemed stiff and bored."

We are really a little sorry for Adelaide Maude who seemed stiff and bored.—A new book from the pen of Ethel Turner is always sure of a welcome, and in The Mist of the Mountains (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) will receive the meed of praise it deserves.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

HAVE YOU BOUGHT YOUR BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS?

A. & F. DENNY will send their New Catalogue on receipt of name and address. The largest and most varied stock in London to select from.

A. & F. DENNY, 147 Strand, London.

(Opposite the Gaiety Theatre.)

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

Ed. Weekly. 12d.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties,

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74 New Oxford Street, London.

Producers and Publishers of Reproductions of Famous Works of Art by the Autotype Process of Permanent Photography.

Artistic Christmas and New Year's Gifts.

Framed Autotypes are always acceptable Presents. Their artistic character renders them especially suitable for decorative purposes in homes of taste, whilst their moderate cost brings them within the reach of most lovers of Art.

Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, NEW EDITION, with upwards of 150 Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes and 23 Tint Block Illustrations. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' Names.

Post free, ONE SHILLING.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY, 74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

OPEN (FREE) DAILY FROM 10 TO 6.

A VISIT OF INSPECTION INVITED.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1808

DECEMBER 29, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointment Vacant

WANTED a HEADMASTER for the Boys' department of the Jews' Free School, salary commencing at £500 per annum, and rising by annual increments of £20 to £700 per annum.

Applicants must be of the Jewish persuasion and have a University degree. Highest educational qualifications and teaching experience in elementary or secondary schools essential. The school accommodation is 2200, and it is proposed by the London County Council to reorganise it shortly so as to consist of a higher elementary and three lower sections, each under a vice-master. The successful candidate must commence his duties after the Easter holidays.

Applications must be addressed to Mr. H. MARKS, Secretary of the Jews' Free School, Bell Lane, London, E., by January 31, 1907, from whom further particulars can be obtained.

The application must be made on form 40 to be obtained from the Education Offices, L.C.C., Victoria Embankment, W.C., or from the present Headmaster at the School.

Books for Sale.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue for DECEMBER Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

FITZGERALD (EDWARD), 1809 - 1883, the Famous Letter-Writer and Translator of Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam—Life of, by Thos. Wright. 63 full page plates in colour. 2 vols., 8vo, Art Linen, new pub., 24s. net for 10s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

CHAUCEER.—A Commentary on the Prolog and Six Tales. Rich in new matter. Subscription price, $2.00. Circular on application.—Address, H. B. HINCKLEY, 54 Prospect Street, Northampton, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

ESSEX HOUSE PRESS BOOKS.—Shakespeare's Poems, hand printed, bound full vellum, published at 42s. net, for 17s. 6d. net. Sir Christopher Wren's Life and Works, hand printed, 20 engravings, folio, published at 73s. 6d. net, for 22s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—AUTHORS' MSS. of all kinds carefully TYPED. 9d. per 1000 after 3000. Knowledge of French, German and Italian. A. U. BOWMAN, 74 Limes Avenue, New Southgate, N.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS.—SHEPHERD'S Winter Exhibition of Selected Landscapes and Portraits by the Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's Square.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—11 Victoria Gardens, Notting-hill Gate, W.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

The new Catalogue for 1906, choicely printed in red and black, done up in old style wrappers, uncut edges, is now ready and will be mailed free on request.

This is Mr. Mosher's only method of making his editions known. All possible value is put into the books issued by him, and they are then left to advertise themselves by their intrinsic merit.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

Education

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

EVENING CLASS DEPARTMENT.

COURSES are arranged for the Intermediate and Final Examinations for the B.A. and B.Sc. Degrees of the University of London. Students taking the full course pay composition fees and rank as Internal Students of the University. There are also classes in Architectural and Engineering Subjects.

Evening Classes are also held for Mechanical and Electrical Engineering, Architecture and Building Construction, Drawing, Mathematics, Physics, and all Science Subjects.

For full information and Prospectus apply to the Dean (Mr. R. W. K. EDWARDS), or the Secretary, King's College, Strand, London, W.C.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

THE Course which is intended to meet the requirements of the Teachers' Registration Council is both practical (including properly directed work in a Secondary School) and theoretical (preparing for the London Teachers' Diploma and the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate).

The Course occupies a year, beginning in October or January.

For further particulars apply to the Secretary, King's College, Strand.

HIGH-CLASS MONTHLY JOURNAL for Disposal. Established some years. Well paying advertisements. Small sum required for goodwill, rights and effects from an IMMEDIATE PURCHASER.—For particulars apply to "P.E.H." 28 Budge Row, Cannon Street, London.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

IDEAL GIFT BOOKS

The Fairy Library

Handsomely bound in cloth, with Picture Covers.

5/- net each. Post free 5/5

Jack the Giant Killer Puss in Boots

Each volume contains Eight Full Page Illustrations in Colour by H. M. BROCK, each picture being beautifully mounted.

The Daily Graphic says :

"Really fine children's books, in which Mr. Brock gives some delightful specimens of his colour-work."

A NEW NOVEL BY MORICE GERARD

A story of great power and originality, the scene of which is laid on the West Coast of Cornwall.

The Secret of the Moor

Cloth, 3/6 net; Post Free, 3/10

In this novel, Mr. Morice Gerard is in turns mysterious, stirring, pathetic, and tender, while the mystic air of the Cornish moors pervades the whole story.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND,
LONDON, W.C.

NOW READY. 1907 EDITION.

ALL NEW HONOURS AND PARLIAMENTARY CHANGES INCLUDED.
OLDEST PEERAGE VOLUME EXTANT.
PUBLISHED IN THREE CENTURIES.

A very mine of information (including Addresses) regarding all living Titled Persons, and the Members of the Collateral Branches of all Peers and Baronets, Bishops, Privy Councillors, Knights and Companions of the various Orders, Precedency, Formal Modes of Address, &c. &c.

DEBRETTS'S

PEERAGE (with Index to Courtesy Titles),

BARONETAGE (with Index),

KNIGHTAGE and
COMPANIONAGE

Illustrated. Accurate and Up-to-Date.

Also an Appendix of Royal Warrant Holders.

2400 pages, cloth gilt (Royal Edition), 3rs. 6d. net; or in two Vols., 16s. 6d. net each. Limp morocco (Special Thin Paper Edition), half-weight and thickness of Royal Editions, 50s. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160 FLEET STREET, E.C.

The book-year ends this week—on Monday anyhow. On Wednesday, at the psychological moment for the Christmas trade, there appeared the January BOOK MONTHLY, bringing the record of the book-year down to its close.

Besides lists, it has bright articles and beautiful illustrations dealing with Christmas books, with publishers' marks, with the triumph of the woman novelist in 1906, and with other literary subjects. Now is the time to become a subscriber to the BOOK MONTHLY, which only costs sixpence. Write for a specimen copy to the publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour), and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	647	God and Man	657
Literature :		The Library Table	659
Literature in 1906	649	Nugæ Scriptoris :
The Malay Peninsula	650	XIV—Noëls	661
Lord Milner in Africa	651	A Literary Causerie :
A Nation's Literature	652	The Lotus Eaters	662
The Cambridge Modern		Fiction	663
History	654	Fine Art :
Despot and Humanist	655	Rosso	664
American Beginnings	655	Correspondence	664
Sir Thomas Lawrence's		The Bookshelf	667
Letters	656

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

Apropos Mr. Hinckley's letter in our last issue, Professor Skeat writes to us as follows: "I am extremely doubtful as to the alleged early date for Ywaine and Gawin, but do not now propose to dispute it. But I altogether repudiate the alleged influence of this poem on the Romaunt of the Rose; and I much doubt whether there are many scholars at the present date who still hold to Chaucer's authorship of the whole of that poem. The arguments which I adduced in my 'Chaucer Canon' to show that fragment B, and that fragment only, is written in the Northern dialect, have never been answered.

"Neither do I admit that there are traces of Northern dialect in fragment A; and I am surprised at the flimsy arguments adduced to show it. We are asked to admit such arguments as these: (1) Halte, 'be called,' in l. 38, is Northern. It does not occur in rhyme; it exists in Thynne's late print (1532) only; and it is wrong. For the Northern form of the infinitive would not be dissyllabic, as the metre requires. (2) Buskes, in l. 102, is Northern. I do not know why; in Chaucer's Knight's Tale, A 1579, buskes or boskes is the reading of five manuscripts out of six, in the Six-text edition. (3) In l. 506, ware rhymes with care. But the passage is corrupt; see my explanation in 'The Chaucer Canon,' p. 150. Are we never to hear the last of this? (4) In l. 716, their occurs in the Glasgow manuscript! How very remarkable! Well, her occurs in the other copy. (5) In l. 103, we have the rhyme of leef is with slevis; and leef is Northern. Not so very Northern either; for it rhymes with theef twice in the Canterbury Tales; A 3792; C 760. And Gower spells it lief, and rhymes it with grief; Conf. Amantis, ii. 209. (6) In l. 1601, perilous rhymes with Narcisus. But what is Northern here? Chaucer rhymes hous with Caucasus, C.T., D 1140.

"The writer freely admits 'that evidences like the above are inconclusive.' Well, they certainly are extremely so. I do not care to consider the Northern rhymes like thar and mar, because they were not the exclusive property of the author of Ywain. You can find them anywhere in Northern texts. Thus, to take Barbour's Bruce, we can find in it mar rhyming with ar, iv. 568; war, bar, x. 241; thaim till, will, ii. 274; sittand, fand and fand, hand, x. 762; and the like."

Will Mistral succeed Brunetière as an Academician? There would be a certain appropriateness in his doing so, for both men have been ardent patriots and both have believed in the force of tradition. But there is a difficulty in the way. Mistral is seventy-six and at that age men do not wish to change their lives. To Paris he would have to go once at least, if he were elected a member of the Academy, and he has never loved Paris. Indeed he has seldom quitted his father's farm in Provence since the day when he was asked what he meant to be and replied "a poet." Few things are more remarkable than the persistency with which he has adhered to the scheme of existence that he then mapped out for himself. He stands, a lonely and an admirable figure, deploring the rural exodus, and proving by his work that religion and beauty are inseparably connected with a country life.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton send us a well-printed little volume on "The Epistle of St. James"—one of a series, entitled "Literary Illustrations of the Bible," intended to show passages of verse and prose in general literature which develop the idea of a Biblical verse or embody the text itself. Though he does not seem to possess a very exhaustive knowledge of literature, the editor, Dr. Moffat, has gleaned his parallels from a wide field—from Shakespeare down to Mrs. Meynell and Miss Alice Gardner—and many of them are interesting and more or less apposite, as the quotation from "Marius the Epicurean":

A white bird, she told him once, looking at him gravely, a bird which he must carry in his bosom across a crowded public place—his own soul was like that, which is chosen to illustrate the words: "And to keep himself unspotted from the world." After "Ye have despised the poor" we have Burns's lines:

Now if ye're ane o' warl's folk
Wha rate the wearer by the cloak
An' sklent on poverty their joke,
Wi' bitter sneer,
Wi' ye no friendship will I troke,
Nor cheap nor dear.

In a large number of cases, however, we fail to see the connection between the text and the "literary illustration." The words "Therewith we curse men," detached from their context, are meaningless, though they are followed by a curious quotation from Andrew Fairservice in "Rob Roy":

I have heard wives flyte in England and Scotland—it's nae marvel to hear them flyte ony gate—but sic ill-scrapit tongues as they Hieland carlines'—and sic grewsome wishes, that men should be slaughtered like sheep—and that they may lapper their hands to the elbows in their heart's blude—sic awsome language as that I never heard oot o' a human thrapple;—and unless the deil wad rise among them to gie them a lesson, I thinkna that this talent at cursing could be amended.

But Swinburne in Lochrine—

We who remember not a day wherein
We have not loved each other,—who can see
No time, since time first bade our days begin,
Within the sweep of memory's wings when we Have known not what each other's love must be,—
We are well content to know it, and rest on this,
And call not words to witness what it is,
To love aloud is oft to love amiss—

does not seem to "develop aptly and freshly" the injunction "Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath." And the connection between "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation" and Goldsmith's:

Aromatic plants bestow
No spicy fragrance while they grow;
But crushed or trodden to the ground
Diffuse their balmy sweets around is purely imaginary. The book is more remarkable for what it omits than for what it contains.

In the Periodical, the quarterly publication of the Oxford University Press, it is mentioned that Dr. B. P. Grenfell—who, with his colleague Dr. Hunt, is now making final explorations at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt—remarked in the course of a recent lecture at Oxford that the literary find of last winter exceeded in value that which had fallen to any previous excavators. New odes of Pindar, parts of the lost tragedy of Euripides on Hypsipyle, a commentary on the second book of Thucydides, and portions of the manuscripts of the "Phaedrus" of Plato, of the "Panaegyrics" of Isocrates, and the speech of Demosthenes against Bocotes had been discovered. The Pindar manuscript, of about 100 A.D., was written on the back of a census, and altogether the find constituted an addition of great importance to Greek literature.

An interesting ceremony is to take place at Hawarden on January 3, when St. Deiniol's Library will be formally opened. The new wing, recently completed, has accommodation for seventeen visitors, as well as for a warden and his assistant. Here the bookishly inclined, who before Caxton's day must forsake the world for a monastery if he would indulge his taste, may now retire for a season without taking any vows. And here, at a very moderate cost, he may enjoy the advantages of a fine library situated in a beautiful part of the country, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot." About £60,000 has been devoted to this admirable scheme. £40,000 was provided by Mr. Gladstone himself, £10,000 by his sons and daughters, and £10,000 by the nation. It is a noble memorial to one who found his chief recreation in the study of literature. The Library numbers thirty-seven thousand volumes. It is strongest on the theological side, but the humanities are well represented, Mr. Gladstone himself having taken Humanity and Divinity as his guides in his choice of books. In this bustling age there is something restful in the mere thought of such a halting-place, and it is almost superfluous to wish St. Deiniol's Library success.

Purley beeches have a name that should be familiar to those who are versed in English literature; for at Purley, in a house that may still be seen, there once lived a Mr. Tooke, who offered his hospitality freely to a Mr. Horne, afterwards known as John Horne Tooke. Here that litigious person loved as often as possible "to shake to all the liberal air, the dust and din and stream of town," passing the greater part of the day on horseback and delighting the guests at dinner with the feast of reason and the flow of soul, while piquet took the place of the much denounced modern game of bridge. It was during this period of his life that he became the literary agent of Pitt. In 1786 he produced the "Divisions of Purley," the first important work published on the philology of the English language. The beeches are threatened by the tide of "progress," and it is sincerely to be hoped that they will escape destruction.

The Conference of Head Masters, which met at Malvern College, on December 20 and 21, supported by 32 votes to 11 the resolution proposed by Mr. Fletcher, Master of Marlborough: "That this conference is of opinion that the system of Latin pronunciation recommended by the Classical Association should be adopted by all schools represented on the conference with as little delay as possible." The Head Masters of Charterhouse and Rugby opposed the change, the former because it tended to obliterate the tie between Latin and English, the latter because the gain did not seem to him an equivalent for the difficulties that would be encountered. These, however, he probably exaggerated.

Dr. Upcott, of Christ's Hospital, then moved: "That in the interests of the general education of young boys it is advisable that the study of Greek should be postponed to the age of thirteen or fourteen, and that Greek should not be a subject of the scholarship and entrance examination in schools represented on the conference." The Head Master of Eton did not approve of this, and it was strongly opposed by the Head Masters of Charterhouse, Rugby, and Shrewsbury, but eventually carried by a large majority. If the resolution is put into practice there will be no Greek taught in preparatory schools, and most boys when they go on to public schools will join the modern side as a matter of course. Compulsory Greek may be a counsel of perfection too hard for these degenerate days, but it is a great pity that the men who should be upholding the claims of Greek are the first to discourage learners by such a change as is here proposed. "Greek, sir," said Dr. Johnson, "is like lace—every man gets as much of it as he can." But the fashion has changed for the one as for the other.

New-Year's Day was one of the days that Dr. Johnson used to observe regularly with a religious solemnity, composing prayers and meditations suitable to the occasion, and making or renewing good resolutions for the future. Early rising was the subject of many of these: e.g., "I purpose, and hope to rise early in the morning, at eight, and by degrees at six; eight being the latest hour to which bed-time can properly be extended; and six the earliest that the present system of life requires." But he confesses that, except for about one half-year, he has never fulfilled this. Like most scholars, he was deeply sensible of the shortness of time. Boswell observed once upon the dial-plate of his watch the inscription Νύξ γὰρ ἔρχεται, adapted from St. John ix. 4, ἔρχεται νύξ, ὅτε οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐργάζεσθαι: but shortly afterwards Johnson laid the dial-plate aside, explaining that as it was often looked upon by others it might be censured as ostentatious.

The late Principal Rainy, though he has left no enduring literary monument, was a conspicuous intellectual force for over a generation in the northern kingdom. He was of Celtic descent on both the paternal and maternal sides of his house, and his mother was distantly related to the Gladstone family. Dr. Harry Rainy, the late Principal's father, attended Edward Irving in his last illness. In his first charge (1851-54) at Huntly, Principal Rainy and George MacDonald occasionally met, and to the end of his days many men of letters were among the great ecclesiastic's closest friends. W. E. Gladstone said of Rainy that his was the acutest intellect he had encountered in Scotland; and no truer estimate of the late Principal has been left than the following by an eminent Edinburgh advocate: "There was about Dr. Rainy a statuesque self-repression against which the Celtic fire within heaved in vain."

The late Mr. C. M. Falconer, of Dundee, was alike a unique and assiduous collector of literary treasures. For over a quarter of a century, books, magazine and newspaper articles and poems by Mr. Andrew Lang were searched for and procured by Mr. Falconer for his Lang Library. The versatility of Mr. Lang necessitated, it can be understood, incessant vigilance and industry on the part of the collector, and the extent and completeness of the library Mr. Falconer has left testifies to the success and skill with which he pursued his hobby. In 1889, and again in 1898, Mr. Falconer printed for private circulation a list of the works—under the titles "Specimen of a Bibliography" and "Catalogue of a 'Lang' Library"—then in his possession; and seven years ago he printed sixty copies of "A New Friendship's Garland"—an anthology of verse in praise of Mr. Lang. The book, now rare and of considerable value, opened with R. L. S.'s "Dear Andrew with the brindled hair," and Mr. S. R. Crockett contributed the epilogue.

One of the most valuable books in Mr. Falconer's collection is his copy of the "Garland of Rachel"—a facsimile, chiefly in his own neat handwriting, of the "Garland" prepared in 1881 by the Rev. C. H. Daniel, of Oxford, with the assistance of Mr. Austin Dobson,

Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Robert Bridges, and others, in honour of his daughter. Mr. Falconer's "copy" won praise from Mr. Daniel, from Mr. Gosse, Lewis Carroll, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Humphry Ward, and other contributors to the original "Garland," and the letters of appreciation, skilfully mounted on guards, add to the volume a value which is further enhanced by the exquisite binding in pale blue Levant morocco extra by Zaehnsdorf.

Mr. George Duncan, concerning whom a question of pathetic interest was asked before Parliament rose, was a contemporary of Stevenson at Edinburgh University, where he graduated in 1870. A student and intense admirer of Carlyle, he addressed to him a letter on the subject of prayer—a subject on which alone to George Duncan the Sage unbosomed himself. On the advice of Carlyle to study history and if possible to go to Germany for the purpose, Duncan went to Berlin twenty-six years ago, and settled down as a private teacher of English. A man of commanding presence, of great gifts and attractive manners, he was for a time fairly successful, and besides teaching and translation work he assisted the Berlin correspondent of the Standard. Latterly he had an appointment in the Staff College. Through all George Duncan's mental vicissitudes Thomas Carlyle remained his hero, and all his views and conduct of life were reduced to the standard of the Chelsea Sage.

The book sale season (for a brief period suspended by the Christmas holidays) has been a notable one. Finely-illuminated manuscripts and (unfortunately imperfect) specimens of the work of our first English printer on the one hand and Shakespeare and Shelley on the other have provided the surprises. The manuscripts—many of them, as usual, Books of Hours—brought high prices, some over six hundred pounds: the Caxtons of course went well. Messrs. Hodgson had the good fortune to discover amongst some books sent them for disposal three imperfect Caxtons bound in one volume of contemporary binding. The precious tome realised four hundred and seventy pounds. In the library of the late Dr. Richard Garnett were three note-books with entries in the handwriting of Shelley, and America bought them for three thousand pounds. In the sale of Mr. Hodson's library by Messrs. Sotheby, which took place on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th December and realised £10,852 6s., Blake's Songs of Innocence, 1789, sold for £107; Chaucer, 1475 (another Caxton, also imperfect), brought one hundred guineas; the Publications of the Kelmscott Press, the famous Press conducted by William Morris, twenty-five volumes (including the Chaucer) all printed on vellum, totaled £744 and the original manuscripts of two dozen of the works of William Morris brought £1239 5s.

Extra-illustrated books brought fair prices, some very good—Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters, £70—while cut-down copies of first editions had their usual fate, witness Scott's "Waverley," which sold for only £14 15s. At Messrs. Hodgson's early this month some extremely rare books were disposed of—Spenser's Shepheard's Calendar, second edition, £180; Shakespeare's Poems, First edition 1640, with the portrait by Marshall, £220; Hamlet, 1637, £107, and Lamb's Rosamund in the original boards, uncut, 1798, £93. The principal sale of the season was that of the Trentham Hall Library, the property of the Duke of Sutherland, at which many good prices were obtained. It lasted six days.

There have been surprises, as we have said, but what the ordinary secondhand bookseller most appreciates has not been by any means abundant. Copies of rare books and manuscripts which bring high prices benefit the owner, the seller and perhaps the buyer, and are of interest to what we might call the spectator, but they are not the stuff which bring grist to the mill of the secondhand bookseller. He likes standard books in good editions, and plenty of them. "Books which no Gentleman's Library should be without" and the sale of "excessively rare" or "unique" copies have only a passing interest for him.

The publisher of "Renderings into Greek and Latin Verse from the Westminster Gazette," reviewed in our last issue, is Mr. Blackwell, of Oxford.

LITERATURE

LITERATURE IN 1906

WE leave to our daily contemporaries the task of making a complete summary and review of the books published during the past year. It is always good to have such a list for purposes of reference, but the names of the books that show the faintest promise of becoming permanent additions to English literature would not cover many sheets of paper. Nor is this to be wondered at, since great artists are not produced every century, and it would be unreasonable to expect a harvest of them each year. The majority of the books issued from the press possesses no more chance of endurance than does the majority of the pictures hung annually at Burlington House. Many notable books, however, have been published during the course of the year that is now closing.

There are one or two points to be noticed about the method of publication, the first of which is that the spring publishing season is tending to disappear. Indeed, as regards the publication of books possessing real importance, authors and publishers are beginning to recognise that not much is gained by carefully selecting any given part of the year. One of the shrewdest of our popular novelists prefers that his annual novel should come out in what is generally called "the silly season," for the simple reason that, the newspapers having plenty of space at their disposal and reviewers being hard up for something to write about, there is then a chance of much wider advertisement than there is during the busiest part of the publishing season. Accordingly the number of books that were issued in the early part of 1906 was considerably below the average. Yet the year opened with a publication of some importance—the Life of Lord Randolph Churchill, by his son, Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill. This book added very much to the reputation of its author, alike as a politician and as a man of letters. It was grave, impartial, unbiassed and philosophic in the true sense of the word. The year has been notable for biographies, but the Life of Lord Randolph Churchill was by far the most important. If we were to place books of this kind in order of merit the second would be "From Midshipman to Field-Marshal," Sir Evelyn Wood's autobiography. Sir Evelyn's life was one of extraordinary activity and in this fine work he narrates its events with an amount of tact, modesty, good sense and liveliness that are most praiseworthy. Third in our list must come the Life of Richard Burton by Mr. Thomas Wright. No Life of Burton could fail to be interesting, but it was generally felt that Mr. Wright had not given a living picture of the man as he appeared to his contemporaries. He had very industriously collected and collated, but it is to be regretted that the task of writing Burton's biography did not devolve upon one of his more intimate friends. We have frequently drawn attention to the prominent vice of modern biography: that of making it not a true essay but a mere mass of documents. This system was carried to the most extraordinary length in the Life and Letters of Prince Hohenlohe, the publication of which came towards the end of the season, as the Life of another statesman had opened the year. Here an industrious German editor had collected in the two huge volumes every tract, letter and other document bearing on the life of the Prince, but had woven them together so unskillfully that the greatest determination on the part of the reader was not equal to carrying him through it. A very pleasant biography on a lesser scale was that which Miss Edith Sichel wrote of Alfred Ainger. It is true that she had a more than usually charming subject. Ainger had inherited a double portion of the spirit of Charles Lamb, whom he admired greatly, and his quips and cranks, his merry jests and clever sayings, joined to a most amiable personality, simplified the task of the biographer; but it must be admitted that Miss Sichel did her work excellently.

While on the subject of biography attention might be directed to what we cannot help thinking the vicious habit of writing the biographies of prominent people while they are still alive. The bad taste of such a proceeding does not need to be pointed out, and that it is also absolutely fatal to sound workmanship is self-evident. For example, the various Lives that have been written of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain might serve some purpose as political pamphlets, but they were certainly not biographies in the literary sense of the word. Another kind of biography that can well be dispensed with is the formal "Life and Letters" which is thought to be the due of every man of standing when he dies. We had an example of this kind but a few months ago. The Duke of Cambridge was a most estimable man and occupied a leading position in the history of his time, but nevertheless it cannot be said that he did anything to merit the two biographical works that were erected as a kind of tombstone to his memory. If we mistake not there were four volumes altogether, two of them dealing with his military career and two with his private life.

In poetry nothing of first class merit has appeared, and yet we have among us many excellent minor poets from some of whom great things are expected. Among those who have published during the past year volumes of verse that deserve a place in the library we might mention Mr. Alfred Noyes and Mr. T. Sturge Moore. As usual, however, the literature of 1906 took the shape of fiction more than any thing else, and in this department several books of a noteworthy character were published. It is not easy to pass a final judgment upon a novel within twelve months after publication, because an imaginative masterpiece must be read several times before its true merits can be appraised. In our opinion the finest novel of the year was Miss Cholmondeley's "Prisoners," which marked a great step forward in the work of this writer. It was drama, and very fine drama, presented as a novel. Miss Cholmondeley had, however, won her spurs as a writer of fiction long before. The most promising of the productions of those who are entitled to be called new writers was, we think, Mr. W. B. Maxwell's "The Guarded Flame," a novel whose careful and steady workmanship augurs well for its author's future. In a lighter vein and yet written with a more consummate art, "The Beloved Vagabond" of Mr. William J. Locke is as simple and joyous a piece of romance as has been added to our bookshelf this many a year. The three books we have mentioned stand out as novels which have had both pains and talent put into their making. It would be invidious to use superlatives as there may be others which have escaped the attention of the present writer, but those mentioned represent a high quality of work that is being done at the present moment in spite of all temptations towards cheapness and popularity.

In criticism, many books have been published, and yet we do not seem to be in the way of discovering a successor to Matthew Arnold. In fact, it is no exaggeration to say that of all departments of literature criticism is most poorly represented at the moment. It would seem that young men coming from the universities possess confused standards of taste. They are impressed by successes which are not due to literary quality but to the power of appealing to the huge mobs of half-educated persons turned out of the cheap schools of the time. They lack the authority to put their backs against this advancing flood. Perhaps in due course there will emerge from among them some individual who will have the vision to see and recognise what is good and pure, and genius enough to make his opinions prevail.

THE MALAY PENINSULA

Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula. By W. W. SKEAT and C. O. BLAGDEN. 2 vols. (Macmillan, 42s. net.)

British Malaya: An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By Sir FRANK SWETTENHAM, K.C.M.G. (Lane, 16s. net.)

It is a humiliating fact that the ethnographical museums of England cannot compare with those of Germany, but it is some consolation that as regards text-books of anthropology we more than hold our own. Following close on the heels of Dr. Rudolf Martin, Messrs. Skeat and Blagden have given us a monumental work on the wild tribes of the Malay Peninsula. Mr. Skeat deals with questions of race, physical anthropology, material culture, religion and magic, Mr. Blagden with the languages. Mr. Skeat classifies the "pagan races"—by which he understands all the aboriginal races of the Peninsula save the civilised Malays—into three groups, of which the southern termed Jakun, is, in his view, representative of an aboriginal Malay stock, overlaid, however, to some extent, by elements drawn from the other two races, which bear the names of Semang and Sakai. The former, who live in the north, are technically termed negritos, i.e., pigmy negroes—a small race, not more than five feet high, with woolly hair, round heads, and wide-open, straight, round eyes. The Sakai, who occupy the centre of the Peninsula, are a taller stock, connected by some with the Dravidians of South India and the Australians, by others with the Khmers, Stieng and other tribes of south-east Asia; their hair is wavy, their eyes narrow but not set obliquely, and their heads long. The Jakuns, so far as we can speak of a distinct and uniform type, are still taller, have round heads, straight hair, and eyes with some tendency to obliquity. Of these three stocks, Mr. Skeat gives us an exhaustive description, based in part on published material (his list of authorities extends to a dozen pages), in part on his own researches. Not the least effective feature of the work is the large number of full-page illustrations, which bring vividly before us the various races and their manner of life.

In a bulky scientific work there is often much which is of little interest to the general reader, who, however, if he skip the technical portions, makes the remainder less easy to understand. Mr. Skeat has met the needs of such readers by the simple device of summaries at the beginning of chapters and sections; these, of course, merely whet the appetite of the initiated for the fuller details to follow. The general reader will, for example, gain an adequate knowledge of the weapons of wild tribes, the most interesting being the blow-pipe, from the twenty-three pages of general remarks; the specialist will plunge with gusto into the seventy-three pages of details which tell him all that is known as to the mode of manufacture, range, preparation of poison, and antidotes.

Within the brief limits of a review it is impossible even to glance at the contents of more than a few sections. Under the heading of material culture we find chapters on food, dress, dwellings, hunting and fishing, barter, weapons, cultivation, manufactures, decorative art, and other subjects; as a specimen we may take the account of Sakai rice planting, in which the magical element is so large as to suggest its inclusion in the second volume rather than under industries. At the beginning of the planting season the magician makes his way to the fields and calls upon the "Little Black Princess" to protect the fields against all harmful demons. With one exception all evil spirits fear her, but she is powerless against the "Squinting Demon." The Sakai say that a man who squints has a wider field of vision than a normal individual: hence a demon who squints can more easily discover those portions of the field which the owner is not watching. During planting operations care must be taken not to arouse the mice demons. If a digging stick be knocked against the trunk of a tree they hear it; consequently the sticks must be cleaned, if they are clogged by soil, by wiping them against the foot; otherwise the mice would exclaim "rice-planting, rice-planting," and set to work to dig up the seed. The soul of the rice is believed to wander for three days at harvest time; when it returns, it must be welcomed by a great feast, to which many guests are bidden; the soul of the rice takes up its abode in seven ears, which are carefully stowed away till the next year's planting, when they are mingled with the seed to fertilise it. This is merely one item among the interesting contents of a single chapter.

In the second volume we find descriptions of the rites at birth, initiation, marriage, and death. The candidate for matrimony has to undergo a regular cross-examination. He is asked whether he has cups and pots, whether he has planted rice and yams, whether he has made a rice spoon and built a hut, whether he can climb trees for fruit and find turtle's eggs, and so on; the bridegroom finally asserts that he can capture monkeys of all kinds, much more somebody's daughter. Thereupon in old times the bride set off at her best pace round a mound, followed by her suitor, who had three laps in which to catch her; if he succeeded he was regarded as duly wedded, if he failed he tried again another day.

Very interesting, too, is the difference of attitude in the three races with regard to the dead; the Semang is indifferent to the ghosts, but the Sakai lives in terror of them, while the Jakun's behaviour is dictated by love and respect for the deceased; yet even among the Besis (Jakun) Mr. Skeat saw a strange ceremony, the object of which was to keep within the tomb the ghost of a dead girl, and to prevent it from feeding on the living. The chapter on religion and folklore is important, and occupies over two hundred pages. Perhaps the most curious item is the account of Semang beliefs about the soul. They say that before a child is born the god Kari sends out its soul, which till then has sat behind him on a tree; it is conveyed by a bird, and the expectant mother must eat of this bird or the child will not live; twins result from eating a soul-bird with an egg. This is by no means a solitary instance of the resourcefulness of the native imagination; thunder they explain as the humming of celestial tops, the whipcords of which are the lightning.

To discuss Mr. Blagden's share of the work is impossible within the space at our disposal; from his linguistic map readers will gather a clear idea of the distribution of the various elements, for the dialectical and racial boundaries correspond in the main. His dictionary of aboriginal dialects, arranged according to the English meanings, is a monument of patient labour, but the reader will be more interested in his account of the taboo or camphor language and its analogues, in his discussion of the Malayan element in aboriginal dialects, and in his very important treatment of the relation of Mon-Annam languages to those of the Peninsula. Put briefly, Mr. Blagden's conclusions are that there is a recent Mon-Annam strain, due to contact, and an older one, due probably to genetic relations. How far both groups are also vitally connected with the Munda family of India is so far an open question. The present work is, in fact, an exhaustive survey of available material; it will serve as a basis for future progress and smooth the path of those who attack the numerous problems raised but not solved by our authors.

Sir Frank Swettenham's work deals with the same area, but it is concerned with British relations with the civilised Malays; and, though one chapter is devoted to a description of the Malay and his ways, the book is essentially historical. Even in Germany the colonising genius of the British nation often finds ungrudging recognition; and it is impossible to read this account of what we have done in the far East, written by one who has himself played his part in the events he records, without feeling pride in British achievements. Englishmen have a happy knack of identifying themselves with the people they rule in British colonies or advise in the native states, and Sir F. Swettenham's book bears testimony to the good results.

Of the fourteen chapters, the first deals with the milieu, the next with the early history according to native and European sources; then follow two chapters on the dawn of British influence; they are not always pleasant reading, for our treatment of the Sultan of Kedah was anything but creditable. The next two chapters cover the middle fifty years of the last century. This was a period of anarchy, brought to an end, though not at once, by the appointment of British Residents. Even now we have not learnt, as is evident from events in Southern Nigeria, the importance of having men who understand the natives, who speak their language and who respect their feelings. The same mistake was made in Malaysia, and one result of it was the murder of the Resident of Perak. It was not until the Residents were more in sympathy and had at their disposal forces strong enough to give effect to their wishes that order began to evolve out of chaos; but the interesting story must be read in detail to be appreciated. Not the least attractive portions of the work are the author's testimony to the virtues of the Chinese and his condemnation of the ordinary system of building railways in British colonies, which, in the Malay States, was happily, almost by accident, replaced by a rational method. The final chapter gives us the author's views on the future of the British colony with some more criticism of irrational methods, which will, we hope, be duly digested in high quarters and result in a reform of inept and expensive procedure.

LORD MILNER IN AFRICA

Lord Milner's Work in South Africa from its Commencement in 1897 to the Peace of Vereeniging in 1902. By W. BASIL WORSFOLD. (Murray, 15s. net.)

THIS book has been written at the wrong time. Four or five years ago, it would have been excellent journalism. Composed ten or twenty years hence in a quiet spirit, it might have been a piece of sound history. In this moment of transition it is neither journalism nor history, and it has the air of being hopelessly out of date. We do not quarrel with its conclusions. We find them merely inapposite. Its facts are unimpeachable, but familiar. Most of them may be found clearly set forth in Mr. E. B. Iwan-Müller's magnum opus, and we are not sure that any good purpose is served by their repetition.

Mr. Worsfold, then, has a twice-told tale to tell, and he tells it with becoming gravity. He does full justice to a great public servant. The tedious discussion of the last five years has immensely strengthened the hold which Lord Milner has upon the esteem of the people. We believe that henceforth no attempt to insult the man, who has done his duty "on the spot," will be successful. Such futile exhibitions of party rancour as disgraced England's treatment of Clive and Warren Hastings are not likely to be repeated, and Lord Milner stands as high to-day in the general regard as when, in 1897, he sailed for the Cape amid the cheers of all parties. Mr. Worsfold sums up in an excellent passage the qualities for which, ten years ago, Lord Milner was already eminent:

Of all the tributes of the farewell banquet [he writes], Sir William Harcourt's was closest to the life—"worthy of all praise and all affection." The quality of inspiring affection to which this impressive phrase bore witness was one which had made itself felt among the humblest of those who were fortunate enough to have been associated with Lord Milner in any public work. Long after Milner had left Egypt, the face of the Syrian or Coptic Effendi of the Finance Department in Cairo would light up at the chance mention of the genial Englishman who had once been his chief. . . . "He was so considerate": that was their excuse for retaining his name and personality among the pleasant memories of the past. But the other side of Milner's character, the power of "tenacious and inflexible resolution," of which Mr. Asquith spoke, was destined to be brought into play so prominently during the "eight dusky years" of his South African administration, that to the distant onlooker it came to be accepted as the characteristic quality of the man.

He himself declared, with excellent humour, that the praise lavished on him was excessive. It was a handsome balance, he thought, put to his credit, and it was not very long before he had to make a large draft upon it.

He could not hold his position in South Africa without incurring manifold unpopularity. His two dominant characteristics—independence and courage—are not such as easily make friends of opponents. Whatever course he thought right, that he pursued, for good or evil, with an inflexible singlemindedness. At times he differed from the Government at home, as he differed from Mr. Kruger's government in South Africa. But he always stated his own case with a clear determination. And his courage was such as no complication of difficult circumstances could daunt. It is impossible to read Mr. Worsfold's pages without admiring Lord Milner's invincible temper. When conciliation was no longer possible he steered a straight course, and it was not his fault that we did not gain a harbour of peace.

His own view of the war and of what led up to it was never better expressed than in a speech which he made during a brief sojourn in London in 1901:

Peace [said he] we could have had by self-effacement. We could have had it easily and comfortably on those lines. But we could not have held our own by any other methods than those which we have been obliged to adopt. I do not know whether I feel more inclined to laugh or to cry when I have to listen for the hundredth time to those dear delusions, the Utopian dogmatism that it only required a little more time, a little more patience, a little more tact, a little more meekness, a little more of all those gentle virtues of which I know I am so conspicuously devoid, in order to conciliate—to conciliate what? Panoplied hatred, insensate ambition, invincible ignorance. I fully believe that the time is coming—Heaven knows how we desire it to come quickly—when all the qualities of the most gentle and forbearing statesmanship will be called for, and ought to be applied to South Africa.

Within a year the time came, and peace was signed at Vereeniging. Lord Milner had won the goal of his policy—a lasting peace. But though peace was signed, the work of conciliation remained to be done, and this great work is outside the scope of Mr. Worsfold's book. Lord Milner was long a favourite mark for the extremists of the extreme faction. He was assailed by a violent vituperation, which was a marked contrast to the chorus of praise to which he left England. It is his peculiar merit that he was insensible alike to praise or blame. In all sincerity he did what he believed to be his duty, and it is for this reason that he stands to-day outside the rancour of politics, and that, though he belongs to the unpopular side, he speaks with an authority that Liberals and Tories alike acknowledge and respect.

A NATION'S LITERATURE

Hungarian Literature. By FREDERICK RIEDL. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THIS volume is a welcome addition to the valuable series of "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World," although it is by no means so original, in either conception or treatment, as the writer of the "Preface" believes.

The literature of Hungary should have a special interest for English readers because, apart from its intrinsic merits, its makers have always shown a strong partiality for British letters. The Preface states that Hungarian literature has been less influenced by the literature of other lands than that of any European nation, yet it is true that Shakespeare, Shelley, Burns, Byron, and a few British authors of later date, have been studied, translated and referred to familiarly by Magyar men of letters.

A considerable portion of the present work is devoted to the story of Hungarian literature in mediæval times, but beyond a few theological and legal fragments little appears to have survived. It has been acknowledged that no authors of repute existed in the country before the eighteenth century; it is, therefore, useless to try to resuscitate such forgotten lore. The translation of the Bible into Hungarian by Protestant reformers, on the eve of the seventeenth century; did more to preserve the vernacular than did all the laborious versifiers eulogised in this volume. Zrinyi's belauded epic, written about the middle of the seventeenth century, closed the attempt to create a national literature: scholars wrote in Latin, as did politicians, when they did not use German. Dr. Riedl terms this epoch of suspended animation "the Age of Decadence," and says it gave rise to the saying, "Hungary will be choked in its own fat"—which doubtless suggested Bismarck's notorious sarcasm.

A drastic reformation of the language started in the eighteenth century, and whether the cause of, or caused by, the nation's growing intellectuality, was contemporaneous with the birth of Hungarian literature. The advent of the famous poets—Vörösmarty, Petöfi, and Arany—of this golden age coincided with the appearance of the great political orators, Széchenyi, Kossuth, and Deák, as well as of a group of notable novelists, including Jósika, Eötvös, and Jókai. The dawn came just as German philosophers were predicting the disappearance of the Magyar language and nation; unfortunately, the pioneers of this uprising perished miserably by axe, or rope, or bullet, or by suicide, so that it is not surprising that Hungarian writers are addicted to descriptions of bloodshed and horror: they tell what experience has taught them. Their history contains enough of romance and terror to supply plots for all their poets and novelists.

The appearance of Vörösmarty's poetry, says Dr. Riedl, "ushered in the golden age of Hungarian literature," and it is often claimed that Vörösmarty was his country's first real poet. Neither his "great epics" nor his dramas, however, are as likely to maintain his popularity as are his charming lyrical and narrative poems. The characters of his plays do terrible deeds, breaking all laws "both human and divine"; and referring to the ferocious incidents of one of these tragedies, a contemporary truly termed it "a cannibal poem." Vörösmarty and his contemporaries translated various plays of Shakespeare, but it does not say much for the knowledge of Hungarian playgoers of those days that not only did stage managers pass off native dramas as by the British bard, but in order to attract audiences, they advertised Shakespeare's own plays as by Kotzebue!

The adventurous career of Petöfi, a greater poet than Vörösmarty or any other Hungarian, is told at length, and several specimens of his poems are given. Petöfi's short life was a poem: a poem with pathetic, tragic and even humorous incidents. No man ever lived who so completely put his life and thought into his poetry as did Petöfi, and no poet was ever so thoroughly typical of a nationality as was he of the Hungarian. An English version by Mr. Loew of his "Talpra Magyar," the national anthem, is given in this volume, as well as a rendering by Bowring of his prophetic lines on his own death upon the field of battle.

An account of Arany, whose biography by Dr. Riedl is a well-known book, is followed by descriptive sketches of later writers and their works. An interesting section, "The Novel," affords a synopsis of the Hungarian writers of romance, the only kind of Magyar prose composition which is really known outside Hungary itself. Gvadányi is the first in this class calling for special notice, and he not so much because of the merit of his vulgar versified narrative, "Paul Ronto," as because it is believed to be the story of the writer's own adventures. Eötvös, next in point of time, was a man of lofty and philanthropical aims, but his novels being "written with a purpose" are, as is usual in such cases, gross exaggerations of society. Other novelists are passed in review and their works analysed, but beyond those of Jókai, none are known out of Hungary. Jókai's works are, of course, known throughout the civilised world, and if popularity alone were a criterion of merit, his name should stand amongst the greatest in literature.

THE EMPRESS

The Life of the Empress Eugénie. By JANE T. STODDART. (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE Empress Eugénie has probably been more written about and more discussed, both in public and in private, than any other woman of her generation. The case of Queen Victoria is no parallel, for, from more than one point of view, our late Sovereign was like that happy nation which needs no historian.

Miss Jane T. Stoddart quotes from something like two hundred authorities, and quite a proportion of these actually deal with the Empress's enigmatical personality. But it should at once be said that this is the first volume in which a serious attempt has been made to give a complete and authentic account of the remarkable woman who seems to have impressed so diversely those with whom she came in contact during the years when she helped to make history. Clara Tschudi, the clever Norwegian writer who has constituted herself the analyst of feminine Royalty, merely wrote an impressionist sketch, and filled in a background of her own views and theories, which, it may be observed, differed in almost every point from the judgment formed by distinguished Frenchmen and Frenchwomen who had had opportunities of seeing the Empress Eugénie during the 'fifties and 'sixties; that is, when she was at the zenith of her fame and power.

Miss Stoddart has gone to work in a different way: she has brought together a mass of practically new material, and she also disperses much of the rather foolish and trivial legendary lore now gathered round the story of the Empress's childhood and youth.

It has been the fashion to represent the beautiful young woman whom Napoleon III. chose to make his Empress within little more than a year of his own elevation to the purple, as having come out of a more or less innocent Bohemia. Stories are still told of how Madame de Montijo and her younger daughter drifted about, from capital to capital, making acquaintances here, and making friends there, but regarded everywhere with suspicion as well as admiration and curiosity.

Nothing can be further from the truth than any of these tales and old half-scandals. Through her father the young Comtesse de Téba was descended from a long line of Spanish grandees: and the fact that he had contracted more or less of a mésalliance with a girl who was descended from the Scotch Kirkpatricks, was of small account, the more so that Madame de Montijo, from the day of her marriage, proved that she was quite able to hold her own with her husband's relations.

As was the fashion in those days, Eugénie and her sister were educated in a French convent, and after the death of their father they returned to Spain, and, with their mother, became people of importance at the Spanish Court. Washington Irving saw them about this time, and incidentally observed that the Comtesse de Montijo was "the leader of the ton." As late as 1847—that is, only five years before her younger daughter became Empress of the French—the Countess was what we should call Mistress of the Robes to Queen Isabella, and her eldest child was already the wife of the Duke of Berwick and Alba.

The fact that Eugénie de Montijo was beautiful, brilliant, and, what counts for so much more, fascinating, undoubtedly made her the butt of a good deal of ill-natured remark and discussion. The Court of Isabella of Spain was scarcely the place where a careful mother would wish to see her unmarried daughter permanently established, and Madame de Montijo seems to have spent a portion of each year in Paris and in London. Louis Napoleon is said to have first met his future wife at Holland House; be that as it may, he was certainly thrown much in her company during the winter of 1851-2—just before the coup d'état. But we have sufficient proof that at that time the French President had but little thought of marriage, and that what thought he had turned to the importance of making a dynastic alliance. After the coup d'état he made advances to more than one Princess, and notably to Queen Victoria's half-sister, Princess Feodore.

Mortified by the refusals which were everywhere made to his suit, he seems to have suddenly turned his mind to the beautiful woman—she was no longer a girl—whom he met in the familiar company of such important people as the Rothschilds, the La Rochefoucaulds, and the Cowleys—that is, the British Ambassador and Ambassadress. How far Madame de Montijo and her daughter intrigued and planned the marriage will never be known. Louis Napoleon's manner to women might be described as alternately caressing and impertinent, according to the taste of the onlooker. He never wore his heart upon his sleeve, and it may be doubted whether any action of Mademoiselle de Montijo could have influenced him in so very important a matter as that of his marriage. Up to the day, even up to the hour, when the betrothal was officially announced, it was openly said that the utmost the Emperor would offer Mademoiselle de Montijo was a morganatic marriage.

The story of the next seventeen years has often been told in innumerable documents and in private letters which have since seen the light. Miss Stoddart makes it quite clear that the Empress Eugénie was in many ways superior, both as regards breeding and innate nobility of character, to those who formed her Court. The Legitimist nobility, with a few exceptions, did not rally round the Emperor and his Consort, and the latter had not the authority needed to keep in check the turbulent bohemian, and it must be admitted, sometimes very vicious elements which composed the entourage of Napoleon III. Thus, the Empress was always far more popular with the peasantry, and with the small bourgeoisie, than she was with those men and women who composed her Court.

The question which has interested, and will continue to interest, historians more and more is, of course, the part played by the Empress Eugénie in the various political events which precipitated the downfall of the Second Empire. By a curious irony she happens to have been the only feminine Regent, since Anne of Austria, who has held even nominal rule of France, and the Empress at no time of her life had a Mazarin to guide her steps. It is known that she desired a considerable rôle in public affairs. This becomes apparent even in Queen Victoria's diary written as long ago as 1858, and it was in the year following, that is in the May of 1859, that the Empress, for the first time, became Regent. For something like thirty years, she was credited with having more or less engineered the Franco-German War, but what a witty judge remarked—"Truth will out even in an affidavit"—is also true of those main facts which go to the structure of history. The Empress has been permitted to see the part which Bismarck played not only in 1870 but with regard to the Austro-Prussian War unmasked, and now no serious or honest seeker of historical truth can any longer suppose that Napoleon III.'s Consort played any real rôle in the great and brilliant intrigue which led to her husband's downfall. In so far as she counted at all, she was but a pawn in the mighty hands of the German Chancellor.

In some ways Fate served the Empress very unkindly during the memorable hours which followed after the fall of Sedan became known in Paris. The Regent had no one to turn to for advice or help except a group of foreign diplomatists whose only object was to save her life, but her action would have been more statesman-like and more heroic had she made up her mind to remain at her post, at any rate till some more dignified escort than that of the excellent American dentist, Dr. Evans, could have been found for her. The best proof of how her conduct was regarded by her contemporaries and by France is shown by a significant note, one of the most interesting and illuminating passages in Miss Stoddart's work:

The motives of Metternich and Negri in thus speeding the parting sovereign were strongly suspected by the Buonapartists. Was it in the interests of Austria and Italy that the downfall of the Empire should be consummated? Were there compromising promises, offers of aid in certain contingencies, which would all be forgotten when the Regent was out of the Tuileries?

Be that as it may, certain it is that the two diplomatists cast the unfortunate woman and her lady-in-waiting adrift after they had placed her in a cab. The Empress's action went far to discredit her immediate past, for once the Regent was known to have left Paris the mob insisted on peacefully invading the Tuileries, and wonderful stories were told of the trunks full of real lace, the hundreds of splendid gowns, the dozens of coloured parasols, and of the thousand and one costly trifles the sight of which exasperated those who knew what it was to go shoeless and hungry. It was significant of the peaceful disposition of the Parisian populace that no looting was done during this strange passage of the crowd through the Imperial private rooms, and we have it on the testimony of Rochefort that when he and Gambetta went to the Tuileries on September 5, they found on the table a case of jewels and in the table-drawer 50,000 francs in gold.

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY

The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. iv.: The Thirty Years' War. Edited by A. W. WARD, G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES. (Cambridge University Press, 16s.net.)

THE fourth volume of the history planned by the late Lord Acton is labelled "The Thirty Years' War," and contains twenty-seven chapters on different subjects. Many of these essays are excellent and some of them deal with the subject indicated by the title: others are not up to the standard, and some have no apparent connection with the theme. The editors of the work appear to be conscious that their net has been widely cast, and they quote in their preface the words of Gustavus Adolphus, written in 1628, that "all the wars that are on foot in Europe have been fused together, and have become a single war." The preface then makes it clear that the great English Civil War ran its course side by side with the last years of the continental conflict, without at any point intersecting it. In spite of this, in the new volume the history of the Civil War in England is sandwiched in, and it is difficult to say what, if any, idea determined the arrangement of the chapters when this comprehensive scheme had been planned.

The history of the Thirty Years War is a long record of marching and countermarching in politics as well as in the field, and would be dreary reading had it not been the age of great men. With Gustavus Adolphus, Tilly, Turenne, Wallenstein, Richelieu and Mazarin on the stage it would be impossible to think the period dull.

In its origin and effects also the war is one of great interest, whether its origin be regarded in the airy phrase uttered on an memorable occasion by Lord Beaconsfield, as "a war of succession for a duchy near Schleswig-Holstein," or as the inevitable result of deep-rooted religious differences not to be settled by ambiguous parchment compromises, or as the outburst of the storm brewed by militant Calvinism, or finally as the opportunity cautiously prepared and still more cautiously allowed to mature by the farsighted statesmanship of France.

As for its far-reaching effects, it is enough here to point out that in 1880 Bismarck told Lord Granville that "Germany had not yet recovered from the effects of the Thirty and of the Seven Years' Wars." But in this book the relation of the struggle in England surpasses the story of the great continental war, just as to most English readers the interest of the former is greater than that of the latter.

In the narration of foreign affairs, however, there are many redeeming features, and conspicuous among them are the excellent chapters, by Mr. Stanley Leathes, on Richelieu and Mazarin, which compensate for many pages written in some cases by authors who we venture to think would not have been included by Lord Acton.

Dr. Ward's chapter on Gustavus Adolphus is dull, and on the military operations—though writers have tackled the subject with skill and knowledge—he is distressingly brief. Half a dozen lines on the great soldier's army conclude with the remark that extreme mobility was a leading principle of Gustavus's method of warfare. Dr. Ward tells us nothing of how that mobility was obtained, by the shortening of the pike, the reduction of defensive armour, the abolition of the musket rest, the reduction of ten ranks to six, and the massing of pikes and "shot" in separate bodies. Nor do we notice any mention of tactical innovations such as the arrangement of squadrons of cavalry interspersed with platoons of musketeers, a device which did not die out until after the battle of Almanza. This is essentially not a military history of the Thirty Years' War, though English affairs come off better. Professor Firth, however, to our sorrow, contributes but one chapter, on Anarchy and the Restoration (1659-60), and that is as short as it is admirable. No one knows more of Cromwell's army than he does, but Dr. G. W. Prothero and Colonel E. M. Lloyd prove to be efficient substitutes. Dr. J. R. Tanner, again, is not the obvious writer to deal with the navy of the Commonwealth and the first Dutch War, but his chapter is quite adequate. It was originally hoped that Dr. S. R. Gardiner would deal in this history with those subjects which he had so thoroughly mastered, but it was not to be, and those who took up the work were necessarily at a disadvantage. Mr. John Morley, presumably, was too much occupied with affairs of State to contribute, and Mr. Fortescue too busy with his magnum opus.

Literature obtains some little hearing in this collection of essays, and Mr. Clutton Brock on the fantastic school of English poetry is entertaining and instructive. Professor Émile Boutroux contributes a chapter on Descartes and Cartesianism, which has possibly some more logical position, as it deals with a phenomenon more or less associated with the course and issue of the War. But whereas Milton and the great classical age of French literature are to be dealt with in a new volume, we have in this several pages about Pascal, who was born in 1623, so that the fruitful years of his short life do not fall within the period of the Thirty Years' War. This criticism would be pedantic were it not for the fact that legitimate subjects are practically ignored and the sense of proportion thereby spoiled. The War, whatever else it was, was a religious war, and one of its results was the appearance in Germany of some very beautiful hymns: the history notes the fact and dismisses it in a few words. As the period, during which a whole generation grew up in ignorance, is one of the most dismal in the history of Germany it is not to be wondered at that its literature calls for little comment. All the more noteworthy was the production of religious lyrics by Jesuit and Protestant writers: Paul Gerhardt is mentioned in this volume only as being pre-eminent among these, which is apparently considered sufficient notice of the man who, next to Luther, was the most gifted and popular hymn-writer of the Lutheran Church. Johann Rist, Joachim Neander, and the wife of the Great Elector find no place at all. None of these writers' hymns can be compared with "Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott," which Heine described as the Marseillaise hymn of the Reformation, but many of them are as beautiful as they are famous.

The index is imposingly long, but appears, on being tested, to be inadequate. Nor, it must be confessed, is the classified bibliography of one hundred and fifty pages of much use to the student unless he is given some idea of what books are useful. One of the few entries which show any form of discrimination is that of the Memoirs of a Cavalier, where the authorship is given as (? Defoe, Daniel), and the note added that "the author professes to have served under Gustavus Adolphus till his death." In this case the hint that the work is fiction would probably deter the student from looking at the book, and he would accordingly miss one of the most picturesque and vivid accounts of war that has ever been written. The bibliography does, however, contain a few valuable pages about the "original sources." It does not pretend to be exhaustive, and we venture to suggest that from English and Foreign service reviews, such as the Revue de Cavalerie, many valuable critical articles might be added: so far as we can see these sources have not been tapped. There are no maps in the book.

DESPOT AND HUMANIST

Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta, Lord of Rimini. A Study of a Fifteenth-Century Italian Despot. By EDWARD HUTTON. (Dent, 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. HUTTON takes the reader into his confidence on his last page, in a few self-explanatory paragraphs which a simpler man would have placed as a preface to the book. He has set himself to recount fact as if it were fiction, to write a work which, without being either a historical romance or a scientific monograph, shall employ all the qualities of fidelity and accuracy necessary to the latter in order to produce the pictorial effect and vital interest more usually aimed at by the writer of novels. As a means of arriving at this result he has invented a contemporary of his hero who shall tell the tale for him—Pietro Sanseverino, the friend of Leon Battista Alberti and Pico della Mirandola, as eminently a man of the new school as Sigismondo was a survivor of old-time barbarism. The idea is ingenious and gives rise to some pages of interesting reflection and comment by the old humanist in the course of his narrative. Yet in this very scheme lies also the initial weakness of the book. For the disparity in the characters of Sigismondo and Sanseverino makes it almost impossible to imagine or believe that there existed between the two men that amount of sympathy which would enable one to write of the other as he does in these pages. Sigismondo had one good quality and one only, physical bravery. He was, as Mr. Hutton admits, "without morality, without honour, without purity or justice," and (what would assuredly have rendered him even more loathsome in the eyes of a Sanseverino than the lack of these qualities) he was entirely wanting in the feelings of kindness and pity and well-nigh incapable of any personal attachment. He was an excellent mercenary soldier, but a savage in every fibre of his being. He seems an impersonation of the mediæval knight as described by some writer with an intensely modern mind: "He was the best knight who could commit the cruellest murders and the foulest adulteries by the most cunning means." It is true that he was to some extent a patron of artists and himself the author of certain very uncultivated verses. But could this have been a claim on the affection of Sanseverino strong enough to overpower the repulsion which the rest of the despot's life must have aroused in the heart of the gentle scholar? We are told that Sanseverino's chief quality was innocence of heart. But the old man's character must have been simple truth exaggerated to simplicity indeed if he thought that this lustful and arrogant lord of a small dominion deserved any credit from scholars and artists because he took so much interest in the construction and decoration of the Rocca and the Temple. For one building was to secure his possessions to himself and his bastards, while the other was intended as a boast for ever of the glory of himself and of Madonna Isotta, one of his many mistresses, subsequently the last of his wives. The only sympathetic biographer for a lord like Sigismondo would have been a man of his own ideas and nature—say one of his captains—one who should combine the spirit in which Cellini writes of himself with that of some of our old ballads describing the bloody deeds of their heroes. Such a chronicler would have related the worst of Sigismondo's doings with zest and in detail, instead of passing rapidly over them with a shudder, and, whenever possible, casting doubts on the truth of the stories. Untroubled by the ethical sense, he would have seen only the glorious side of his master's life; his interest therein would have been obvious and reasonable; he would not have had to fall back, in order to justify himself, on the somewhat lame excuse: "I loved him . . . because he was beautiful, fearless and unfortunate."

And yet we are glad that Mr. Hutton did not choose so completely suitable a biographer as his mouthpiece. In the first place it would not have suited his style; for one so naturally given to destruction could not have had that delight in creation which is necessary to the making of an artist—even an artist in words alone. Then, again, he would not have seen the difference between the spirit of old, which in Sigismondo's time was beginning to pass away, and the new spirit already making itself felt, the spirit of humanism, depending on reverence for antiquity and beauty, love of nature and recognition of the value of simple things; and we should consequently have missed that wider outlook on life which adds interest to the narrative as we have it. And he certainly would not have understood and made friends with Leon Battista Alberti, and here we should perhaps have been deprived of more than at any other point; for the descriptions of that scholar's coming to Rimini and of his conversations with the teller of the tale are among the most genially imagined and best executed parts of the book. We prefer to hear the story from old Sanseverino, and forgive his unreasonable affection for Sigismondo, partly because the scholar's personality is more interesting than that of his patron, and partly because his genial, tolerant, gentle yet enthusiastic attitude to men and life, appearing every now and again in his comments on what he relates, goes a long way towards tempering the disgust inevitably aroused by the sordid recital of intrigue and brutality which is put into his mouth.

AMERICAN BEGINNINGS

The History of the United States. By ELROY M. AVERY. Vols. i. and ii. (Cleveland: The Burrows Brothers Company, $6.25 per vol.)

THERE is no sign of the old prejudice against "our hereditary foe" which is said to colour text-books of American history, in the first two volumes of "The History of the United States," which Mr. E. M. Avery has just given to the world. It is a monumental work; probably the most comprehensive undertaking of the kind ever attempted. It was begun twenty years ago. It is to consist of twelve volumes. The two already issued number respectively four hundred and four hundred and fifty pages, copiously illustrated. Mr. Avery describes the history as "an attempt to tell the story of the men and measures that have made the United States what it is." It is intended to meet the needs of readers "of general culture rather than those of professional historical students." For the latter, however, statistics and a bibliographical appendix at the end of each volume supply the necessary references. In this work, which is dedicated to the United States and her people, Mr. Avery has aimed at and achieved "readability," and at the same time there is little doubt that this will be the standard record of United States history.

The published volumes carry the story of America down to the confederation of the New England States in the middle of the seventeenth century, and therefore cover that section of the American pedigree which Americans regard with greatest reverence. The narrative of the "Pilgrims" is given with a wealth of detail enlivened by a recognition of its occasional humour. One thing stands out prominent in all this story of religious strife, persecution and heroism, and that is the universal acceptance by all parties of the doctrine of intolerance. The persecuted Puritans and Separatists, one imagines, must have pitied themselves much more on practical than on philosophic grounds. The fact that they were "under dogs" probably troubled them more than the fact that they were the victims of a denial of the right to freedom of conscience. For this was a right which, despite much talk of "liberty of conscience," was at that day never conceded either in old or new England. The Dutch republicans indeed, were far in advance of England in their conceptions of civil and religious liberty, and it is strange that the Puritans, many of whom had taken refuge in the Netherlands before settling in America, should have imbibed so little of the Dutch wisdom. Yet it must be admitted that the Separatists, to whose ranks the "Pilgrim Fathers" belonged, were less intolerant than the Puritans, whilst the "Fathers" themselves were in this respect almost without reproach. "Heretics" suffered far worse things at the hands of the Puritans in Massachusetts than at the hands of the Separatists in Plymouth. The Separatists, on the other hand, received the hardest usage of any of the victims of persecution in Queen Elizabeth's reign. Two prominent Separatists were hanged and died praying for England and the Queen. Execution, banishment and forfeiture were meted out liberally to the hated sect. When, at the accession of James I., three hundred Puritan clergymen "were silenced," the Separatists realised that England could no longer be their home. Already in a naïve petition rejected by Elizabeth the early Separatists had prayed to be allowed to sail for the province of Canada where they hoped not only "to worship God as we are in conscience persuaded," but, "in time also greatly to annoy the bloody and persecuting Spaniard about the Bay of Mexico."

The Pilgrims first took refuge at Amsterdam, and it is curious that their enmity to the Church of England seems to have relaxed even before they set sail for a more distant land. In fact their life on the Continent was not much happier than it had been in England. They left Amsterdam for Leyden to escape contention with other bodies of English religious refugees. In Leyden they were sore pressed by poverty. The profanation of the Sabbath shocked them. There was danger of corruption by inter-marriage. The Government of the Dutch Republic, anxious to please an allied sovereign, betrayed their own principles and stopped the Pilgrim printing-presses. Finally in 1617 envoys were sent to England asking for lands in Northern Virginia and an assurance of religious liberty. With the Church from which the Separatists had professed in England an absolute severance, they now affirmed concurrence, and a desire for spiritual communion with its members. The poor Pilgrims received an informal promise from James, and very hard terms from the London Company which contracted to carry them to the New World. They suffered a nine-weeks tempestuous voyage and were landed, not in Virginia, for which territory they had a patent, but at the harbour now known as "Provincetown." Here they framed their celebrated Mayflower Compact. In this they described themselves as "loyal subjects of our dread sovereign Lord King James, . . . Defender of the Faith." The Pilgrims, one not unreasonably infers, had a sense of humour. But for the fact that she had a fraudulent captain, the Speedwell might have been as famous a name in American history as that of her sister ship, the Mayflower. The two ships bearing the Pilgrims set sail together from Southampton, where the refugees had gathered themselves from Holland and divers parts of England. After Land's End had been passed the captain of the Speedwell declared that the ship was sinking, and she put back to Plymouth, where she was given up. The Mayflower had also put into Plymouth, and she set out again burdened with a remnant of the Speedwell's passengers. Altogether the Mayflower pilgrims consisted of thirty-four men, eighteen wives, twenty boys, eight girls, three maid-servants and nineteen men-servants. Of these less than a dozen were of the original party which hazardously escaped from Scrooby in Lincolnshire to Amsterdam. Among the chief men of the Pilgrims were John Carver, who was chosen Governor, Bradford, Winslow, Elder Brewster, and Captain Myles Standish.

Twenty-three years after its foundation New Plymouth entered into a league with Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Haven, and from that time its inhabitants lost something of their early manliness and independence. Most of the "Fathers" had passed away, and Plymouth in the course of time became infected by the intolerance of their Puritan neighbours. The treatment of the first Quakers in Massachusetts best illustrates this unpleasant feature of early American history. Quaker missionaries were imprisoned on arrival. Both men and women were stripped and whipped. Banished and returning Quakers were punished with amputation of the ears and boring of the tongue with a red-hot iron. The result of all this was to make converts, and as a final measure the death penalty was enacted for Quakers returning from banishment. Two men and one woman—Mary Dyer—were hanged. But after the execution of the blameless Lедdra Charles II. intervened. In a memorable order he forbade further proceedings against the Quakers. When, in the following year, the unstable monarch light-heartedly approved their persecution, the Puritans had grown tired of it.

Americans are justified in feeling for the Pilgrims and the early Plymouth community an especial veneration. It is not merely that their part in the building of the United States was historically important and pictorially impressive: the men themselves have left behind them a memory more fragrant than was bequeathed by any of the bold spirits that came before or after them to the conquest of a new world. They followed simply a great ideal and were temperate in the hour of attainment. They were loyal to the land from which they were exiles, and there is pathos in the steadfast honesty with which they toiled in poverty to discharge their debts to fraudulent and extortionate debtors in a distant country. The royalist refugees introduced the practices of feudalism; the Puritans preserved bigotry, and the Netherlands disgraced European civilisation by a massacre of the natives. The Pilgrims did none of these things. They were content to find and cherish liberty.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE'S LETTERS

Sir Thomas Lawrence's Letter-Bag. Edited by GEORGE SOMES LAYARD. (Allen, 15s. net.)

IF, as must be supposed, this selection from Lawrence's correspondence is a fair sample of the bulk, Mr. Layard cannot be too highly praised for the patience with which he has accomplished the task of boring his way through the "five immense volumes" placed at his disposal. That the correspondence of so fashionable a portrait-painter should be devoid of any interest whatever is of course impossible, and in these letters there is a good deal that is valuable as well as interesting; but in a collection of purely personal documents something more is expected than what is valuable or interesting; or, it may be, something less: something, at any rate, that kindles a feeling of satisfaction in the reader at having been admitted not merely into the presence, but to some sort of intimacy with one whose ideas and feelings are capable of impressing his own.

It must be confessed that in the whole two hundred and forty pages taken up with these letters, there is singularly little that is calculated to inspire anything in the nature of enthusiasm, either for the painter or his work. "It may be imagined," Mr. Layard writes in his preface, "that my purpose in undertaking the task of editing Sir Thomas Lawrence's correspondence is to whitewash his character. I deny that it requires any such treatment." One might as well whitewash a lily. A dash of colour, indeed, would have served Sir Thomas much better, could it possibly have been applied; and one almost wishes he could have been discovered in the act of painting Fanny Kemble, on the sly, as the sleeping nymph. Mrs. Grundy, dear lady, is not nearly as squeamish on matters of art as is pretended, or she would not love Romney, Hogarth, and Rowlandson as she does from the bottom of her heart. That she should be a little shocked at the lamentable tendency to extremes that is sometimes observable in the French schools is no proof that she has any more patience with excesses in the other direction, and if Mr. Layard could have exhibited more of the manly humour which Lawrence surely must have possessed, and curtailed the repetition of his undoubted virtues a little, the result would certainly have been more exhilarating. Surely there must among the five immense volumes have been more letters like that beginning "My dear Madam,—Whilst my servant was this morning putting on my Cannon Curls and dressing my Toupee." Mr. Layard's only comment on this letter is, "We next find Lawrence in one of his lighter moods"; what a pity that he has not given us a few specimens of others, instead of for instance, two whole letters describing the death of one of his servants! "There is nothing pleasanter to contemplate in Lawrence's character," is Mr. Layard's comment on these, "than the unostentatious sympathy shown by him for his dependants and persons in humble condition." Is there not? Then why publish his correspondence? However laudable a characteristic, especially in an age when "gentlemen were requested and servants ordered" to keep off the grass in a public garden, the bare mention of it would have amply sufficed.

With the letters addressed to Lawrence the case is much the same, and although the list of his correspondents includes the names of the Duke of Wellington, Canning, Joseph Farington, Wilkie, Etty, Mrs. Siddons, and Miss Farren, the aggregate of enjoyable reading in them is singularly small. Mrs. Kemble's letter from Scotland is an exception to the general dullness, in which she asks, "How do you like the lighting our Theatre with Gass?" (1817), and one of Miss Farren's is at least amusing:

Mr. Lawrence, you will think me the most troublesome of human beings, but indeed it is not my own fault; they tease me to death about this picture and insist upon my writing to you. One says it is so thin in the figure that you might blow it away, another that it looks broke off in the middle; in short, you must make it a little fatter, at all events diminish the bend you are so attached to, even if it makes the picture look ill; for the owner of it is quite distressed about it at present. I am shocked to tease you and daresay you wish me and the portrait in the fire—but as it was impossible to appease the cries of my friends I must beg you to excuse me.

Then there is Farington's letter advising Lawrence about the proposals for the Irish Academy, which is of the utmost interest, and which certainly deserves to have been given in full. As it is, the casual inquirer must take Mr. Layard's word for it, so to speak, that there is nothing further of historical interest contained in it: nor is any indication vouchsafed in the preface as to who possesses this correspondence, or of any where it may be seen.

Of Lawrence's art it is not necessary to say more in this place than is occasioned by the embellishment of the book by nineteen specimens of it. With the exception of the frontispiece, a portrait of Mrs. Villiers Layard, it is difficult to imagine how any of these, typical as they may be of Sir Thomas's best work, could ever have secured him a European reputation as a great portrait-painter. It may be that our present vision is distorted, and that future ages will find excellences in Lawrence that are wanting in the works of Reynolds, Gainsborough, or Hoppner; but it is certain that there are few portraits or drawings of man, woman or child by Lawrence that are suitable (we will not say fit) to be hung side by side with the work of any of the more considerable painters of the British school. The contrast is too painful.

By no means the least interesting part of the book is Elizabeth Croft's "Recollections" of Lawrence, which occupy the last fifty pages. These constitute a very pleasant little memoir. It has not been published before, and would hardly be worth printing as a separate book, so that its inclusion in the present volume is a great benefit.

GOD AND MAN

Synthetica. Being Meditations Epistemological and Ontological. By S. S. LAURIE, LL.D. 2 vols. (Longmans, 21s. net.)

PHILOSOPHY, at least in relation to the ultimate problems, is strangely temperamental. As a man is, so he thinks. Dr. Laurie doubtless has something of this in his mind when, quoting a passage from Amiel in which the latter gives expression to a nebulous if picturesque pantheism, he disposes of it by characterising it as "the utterance of a religious mystic in whom personality was weak." Dr. Laurie had the advantage, in making this criticism, of knowing Amiel's life and character as Amiel himself has given them to us. We have not the same advantage in interpreting the metaphysic of Dr. Laurie: but, if it be allowable to work backwards from the metaphysic to the man, we can hardly be mistaken in seeing behind "Synthetica" a man in whom an insistent sense of personal aliveness and a deep-seated moral conviction are dominant characteristics. It is these that would seem to have given to Dr. Laurie's metaphysic its distinctive note.

Of the first volume, consisting of a critical examination of knowledge, we had something to say in our issue of September 8. To-day we are concerned only with the second volume, which applies the principles reached in the course of the earlier epistemological analysis to the solution of some of the ultimate questions concerning God and man. The volume is a lengthy one—it runs to some four hundred pages—and there is in it not a little repetition, due presumably to the fact that it embodies lectures delivered to an audience who had not the first volume before them.

God, to Dr. Laurie, is more than a mere centre of unity within which differences are reconciled. He is active, generating. He is a Will-dialectic, who "purposely determines" Himself. He is a deliberately creative, and, so far, self-conscious Spirit. If we may not say that He is a person (and, for all his robustness, Dr. Laurie seems to shrink from that) we must at least regard Him as Personality.

And one form of God's energy—the form within which our interest lies—is that of manifesting, indeed we may say realising, Himself in an Other—in man. "God needs man," Dr. Laurie is not afraid to say—in the sense that God lives in and through the free activity of this Other whom He has projected from Himself. God is, on this view, evolving Himself; and to this process of evolution we, as free agents, are real contributors—"contending with chaos along with God." "Freedom," he writes, "of each and all is the method of God."

For this freedom and independent worth of the individual we have been, indeed, prepared by the first volume. Already there we were offered Negation as a metaphysical principle guaranteeing the reality and independence of the part as against the whole: and it seems to be on an appeal to this principle that Dr. Laurie largely rests his claim for the real independence of man as against God. He spells Negation with a capital N: and perhaps that is the least that he could do for it, having in view the work he puts upon it. But we may be pardoned for questioning whether the mere logical conception of negation (or Otherness) can actually carry all the weight of positive significance that Dr. Laurie would have it carry. Otherness, after all, except for one who starts (as Dr. Laurie does) possessed of a conviction of the independence of the individual soul as, in the fullest sense, an originating force, does not carry with it freedom. This step, from otherness to independence, is one to which more contributes than pure epistemology. This is a reflection which a perusal of Dr. Laurie's book suggests.

For him certainly negation has to be accepted as in some sense a positive force. "It is not simply a device whereby the rays that emanate from the Central Sun are differenced from one another: it blocks the free course of those rays." Such a principle is indeed one of which God must take account: a principle which, in Dr. Laurie's own words, "is not to be trifled with." Imperfection and evil derive from it: and they are real. God is limited by man's freedom; and the official recognition of that freedom in metaphysics is just negation. As Dr. Laurie frankly puts it, "The Negation in the individual (popularly called the Devil) has been too potent for man: and for God also, it would seem, on this plane of His Evolution of Himself."

Of course all the old difficulties meet us. Is God finite, it will be at once asked, if He be limited by the free individuality of man? Dr. Laurie is alive to this as a difficulty; and he seeks, apparently, to escape from it, as others have sought before him, by insisting that God is, negation notwithstanding, infinite, "because His limitations are within Himself." Well, it may be necessary to cling to both sides of the contradiction—to the real power of the individual to "defy" God on the one hand, and to the Infiniteness of God on the other; but in that case we must at least be prepared to admit that it is a contradiction. A "struggling" God—and that is what Dr. Laurie's God is—is a God, certainly, whose infinitude seems to be inadequately secured in the mere fact that His limitations are somehow within Himself. Is that indeed a genuinely thinkable conception—the conception, that is, of a limitation which is a real limitation, and yet entirely within, and from, oneself? "God," says Dr. Laurie, in one of his striking phrases, "is a Spirit, but a Spirit in difficulty." And the struggle and contradiction which are in God's life show themselves within the individual. No doubt from one point of view it is true to represent the struggle as between God and man: as one in which man defies, and in some sense defeats, his God. But from another point of view it may, with scarcely less of truth, be represented as a struggle within the individual man of two opposed forces—the Positive, in Dr. Laurie's language, and the negative. The idea or essence, in which the truth of the individual may be said to reside, is the Positive element: and that is God. And this Positive element is hampered and thwarted by the negative element. Nor is victory, it would seem, always with the idea.

"Were the affirmation [essence or idea] in each individual powerful enough to subdue the negation, the world would cease to be a system of individuals, and present itself as the easy placid-flowing stream of a one Divine Life." And that, in Dr. Laurie's theory, the world certainly is not. God is no doubt always there, immanent as idea: but He does not force Himself on man. He is present, but not as interfering. It is part of the scheme of things, Dr. Laurie is fond of repeating, that God should be taken by man—appropriated, that is, by a free act of will.

And yet Dr. Laurie's heart seems to fail him at times before the notion of the Positive as finally incompetent before the negative. Otherwise he could hardly write "spite of the resistance of the negative to God as idea, it is overpowered by the affirmation, and transformed into an ordered, reasoned vehicle of the idea, in so far as this is compatible with negation and individua." For one has heard so much, both in this volume and in the other, of Negation and Imperfection and "Cosmic Sin" as realities, and of God and the system as only "on the way," that one is disconcerted at finding the power of the individual to defy God treated, as it here is, as barely more than an illusion. Nor is the situation materially bettered by the effort to preserve to the individual a certain region within which the negation may disport itself and play at independence, but to which definite limits are set. Dr. Laurie seems sometimes to imagine that he can by this simple device satisfy both claimants. "God," he writes, "is content to know (if we may so speak) that in the affirmation, essence, or idea, the nature and limits and possibilities of the individual are fixed. There is in each a 'thus far and no farther' in the fact of its distinctive idea." And elsewhere he says: "The important thing to emphasise here is that each individuum, while held bound to the throne of God by the immanent idea in it—the divine affirmation—is set free in so far as it is a concrete individuate to work its own brute will within the limits of its nature, whatever that may be." Under this conception, the kind of activity is fixed for each individual by his nature; and only the particular activities are "fluent and unstable." But does this satisfy any one who is genuinely concerned for the freedom of the individual? Does it not emasculate that very conception of Negation upon which Dr. Laurie's metaphysic seems so largely to depend?

It seems perhaps ungenerous to press too hardly on a metaphysic which is at grip with the ultimate problem of Freedom: for we all know that to be a problem to any solution of which we can more easily offer criticism than find a substitute. But ignoring difficulties helps no one: and we cannot ourselves feel that the tendency which shows itself now and again in Dr. Laurie's book to limit the power of individual resistance by the Idea or Positive Nature is really consistent with his earnest endeavour to preserve for man a freedom which shall be genuine.

There is one other aspect of God's relation to man which is characteristic of Dr. Laurie, and to which we wish to-day to draw attention. God, for him, is not revealed in intelligence merely, but at least as effectively in feeling and emotion. "It is the feeling of God not the recognition of the fact of God that is the sole foundation of the religious life." And again—"We 'know' God in His creative aspects alone; but we also, and chiefly, 'feel' Him as Infinite Being close to our inner selves." Or once more—"It is through feeling not intellect that we, mere units of Being finally commune with Universal Being, the Ultimate Reality."

We catch in this last passage a note of mysticism which is by no means uncharacteristic. Natural Realism has indeed points in common with mysticism. Dr. Laurie recognises this himself. For him, as for the mystic, the ground of the actual is Unconditioned Being. And this Being because, relatively to the determined with which we are in contact, unconditioned, and, relatively to the actual, mere possibility, is just for that reason "unknowable." One may be tempted to ask how, or in what sense, we are to conceive of the source of all things as Potentiality merely. The starting-point of every process in which a potentiality passes into an actuality must after all, as Aristotle loved to insist, be itself an actuality: and in that sense the end must be in the beginning. Dr. Laurie is not, of course, blind to this. He tells us that "we may not say that that is Nothing which is Fons omnium, or that that is inert which is the Source of all activity." But though he reminds us of that, it is still on the ground of its character as a possible as opposed to an actual, an unconditioned as opposed to a conditioned, that he rests the essential unknowableness of Ultimate Being. And it is for that reason that the medium of communication with God as Absolute is, for Dr. Laurie, not thought, but feeling. In the beginning we feel Him Sub-rationally: in the end we feel Him Supra-rationally. Intelligence, and all the process of our reflective experience, do but fill the space which lies between these two forms of Feeling-communion. And for that reason the ideal for man is to reach the Intuition which "transcends Reason." It is true that Dr. Laurie struggles to preserve the essential character of man from annihilation. The ego does not, he tells us, lose itself in the mystic union with the Absolute. Moreover, intuition can reveal nothing to us which we do not carry with us into it. "It is only the apotheosis of himself in the Absolute that a man can attain to." Indeed, Dr. Laurie can even say that in Intuition Will and Personality are intensified. We are grateful to him for this, and we recognise his mysticism as, so far, sane, and even inspiring. But we are left to wonder why, if this is all as he tells us, it is necessary to oppose, so strongly as he sometimes does, feeling to reason; to treat the goal of intuition as supra-rational; and to refuse to the communion with the absolute the name of knowledge. We are with him in his recognition of Feeling and Emotion as vehicles of the Divine Life: but we question whether the effort to get "beyond reason" can ultimately be reconciled with an intensification of selfhood.

The volume closes with a meditation on the subject of personal immortality. That is not a subject which admits, in the ordinary sense, of demonstration: and it is no slight upon Dr. Laurie's treatment of it to say that most people will probably find it not so much "convincing" as interesting. We cannot close our article better than by quoting from this last discussion a characteristic remark. "The identity of the 'person' continues, sustained by the memory of all here that is worthy of a higher existence there—truth, love, and ideals."

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Vita Nuova. Translated by THOMAS OKEY. (Dent, 1s. 6d. net.)

THE volume before us, containing the Vita Nuova and Canzoniere, or collected minor poems, completes the "Temple Classics" edition of the works of Dante. This, like the volumes of the Divina Commedia, is provided with the original Italian and the English translation on opposite pages. The text and rendering are the work of Mr. Thomas Okey, with the exception of the Canzoni, for which Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed is responsible. This translation is not put forward to compete with that of Rossetti as a work of art; it is a literal version, offered to those who, "possessing some acquaintance with Latin or one of the Romance languages, will desire to read the very words of the master in the original." The book will no doubt supply a genuinely felt want, for there are many such readers—people who learn their Italian at first by spelling out the text of Dante after they have learned to love him in translations. Mr. Okey's capability of rendering Dante's writing so as to make it verbally intelligible to this class of students was shown some time ago in his edition of the Purgatorio in this series, and it is again abundantly proven throughout the bulk of the present volume. But there are two things above all others which we have a right to demand in a work of this nature—clarity and accuracy; and chiefly on these grounds we must quarrel with Mr. Okey on one or two points in his translation. On page 20, why should the expression "donna di si gaia sembianza" be rendered "mistress of so winsome a vesture"? There is no advantage gained by changing the metaphor, and it makes the translation of the passage less easy to follow. On page 24, the original "ma tuttavia di queste parole . . . se alcune ne dicessi, dille per modo che per loro non si discernesse lo simulato amore che hai mostrato a questa" is perfectly clear. But what sense, except a wrong sense, can be made out of the rendering: "but yet if thou tell any of these words . . . tell them in such wise that the simulated love be not discerned by them, which thou has shown to her." Instead of the words which we have printed in italics Rossetti has "thereby," which removes all ambiguity. On page 29, in the sentence "my beatitude lay in her salutation which many times exceeded and overflowed my capacity," "which" is made to refer to "salutation," instead of to "beatitude." On page 135 there is an unnecessary and confused use of archaic forms in the passage which runs: "and now it seemeth that ye would forget it because of this lady who gazes at you, and gazeth not save in so far . . ." etc. Is there any reason why the word "ragionare" (p. 137) should be translated by "pleading"? The rendering of "lor" by "him" (p. 63) is an obvious oversight. The expression "thou are" is perhaps due to the printer; and so, we will hope, is the annoying hybrid "Incipit Vita Nuova." Finally, it seems a great mistake that in a volume containing seventy-five poems there should be no index of first lines. We have pointed out all these blemishes—most of them unimportant—in no spirit of captiousness, but because the work is, as a whole, so well executed that it is a pity that its value should be lessened by such easily remediable defects.

Hills and the Sea. By HILAIRE BELLOC. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. HILAIRE BELLOC is not so much an original writer as an original man. As a painter of travel-pictures he has of course, many predecessors—for instance, Heine in the "Reisebilder," Sterne in the "Sentimental Journey," and Stevenson in several volumes. Vagabondage is the common tie between these writers, the one respect in which Mr. Belloc resembles his brethren of the road. But even Mr. Belloc, original though he is, cannot always rid himself of the memory of voices that are stilled. In "The Griffin," for example, he develops in eight pages the notion which Wordsworth expressed in four lines:

We will not see them, will not go
To-day nor yet to-morrow;
Enough if in our hearts we know
There's such a place as Yarrow.

But in general Mr. Belloc is satisfied to be himself. He is the spoilt child of contemporary literature. He has the seriousness and the japes of one of Shakespeare's fools. He bangs his bladder in the face of our pet prejudices, and we are almost angry; but the next minute we forgive him. Of the essays in the volume before us we like best those in which politics are not obtruded. Of such there are many. We would give first place to "The Wing of Dalua," a Pyrenean incident, which tells how two travellers essayed to cross the mountains into Andorra, how a storm overtook them on the summit, how on the second day out, faint with cold and hunger, they believed themselves bewitched, and at last found themselves back in the valley from which they had started. The chill fear which steals over those who have lost their way among mountains is admirably suggested, and no less admirable is the description of the three successive jasses, or plateaux, which in the Pyrenees commonly form the steps between the plain and the summit. From this paper the reader will do well to pass to "The Cerdagne" and "The Canigou," which also are instinct with the magic of the Pyrenees. Mr. Belloc is equally at home upon the sea.

It is in tense narration, touched with fantasy, that his strength lies. When he deals with high matters of the soul and of destiny, as in "The Arena," "The Autumn and the Fall of Leaves," and "The Harbour in the North," he sets out as one with a great meaning to express, and in the end expresses hardly any meaning at all, falling, at such times, into pretentiousness and unreality.

The Gem-Cutter's Craft. By LEOPOLD CLAREMONT. (Bell, 15s. net.)

THE history of the gem from its rough state to its cut and polished final appearance is given with remarkable clearness in this work by a cutter of jewels, who writes in the first place for cutters. The opening sentence of the first chapter: "For the successful identification of precious stones nothing is of greater value than the experience which is only attainable by constantly handling large quantities of cut and rough gems," suggests at once that Mr. Claremont does not mean to engage the lay reader. But he develops his story of "cleavage," "striae," "diaphaneity," "lustre," and colour in so agreeable a manner that those entirely outside the influence of Hatton Garden will find his volume at once extremely interesting and informing. The jewels that the Queen of Zer wore many thousands of years B.C. are still with us, and from the earliest days of Egypt to the latest moment of time the vanities—or, perhaps, the aesthetic tastes—of man have constantly employed the miner and the lapidary. The main difference between the gem-cutter's craft in distant ages and in our own is that whereas in the earliest periods gems—rubies, sapphires, and the like—were carved into the form of a god or some fine representation of an animal, as in Egypt; or, later into the beautiful cameos of ancient Greece and Rome; now the cutting of gems is reduced to a science which gives the greatest amount of beauty that the stone itself can be made to show, but leaves the artist out. The vast amount of skill which, as Mr. Claremont demonstrates, must be used to make the best of a diamond is now almost always employed, but the glyptic artist appears as dead as Troy. The modern demand is for as much brightness, colour, and value, as the rough stone can be made to produce, and the craft of the gem-cutter enables him to do all this to a wonderful extent. Our hope is that with the increase of wealth and precious stones the old taste for a beautiful carving on a beautiful substance will return; in which case, we feel sure the many clever people who are now cutters would develop from craftsmen into artists, and the jewel again become beautiful instead of, as at present, a vain and garish display.

Untravelled England. By JOHN JAMES HISSEY. (Macmillan, 16s.)

MR. HISSEY is a traveller in his own country.

All I ask, the heaven above
And the read below me—

he sings with R.L.S.; but unlike him he sings from the deck of a motor-car. His book is refreshing—a book to keep by one and dip into at odd moments—and as accurate as it could be in the circumstances, though his motor-car travels a little too fast for us at times. As a means to an end it is well enough, but we prefer Borrow's mode of progression. Mr. Hissey's title is hardly accurate; very little of the country he passed through has not been well travelled—and described—before. Rushing through Buckinghamshire, he observes of Wendover that "it has not yet developed a red-brick and blue-slate ugliness"; and "till lately the nearest railway to the little town was three miles away; now, however, the railway has found Wendover, and as the country around is pleasant, the speculative builder with his modern villas may be trusted to put in an appearance." He may be interested to learn that the first train ran through Wendover at least thirteen years ago, and that the speculative builder has already spoiled what was once one of the most beautiful valleys in England. Had our author forsaken his car occasionally he might have found, a little off the beaten track, many places more interesting than those he describes.

The Battle of Tsushima. By Captain VLADIMIR SEMENOFF. (Murray, 3s. 6d. net.)

WE welcome Captain A. B. Lindsay's excellent translation of Captain Semenoff's admirable account of the great battle fought in the Sea of Japan—a book already favourably known in this country in its native dress. Captain Semenoff occupied a very exceptional position on board the Kniaz Suvaroff, Admiral Rodjestvensky's flagship, for he had no other official duty than to make notes, to watch, and to record the phases of the battle. Such a narrative from the hand of a trained eye-witness is necessarily valuable, but in this case it is made more so by the fact that the author was also on board the Cesarevitch when Admiral Vetoft made his disastrous sally from Port Arthur on August 10, 1904. He is able, therefore, to contrast the tactics and other conditions in the two battles, and his impressions possess an importance which naval officers and those interested in warship design have fully recognised. To these specialist readers Sir George Clarke's introduction will particularly commend itself, although not all of them will agree with his conclusions.

Right through the action from 1.49 P.M. to 7.40 P.M., when he makes his last note, Captain Semenoff provides us with vivid pictures of the scenes on board the flagship as well as the various phases of the battle. At one moment he is on the fore-bridge noting the orders given by the Admiral, at the next, through his Zeiss glasses, he is watching the enemy's ships, where he could distinguish mantlets of hammocks on the bridges and groups of men, the ships in perfect order at close intervals, manœuvring as if at target practice. Then he is assisting to put a fire out, helping a wounded comrade, observing that the after-turret has been blown up, and a little later that the fore-most funnel had fallen, and every now and again making notes. About 3 P.M. Captain Semenoff received his second wound, and this took him to the lower deck. He did not stop to wait his turn under the surgeons, but proceeding on deck, learnt that the Admiral had been wounded, observed the movements of the enemy's fleet, noted the condition of the Russian ships, and realised the true significance of what had happened:

How pitiless is memory!—a scene never to be forgotten came before my eyes, clearly and distinctly—just such another scene—the same awful picture. After Prince Utomsky's signal on the 10th of August, our battleships had steamed N.W. in the same disorder and just as horridly.

Yet, pulling out his watch and note-book, he jots down: "3.25 P.M. A heavy list to port, and a bad fire in the upper battery." Captain Semenoff's graphic description continues up to the time when the Admiral, sorely wounded and unconscious, is taken off the doomed vessel in a torpedo-boat. Every word of this little volume is intensely interesting, and, moreover, it supplies the essential complement to the account which Polittovsky supplied of the voyage of the Russian fleet to the scene of action under the title, "From Lebau to Tsushima."

Olives: the Reminiscences of a President. By Sir WYKE BAYLISS. (Allen, 15s. net.)

THE unwary reader, pardonably ignorant as to the identity of the author of "Olives," might be led to expect from the sub-title that he was about to hear the amazing adventures of some South American dictator, and it seems necessary to state without delay that the presidency thus proudly insisted upon is merely that of the Royal Society of Artists, and that the only conflict in which the author ever engaged resulted in a barren victory over his great predecessor in that chair, Mr.

Whistler. A little while ago a persistent contributor to the correspondence columns of the daily Press inflicted on us a volume of the letters he had unnecessarily written, and the late Sir Wyke Bayliss appears, in a spirit of rivalry, to have determined to eclipse this literary feat by printing in a book all the after-dinner speeches and prize-giving addresses which he delivered throughout the course of a long but not very interesting career. Remarkable neither for their matter nor their manner, these speeches should never have been collected for other than family reading, and the continual reiteration not only of the same ideas, but of the same phrases and sentences, relentlessly exposes the poverty of the orator's intellectual resources. Of the many interesting personalities he had the good fortune to meet, Sir Wyke Bayliss appears to have remembered little save the opportunities they gave him of speechifying and writing doggerel, and though he is appreciative of the art of Turner, and David Cox, Watts, and other modern masters, his criticism is not so illuminating as to warrant rekindling. Of art in the abstract sensible remarks are from time to time uttered, but they have all been made before, and frequently better expressed. To an uncritical audience of men who have dined well these utterances may have seemed entertaining enough, but to reprint them after the occasion that prompted them is past, is like offering us at breakfast the champagne opened the night before. The illustrations, consisting of reproductions in colour and black and white of the author's paintings and drawings of cathedral interiors, have more claim to serious consideration than the text, but they do not incline us to assign to Sir Wyke Bayliss a lofty place among British artists.

Patrollers in Palestine. By the Rev. HASKETT SMITH. (Arnold, 10s. 6d. net.)

"PATROLLERS IN PALESTINE," though brightly written, is spoilt by the introduction of a good deal of humour which strikes us as often a little forced. It is a record, for the most part amusing enough, of the journeyings in Palestine of a party of tourists conducted by the late Mr. Haskett Smith, consisting of the "Sheikh," as their leader called himself, and his tribe, the Archbishop (who, needless to say, was not an archbishop), The Fossil, The Enthusiast, The Matter-of-Fact Man, The Pessimist, The Angel, The Malaprop, The General Nuisance, The Gusher, and Monte Carlo. A good deal of useful information is imparted, and the book makes pleasant reading.

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

XIV. NOËLS

THE Nuga for Christmas week—which is the last which Spectator ab extra will contribute for the present—naturally refers to the season, and to the verses (odes, songs, lyrics, hymns, and sonnets) relating to it, which the Anglo-Saxon race has produced during the last three hundred years. Their number is remarkable, and their variety great; but as yet we have no adequate Christmas Anthology, containing only the choicest literary products of the genius of England and America, in reference to that gracious time which Christendom commemorates with a homage that is ever old yet always new.

Unquestionably the finest Christmas poem which the world possesses is Milton's magnificent Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity, written it is thought when he was a Cambridge undergraduate; but many of our earlier English noëls have the dew of the nation's youth upon them. There is no better method of arrangement than the chronological one, as it shows the growth of the national mind and heart on the subject: and it is more than interesting to trace its evolution from comparatively crude beginnings—in which the yule log and wassail-bowl, with tumultuous dance and song, were prominent elements—to the richer and nobler products of succeeding years. Milton's Ode must however stand first, because it not only represents the highest watermark of English genius on the subject, but is perhaps the finest poem he ever wrote.

It may be worth considering what the editor of a Christmas Anthology should endeavour to realise. The year in which each poem was written, or first published, is not always known, but when it is discoverable it should be printed at the end of the stanzas; the years of the birth and death of the author following his name, and prefixed to the poem. The occasional omission of stanzas, which is sometimes necessary, should be indicated by triple stars inserted between the verses quoted; and when the original text is altered in any case the author's name should be italicised. The reason for the omission of stanzas is that they are sometimes trivial, occasionally tawdry, and frequently obtrude opinion where dogma should be concealed, or suggested rather than emphasised. In the preface to his admirable "Book of Praise," Sir Roundell Palmer (Lord Selborne) wrote "there is far more dross than gold in the works of all voluminous hymn-writers"; and it is notorious that some of our choicest ones have prosaic lines, uncouth words, or halting stanzas. Others have archaic phrases, which have long since fallen into desuetude, and of which there can be no literary resurrection. All these should be removed, if possible: or only retained where they bring out, by contrast, the loveliness of the lines which lie embedded in them, like golden ore in veins of quartz.

When the text of a poem is changed, however slightly, the fact should always be indicated by the author's name being printed in italics, and the name of the writer who changed it should be given. The reason for a change of text is the same as for the omission of a stanza. Very often a really noble poem is seriously marred by a single faulty line or an infelicitous word; and it should be remembered that the authors of some of our greatest poems have not infrequently altered their own text, in new editions of their works. In these cases it is neither the editor's duty to select the latest or the earliest text but to take what he considers the best version on the whole. He may err in judgment, but the decision rests with him, and with posterity, which will either approve his judgment or condemn it. Here again the words of Lord Selborne may be quoted. "The Wesleys altered the compositions of George Herbert, Sandys, Austin and Watts. Toplady, and others, altered some of Charles Wesley's. . . . Bishop Heber, scholar as he was, and editor of Jeremy Taylor's works, silently altered Taylor's Advent Hymn in his own hymn-book; and the hymns of Heber himself, and of Keble, etc., are met with every day in a variety of forms, which their authors would hardly recognise. . . . Some such variations of hymns are, however, sufficiently good to take rank as new compositions, better than those by which they were suggested."

As to the titles of the poems, when a writer has not given one, the first line of his composition—placed in full within inverted commas—should be invariably used as the title; so that everything printed (except the author's name, and the year of his birth and death) is his own writing. No literary practice is more reprehensible than for an editor to invent a title, and place it above a poem or a hymn, without informing his readers that he has done so; and letting it be known that the title he has given was not the work of the author. This occurs however in dozens of anthologies, and miscellaneous collections of English verse. It disfigures even the excellent "Golden Treasury" of the late Francis Turner Palgrave, and it absolutely vitiates numerous collections of verse, in which the title of nearly every poem ignores that which was given to it by its author, and is the unaccredited—often the inaccurate—manufacture of the editor.

In reference to punctuation, and capital letters—as well as brackets and "dashes" in the text—many authors have been so capricious in their use of them that their practice cannot be followed wisely. A superabundance of capital letters always disfigures a page; and the random insertion of an apostrophe before the final letter of a word ending with "d"—to guide the reader in pronunciation—is useless, as well as gratuitous. In other words, the "ed" should always be printed in full, without the use of a comma in place of a vowel.

But leaving these minor points, how wide an area do our English noëls cover! From Dunbar, Giles Fletcher, and Ben Jonson, to Tennyson, Charles Kingsley, and Alfred Dommett; from Thomas Southwell and Fitzgerald, William Drummond, Robert Herrick, and George Herbert, to Dean Stanley, William Morris, and Christina Rossetti; from Jeremy Taylor, Richard Crashaw, and Henry Vaughan, to Dora Greenwell and Addington Symonds: with Charles Wesley, Coleridge, Lamb, Heber, Milman, Keble, and Bowring between, and many a less-known minstrel throughout all the years; and amongst Americans we have Longfellow, Whittier, Lowell, Philips Brooks, and a dozen more.

It may be suggested that a collection of the most notable passages of English prose referring to Christmas would be a useful supplement to gleanings from our best poets on the subject: and it is to be hoped that the year 1907 will not close without an adequate Christmas Anthology being within reach of every one.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE LOTUS EATERS

A CERTAIN noble sensuousness is the note of the poetry of our heroic age: a certain mournful wistfulness is the note of the poetry of our romantic period. Yet it is remarkable that this mournful wistfulness never deepens into the profound sadness that breathes from the works of our older writers. A man must first have been enraptured by the joy and the beauty of earthly existence to feel to the full the sublime vanity of it all.

And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve
And, like the insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep,— is written in a frame of mind far different from that in which Shelley wrote:

Alas! I have nor hope, nor health,
Nor peace within nor calm around,
Nor that content surpassing wealth
The sage in meditation found . . .

Yet now despair itself is mild,
Even as the winds and waters are;
I could lie down like a tired child,
And weep away a life of care.

The melancholy of Shakespeare resembles rather that of Alexander. It is the very ecstasy of the spirit of adventure. He has grasped the power and the glory of earth, and its finitude and transitoriness drive his imagination in upon itself and make him at last a visionary. Thereupon he gives over writing, and recovering, in the stillness of all ambition, the simplicity and blitheness of his youth, resettles quietly in the little country town in which he was born.

We poets in our youth begin in gladness; said Wordsworth, who held to the old tradition; but most of his successors seem in their youth to have begun in despondency. Instead of opening their souls to the fair impression of things, and exercising and delighting their senses with the glowing pageantry of life, they let their imagination feed upon the sweet and unwholesome fruits of melancholy. Sadness seemed to them to be a more poetic thing than joy. Perhaps it is, if it be true, vehement and deep: for it is in moments of tragic grief that the depths of our nature are revealed. The young poets of the new school, however, were only fantastically sad.

It was the pleasure of mild-minded melancholy that enticed them, and its introspective quality: the melancholy that divides a man from his kind and keeps him a prisoner in the hollow Lotus-land. As is seen in the verses of Mr. W. B. Yeats, the latest and most romantic of the writers of the romantic school, the more completely a poet surrenders himself to the luxury of sorrow, the less quick and passionate grows his sense of the majesty of human woe. Passively contemplative, he cares only for the loveliness of sorrowful things, their poignancy disconcerts him; so he weaves his reveries out of dead desires and dead regrets, fading memories and dim, legendary figures of spectral beauty, and frames therefrom an artificial paradise of dreams in which he moves, a shadow among shadows, solitary, disconsolate and ineffectual.

The deplorable result of the romantic movement in our poetical literature was to disconnect that literature, for the first time in our history, from the general life of the nation. Shakespeare and Milton wrote for the commonalty, and Wordsworth, who held in this also to old tradition, attempted, at least, to do so. They tried to kindle the imagination, enrich the mind and touch the heart of the common people. To this end they made legend, history, politics, religion and even philosophy the matter of poetry, and they kept that poetry simple, sensuous and passionate, so that it might come home to men's business and bosoms. Hence their work was distinguished by that profound application of ideas to life which compelled the admiration of the leader of the great French movement of enlightenment in the eighteenth century. And with all this it remained poetry of the supreme order. It was popular, and yet it was wanting neither in exquisiteness and beauty of execution, nor in largeness and sublimity of conception. It moved the peasant almost as powerfully as the sacred Book which he regarded as the very handiwork of God, and it filled with wonder and delight the amateur of the delicacies of fine literature.

The poetry of the romantic school, on the other hand, far from having any connection with the general life of the nation, was a kind of charm that deadened one's sense of that general life. The new writers were merchants of the incantations and faery visions that come between a man and the deeds of his hand and the hopes of his heart:

If there were dreams to sell,
What would you buy?
Some cost a passing-bell,
And some a sigh,
That shakes from life's fresh crown
Only a rose-leaf down.
If there were dreams to sell . . .
What would you buy?

That was the burden of their songs. The sick, languid and discontented spirits of their age came to them and purchased dreams of demoniac power, dreams of earthly love and heavenly, dreams of beauty and sorrow, dreams of social reform, dreams of everything; and then passed out too from the storm and sunshine of actual existence into the hollow Lotus-land. Addressed to a little circle of over-cultivated and idle people who liked to refine upon their feelings, English poetry was perverted from a sweetening, ennobling and general influence in life, into an enervating, distracting and narrow influence in life. It became something that the people could not understand: something that was fashioned as a means of escape from the world which they loved, and which they laboured to make more pleasant, and more beautiful for their children. The art of Marlowe, Shakespeare and Milton fell into common disrepute. The London 'prentices were no longer moved to rapture by ideas of chivalry and heroism, as were the lads who followed Ralph in "The Knight of the Burning Pestle." They turned instead for recreation to the realism of the music-hall and regarded the romantic poets, not without some justification, as the proper objects of vulgar ridicule. In vain did some of the men of the later school of romanticism try to touch the popular mind by other means than poetry: by painting, by the revival of craftsmanship, by fiction and criticism. Having grown weary, as Tennyson and Matthew Arnold had done, of the loneliness and the eeriness of their artificial paradise, they did not, like Tennyson and Arnold, abandon it, and come down to the world and work there cheerfully and without anodynes. Art to them was still a refuge from the misery of human life, and they wanted to lead the English people into the place of shelter which they had found. The English people wisely declined to follow them, as, I think, the Irish people will decline to follow their disciples who are now working to the same end in Ireland.

The English romantic movement that Coleridge and Byron, Shelley and Keats began, and Rossetti and Burne-Jones, William Morris and Pater developed, was not only ineffectual, it was disastrous. It impaired the great traditions of English literature, and it impaired even the genius of the men who succeeded in freeing themselves from its conventions. None of them was equal to his task: the task of doing in the age of Victoria that which Shakespeare had accomplished in the age of Elizabeth, and Milton in the age of Cromwell. In my opinion, there is immeasurably more of the stuff and spirit of great poetry in the formless prose of Walt Whitman than in all the delicate verse of the writers of the romantic school. He, in a brave attempt to glorify with light and warmth and beauty the sombre and immense new world of modern thought,

Perished in the chariot of the sun:

they, in a vain endeavour to forget the existence of that world, became merely the idle singers of an empty day.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

FICTION

The Philosopher and the Foundling. By GEORG ENGEL. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

THE soul of the German is in this beautiful story, his poetry, simplicity and profundity. It deals with the good and bad fortunes of fisher-folk living on the shores of the Baltic; and when you come to the last page you know what kind of folk they are, you can picture the sea and land to which they belong, and you have been fascinated by the humour and tender imagination that have told you their uneventful histories. The book will charm many readers as some of Andersen's stories charm: that about the Storks, for instance, or that about the Brave Tin Soldier. It is set in a northern landscape of marsh and sea and glittering snow; the men are of the north, dour, kindly, and reflective, and their laugh is of the north for it is near to tears. The brilliant figure of Lina, the Foundling, contrasts with her surroundings, as a humming-bird would contrast with a moor-hen, and the tragedy of her life is a tragedy of temperament. Fate placed her in an environment for which she was too fragile and unstable. All the characters are quaint and interesting; and the promise of sunshine after sorrow seems a suitable end to a story that looks kindly and truly at life. The translation is admirably done.

Love's Trilogy: Julie's Diary, Marie, God's Peace. From the Danish of PETER NANSEN. By JULIA LE GALLIENNE. (Heinemann, 6s.)

"WHY mustn't I do it? Is it wicked?" asked a little boy who had been reprov'd by his mother. "My dear," replied she, "it is worse than wicked: it is vulgar!" In this book of Peter Nansen's the reader is constantly being reminded that he is to be shocked. The "inquisitive moralist" appealed to is evidently the reader expected—probably desired—by the author, to whom the possibility of the book falling into the hands of artists of the type of the little boy's mother mentioned above has not occurred. The author has an unpleasant knack of vulgarising his characters, and a note of intense vulgarity runs through the first two stories, which are both concerned with the "generous" yielding of a young girl to her lover. We are told of Marie, the heroine of the second story, that "if Solomon the kingly poet" had known her, he would have written of her "like this." The extract which follows is too long to quote, but in no circumstances—not even under the influence of an amour with Marie—can we imagine the author of the Canticles adopting the style of Peter Nansen. In the third story the atmosphere changes for the better. The writer seems more at home in out-of-the-world towns, and with old women in institutions, than with "innocent" but amorous maidens. The first two stories have the appearance of being written in the hope of ensuring a large sale for the book, and they are unpleasant and dull. There is a note of sincerity about the third: the author is content to be himself.

A Minister of Fate. By CHARLES DAWSON. (Long, 6s.)

THE tale opens with the slaying of a bear in the Western Pyrenees and closes with two happy marriages in England. The twenty-two chapters leading up to this satisfactory culmination are anything but peaceful, and many and strange are the adventures which befall the unfortunate hero, Edward Ravenshaw. The true character of his guardian, Sir John Lepell, and his rascally son, Albert, is revealed to us in the beginning of the story, and it is without surprise that we learn on reading further that the man who did not scruple to push his enemy over a cliff has no hesitation in consigning him later to a French madhouse, where he endures tortures worthy of the invention of Charles Reade himself. He is eventually rescued by a heroic friend, Ferdinand Seymour, who, having borne him through the asylum window and down a rope ladder, returns to England in the nick of time to help Edward's sister, his fiancé, out of her window to happier and safer spheres:

An Irish Utopia. A Story of a Phase of the Land Problem. By JOHN H. EDGE. (Dublin: Hodges Figgis, 3s. 6d.)

MR. EDGE has written a novel with a purpose, but if the reader forget that the author has at heart "the Unity of Christendom," he will, by judicious skipping, find an entertaining story; or, if he ignore the story or regard it as a peg for Mr. Edge's opinions to hang on, he will become engrossed in the conclusions arrived at by a genuinely serious-minded man who, in his official capacity as a Land Commissioner, has been brought much into contact with his fellow countrymen. The story is a simple one and touches on an attempt made by the younger of twins to benefit by the supposed destruction of some documents which prove his brother's primogeniture. Of course the documents are found and all ends well, but the date of the incidents gives the author an opportunity—of which he makes the most—to paint Ireland as she was at a time when the Union had been effected but a few years. He draws entertaining sketches of parson and priest, lawyers and farmers, lords and ladies, but though "the humming bowl" is referred to occasionally the book in no wise resembles "Harry Lorrequer." It is as sober a production as its title suggests.

FINE ART

ROSSO

LESS than a year ago, at the second part of the International Society's exhibition at the New Gallery, something like a sensation was created by a number of sculptured heads, more impressionist in treatment than even the Balzac of Rodin. These were the work of the Italian sculptor, Signor Madardo Rosso, who, though he had at least twice before exhibited in this country, was far less known here than on the continent. But while the International Society was receiving congratulations on a new recruit of such undoubted genius, it was remarked that although nine works by Signor Rosso figured in the catalogue, only six were to be found in the New Gallery. The natural inference was that the sculptor was unable to send the full number promised, but against this there spread an astounding report that the works in question were not only sent but placed in position by the sculptor, and after his departure were mysteriously removed. This report, which was published in more than one newspaper, has never been contradicted or explained by the society, which thus appears to have been guilty of an affront to an artist who should have been hors concours.

To recall this unpleasant incident has been rendered necessary by the opening in Mr. Eugene Cremetti's new gallery (44 Dover Street) of a collection of sculpture by Signor Rosso. Among the collection are the works included in the International catalogue but missing from the exhibits, and among these controversial works is one that has been called his masterpiece, Femme à la Violette. Whether he approve or no of Signor Rosso's theories about sculpture, the fair-minded spectator must admit that this work is a tour de force, for by suggestive modelling the artist has conveyed an impression of a thing that has no real existence. Viewed from the proper distance a veil is distinctly seen falling from the hat over the beautiful drooping face, yet this veil, so wondrously perceptible, has no real existence, but is an artistic illusion created by the suggestive modelling of the face. If this were merely a clever trick to show how the cunning of the artist's hand can deceive the eye of the spectator, Signor Rosso's achievement would be less worthy of respect; but it may more properly be regarded as an earnest and triumphant demonstration of the sculptor's artistic creed, Rien n'est matériel dans l'espace, which may be interpreted as meaning that form seen through the medium of light, colour, atmosphere, and perspective cannot be faithfully rendered in sculpture by considering the material form alone. Signor Rosso has carried out in sculpture the belief which, consciously or unconsciously, has actuated all impressionists in art, namely, that by copying form as it automatically exists you cannot present form as it appears to the human eye. The first canon of impressionism is not merely that "things are seldom what they seem," but that "things always seem other than they actually are." If Signor Rosso had taken a cast of the face by which he was attracted on the boulevard, and then covered this cast with the finest possible screen of transparent marble, he could never have created so true an impression of what he had seen as he has by his own bolder and less imitative methods.

Students of modern sculpture are (or should be) aware that Rosso, born at Turin, came to Paris about twenty-five years ago with his impressionist theories of sculpture already formed and put into execution. There he made the acquaintance of M. Rodin, who was greatly interested in his theories, with which he must have been mainly in agreement. It is curious, however, that in none of the many books on the life and art of M. Rodin which have appeared, is Rosso even mentioned. If the sculptural work of Rodin during the eighties be studied, it will be recognised that his most impressionist effort was La Défense in 1880, a competitive sketch for a "Monument to the Defenders of the Nation." Compare this or the S. John the Baptist, which was executed about the same date, with Signor Rosso's Impression Omnibus, or Concierge, both dating between 1883 and 1884, and it will be seen that Rosso owes nothing to Rodin, that during that decade he was ahead of his more celebrated rival in impressionist theory and practice. How much Rodin owes to Rosso future historians must decide, the aim of this article being not to depreciate the original genius of the great French sculptor, but to direct attention to his pioneer in impressionist sculptures—to a great genius insufficiently known and inadequately appreciated in England.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE DANCE OF MACABRE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the fifteenth century Lydgate translated from the French a work called la danse Macabré. On the title-page the poet tells us that in the dance of "Machabree" is vividly expressed and shown the state of man, and how he is called at uncertain times by death, and when he thinketh least thereon. According to M. Gaston Paris (Romania xxiv. 131) the old French word Macabré occurs first in Jean le Fèvre's Respit de la Mort which appeared in the year 1376, and in which the author claims to have written a work called la danse Macabré. What is the etymology of the word? M. Gaston Paris thinks Macabré may have been the name of the artist who painted the picture which suggested the first poem on the subject. The Oxford Dictionary says the etymology of the word is obscure, but draws attention to the fact that this name for the "Dance of Death" was popularly associated with the history of the Maccabees. In a Besançon document of 1453 quoted by Ducange the "Dance of Death" was called Chorea Machabeorum. It was called in Dutch Makkabeusdans. But this is doubtless mere popular etymology. I believe the correct etymology of Macabré is to be found in Grimm's Teutonic Mythology (see English edition, note on p. 851). It is there suggested that the word is derived from the Arabic maqābir (graves, tombs), the plural of maqbar (tomb, cemetery), from the verb qabar to bury, inter, so that la danse Macabré would mean the dance connected with the tombs. From this Arabic maqābir are derived two words which may still be heard in the Iberian peninsula, namely the Portuguese almocávar (a cemetery), and Spanish macabe a name for cemeteries in Almeria. Dozy in his Glossaire tells us that in Tripoli the Arabs call the cemetery outside the town maqābir. It may be noted that the cognate of the Arabic word appears in the Hebrew Bible in the name of the station in the wilderness called Kibroth-kattaavah, explained in the margin as "the graves of lust."

A. L. MAYHEW.

Oxford.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It seems I have not made plain my objections to the common method of analysing such sentences as, "It is I who am in fault" (see Mason's "English Grammar," p. 170). My first objection is that who cannot agree with it; my second, that it can never be an antecedent; my third, that a similar difficulty occurs without any it; and my fourth, that it does not show the real sense of the sentence. Carson explains the Latin construction, Sunt qui putent, by saying that putent is the main predicate and sunt is part of the subject—which I think is a very sensible way, capable of being extended to many not quite similar expressions in English. Not only may the subject (or object) be put into a clause by itself and thus emphasised, but any extension of the predicate whether adverb, prepositional phrase, or even an adverbial or subordinate clause.

It was a Friar of Orders Gray
Walked forth to tell his beads.

There be some that trouble you.

'Twas with pain that she saw me depart.

It was from Mons Gomericus
The first Montgomery came.

It was many and many a year ago
That a maiden lived—

It was not thus I greeted your brother.

Is it because his patience waits
Ye scorn his offered love?

Such clauses are joined by that, either relative or conjunction, expressed or understood, but there are hybernicisms in which this cannot be done, such as, It is nicely she sang, or It is very angry he was.

I see that Burns's use of the second person singular of the verb with s instead of st cannot always be defended as dialect idiom. But instances of such usage can be found in other authors. The following is from De Rous's Psalms:

Lo, I do stretch my hands
To thee, my help alone;
For thou well understandest
All my complaint and moan.

Pope's "Universal Prayer" furnishes instances of the omission of the st. I have not seen any English grammar that notices that such forms as Thou gavest, Thou sawest, are not in accordance with Anglo-Saxon usage. In that language the termination st is not added to the past tense of strong verbs.

WM. BIRD.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I can quite understand why teachers of phonetic spelling should disagree with my argument, but fail to see where the satisfying results (desired by Mr. Drummond) would come in by their method. At present, at least, even if taught to read a wee bit by means of a phonetic system, the standard spelling remains, and the meaning of vocabularies can be made plain by any educated person, afterwards. Utterly revolutionise spelling, and I defy any one to prove that the language would not be crippled by the consequent loss in a proper comprehension of a great proportion of the words which help to make up the English language.

Who some of the educationists (? faddists) are to whom Mr. Drummond refers I really do not know. I expect, however, not all the doctors agree. Decidedly I am not myself a worshipper of any dry-as-dust specialists (what the Germans call "stubegelehrten"), some of whom, anyhow, have not a practical knowledge of the tongues they profess. At all events, in the days when I went to school, I learnt spelling easily enough with the aid of Butter's Etymological Spelling-Book, in which the meaning of words was made perfectly clear through placing the root of a word as a heading, and showing its derivatives underneath.

Instead of trying to twist the language out of all shape—in fact making a new language of it—for that is what phonetic spelling would practically amount to, phoneticians might do better by joining hands with the Esperantists. Mr. Drummond evidently does not, or will not, appreciate how much a language like English is dependent on its past, so for a really good ready-made, though mechanical, "make-shift," useful like phonetic spelling, I can strongly recommend to him Esperanto, though, some might consider a study of Latin, Greek, or French, or even English preferable as an intellectual training.

There is, however, no getting away from the fact that for any one desirous of a thorough understanding of our very composite language, a little knowledge of Latin, Greek, etc., roots is necessary, especially in these days of scientific literature. Although some ordinary illiterate labourer, villager, or an individual who does not read much, may be able to jog along with only two or three hundred vocabularies, a person who wishes to understand what he reads requires a knowledge of at least a few thousand, and without being under the necessity of having recourse to a dictionary for an explanation of their meaning. Phonetic spelling, I am afraid, would not help, but hinder in the understanding of the vocabularies, and I, for one, care more about the words themselves and their meaning, than for phonology or the mere science of spoken sounds!

F. W. T. LANGE.

December 8.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Save for his desperate assault upon Humor, J. B. Wallis is careful to omit reference to my refutation of his proposition that changes of spelling constitute a process analogous to growth. I acknowledge the compliment.

It has been often suggested that shorthand might serve instead of fonetic spelling. Those who are familiar with shorthand will, however, recognize that the many devices (circles, hooks, loops, contractions, gramalogs, and vocalized and unvocalized outlines—designed originally for a purpose other than fonetic representation: to facilitate speed in reporting, to wit) without considering the disadvantages from the compositors point of view, constitute a real objection to its use for general literary purposes, and as an instrument of elementary literary education in particular. The most valuable code for this purpose will be that which is simplest and most direct in its construction and application.

Spelling reformers are not unaware of the practical difficulties to be overcome in securing the adoption of fonetic spelling; nor of the fact that reformers are, inevitably in the first instance, in the minority, and usually unpopular until after they have been dead a few centuries, when it becomes desirable that others should reform their worshippers. (I have been well-nigh immortalized in Parody and can henceforth afford to complacently await the doom determined for pedants and reformers by generations of heredity) while ritters of real literary ability are content to countenance the forces of indifference and routine, and are manifestly unwilling to ascertain the merits or demerits of the proposed change, it will not be easy to overlook or underestimate the difficulty of the task of reform.

"Who is to give authoritative weight to these innovations?" The question is remarkable asked by one who—in another connection page 451)—has described his position as an agnostic as that of an intellectual scout. This is not the place in which to undertake the demonstration that there is no necessary antagonism between "whim" and "science." It may be worth while to repeat the suggestion that in the direction of whimsical and competitive schemes of spelling lies the possibility of the eventual selection of a sum consistent scheme adapted to the general purposes of literature. That we are apt through the influence of custom to regard spelling as a combined public possession and taskmaster, it is strictly a marketable commodity, in every practical sense as much as are railways, ships, telephones, bicycles or any other means of facilitating the business of life. And to a recognition of this fact a sum publisher with means and enterprise will presently awake.

"Repetition" our old (ancienne) French teacher used to say "is the father and mother of memory." But if the claims of repetition be examined likely enough it may appear that repetition is but a sort of step-parent to memory, and altogether unworthy of our regard. To exercise the faculty of memory in the holiest and intelligent pursuit of recording and classifying comprehensible facts is to strengthen and develop that faculty; to submit it to the drudgery of retaining masses of uncoordinated items of knowledge—often incomprehensible and self-contradictory, is to weaken the faculty and, further, to lessen the ability to practically apply that which is thus retained. It is precisely at this point where the services of a fonetic code of spelling prove most useful. If the gain could be measured by the superiority of new forms for certain words only, it would not be of sufficient importance to justify the labor of change. But there is a difference between the processes of teaching to read by means of the ordinary and of fonetic modes of spelling which is so great in degree as to amount almost to an essential difference. Those who learn by means of the ordinary spelling are obliged, owing to its inconsistency, to commit to memory each word individually. On the other hand with a fonetic code of spelling it is necessary only to learn to analyze the elements of speech and to commit to memory the signs which represent them; the rest depending chiefly upon constructive ability. In the first case, not only are there scores of devices for representing similar or identical sounds, but there are countless exceptions all to be memorized separately, by repetition oft repeated. See-ay-tea cat, see-ay-tea cat. Who denies that it is injurious? Listen to the droning from the inside or outside of any public school from Monday morning till Friday afternoon. The perceptive and analytical faculties of the mind tortured or destroyed; self-confidence abated; initiative discouraged and penalized—words only. They are worth thinking over and remembering.

The fact that sum shorthand ritters experience difficulty in recollecting the current orthography is also in a large measure explainable by the circumstance that current spelling is got by rote; and that most learners of shorthand unconsciously acquire a knowledge of it in the same way; the memory in such cases being much in the condition of the proverbial lumber-room.

"Since when has fonetics become a science apart from language?" The question is timely. The answer is fonetics has been a distinct branch of the science of language since the invention of letters. It is that branch of linguistic science which provides for the representation of speech-sounds apart from the meaning of spoken language. That is, ostensibly at least, the office of letters; tho in the case of English spelling the fact is barely discernible—so nearly has it reverted, because of its inconsistency, to a state resembling ideography or hieroglyphics.

I have been in the habit of associating logic with common sense. But this seems to be another case in proof of the theory that the function of words is to obscure meaning—tho, of course, crowds do appear to dispense with that most uncommon possession, common sense, without suffering from the loss of it. "A person of average capacity" is an interesting expression. What does it mean? The ability to correctly use current English spelling depends largely upon visual memory. Thus many persons are uncertain how a word should be spelt until they have written it out and see what it looks like. Others who have not this analytical gift or power of the eye are doomed to remain bad spellers to the end of the chapter in spite of whatever may be their mental capacity otherwise.

The intrusion of the foreign element into our language accounts for much of the existing confusion. To deal with the question in an adequate manner would occupy more space than I should care to ask for just now. But I do not for a moment admit that it is past human skill to supply the remedy. There are French and German foneticians, and a consistent international fonetic alphabet is by no means an impossibility. It is an accomplished fact.

T. TALBOT LODGE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In its circular No. 8 issued October 20, 1906, the New York Simplified Spelling Board declares that amongst those who object to its recommendations are some "who misunderstand the aims of the Board and who have been led to believe that it is urging a violent and radical scheme of 'Phonetic' spelling or some kind of 'new' spelling. But this is not at all the aim of the Board. Its . . . purpose is the slow and steady simplification of the existing spelling by the omission of useless letters, and by the removal of senseless exceptions to accepted rules and analogies. Probably the hostility of this first group will cease when its members learn that the Board is not in favour of any freakish orthography."

This disclaimer suggests several inquiries; amongst which the more important probably are (1) Is this position useful; (2) Is it perfectly candid and sincere; and (3) Are there any good reasons for the misunderstanding?

The principal if not the sole valid reason for the desirability of the revival of real spelling is to be found in the interests of those who are as yet unlearned in and untainted with the present abominable and mongrel concoction which has to do duty for, and is falsely called, spelling. Those who have passed through the mill have had their spirits so broken that they now fondly hug their chains and glory in their shame, so that they weave a glowing web of unreal and absurd sentiment round the fetid corpse of a decayed ruin. No doubt ruins are often quite picturesque when they are horribly insanitary and inconvenient. So it is with conventional spelling. Those who have got used to working this mis-shapen lever would find a straightforward and true analysis of the sounds they use positively grotesque and even painful.

But with the unsophisticated veracious curiosity of the healthy child-like mind the very reverse is the case. The presentation of a true spelling is a joy and revelation which easily becomes as fascinating as a game, and which converts a dreary task into a delicious recreation.

What use in this connection is the magical list of three hundred words? The answer is infinitesimally little. It does no harm, but in itself it does so very little good that it seems hardly worth any effort without counting the magnitude of the effort which it has already cost and is likely to cost. Its utility arises mainly from its being an initiation and a revelation of further possibilities. Is it desirable that this possibility should be disavowed? Is there a greater gain derived from cajoling President Roosevelt into accepting these three hundred words than from continuing to work wholeheartedly and honestly for the object really desired? Can the adoption of a hesitating sham do as much good as a persistent demand for the truth; and nothing but the truth. Spelling is really a matter of conscience. It is nothing short of a downright falsehood to tell a child that in order to produce a sound beginning with d and rhyming with no and so it must not write do (which would rhyme with too, loo, too, woo), but must compile the unsightly dough, or in tonic solfa doh. The only way the teacher can save his face as a moral guide to the youngster is to say that the truth is that it is the fashion to misuse the alphabetic elements in this uncouth and barbarous fashion. It is mere fashion, mere custom, mere familiarity which gives a pseudo-justification to these parodies and libels upon the true art of spelling.

And yet it must be admitted that in one aspect the senseless fashion is invincible. It is utterly hopeless to expect that those who have struggled through the crushing and crippling torture chambers can walk erect. To them this would be a fresh and apparently useless torture. The only use for reformed spelling is to make the learning of reading and writing easier, and the only successful way to introduce it is in the teaching of the unlearned. Then the question is what use is the adoption of the three hundred words and what is the alternative? A moment's reflection must convince every thoughtful person that this paltry reform must be troublesome to the learned without doing the learners any appreciable advantage in purging the foul and fetid mass of mis-spelling which they have to face in the recognised orthography. The elaborate compilation of this list and its establishment by copious authorities is in itself a movement quite in the opposite direction from that of proving the baselessness of the belief of a second set of objectors who think that there is an inviolable standard of orthography. The sanctity of the old standard is not overthrown, it is merely transferred or enlarged. So that really the Board ought to do what it repudiates when alleged by the first group of objectors if it means to prove the point which it wishes to use as a reply to the second group, and while it protests that it won't support complete system of true (or phonetic) spelling it quotes as testimonials and justifications of its timorous venture the writing of those who advocate emancipation of the rising and all succeeding generations from the incubus of a so-called spelling which seldom spells truly and in multitudes of cases spells falsely, even according to its own criterion of accuracy, which is after all merely custom as discovered in history.

Piece-meal reform forced upon the learned and then passed on to the unlearned must involve the maximum of disturbances and of effort and yield the minimum of benefit to the race.

The only immediate concern of adults in the matter is the desirability of deciding whether or not they will demand the reform for the helpless juniors together with an implied necessary willingness to tolerate the mixture of styles of writing and printing when it is inevitably forced upon their notice by the practice of the better-taught generations filtering in amongst them and for one short human life elbowing them and hustling them sideways with their superior and new-fangled notions.

For these reasons a pioneer association like the Simplified Spelling Board should not take up the absurd, inconsistent and useless position of protesting that it will not advocate a wholesome thorough change but will continue tinkering at the old hulk of orthodoxy in spelling. The line of attack then must be complete liberty and toleration for the method of teaching.

It has been often demonstrated that a majority of children will reach the attainment of facility in ordinary spelling by the indirect road of practice in Phonetic reading and writing earlier and better equipped than they would have done by a direct attack upon its complexities.

Rules for altering existing spelling are no good to children. What they must first learn is to spell (with a close approximation) any word in the language from its actual sound as they themselves hear and speak it; and this ought to be done thoroughly by means of a necessarily enlarged alphabet. It is really very easy for any average child to discover unaided the Phonetic elements of any word. In fact this exercise except for the very dull is a delightful pastime and certainly the dull ones find natural spelling much easier than memorising the inconsistent medley of our semi-Phonetic recognised orthography. A young child has been known to spell hee, eh, eh (cake), and tee ee ysh wish by its own inventive powers progressing from the slight start, of overhearing elder children repeating some of the less fantastic spellings of short words. No reasonable child would ever suspect or credit the horrible falsehood that see oh double you spells cow.

The fact that our spelling is not supported upon an unchangeable standard which the spelling board brings forward against the second group of objectors is only a sort of half truth which in some respects is worse than a downright lie. Though the standard can be shown to have an infinitesimal fringe of optional spellings yet in the main it is alas! only too rigid and too inflexible. It is very useful to show that this stiffness is not quite so firm and so constant as its upholders fancy, though this demonstration might simply lead to efforts to bring the few exceptions under the same unbending domain of authorised custom by means of Academies and what not.

What is required, however, is to persuade people that however impregnably our present spelling may have been hitherto established yet there are such advantages to be derived from a free and easy loyalty to truth at least and especially on the part of future generations that the passing generation must tolerate and even encourage if it cannot actually embrace and adopt the practice in its own writing. While it may be frankly admitted that it would be a matter of obstructive difficulty for those who have completed their acquisition of the current spelling to adopt an altered orthography in their writing; they might still be expected to yield to the claims of the future the smaller difficulty of acquiescing in the reading of manuscripts and letterpress in which Phonetic spellings were more or less frequent or fully prevalent. It is not such a task to read matter written to imitate a dialect or to construe a passage from a partly learned language as to compose and speak either. This task in the matter of true spelling ought to be demanded of the grown up world for a short space of time. It would be no hardship at the very first when wholly unfamiliar and would constantly grow easier.

Nothing is really gained by conscious or unconscious disingenuousness, but certainly a strong agitation wants to be kept up to constrain the world's managers to relax their unintentional tyranny and admit the fresh air of freedom and truth into this old hot-bed of oppression.

GREEVZ FYSSER.

Nov. 26.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reference to this subject there is perhaps no point of more importance than differentiation. There are many couples of words which are phonetically alike, but distinguished orthographically. If the spelling of these words is assimilated, there is a transference of the difficulty but not an extension of it. The difficulty of spelling is lessened but that is secured by an increased difficulty in the reading and comprehending the meaning of what is read. The advantage of this proceeding is by no means evident. Whether the word is beech or beach, bark or barque, know or so, reach or retch, rood or rude, vain, vane, or vein, etc., the reader may find it difficult to determine at a glance.

There are, however, two letters in our alphabet which might be dealt with without difficulty, and, I submit, with advantage. The letter e when final is an index letter indicating that the preceding vowel is long—can and cane, rag and rage, pin and pine, kit and kite, rob and robe, tub and tube. The duty of final e being thus established, as denoting a preceding long vowel, it is worthless and even misleading, and should therefore be removed in: apposite, doctrine, engine, ermine, examine, famine, feminine, granite, hypocrite, masculine, opposite, perquisite, sanguine and many others.

The second letter I wish to call attention to is v. Some centuries ago it was considered necessary to give v the support of an e. Nowadays this seems quite unnecessary, and I claim the right of v to stand unattended as a final consonant. Such words as festive, motive, votive being spelt without the long-vowel-indicator would be more phonetically represented, and the overworked e would be spared. As there are in our dictionaries between two and three hundred words ending in -sive and -tive, there would be a saving of nearly four hundred e's, even if such pairs as thief and thieve were not included.

BENJAMIN DAWSON.

THE VALUE OF THE LETTER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am afraid it is rather late in the day to return to this subject, but unfortunately I have been in a part of the world where the ACADEMY was only procurable by premeditated act, and so did not read Mr. Lodge's letter of December 1 until yesterday.

I am glad that he finds some "real interest and importance" in my objection to spelling reform, but regret that he endorses my plea with so many reservations. He, like others, places faith in "phonetic" spelling, but where I ask is phonetic spelling to be found? It seems to be unknown even of its disciples. Can it be arrived at without either revising the alphabet or adopting signs to indicate in which of the many possible ways the letter is for the moment being used? Also must not the time-value for which I singly plead be lost utterly, or be left to depend on the haphazard survival of tradition? I would point out that music, in addition to notes (which may be compared to truly phonetic letters), avails itself of many signs; and my argument is that our alphabet cannot indicate English speech accurately, therefore, to suggest it, letters must occasionally be employed eccentrically. In music from the first note to the last every fraction of time can be accounted for with science, but the art of prose is not bounded by restrictions.

And who is to decide, first as to pronunciation, secondly as to the means of symbolising that pronunciation? Surely only those who have proved their fitness in practice. The conclusions of a jury of beautiful speakers and beautiful writers set down by a reporter of accurate technical knowledge and perfect ear might have weight, otherwise there must be much disagreement between those who are haunted by the h in ghost, and find restfulness and glamour in the gh of light, and the grave and reverend signors who stumble at the stumbling-stone that that same gh prepares for them in the infinite variety of tough, lough, through, etc.; philosophers who "would clip an angel's wings."

On this, unless I am moved to change my mind, I close my share of a protracted argument; for though I appreciate the value of the letter I do not cling to the valuable last word, and reiteration or expansion of what I have already said may be wearisome.

GLADYS JONES.

THE BOOKSHELF

The Stress Accent in Latin Poetry. By Elizabeth Hickman du Bois. (Macmillan, $1.25.)—It is difficult to award adequate praise to Miss du Bois for the erudition, industry and research she has displayed in this little volume. The work consists of ninety-six pages only, but every paragraph is closely reasoned, and the writer supports her argument in each case with copious quotations. No summary is possible; but a brief statement of the theory may be attempted. It is that besides the accentuation caused by the quantity of a syllable, there is a Stress accent, which does not always coincide with the quantitative accent. It is easy enough to prove this from early Latin verse, which was scanned (if we can call it scansion) by stress and not by quantity. Miss du Bois has collected a large number of instances of this rude form of metre, which, as scholars are aware, survived down to the time and work of Plautus. There are passages in that author's comedies which are metrical if stress accent be accepted as turning a short syllable into a long one, and even a few which can only be scanned if the stress accent on a preceding syllable be accepted as shortening that which succeeds. Plautus, however, was the latest classical writer in whose metre the stress-accent survives, unless we attribute to stress the Virgilian and Horatian usage of occasionally lengthening a syllable naturally short, where the sense and the metre seem to require this treatment. We may fully accept all that Miss du Bois says about the early Italic metre, but we think she is carried away by her own theory when she says that the well-known verse

Dabunt malum Metelli Naevius poetae

"would almost seem to be the one thing which the Saturnians are not." If she is right, the whole tradition of Latin scholarship is wrong. We are inclined, indeed, to say that Miss du Bois attributes too much importance to accent as an element in language. There are languages of which it might almost be said that they have no accent. But it would require more space than we have at command, to deal adequately with this topic; and besides, there is a previous question. Is all this minute attention to accent, and even to quantity, worthy of the name of scholarship? We take it that Scholarship means intelligent appreciation of the historian's narrative, the philosopher's thought, the orator's eloquence, the poet's imagination and sentiment. Such appreciation includes pleasure derived from the music of the verse; and to that extent scholarship stands in need of the knowledge of verse structure. It is because of this that verse composition has value as a part of classical education; and all which is beyond this is Erudition, not Scholarship. We find it difficult to believe that any one will be nearer to Scholarship for studying Miss du Bois's book, though we do not deny that she may render service incidentally. Minute knowledge of quantity has ere now helped to restore a lost reading or to correct a false one. It may be that knowledge of accent shall render like service in the future, and if so Miss du Bois may be laying scholarship under an obligation.

The Young People. By one of the Old People. (Murray, 5s. net.)—Perhaps it is natural that the author of this rambling, charming book should wish to remain anonymous, for what he gives us is an intimate picture of family life. He pretends now and then that he stands outside the family himself, but he does not pretend well. The voice speaking is a man's voice, humorous, thoughtful, tender, and a little melancholy because he has not been able to give a beloved wife and children the kingdoms of the earth as well as the treasures of heaven. At least the strain of sadness running through his reflections suggests some sense of worldly failure, although the impression unconsciously and involuntarily left on the reader is that there never was a happier household and that he does what a man can to make it happy. "I wish to goodness I made more money," he says when his wife comes back from a day in tubes and 'buses with a headache. But perhaps if he had been a successful money-grabber he would not have had time or fancy for those long delightful days with his children here and there in London. When they in their turn are old, they will remember those pilgrimages with greater pleasure than expensive toys and frocks.

Watteau. By Camille Mauclair. (Duckworth, 2s. net.)—In this brief but stimulating monograph on France's most representative painter, M. Mauclair sets out with a double aim; to show that Watteau by his discovery of the decomposition of tones was "the inventor of impressionism and the link that connects Ruysdael and Claude Lorrain with Turner, Monticelli and Claude Monet"; and "that in reality Watteau was no petit-maitre, no painter of gay and laughing scenes, but that underneath this decorative exterior lay a great soul that had . . . been stricken by what has been called the 'malady of the infinite.'" In proving his first case, the technical greatness of Watteau, M. Mauclair is completely successful, and if his arguments in the second carry less conviction, they are none the less interesting. M. Mauclair attempts to discover the man in his works and laying great stress on the painter's consumptive tendency, he finds in his pictures "an element that was altogether exceptional and unexpected, namely intellectual distinction, the representation of melancholy and love as they are conceived in the metaphysical poetry of our own time." Delightful though creative criticism be to read it is always open to the suspicion that the critic is putting more in than he is taking out of the picture. Leonardo, we imagine, would be more than a little surprised at Pater's interpretation of his Monna Lisa, and we doubt whether Watteau was conscious of the philosophy of life with which M. Mauclair has endowed him. That Watteau's works are far from being trivial as regards subject-matter, that Watteau expressed in them his views of life, his love of refinement, of quiet, of retreat from action—all this we can believe without going to the extreme of regarding all Watteau's figures as Tristans and Isolde asking each other "with weary grace and languid renunciation that terrible question of despairing love. . . . 'Tristan must we live?'" The illustrations to the volume are well chosen, but the printing leaves much to be desired, subtleties of modelling and daintiness of brushwork alike being lost in vague blurs.

A Century's Progress in Astronomy. By Hector Macpherson, jun. (Blackwood, 6s. net.)—This book claims to record in a small compass the marvellous progress made in astronomy during the past hundred years; and certainly this scheme has been followed out in a lucid and businesslike manner. William Herschel, the pioneer, forms a natural starting-point for the narrative, although indeed being born in 1738 and practically beginning his study of astronomy about 1772, he stretches back a little beyond the century's limit. Herschel was indeed a model astronomer, both in the assiduity with which he observed, the judgment with which he deduced, and the nice admixture of imagination and caution with which he theorised. After dealing with Herschel and his work at considerable, though not undue length, Mr. Macpherson narrates the development of knowledge respecting the sun, moon, planets, comets, stars, etc. during the century; and he very ably associates with each department of astronomy an account of the life and work of the men who specialised therein. Thus, the chapter on the Sun, for example, contains, the story of the various discoveries made, and a brief biography of each astronomer from Schwabe to Newcomb who has made any special contribution to our knowledge with regard to this important subject. Occasionally the references are tantalisingly brief; but after all the author cannot be blamed for adhering to the right proportions of his scheme, and further inquiry is duly stimulated. A work of this kind, owing to its very conciseness, brings out in a striking manner the variation of opinion which has taken place during the century with regard to different astronomical problems. For instance, at the end of the eighteenth century it was generally held that the Moon was a living world with volcanoes in active eruption, surrounded by an atmosphere, and inhabited. In 1837 Mädler declared the Moon to be destitute of life of any kind, while in 1866 Schmidt claimed to have proved the existence of changes upon its surface; and as recently as 1903 Pickering has concluded that volcanic activity upon the Moon has not yet ceased, and that there is a probability of the existence of organic life. Again, the Martian "canals" have had a somewhat chequered career, having been affirmed and denied more than once. However, it now appears that the camera has ranged itself upon their side, and they have finally emerged from the region of ridicule and doubt. Astronomy may be a hard mistress, but it certainly seems to inspire devotion in its followers; and we may learn from this book how most of the great discoveries of the century have been made, not by chance but by years of devoted toil. Thus Schwabe pointed his telescope at the Sun and observed the spots every clear day for forty-three years (this was not in England); and it was only after twenty-six years that he published his sun-spot cycle theory. Bessel spent upon study the hours he spared from sleep. W. F. Denning has devoted himself to the study of meteors for forty years. Neptune, while still unknown, was pursued by Hussey, Bessel and Adams, for eleven years before it was discovered in 1845. The book concludes with a chapter on celestial evolution in which the most modern theories are mentioned. It has a good index. For a later edition, two additions by way of appendices may perhaps be suggested, which would be well within the scope of the book—a bibliography and a biographical table.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Printed for the Proprietors by BAILLANTYNE & CO. LIMITED, Tavistock Street, London, and Published at the Offices of COUNTRY LIFE, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, and GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS. CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY

Royal 8vo, 16s. net each vol.

Planned by the late Lord ACTON. Edited by A. W. WARD, Litt.D. G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D. and STANLEY LEATHES, M.A.

Vol. IV. of this History, THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR, is just ready. It is the seventh volume to appear of this general history of modern times, the others published being: Vol. I—The Renaissance, II—The Reformation, III—The Wars of Religion, VII—The United States, VIII—The French Revolution, and IX—Napoleon.

Any volume may be purchased separately, at 16s. net. But subscriptions of £7 10s. net are received for the complete work in twelve volumes. Such subscriptions may be paid either at once in full, or in a sum of 12s. 6d. for each volume ready and the balance in instalments of 12s. 6d. on the publication of each of the remaining volumes.

COWLEY: ESSAYS, PLAYS & SUNDRY VERSES

Edited by A. R. WALLER, M.A.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

This companion volume to the POEMS OF ABRAHAM COWLEY already published in the same series of Cambridge English Classics contains the rest of Cowley's English writings. The earlier volume gave the whole of the poems collected for the folio which appeared the year after Cowley's death. The present gives the poems not included in the folio, his prose contents and Cowley's English plays.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net each vol.

Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by ARNOLD GLOVER, M.A. and A. R. WALLER, M.A.

Vol. IV. of this edition is ready, and contains The Tragedy of Valentinian, Monsieur Thomas, The Chances, The Bloody Brother, and The Wild-Goose Chase. The text of the edition, which is reprinted from the folio of 1670 with a record of all earlier variant readings, will be completed in ten volumes, of which four are now ready. Subscribers for complete sets of the ten volumes are entitled to purchase copies at the reduced rate of 4s. net per volume.

The PRINTERS, STATIONERS & BOOKBINDERS OF WESTMINSTER & LONDON 1476 to 1535

S

Crown 8vo, 7 plates, 5s. net.

By E. GORDON DUFF, M.A., sometime Sanders Reader in Bibliography in the University of Cambridge.

This book gives an account of the introduction of the art of printing into England and of its spread, and describes the work of the early English printers, of those foreign printers who printed abroad for sale by the "stationers" in England, and of the English bookbinders, from the introduction of printing down to the Act of Henry VIII. which restricted the importation of foreign books.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
LONDON, FETTER LANE—C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

